(12) Several charges of misconduct relate to a Ms. Cuskaden, who resided on Catalina during much of the time during which petitioner occupied the bench on the island and was well known in the courtroom, both as litigant and spectator.

1. August 19, 1983

In mid-August 1983 petitioner became aware of a letter that Ms. Cuskaden wrote to the Commission in which she alleged that he had her evicted from the courtroom and had ordered the bailiff, in doing so, to punch her in the mouth. There is evidence in the record that she posted these charges in various public places in Avalon. Petitioner wrote to Ms. Cuskaden and directed her to appear before him on August 19.[3] On that date he inquired of her whether the letter to the Commission bore her signature. When she invoked her right to remain silent, petitioner ordered her to appear in the Long Beach Municipal Court to show cause why she should not be held in contempt for the language in her letter to the Commission. He further informed her that if she were adjudged in contempt and remanded to custody, he would recommend a mental evaluation of her pursuant to Penal Code section 4011.6. Finally, unless she came as a party or a witness, he would hold her in contempt if she again appeared in his courtroom.

On the basis of the report of the masters, the Commission found two charges of wilful misconduct to be true: that petitioner had abused the contempt power and that he had failed to conduct himself in a manner promoting public confidence in the judiciary. It concluded that the acts involved malice in that he "intentionally committed acts which he knew or should have known were beyond his lawful power," engaging in a "pervasive course of conduct of overreaching his authority." (Geiler, supra, 10 Cal.3d at p. 286; see also McCartney, supra, 12 Cal.3d at p. 531.)

The Commission's findings are fully justified. Petitioner once again failed to follow the contempt procedures mandated in Code of Civil Procedure section 1211. Furthermore, petitioner should have known that his actions would undermine public confidence in the impartiality of the judiciary. His summoning Ms. Cuskaden into court at the very least suggests the appearance of singling her out to punish her for complaints about him to the Commission.

In addition, the conduct exhibited malice. Petitioner claims that he simply intended to ask her to retract the defamatory imputations of the posted letter.[4] Even if this explanation is true, the matter should have been handled by a judge who was not personally embroiled in it. (See Wenger, supra, 29 Cal.3d at p. 629.) And the masters characterized his actions as "vindictive" and "punitive." It stretches credulity to claim that summoning someone into court and initiating a contempt proceeding for writing a letter to the Commission could be done for a proper judicial purpose.

[3] Ms. Cuskaden appears also to have posted copies of the letter from petitioner, adding to it her annotations. Beneath his signature she wrote that the judge was trying to "extradite" her from the island, stated that he had her thrown out of the courtroom and had his bailiff punch her, and reported that details were to be found in her new novel, "From House Shoes to Hand Grenades." She invited the community to come to the August 19 proceeding.

[4] His explanation is belied by his stipulation in lieu of testimony, which states that petitioner ordered Ms. Cuskaden to appear in Long Beach to show cause why she should not be held in contempt for the language of her letter. There is no mention of an intended request for a retraction.

In relation to this incident petitioner was also charged with wilful misconduct for engaging in a vengeful and punitive pattern of conduct by improperly summoning Ms. Cuskaden to appear before him and later attempting to banish her from his courtroom. The Commission adopted the finding of the masters that these charges constituted only prejudicial conduct. Because they largely duplicate the two charges of wilful misconduct that we have concluded are true, we lay aside these findings.

(13a) Petitioner again summoned Ms. Cuskaden into his courtroom by a letter dated September 15, 1983. When she appeared eight days later, she attempted to disqualify him by a motion pursuant to Code of Civil Procedure section 170.6. Petitioner denied the motion as inappropriate in a contempt hearing. A peace officer then testified that he had seen Ms. Cuskaden in line to board the ferry from the island to Long Beach at approximately 11:15 a.m. on September 12. Petitioner held Ms. Cuskaden in contempt for violating his order to appear at 9 a.m. that same day in Long Beach in connection with her letter to the Commission and the material she had posted in Avalon. He sentenced her to five days in jail and a fine of $500, which could be served at the rate of $30 a day. She was remanded forthwith.

Ms. Cuskaden was brought back to petitioner's courtroom that afternoon. He had learned that her teenage son might be living alone in a motel in Avalon. A local ordinance made it an offense to allow a motel room to be occupied solely by someone under the age of 18. When he questioned her about her son's age and residence, she invoked her right to remain silent. Petitioner forthwith held her in contempt and sentenced her to an additional $500 fine and five more days in jail. On September 28 the Los Angeles Superior Court released Ms. Cuskaden on a writ of habeas corpus, and the following month it ruled the contempt orders fatally defective because the timely order required by Code of Civil Procedure section 1211 had not been filed.

The Commission concluded this series of events constituted abuse of the contempt power, failure to conduct himself in court proceedings in a manner that promotes public confidence in the impartiality of the judiciary, and vindictive and punitive conduct in improperly questioning and jailing Ms. Cuskaden regarding an uncharged collateral matter over her timely invocation of the constitutional right to remain silent. The Commission further found that the vindictive and punitive conduct in improperly summoning Ms. Cuskaden was prejudicial conduct.

The evidence once again supports these conclusions. Petitioner knew or should have known that his actions exceeded the bounds of his authority. The contempt orders were, as in the other instances, procedurally irregular. Furthermore, the masters found that Ms. Cuskaden had indeed appeared before Judge Simpson in the Long Beach Municipal Court on the day in question, and that the case was continued to September 26 for a hearing. Ironically, in his eagerness to ensure her presence in Long Beach, petitioner appears to have held her in contempt despite the fact that she went to the hearing on the appointed day, and by having her jailed for 10 days for the 2 alleged contempts on September 23 he prevented her from attending the continued contempt hearing in Long Beach on September 26.

Equally disturbing is petitioner's ordering her into his courtroom later to question her about her son's occupancy of a motel room and the addition of another count of contempt when she refused to testify on a matter over which he palpably had no jurisdiction. Finally, the imposition of fines that were sure in her case to lead to additional jail time violates the precepts of In re Antazo, supra, 3 Cal.3d at page 115.

(14) In contempt proceedings the court is often the prosecutor, judge, and jury. The contempt power is virtually unique in our system of justice because it permits a single official to deprive a citizen of his fundamental liberty interest without all of the procedural safeguards normally accompanying such a deprivation. Petitioner would have done well to recall the words of one of this court's first opinions, a case involving the future Justice Stephen J. Field: "The power [of contempt] is necessarily of an arbitrary nature, and should be used with great prudence and caution. A Judge should bear in mind that he is engaged, not so much in vindicating his own character, as in promoting the respect due to the administration of the laws . . . ." (People v. Turner (1850) 1 Cal. 152, 153.)

(13b) We must, in determining whether malice existed, also assess petitioner's purpose. He suggests that summoning Ms. Cuskaden into court was a well-meaning attempt to teach her that there was no future in disobeying lawful orders of the court. The masters, however, once again found that petitioner had engaged in vindictive and punitive conduct. His eagerness to compel that Ms. Cuskaden be made to account for her letter criticizing him to the Commission and the inquisitorial proceeding regarding her son—who would be living alone only because his mother was wrongfully held in jail—support a strong inference that his motive was to punish her and perhaps to drive her off the island. We therefore adopt the Commission's findings on this incident.

3. The Letter to Judge Herrington

(15) On March 28, 1984, Ms. Cuskaden appeared as a defendant in the Catalina Justice Court. She filed an affidavit of prejudice against petitioner under Code of Civil Procedure section 170.6. The case was then transferred to the South Bay Judicial District.

Petitioner subsequently wrote a letter to Judge Herrington of the latter court, advising her that the Cuskaden case would likely be heard in her division. The note continued that "since I have been papered, it goes without saying that I must use discretion and not attempt to influence you or any other judge." Ms. Cuskaden, he nevertheless reported, had recently been convicted by an Avalon jury but it was no longer possible to impanel an impartial group of jurors on the island. Furthermore, he warned Judge Herrington that "any statements made by this defendant should be viewed with skepticism. On at least two occasions, this defendant has libeled my bailiff and myself. . . . [H]er ability to distort and/or lie can be most persuasive."

The notice of formal proceedings contained two charges of wilful misconduct arising out of this occurrence: offering unsolicited advice to another judge on a case from which he had been disqualified, and vengeful and punitive conduct. Although the two charges focus on different aspects of the writing of the letter, they overlap considerably. We therefore adopt only one of the Commission's findings: that offering unsolicited advice to another judge constituted wilful misconduct. As we observed in Gubler, supra, 37 Cal.3d at page 54, "Since petitioner was disqualified under section 170.6 from hearing the . . . issue, it was highly improper for him to give unsolicited advice to another judicial officer on how to decide it. The right to disqualify a judge, guaranteed by section 170.6 [citations], would be undermined and perhaps vitiated if the disqualified judge were permitted to circumvent the disqualification by initiating advice to another judicial officer on how to decide the matter."

The masters observed that although in the similar Hughes incident they had found the rendering of unsolicited advice to be the lesser charge of prejudicial conduct owing to petitioner's contrition and lack of experience, in the present instance he not only should have known, but obviously was actually aware, that his action was highly improper.[5] Petitioner does not dispute this finding. But he contends that his motivation was merely to warn Judge Herrington and protect the court from possible misrepresentation. The masters, to whom we customarily defer in questions of the credibility of witnesses, characterized his explanation as "disingenuous" and stated that the gratuitous transmission of his views to Judge Herrington following his disqualification was done for vindictive and punitive motives. (Cf. Gubler, supra, 37 Cal.3d at pp. 52-54.) We agree. Indeed, petitioner virtually condemned himself by acknowledging in his letter the need to avoid influencing another judge and then proceeding to do exactly that.

4. The Dress Code Violation

(16) Posted in the Catalina courtroom was a sign with the following text: "Notice!! All parties and witnesses appearing before the court will be properly attired. Long pants and shirt. No shorts, swim suits or bare feet allowed in court room at any time." This is understandable in a resort community.

On June 15, 1984, Ms. Cuskaden entered the court as a spectator, wearing shoes, jeans, and a sweatshirt that left a shoulder bare, revealing the strap of a piece of underclothing or a bathing suit. Before court was in session, petitioner asked his bailiff to inform her that she was improperly attired and would have to leave. She declined to do so. Petitioner then took the bench and told her that she was in violation of the dress code. When she refused to leave, he held her in contempt of court and sentenced her to five days in jail and a $500 fine. She was transported to a division of the Los Angeles County Jail on the mainland, only to be released on her own recognizance later that day after she petitioned the superior court for a writ of habeas corpus. A month later the superior court granted the petition and vacated the contempt order.

Following his adjudication that Ms. Cuskaden was in contempt, petitioner ordered that she not be allowed to make a telephone call. He contends that as she was being led out of the courtroom she shouted that she wished to make a call, and that he issued the prohibition because he interpreted her utterance as a request to use the telephone on the court clerk's desk. However, we are inclined to agree with the masters who found that petitioner meant to preclude her from making any telephone calls. It is clear that this interpretation was given petitioner's utterance by his bailiff, who wrote on the booking slip that "Judge orders no phone calls." Because the bailiff was at the scene and had worked with petitioner for some time, his contemporaneous understanding of the meaning of the statement should be given substantial weight.

The Commission based two charges of wilful misconduct on this incident: abuse of the contempt power and failure to conduct himself in a manner that promotes public confidence in the impartiality of the judiciary. We concur in its conclusion that the evidence substantiates the charges. As to the contempt power, petitioner again failed to make the required written findings and an order. He seems to have learned nothing from the fact that several of his contempt orders had been set aside by higher courts for these procedural defects.[6] And once more he imposed a monetary fine on an indigent, ordering confinement if it was not paid and thus effectively quadrupling the permissible period of confinement. Furthermore, petitioner violated Ms. Cuskaden's statutory right to use the telephone (Pen. Code, § 851.5, subd. (a)), thereby jeopardizing her ability to obtain relief by a petition for habeas corpus. Singling her out for such treatment clearly does not serve to promote public confidence in the impartiality of the judiciary.

Moreover, we have seen ample confirmation of petitioner's growing animosity toward Ms. Cuskaden. These incidents do not merely reflect "procedural shortcomings," as he would have it, but are part of a disturbing pattern of wilful misconduct toward a litigant and courtroom spectator. As the masters noted, he was probably dealing with Ms. Cuskaden in a manner applauded by those who believe her to be a controversial and difficult individual. But a judge's prime responsibility is the evenhanded dispensation of justice, even for the controversial and difficult persons in society. We thus conclude that in indulging his animosity toward Ms. Cuskaden petitioner was guilty of wilful misconduct in office.

III. DISPOSITION

(1b) We have seen that the Commission, by a vote of seven to one, recommended that petitioner be removed from office. While we give serious consideration to the recommendation and its near-unanimity, the ultimate disposition rests with this court. (Spruance v. Commission on Judicial Qua-

[6]Whether Ms. Cuskaden was truly in contempt is not clear because of this failure to make findings. If she was cited for her dress, the contempt was improper because the sign was not directed at spectators. On the other hand, petitioner maintains that the masters misconstrued the order and that Ms. Cuskaden was held in contempt for her refusal to obey the order to leave and her use of vulgar language in the courtroom. But he stipulated earlier that he "found her in contempt of his order setting forth the dress code." Furthermore, his bailiff testified that "she didn't go into profanity this time." Petitioner therefore cannot now argue that the facts were otherwise, especially because he is himself responsible for the lack of findings.

Since 1964 this court has ordered the removal of five judges. The first such case was Geiler, supra, 10 Cal.3d 270, in which a judge was removed for several instances of wilful misconduct, including the use of vulgar language and sexual innuendo, prodding a deputy public defender with a dildo, curtailing cross-examination, and interfering with the attorney-client relationship. In Spruance, supra, 13 Cal.3d 778, a judge was removed from office for acting with hostility toward an attorney by failing to properly disqualify himself, maliciously attempting to prejudice a criminal defendant's case, trying to influence the disposition of criminal cases as a favor to friends and political supporters, and appointing friends and supporters as attorneys in cases in which the defendant was not entitled to counsel at public expense. We concluded in Cannon v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications (1975) 14 Cal.3d 678, 681 [122 Cal.Rptr. 778, 537 P.2d 898], that the petitioner had engaged in 21 acts constituting wilful misconduct and 8 instances of prejudicial conduct. Among the former were cases of abuse of the contempt power, unlawful interference with the attorney-client relationship, arbitrary setting of bail, instilling submissiveness in attorneys and ridiculing members of the bar, abusing the prerogatives of office, and several instances of bizarre behavior.

The next case in which a judge was removed was Wenger, supra, 29 Cal.3d 615. There we sustained 10 charges of wilful misconduct in 9 separate incidents. The wilful misconduct included failure of the judge to disqualify himself, abuse of the contempt power, and banishing a prosecutor from the courtroom because he suspected she had communicated with the Commission regarding his judicial performance. Finally, our sustaining of 18 charges of wilful misconduct and 2 charges of prejudicial conduct led to removal in Gonzalez, supra, 33 Cal.3d 359, 377. Among the incidents of wilful misconduct were interceding in criminal matters for the benefit of friends and benefactors, arbitrary bail-setting, impugning the character of his colleagues, abuse of judicial authority, making personal verbal attacks, and uttering ethnic and sexual slurs.

Petitioner's transgressions are not as numerous or as colorful as those in Cannon, for example, which is admittedly a rather egregious illustration of judicial malfeasance. His case exhibits many similarities with Wenger, however, both as to the number of sustained charges of wilful misconduct and the types of incidents. In both this case and Wenger the primary instances of misconduct consisted of abuses of the contempt power, failure of the judges to disqualify themselves, and by various means improperly injecting themselves into the adversarial process. And in each case the judge took reprisals against someone he knew or suspected had complained of his conduct to the Commission.

Petitioner concedes that some discipline is appropriate. But he maintains that the confluence of his inexperience on the bench and unusually trying circumstances mitigates his conduct. Several witnesses praised his energy and devotion. He further alleges that before the recommendation of sanctions by the Commission he became aware of his shortcomings and began attending judicial education meetings.

We have no doubt that petitioner was industrious, but hard work does not mitigate wilful misconduct. (Wenger, supra, 29 Cal.3d at p. 653.) As we stated in Cannon, supra, 14 Cal.3d at page 706, "It is manifest . . . that a lack in the quality of justice cannot be balanced by the fact that justice, such as it is, is administered in large quantities." Nor are petitioner's expressions of remorse especially persuasive. As in Wenger, "The difficulty with his professed enlightenment is its delayed arrival." (Wenger, supra, 29 Cal.3d at p. 654.) All the sustained charges of wilful misconduct occurred after he became aware that Ms. Cuskaden had been in contact with the Commission, and hence after he should have been on notice that an investigation of his conduct was possible. And he seems to have learned little from his mistakes: he improperly held Ms. Cuskaden in contempt after similar orders had twice been overturned by a higher court for procedural irregularities, and he sent an unsolicited letter to Judge Herrington even after he had been warned of its impropriety in the Hughes incident.

Petitioner urges leniency because of his inexperience. Here again an analogy with Wenger is apposite. Judge Wenger had been a deputy district attorney for five years and had been in office a mere three years before the Commission notified him that it was investigating his conduct; the Commission filed its recommendation for removal only five years after he took office. We rejected Judge Wenger's appeals to inexperience, noting that he should have known criminal procedure and that his abuses in civil matters were too serious to be explainable by lack of training. (Wenger, supra, 29 Cal.3d at pp. 653-654.) Like Judge Wenger, petitioner had been an attorney for five years, largely as a deputy district attorney and deputy public defender, before assuming the bench. And in both cases the misconduct occurred during the first few years that the judges were in office. In any event, lack of prior experience simply cannot mitigate wilful misconduct: if petitioner did not have the legal background and temperament to avoid committing malfeasance in office, he should not have sought election to the court.

We recognize that all the sustained charges of wilful misconduct involved Ms. Cuskaden, a person described in the record as a foulmouthed and intentionally disruptive spectator and litigant. But the mitigating weight of Ms. Cuskaden's courtroom demeanor is slight. (Cf. Wenger, supra, 29 Cal.3d at p. 637.) It was petitioner's duty to deal with such difficulties by lawful and proper means. As Justice Douglas of the United States Supreme Court has written, "Judges are supposed to be men of fortitude, able to thrive in a hardy climate." (Craig v. Harney (1947) 331 U.S. 367, 376 [91 L.Ed. 1546, 1552, 67 S.Ct. 1249].)

(20) The purpose of these proceedings is not to punish errant judges but to protect the judicial system and those subject to the awesome power that judges wield. (Wenger, supra, 29 Cal.3d at p. 654.) For all the reasons stated herein, that purpose will best be served in this case by adopting the recommendation of the masters and of the Commission.

We order that Judge Robert H. Furey, Jr., of the Catalina Justice Court District, Los Angeles County, be removed from office. Because the misconduct for which he is removed does not amount to grounds for disbarment or suspension from the practice of law, he shall, if otherwise qualified, be permitted to continue to practice law (Cal.Const, art. VI, § 18, subd. (d); see Wenger v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 29 Cal.3d at p. 654), but he shall be required to pass the Professional Responsibility Examination within one year (see Gonzalez v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 33 Cal.3d at p. 378); Segretti v. State Bar (1976) 15 Cal.3d 878, 891, fn. 8 [126 Cal.Rptr. 793, 544 P.2d 929]). This order is final forthwith.

Petitioner's application for a rehearing was denied December 17, 1987, and the opinion and judgment were modified to read as printed above.

[S.F. No. 25086. May 31, 1988.]

RICHARD RYAN, a Judge of the Municipal Court, Petitioner, v. COMMISSION ON JUDICIAL PERFORMANCE, Respondent.

SUMMARY

On review of a recommendation of the Commission on Judicial Performance that a municipal judge be removed from office, the Supreme Court adopted the recommendation and ordered the judge removed, holding the judge had committed four acts of willful misconduct and fourteen acts of prejudicial conduct. It held the judge's conduct exhibited a pattern of personal embroilment in the cases assigned to him, and showed a loss of temperance and objectivity on several occasions, resulting in prejudice to the parties appearing before him or an abuse of his contempt power. The court also held that the judge was given ample opportunity to conduct adequate discovery, and that admonishment by commission investigators to witnesses not to discuss the matter with the judge prior to the proceedings did not deny the judge due process. The court also rejected the contention the judge was denied due process because the commission limited argument to 45 minutes rather than the 2 hours he requested, noting the judge had the opportunity in his briefs to address every charge in detail. (Opinion by The Court.)

HEADNOTES

Classified to California Digest of Official Reports, 3d Series

(1) Judges § 6—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Commission on Judicial Performance—Court Review of Findings.—In reviewing findings by the Commission on Judicial Performance, the reviewing court properly has before it only those charges that the commission sustained.

(2) Judges § 6.4—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Preliminary Investigations—Admonishment of Witnesses—Propriety.—Prior to disciplinary proceeding against a judge, the Commission on Judicial Performance properly admonished witnesses during the preliminary investigation that they were not to talk to anyone, including the judge, about the subject of the investigation. Such admonishments were mandated by Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, and Cal. Rules of Court, rule 902(a), which require that preliminary investigations by the commission be strictly confidential. The judge was not deprived of his due process rights by the admonishments, which did not prevent him from conducting reasonable discovery after formal proceedings were brought against him.

(3) Judges § 6.4—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Admonishment of Witnesses—Propriety—Burden of Showing Prejudice.—In a disciplinary action against a judge, in which the judge claimed that admonishments by the Commission on Judicial Performance to witnesses to be silent violated his due process rights, the commission correctly placed the burden on the judge to identify (1) which witnesses were admonished, (2) which witnesses refused to speak to the judge because of the admonishments, and (3) how such refusal prejudiced the judge's preparation for the hearing. The admonishments did not deny the judge due process, since the only showing made by the judge was that substantially all of the witnesses were admonished not to speak to anyone, that some of the witnesses were admonished not to speak to him personally, and that four witnesses did refuse to speak with him. Moreover, the judge later failed to subpoena witnesses who were reluctant to speak with him, and he refused the commission's offer of a continuance.

(4) Judges § 6.4—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Due Process Rights—Adequacy of Opportunity for Oral Argument.—In a discipline proceeding against a judge, a 45 minute time limit for oral argument did not deprive the judge of his due process rights, where he had the opportunity in his briefs to address every charge in detail.

(5) Judges § 6—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Court Review of Findings—Standard of Review.—In reviewing the findings of the Commission on Judicial Performance to insure that there is clear and convincing evidence to sustain the charge to a reasonable certainty, special weight is given to the factual determinations of the masters, and great weight is given to the legal conclusions of the commission.

(6a, 6b) Judges § 6.2—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Grounds—Willful Misconduct.—The charge of willful misconduct, as distinguished from prejudicial conduct, refers to unjudicial conduct which a judge acting in his judicial capacity commits in bad faith. To prove bad faith, it must be shown that the judge intentionally committed acts he knew or should have known to be beyond his power, and that he committed them for a purpose other than faithful discharge of judicial duties. The test is an objective one.

(7) Judges § 6.2—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Grounds—Prejudicial Conduct.—The charge of prejudicial conduct comprises conduct which the judge undertakes in good faith but which would nonetheless appear to an objective observer to be unjudicial and harmful to the public esteem of the judiciary. It also refers to unjudicial conduct committed in bad faith by a judge not acting in an official capacity.

(8) Judges § 6.2—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Grounds—Willful Misconduct—Unauthorized Contempt Procedure.—A judge committed willful misconduct in holding an attorney in contempt for remarks made outside the judge's presence and after the court session had ended, where the order was both procedurally and substantively invalid, the judge was experienced and should have known proper contempt procedures, and, even after he realized his contempt order was invalid, he still pursued the matter with the district attorney and did not notify the alleged contemnor that the matter was dropped until two weeks later. The conduct of the attorney found in contempt, a heated discussion with the court clerk, did not rise to the level of contemptuous behavior, and did not interfere with court proceedings nor lower esteem for the judiciary.

[See Cal.Jur.3d, Judges, § 62; Am.Jur.2d, Judges, § 19.]

(9) Judges § 6.2—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Grounds—Willful Misconduct—Contempt Procedures.—A judge committed willful misconduct by abusing the contempt power in ordering a bailiff to take a party in a civil action into custody for contempt after she had protested his decision, summarily sentencing her to jail for 24 hours without notice or an opportunity to be heard, and relying on his bailiff for advice as to the statute to cite in his order. Willful ignorance of contempt procedures by an experienced judge constitutes bad faith.

(10) Judges § 6.2—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Grounds—Willful Misconduct—Improper Sentence.—A judge committed willful misconduct by sentencing a man convicted of driving under the influence to 30 days in jail, where the judge had told a deputy district attorney at the pretrial conference he would do so to teach the man's attorney a lesson for refusing the standard plea bargain and demanding a jury trial. The judge also refused to state his reasons for the sentence in the record, but commented to the press that the sentence was intended to discourage costly and time-consuming jury trials. The judge also relied on a fabricated allegation of perjury as the reason for the sentence, as he had told the deputy district attorney he would do, despite the fact that perjury had never been charged or determined. A willingness to fabricate justifications for a challenged ruling is misconduct of the worst kind, evidencing moral turpitude and dishonesty.

(11) Judges § 6.2—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Grounds—Willful Misconduct—Interference With District Attorney.—A judge committed willful misconduct by calling a district attorney ex parte and urging him to pursue a sodomy charge as a felony rather than as a misdemeanor. Even though the misconduct did not prejudice the defendant, the judge attempted to intrude into the charging authority of the administrative branch of government and deprived a defendant of an impartial magistrate by advocating a harsher charge. The judge knew or should have known that his conduct was beyond his lawful authority and its purpose, viewed objectively, went outside the scope of the judicial function.

(12) Judges § 6.2—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Grounds—Prejudicial Conduct—Criminal Trial—Ex Parte Investigation.—A judge engaged in prejudicial conduct when, in the midst of a criminal trial involving a hit-and-run accident, the judge conducted his own investigation of the matter without notice to the parties and later interrupted the defense case and called a car parts manager as the court's own witness. The evidence presented by the judge was extremely damaging to defendant's case. By undertaking a collateral investigation the judge abdicated his responsibility for deciding the parties' dispute on the pleadings and evidence properly brought before him.

(13) Judges § 6.2—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Grounds—Prejudicial Conduct—Dismissal of Criminal Charges—Improper Personal Reasons.—On review by the Supreme Court, a judge was entitled to dismissal of charges that he had issued an order dismissing criminal charges against a female defendant for improper personal reasons. During a discussion in chambers with defendant and others, defendant, wearing a low-cut sweater, bent over several times to remove documents from her purse, and the judge, later responding to his clerk's query as to why he had dismissed the charges against defendant, replied, "she showed me her boobs." However, the judge contended that his comment was only a joke and that his decision was based on the documents the defendant removed from her purse, and the testimony was evenly balanced on the question. Thus, there was not clear and convincing proof that the documents submitted by defendant did not provide an adequate basis for the judge's ruling.

(14) Judges § 6.2—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Grounds—Prejudicial Conduct—Interference With Work-release Program.—A judge's improper action in reinstating a defendant to a work-release program after she had been terminated therefrom by the probation department constituted prejudicial conduct. The judge did not have authority under Pen. Code, § 4024.2, to order defendant into the work-release program. The judge became personally embroiled in the case and exhibited bad faith in threatening to retain "the most expensive lawyer that he could find" to defend his actions.

(15) Judges § 6.2—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Grounds—Prejudicial Conduct—Acting in Absence of Counsel.—A judge committed prejudicial conduct when, without notice to a defendant's counsel, the judge asked defendant whether he wanted to proceed with sentencing without his attorney present and then sentenced defendant to jail after defendant had said he wanted to get it over with. The judge erred in failing to notify defendant's counsel of record prior to sentencing and in accepting an invalid waiver of counsel. However, given defendant's statement that he wanted to proceed without counsel, the judge's actions did not rise to the level of willful misconduct.

(16) Judges § 6.2—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Grounds—Prejudicial Conduct—Ignoring Defendant's Request for Counsel.—A judge committed prejudicial misconduct when, during a revocation of probation proceeding, the judge, without waiting for appointed counsel to arrive, asked defendant if he had done the acts alleged in the petition to revoke parole and, on defendant's admission, directed the probation officer to prepare a report and have it ready for defendant's sentencing. Although there was no evidence of bad faith, the judge's conduct in ignoring defendant's request for counsel and continuing to extract a confession from him was prejudicial.

(17) Judges § 6.2—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Grounds—Prejudicial Conduct—Absence of Court Reporter.—A judge's failure to provide a court reporter for criminal defendants appearing in propria persona, and his failure to instruct them that they had a right to a verbatim record, deprived them of a constitutional right and constituted prejudicial conduct.

(18) Judges § 6.2—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Grounds—Prejudicial Conduct—Communication With Press.—A judge, by showing a decision to the press before it was in final form and by discussing his decision with the press before he had informed the parties of his ruling, engaged in prejudicial conduct.

(19) Judges § 6.2—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Grounds—Prejudicial Conduct—Comments to Press—Pending Matters.—A judge committed prejudicial conduct in discussing a contempt order against an attorney with the press while the matter was pending in the superior court on petition for writ of habeas corpus. The judge informed a newspaper reporter that he planned to vacate the order of contempt, but would ask another judge to review the matter, while the attorney only learned of the intention to vacate the order by reading the local newspaper; he did not receive formal notice of the order vacating contempt for another two weeks.

(20) Judges § 6.2—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Grounds—Prejudicial Conduct—Comments to Press—Sufficiency of Evidence.—In proceedings by the Commission on Judicial Performance, there was not clear and convincing evidence that a judge committed prejudicial conduct by defending his disposition in a "dog custody" case to the press, where all of the statements made by the judge and reported in the press were statements that he made from the bench while the press was present in the courtroom. The judge merely declared that the parties had reached a settlement and announced what amounted to an interlocutory judgment granting temporary joint custody of the dog to both parties. Although it was alleged the judge was "grandstanding" for the press during the court session, there was not clear and convincing evidence of any impropriety.

(21) Judges § 6.2—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Grounds—Prejudicial Conduct—Comments to Press Explaining Sentence.—It was prejudicial conduct for a judge, who had improperly imposed a 30-day jail sentence on a defendant charged with driving under the influence who requested a jury trial and was later convicted, to defend his sentence by discussing the pending matter with the press and writing a letter to the editor explaining his sentence.

(22) Judges § 6.2—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Grounds—Prejudicial Conduct—Offensive Sexual Jokes.—A judge committed two acts of prejudicial conduct when he told two sexual jokes to female attorneys who were in his chambers with others, which the attorneys found offensive. Although the judge intended the comments as jokes and later apologized to some of the individuals present, the fact the judge was acting in his official capacity when he told one of the jokes provided ample support for the determination that the judge committed prejudicial conduct. The fact that they were told during a hearing in his chambers made little difference; his conduct was just as improper as if he had told the joke from the courtroom bench.

(23) Judges § 6.2—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Grounds—Prejudicial Conduct—Absenteeism.—A municipal judge's work routine amounted to prejudicial conduct on account of his practice of leaving the courthouse after his calendars were completed, usually in the early afternoon. Administrative duties must be discharged with the same diligence as adjudicative duties (Cal. Code Jud. Conduct, canon 3(B)(1)). It was therefore improper for the judge to leave the moment his adjudicative duties were completed, and the fact that police officers, deputy district attorneys, and other members of the public could not reach the judge in the afternoon supported the conclusion that the judge failed to fulfill certain aspects of his judicial function.

(24) Judges § 6.4—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Aggravating and Mitigating Circumstances.—Aggravating and mitigating circumstances are appropriate factors to consider in determining judicial discipline.

(25) Judges § 6—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Willful Misconduct and Prejudicial Conduct—Removal.—Removal from office was the appropriate disposition for a municipal judge found to have committed four acts of willful misconduct and fourteen acts of prejudicial misconduct, where his conduct exhibited a pattern of personal embroilment in the cases assigned to him. He had lost his temperance and objectivity on several occasions, resulting in prejudice to the parties appearing before him or an abuse of his contempt power. He also attempted to defend his position in the courts and in the media with little regard to procedure or judicial decorum. The purpose of protecting the judicial system and those subject to the awesome power that judges wield would best be served by removal of the judge from office.

OPINION

THE COURT.—The Commission on Judicial Performance (hereafter the Commission) recommends that Municipal Court Judge Richard J. Ryan, of the Roseville-Rocklin Judicial District of Placer County, be removed for "wilful misconduct in office" (hereafter wilful misconduct) and "conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute" (hereafter prejudicial conduct). (Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (c).) Judge Ryan petitions this court for remand to the Commission, alleging that he was denied due process of law because (1) numerous witnesses in these disciplinary proceedings were admonished not to speak to the judge or anyone, and (2) the Commission limited Judge Ryan's oral argument time to 45 minutes rather than the 2 hours he had requested. Judge Ryan also petitions for review,[1] alleging that the Commission's findings of fact and conclusions of law are not supported by clear and convincing evidence.

After independently reviewing the record, we conclude that Judge Ryan has not been deprived of due process in this disciplinary proceeding. Moreover, we conclude that the Commission's recommendation of removal is supported by clear and convincing evidence.

I. Background Information.

Judge Ryan is 39 years of age and was born in San Mateo, California. He served in the Air Force from 1965 to 1968 and graduated from San Diego State University in 1971. The judge attended the University of San Diego Law School and graduated from that institution in 1974. He was admitted to the California State Bar soon after.

Judge Ryan moved to Auburn, where he worked in a law office for two years and then went into sole practice for another two years. In 1978 he was elected as a judge of the Justice Court for the Foresthill Judicial District. In 1982 he became municipal court judge in the Roseville-Rocklin Judicial District, Placer County, where he has served to the present time.

The Commission served Judge Ryan with notice of formal proceedings on January 14, 1986. Three special masters (the masters) were appointed to take testimony on this matter, and the Commission appointed examiners to present the case. After 13 days of hearings, the masters found that Judge

[1] Judge Ryan's petition states that it is made pursuant to rule 920(c) of the California Rules of Court. However, rule 920 applies only to Commission determinations for private admonishment. Rule 919, on the other hand, applies to review of Commission recommendations of censure or removal from office. It therefore appears that Judge Ryan intended to file a petition for review under rule 919(b), and we treat the petition as so filed.

Ryan had engaged in numerous acts of wilful misconduct and prejudicial conduct. The Commission then heard oral argument in the matter and determined that Judge Ryan committed three acts of wilful misconduct in office and seventeen acts of prejudicial conduct. The Commission dismissed 17 other charges as not proven. (1) In reviewing the Commission's findings and conclusions, we are concerned only with the charges that the Commission sustained. (Wenger v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1981) 29 Cal.3d 615, 622 [175 Cal.Rptr. 420, 630 P.2d 954]; Spruance v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications (1975) 13 Cal.3d 778, 784, fn. 5 [119 Cal.Rptr. 841, 532 P.2d 1209].) The Commission recommended removal by a vote of five to two. The two commissioners in the minority espoused censure.

II. Petition for Remand Based on Alleged Due Process Violations.

A. Propriety of Admonishments.

Judge Ryan contends that he was denied due process of law because the examiners improperly admonished the witnesses during the preliminary investigation that they were not to talk to anyone about the subject of the investigation. The judge claims that this admonishment prevented him from adequately preparing for his defense because certain witnesses refused to speak with him.

The pertinent facts may be summarized briefly and are not in dispute. From September through December of 1985, the Commission conducted a preliminary investigation into the judicial performance of Judge Ryan. The investigation consisted of sworn interviews with over 100 people. After each interview, the examiners informed the interviewees of the confidential nature of the investigation and told them not to speak to anyone about it. Moreover, in some of the interviews the examiners admonished the interviewees specifically not to speak to Judge Ryan. While the preliminary investigation was being conducted, Judge Ryan wrote several letters to the Commission, objecting to the admonishments given to the witnesses. The Commission responded that it was not aware of any improprieties.

After the notice of formal proceedings was served, the judge received discovery information from the examiners from January through March, including tapes of the investigative interviews and lists of prospective witnesses. During this time Judge Ryan did not retain counsel or avail himself of applicable discovery procedures that would have allowed him to compel information from hesitant witnesses.[2]

On March 31, 1986, the first day of hearings before the masters, Judge Ryan made a motion to dismiss or exclude evidence based on the allegedly improper admonishments. The masters placed the burden on the judge to identify which persons had been improperly admonished and which persons refused to speak to the judge as a result of the improper admonishments. The judge offered evidence that he had tried to speak to four witnesses, but that they had refused to speak with him. He claims he stopped seeking information at that point because the admonishments rendered his discovery futile.

Although Judge Ryan never proved that the admonishments caused the witnesses to refuse to speak with him, the masters nevertheless directed the examiners to send letters to those individuals who had been admonished, informing those witnesses that they were free to speak to the judge if they wished. The examiners initially sent letters only to those persons who had been admonished not to speak to Judge Ryan personally. However, on April 8, 1986, while the hearing before the masters was still pending, the examiners sent another 66 letters to every prospective witness they intended to call in the proceeding, informing those people that they could speak to the judge if they wished. The hearing before the masters continued through April 21, 1986.

On the third day of the hearings, the examiners indicated that they would agree to a continuance so that Judge Ryan could interview any witnesses he wished. The judge rejected a continuance, stating that the examiners should have to "live with" their errors. The masters then indicated that they would grant the judge a continuance at any time so that he could interview any of the witnesses that he claimed were improperly admonished, but the judge chose to stand on the record as it existed. During the remainder of the hearing, the masters began the practice of informing each witness who took the stand that they could speak to Judge Ryan. The masters subsequently denied the judge's motion for dismissal or exclusion of evidence.

(2) Article VI, section 18 of the California Constitution and rule 902(a) of the California Rules of Court require that preliminary investigations by the Commission be strictly confidential.[3] Such confidentiality protects a

[2]Rule 910 of the California Rules of Court gives the judge the right to subpoena witnesses. Moreover, Government Code section 68752 provides procedures to compel a witness to attend or testify, and section 68753 provides the authority for ordering depositions.

[3]Article VI, section 18, of the California Constitution provides for the suspension or removal of judges. Subdivision (f) of section 18 states: "The Judicial Council shall make rules judge from premature public attention and also protects the witnesses from intimidation. (McCartney v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications (1974) 12 Cal.3d 512, 520-521 [116 Cal.Rptr. 260, 526 P.2d 268]; Mosk v. Superior Court, supra, 25 Cal.3d 474, 491.) In admonishing the interviewees as to the confidentiality of the proceedings, the examiners were faithful to the constitutional mandate of article VI, section 18. Moreover, newspaper articles published during the preliminary investigation indicate that the witnesses properly refused to speak to the press about the investigation because they had been admonished that the proceedings were confidential. Thus, the admonishments served their intended purpose.

Nevertheless, a judge certainly has the right to conduct a proper defense in disciplinary actions. Rule 910 of the California Rules of Court provides that "[i]n formal proceedings involving his censure, removal, retirement or private admonishment, a judge shall have the right and reasonable opportunity to defend against the charges by the introduction of evidence, to be represented by counsel, and to examine and cross-examine witnesses. He shall also have the right to the issuance of subpoenas for attendance of witnesses to testify or produce books, papers, and other evidentiary matter." (Italics added.) While the language of rule 910 specifies a judge's right to conduct an adequate defense, it also indicates that the right attaches once formal proceedings are instituted. A judge does not have the same right while the Commission is conducting its preliminary investigation.

As we stated in McCartney, supra, 12 Cal.3d at page 519, during the preliminary investigation stage the Commission has not yet begun its adjudicatory function, "but is merely attempting to examine citizen complaints in a purely investigatory manner." During this investigatory period the Commission must have the freedom to collect accurate and untainted information. The accuracy of the investigation could be compromised if the witnesses were allowed to discuss the matter with others, especially the judge. For this reason, the examiners conducting the investigation were correct in admonishing the witnesses not to speak to anyone.

Simply stated, a judge does not have the right to defend against a proceeding that has not yet been brought.

implementing this section and providing for confidentiality of proceedings." Subdivision (f) has been held to require confidentiality in disciplinary proceedings before the Commission. (Mosk v. Superior Court (1979) 25 Cal.3d 474, 499 [159 Cal.Rptr. 494, 601 P.2d 1030].) Moreover, rule 902(a) of the California Rules of Court provides: "Except as provided in this rule, all papers filed with and proceedings before the Commission, or before the masters appointed by the Supreme Court pursuant to rule 907, shall be confidential until a record is filed by the Commission in the Supreme Court. Upon a recommendation of censure, all papers filed with and proceedings before the Commission or masters shall remain confidential until the judge who is the subject of the proceedings files a petition in the Supreme Court to modify or reject the Commission's recommendation or until the time for filing a petition expires."

Thus, the issue presented is limited to whether the admonishments prevented the judge from conducting reasonable discovery after formal proceedings were brought against him. Although we have no reason to disbelieve Judge Ryan's claim that several witnesses refused to speak with him, we nevertheless conclude that he has not made a sufficient showing of prejudice.

(3) The masters correctly placed the burden on the judge to identify (1) which witnesses were admonished, (2) which witnesses refused to speak to the judge because of the admonishment, and (3) how such refusal prejudiced the judge's preparation for the hearing. (McCartney, supra, 12 Cal.3d at p. 519 ["relief from . . . the Commission's failure . . . may be secured by petitioner only upon a showing of actual prejudice"].) The only showing made by the judge was that substantially all of the witnesses were admonished not to speak to "anyone," that some of the witnesses were admonished not to speak to him personally, and that four individuals actually did refuse to speak with him. This showing was insufficient in light of the clear need to protect confidentiality and accuracy in the preliminary investigation and the fact that the witnesses could have refused to discuss the matter with the judge for a variety of reasons not associated with the admonishment.

Moreover, once formal proceedings were brought, Judge Ryan had the power under rule 910 to subpoena witnesses who were reluctant to speak with him. He also had the power to compel depositions and testimony under Government Code sections 68752 and 68753. The judge never utilized these procedural tools.

Furthermore, the examiners and the masters made a tremendous effort to alleviate any prejudice that may have resulted from the admonishments. Judge Ryan rejected these efforts and refused the offer of a continuance.[4]

For these reasons, we conclude that Judge Ryan was given ample opportunity to conduct adequate discovery. The admonishments did not deny him due process.

B. Rejection of Requested Argument Time.

(4) Judge Ryan also contends that he was denied due process because the Commission refused to provide his counsel with adequate oral argument

[4]Judge Ryan argues that it would have been "absurd" to accept a continuance when it was offered to him during the hearing, because by that time the witnesses probably suffered from loss of memory due to the passage of time. It is therefore incongruous that he should ask us to remand his case now so that he can conduct proper discovery. Surely the witnesses' memories are not getting any better as time goes on.

time to present his defense. The judge requested 2 hours, but the Commission limited argument to 45 minutes for each side. The judge argues that 45 minutes was insufficient to address the numerous charges brought against him and asks that we remand his case to the Commission for further argument.

Rule 914 of the California Rules of Court provides: "[T]he Commission shall give the judge and the examiner an opportunity to be heard orally before the Commission . . . ." However, the rule does not specify a minimum time allotment for oral argument.

Nevertheless, 45 minutes for oral argument is certainly a reasonable time limit. Argument before this court is limited to 45 minutes even in automatic appeals, where the issues are often more numerous and complex. (Cal. Rules of Court, rule 22.)

Judge Ryan had the opportunity in his briefs to address every charge in detail. Moreover, as a result of the questioning by the Commissioners, Judge Ryan's counsel was allowed to argue for a total of 59 minutes. The Commission did not abuse its discretion in limiting the oral argument time. Judge Ryan's petition for remand is denied.

III. Petition for Review of Commission's Findings and Conclusions.

A. Standard of Review.

(5) We independently review the findings of the Commission to ensure that there is clear and convincing evidence to sustain the charge to a reasonable certainty. (Gonzalez v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1983) 33 Cal.3d 359, 365 [188 Cal.Rptr. 880, 657 P.2d 372]; Geiler v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications (1973) 10 Cal.3d 270, 275 [110 Cal.Rptr. 201, 515 P.2d 1].) In doing so, we give special weight to the factual determinations of the masters, who are best able to evaluate the truthfulness of the witnesses appearing before them. (Gubler v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1984) 37 Cal.3d 27, 34 [207 Cal.Rptr. 171, 688 P.2d 551]; Wenger, supra, 29 Cal.3d at p. 623.) At the same time, we accord great weight to the legal conclusions of the Commission. (Wenger, supra, 29 Cal.3d at p. 623.)

which would nonetheless appear to an objective observer to be unjudicial and harmful to the public esteem of the judiciary. It also refers to unjudicial conduct committed in bad faith by a judge not acting in an official capacity. (Furey v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1987) 43 Cal.3d 1297, 1304-1305 [240 Cal.Rptr. 859, 743 P.2d 919]; Gonzalez, supra, 33 Cal.3d at p. 365; Geiler, supra, 10 Cal.3d at p. 284 and fn. 11.)

(6b) When a judge is acting in an official capacity, the critical distinction between wilful misconduct and prejudicial conduct is the presence of bad faith or malice. (Furey, supra, 43 Cal.3d at p. 1304.) In Wenger v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 29 Cal.3d 615, we enunciated a two-prong test for the determination of bad faith or malice. It must be shown that the judge intentionally "(1) committed acts he knew or should have known to be beyond his power, (2) for a purpose other than faithful discharge of judicial duties." (Id. at p. 622, fn. 4.) Both prongs of the Wenger test apply an objective, rather than subjective, standard. The objective approach is consistent with our holdings in judicial discipline cases prior to the adoption of the Wenger two-prong test. (See Geiler, supra, 10 Cal.3d at p. 277.) The objective approach is also consistent with canon 2 of the California Code of Judicial Conduct, which provides that a judge should avoid the "appearance" of impropriety.

B. Charged Instances of Misconduct.

1. The Starks Matter.

(8) Dean H. Starks, an attorney, was in court for an unrelated matter when he observed a friend, Charles Jergo, appearing before Judge Ryan without counsel on several misdemeanor charges. Starks attempted to intervene on behalf of the defendant regarding the issue of release on bail. Judge Ryan thanked Starks, but stated he had already made his decision. Judge Ryan then left the courtroom. Once the court session had ended, Starks approached another attorney in the courtroom and jokingly asked when the next judicial election would be held. Judge Ryan's court clerk, Samantha Spangler, overheard Starks's question and stated that Starks's comment was inappropriate. Starks then began to explain his friendship with Jergo, while Spangler defended the judge's ruling. The conversation became heated and the bailiff had to intervene. Starks did not make any derogatory comments about the judge during the exchange, and the entire conversation occurred out of the judge's presence.

Spangler immediately went to Judge Ryan's chambers and informed him of what transpired. The judge called Starks into his chambers. Following an unsworn recitation of the facts by certain witnesses, Judge Ryan held Starks in contempt of court and summarily sentenced him to a $200 fine or three days in jail. The judge gave Starks three days to pay the fine.

Starks immediately filed a petition for writ of habeas corpus in the superior court. Soon after, Judge Ryan told the press that he intended to drop the contempt charge. Nevertheless, Judge Ryan asked the district attorney to research contempt law for him and did not inform Starks that he was dropping the contempt order until two weeks later. The contempt order was later invalidated by the superior court.[5]

The masters concluded that Judge Ryan committed wilful misconduct in this matter. The Commission agreed. The Commission determined that Judge Ryan should have known his contempt order was both substantively and procedurally invalid. Moreover, the Commission determined that the judge's continued pursuit of the contempt case was done in bad faith and for an improper purpose.

Judge Ryan completely ignored the procedures required for issuing contempt orders. Starks could not be held in direct contempt because his statements were made outside the judge's presence and after the court session had ended. (Code Civ. Proc., § 1209, subd. (b).)[6] Moreover, the judge failed to follow the procedures for indirect contempt outlined in section 1211 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Section 1211 requires that an affidavit be presented to the judge reciting the facts constituting contempt. No such affidavit was presented. Judge Ryan found Starks guilty of contempt merely on the basis of the unsworn testimony presented in his chambers. Thus, the Commission was correct in concluding that Judge Ryan's contempt order was procedurally invalid.

The Commission also correctly concluded that the contempt order was substantively invalid. The comment made by Starks regarding the next judicial election was mild. Those who accept judicial office must expect and endure such criticism. As one court aptly stated, "the judge must be long of fuse and somewhat thick of skin." (DeGeorge v. Superior Court (1974) 40 Cal.App.3d 305, 312 [114 Cal.Rptr. 860].) Moreover, Starks's heated discussion with Spangler did not rise to the level of contemptuous behavior. Starks's conduct did not interfere with court proceedings, nor did it lower esteem for the judiciary.

[5]Judge Ryan dropped the contempt charge before the superior court heard the matter. Despite the apparent mootness of the issue, the superior court chose to decide the matter to redress any harm the contempt order had on Starks's reputation in the community.

[6]Section 1209, subdivision (b) provides: "No speech or publication reflecting upon or concerning any court or any officer thereof shall be treated or punished as a contempt of such court unless made in the immediate presence of such court while in session and in such a manner as to actually interfere with its proceedings."

In Cannon v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications (1975) 14 Cal.3d 678 [122 Cal.Rptr. 778, 537 P.2d 898], we held that ignorance of proper contempt procedures, without more, constituted bad faith. (Id. at p. 694.) In Cannon we emphasized that Judge Cannon was an experienced judge, with more than nine years on the bench. Judge Ryan is also experienced, having served on the justice court bench for four years and on the municipal court bench since 1982. Judge Ryan should have known, or should have researched, the proper contempt procedures in this matter. His failure to do so constituted bad faith under the Wenger two-prong test.

However, Judge Ryan's ignorance of contempt procedure was not his only transgression in this matter. Judge Ryan testified that he knew he had made mistakes immediately after he held Starks in contempt. Nevertheless, even after the judge realized his contempt order was invalid, he still pursued the matter with the district attorney and did not notify Starks that the matter was dropped until two weeks later. This conduct also constituted bad faith. We agree with the Commission that Judge Ryan committed wilful misconduct.

2. The Hiter Matter.

(9) Maxine Hiter appeared as a defendant in a civil matter before Judge Ryan. The judge ordered Hiter to pay a judgment. Hiter was upset and protested the decision, but later apologized for her outburst. As she was leaving the courtroom she remarked, "you can't get blood out of a turnip." Judge Ryan heard the comment and ordered his bailiff to take her into custody for contempt. The judge summarily sentenced her to jail for 24 hours without notice or an opportunity to be heard. Judge Ryan then relied on his bailiff for advice as to the code section to cite in his order. The order improperly cited Penal Code section 166.1 and did not include a summary of facts constituting contempt. Hiter served 24 hours in the county jail.

This is another inexcusable example of Judge Ryan's abuse of the contempt power. Once again, the judge completely ignored contempt procedures. He failed to return Hiter to court to inform her that she was in contempt. Moreover, he never gave her a chance to respond to the contempt order. Judge Ryan also committed unjudicial conduct in relying on his bailiff for the legal citations to put in his order.

As we stated in the Starks matter, ante, wilful ignorance of contempt procedures by an experienced judge constitutes bad faith. Although the masters concluded that the judge's conduct was merely prejudicial, we agree with the Commission that Judge Ryan committed wilful misconduct in this matter.

3. The Wiggins Matter.

(10) David Wiggins appeared before Judge Ryan on a charge of driving under the influence. Judge Ryan offered him a "no time" disposition at the pretrial conference. Wiggins rejected the offer and requested a jury trial. The judge then privately told Deputy District Attorney Jess Bedore that he was going to teach Wiggins's attorney a lesson for seeking a jury trial. The judge said he would sentence Wiggins to 30 days in jail if the jury convicted him. When Bedore expressed reservations, Judge Ryan said the sentence would be for refusing the standard plea bargain. However, Judge Ryan added that he could further justify the long sentence by stating that Wiggins committed perjury during his trial.

Wiggins was convicted by the jury. Judge Ryan, in accordance with his pretrial statement to Bedore, sentenced Wiggins to 30 days in jail, plus fines and assessments. The sentence was unusually severe for such a conviction. Wiggins's attorney asked the judge to state his reasons for the sentence on the record. Judge Ryan refused. The next day the judge made comments to the press which appeared on the front page of the local newspaper. Judge Ryan told the press that the Wiggins sentence was intended to discourage costly and time-consuming jury trials and that "there had to be some incentive not to go to trial."[7]

Wiggins brought a habeas corpus action in the superior court challenging the sentence imposed. Judge Ryan hired a private attorney at county expense to defend his sentence. When Judge Ryan was ordered by the superior court to justify his sentence, but only after the judge had exhausted his appellate remedies, he stated that the sentence was justified because of Wiggins's perjury at trial.

The masters and the Commission both determined that the judge committed wilful misconduct in this matter.

In the case of In re Lewallen (1979) 23 Cal.3d 274 [152 Cal.Rptr. 528, 590 P.2d 383, 100 A.L.R.3d 823], we held that a judge is precluded from imposing a more severe sentence based on the accused's election to proceed to trial. Such conduct by a judge chills the exercise of the constitutional right to trial by jury. (Id. at p. 281.)

[7]Judge Ryan is separately charged with improperly communicating with the press. To avoid the danger of double-counting misconduct arising from the same activity, we discuss the details of the press charges infra. Nevertheless, we include some of Judge Ryan's statements to the press at this point because they provide evidence of his improper motives in sentencing Wiggins.

Although trial judges have broad sentencing discretion, clear and convincing evidence supports the Commission's determination that Judge Ryan based his sentence on improper factors. The judge stated to Bedore that he would teach Wiggins's attorney a lesson. He also refused to state his reasoning for the sentence to Wiggins's attorney, but admitted to the press that there had to be some incentive to plea bargain. Moreover, the judge privately told Bedore that he could support the sentence by claiming that Wiggins committed perjury during trial, even though the trial had not yet occurred. Then, when the superior court ordered the judge to justify the sentence, Judge Ryan relied on his fabricated allegation of perjury despite the fact that perjury had never been charged or determined.

The misconduct in this matter is especially serious because it indicates that the judge was willing to fabricate justifications for a challenged ruling. This is misconduct of the worst kind, evidencing moral turpitude and dishonesty. We agree with the Commission that Judge Ryan committed wilful misconduct.

4. The Jacks Matter.

(11) Robert Jacks appeared at a preliminary hearing in Judge Ryan's court to answer on a felony sodomy charge. After the preliminary hearing, the judge learned that the district attorney intended to prosecute on misdemeanor charges. The judge called the district attorney ex parte and urged him to pursue the matter as a felony.

The judge's misconduct did not prejudice the defendant. The district attorney did not follow the judge's suggestion to pursue the matter as a felony and the judge had nothing further to do with the case. Nevertheless, the fact that no harm was done to defendant does not lessen the judge's culpability.

Although the masters and the Commission both concluded that this conduct was merely prejudicial, we conclude that it constituted wilful misconduct. Judge Ryan attempted to intrude into the charging authority of the administrative branch of government. Moreover, he deprived the defendant of an impartial magistrate by advocating a harsher charge.

In Gonzalez v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 33 Cal.3d 359, we addressed similar misconduct. In that case Judge Gonzalez attempted to persuade the district attorney to drop charges in matters that were not before the judge. We concluded that such activity constituted wilful misconduct. (Id. at 369.)

Applying the Wenger test (supra, 29 Cal.3d 615) to the case at bar, Judge Ryan knew or should have known that his conduct was beyond his lawful authority, and the purpose of his conduct, viewed objectively, went outside the scope of the judicial function. Judge Ryan acted in bad faith and his misconduct was wilful.

5. The Handcock Matter.

(12) In the midst of a criminal jury trial involving a hit-and-run accident, Judge Ryan conducted his own investigation of the matter. Without notice to the parties, the judge directed his bailiff to contact a local auto dealer's parts manager. The judge wanted to obtain a rear light lens for the type of vehicle driven by defendant, so that he could compare the lens with trial evidence. The judge then went on a lunch break, sought out the parts manager with the lens, and determined that the lens matched defendant's car. Back in court, the judge interrupted the defense case and called the parts manager as the court's own witness. The judge did this with minimal notice to the parties and over objection from both sides. The evidence presented by the judge was extremely damaging to defendant's case.

Defendant's resulting conviction was later set aside by the appellate department of the superior court because of Judge Ryan's misconduct. (People v. Handcock (1983) 145 Cal.App.3d Supp. 25 [193 Cal.Rptr. 397].) The court found no authority for the judge's investigation. (Id. at p. Supp. 32.) Moreover, the appellate department also held that although a judge may call and examine witnesses (Evid. Code, § 775), the manner in which Judge Ryan placed his own witness on the stand (by interrupting the defendant's testimony) seriously prejudiced the defendant. (Handcock, supra, 145 Cal.App.3d at p. Supp. 31.)

The masters and the Commission both determined that the judge's conduct was prejudicial.

Wenger v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 29 Cal.3d 615, involved similar misconduct. In that case Judge Wenger conducted his own investigation, suspecting that one of the parties had made false statements in the briefing. The Commission found that Judge Wenger " 'should have known that it was beyond his lawful authority to conduct an ex parte investigation . . . .' " (Id. at p. 632.) The Commission determined that Judge Wenger's conduct was prejudicial. We agreed, concluding: "By undertaking a collateral investigation [the judge] abdicated his responsibility for deciding the parties' dispute on pleadings and evidence properly brought before him." (Ibid.)

We conclude that Judge Ryan's handling of the Handcock case was improper and constituted prejudicial conduct.

6. The Merkle Matter.

(13) Madeleine Merkle was charged with various misdemeanor drug violations. Judge Ryan ordered her into the drug diversion program. Later, the probation department sought to have Merkle removed from the program, alleging that she was not complying with program rules. The probation department sought to have criminal proceedings reinstituted.

Merkle was called into the judge's chambers to discuss the matter. A deputy district attorney, a deputy public defender and the judge's clerk were also present. During the conversation, Merkle, who was wearing a low-cut sweater, bent over several times to remove documents from her purse. Thereafter the judge dismissed all criminal charges against her. When his clerk asked why the charges had been dropped, Judge Ryan replied, "she showed me her boobs."

Judge Ryan is charged with issuing his order to dismiss Merkle's criminal charges for improper personal reasons. The judge contends that his comment was only a joke and that his decision was based on the documents Merkle removed from her purse, which showed that she had successfully completed the drug diversion program.

The masters determined that the charge against Judge Ryan was not proven. However, the Commission disagreed, concluding that the charge was proven and that Judge Ryan's conduct was prejudicial.

Although there is much to find wrong with Judge Ryan's "joke," we nevertheless cannot exceed the scope of the formal charge brought against him. (Wenger, supra, 29 Cal.3d at pp. 638-639; Cannon, supra, 14 Cal.3d at p. 696.) We conclude that although Judge Ryan's comment was in very poor taste, the charge that he based his order on improper personal reasons has not been proven by clear and convincing evidence. While inferences may be drawn from the record that the documents presented by Merkle did not justify the judge's order,[8] we nevertheless agree with the masters that the testimony is evenly balanced on the question. The witnesses present at the hearing testified that Merkle gave the judge documents that she said proved her completion of the diversion program. Those documents were not placed into evidence. Thus, we cannot find clear and convincing proof that the documents submitted by Merkle did not provide an adequate basis for Judge Ryan's ruling. We defer to the masters' findings of fact and dismiss the charge.

[8]The examiners enumerate the following facts in support of their position that Judge Ryan made his ruling for improper reasons: (1) the probation department reported to Judge Ryan that Merkle had not attended the counselling program and had failed to report regularly to the department; (2) the deputy public defender did not argue for dismissal of the case and did not believe Merkle's chances for reinstatement to the diversion program were good; (3) if Merkle did have proof of completion of the program, she did not bother to show it to her own attorney prior to the hearing; (4) the district attorney and the deputy public defender who were present at the time cannot remember what proof Merkle offered to the judge, and both

7. The Mitchell Matter.

(14) Deborah Mitchell pled guilty in Judge Ryan's court to a violation of the Vehicle Code (unlawful taking or driving of an automobile). Judge Ryan suspended execution of sentence and ordered two years probation. As a condition of probation, Judge Ryan committed Mitchell to the county jail for 20 days, but ordered that she serve the time in the work-release program.

The probation department subsequently terminated Mitchell from the work-release program because of an alleged back injury. Mitchell notified Judge Ryan of the termination and the judge scheduled a hearing in the matter. Over objection, Judge Ryan reinstated Mitchell into the program. When the probation department again terminated Mitchell from the program because she refused to comply with program rules, the judge again scheduled a hearing. After being advised by the deputy county counsel that he had no authority to act in the matter, Judge Ryan threatened to obtain "the most expensive lawyer that he could find" if his actions were challenged. Writ proceedings were pursued by the county counsel and Judge Ryan hired a private attorney to represent the court, failing to comply with a county requirement that he submit a written request to hire counsel. The judge later billed the county for counsel's services. The superior court subsequently determined that Judge Ryan had unlawfully ordered Mitchell into the work-release program. Both the masters and the Commission found the judge's conduct to be prejudicial.

Penal Code section 4024.2 provides that the administrative official in charge of county correctional facilities may offer a voluntary work-release program in lieu of jail time.[9] Subdivision (a) of section 4024.2 states that the were surprised at the dismissal of the case; (5) the deputy public defender was so surprised by the dismissal that he consulted other members of the bar to determine his responsibilities; and (6) there is no documentary proof of Merkle's completion of the program in the court file.

[9]Penal Code section 4024.2 provides in pertinent part: "(a) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the board of supervisors of any county may authorize the sheriff or other official in charge of county correctional facilities to offer a voluntary program under which any person committed to such facility may perform a minimum of 8 and a maximum of 10 program may only be offered to someone already committed to the correctional facility. Moreover, subdivision (c) provides that a person is eligible for the program at the discretion of the administrative official in charge of the program, subject to the fitness of the person for the program and compliance with the rules of the program.

As the superior court correctly held, Judge Ryan did not have authority under Penal Code section 4024.2 to order Mitchell into the work-release program. A judge has the power to commit a person to a correctional facility, but then the administrative official in charge of the facility has the discretionary power to offer work release if the person is deemed eligible under the rules of the program.

Thus, Judge Ryan erred in twice ordering Mitchell into the work-release program. Moreover, although the superior court admitted that the question of Mitchell's due process right to a hearing upon termination from the program was legitimately raised, the judge nevertheless should have appointed counsel for Mitchell so that she could seek habeas corpus relief. Instead, Judge Ryan hired a private attorney to defend his actions. He then billed the county for the attorney fees.

This is another instance where the judge became personally embroiled in a case before him. He exhibited bad faith in threatening to retain "the most expensive lawyer that he could find." Nevertheless, we do not find wilful misconduct here, because the record indicates that the judge may have been genuinely concerned with Mitchell's situation. We do conclude, however, that the judge's improper actions constituted prejudicial conduct.

8. The Cabrera Matter.

(15) Rick Cabrera, represented by the public defender, pled guilty to two misdemeanor counts in Judge Ryan's court. Cabrera subsequently failed to appear for sentencing and a bench warrant issued. After apprehension, Cabrera was again brought before Judge Ryan. Without notice to Cabrera's counsel, the judge asked Cabrera whether he wanted to proceed hours of labor on the public works or ways in lieu of one day of confinement . . . . [¶] (b) The board of supervisors may prescribe reasonable rules and regulations under which such labor is to be performed and may provide that such persons wear clothing of a distinctive character while performing such work. . . . [¶] (c) Nothing in this section shall be construed to require the sheriff or other such official to assign labor to a person pursuant to this section if it appears from the record that such person has refused to satisfactorily perform labor as assigned or has not satisfactorily complied with the reasonable rules and regulations governing such assignment . . . . [¶] A person shall be eligible for work release under this section only if the sheriff or other such official in charge concludes that such person is a fit subject therefor."

with sentencing without his attorney present. Cabrera said, "I don't see if it's going to make any difference," and then indicated that he wanted to "get it over with." Judge Ryan sentenced Cabrera to jail. Cabrera's defense attorney then challenged the judge's action in a petition for writ of habeas corpus. In granting habeas corpus relief, the superior court held that counsel should have been formally notified of the sentencing and that Cabrera did not make a knowing and intelligent waiver of the right to counsel. Both the masters and the Commission found that the judge's conduct was prejudicial.

We agree that Judge Ryan erred in failing to notify Cabrera's counsel of record prior to sentencing. (In re Haro (1969) 71 Cal.2d 1021, 1028-1029 [80 Cal.Rptr. 588, 458 P.2d 500]; In re Martinez (1959) 52 Cal.2d 808, 813 [345 P.2d 449].) He also erred in accepting an invalid waiver of counsel. We held in Gonzalez v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 33 Cal.3d 359, that conducting judicial proceedings in the absence of counsel constitutes judicial misconduct. (Id. at p. 372.) In that case, Judge Gonzalez conducted proceedings without waiting for counsel to arrive, claiming that he abhorred tardiness. We found Judge Gonzalez had committed wilful misconduct. (Ibid.)

Given Cabrera's statement that he wanted to proceed without counsel, we do not believe the judge's actions rise to the level of wilful misconduct. We conclude that the judge committed prejudicial conduct in this matter.

9. The Burgess Matter.

(16) Defendant Burgess was represented by counsel and pled guilty to a misdemeanor charge. He was placed on formal probation for three years. Many months later, the probation department petitioned for revocation of probation based on Burgess's subsequent criminal convictions. Burgess appeared in Judge Ryan's chambers for the revocation-of-probation proceedings. There was no court reporter present. The judge asked Burgess if he wanted an attorney. Burgess said that he did. The minute order indicates that Judge Ryan then appointed a public defender to represent Burgess. However, without waiting for appointed counsel to arrive, the judge asked Burgess if he had done the acts alleged in the petition to revoke parole. Burgess admitted that he had. The judge then turned to the probation officer, who was present at the hearing, and directed her to prepare a report and have it ready for Burgess's sentencing. With that, the hearing was concluded.

The masters and the Commission both determined that Judge Ryan's conduct was prejudicial. Although there is conflicting testimony in the record as to whether Burgess actually requested counsel, the masters found that he did make such a request. We defer to the masters' finding of fact on this question. (Gubler v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 37 Cal.3d 27, 34.) Thus, we conclude that the judge ignored Burgess's request for counsel and continued to extract a confession from him. Although there is no evidence of bad faith, the judge's conduct was prejudicial.

10. Court Reporter Charges.

(17) Judge Ryan is charged with three instances of prejudicial conduct for failing to provide a court reporter in criminal hearings. The pertinent facts surrounding these matters may be summarized briefly. The court administrator for Placer County advised all members of the court, including Judge Ryan, of the case of In re Armstrong (1981) 126 Cal.App.3d 565 [178 Cal.Rptr. 902], which held that it is a violation of due process and equal protection to deny a verbatim record upon request in all municipal court criminal proceedings. Funds were appropriated in January 1983, for reporters to serve the Municipal Court of Placer County on a daily basis. Judge Ryan took the position that reporters were not required and directed the clerk of his court to discharge the reporters assigned to his courtroom unless a timely request was made for their presence. To ensure that a court reporter would be present in Judge Ryan's courtroom, the district attorney's office began stamping a request for a court reporter on every pleading or motion filed. However, individuals appearing without counsel were not advised of their right to have a reporter, and hence did not know they had to request one.

In one incident, Judge Gilbert of the superior court remanded a matter to Judge Ryan because of Judge Ryan's failure to provide a reporter. Judge Ryan telephoned Judge Gilbert to express his disagreement with the latter's decision and stated that reporters were not required and their presence resulted in an unnecessary expense to the county.

In the Bremer matter, Judge Ryan accepted defendant's waiver of a preliminary hearing in the absence of a court reporter. The superior court remanded the case back to Judge Ryan because of the omission.

The Mitchell matter, discussed previously, involved the judge's unauthorized placement of Mitchell into the work-release program. In a separate disciplinary count against Judge Ryan arising from the same matter, the probation department had requested a reporter at the hearing. The request was denied by Judge Ryan as untimely, because no request had been made prior to the hearing.

Finally, the previously discussed Burgess matter involved the charge that Judge Ryan ignored Burgess's request for counsel. As a separate count of improper conduct, it was alleged that the judge failed to provide a court reporter upon return of the bench warrant and that he also sentenced Burgess without a reporter present.

In all three of the counts enumerated above (Bremer, Mitchell, and Burgess) the masters and the Commission concluded that the judge committed prejudicial conduct. Judge Ryan contends that Armstrong, supra, 126 Cal.App.3d 565, required verbatim records only upon request, and that he did provide court reporters whenever a timely request was made. Moreover, Judge Ryan points out that he eventually began to provide court reporters on a regular basis after the district attorney and the board of supervisors made it known that reporters were desired.

The judge correctly interprets Armstrong as requiring a court reporter upon request. However, he misperceives the significance of his failure to instruct defendants appearing in propria persona that they had a right to a verbatim record. The judge's stubborn and obstructionist attitude effectively denied those defendants their constitutional right to have a reporter present.

We concur with the masters and the Commission that Judge Ryan's conduct in these matters was prejudicial.

11. Communication With the Press.

The Commission determined that Judge Ryan made improper comments to the press in four pending cases before him. The Commission stated in its ruling that "[w]hen cases are pending it is entirely improper for a judge to use the media either as a platform or as a method of responding to criticism. In some instances, his comments have drawn unfavorable reaction from the press and in others, prejudiced litigants."

(18) In the Nutrition Site matter, Judge Ryan informed the parties that he would mail them his written decision. A short time later a newspaper reporter learned that the judge had finished his opinion in the case. The reporter came to Judge Ryan's chambers and asked if she could see the decision. Although the judge admitted to the masters that the decision was still only in draft form, he nevertheless showed it to the newspaper reporter and discussed his rationale for deciding the case. Judge Ryan's statements appeared in the local newspaper before the parties received copies of the decision.

The masters and the Commission both concluded that this was prejudicial conduct. We agree. Canon 3A(6) of the California Code of Judicial Conduct provides: "Judges should abstain from public comment about a pending or impending proceeding in any court . . . ." By showing his decision to the press before it was in final form and by discussing his decision with the press before he had informed the parties of his ruling, Judge Ryan acted improperly.

(19) We have previously discussed the Starks matter, which involved the contempt order for Attorney Starks. In a separate count, Judge Ryan is charged with discussing his contempt order with the press while the matter was pending. Specifically, Judge Ryan informed a newspaper reporter that he planned to vacate his order of contempt, but would ask another judge to review the matter. Starks learned of Judge Ryan's intention to vacate the contempt order by reading the local newspaper. Starks did not receive formal notice of Judge Ryan's order vacating contempt for another two weeks.

After stating to the press that he intended to drop the contempt charge, Judge Ryan nevertheless went on to defend his contempt order in the press. He is reported as saying: "I was told [Starks] was really out of line, but since there was something negative said about me and since it involved my clerk, I don't want to appear biased and will let another judge decide." Judge Ryan added that Starks had said "some really rude and nasty things in court," and "[a] judge has to protect the integrity of the court, and it's not proper for loud, derogatory statements to [be] made in fron[t] of the whole courtroom as soon as the judge leaves."

Judge Ryan made his statements to the press while the validity of his contempt order was pending in the superior court on petition for writ of habeas corpus. As canon 3A(6) of the California Code of Judicial Conduct expressly states, the judge acted improperly in commenting on pending matters. We agree with the masters and the Commission that Judge Ryan's conduct was prejudicial.

[10]Judge Ryan argues in his response brief that the McGinnis matter is not properly before us because the Commission specifically incorporated into its decision certain exhibits (examiners' exhibits 14, 15, 16-22, 25, 26, 28-31) as the basis for its conclusion of prejudicial conduct, and none of those exhibits involve the McGinnis matter. Judge Ryan's argument is without merit. Exhibit 56 is a newspaper article pertaining to the McGinnis case. Although the Commission did not list this exhibit in making its determination, the Commission did state that it was relying on four charges of improper communication with the press. Moreover, because we independently review the record in disciplinary proceedings (Furey, supra, 43 Cal.3d at p. 1304), we are not limited by the Commission's failure to cite certain exhibits in support of its determinations.

and the Commission determined Judge Ryan's comments to be prejudicial. However, the record indicates that all of the statements made by the judge and reported in the press were statements that he made from the bench while the press was present in the courtroom. Judge Ryan merely declared that the parties had reached a settlement and announced what amounted to an interlocutory judgment granting temporary joint custody of the dog to both parties. Although the examiners allege that Judge Ryan was "grandstanding" for the press during the court session, we do not find clear and convincing evidence of any impropriety in this matter.

(21) Finally, in the previously discussed Wiggins matter, which involved the judge's imposition of a 30-day jail sentence because Wiggins requested a jury trial, the judge is separately charged with defending his sentence by discussing the pending matter with the press and writing a letter to the editor explaining his sentence. There is clear and convincing evidence to support the findings of the masters and the Commission, and we agree with the Commission that the judge committed prejudicial conduct.

12. Offensive Jokes to Female Attorneys.

(22) The Commission determined that Judge Ryan committed two acts of prejudicial conduct when he told offensive jokes to female attorneys in his chambers.

The judge admits telling the following joke while two female attorneys, among others, were present in his chambers: "It's during the period of creation and God has just gone ahead and has made—he's made the earth and the stars and the wind and some of the animals. He's still creating things. Adam and Eve have been created. They discover each other and they discover the physical portions of each other and they lay down and they make love. When they finish, Eve leaves for a little while and then returns. When she returns, she—or Adam says, where have you been? She says, I went to the stream to wash off. And Adam says, gee, I wonder if that's going to give a scent to the fish?" The two female attorneys were offended by the joke.

In another count, two female attorneys, among others, appeared before the judge in his chambers to conduct a preliminary hearing. Judge Ryan asked the two female attorneys if they knew the difference "between a Caesar salad and a blow job." When the attorneys responded that they did not know the difference, the judge said, "Great, let's have lunch." The attorneys were offended.

Judge Ryan intended these comments as jokes. He later apologized to some of the individuals present. The masters found that the judge had indeed made the comments, but that his conduct was not prejudicial. The Commission disagreed, concluding that prejudicial conduct existed.

It is sometimes difficult to determine the line between "extremely poor taste" and "conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute." Nevertheless, we believe the fact that the judge was acting in his official capacity when he told the Caesar salad joke provides ample support for the Commission's determination that the judge committed prejudicial conduct. When Judge Ryan told the Caesar salad joke, the two female attorneys were appearing before him for a preliminary hearing. The fact that the hearing was conducted in Judge Ryan's chambers makes little difference; his conduct was just as improper as if he had told the joke from the courtroom bench.[11]

In Geiler v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications, supra, 10 Cal.3d 270, we removed Judge Geiler from office because of his vulgar and profane statements and conduct, among other things. Two of Judge Geiler's vulgar comments are illustrative: (1) Referring to his female court clerk while she was present, Judge Geiler asked other men in his chambers, "How would you like to eat that?" (2) In conversations with his female clerk, the judge occasionally asked, "Did you get any last night?" We found the comments made by Judge Geiler to be prejudicial.

As we stated in Gonzalez v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 33 Cal.3d 359, "[d]erogatory remarks, although made in chambers or at a staff gathering, may become public knowledge and thereby diminish the hearer's esteem for the judiciary—again regardless of the speaker's subjective intent or motivation. The reputation in the community of an individual judge necessarily reflects on that community's regard for the judicial system." (Id. at p. 377.) We conclude that Judge Ryan's offensive and insensitive jokes constituted prejudicial conduct.

(23) The masters and the Commission also determined that Judge Ryan committed two counts of prejudicial conduct because of his practice of leaving the courthouse after his calendars were completed, usually in the early afternoon. The evidence shows that Judge Ryan regularly left the courthouse at 2 p.m. each day. On Fridays, he often left in the morning and did not return. Numerous witnesses testified that the judge's short hours made it necessary for police and deputy district attorneys to bring warrants and other matters in the morning before the judge left. Moreover, many witnesses testified that the municipal court was in need of another judge, but that the board of supervisors refused to provide one until it was shown that all of the judges were currently working full-time.

In the Fitzpatrick matter, the Commission determined that the clerk had to tell members of the public that Judge Ryan was not available because he had gone for the day. In another count, the Commission found that the judge's abbreviated hours caused the presiding judge to issue an order providing that all judges had to advise the presiding judge if they completed their judicial business and intended to leave before 3 p.m.

Canon 3B(1) of the California Code of Judicial Conduct provides: "Judges should diligently discharge their administrative responsibilities, maintain professional competence in judicial administration, and facilitate the performance of the administrative responsibilities of other judges and court officials." As canon 3B(1) makes clear, administrative duties must be discharged with the same diligence as adjudicative duties. It was therefore improper for Judge Ryan to leave the moment his adjudicative duties were completed. The fact that police officers, deputy district attorneys and other members of the public could not reach the judge in the afternoons supports the conclusion that the judge failed to fulfill certain aspects of his judicial function.

We therefore agree with the Commission that Judge Ryan's work routine amounted to prejudicial conduct.

IV. Aggravating and Mitigating Circumstances.

(24) Aggravating and mitigating circumstances are appropriate factors to consider in determining judicial discipline. (See Furey, supra, 43 Cal.3d 1297, 1319-1320.) The record in this case does not provide evidence of aggravating circumstances. Although Judge Ryan presented mitigating evidence, such evidence is insufficient to reduce the level of discipline.

V. Disposition.

Petitioner's application for a rehearing was denied June 30, 1988, and the opinion was modified to read as printed above.

(25) We conclude that Judge Ryan has committed four acts of wilful misconduct and fourteen acts of prejudicial conduct. We dismiss two charges of misconduct that have not been proven by clear and convincing evidence.

The judge's conduct exhibits a pattern of personal embroilment in the cases assigned to him. He has lost his temperance and objectivity on several occasions, resulting in prejudice to the parties appearing before him or in abuse of his contempt power. He has attempted to defend his position in the courts and in the media with little regard for procedure or judicial decorum.

"The purpose of these proceedings is not to punish errant judges but to protect the judicial system and those subject to the awesome power that judges wield." (Furey, supra, 43 Cal.3d at p. 1320.) That purpose will best be served by adopting the recommendation of the Commission that Judge Ryan be removed from office.

We order that Judge Richard Ryan, Municipal Court Judge of the Roseville-Rocklin Judicial District, Placer County, be removed from office. Because the misconduct for which he is removed does not amount to grounds for disbarment, he shall, if otherwise qualified, be permitted to practice law (Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (d); see Wenger v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 29 Cal.3d at p. 654), on condition that he pass the Professional Responsibility Examination (see Gonzalez v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 33 Cal.3d at p. 378). This order is effective upon the finality of this decision.

Petitioner's application for a rehearing was denied June 30, 1988, and the opinion was modified to read as printed above.

[No. S007641. July 31, 1989.]

BERNARD P. McCULLOUGH, Petitioner, v.
COMMISSION ON JUDICIAL PERFORMANCE, Respondent.

SUMMARY

The Supreme Court ordered that a justice court judge be removed from office based on findings that he had committed four acts of willful misconduct and one act of persistent failure to perform his judicial duties. There was substantial evidence that the judge had directed a guilty verdict against one criminal defendant, and had conducted a trial of two other defendants in one defendant's absence and in the absence of their attorneys. He had also used his office to benefit a personal friend by improperly dismissing a criminal charge against the friend. He had also failed to sign a judgment form for over six years after the motion for the judgment had been granted, and even after he had been publicly censured by the Supreme Court for such failure. (Opinion by The Court.)

HEADNOTES

Classified to California Digest of Official Reports, 3d Series

(1) Judges § 6.4—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Proceedings—Review.—When disciplining a member of the judiciary, the Supreme Court undertakes an independent evaluation of the record in order to determine whether clear and convincing evidence supports the recommendation of the Commission on Judicial Performance. In so doing the court gives special weight both to the factual findings of the special masters, because of their ability to evaluate the credibility of the witnesses at the hearing, and to the conclusion of the commission, because of its expertise in matters of judicial conduct.

(2) Judges § 6.2—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Grounds.—A judge may be censured or removed for engaging in willful misconduct in office, persistent failure or inability to perform his duties, habitual intemperance in the use of intoxicants or drugs, or conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute (Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (c)). Willful misconduct, the most serious charge, occurs when a judge commits acts which he knows, or should know, are beyond his authority for reasons other than the faithful discharge of his duties. Though a judge must act in bad faith in order to commit willful misconduct, he need not necessarily seek to harm a particular litigant or attorney; disregard for the legal system in general will suffice. Unlike willful misconduct, the charge of prejudicial conduct does not require the presence of bad faith. It occurs when a judge, though acting in good faith, engages in conduct which adversely affects public opinion of the judiciary. Though "less grave" than willful misconduct, prejudicial misconduct may nevertheless, by itself, justify removal. Persistent failure, also an independent ground for removal, focuses on a judge's legal and administrative competence and omissions.

[See Cal.Jur.3d, Judges, § 62; Am.Jur.2d, Judges, § 19.]

(3) Judges § 6.2—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Grounds—Willful Misconduct—Directing Guilty Verdict.—A justice court judge who directed a jury to find guilty a defendant charged with a Vehicle Code violation was guilty of willful misconduct and abridgement of defendant's right to trial by an impartial jury. The judge clearly should have known that attempting to direct a jury to return a guilty verdict in a criminal action was beyond his judicial authority. The fact that the conviction was reversed on appeal did not justify or excuse the judge's action, which deprived defendant of his fundamental right to be tried by a jury and manifested disrespect for the constitutional protections of the legal system.

(4) Judges § 6.2—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Grounds—Willful Misconduct—Using Power to Benefit Friend.—It was willful misconduct for a justice court judge to use his judicial office to advance the private interests of a personal friend by continuing the friend's criminal case for over two years and then dismissing it without explanation, in violation of Pen. Code, § 1385, subd. (a). In addition, the judge failed to disqualify and recuse himself from the case. It was not a defense that the judge was waiting for some action by the district attorney's office and the action was dismissed because the office never took any action, since the responsibility for the arraignment rested with the judge, as the presiding judge, not with the district attorney's office. Using the power of the bench to benefit a friend is a casebook example of willful misconduct and the judge should have known that failing to arraign the friend, continuing the case several times, and then dismissing it was improper. The evidence supported the conclusion that the judge's reason for taking those actions was not the faithful discharge of his judicial duties.

(5) Judges § 6.2—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Grounds—Willful Misconduct—Ordering Trial in Absence of Defendant and Attorney.—A justice court judge who violated two criminal defendants' right to representation by ordering their trials to proceed despite the absence of their attorneys was guilty of willful misconduct as to each case. Although the granting of continuances and the imposition of sanctions are discretionary, a judge must hold a hearing to determine whether a request for a continuance that did not comply with the court's rules was made in good faith, and the judge had failed to hold such a hearing. To enforce continuance rules, the judge should have given greater consideration to the statutory option of sanctioning defense counsel, rather than penalizing defendants by ordering their trials to proceed in the absence of their attorneys. Also, one defendant had been absent, too. Conducting judicial proceedings in the absence of the defendant and counsel seriously interferes with the defendant's right to representation under U.S. Const., 6th Amend.

(6) Judges § 6.2—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Grounds—Persistent Failure to Perform Duties.—A justice court judge who failed to sign a judgment form for over six years after the motion for judgment had been granted, and after he had been censured for his failure, was guilty of persistent failure to perform his judicial duties.

(7) Judges § 6.4—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Proceedings—Prejudicial Publicity.—The presence of a prosecutor in the courtroom when the Commission on Judicial Performance served a justice court judge with its notice of formal proceedings, and the appearance of a newspaper article about the proceedings on the following day, did not, by themselves, show that the commission violated the rules of confidentiality relating to discipline of members of the judiciary.

(8) Judges § 6—Removal.—It was appropriate that the Supreme Court adopt the recommendation of the Commission on Judicial Performance that a justice court judge be removed from office where he had committed four acts of willful misconduct and one act of persistent failure to perform his judicial duties. The judge deprived criminal defendants of their constitutional rights by directing a guilty verdict against one defendant and conducting a trial of two others in one defendant's absence and in the absence of their attorneys, used his office to benefit a personal friend, and failed to perform the most basic of judicial duties. The judge's 10 years' experience as a district attorney certainly acquainted him with the rules of court and criminal procedure. Moreover, the judge had failed to respond to a previous public censure, evidencing a lack of regard for the commission, the Supreme Court, and his obligations as a judge. Removal would best serve the purpose of the proceedings, which is not to punish errant judges but to protect the judicial system and those subject to the awesome power that judges wield.

OPINION

THE COURT.—The Commission on Judicial Performance (hereafter the Commission) unanimously recommends that we remove Bernard P. McCullough from his office as judge of the Justice Court of the San Benito Judicial District, San Benito County. Judge McCullough asks us to reject the Commission's recommendation, alleging that it is not supported by the evidence. The San Benito County Bar Association filed an amicus curiae brief in support of Judge McCullough's position. After reviewing the record and the judge's objections, we adopt the Commission's recommendation.

BACKGROUND

Judge McCullough was born and raised in Hollister, California. After practicing law in San Francisco for almost 10 years, he returned to Hollister in 1967 to serve as District Attorney of San Benito County. In 1977, he was appointed to the Justice Court, and has since been elected and reelected.

In April 1987, we publicly censured Judge McCullough for failing to decide a case for almost four years and for continuing to execute salary affidavits even though cases remained pending in his court for more than 90 days. (See discussion of count 6, infra, p. 197.) At that time, we noted that he had ignored three private admonishments from the Commission to act promptly on the cases before him. (In re McCullough (1987) 43 Cal.3d 534, 535 [236 Cal.Rptr. 151, 734 P.2d 987].)

In the instant matter, the Commission served Judge McCullough with a notice of formal proceedings on September 24, 1987, alleging six counts of misconduct. (Cal. Rules of Court, rule 905; all subsequent rule references are to the California Rules of Court.) Count 1 alleges that Judge McCullough abridged a defendant's right to trial by an impartial jury when he directed the jurors to find the defendant guilty. Count 2 alleges that he used his judicial office to advance the private interests of a personal friend by continuing the friend's case for over two years, and then dismissing it without explanation in violation of Penal Code section 1385, subdivision (a). The third and fourth counts allege that the judge violated defendants' rights to representation when he ordered their trials to proceed in the absence of their attorneys. Count 5 involved the judge's failure to advise convicted misdemeanants of their rights on appeal under rule 535. The sixth count alleges that he failed to perform his judicial duties by not disposing of a matter pending before him for over six years.

We appointed the Honorable Robert K. Barber, retired judge of the Alameda County Superior Court, the Honorable George H. Barnett, retired judge of the Santa Clara County Superior Court, and the Honorable Jane A. York, judge of the Fresno County Justice Court, to serve as special masters, to take evidence on the alleged counts of misconduct, and then to report their findings to the Commission. (Rule 907.) The hearing spanned four days in May 1988. (Rules 908, 909.) The special masters concluded that counts 1, 2, 3 and 4 constituted wilful misconduct in office, that count 5 did not constitute misconduct at all, and that count 6 constituted persistent failure by the judge to perform his judicial duty. (Rule 912.)

In October 1988, the Commission accepted the special masters' characterization of counts 1, 2, 4, and 6, dismissed count 5, but concluded that count 3 constituted conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute rather than wilful misconduct. By a vote of eight to zero, it recommended removal of Judge McCullough. (Rule 917.) The judge then petitioned this court for review of the recommendation. (Rule 919(b).)

STANDARD OF REVIEW

(1) When disciplining a member of the judiciary, we undertake an independent evaluation of the record in order to determine whether clear and convincing evidence supports the Commission's recommendation. (Ryan v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1988) 45 Cal.3d 518, 530 [247 Cal.Rptr. 378, 754 P.2d 724].) In so doing, we give special weight both to the factual findings of the special masters, because of the masters' ability to evaluate the credibility of the witnesses at the hearing, and to the conclusions of the Commission, because of its expertise in matters of judicial conduct. (Ibid.)

(2) We may censure or remove a judge for engaging in "wilful misconduct in office, persistent failure or inability to perform the judge's duties, habitual intemperance in the use of intoxicants or drugs, or conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute." (Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (c).)[1] Wilful misconduct, the most serious charge, occurs when a judge commits acts (1) which he knows, or should know, are beyond his authority (2) for reasons other than the faithful discharge of his duties. (Furey v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1987) 43 Cal.3d 1297, 1305 [240 Cal.Rptr. 859, 743 P.2d 919].) Though a judge must act in bad faith (id., at p. 1304) in order to commit wilful misconduct, he need not necessarily seek to harm a particular litigant or attorney; disregard for the legal system in general will suffice. (Geiler v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications (1973) 10 Cal.3d 270, 286 [110 Cal.Rptr. 201, 515 P.2d 1].) Unlike wilful misconduct, the charge of prejudicial conduct does not require the presence of bad faith. (Furey, supra, 43 Cal.3d at p. 1304.) It occurs when a judge, though acting in good faith, engages in conduct which adversely affects public opinion of the judiciary. (Geiler, supra, 10 Cal.3d at p. 284.) Though "less grave" than wilful misconduct (id., at p. 283), prejudicial conduct may nevertheless, by itself, justify removal. (id., at p. 284, fn. 11.) Persistent failure, also an independent ground for removal, focuses on a judge's legal and administrative competence and omissions.

COUNT 1—THE SUMAYA MATTER

(3) Count 1 alleges that Judge McCullough abridged Richard Sumaya's right to trial by an impartial jury by directing the jurors sitting on his case to find him guilty. Sumaya plead not guilty to a charge of riding a bicycle while under the influence of alcohol. (Veh. Code, § 21200.5.) The matter proceeded to trial. During the prosecution's closing argument to the jury, Judge McCullough interrupted the prosecutor, told him to "sit down," and then said to the jurors: "Ladies and gentlemen, I want you to go in that room and find the defendant guilty." Five minutes later, when the jurors returned with a guilty verdict, the judge commented that, "For a while there, ladies and gentlemen, I thought you were not going to follow my instructions." After conviction, the district attorney's office contacted Sumaya's counsel, advising him to appeal; following Sumaya's appeal, the appellate department of the superior court eventually reversed the conviction.

[1] We will refer to "wilful misconduct in office" as "wilful misconduct," "persistent failure or inability to perform the judge's duties" as "persistent failure," and "conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute" as "prejudicial conduct." "Habitual intemperance in the use of intoxicants or drugs" is not at issue in this case.

In response to this charge, Judge McCullough claims that he directed the jury to bring in a guilty verdict because Sumaya had admitted all elements of the offense on the witness stand. The record supports a finding, however, that Sumaya never actually testified at trial. He also asserts that, at the time of Sumaya's trial, he believed that federal law allowed a judge to direct a guilty verdict when the defendant's guilt is, in the view of the judge, undisputed. He now acknowledges that neither federal nor state law authorizes such an instruction, regardless of the judge's opinion of the defendant's guilt. Moreover, he clearly should have known that attempting to direct a jury to return a guilty verdict in a criminal action was beyond his judicial authority. (Gonzalez v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1983) 33 Cal.3d 359, 369 [188 Cal.Rptr. 880, 657 P.2d 372] ["Petitioner's patent misunderstanding of the nature of his judicial responsibility serves not to mitigate but to aggravate the severity of his misconduct."].)

The judge further argues that witnesses at the hearing before the special masters gave contradictory testimony regarding the number of witnesses who actually testified at Sumaya's trial and whether the police had subjected Sumaya to a blood-alcohol test. Resolution of these testimonial contradictions is irrelevant to the issue before us, however, because the Commission's charge of wilful misconduct did not rest on proof of those facts. Judge McCullough admits that he committed the act which formed the basis of the Commission's charge, i.e., that he directed the jury to find Sumaya guilty. Finally, the fact that Sumaya's conviction was reversed does not justify or excuse the judge's action. Depriving a criminal defendant of his fundamental right to be tried by a jury manifests disrespect for the constitutional protections of our legal system. We conclude that Judge McCullough's instruction to the jury directing a guilty verdict constituted wilful misconduct.

COUNT 2—THE CERRATO MATTER

(4) Count 2 alleges that Judge McCullough used his judicial office to advance the private interests of Frank Cerrato, a personal friend of his, by continuing Cerrato's criminal case for over two years and then dismissing it without explanation, in violation of Penal Code section 1385, subdivision

(a). The criminal action against Cerrato arose out of a domestic dispute between Cerrato and his wife. The police went to the Cerrato home in response to a call; when Mrs. Cerrato refused to file a criminal complaint against her husband, the district attorney's office charged him with obstructing a police officer in the performance of his duties. (Pen. Code, § 148.)

Frank Cerrato and his twin brother Harold are lifelong friends of Judge McCullough; Harold was a member of the board of supervisors when the board first appointed the judge to the bench. The day before Frank's arraignment, the Cerratos went to the judge's home, where Frank told the judge the story of his arrest and asked the judge to excuse him from appearing on the next day. (The Cerratos owned an apricot orchard and Frank's arrest occurred in the midst of the harvest season.) Frank testified at the hearing before the special masters that Judge McCullough told him that the arresting officer had apparently "overreacted" and that he "should go home and pick his apricots." Frank did not appear in court on either the next day or any later date, and testified that he "presumed" the district attorney had dismissed the case when the court returned the bail money to his brother two years later.

The judge admits that he committed the acts that form the basis of the Commission's charge—that he had an improper ex parte conversation with Frank,[2] never arraigned him on the obstructing charge, continued the case approximately 20 times over a 2-year period, later took the case off calendar, and eventually dismissed the case, without ever explaining his actions or advising the district attorney's office.[3] In addition, he failed to disqualify and recuse himself from the case even though he stated that he planned to do so.

In his defense, the judge alleges that he continued the case 20 times because he was waiting for some action by the district attorney's office, and that he dismissed the case because the office never took any action.[4] How-

[2]During the Commission's investigation, the judge admitted in correspondence with the Commission that he had spoken about the case with Harold but failed to disclose his conversation with Frank.

[3]Under the calendaring system in use at the time, the district attorney's office did not attend arraignment calendars and did not track a case until the court completed arraignment and set the matter for pretrial hearing or trial. The court provided the district attorney's office with an advance copy of the arraignment calendar and, following completion of the calendar, would send another copy reflecting what action was taken on the matters on calendar for that day. A clerk in the district attorney's office notified the deputy assigned to the case only when a completed calendar showed that the court had arraigned the defendant and scheduled either a pretrial hearing or trial. By failing to arraign Cerrato, Judge McCullough effectively kept the case from being monitored by the district attorney's office.

[4]After he spoke to Frank at his home, Judge McCullough informally asked a prosecutor to "take a look at" the Cerrato case. The prosecutor told the judge he would review the com-ever, the responsibility for the arraignment rested with Judge McCullough, as the presiding judge, not with the district attorney's office.[5]

Using the power of the bench to benefit a friend is a casebook example of wilful misconduct. (Spruance v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications (1975) 13 Cal.3d 778, 798 [119 Cal.Rptr. 841, 532 P.2d 1209]; see also Cal. Code Jud. Conduct, canon 2B ["Judges should not allow their families, social, or other relationships to influence their judicial conduct or judgment. Judges should not lend the prestige of their office to advance the private interests of others . . . ."].) Judge McCullough certainly should have known that failing to arraign Cerrato, continuing the case several times, and then dismissing it was improper. The evidence supports the conclusion that his reason for taking these actions was not the faithful discharge of his judicial duties. (Gonzalez, supra, 33 Cal.3d 359, 369.) Moreover, in view of his extrajudicial discussion with the Cerrato brothers about Frank's arrest and his long-term friendship with them, he should have promptly disqualified himself from the case. (Cal. Code Jud. Conduct, canon 3C(1) ["Judges should disqualify themselves in a proceeding in which . . . their impartiality might reasonably be questioned, including but not limited to instances where: (a) the judge has a personal bias or prejudice concerning a party . . . ."].) We conclude that the judge's handling of the Cerrato case constituted wilful misconduct.

COUNT 3—THE O'BRIEN MATTER

(5) Count 3 alleges that the judge violated Amelia O'Brien's right to representation when he ordered her trial to proceed despite the absence of herself and her attorney. O'Brien was charged with driving while under the influence of alcohol. (Veh. Code, § 23152, subd. (a).) On the day before her scheduled trial in San Benito County, a court in another county had ordered O'Brien's attorney to appear before it on the following day. Due to the trial conflict, O'Brien's attorney had his secretary telephone Judge McCullough's chambers to request a continuance of the O'Brien trial. A court clerk advised the secretary to contact the district attorney's office. The district attorney had no objection to the continuance but informed the attorney that the court normally required 48 hours' written notice of requests for continuances. Since he did not have sufficient time to prepare a plaint, and decided to do so when the case appeared on the pretrial calendar. Since Judge McCullough kept the case off the pretrial calendar, the prosecutor never took any action on the case and testified that he had forgotten about it until it came up in the proceedings before the Commission.

[5]The actual dismissal of the case stemmed from the chief clerk's comment that she was "getting sick and tired of having to account for that $150 [bail money] each month." When she asked the judge how to handle the case, he told her to "Get rid of it" and she entered the dismissal on the docket.

written motion for a continuance, O'Brien's attorney arranged for a local attorney to make a special appearance at the trial to make the request. The local attorney, however, did not appear personally at the court on the following day, but instead telephoned the court with the request for a continuance.

Judge McCullough denied the request and ordered the trial to proceed—despite the absence of the defendant, her counsel of record, or the local attorney.[6] Moreover, the prosecutor on the case informed the judge that he did not object to a continuance, and suggested that the judge impose sanctions on O'Brien's attorney for failing to comply with the court's 48-hour rule instead of ordering the trial to proceed.[7] Later that day, O'Brien's counsel learned that the trial had proceeded without him or his client and made a motion for a new trial, which the judge granted.

Judge McCullough correctly asserts that the power to grant a continuance, along with the power to impose sanctions on parties who do not comply with the requirements for requesting a continuance, are discretionary under section 1050 of the Penal Code. Although section 1050 does make the granting of continuances and the imposition of sanctions discretionary, a judge must hold a hearing to determine whether the noncomplying request was made in good faith. Judge McCullough failed to hold such a hearing. The hearing would have been the proper forum for determining whether the court had already granted an excessive number of continuances in the case and whether the court could have reasonably expected defense counsel to appear on the scheduled date. Moreover, Judge McCullough should have given greater consideration to the statutory option of sanctioning defense counsel, rather than penalizing the defendant by ordering the trial to proceed in the absence of both her and her attorney. His stated goal of expediting the adjudication of cases in his court, though laudable, should not blind him to the fundamental elements of a fair criminal proceeding.

The special masters found that the allegations of count 3 constituted wilful misconduct; the Commission disagreed and concluded that count 3 constituted only prejudicial conduct. We agree with the special masters. Conducting judicial proceedings in the absence of the defendant and her counsel seriously interferes with the defendant's Sixth Amendment right to representation. Though Judge McCullough may have intended to punish only O'Brien's attorney and not O'Brien, he acted intentionally and in bad faith. (Gonzalez, supra, 33 Cal.3d at p. 372 [attorneys on three occasions entered judge's courtroom and found proceedings had begun without them; court found judge's action constituted wilful misconduct].) We thus conclude that the judge's action in the O'Brien case constituted wilful misconduct.

[6]The judge does not argue, nor does the record reveal, that O'Brien waived her right to be present pursuant to Penal Code sections 977 and 1043.

[7]Subdivision (b) of section 1050 of the Penal Code requires a party to make a request for a continuance in writing two days before trial; subdivision (c) allows a party to request a continuance without complying with the requirements of subdivision (b), but also allows the court to impose sanctions for noncompliance. Subdivision (d) requires the court to hold a hearing to determine whether there was good cause for the party's noncompliance with subdivision (b).

COUNT 4—THE ROBERTS MATTER

Count 4 alleges that the judge violated Rose Roberts's right to representation by ordering her trial to proceed even though her attorney of record was not present. Roberts was charged with driving while under the influence of alcohol. (Veh. Code, § 23152, subd. (a).) On the day before her scheduled trial in San Benito County, her attorney was involved in a trial in another county; when he realized that the trial would not end that day, he telephoned Judge McCullough's chambers to request a continuance of Roberts's case. A clerk informed him of the court's 48-hour written notice requirement. The attorney then contacted the district attorney, who told him that he did not object to the trial being continued. He thus arranged for a local attorney to make a special appearance at Roberts's trial and request a continuance.

The local attorney personally appeared in court along with Roberts and made the request. Judge McCullough denied the request and ordered the trial to proceed—even after the local attorney indicated that he would not represent Roberts at trial. Roberts broke into tears in response to the judge's insistence on proceeding to trial without her attorney of record, as she was unprepared to represent herself. She understandably did not call witnesses, cross-examine the prosecution's witnesses, or herself take the stand. She was convicted of the charge. When her attorney learned that the trial had proceeded without him, he moved for a new trial, which Judge McCullough denied.

Again, Judge McCullough claims that he simply followed the 48-hour requirement of section 1050, subdivision (b) of the Penal Code. He again ignores the hearing requirement of subdivision (d) and the availability of sanctions for noncompliance under subdivision (c). As occurred in the O'Brien matter, Judge McCullough allowed his impatience with a defendant's attorney to outweigh a defendant's right to a fair trial and representation of her choice. Moreover, we are concerned that the judge's rulings in the O'Brien and Roberts matters may have been the product of the friction he alleged existed between him and the district attorney's office rather than from his desire to maintain the court's calendar. (See infra, p. 198.) We conclude that his actions in the Roberts case also constituted wilful misconduct.

We do not consider charges of misconduct that the Commission has dismissed. (Spruance, supra, 13 Cal.3d at pp. 784-785, fn. 5.)

COUNT 6—THE BRASHEAR MATTER

(6) Count 6 alleges that the judge failed to perform his judicial duties by not disposing of a matter pending before him for over six years. Kathy Brashear was the codefendant and cross-complainant in the case of Oakley v. Cheadle. On February 2, 1982, Judge McCullough granted her motions for judgment against plaintiffs and cross-defendants.[8] A week later, Brashear's attorney sent the court a proposed judgment and request for costs and attorney's fees. Despite numerous telephone calls, written requests and trips to the court by Brashear's attorney over the next three years, Judge McCullough neither signed the judgment nor ruled on the request for costs and fees. The Commission eventually brought charges against the judge for his delay in this and other cases, and we publicly censured him in April 1987, finding that he had committed persistent failure and prejudicial conduct. (In re McCullough, supra, 43 Cal.3d at p. 535.)

We are especially concerned with the judge's failure to act on the Brashear matter even after public censure. Instead of signing the judgment after his censure, the judge cavalierly told his clerk that he wanted nothing more to do with the case. Not until March 1988, after the Commission had instituted the present proceedings and more than six years after he actually granted the motions, did he sign the judgment.

Judge McCullough offers the same argument in his defense that he made before us two years ago: Section 71610 of the Government Code, which compels a judge to act on a matter within 90 days of it submission, did not require him to sign the proposed judgment or rule on costs and fees because the motion was made and decided "in court." A judge must issue a written judgment, however, to give his oral decision legal force. (Code Civ. Proc., § 632; rule 520.) We conclude that Judge McCullough's failure to sign the judgment form constituted persistent failure.

[8]The case proceeded as to the remaining parties; they submitted posttrial briefs on February 16, 1982. Judge McCullough finally entered a decision in the underlying dispute in October 1985.

SPECIAL DEFENSES

Judge McCullough asserts that the Commission violated his right to confidentiality by improperly disclosing information regarding the charges against him. (Rule 902.) (7) He claims that the presence of a prosecutor in the courtroom when the Commission served him with its notice of formal proceedings, and the appearance of a newspaper article about the proceedings on the following day, support his contention that the Commission improperly disclosed confidential information to the district attorney's office and the local media. The mere presence of a prosecutor and appearance of a news article, however, do not, by themselves, support an argument that the Commission violated the rules of confidentiality. Moreover, the Commission is authorized to issue announcements "confirming the hearing, clarifying the procedural aspects, and defending the right of a judge to a fair hearing" whenever it has instituted formal proceedings in a matter "in which the subject matter is generally known to the public and in which there is broad public interest, and in which confidence in the administration of justice is threatened due to lack of information concerning the status of the proceeding and requirements of due process . . . ." (Rule 902(b)(3); Gubler v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1984) 37 Cal.3d 27, 61 [207 Cal.Rptr. 171, 688 P.2d 551].)[9]

Also, the judge alludes throughout his petition to animosity toward him on the part of the district attorney's office.[10] Judge McCullough suggests that the district attorney's office was out to "get him." The Commission noted that the relationship between the district attorney and Judge McCullough was "far from harmonious." We agree with the Commission's conclusion, however, that the only relevance to the current proceedings of any acrimony in their relationship is its effect on the credibility of the witnesses at the hearing. In this regard, the special masters stood in the best position to judge the credibility of the witnesses at the hearing; we thus assume that they considered the trustworthiness of the testimony in formulating their factual findings.

MITIGATING CIRCUMSTANCES

The Commission found that Judge McCullough is a hardworking judge who has critics but also friends in the community. Several parties testified to the judge's good character, and the San Benito County Bar Association filed [9] We emphasize, however, that we have no evidence before us that the Commission actually submitted any material to the local media.

[10] We consider this contention here even though the judge does not specifically label it a "Special Defense."

an amicus curiae brief on his behalf. In addition, we take notice that the voters of San Benito County have twice elected him to judicial office.

DISPOSITION

(8) We conclude that Judge McCullough has committed four acts of wilful misconduct and one act of persistent failure. He deprived criminal defendants of their constitutional rights, used his office to benefit a personal friend, and failed to perform the most basic of judicial duties. Ten years' experience as the District Attorney of San Benito County certainly acquainted him with the rules of court and criminal procedure. (Wenger v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1981) 29 Cal.3d 615, 653-654 [175 Cal.Rptr. 420, 630 P.2d 954].) Moreover, his failure to respond to our public censure evidences a lack of regard for the Commission, this court and his obligations as a judge.

"The purpose of these proceedings is not to punish errant judges but to protect the judicial system and those subject to the awesome power that judges wield." (Furey, supra, 43 Cal.3d at p. 1320.) We conclude that that purpose is best served by adopting the recommendation of the Commission that Judge McCullough be removed from office.

We order that Judge Bernard P. McCullough, justice court judge of the San Benito Judicial District, San Benito County, be removed from office. He shall, however, if otherwise qualified, be permitted to resume the practice of law (Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (d)) on the condition that he pass the Professional Responsibility Examination. He had a long career in private and public practice before coming onto the bench, and several parties have testified to his good character. Moreover, as an attorney, he will not have access to the power that he abused as a judge. (Spruance, supra, 13 Cal.3d at p. 803.) This order is effective upon the finality of this decision in this court.

[No. S003813. Mar. 8, 1990.]

DAVID M. KENNICK, a Judge of the Municipal Court, Petitioner, v.
COMMISSION ON JUDICIAL PERFORMANCE, Respondent.

The Commission on Judicial Performance found that a municipal court judge had committed willful misconduct and conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice, and was culpable of a persistent failure or inability to perform his duties (Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (c)). The commission recommended that the judge be removed from office. The judge filed a petition to modify or reject the recommendation and thereafter retired from office. He then sought to withdraw his petition and requested dismissal of the disciplinary proceeding as moot. The Supreme Court denied this request. The judge then informed the Supreme Court by letter of his willingness, as a basis for dismissal, to agree to his ineligibility for future judicial office and suspension from the practice of law.

The Supreme Court ordered that the judge be removed from office on the sole ground of his persistent failure or inability to perform his judicial duties, and it censured him for his willful misconduct in office and his conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice. The court held that the proceeding was not moot even though the judge had retired. The court further held that the judge's willful misconduct and prejudicial conduct (refusal to cooperate with police officers after being arrested for drunk driving; abusive behavior toward a deputy district attorney; treating witnesses in a demeaning and discourteous manner; favoring two attorneys, one of whom he owned property with, in his appointments of counsel; and improperly suggesting to a waitress in a restaurant that she should not worry about her drunk driving arrest) were insufficient to warrant his removal, even though they clearly supported the lesser discipline of censure. However, in light of evidence that the judge had not worked approximately 96½ days between March 8, 1985, and December 31, 1986, had stopped working without explanation at the beginning of 1987, and was not working in May 1987 at the time of his testimony before the special masters, removal from office on the ground of persistent failure or inability to perform his judicial duties was appropriate. (Opinion by The Court.)

Classified to California Digest of Official Reports, 3d Series

(1) Judges § 6.4—Removal—Proceedings—Mootness—Retirement of Judge.—A proceeding for removal of a municipal court judge was not rendered moot by the judge's retirement. The filing with the Supreme Court of the recommendation by the Commission on Judicial Performance that the judge be removed placed in issue whether the judge should continue in office, whether he should be eligible for any judicial office, and whether he should be suspended from legal practice. His retirement eliminated any possibility of his continuing in office but did not foreclose his future eligibility to serve as a judge and did not resolve whether he should be suspended from legal practice in California.

(2) Judges § 6—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Suspension From Law Practice—Due Process.—In a proceeding for discipline of a municipal court judge, the question whether the judge should be suspended from legal practice was properly before the Supreme Court, notwithstanding the judge's contention that suspension by the court, rather than the State Bar, would violate his due process rights, in that he was not notified as to which of the charges underlying the removal recommendation by the Commission on Judicial Performance would be a basis for suspension from practice and there was no hearing on how these charges related to his right to practice law. The judge received the commission's notice of formal proceedings expressly charging him with conduct constituting grounds for removal from office and had notice from the California Constitution itself that a removed judge would be automatically suspended from legal practice unless and until the Supreme Court ordered otherwise (Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (d)). He also knew, or should have known, that the Supreme Court, in responding to any recommendation of removal, would consider only the charges sustained by the commission.

(3) Judges § 6—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Suspension From Law Practice—Equal Protection.—In a proceeding for discipline of a municipal court judge, the question whether the judge should be suspended from legal practice was properly before the Supreme Court, notwithstanding the judge's contention that suspension by the court rather than by the State Bar would deprive him of equal protection of the laws in that there is no rational basis for subjecting an attorney who happens to be a removed judge to disciplinary sanctions not applicable to other attorneys. California law makes a reasonable distinction between suspension from legal practice based on the attorney's conduct while a judge, and suspension or disbarment that is based on other conduct and ordinarily arises out of proceedings before the State Bar.

(4a, 4b) Judges § 6.4—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Proceedings—Mootness—Retirement of Judge—Stipulation as to Ineligibility for Office.—A proceeding for discipline of a municipal court judge was not rendered moot by the judge's retirement and his willingness to stipulate to his ineligibility for judicial office and to the entry of an order of the Supreme Court suspending him from California law practice. The judge's stipulation did not preclude the possibility of a proceeding for reinstatement to practice, and a necessary foundation to any such proceeding would be a record of the reasons for the judge's suspension, which necessarily would inhere in the reasons for the event giving rise to the suspension, i.e., his removal from judicial office. There was no practicable way to create such a record except to go forward with the removal proceeding.

(5) Attorneys at Law § 61—Discipline of Attorneys—Reinstatement—Criteria.—In considering a recommendation of reinstatement after disbarment, the Supreme Court must consider the evidence of present character in the light of the moral shortcomings that resulted in the imposition of discipline.

(6) Judges § 6.2—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Grounds—Willful Misconduct.—A judge's willful misconduct in office within the meaning of Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (c) (censure or removal of judge), has two elements: it must be willful, i.e., done with malice or in bad faith, and it must be committed in office, i.e., while acting in a judicial capacity. The element of bad faith, or malice, must meet a two-pronged test: the judge must have committed acts he knew or should have known to be beyond his power, and he must have done so for a purpose other than faithful discharge of judicial duties.

[See Cal.Jur.3d, Judges, § 62; Am.Jur.2d, Judges, § 19.]

(7) Judges § 6.2—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Grounds—Prejudicial Conduct.—Conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice, within the meaning of Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (c) (censure or removal of judge), is generally less serious than willful misconduct and may be committed either while acting in other than a judicial capacity or while acting in a judicial capacity but in good faith and without malice. Prejudicial conduct while acting in a judicial capacity means conduct that the judge undertakes in good faith but that nevertheless would appear to an objective observer to be not only unjudicial conduct but conduct prejudicial to public esteem for the judicial office. Prejudicial conduct while not acting in a judicial capacity may be committed in bad faith or with malice and thus fall short of willful misconduct only because not committed in a judicial capacity. Prejudicial conduct does not require notoriety, but only that the conduct be damaging to the esteem for the judiciary held by members of the public who observed such conduct.

(8) Judges § 6.4—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Proceedings—Review by Supreme Court—Scope—In considering a report and recommendation by the Commission on Judicial Performance, the Supreme Court must independently review the record and sustain the charges against the judge only to the extent the court finds there is clear and convincing evidence sufficient to prove them to a reasonable certainty. The court must then determine, as a matter of law, what if any constitutional grounds for judicial discipline are established by each of the findings thus sustained and whether those grounds support the commission's recommendation of removal. In formulating these legal conclusions, the court gives great weight to the conclusions of the commission. In resolving disputed issues of fact, however, the court gives special deference to the determinations of the special masters, who were best able to evaluate the truthfulness of the witnesses appearing before them.

(9) Judges § 6.4—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Proceedings—Review by Supreme Court—Scope—Findings Outside Scope of Notice of Formal Proceedings.—In a proceeding for discipline of a municipal court judge, the findings of the Commission on Judicial Performance were subject to consideration by the Supreme Court only for their bearing upon the charges that the amended notice of formal proceedings, together with the judge's answer, placed in issue, where some of the commission's findings expanded upon the charges in that notice. The Supreme Court will not adopt commission determinations of judicial misconduct based on findings outside the scope of a notice of formal proceedings, as amended.

(10) Judges § 6.2—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Grounds—Prejudicial Conduct—Refusal to Cooperate Following Drunk Driving Arrest.—In a proceeding for discipline of a municipal court judge, the findings of the Commission on Judicial Performance, that the judge had refused to cooperate with officers who stopped him for erratic driving by behaving in a rude and abusive manner and by refusing to complete field sobriety tests or submit to any chemical test, were supported by clear and convincing evidence, and the commission properly concluded that this behavior constituted conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute within the meaning of Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (c). The judge contended that the testimony of the officers that he was rude and obnoxious should be disbelieved because they did not treat him as physically dangerous and took no precautions to restrain him while interviewing him or driving him home; however, the commission's findings pertained only to noncooperation and verbal abuse, not to physical threats or conduct.

(11) Judges § 6.2—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Grounds—Willful Misconduct—Attempt to Obtain Preferential Treatment Following Drunk Driving Arrest.—In a proceeding for discipline of a municipal court judge, the findings of the Commission on Judicial Performance, that the judge had attempted to obtain preferential treatment after being arrested for drunk driving, were supported by clear and convincing evidence. The judge's testimony, that the arresting officers sought an interview with the judge out of embarrassment stemming from a belief that the judge's arrest had been a big mistake, was not credible. However, for purposes of judicial discipline, willful misconduct can be committed only while acting in a judicial capacity. Thus, the commission erred in finding that the judge's actions constituted willful misconduct, in addition to prejudicial conduct, within the meaning of Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (c), since the judge made his improper requests in a conversation that took place wholly outside any judicial setting and there was no evidence that he even referred to his judicial status on that occasion.

(12) Judges § 6.2—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Grounds—Nolo Contendere Plea.—In a proceeding for discipline of a municipal court judge, the charge that the judge had been convicted on a plea of nolo contendere of the offense of drunk driving did not state a ground for discipline. Violation of Veh. Code, § 23152, subd. (a), the offense of which the judge was convicted, constitutes only a misdemeanor, and there was no finding or showing that the judge's commission of the offense involved moral turpitude. Thus, a ground for removal under Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (b), was not stated, and the bare fact of a judge's conviction of a misdemeanor not involving moral turpitude, based on a plea of nolo contendere, cannot constitute prejudicial conduct warranting discipline within the meaning of Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (c).

(13) Judges § 6.2—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Grounds—Prejudicial Conduct—Taking Over Questioning From Counsel.—In a proceeding for discipline of a municipal court judge, the findings and conclusions of prejudicial conduct within the meaning of Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (c), by the Commission on Judicial Performance in connection with the judge's alleged taking over questioning from counsel and ordering counsel not to return, were not supported by clear and convincing evidence. The commission's finding of impropriety in the judge's judicial demeanor appeared to rest on a deputy district attorney's testimony of her impressions of his behavior, and the credibility of these impressions could best be judged by the special masters, who observed the witness, rejected the charge of impropriety in the judge's manner, and, even though the deputy thereafter refrained from appearing before the judge, found it not true that the judge had intimidated her.

(14) Judges § 6.2—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Grounds—Willful Misconduct—Abusive Behavior Toward Deputy District Attorney.—In a proceeding for discipline of a municipal court judge, the findings of the Commission on Judicial Performance, that the judge had behaved rudely, impatiently, and abusively to a deputy district attorney after curtailing her direct examination at a preliminary hearing and calling her to his chambers, and that he had later treated the occurrence as a laughing matter, were supported by clear and convincing evidence. The commission also properly found that the judge was acting in a judicial capacity and in bad faith, and that his actions therefore constituted willful misconduct in office as well as prejudicial conduct within the meaning of Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (c). However, the judge's view that he had discretion to curtail the preliminary examination, out of concern for security at the courtroom, once there was sufficient evidence to hold the defendant to answer, had enough merit to prevent the holding of it from constituting prejudicial misconduct, consisting of the denial of the right of a party or counsel to be heard.

(15) Judges § 6.2—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Grounds—Prejudicial Conduct—Demeaning Treatment of Females.—In a proceeding for discipline of a municipal court judge, the Commission on Judicial Performance properly concluded that the judge's use of the terms "sweetie," "sweetheart," "honey," or "dear," to address female attorneys and others appearing before him was unprofessional and demeaning and constituted prejudicial conduct within the meaning of Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (c). The commission's finding that the judge had used these terms in open court lacked the requisite evidentiary support, but it could be fairly inferred that the judge used the expressions in and about the courthouse during business hours to people he knew principally or solely in connection with his judicial duties.

(16) Judges § 6.2—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Grounds—Prejudicial Conduct—Behavior in Court—Toward Litigants.—In a proceeding for discipline of a municipal court judge, the findings of the Commission on Judicial Performance, that the judge was discourteous, impatient, and demeaning to litigants appearing before him, were amply supported by the testimony of two deputy district attorneys and two deputy city attorneys, all of whom had appeared frequently in the judge's courtroom, and such conduct constituted prejudicial conduct within the meaning of Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (c). The fact that the judge proceeded properly and courteously on many, or most, occasions, did not excuse the instances of misconduct proved by testimony that the special masters found credible.

(17) Judges § 6.2—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Grounds—Prejudicial Conduct—Behavior in Court—Toward Deputy City Attorney.—In a proceeding for discipline of a municipal court judge, the findings of the Commission on Judicial Performance, that the judge had screamed in an abusive manner at a deputy city attorney in open court when she attempted to make a bail motion and in chambers when she suggested that some of the 11 conflict cases on the afternoon calendar be reassigned to other counsel in order to expedite the calendar, were supported by the evidence. However, the evidence did not establish clearly and convincingly that the conduct in question was committed for a purpose other than the faithful discharge of judicial duties and thus amounted to more than spontaneous outbursts. In the absence of a showing of bad faith requisite for willful misconduct, such conduct constituted only prejudicial conduct within the meaning of Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (c).

(18) Judges § 6.2—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Grounds—Prejudicial Conduct—Behavior in Court—Toward Witnesses.—In a proceeding for discipline of a municipal court judge, the findings of the Commission on Judicial Performance, that the judge was rude and intimidating to witnesses, were supported by the evidence, where another judge testified that the judge became loud, impatient, and abusive toward witnesses who hesitated in answering questions. Such intemperate judicial conduct was consistent with other of the judge's acts that were established by the findings, and there was no reason to disbelieve the other judge's testimony. The commission properly found that such conduct constituted prejudicial conduct within the meaning of Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (c), consisting of rude, intimidating treatment of witnesses and denials of the right to be heard.

(19) Judges § 6.2—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Grounds—Prejudicial Conduct—Bias in Appointment of Counsel.—In a proceeding for discipline of a municipal court judge, the finding of the Commission on Judicial Performance, that the judge had committed prejudicial conduct within the meaning of Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd (c), by favoring two attorneys, one with whom he owned real property, in his appointments of counsel, was supported by clear and convincing evidence. However, in the absence of any contention or evidence that any of the judge's appointments were not fully justified under Pen. Code, § 987.2, and related sections, or that the attorneys were overpaid for their services, or that the judge acted in bad faith, the judge's conduct did not constitute willful misconduct within the meaning of Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (c).

(20) Judges § 6.2—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Grounds—Prejudicial Conduct—Ex Parte Meetings With Attorneys.—In a proceeding for discipline of a municipal court judge, the findings of the Commission on Judicial Performance, that the judge, during private meetings in his chambers with appointed attorneys who were appearing before him, had improperly discussed cases in which the attorneys were appearing before him, were not supported by the evidence. However, the judge's practice of meeting alone in chambers with attorneys representing one side of a case pending before him in the absence of circumstances that would make ex parte communication proper gave rise to an appearance of impropriety and therefore constituted prejudicial conduct, bringing the judicial office into disrepute, within the meaning of Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (c).

(21) Judges § 6.4—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Proceedings—Review by Supreme Court—Scope—As Affected by Specifications and Notice of Proceedings.—The Supreme Court predicates its adoption, modification, or rejection of the disciplinary recommendations of the Commission on Judicial Performance solely upon those specifications in the notice of formal proceedings that the commission found both to have been proven as a matter of fact and to have constituted constitutionally sufficient grounds for the imposition of discipline.

(22) Judges § 6.2—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Grounds—Prejudicial Conduct—Assurances Regarding Outcome of Prosecution.—In a proceeding for discipline of a municipal court judge, the finding of the Commission on Judicial Performance, that the judge improperly suggested to a waitress in a restaurant not to worry about her arrest for drunk driving, was supported by the evidence, and such conduct constituted prejudicial conduct within the meaning of Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (c). For a judge to give a layperson assurances about the outcome of a prosecution against the layperson may imply inside information and thus be inappropriate.

(23) Judges § 6.4—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Proceedings—Evidence—Abbreviated Working Hours.—In a proceeding for discipline of a municipal court judge, the finding of the Commission on Judicial Performance, that the judge had maintained abbreviated working hours, was not supported by clear and convincing evidence. The special masters had failed to find the charge true and, in light of numerous conflicts of testimony and the masters' observation of the witnesses, they were in a better position than the commission to resolve the matter.

(24) Judges § 6.2—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Grounds—Failure or Inability to Perform Duties.—In a proceeding for discipline of a municipal court judge, the findings and conclusions of the Commission on Judicial Performance, that the judge had not worked approximately 96½ days between March 8, 1985, and December 31, 1986, that he had stopped working and was not working in 1987, and that such failure to work constituted a persistent failure or inability to perform judicial duties, were supported by clear and convincing evidence. Even if a substantial portion of the absences in 1985 and 1986 were excusable by illness or as vacation, there appeared no excuse for the judge's failure to work from the beginning of 1987 to May 14, 1987, the date of his testimony before the special masters. The conclusion that this failure to work constituted a persistent failure or inability by the judge to perform his judicial duties was clearly correct, particularly in view of the history of the elimination of willfulness as an element of this ground for removal (Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (c)).

(25) Judges § 6—Censure—Willful Misconduct and Prejudicial Conduct.—In a proceeding for discipline of a municipal court judge, the findings of the Supreme Court that the judge had committed willful misconduct and prejudicial conduct within the meaning of Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (c), were insufficient to warrant his removal, even though they clearly supported the lesser discipline of censure. The judge had refused to cooperate with police officers, and later attempted to obtain preferential treatment, after being arrested for drunk driving. He had treated a deputy district attorney abusively and treated witnesses in a demeaning and discourteous manner. Further, he had favored two attorneys, one with whom he owned real property, in his appointments of counsel, and had improperly suggested to a waitress in a restaurant that she should not worry about her drunk driving arrest. However, in light of testimony by numerous attorneys and court personnel that he was capable of being a competent, conscientious, and fair judge, the judge's misconduct did not appear so continuing or pervasive as to preclude his reform.

(26) Judges § 6.2—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Grounds—Failure or Inability to Perform Duties—Appropriate Discipline.—Removal from office was the appropriate discipline for a municipal court judge whose conduct demonstrated a persistent failure or inability to perform judicial duties. The judge had not worked approximately 96½ days between March 8, 1985, and December 31, 1986, he had stopped working at the beginning of 1987, and he was not working in May 1987 at the time of his testimony before the special masters. His failure to work during 1987 without any explanation other than vague references to current medical treatment, and without any evidence that he might or could resume his duties thereafter, was alone sufficient to establish the ground of persistent failure or inability to perform judicial duties. Medical reports considered for purposes of mitigation by the Commission on Judicial Performance, even though technically inadmissible, merely confirmed the conclusion that since the beginning of 1987 the judge had been unable to perform his duties. Even if the reports were proved true, they would not have affected the Supreme Court's findings under other counts that the judge had also engaged in willful misconduct and prejudicial conduct within the meaning of Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (c) (thereby resulting in the Supreme Court's censure of the judge).

OPINION

THE COURT.—The Commission on Judicial Performance (commission) has filed in this court its recommendation that David M. Kennick, a judge of the Municipal Court for the Los Angeles Judicial District, be removed from office. (See Cal. Rules of Court, rule 919(a).[1]) Accompanying the petition were the commission's findings of fact and conclusions that the judge had committed "wilful misconduct in office" (willful misconduct) and "conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute" (prejudicial conduct), and was culpable of "persistent failure or inability to perform the judge's duties" (persistent failure) (Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (c)).

In response, the judge (petitioner) filed a petition to modify or reject the recommendation. (See rule 919(b).) Thereafter, he retired from office (Gov. Code, § 75033.5). He then sought to withdraw his petition and requested dismissal of this proceeding as moot. We denied the request by a minute order dated February 23, 1989, in which we explained that to implement the constitutional provisions that make a removed judge ineligible for judicial office and suspend him or her from practicing law in California pending further order of this court (Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (d)), it is necessary to determine whether removal of petitioner from office would have been warranted had he not retired and, if so, whether he should be permitted to practice law.

After the filing of that order, petitioner informed us by letter of his willingness, as a basis for dismissal, to agree to his ineligibility for future judicial office and suspension from the practice of law.[2] He now contends

*Before Lucas, C. J., Mosk, J., Broussard, J., Panelli, J., Eagleson, J., Kennard, J., and Kaufman, J.†

[1] All references to rules are to the California Rules of Court unless otherwise indicated.

[2] On December 8, 1988, before issuing the minute order denying dismissal, the court sent petitioner a letter inquiring whether he would agree to ineligibility for judicial office and suspension from law practice if this court were to "enter an order suspending petitioner from the practice of law and dismissing the proceeding without prejudice to reinstatement should petitioner seek either judicial office or to set aside the order suspending him from the practice of law." When no assent to the conditions was forthcoming, the court filed the order denying dismissal and resolved to defer further consideration of petitioner's mootness contentions until the hearing of this matter on the merits.

Petitioner thereafter sent us a personally signed statement, attached to his counsel's letter of March 22, 1989, reading as follows: "I, David M. Kennick, a retired judge of the Los Angeles Municipal Court, pursuant to an offer I understand was made by the California State Supreme Court, hereby agrees [sic] that I am ineligible for judicial office in the future and also that this willingness creates an additional basis for dismissal based on mootness. He further contends his fitness to practice law should be determined in proceedings before the State Bar.

As will be explained, we have concluded that this proceeding is not moot and that we should proceed to a determination of the merits of the commission's report and recommendation of removal. We have further concluded, after independently reviewing the record, that petitioner should be censured for willful misconduct and prejudicial conduct and ordered removed from office on the sole ground of persistent failure or inability to perform his judicial duties, but that he should be permitted to practice law if he passes the Professional Responsibility Examination.

Petitioner was a judge of the Municipal Court, Los Angeles Judicial District, from June 1972 until his retirement in July 1988. Pursuant to a preliminary investigation (rule 904), the commission served him on December 10, 1986, with a notice of formal proceedings (rule 905) and on March 13, 1987, with an amended notice (rule 911), alleging facts charged to constitute willful misconduct, prejudicial conduct, and persistent failure. He filed an answer (rule 906), and in May 1987 three special masters held 10 days of evidentiary hearings on the issues thereby presented (rules 907-910). The masters' report to the commission (rule 912) found most, but not all, of the alleged facts to be true and concluded that each true fact, or set of facts, sustained a charge of willful misconduct, prejudicial conduct, or persistent failure.

The commission's report, filed with this court in January 1988, confirmed virtually all the masters' findings and found additional facts that the masters had concluded were not proved. The commission also differed from the masters in its assessment of particular acts as willful misconduct or prejudicial misconduct. The commission's findings of fact and conclusions of law were unanimous. The recommendation of removal was by a vote of eight to one.

The commission's findings, which are in eight counts, deal with five factual situations, beginning with the arrest and conviction of petitioner for agrees [sic] to entry of an order suspending me from the practice of law." (Italics supplied.) His attorney's letter of March 21, referring to "the Court's proposal of December 8, 1988," makes clear that the mention of an "offer" in petitioner's statement was a reference to the court's aforementioned letter.

Still later, on April 17, 1989, petitioner sent us an additional signed statement as follows: "I, David M. Kennick, a retired judge of the Los Angeles Municipal Court, as an additional part of an agreement signed recently by me and mailed to the Supreme Court by my counsel, do hereby further stipulate that the agreement and/or stipulations are made by me, without my having the right of revocation of any part of the agreement or stipulations. I further stipulate that I will not in any way, move to re-open any part of my case, including, but not limited to, requesting that any order entered by the Supreme Court pursuant to the agreement, be set aside or modified."

drunk driving in August 1985. It is found that he was rude and abusive toward the arresting officers and refused to take field sobriety or blood-alcohol tests (count two), that he sought preferential treatment because of his judicial status and asked an officer if "the paperwork could get lost" before it reached the court (count one), and that he was convicted of driving under the influence of alcohol on a plea of nolo contendere (count three). A second group of findings specifies numerous instances of demeaning, rude, impatient, or abusive behavior, and denial of litigants' and attorneys' rights to be heard, both on the bench and in chambers (counts four and six). Next are findings that petitioner favored certain attorneys in appointing counsel for indigent defendants (count five). In another count it is found that in a long conversation with a waitress at a restaurant, petitioner implied she should not worry about a drunk driving arrest (count seven). Finally, it is found that petitioner's excessive absences from the courthouse, and his cessation of work altogether at the beginning of 1987, constituted persistent failure or inability to perform judicial duties (count eight).

EFFECT OF PETITIONER'S RETIREMENT

(1) Petitioner contends his retirement has made this proceeding moot because we no longer can grant the relief sought by the commission, i.e., his removal from office. (See Paul v. Milk Depots, Inc. (1964) 62 Cal.2d 129 [41 Cal.Rptr. 468, 396 P.2d 924] [proceeding to enforce marketing regulation rendered moot by defendant's bankruptcy and cessation of business].) Article VI, section 18, subdivision (d), of the California Constitution, however, provides: "A judge removed by the Supreme Court is ineligible for judicial office and pending further order of the court is suspended from practicing law in this State." Thus, the filing in this court of the commission's recommendation of removal placed in issue (1) whether petitioner should continue in the judicial office which he then held, (2) whether he should be eligible for any judicial office, and (3) whether he should be suspended from the practice of law in California until further order of this court.

The statute under which petitioner retired provides that "[a]n election to retire" thereunder "shall be without right of revocation, and upon such filing [of the election] said judge shall be deemed retired with receipt of benefits deferred until herein provided, and the judicial office from which he or she has retired shall become vacant." (Gov. Code, § 75033.5.) Petitioner's election to retire therefore eliminated any possibility of his continuing in the judicial office he was holding at the time of the commission's recommendation. His retirement did not, however, foreclose his future eligibility to serve as a judge (see Cal. Const., art. VI, § 15 & 5th par. of § 6), and that eligibility remained for determination in this proceeding.

Further, petitioner's retirement did not resolve the question whether he should be suspended from the practice of law pending further order of this court. (2) Petitioner contends that the suspension issue is not properly before us and instead should be a matter for the State Bar. He claims that suspending him from law practice in this proceeding would violate his constitutional rights to due process and equal protection of the laws. Due process would be violated, he argues, because (1) he was not notified as to which of the charges underlying the removal recommendation would be a basis for suspension from practice or informed of the potential term of suspension, and (2) there has been no hearing on how these charges relate to his right to law practice.

No such notice was required. Rejecting a similar due process claim under a statute authorizing automatic suspension or disbarment of an attorney convicted of a crime involving moral turpitude, this court held that notice of the criminal proceedings was constitutionally sufficient. "The law informs [the accused attorney] that one of the results of his conviction will be his subsequent disbarment . . . . This answers the constitutional requirement that he shall have due process of law before he can be deprived of his right to practice." (In re Collins (1922) 188 Cal. 701, 708 [206 P. 990, 32 A.L.R. 1062]; accord In re Rothrock (1944) 25 Cal.2d 588, 592 [154 P.2d 392].) So here, petitioner received the commission's notice of formal proceedings expressly charging him with conduct constituting grounds for removal from office (Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (c)) and had notice from the Constitution itself that a removed judge would be automatically suspended from law practice unless and until this court ordered otherwise (id., art. VI, § 18, subd. (d)). Petitioner also knew, or should have known, that this court, in responding to any recommendation of removal, would consider only the charges sustained by the commission. (Wenger v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1981) 29 Cal.3d 615, 622 [175 Cal.Rptr. 420, 630 P.2d 954].) Whether the record of the commission's proceedings pertaining to those charges discloses grounds for declining to suspend petitioner from law practice upon removal from office is a legal question that petitioner can and does address before this court.

(3) Petitioner claims that suspension from law practice would deprive him of equal protection of the laws because, he argues, there is no rational basis for subjecting an attorney who happens to be a removed judge to disciplinary sanctions not applicable to other attorneys. To the contrary, California law makes a reasonable distinction between suspension from law practice based on the attorney's conduct while a judge and suspension or disbarment that is based on other conduct and ordinarily arises out of proceedings before the State Bar. Investigation of judges' conduct for purposes of judicial discipline is entrusted to the commission, and if this court accepts the commission's recommendation of removal, the question of suspension is determined by this court from the record of proceedings before the commission, without the necessity for further factual investigation.

(4a) Finally, petitioner contends that even if his retirement alone did not make this proceeding moot, mootness does result from his retirement plus his willingness to stipulate to his ineligibility for judicial office and to the entry of an order of this court suspending him from California law practice. (See fn. 2, ante.) He claims he should be treated in the same manner as an attorney who seeks to resign from the State Bar while disciplinary charges against the attorney are pending. Such a resignation is effective only if accepted by this court on the State Bar's recommendation. (See rule 960.) Both an attorney whose resignation is accepted and a removed judge, however, are eligible for reinstatement to the bar upon a sufficient showing of rehabilitation. The attorney may resume practice by undergoing the proceedings required for reinstatement after disbarment. (See Rules Proc. of State Bar, rule 660 et seq.)

Reinstatement to law practice of the removed judge is authorized by article VI, section 18, subdivision (d), of the Constitution. That subdivision makes the removed judge "ineligible" for judicial office but merely "suspended" from law practice. Suspension, in contrast to ineligibility, connotes temporary rather than permanent disqualification. Also, the suspension is effective "pending further order of [this] court" and is therefore subject to our later reconsideration. The possibility that petitioner would be the subject of such a reinstatement proceeding before this court is not precluded by his supplementary offer to refrain from moving to reopen any part of his case and from requesting that any order suspending him from law practice be set aside or modified. (See fn. 2, ante.) An application for reinstatement to practice would not require setting aside or modifying the suspension order because the suspension itself imposes only a temporary disability that can be removed on the basis of subsequent events. Thus, even petitioner's augmented offer does not preclude the possibility of a reinstatement proceeding.

A necessary foundation to any such proceeding would be a record of the reasons for petitioner's suspension, which necessarily would inhere in the reasons for the event giving rise to the suspension, i.e., his removal from judicial office. There appears no practicable way to create such a record except to go forward with the present proceeding.

An analogy to State Bar proceedings is again instructive. An attorney who has been allowed to resign from the State Bar during the pendency of disciplinary proceedings may resume practice by undergoing the proceedings required for reinstatement after disbarment, including a State Bar investigation, a public hearing before a hearing panel, a favorable recommendation to this court, and our acceptance of that recommendation. (See Rules Proc. of State Bar, rules 225, 660 et seq.) (5) In considering a recommendation of reinstatement after disbarment, this court must consider "the evidence of present character . . . in the light of the moral shortcomings which resulted in the imposition of discipline. [Citation.]" (Roth v. State Bar (1953) 40 Cal.2d 307, 313 [253 P.2d 969]; accord Tardiff v. State Bar (1980) 27 Cal.3d 395, 403 [165 Cal.Rptr. 829, 612 P.2d 919].) Yet if the attorney has been allowed to resign and thus avoid disciplinary proceedings, no such grounds for discipline will have been established. To fill this gap, acceptance of resignation may be conditioned upon perpetuation of testimony concerning the attorney's conduct pertinent to his or her fitness to practice law. (Rule 960(c); Rules Proc. of State Bar, rule 650 et seq.) This step makes it possible to consider a resigned attorney's application for reinstatement in light of evidence of the attorney's preresignation conduct, in lieu of findings on that subject.

(4b) Similarly, if we were to suspend petitioner from the practice of law and then dismiss this proceeding as he requests, he would be entitled to apply for reinstatement to practice. Determination of the application would require our consideration of whether petitioner had presented proof of rehabilitation sufficient to overcome the grounds for suspension (see Tardiff v. State Bar, supra, 27 Cal.3d 395, 403; Roth v. State Bar, supra, 40 Cal.2d 307, 313). A necessary foundation of that determination, of course, would be the ascertainment of what grounds, if any, had warranted suspension in the first place. That inquiry would necessitate resolution of the merits of the present proceeding, i.e., whether the commission's recommendation of removal from judicial office should be sustained and, if so, whether the grounds for removal also constituted grounds for suspending petitioner from law practice. The only practicable way to resolve the merits would be for the commission to appear before us in the reinstatement proceeding to defend its findings and recommendation of removal; yet the commission would then be burdened by all the adverse consequences of the delay between dismissal of the present proceeding and the hearing of the application for reinstatement, e.g., staleness of the record, the dimming of counsel's recollections, and changes in commission personnel.

Thus, to dismiss this proceeding simply because of petitioner's retirement and temporary acceptance of some of the consequences of removal from office might well result in our simply postponing, rather than forgoing, consideration of the merits of the commission's recommendation of removal and the question whether, if the recommendation is accepted, the conduct warranting removal calls for suspension of petitioner from the practice of law in this state. Because of the practical difficulties such postponed consideration would raise, we decline to follow this course.[3]

In light of this conclusion, we need not consider the other reasons urged by the commission for immediately reaching the merits, e.g., protection of the integrity of the judicial system (see Judicial Inquiry and Review Bd. v. Snyder (1987) 514 Pa. 142 [523 A.2d 294, 298]; Matter of Probert (1981) 411 Mich. 210 [308 N.W.2d 773, 776]), preservation of public confidence in the judiciary (Matter of Yaccarino (1985) 101 N.J. 342 [502 A.2d 3, 30-31]), and provision of guidance to other judges (see In re Weeks (1983) 134 Ariz. 521 [658 P.2d 174, 176]).

APPLICABLE STANDARDS

We turn to the merits of the commission's report and recommendation of removal. Removal may be justified by any of the three forms of dereliction found here: willful misconduct, prejudicial conduct, or persistent failure to perform duties, all as defined in article VI, section 18, subdivision (c) of the California Constitution (art. VI, § 18, subd. (c)).[4]

(6) Willful misconduct, or "wilful misconduct in office" (art. VI, § 18, subd. (c)), has two elements: it must be willful, i.e., done with malice or in bad faith, and it must be committed in office, i.e., while acting in a judicial capacity. (Gonzales v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1983) 33 Cal.3d 359, 365 [188 Cal.Rptr. 880, 657 P.2d 372]); Geiler v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications (1973) 10 Cal.3d 270, 283-284 [110 Cal.Rptr. 201, 515 P.2d 1].) The element of bad faith, or malice, must meet a two-pronged test: the judge must have "(1) committed acts he knew or should have

[3]Shortly before oral argument (at which petitioner did not appear), counsel forwarded to us a copy of a letter from petitioner to the State Bar, dated December 8, 1989, stating in pertinent part as follows: "I . . . hereby resign as a member of the State Bar of California and relinquish all right to practice law in the State of California and agree that in the event this resignation is accepted and I later file a petition for reinstatement, that the Supreme Court will consider in connection therewith all disciplinary matters and proceedings against me at the time this resignation is accepted, in addition to other appropriate matters. I further agree that upon filing of this resignation by the Office of the Clerk, State Bar of California, that I will remain on inactive membership of the State Bar. Because of this I shall be ineligible to practice law . . . . [¶] I further request that . . . due to my resignation from the State Bar that the Supreme Court of the State of California dismiss the proceedings against me. . . ."

This communication, addressed to the State Bar, does not alter our decision to proceed with consideration of the merits for the reasons stated in the text.

[4]Subdivision (c) provides in pertinent part: "On recommendation of the Commission on Judicial Performance the Supreme Court may . . . censure or remove a judge for action occurring not more than 6 years prior to the commencement of the judge's current term that constitutes wilful misconduct in office, persistent failure or inability to perform the judge's duties, . . . or conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute."

known to be beyond his power, (2) for a purpose other than faithful discharge of judicial duties." (Wenger v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 29 Cal.3d 615, 622, fn. 4; accord Furey v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1987) 43 Cal.3d 1297, 1305 [240 Cal.Rptr. 859, 743 P.2d 919].)

(7) Prejudicial conduct, or "conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute" (art. VI, § 18, subd. (c)), is generally less serious than willful misconduct and may be committed either (1) while acting in other than a judicial capacity or (2) while acting in a judicial capacity but in good faith and without malice. Prejudicial conduct while acting in a judicial capacity means "conduct which a judge undertakes in good faith but which nevertheless would appear to an objective observer to be not only unjudicial conduct but conduct prejudicial to public esteem for the judicial office." (Geiler v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications, supra, 10 Cal.3d 270, 284; accord Ryan v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1988) 45 Cal.3d 518, 530-531 [247 Cal.Rptr. 378, 754 P.2d 724, 76 A.L.R.4th 951].) Prejudicial conduct while not acting in a judicial capacity may be committed in bad faith or with malice and thus fall short of willful misconduct only because not committed in a judicial capacity. (Furey v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 43 Cal.3d 1297, 1304; Geiler, supra, 10 Cal.3d at p. 284, fn. 11.) The provision that prejudicial conduct must be that which "brings the judicial office into disrepute" (art. VI, § 18, subd. (c)) does "not require notoriety, but only that the conduct be 'damaging to the esteem for the judiciary held by members of the public who observed such conduct.' (McCartney v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications (1974) 12 Cal.3d 512, 534 [116 Cal.Rptr. 260, 526 P.2d 2681].)" (Wenger v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 29 Cal.3d 615, 622-623, fn. 4.)

(8) In considering the commission's report and recommendation, we must independently review the record and sustain the charges against petitioner only to the extent we find there is clear and convincing evidence sufficient to prove them to a reasonable certainty. (Ryan v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 45 Cal.3d 518, 530; Furey v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 43 Cal.3d 1297, 1304.) We must then determine, as a matter of law, what if any constitutional grounds for judicial discipline are established by each of the findings thus sustained and whether those grounds support the commission's recommendation of removal. (Geiler v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications, supra, 10 Cal.3d 270, 276.) In formulating these legal conclusions, we give great weight to the conclusions of the commission. (Ryan, supra, 45 Cal.3d at p. 530; Wenger v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 29 Cal.3d at p. 623.) In resolving disputed issues of fact, however, we give special deference to the determinations of the masters, who were best able to evaluate the truthfulness of the witnesses appearing before them. (Ryan, supra, 45 Cal.3d at p. 530; Furey v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 43 Cal.3d 1297, 1304.) Each of the three masters who heard petitioner's case was a judge or retired judge of the Los Angeles County Superior Court and thus experienced in assessing credibility.[5]

(9) Some of the commission's findings expand upon the charges in the amended notice of formal proceedings. We have repeatedly refused to adopt commission determinations of judicial misconduct based on findings outside the scope of a notice of formal proceedings, as amended. (Wenger v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 29 Cal.3d 615, 638-639; Cannon v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications (1975) 14 Cal.3d 678, 696 [122 Cal.Rptr. 778, 537 P.2d 898].) Here, neither the masters nor the commission exercised their power under rule 911 to allow or require further amendments that would have enlarged the scope of the notice to encompass the commission's findings. We therefore consider the findings only for their bearing upon the charges that the amended notice, together with petitioner's answer, placed in issue (see rules 908(a), 912(a)).

MISCONDUCT IN RESPONSE TO ARREST AND PROSECUTION FOR DRUNK DRIVING (Counts one, two and three)

The first three counts upheld by the commission pertain to events surrounding the arrest and prosecution of petitioner for driving under the influence of alcohol about 1 a.m. on August 21, 1985. Count one deals with petitioner's alleged efforts to have charges dropped, count two with the arrest itself, and count three with petitioner's conviction on a nolo contendere plea. The commission concluded that its findings pursuant to each of the three counts established prejudicial conduct, and that its findings on count one also established willful misconduct. We consider the counts in chronological order, beginning with count two.

(a) Rudeness and Noncooperation in Connection With Arrest (count two)

(10) Count two charged that at the time of petitioner's arrest, he failed to cooperate by behaving in a rude and abusive manner toward the arresting officers, refusing to complete field sobriety tests, and refusing to submit to any chemical test of his blood, breath or urine despite the implied consent provisions of the Vehicle Code. The commission found all these charges to be true and further found that petitioner refused the chemical tests despite being advised five times about the implied consent provisions. The commission also found that the arresting officers and the officers at the sheriff's substation where petitioner was taken following the arrest observed objective symptoms indicating that he was under the influence of alcohol.

The arrest was made by California Highway Patrol (CHP) Officer Diane Rojas while directing traffic at the scene of an accident on a transition ramp between freeways 605 and 91. Petitioner was driving alone. Rojas testified she noticed that petitioner's car was running over some flares. She gave him three orders to stop before he did so and repeatedly instructed him to extinguish his cigarette, explaining that gasoline had spilled from an overturned vehicle. When he did not comply, she reached in his car and took the cigarette away. Smelling alcohol, she asked him to step outside. Again he did not comply with her repeated requests, so she opened the car door, pulled him out, and attempted to administer field sobriety tests, with which he refused to cooperate. Concluding from his speech, gait, and eyes that he was under the influence of alcohol, she placed him under arrest and advised him of his obligations under the implied consent law to submit to chemical tests for blood alcohol. (See Veh. Code, §§ 13353, 23157.) He repeatedly refused such tests. On the way to the sheriff's substation with Rojas and her partner, petitioner kept saying he couldn't believe he was being arrested by female officers, and that he wasn't drunk. During the booking process he was again uncooperative.

When Rojas and her partner discovered that petitioner's belongings included his business card as a judge, they called CHP Sergeant Bladow and had the jailer call his own supervisor, who was Sheriff's Sergeant Balch. Balch and Bladow both saw petitioner at the substation and corroborated that he was rude, uncooperative, and seemingly under the influence of alcohol. He again refused to take chemical tests, this time offered twice by Bladow. Balch and Bladow concluded that to avoid risks from exposing petitioner, as a judge, to other prisoners, Bladow should drive petitioner home. Bladow did so.

Petitioner testified that he had had no more than three and a half glasses of wine and that he was not uncooperative. He contends the officers' testimony that he was rude and obnoxious should be disbelieved because they did not treat him as physically dangerous. Thus, they took no precautions to restrain him while interviewing him outside the cell or while Bladow drove him home in the front seat of the patrol car. The commission's findings, however, pertain only to noncooperation and verbal abuse, not to physical threats or conduct.

The masters as well as the commission found that petitioner had refused to cooperate with the officers by behaving in a rude and abusive manner and by refusing to complete field sobriety tests or submit to any chemical test. The officers' testimony supporting these findings pursuant to count two is clear and convincing, and we adopt them as our own. We also adopt the commission's conclusion that petitioner's behavior described in the findings constituted prejudicial conduct.

(b) Attempts to Obtain Preferential Treatment (count one)

(11) Count one charges that on August 22, 1985, petitioner went to a CHP office and spoke with Sergeant Bladow about his arrest the previous day. Petitioner allegedly said he "would like to make a deal or something," and asked if the paperwork could get lost between the CHP and the court or if something could be worked out with the captain. It is charged that petitioner abused his authority as a judge to obtain preferential treatment. The masters found these charges to be true, and the commission's findings adopted them in substance.

Bladow testified that when he drove petitioner home from the sheriff's substation, petitioner said he wanted to file a complaint against the CHP officers for making a false arrest and on other grounds. Bladow replied that he would not then accept a complaint because of petitioner's intoxicated state, but that petitioner could call him at his CHP office, for which he left the telephone number.

The next day, August 22, petitioner phoned Bladow and made an appointment to come to Bladow's office that evening. At that meeting, petitioner was polite and apologetic about his actions following his arrest. He asked which court would hear his case. When told it would be the Los Cerritos Municipal Court in Bellflower, petitioner said that would be embarrassing, because people there knew him from his having appeared in that court as a deputy district attorney. He asked if the case could be transferred; Bladow said that would be up to the district attorney's office.

Bladow testified that during this conversation petitioner "made a request that maybe I [Bladow] could lose the paperwork or the paperwork could get lost somewhere between the office and the court." Bladow replied that "we" would not do that. He mentioned certain pending charges against two CHP officers for failing to process paperwork for the court and said he would not jeopardize his job by doing such a thing. Petitioner asked if Bladow's captain could help petitioner or maybe lose the paperwork. Bladow replied that Captain Whiteside "would not under any circumstances be involved in anything like that," but that petitioner was free to speak with him.

Petitioner's version of this incident is that Bladow, when taking petitioner home, initiated the idea of their meeting again to discuss the evening's events "when the smoke settles." Petitioner thought Bladow wanted a further discussion because Bladow was of the opinion that a mistake had been made, and wanted to clarify the matter as soon as possible. When petitioner first arrived at Bladow's office, he noticed a newspaper on the desk carrying a story about two highway patrol officers indicted for bribery in drunk driving cases. They briefly discussed the article; then petitioner asked in which court his case would be filed, and expressed disappointment when told it would be the Los Cerritos court. Bladow agreed to let petitioner see the reports on his case, but then said he could not find them. Finally, petitioner said he thought the CHP officers had made a major mistake in arresting him and asked whether there was any CHP procedure for holding a hearing to discuss the facts of a case. Bladow said he knew of no such procedure, but invited petitioner to discuss the matter with the captain. Petitioner then terminated the conversation. He denied seeking any preferential treatment or any diversion of the papers in his case.

The commission's findings upholding count one are supported by clear and convincing evidence. Petitioner's testimony, that Bladow sought the interview out of embarrassment stemming from a belief that petitioner's arrest had been a big mistake, is not credible. The count one findings are reinforced by the commission's findings on count two that the arresting officers and officers at the jail observed symptoms indicating petitioner was under the influence of alcohol. Those findings are amply supported by testimony and utterly discredit petitioner's version.

A closer question is presented by the commission's conclusion that in this incident petitioner "abused his authority as a judge in an attempt to obtain preferential treatment," and that his behavior constituted willful misconduct in office as well as prejudicial conduct. For purposes of judicial discipline, willful misconduct can be committed only while acting in a judicial capacity. (Gonzales v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 33 Cal.3d 359, 365; Geiler v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications, supra, 10 Cal.3d 270, 283-284.) The question, therefore, is whether petitioner was acting in a judicial capacity when he asked Sergeant Bladow for preferential treatment at the CHP office on August 22.

In support of its theory of willful misconduct under count one, the commission made an additional finding pertaining to an earlier incident that occurred when Sergeant Bladow was driving petitioner home from the sheriff's substation in the early morning hours of August 21, just after petitioner's arrest. At that time, states the finding, petitioner "referred to his judicial status and told the sergeant to remember that the Highway Patrol had to come before him when he was on the bench." Bladow testified that this statement was made at the end of the 20-minute ride home, during which petitioner berated CHP personnel for arresting him and not letting him drive his own car home. The remark does not appear to have been accompanied by any request for special treatment. The incident confirmed what undoubtedly was already common knowledge on the part of Bladow and petitioner, that the latter was a municipal court judge before whom CHP officers might appear from time to time as witnesses.

The mere fact of this common knowledge is insufficient to establish that petitioner was acting in a judicial capacity during the conversation in which he made the requests for special treatment. The present case is clearly distinguishable from the two decisions cited by the commission on this issue, in each of which a judge committed misconduct by using the authority of his office for improper ends. Thus, in Spruance v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications (1975) 13 Cal.3d 778, 794, footnote 14, and 798-799 [119 Cal.Rptr. 841, 532 P.2d 1209], the judge had received a traffic citation and committed willful misconduct by entering the chambers of a fellow judge of the same court and prevailing upon the latter to prepare and sign a dismissal of the citation. In Gonzales v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 33 Cal.3d 359, 366-369, the judge summoned a deputy district attorney into his chambers and attempted to persuade the latter to dismiss charges in cases not before the judge. Here, in contrast, petitioner made his improper requests in a conversation that took place wholly outside any judicial setting. There is no evidence that he even referred to his judicial status on that occasion.

Accordingly, it has not been proved by clear and convincing evidence that petitioner was acting in a judicial capacity when he sought favorable treatment from Bladow. The conduct of a judge not acting in judicial capacity cannot amount to willful misconduct, for purposes of judicial discipline, regardless of the malice or bad faith involved. (Furey v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 43 Cal.3d 1297, 1304; Gonzales v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 33 Cal.3d 359, 365; Geiler v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications, supra, 10 Cal.3d, 270, 284, fn. 11.) We therefore hold that by engaging in the acts charged and proved under count one, petitioner committed prejudicial conduct but not willful misconduct.

(c) Misdemeanor Conviction on Nolo Contendere Plea (count three; dismissed)

the offense of driving under the influence of alcohol on August 21, 1985." The masters and the commission upheld this charge and found additionally that there was no valid explanation for the nolo contendere plea other than petitioner's guilt. These additional findings must be disregarded in our consideration of this count, however, if the charge itself does not state a ground for discipline. We conclude that it does not.

Article VI, section 18, subdivision (b), of the Constitution provides for removal by this court of a judge who pleads guilty or no contest or is found guilty of a crime that is punishable as a felony or involves moral turpitude. Violation of Vehicle Code section 23152, subdivision (a), the offense of which petitioner was convicted, constitutes only a misdemeanor (Veh. Code, § 40000.15), and there was no finding or showing that petitioner's commission of the offense involved moral turpitude. The question therefore is whether the bare fact of a judge's conviction of a misdemeanor not involving moral turpitude, based on a plea of nolo contendere, can constitute prejudicial conduct warranting discipline.

In Cartwright v. Board of Chiropractic Examiners (1976) 16 Cal.3d 762 [129 Cal.Rptr. 462, 548 P.2d 1134], we held that the license of a chiropractor who had been convicted on a plea of nolo contendere of violating Penal Code section 316 (prohibiting the keeping of a "disorderly house") could not be revoked for "conviction of a crime involving moral turpitude" (Chiropractic Act, former § 10, subd. (b), 3 West's Ann. Bus. & Prof. Code (1974 ed.) p. 147). Our holding rested not on the statutory prohibition against using a nolo contendere plea as an admission in a civil suit (Pen. Code, former § 1016, subd. 3), but on judicial construction of the nolo contendere plea as the equivalent of a guilty plea for only the purpose of the criminal proceeding. (16 Cal.3d at p. 772; see In re Hallinan (1954) 43 Cal.2d 243, 247 [272 P.2d 768]; Grannis v. Board of Medical Examiners (1971) 19 Cal.App.3d 551, 557-560 [96 Cal.Rptr. 863]; Kirby v. Alcoholic Bev. etc. App. Bd. (1969) 3 Cal.App.3d 209, 218-222 [83 Cal.Rptr. 89]; Caminetti v. Imperial Mut. L. Ins. Co. (1943) 59 Cal.App.2d 476, 490-492 [139 P.2d 681].)

The practical impact of the Cartwright principle has been substantially narrowed by legislation expanding the legal effect of a nolo contendere plea. Penal Code section 1016, subdivision 3, now provides that the "legal effect of [a nolo contendere] plea, to a crime punishable as a felony, shall be the same as that of a plea of guilty for all purposes." (Italics supplied; see also Evid. Code, § 1300.) A number of licensing statutes have been amended to specify a nolo contendere plea, or conviction based thereon, as a ground for discipline. (Cartwright v. Board of Chiropractic Examiners, supra, 16 Cal.3d at p. 771; Arneson v. Fox (1980) 28 Cal.3d 440 [170 Cal.Rptr. 778, 621 P.2d 817] [sustaining revocation of license of real estate broker, convicted after nolo contendere plea, under Bus. & Prof. Code, § 10177, subd. (b)].)[6]

The commission recognizes that in the absence of legislation altering the Cartwright principle, nolo contendere pleas should be excluded from administrative licensing proceedings, but contends that the rule should be otherwise in judicial disciplinary proceedings. The commission relies extensively upon Matter of Killam (1983) 388 Mass. 619 [447 N.E.2d 1233], but there a judge was censured for the act of driving under the influence of intoxicating liquor. Here, the commission chose to charge petitioner only with a conviction for such misconduct and not with the act itself.

The commission contends that our reliance in Cartwright v. Board of Chiropractic Examiners, supra, 16 Cal.3d 762, on the absence of any legislative provision for basing discipline on convictions following nolo contendere pleas, makes our holding inapplicable to constitutionally based judicial disciplinary proceedings. The Constitution itself, however, expressly provides for judicial discipline based on "no contest" (nolo contendere) pleas only if the plea is to a crime punishable as a felony or involving moral turpitude. (Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (b).) The drafters of the constitutional provision seem to have recognized that a nolo contendere plea to a lesser crime may be "induced by factors collateral to the issue of guilt" (Arneson v. Fox, supra, 28 Cal.3d 440, 446). Indeed, if a judge considers himself or herself not guilty of a charged misdemeanor or infraction not involving moral turpitude, a nolo contendere plea may well be less "prejudicial to the administration of justice" or less likely to "[bring] the judicial office into disrepute" (art. VI, § 18, subd. (c)) than would the adverse publicity and the expenditure of time and money which would result from a plea of not guilty.

Thus, the sole charge in count three of the amended notice of formal proceedings, that petitioner was convicted, on a plea of nolo contendere, of the offense of driving under the influence of alcohol, fails to state a ground for discipline. Count three is therefore dismissed.

JUDICIAL RUDENESS AND DENIAL OF DUE PROCESS
(Counts four and six)

Count four charges petitioner with demeaning, rude, impatient, and abusive behavior toward individuals appearing before him, and count six

[6] In apparent response to the Cartwright decision, section 10, subdivision (b), of the Chiropractic Act was amended in 1978 to authorize revocation of a practitioner's license because of "a plea or verdict of guilty or a conviction following a plea of nolo contendere made to a charge of a felony or of any offense substantially related to the practice of chiropractic." (Stats. 1978, ch. 307, § 3, p. 640, approved at Gen. Elec. of Nov. 7, 1978.)

charges him with denying parties or their attorneys the right to be heard. Incidents exemplifying these charges are described in the following paragraphs under count 4. (We omit paragraphs e and g since the charges therein were dismissed by the commission.)

(a) Taking over questioning and ordering counsel not to return (par. a; dismissed)

Paragraph a charges: At a preliminary hearing on December 24, 1985, petitioner said to a deputy district attorney during her direct examination of an officer-witness, "I'm going to take this over, counsel. This is ridiculous." When counsel objected to petitioner's questions, petitioner became angry and told her she was "not to come in here again." Paragraph i alleges that at the hearing petitioner intimidated counsel and interrupted and took over questioning.

The masters found that the allegations of paragraph a were factually correct and that petitioner had improperly interrupted and taken over the questioning, but refused to find that petitioner had thereby intimidated counsel, had improperly curtailed questioning, had been demeaning, rude, impatient or abusive to persons appearing before him, or had conducted himself in a manner that reflects adversely on the judiciary. (13) The commission, on the other hand, dismissed the charge of improperly interrupting and taking over the questioning (par. i), but found that in responding to the deputy district attorney's objections to his questions, petitioner had become angry, sarcastic and abusive, and had thereby committed prejudicial misconduct. The commission also found that petitioner's order to the deputy "not to come in here again" was conduct reflecting adversely on the judiciary and constituted prejudicial conduct.

The commission's finding of impropriety in petitioner's judicial demeanor appears to rest on the deputy district attorney's testimony of her impressions that petitioner had a "fidgety, impatient" mannerism, "spoke in a shrill manner," and addressed her as "ma'am" in a sarcastic tone. The credibility of these impressions could best be judged by the masters, who observed the witness and rejected the charge of impropriety in petitioner's manner.

The commission contends that petitioner's ordering counsel not to return to his courtroom was parallel to the willful misconduct of Judge Wenger in banishing a deputy district attorney from his courtroom. Wenger, however, imposed the ban apparently to prevent the deputy from reporting his conduct to the commission. (Wenger v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 29 Cal.3d 615, 650-652.) Here, the incident arose when the deputy apparently objected to being addressed as "ma'am," was told by petitioner "not to come in here again," and replied, "Thank you very much. That's a privilege." Petitioner testified that the deputy spoke in a sharp tone and was insolent and disrespectful. Although she thereafter refrained from appearing before petitioner, the masters found it "not true that [petitioner] intimidated counsel." Giving due weight to the masters' assessment of credibility, we conclude that the commission's findings and conclusions of prejudicial conduct in connection with the conduct charged in paragraph a of count four are not supported by clear and convincing evidence. Accordingly, the charges based on that paragraph are dismissed.

(b) Loud, angry behavior toward counsel in chambers (par. b)

Channell testified that she had been instructed to make an extensive record at the preliminary hearing because the victim was frightened and wanted to drop the charges. Petitioner ordered her to cease her examination even though she attempted to explain the situation to him. After holding the defendant to answer, he ordered her into his chambers, where he explained that continued examination of the victim was creating a security risk because of persons in the courtroom connected with the defendant. Petitioner testified that during the examination, the defendant and his friends continuously stared at the victim.

During the in-chambers conference, however, he yelled for three to five minutes, so loudly that a clerk testified she could hear his voice in the courtroom. The clerk saw Channell emerge in tears. Channell testified that she was extremely upset, notified her superiors, and never returned to petitioner's courtroom for any further preliminary hearings. At the time of her testimony in 1987, she had been a deputy district attorney for nine years.

Shortly after the incident, Channell visited the chambers of Judge Lorna Parnell and explained what had happened. Less than an hour later, as Judge

Parnell was leaving the courthouse, she walked past petitioner's chambers, where she saw and heard petitioner laughing and telling his clerk how funny it was that he had upset a deputy district attorney and made her run out of his courtroom. Petitioner testified that he did raise his voice during the meeting with Channell in chambers, but that he had no recollection of later laughing about the matter with the clerk.

Clear and convincing evidence supports the commission's findings that petitioner's behavior, as described in paragraph b of count four, was demeaning, rude, impatient and abusive, and was treated by him as a laughing matter. We also agree that he was acting in a judicial capacity and in bad faith, and that his actions therefore constituted willful misconduct in office as well as prejudicial conduct. We decline, however, to adopt the commission's conclusion that petitioner's curtailment of the deputy district attorney's cross-examination constituted prejudicial conduct consisting of a denial of the right of a party or counsel to be heard (count six, cross-referring to paragraph b of count four). Petitioner's view that he had discretion to curtail the preliminary examination, out of concern for security of the courtroom, once there was sufficient evidence to hold the defendant to answer, "had at least enough merit to prevent the holding of it from constituting misconduct" (Wenger v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 29 Cal.3d 615, 647, fn. 13).

(c) Addressing female personnel as "sweetheart" (par. c)

(15) Paragraph c of count four alleges that petitioner addressed female attorneys and others appearing before him as "sweetie," "sweetheart," "honey," or "dear." The masters and the commission found this charge was true and that the expressions used were unprofessional, demeaning and unjustified by personal friendship or acquaintance.

Three attorneys, plus a deputy clerk and a police detective, all women, testified that petitioner had addressed them as "sweetheart," "sweetie," or "baby"; three of these witnesses stated that petitioner had also addressed female defendants as "sweetheart" or "sweetie." In his written answer to paragraph c, petitioner acknowledged that he had addressed many female acquaintances and friends, as well as members of his staff or of the clerk's office, as "dear," "honey," or "sweetheart," but asserted each of these was "meant as a warm, friendly word."

The commission found that petitioner had used these expressions in open court, but the masters found he had not done so. There was testimony that petitioner had used the terms "sweetie" or "sweetheart" to "females in the courtroom," but the witness did not specify whether court was then in session. Thus, the commission's finding on this point lacks the requisite evidentiary support. It can fairly be inferred, however, that petitioner used the expressions in and about the courthouse during business hours to people he knew principally or solely in connection with his judicial duties. We agree with the commission that petitioner's use of these terms in addressing women under those circumstances was unprofessional, demeaning and sexist, and violated canon 3A(3) of the California Code of Judicial Conduct ("Judges should be patient, dignified, and courteous to litigants, jurors, witnesses, lawyers, and others with whom judges deal in their official capacity . . . ."). We therefore adopt the conclusions of the masters and the commission that these acts constituted prejudicial conduct.

Paragraph d of count four alleges that petitioner was discourteous, impatient, and demeaning to litigants appearing before him in criminal and civil cases. The masters and the commission found this charge true only with respect to criminal cases. The commission's findings state four examples: (1) Petitioner frequently failed to respond to questions from traffic and misdemeanor defendants or to allow such defendants to explain their conduct. (2) Petitioner sometimes interrupted misdemeanor defendants who were attempting to address the court and ordered them remanded, resulting in additional incarceration. (3) Petitioner frequently lost his temper and yelled at litigants, sometimes ordering them out of his courtroom. (4) Often, petitioner used a demeaning tone of voice to Asian-surnamed defendants appearing on fish and game violations and uttered such statements as, "You were catching fishy, fishy in the harbor here and you weren't supposed to? Were you a bad boy?" Petitioner also demeaned defendants who appeared to be alcoholics or transients by addressing them using slurred speech.

(16) The commission's findings are amply supported by the testimony of two deputy district attorneys and two deputy city attorneys, all of whom had appeared frequently in petitioner's courtroom. Petitioner called 28 witnesses, including attorneys, bailiffs, clerks and court reporters, who testified to being frequently present in petitioner's courtroom without observing any of this type of misbehavior. The fact that petitioner proceeded properly and courteously on many, or even most, occasions, however, does not excuse the instances of misconduct proved by testimony which the masters found credible. We adopt the commission's findings on paragraph d of count four, as well as its conclusion that the subject behavior constituted prejudicial conduct. We also agree with the commission that petitioner's refusal to listen to defendants who were attempting to address the court, as found under paragraph d of count four, amounted to prejudicial conduct consisting of the denial of parties' full right to be heard, as charged in count six.

(e) Abusive screaming at counsel (par. f)

Paragraph f of count four alleges that petitioner screamed in an abusive manner at Deputy City Attorney Carol Rose (1) in open court when she attempted to make a bail motion and (2) in chambers when she suggested that some of the eleven conflict cases on the afternoon calendar, all assigned to David Pantoja as appointed counsel, be reassigned to other counsel in order to expedite the calendar. The masters found these allegations true, as did the commission. The commission also found that petitioner's yelling at Ms. Rose in open court so intimidated her that she felt she could never make another bail motion before petitioner, and that his yelling at her in chambers frightened her and reduced her to tears.

(17) The findings are supported by the testimony of Rose, who said that both incidents occurred about 3:30 p.m. on different days between January and August 1985 but that she could not fix any exact dates. As to the second incident, Rose testified that by 3:30 p.m., Pantoja had interviewed only two of the eleven defendants he was scheduled to represent at arraignments that day. She approached a local attorney and ascertained that he would be willing to take some court appointments, then asked Pantoja if he would be willing to split the appointments with that attorney so they could all finish by 5 p.m. Pantoja agreed, and Rose said she would speak to petitioner about it. When she made the request to petitioner, he was furious and accused her of calling Pantoja incompetent.

Petitioner argues these are vague accusations made by a single attorney and contradicted by testimony of petitioner's consistently decorous behavior by numerous witnesses who were in his courtroom on a regular basis. The intemperate behavior found here, however, is consistent with petitioner's similar conduct established by the findings under paragraphs b, d, and h of count four. Moreover, Pantoja is one of the attorneys toward whom petitioner is found, in count five, to have shown favoritism in making appointments. As the commission points out, that fact may have made petitioner overly sensitive to the suggestion that some of those appointments be transferred to another attorney.

The masters concluded that the foregoing behavior, charged in paragraph f, constituted willful misconduct, but the commission decided it was only prejudicial conduct. The evidence does not establish clearly and convincingly that the acts in question were committed for a purpose other than the faithful discharge of judicial duties and thus amounted to more than spontaneous outbursts. In the absence of a showing of bad faith requisite for willful misconduct, we conclude that the findings under paragraph f of count four constituted prejudicial conduct. We also conclude that petitioner's angry rebuff of counsel's attempt to make a bail motion denied counsel the right to be heard and, as determined by the commission, thereby constituted prejudicial conduct under count six.

(f) Intimidation of witnesses (par. h)

(18) Paragraph h of count four alleges that petitioner was rude and intimidating to witnesses, unnecessarily interrupted their testimony, at times harshly admonished them to "just answer the question," and caused them to become upset. The masters and the commission found this charge true.

The evidence supporting this charge was the testimony of Judge Lorna Parnell, who testified that her first judicial assignment, from August through December 1985, was in the San Pedro branch where petitioner was also sitting. Because she was new to criminal law, she sat in petitioner's courtroom on three occasions to observe preliminary hearings. She testified that petitioner became loud, impatient, and abusive toward witnesses who hesitated in answering questions. She was concerned about this behavior because most of the witnesses had been victims of crime.

Petitioner contends that this testimony lacks specific case names and dates, and is too vague. The intemperate judicial conduct found here, however, is consistent with other acts of petitioner established by the findings. There was no reason to disbelieve Judge Parnell's testimony. We find the charges of paragraph h of count four to be true and agree with the masters and the commission that the acts charged constituted prejudicial conduct consisting of both rude, intimidating treatment of witnesses (count four) and denials of the right to be heard (count six).

FAVORITISM TOWARD APPOINTED COUNSEL (Count five)

Count five charges that petitioner has "shown favoritism to private attorney Theordore Veganes, with whom [petitioner has] jointly owned property in Hawaii since 1976, and to private attorney David Pantoja by conduct which includes, but is not limited to, the following: . . . ." There follow four paragraphs charging misconduct. Paragraphs c and d were dismissed by the commission; therefore, only paragraphs a and b are considered here.

(a) Favoritism in appointing counsel for indigent defendants (par. a)

Paragraph a of count five charges petitioner with exercising his power of appointment on behalf of Attorneys Veganes and Pantoja in an extremely high number of cases during the years 1983 to 1986. The masters found that this charge was true and constituted prejudicial conduct.

The commission found favoritism not only toward Attorneys Veganes and Pantoja, as charged in count five, but also toward a third attorney, "Susan Anderson, an associate of Mr. Pantoja," and found under paragraph a that petitioner had overly used his appointive power on behalf of all three attorneys. The commission then made four subfindings, which we must consider for their bearing on paragraph a's charge of favoritism toward Attorneys Veganes and Pantoja. The first two of these subfindings are based on testimony and documents presented to the masters by an internal auditor for the Los Angeles County Controller's Audit Division, who had been directed to audit appointments of attorneys under Penal Code section 987.2 from the beginning of 1984 to March 1987 in the San Pedro courthouse, to which petitioner was assigned in January 1985.[7]

The first of the 2 subfindings is that from January 1986 to March 1987, petitioner appointed Attorneys Veganes, Pantoja, and Anderson to serve in 465 (approximately 58 percent) of the 801 cases in which he made appointments. The auditor also testified, however, that the 3 attorneys received 99 of 484 appointments made by judges other than petitioner during that period. Moreover, there was no testimony on how many of these appointments went to Anderson, who was specified as one of the recipients of favoritism in the commission's findings but not in the amended notice of formal proceedings.

The second subfinding was that in 1985 the three allegedly favored attorneys received 30.3 percent of all the money paid for appointments in the San Pedro courthouse, whereas in 1984 only 4.8 percent of such payments went to Veganes and none to the other two attorneys. The auditor, who testified to these figures, also stated that of the 30.3 percent of the payments in 1985, 6.8 percent went to Anderson, 7.2 percent to Pantoja, and 16.3 percent to Veganes. He did not say how many of these appointments were made by petitioner and how many by other judges. Moreover, the auditor testified that because attorneys usually did not submit their claims for two or three months, or sometimes even six months, there was no way of knowing how many of the payments in 1985 were for services performed in 1984, i.e., before petitioner took the bench in San Pedro. Veganes testified that it was his regular practice to allow requests for payment for services as appointed counsel to accumulate for three or four months and then submit them in one batch.

Petitioner's clerk testified that when appointments were necessary because the public defender was unavailable or declared a conflict, petitioner would have her check the building for available attorneys, and if she could not find one she would make telephone calls to attorneys who had asked to be placed on the appointments list. She named nine attorneys (including the three in question) who were repeatedly appointed, and she denied that petitioner had ever told her to call only Veganes, Pantoja, and Anderson.

Five attorneys, other than those three, testified to receiving as many San Pedro appointments as they could handle. Both a deputy district attorney and a deputy city attorney, however, testified that after petitioner's arrival at the court, most (one said 90 percent) of the appointments went to Veganes, Pantoja, and Anderson. Petitioner testified that he frequently appointed Veganes and Pantoja because of their competence but that he did not keep track of how often he used them. He had served with both men in the same district attorney's office, and both testified that they contributed to petitioner's 1986 judicial reelection campaign.

Judge Trammell, who was presiding judge of the Los Angeles Municipal Court, testified that a directive had been sent by his predecessor to judges of the court pertaining to appointment of counsel. The directive, which is in evidence and dated July 31, 1985, states that its provisions for "appointment rotation via a list of eligible attorneys" is "not in effect at this time." Judge Trammell also testified that on several occasions he advised petitioner that he had discussed appointments of counsel with a county auditor and had received telephone calls on the subject from a newspaper reporter, and that he was concerned about the issue. Petitioner replied that he felt there were a number of people who were out to get him.

The commission's third subfinding under paragraph a of count five was that petitioner "never disclosed his joint ownership of property with Mr. Veganes to opposing counsel in cases before him in which Mr. Veganes represented defendants." The property in question was a condominium in Hawaii on which petitioner had always paid his share of the expenses. The commission contends the joint ownership violated the canon 5C(1) of the California Code of Judicial Conduct, admonishing judges to "refrain from financial and business dealings that tend to . . . involve them in frequent transactions with lawyers or persons likely to come before the courts on which they serve." Petitioner concedes that his failure to disclose his interest in the property to counsel opposing Mr. Veganes may have given the appearance of some impropriety.

Finally, the fourth subfinding is that "[w]hile assigned to the municipal court on Bauchet Street in Los Angeles, [petitioner] made Penal Code section 987.2 appointments to Mr. Pantoja in order to help Mr. Pantoja reestablish his private practice of law." The finding is based on a single

"yes" answer by petitioner on cross-examination, in response to a question whether he had done what the finding states. There is no other evidence of favoritism toward Pantoja at that time, which preceded petitioner's assignment to San Pedro.

(19) Both the masters and the commission concluded that petitioner had committed prejudicial conduct by favoring Veganes and Pantoja in his appointments of counsel. Giving due weight to the masters' assessment of credibility, we think this conclusion is supported by clear and convincing evidence. Though some of the evidence of favoritism, as already explained, lumped appointments of Veganes and Pantoja with the appointments of Anderson, the fact that Anderson was Pantoja's associate made Anderson's appointments somewhat probative of favoritism toward Pantoja.

The commission also concluded, however, that petitioner's favoritism in appointing counsel constituted willful misconduct. The commission relies for this conclusion on Spruance v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications, supra, 13 Cal.3d 778, contending that that decision is directly in point. It is not. Judge Spruance committed willful misconduct by making "illegal and unjustified appointments of two attorneys" who were his friends and supporters. (Id. at p. 799.) "[N]o valid reason, such as conflict of interest, existed to justify [the 27] appointments [in question], nor does it appear that in each of the 27 cases a determination of the indigency of these defendants had been duly made as required by Government Code section 27707. [The attorneys] were compensated by Alameda County public funds in amounts not less than $150 for each court appearance without regard to the nature of the service performed or the time expended . . . ." (Id. at p. 795, fn. 15.) In the present case, by contrast, there is no contention or evidence that any of petitioner's appointments of the allegedly favored attorneys was not fully justified under Penal Code section 987.2 and related sections, or that the attorneys were overpaid for their services.

Nor do we find any other clear and convincing evidence that petitioner acted in bad faith, i.e., that he knew or should have known the appointments were beyond his powers and that he made them for a purpose other than the faithful discharge of his judicial duties (see Gubler v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1984) 37 Cal.3d 27, 45-46 [207 Cal.Rptr. 171, 688 P.2d 551]). There is evidence that petitioner was not given clear guidelines for allocating the appointments, and that he acted to provide competent counsel whenever needed without conscious favoritism. Though there was other evidence from which inferences of bad faith might be drawn, such evidence appears to have been rejected by the masters, who were best able to judge credibility. We therefore conclude that the conduct charged in paragraph a of count five constituted prejudicial conduct but not willful misconduct.

(b) Ex parte conversations with attorneys who were appearing on appointed cases (par. b)

As a further instance of alleged favoritism toward Attorneys Veganes and Pantoja, paragraph b of count five charges petitioner with having "[e]x parte conversations in your chambers with these two attorneys on a number of occasions when they were appearing on appointed cases." Petitioner testified that these attorneys sometimes came into his chambers for social visits on days when they were appearing before him in court, but he denied that they ever discussed cases in which he was acting as judge.

(20) The masters' findings under paragraph b are consistent with petitioner's testimony. The masters found it not true that petitioner had ex parte conversations with the attorneys concerning cases on which they were appearing before him. The masters also found that petitioner "met privately with these attorneys in chambers on days when the attorneys were appearing before [him] as counsel in a case on his calendar, thereby giving the appearance of impropriety." The masters concluded this was prejudicial conduct.

The commission, however, found that during some of the meetings described in the masters' findings, petitioner "would improperly discuss cases in which the attorneys were appearing before him." The principal evidence supporting this finding was the testimony of Carol Rose, who had appeared before petitioner in San Pedro both as a deputy city attorney and as a deputy district attorney. Ms. Rose testified that on four or five occasions she saw Veganes, Anderson, or other defense counsel in chambers without a prosecutor present. She thereupon positioned herself at the chambers door, heard that they were discussing one of her own cases, and then went into chambers herself. Deputy City Attorney Sherry Tourino testified that in cases in which Veganes, Pantoja, or Anderson appeared before petitioner, she saw him invite the attorney into his chambers during the recess. She disclaimed any charge of actual impropriety but said it gave her "a feeling of impropriety."

Mr. Pantoja testified that he frequently visited petitioner in chambers during the lunch period, perhaps twice a week, and that most of the time they were alone. When asked whether during those visits he ever discussed cases in which petitioner had appointed him as counsel, he answered, "Yes." While supportive of the commission's finding, this testimony is literally consistent with the masters' finding that petitioner had no ex parte conversations with the attorneys concerning cases "in which they were appearing" before him. Pantoja's answer could have referred to cases already finally disposed of by the court. Although the question is close, we defer to the masters' determinations of credibility and adopt their finding that petitioner had no ex parte conversations with attorneys about cases in which they were appearing before him. We conclude, however, that petitioner's practice of meeting alone in chambers with an attorney representing one side of a case pending before him in the absence of circumstances that would make ex parte communication proper (see, e.g., 6 Witkin, Cal. Procedure (3d ed. 1985) Proceedings Without Trial, §§ 42-44) gave rise to an appearance of impropriety. It therefore constituted prejudicial conduct "that brings the judicial office into disrepute" (art. VI, § 18, subd. (c)).

IMPROPER SUGGESTION TO WAITRESS NOT TO WORRY ABOUT DRUNK DRIVING ARREST (Count seven)

Count seven alleges that on the evening of February 22, 1985, petitioner "sat at a bar in Cigo's Restaurant in San Pedro for a period of several hours and during that period engaged in a conversation with Mary Davis, a waitress at the restaurant, in which [he] repeatedly implied that she should not worry about her recent arrest for drunk driving because [he] could in some manner exert influence to affect the disposition of the case." (Italics added.) The masters found this allegation to be true and concluded that it amounted to willful misconduct. The commission's finding, however, adopted the allegation except for the italicized portions; thus, the commission declined to find that petitioner either (1) implied more than once that Davis should not worry about her arrest or (2) implied that he could exert influence on her behalf. The commission nonetheless concluded that the conduct described in its finding constituted prejudicial conduct.

Notwithstanding this limited scope of the commission's finding, the commission's brief in this court analyzes at length certain testimony from which it might be inferred that petitioner made repeated offers of improper assistance in the matter. None of that testimony is properly before us. (21) It is settled that we "predicate our adoption, modification, or rejection of the Commission's recommendation [to remove petitioner from his judicial office] solely upon those specifications in the [Amended] Notice of Formal Proceedings which the Commission found both to have been proven as a matter of fact and to have constituted constitutionally sufficient grounds for the imposition of discipline." (Spruance v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications, supra, 13 Cal.3d 778, 785, fn. 5.) Thus, on count seven, we are concerned factually only with the commission's finding that during his long conversation with the waitress, petitioner implied that she should not worry about her recent arrest for drunk driving.

(22) Petitioner testified that he recalled sitting at the bar named in count seven, next to a woman who told him about a drinking-and-driving offense. Though he could not identify the woman as Mary Davis, he was convinced from the testimony that she was the one. He did not comment on, and thus did not deny, the testimony that she was told he was a judge. He testified that he "spoke to her in terms of telling her not to worry about it; it is going to be all right; these things have a way of working themselves out." He said he had often spoken in those terms as he listened to people's problems, including "the facts of . . . their traffic cases and their drinking and driving cases." But he emphatically denied ever telling Mary Davis or anyone else that he would take care of that person's case or use any improper influence in the matter.

Petitioner concedes in his brief that in acting as he testified, he "may have acted inappropriately," and that "[a]t the worst, the evidence might give an appearance of possible impropriety meeting the standard of prejudicial conduct." We agree that for a judge to give a layperson assurances about the outcome of a prosecution against the latter may imply inside information and thus be inappropriate. We concur in the commission's conclusion that petitioner's conduct charged and found true by the commission under count seven constituted prejudicial conduct.

PERSISTENT FAILURE TO PERFORM DUTIES (Count eight)

Count eight alleges that petitioner "persistently failed to perform [his] judicial duties by being frequently absent from the courthouse, maintaining abbreviated working hours and delegating [his] judicial responsibilities to others," and that "this conduct rendered [him] unavailable for judicial services, placed a burden on [his] judicial colleagues, injured the administration of justice, and failed to promote public confidence in the integrity of the judiciary. This conduct is exemplified by, but not limited to, the following:" There follow two paragraphs, of which paragraph a deals with abbreviated working hours, and paragraph b deals with days absent from work.

The masters rejected paragraph a (abbreviated work hours) as not proved, but found that paragraph b (days absent) was true and accordingly upheld count eight only to the extent of its finding on paragraph b. The commission, however, made findings incorporating the substance of both paragraphs and sustaining the whole of count eight.

(a) Abbreviated working hours (par. a; dismissed)

(23) Paragraph a of count eight alleged that petitioner had "maintained abbreviated working hours, beginning work at 10:00 or 10:30 a.m., taking lunch breaks of two to three hours and often stopping work at 4:00 p.m. or earlier." The commission, but not the masters, found this paragraph to be true.

Numerous attorneys and other witnesses testified that petitioner customarily did not take the bench until after 10 a.m., and some said he usually did not arrive at the courthouse until that hour. Petitioner himself testified that his "work hours" were "10 o'clock to noon and from 2 to—I suppose 5 o'clock basically," but that "in most instances" he did not leave the court until 6 or 7 o'clock in the evening because he had things to take care of that he could not get done during the day. He said that he sometimes was there on weekends. He also testified that he usually did not leave for lunch "until probably 12:30 or 1 o'clock" and that he "was back by quarter to 2 or so."

Elaine Markulis, one of petitioner's two courtroom deputy clerks, testified that petitioner usually arrived between 9:30 and 10 a.m. and was still there when she left between 6 and 6:30. The only witness who contradicted petitioner's statement of when he usually left for the day was Judge Parnell, who was at the San Pedro court from July through December 1985. She testified that she "share[d] the same corridor" with petitioner in the "small courthouse" and parked in the same area as he, that she was usually at the courthouse from 9 a.m. to 5 p.m., and that petitioner rarely arrived before 10 a.m. and usually, but not always, was gone when she left at 5 p.m.

Deputy Clerk Markulis explained that petitioner's division handled traffic, misdemeanor and felony arraignments, preliminary hearings, and small claims. She said she arrived at 8:30 a.m., and the courtroom doors were opened at 9 a.m., when the clerks would proceed to call the calendar, find out which defendants were present and which ones needed counsel, and "play a tape of the constitutional rights." Walk-in traffic-ticket arraignments would "come from the office" about 9:50 a.m. Thus, the morning calendar was not ready until 10 a.m. Petitioner's other deputy courtroom clerk, Kathleen McGee, on the other hand, testified that the traffic citations were ready to be heard by 9:15 a.m. The commission argues that petitioner could have heard these traffic citations as well as small claims cases before 10 a.m.

Markulis testified, however, that when petitioner was not on the bench, he was usually in his chambers busy with paperwork, including probation and sentencing reports, small claims cases (which he customarily took under submission), and applications for appointment or compensation of counsel. The commission contends, based on testimony of petitioner's friends, that he spent too much time in chambers socializing instead of working.

Markulis estimated that from 175 to 225 cases per day were dealt with in petitioner's courtroom. Her estimates included: traffic ticket appearances, 20 to 40 in the morning and 20 to 40 in the afternoon; "custodies" (misdemeanor), from 15 to 40 or 45; felony preliminary hearings, 4 to 10, averaging 6 or 7; felony arraignments, up to 4 or 5; and misdemeanor "bailouts," 20 to 40. In addition, there were cases "continued for arraignments." Markulis testified that petitioner always completed his calendar for the day, and Deputy District Attorney Rose testified that when there was a heavy preliminary hearing calendar, petitioner would sometimes go as late as 6 or 7 p.m.

The commission argues that some of petitioner's rude and impatient behavior found under count four may have been due to his failure to allow more time for court proceedings. The commission also asserts that this failure was the cause of petitioner's alleged policy, testified to by Deputy Clerk McGee, as well as by a deputy district attorney, of transferring to downtown Los Angeles any preliminary hearing estimated to last more than one hour. Markulis, however, emphatically denied the existence of any such policy.

Thus, the evidence on paragraph a's charge of abbreviated working hours included numerous conflicts of testimony that the masters who observed the witnesses were in a better position to resolve than the commission. Accepting the masters' resolution, reflected in their finding that rejected paragraph a, we conclude there is a lack of clear and convincing evidence that petitioner maintained abbreviated working hours and thereby shirked his judicial responsibilities. We therefore dismiss paragraph a of count eight.

(b) Absences from work (par. b)

(24) Paragraph b of count eight charges that petitioner "did not work approximately ninety-six and one-half days between March 8, 1985 and December 31, 1986; [petitioner] reported inability to work for health reasons on 21 of those days. [Petitioner] apparently ha[s] stopped working and [is] not working in 1987." This charge was found true by the masters and the commission, who also found "[t]here was no legal justification for [petitioner's] failure to work as such during 1987," and concluded that the conduct charged in paragraph b constituted persistent failure or inability to perform judicial duties.

Daily work sheets were introduced before the masters to prove petitioner's absence for 96½ days from March 1985 through 1986.[8] Petitioner testified that during that period he was absent only 95 days, of which 57 days were vacation at the recommended rate of 21 days per year—42 days for 1985 and 1986 plus 15 days carried over from 1984. He also said that during the same period he was sick on 27 days, not just the 21 days stated in the charge. He acknowledged that his figures left 11 days of absence unaccounted for. The commission contends this testimony is inconsistent with the statement in petitioner's answer to the amended notice of formal proceedings that he had not kept records of his vacation or sick time. He testified, however, that his testimony was based on old calendars on which he had noted the dates of his illnesses and his vacations.

Petitioner also testified that since January 5, 1987 (a Monday), he had not worked and had not been available for assignment. He named a doctor who was treating him for "blood pressure," a psychiatrist whom he had been seeing since the fall of 1986, and a psychologist he had consulted before that, but he introduced no expert testimony or reports concerning any limitations imposed by his health upon his ability to carry out his judicial duties. The presiding judge of the municipal court testified that he had planned to transfer petitioner away from San Pedro as of the first of January 1987, but did not do so because in mid-December 1986 petitioner said he was leaving on a vacation for the remainder of the month and thereafter would be taking a medical leave of absence on the advice of his physician.

Based on the foregoing, we agree with the masters and the commission that there is clear and convincing evidence to support the charges of paragraph b, and we so find. Even if a substantial portion of the absences in 1985 and 1986 were excusable by illness or as vacation, there appears no excuse for petitioner's failure to work from the beginning of 1987 to May 14, 1987, the date of his testimony before the masters. Nor does he claim to have made even an attempt to return to his duties from that time until his retirement in July 1988.

The masters and the commission also concluded that the conduct charged and found true under paragraph b constitutes a persistent failure or inability by petitioner to perform his judicial duties. This conclusion is clearly correct, particularly in view of the constitutional history of the elimination of willfulness as an element of this ground for removal.

[8]The commission's brief in this court describes testimony of three witnesses to the effect that petitioner failed to provide adequate advance notice of some of his absences. Any such testimony is beyond the scope of the charges against petitioner and therefore must be disregarded. It should not have been referred to in the brief.

From 1960 to 1976 judges could be removed for "willful and persistent failure to perform [the judge's] duties." (Italics added; Cal. Const., former art. VI, § 10b [adopted Nov. 8, 1960]; Cal. Const., former art. VI, § 18, subd. (c) [adopted Nov. 8, 1966].) In 1976 such removal became authorized for "persistent failure or inability to perform the judge's duties." (Italics added; art. VI, § 18, subd. (c).) The ballot pamphlet argument in favor of the 1976 amendment (Gen. Elec., Nov. 2, 1976) stated at page 31: "Proposition 7 will expand the powers of the Commission to deal with judicial officers who, due to disability, are no longer able to perform their judicial functions. Under current constitutional authority the Commission may only censure or remove a judge where the persistent failure to perform duties is willful. This Proposition will eliminate willfulness as grounds for removal and censure, enabling the Commission to more adequately deal with problems of age and health which may impede the efficiency and quality of justice." No argument against the amendment appeared in the ballot pamphlet.

Accordingly, we conclude that petitioner's excessive absences from work in 1985 and 1986 and his cessation of work altogether at the beginning of 1987, as set forth in our finding on paragraph b of count eight, constituted persistent failure or inability to perform his judicial duties.

REMOVAL FROM OFFICE

The commission recommends that petitioner be removed from office. For the reasons heretofore explained, we must decide whether to adopt this recommendation even though petitioner voluntarily retired after it was made. The commission based its recommendation on three of the constitutional grounds for removal stated in article VI, section 18, subdivision (c): willful misconduct, prejudicial conduct, and persistent inability or failure to perform judicial duties. We begin by considering whether removal is called for on the first two of those grounds.

(a) Willful misconduct and prejudicial conduct as ground for removal

(25) There is merit in petitioner's contention that our findings of his willful misconduct and prejudicial conduct are insufficient to warrant removal even though they clearly support the lesser discipline of censure.[9] Indeed, our findings against petitioner are similar in degree of gravity to those in two relatively recent cases in which only censure was imposed:

[9]The commission's recommendation of removal empowers this court to impose the lesser discipline of censure. (McCartney v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications (1974) 12 Cal.3d 512 [116 Cal.Rptr. 260, 526 P.2d 268].)

Gubler v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 37 Cal.3d 27, and Roberts v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1983) 33 Cal.3d 739 [190 Cal.Rptr. 910, 661 P.2d 1064].

In Gubler, supra, 37 Cal.3d 27, the judge made a variety of orders violative of statutory restrictions on enforcement of a defendant's obligation to pay the county for services of the public defender (Pen. Code, § 987.8). The orders unlawfully required defendants to appear for fee-collecting purposes, made fee payments an apparent condition of probation, extracted fees from deposits for bail and, in one instance found to be willful misconduct, doubled a fee because of the judge's irritation over counsel's objection to the fee's being made an apparent condition of probation. Judge Gubler also committed willful misconduct by writing a note to a court commissioner recommending disposition of a case in which the judge had been peremptorily disqualified (Code Civ. Proc., § 170.6). Finally, the judge on four occasions illegally released confiscated guns for sale to his courtroom bailiff, who was a close personal friend, or to purchasers brought in by the bailiff. (See Pen. Code, § 12028.)

In Roberts v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 33 Cal.3d 739, we held that an independent basis for our censure order was afforded by the judge's conviction (after jury trial) for obstructing a public officer (Pen. Code, § 148) under circumstances reminiscent of the present case. Uniformed officers stopped a car being driven erratically by the judge's son and began to give the son a field sobriety test. The judge emerged from the car, told the officers they had no business stopping the car, directed obscenities at them, handed them a card identifying himself as a judge, and finally struck an officer in the chest and grabbed his shirt. Another independent basis for the Roberts censure order was a matter in which the judge threatened a district attorney who had sought a writ against his ruling; advised the public defender, ex parte, " 'You'd better win this or I won't grant another motion for you' "; and then, after the Court of Appeal had granted the writ, telephoned the presiding justice before expiration of the time for rehearing, angrily protesting the decision. In another matter, involving child neglect, the judge " 'improperly acted as an advocate, prejudged issues, abusively curtailed the presentation of evidence, and treated witnesses, litigants and an attorney in a rude, intimidating and demeaning manner.' " (33 Cal.3d at p. 744.) Moreover, after making his ruling, the judge threatened to report losing counsel to the State Bar if she advised her client to appeal, and then after the appeal was taken made an ex parte request to substituted counsel to consider dismissing the appeal. Finally, during a felony trial, the judge called inexperienced defense counsel into chambers and caused her to cry by loudly and angrily accusing her of being incompetent and quizzing her about her legal experience.

Petitioner's willful misconduct and prejudicial conduct, though egregious, is not significantly more so than the misdeeds found in Roberts and Gubler. Like Judge Roberts, he failed to cooperate with officers engaged in enforcing the law against driving under the influence of alcohol, and then attempted to obtain special treatment. On the other hand, petitioner's request that the CHP "lose the paperwork" on his case, though thoroughly reprehensible, did not go beyond the stage of inquiry; aside from his remark the previous evening that CHP officers occasionally appeared before him, he did not press his request with any threat or offer of favors.

Like Judges Roberts and Gubler, petitioner from time to time was demeaning, rude, impatient, and abusive to individuals appearing before him. These included witnesses, as well as traffic and misdemeanor defendants. He sometimes addressed women in the courthouse (though not in open court) with undue and demeaning familiarity. Twice, he yelled at and unjustly intimidated a deputy city attorney, and on another occasion he imparted similar treatment to a deputy district attorney and then was heard to express amusement that he had upset her.

Petitioner also exercised favoritism toward two friends in his appointments of counsel for indigent defendants, but we have concluded that this favoritism was not willful misconduct because petitioner made the appointments under pressure and without adequate guidelines for assuring impartiality among would-be appointees. His visits in chambers with the two favored attorneys while they had cases pending before him gave the appearance of impropriety even though the conversations were not about those cases. (It should be noted that Judge Gubler also exercised favoritism by illegally releasing confiscated guns for sale to or through his bailiff, a close friend. (37 Cal.3d at pp. 55-59.) Finally, petitioner gave the appearance of impropriety when he assured a waitress that she should not worry about her recent arrest for drunk driving.

All this judicial misbehavior by petitioner, though deplorable and clearly calling for censure, falls significantly short of the showings of willful misconduct and prejudicial conduct on which we have based orders removing judges. In Furey v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 43 Cal.3d 1297, we removed a judge after sustaining eight charges of willful misconduct arising out of four incidents, plus ten charges of prejudicial conduct; the charges included abuses of the contempt power and an attempt to influence a case in which the judge had been disqualified. In that opinion, we reviewed five previous cases of judicial removal. (43 Cal.3d at p. 1318.)

Since then, three other judges have been removed. In one of those cases, the judge repeatedly abused his contempt power, personally embroiled himself in cases by ex parte communication or investigation, and regularly left the courthouse at 2 p.m., or even in the morning on Fridays. (Ryan v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1988) 45 Cal.3d 518 [247 Cal.Rptr. 378, 754 P.2d 724, 76 A.L.R.4th 951].) In a second case, the judge directed a guilty verdict, dismissed a criminal action against a lifelong friend whom the judge had failed even to arraign, ordered criminal trials to proceed in the absence of defense counsel, and failed to sign a judgment even after this court had formally censured him for failing to do so. (McCullough v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1989) 49 Cal.3d 186 [260 Cal.Rptr. 557, 776 P.2d 259].) Finally, in the third case, removal was based on twenty-five findings of willful misconduct or prejudicial misconduct, including the following: ten incidents of prejudicial conduct over a four-year period reflecting a persistent pattern of rude, abusive behavior toward litigants, witnesses, counsel, and court personnel; abdication on five occasions of the judge's responsibility to ensure the rights of criminal defendants; five instances of abuse of the contempt power; three cases of the judge's personal involvement and failure to remain objective in matters before him; and two instances of abuse of the power to make fee orders. (Kloepfer v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1989) 49 Cal.3d 826 [264 Cal.Rptr. 100, 782 P.2d 239].)

Petitioner's willful misconduct and prejudicial conduct, though clearly calling for severe censure, was significantly less blameworthy than the misconduct in the removal cases. His inquiries whether the CHP could "lose the paperwork" on his arrest were reprehensible, yet he took no further steps to avoid being prosecuted. (Compare this with the repeated obstruction of criminal prosecution found in Gonzales v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 33 Cal.3d 359, 366-369, and Spruance v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications, supra, 13 Cal.3d 778, 794, fn. 14, 798-799.) His rude and demeaning behavior toward litigants, witnesses, and counsel who appeared before him undoubtedly had adverse effects on the proper disposition of cases, particularly where it improperly curtailed testimony or the functioning of counsel. Yet petitioner did not abuse the contempt power, attempt to influence the disposition of cases through ex parte communication or investigation, or intervene in cases in which he had been disqualified. (Cf., e.g., Wenger v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 29 Cal.3d 615, 653.) As for his too frequent appointments of two close personal friends, and the associate of one of them, as counsel for indigent defendants, we should not assume that if clear guidelines for rotating appointments had been laid down, petitioner would not have followed them.

The testimony of the numerous attorneys and court personnel who testified on petitioner's behalf, particularly in connection with count four, indicates that he was capable of being a competent, conscientious, and fair judge. Viewed as a whole, petitioner's misconduct does not appear so continuing or pervasive as to preclude his reform. (Cf. Kloepfer v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 49 Cal.3d 826, 866). Thus, it seems likely that our public censure of each of petitioner's misdeeds would have led him to correct and improve his judicial behavior. (See In re Rasmussen (1987) 43 Cal.3d 536, 538 [236 Cal.Rptr. 152, 734 P.2d 988].) Accordingly, we decline to order him removed from office for willful misconduct or prejudicial conduct.

(b) Persistent failure or inability to perform duties as ground for removal

(26) The commission's recommendation of removal from office is grounded not only on petitioner's willful misconduct and prejudicial conduct, but also on his persistent failure or inability to perform judicial duties, based on the commission's finding, which we have adopted, under paragraph b of count eight. Petitioner's failure to work since the beginning of 1987 without any explanation other than vague references to current medical treatment, and without any evidence that he might or could resume his duties thereafter, is alone sufficient to establish this ground for his removal.

Petitioner asks us to take judicial notice of a writ proceeding concerning his application to the commission for disability retirement in March 1987, two months prior to the hearing before the masters. (See Gov. Code, § 75060 et seq.) He does not claim, however, that the application or the proceeding resulted in any administrative or judicial determination with respect to his ability to work. Hence, the proceeding in question appears irrelevant.

On November 17, 1987, petitioner requested that the commission consider certain exhibits, including six medical reports, at its hearing in this matter then set for December 4, 1987. He did not, however, request a hearing for the taking of additional evidence under rule 916. In objecting to the request on various grounds, the examiners pointed out that even if an evidentiary hearing were ordered, the medical reports would be excludable as hearsay under rule 909, which at that time allowed only "legal" evidence to be received. The commission, however, adopted a resolution, concurrently with its findings, conclusions and recommendation, that the medical reports offered by petitioner, "although technically inadmissible, have nevertheless been considered by the Commission for the purposes of mitigation." Thus, the commission appears to have considered the reports as in the nature of an offer of proof and to have concluded that even if they were true they would not alter the recommendation of removal.

Five of the reports were addressed to petitioner's counsel; one of these was from a psychologist, dated October 13, 1986, and four were from a psychiatrist, with dates in January, August, September and October 1987. The other report, dated May 7, 1987, was from a different psychiatrist and addressed to the commission. All stated that petitioner had numerous symptoms from stress associated with a hard-fought campaign, beginning in February 1986, to be retained in office at the June 1986 election. Petitioner was said to be suffering from severe depression and numerous related difficulties that would interfere with his functioning as a judge. Thus, the reports, at most, merely confirmed the conclusion that since the beginning of 1987, petitioner had been unable to perform his judicial duties.

Nor would the medical reports, if proved true, affect any of our findings under the other counts. Since petitioner's reported medical difficulties did not commence until February 1986, they could have no bearing on any of the findings that occurred in 1985, i.e., our sole finding of willful misconduct (count four, par. b) and five of our findings of prejudicial conduct (counts one, two, and seven; pars. f and h of count four [included also in count six]).

The remaining counts of prejudicial conduct were either undated (count four, pars. d [included in count six] and c) or took place both before and after February 1986 (count five). But even as to misconduct committed after commencement of the troubles described in the medical reports, proof of the substance of those reports would not be a defense. Protection of the public and of the integrity of the judiciary precludes allowing petitioner's reported physical or emotional difficulties to bar a determination of "conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute." (Art. VI, § 18, subd. (c); see Matter of Yaccarino, supra, 101 N.J. 337 [502 A.2d 3, 30].)

CONCLUSION

For the reasons stated, we order that as of the date this decision becomes final, David M. Kennick shall be removed from his office as judge of the Municipal Court for the Los Angeles Judicial District on the sole ground of persistent failure or inability to perform his judicial duties. We also censure him for his willful misconduct in office and his conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice as determined in this opinion. He shall be permitted to practice law upon passing the Professional Responsibility Examination required of applicants seeking readmission or reinstatement to the bar. (Gonzales v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 33 Cal.3d 359, 378.)[10]

[10]Since petitioner Kennick's retirement has already terminated his tenure in office, the effects of our directing his removal are (1) to establish his ineligibility for judicial office generally and (2) to suspend him from practicing law in California pending further order of this court, thereby laying the foundation for the conditional permission to practice granted by our order. (See Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (d).)

[No. S004893. Nov. 27, 1989.]

KENNETH LYNN KLOEPFER, a Judge of the Municipal Court, Petitioner, v.
COMMISSION ON JUDICIAL PERFORMANCE, Respondent.

SUMMARY

The Commission on Judicial Performance recommended that a judge of the municipal court be removed from office, based on findings by the commission that the judge had committed five acts of willful misconduct and twenty acts of conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brought the judicial office into disrepute (Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (c)). The basis for the proceedings was incidents in which the judge was alleged to have displayed a lack of judicial temperament in dealing with litigants, attorneys, witnesses and attachés, thereby violating canon 3A(3) of the California Code of Judicial Conduct, and to have failed to ensure the rights of defendants in criminal cases who appeared before him.

The Supreme Court ordered that the judge be removed from office. The court rejected the judge's claims of prejudicial delay and denial of due process in the course of the commission's proceedings, and adopted the findings and recommendations of the commission, holding that four acts of willful misconduct and twenty-one acts of prejudicial conduct were established. The court held the record established by clear and convincing evidence that the judge's actions, almost all of which occurred on the bench, could not be characterized as occasional lapses or isolated instances of misconduct, but rather as a persistent pattern of abuse and arbitrary conduct as to which admonition or censure would not be adequate. It held the fact that the judge's conduct of other proceedings during his tenure on the bench had been unremarkable could not overcome the evidence of a continuing, pervasive pattern of misconduct, which occurred over the full span of his judicial career. (Opinion by The Court.)

Classified to California Digest of Official Reports, 3d Series

(1) Judges § 6.2—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Grounds—Willful Misconduct—Prejudicial Conduct.—Willful misconduct as a ground for discipline of a judge occurs when he commits acts (1) which he knows, or should know, are beyond his authority (2) for reasons other than the faithful discharge of his duties. Though a judge must act in bad faith in order to commit willful misconduct, he need not necessarily seek to harm a particular litigant or attorney; disregard for the legal system in general will suffice. Unlike willful misconduct, the charge of prejudicial conduct does not require the presence of bad faith. It occurs when a judge, though acting in good faith, engages in conduct which adversely affects public opinion of the judiciary.

(2) Judges § 6.4—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Proceedings—Review.—On review of a recommendation by the Commission on Judicial Performance, the Supreme Court independently evaluates the evidence taken in the commission proceedings to determine if the findings of the commission are supported by clear and convincing evidence sufficient to sustain them to a reasonable certainty. The court gives special weight to the factual findings of the special masters before whom the evidence was presented, because they are better able to evaluate the credibility of the witnesses. The court then determines if the conduct found to have occurred is a basis for censure or removal and, if so, the appropriate action. In this aspect of its review of the commission recommendation, the court recognizes the expertise of the commission in matters involving judicial conduct and therefore gives special weight to its conclusions.

(3) Judges § 6.4—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Proceedings—Due Process.—The procedures of the Commission on Judicial Performance and the combination of investigatory and adjudicatory functions by the commission do not deny due process to judges subject to disciplinary recommendations. The initial investigation is by the commission staff, but once formal proceedings are instituted the prosecutorial function shifts to examiners from the office of the Attorney General. The special masters appointed by the Supreme Court then hear the evidence, make findings and conclusions based thereon, and recommend action to the commission, which itself reviews the evidence, independently makes findings and conclusions, and recommends appropriate discipline to the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court, however, is the final decision maker and must itself review the evidence and independently assess its weight and relevance. The procedures do not create an unacceptable risk of bias either on the part of the commission, or on the part of the court as ultimate decision maker. That during the course of the initial investigation or thereafter the commission may become aware of the reports regarding the investigation is not a sufficient basis for believing that either the commission or the Supreme Court is not, or cannot be, an impartial decision maker.

(4) Judges § 6.4—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Proceedings—Due Process—Delay.—Cal. Rules of Court, Rules for Censure, Removal, and Retirement or Private Admonishment of Judges, rule 905(a), requiring written notice without delay to a judge advising him of the institution of formal proceedings to inquire into charges against him, does not create a right to notice equivalent to a statutory right to speedy trial, or require the Commission on Judicial Performance, once a decision to initiate formal proceedings with regard to any incident has been made, to proceed at once regardless of the number or gravity of other incidents that have come to light during the preliminary investigation and are themselves still being investigated. The procedure of giving notice to a judge that a preliminary investigation is underway is not compelled as a matter of due process, and the commission is not obliged to give notice of formal proceedings until the preliminary investigation is complete.

(5) Judges § 6.4—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Proceedings—Prehearing Delay.—A delay of 25 months between the service of notice of formal proceedings on a judge and the hearing by the Commission on Judicial Performance did not require dismissal of charges against the judge, where, since the judge had early notice of the charges, and the delay between formal presentation and hearing was not unduly prolonged, no presumption of prejudice from delay need or could be indulged in, and where there was no demonstration of actual prejudice.

(6a-6d) Judges § 6.2—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Grounds—Lack of Judicial Temperament.—The conclusion of the Commission on Judicial Performance, that a municipal court judge be removed from office, was fully supported by evidence establishing four charges of willful misconduct and twenty-one charges of prejudicial misconduct occurring over the full span of the judge's judicial career, where the judge displayed a manifest lack of judicial temperament in dealing with litigants, attorneys, witnesses, and attachés, thereby violating canon 3A(3) of the California Code of Judicial Conduct, and failed to ensure the rights of defendants in criminal cases who appeared before him. That the judge's conduct of other proceedings during his tenure on the bench had been unremarkable could not overcome the evidence of a continuing, pervasive pattern of misconduct, and the record did not suggest that the judge had, or would be able to, overcome this trait and that similar incidents would not recur. The judge's misconduct reflected adversely on the judiciary, had a negative impact on public esteem for the judicial process, and was prejudicial to the administration of justice.

(7) Judges § 6—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Standards.—While the canons in the California Code of Judicial Conduct do not have the force of law or regulation, they reflect a judicial consensus regarding appropriate behavior, and are helpful in giving content to the constitutional standards under which disciplinary proceedings are charged. It is expected all judges will comply with the canons, and failure to do so suggests performance below the minimum level necessary to maintain public confidence in the administration of justice.

(8) Criminal Law § 234—Trial—Course and Conduct of Trial—Power and Conduct of Judge—Examination of Witnesses.—The trial court in a criminal case must not undertake the role of prosecutor or defense counsel if public confidence in the impartiality of the criminal justice system is to be maintained. It is fundamental that the trial court must refrain from advocacy and remain circumspect in its comments on the evidence, treating litigants and witnesses with appropriate respect and without demonstration of partiality or bias.

(9) Judges § 17—Disqualification—Motion; Affidavit of Bias or Prejudice.—A disqualification motion made under Code Civ. Proc., § 170.6, does not require a showing of actual prejudice. Under the statute, the defendant's right to peremptorily disqualify a judge on timely motion is automatic.

(10) Judges § 8—Powers and Duties—Misuse.—Ordering a person to appear in court when no matter requiring his attendance is pending constitutes serious misuse of the judicial office.

(11) Judges § 8—Powers and Duties—Control of Courtroom—Contempt.—Because it carries with it a heightened potential for abuse, the contempt power should be the last resort of a judge in maintaining control in his courtroom. It should be used with great prudence and caution, and never to intimidate litigants and witnesses, or in a manner that interferes unnecessarily with a litigant's ability to consult with counsel.

(12) Judges § 6.2—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Grounds—Disobedience to Writ.—Willful misconduct was not shown by a municipal court judge's failure to comply with a writ of mandamus requiring him to grant a continuance, where the writ was worded as an alternative writ, which gave the judge an option to comply or show cause before the issuing court why that court should not order the judge to grant the relief sought by the petitioner, rather than a peremptory writ on its face. Therefore, since the superior court did not order a stay of proceedings pending disposition of the petition for writ of mandate, the judge was free to continue the trial.

(13) Bail and Recognizance § 8—Deposits in Lieu of Bond—Return.—Bail posted by a nondefendant must be returned on demand pursuant to Pen. Code, § 1297, which authorizes the court to order bail deposits made by a defendant be applied to fines and costs if the funds remain on deposit at the time of judgment. Even that authorization does not permit application of such funds to attorney fees absent consent of the defendant.

(14) Judges § 6.4—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Proceedings—Purpose.—The purpose of proceedings by the Commission on Judicial Performance is not punishment, but protection of the public, ensuring evenhanded and efficient administration of justice, and the maintenance of public confidence in the integrity of the judicial system (Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (c)). The Supreme Court's purpose is to determine the nature of the discipline, if any, that is necessary to achieve these goals. The court therefore considers evidence offered by the judge in explanation and/or mitigation of his conduct. There can be no mitigation for maliciously motivated judicial misconduct, however.

(15) Judges § 6.4—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Proceedings—Mitigation.—Since honesty and good legal knowledge are minimum qualifications which are expected of every judge, neither these qualities nor a judge's administrative skills can mitigate either willful misconduct or conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute.

(16) Judges § 6.4—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Proceedings—Mitigation.—On Supreme Court review of proceedings of the Commission on Judicial Performance finding a judge seriously lacking in judicial temperament, the testimony of persons who were not present at the time of the incidents, and thus were unable to assess the serious nature of the incidents of misconduct, but nevertheless believed the judge to be a fair and patient person whose judicial temperament was appropriate, was not persuasive.

OPINION

THE COURT.—The Commission on Judicial Performance (Commission) has recommended that Judge Kenneth Lynn Kloepfer, a judge of the San Bernardino Municipal Court District, be removed from office. On petition by Judge Kloepfer, we consider that recommendation which is based on findings by the Commission that Judge Kloepfer committed five acts of wilful misconduct and twenty acts of conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute. (Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (c). [hereafter section 18(c)];[1] Cal. Rules of Court, Rules for Censure, Removal, Retirement or Private Admonishment of Judges, rule

†Presiding Justice, Court of Appeal, Second Appellate District, Division Seven, assigned by the Chairperson of the Judicial Council.

[1]Section 18(c): "On recommendation of the Commission on Judicial Performance the Supreme Court may (1) retire a judge for disability that seriously interferes with the performance of the judge's duties and is or is likely to become permanent, and (2) censure or remove a judge for action occurring not more than 6 years prior to the commencement of the judge's current term that constitutes wilful misconduct in office, persistent failure or inability to perform the judge's duties, habitual intemperance in the use of intoxicants or drugs, or conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute. The commission may privately admonish a judge found to have engaged in an improper action or a dereliction of duty, subject to review in the Supreme Court in the manner provided for review of causes decided by a court of appeal."

919(b).)[2] In this proceeding we also consider petitioner's claims that the procedures by which disciplinary proceedings against judges are commenced and prosecuted deny due process, and that he suffered prejudice as a result of the delay in instituting proceedings against him.

(1) As we explained in McCullough v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1989) 49 Cal.3d 186, 191 [260 Cal.Rptr. 557, 776 P.2d 259], wilful misconduct occurs when a judge "commits acts (1) which he knows, or should know, are beyond his authority (2) for reasons other than the faithful discharge of his duties. [Citation.] Though a judge must act in bad faith . . . in order to commit wilful misconduct, he need not necessarily seek to harm a particular litigant or attorney; disregard for the legal system in general will suffice. [Citation.] Unlike wilful misconduct, the charge of prejudicial conduct does not require the presence of bad faith. [Citation.] It occurs when a judge, though acting in good faith, engages in conduct which adversely affects public opinion of the judiciary."

(2) On review of a recommendation by the Commission this court independently evaluates the evidence taken in the Commission proceedings to determine if the findings of the Commission are supported by clear and convincing evidence sufficient to sustain them to a reasonable certainty. (Ryan v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1988) 45 Cal.3d 518, 530 [247 Cal.Rptr. 378, 754 P.2d 724, A.L.R.4th 2066]; Geiler v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications (1973) 10 Cal.3d 270, 275 [110 Cal.Rptr. 201, 515 P.2d 1].) We do, however, give special weight to the factual findings of the special masters before whom the evidence was presented because they are better able to evaluate the credibility of the witnesses. (Ryan v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications, supra, at p. 530.)

We then determine if the conduct found to have occurred is a basis for censure or removal and, if so, the appropriate action. In this aspect of our review of the Commission recommendation we recognize the expertise of the Commission in matters involving judicial conduct and therefore give special weight to its conclusions. (McCullough v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 49 Cal.3d at p. 191; Furey v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1987) 43 Cal.3d 1297, 1304 [240 Cal.Rptr. 859, 743 P.2d 919]; Mardikian v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1985) 40 Cal.3d 473, 476-477 [220 Cal.Rptr. 833, 709 P.2d 852].)

Having done so, we reject petitioner's claims of prejudicial delay and denial of due process, and adopt the findings and recommendations of the [2] All references to rules herein are to those rules unless otherwise noted. Rule 919(b) authorizes a petition to this court for modification or rejection of a recommendation of the Commission.

Commission. The record establishes by clear and convincing evidence that petitioner's actions, almost all of which occurred on the bench, cannot be characterized as occasional lapses or isolated instances of misconduct. Rather, as the Commission concluded, a persistent pattern of abuse and arbitrary conduct appears as to which admonition or censure would not be adequate.

DUE PROCESS: INVESTIGATIVE FUNCTIONS OF COMMISSION STAFF

(3) Petitioner contends in essence that the Commission, which is charged with the duty to take evidence and make findings of fact and conclusions of law incident to making disciplinary recommendations to this court, is not a neutral forum. He argues that the Commission is inevitably influenced by matters outside the record since its own staff makes the initial investigation into, and recommendation to initiate formal proceedings as a result of, complaints regarding the conduct of a judge. This occurs, in the view of petitioner, because the accusatory, investigatory, and adjudicatory functions are combined during proceedings in the Commission.[3]

Petitioner asserts more specifically that in the instant proceeding the Commission staff not only initiated correspondence and investigation prior to the decision to institute formal proceedings, but thereafter continued an investigation parallel to that of the examiners from the office of the Attorney General. The director and the chief counsel of the Commission assertedly participated in the investigation. This involvement and the reliance of the Commission on staff during the ensuing proceedings, petitioner asserts, makes the association of the director, the staff, and the members of the Commission too close "to allow the adjudicatory process to comport with generally accepted standards of due process."

Petitioner identifies no actual bias on the part of the members of the Commission, and offers no authority to support his argument that the procedures to which he objects are constitutionally impermissible. That omission is easily understood for his claim is contrary to existing authority

[3]The Commission argues that because petitioner made no prior objection to the proceedings on this basis, he is foreclosed from doing so now. He was not required, however, to engage in the presumptively futile exercise of objecting to procedures adopted by the Judicial Council pursuant to the command of article VI, section 18, subdivision (f), of the California Constitution. The Commission lacks authority to declare those rules invalid. (Cf. Cal. Const., art. III, § 3.5.)

upholding similar due-process-based challenges to administrative adjudication pursuant to procedures in which the relationship between the decisionmaking, investigating, and prosecutorial functions is much closer. (See 1 Koch, Administrative Law and Practice (1985) p. 448, § 6.8; Schwartz, Administrative Law (2d ed. 1983) p. 495 et seq.; 3 Davis, Administrative Law Treatise (2d ed. 1980) § 18:2, p. 343 et seq.)

The Supreme Court rejected a due-process-based challenge to the combination of investigatory and adjudicatory functions of a medical licensing board in Withrow v. Larkin (1975) 421 U.S. 35 [43 L.Ed.2d 712, 95 S.Ct. 1456]. There the board heard evidence during the investigatory stage, determined if probable cause existed for license revocation proceedings, and subsequently conducted a contested hearing to determine if prohibited acts had occurred and, if so, if the license should be revoked. The Supreme Court recognized that a " 'fair trial in a fair tribunal is a basic requirement of due process' " (id. at p. 46 [43 L.Ed.2d at p. 723]), but nonetheless upheld the administrative adjudication procedure.

The Supreme Court explained: "Not only is a biased decisionmaker constitutionally unacceptable but 'our system of law has always endeavored to prevent even the probability of unfairness.' [Citations.] In pursuit of this end, various situations have been identified in which experience teaches that the probability of actual bias on the part of the judge or decisionmaker is too high to be constitutionally tolerable. Among these cases are those in which the adjudicator has a pecuniary interest in the outcome and in which he has been the target of personal abuse or criticism from the party before him.

"The contention that the combination of investigative and adjudicative functions necessarily creates an unconstitutional risk of bias in administrative adjudication has a much more difficult burden of persuasion to carry. It must overcome a presumption of honesty and integrity in those serving as adjudicators; and it must convince that, under a realistic appraisal of psychological tendencies and human weakness, conferring investigative and adjudicative powers on the same individuals poses such a risk of actual bias or prejudgment that the practice must be forbidden if the guarantee of due process is to be adequately implemented." (Withrow v. Larkin, supra, 421 U.S. at pp. 46-47 [43 L.Ed.2d at pp. 723-724].)

After reviewing the several earlier cases in which due-process-based challenges to administrative adjudication had been rejected, the Supreme Court concluded that the procedures under review did not create an unacceptable risk of bias. (Withrow v. Larkin, supra, 421 U.S. at p. 54 [43 L.Ed.2d at pp. 727-728].) Manifestly the procedure to which petitioner here objects involves even less potential for biased decisionmaking. The initial investigation is by the Commission staff, but once formal proceedings are instituted the prosecutorial function shifts to examiners from the office of the Attorney General. The special masters appointed by this court then hear the evidence, make findings and conclusions based thereon, and recommend action to the Commission, which itself reviews the evidence, independently makes findings and conclusions, and recommends appropriate discipline to this court. The court, however, is the final decision maker and must itself review the evidence and independently assess its weight and relevance.

The procedures do not create an unacceptable risk of bias either on the part of the Commission, or on the part of the court as ultimate decision maker. That during the course of the initial investigation or thereafter the Commission may become aware of the reports regarding the investigation is not a sufficient basis for believing that either the Commission or this court is not, or cannot be, an impartial decision maker. (McCartney v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications (1974) 12 Cal.3d 512, 519-520 [116 Cal.Rptr. 260, 526 P.2d 268].)

DUE PROCESS: PREJUDICIAL DELAY

Commission staff commenced a preliminary investigation into petitioner's conduct following the receipt of complaints in April 1985. In June 1986, he was advised by letter that formal proceedings were to be initiated. Between that date and the filing of formal charges, both the Commission's staff and that of the Attorney General conducted investigations. The formal proceedings commenced with the December 17, 1986, service on petitioner of a notice of formal proceedings, followed by his acceptance of service on January 5, 1987, and submission of an answer on February 20, 1987. Pursuant to rule 907, this court then appointed special masters[4] to hear and take evidence, and report to the Commission.

Petitioner complains both of the delay prior to the notice of formal proceedings, and the subsequent delay of two years until the date of the hearing. He asserts both a violation of the procedural rules governing the Commission, and prejudice from the inability to adequately cross-examine witnesses whose memory of the events had faded, and from his own lack of recall.[5]

A. RULES OF PROCEDURE

Rule 904 directs that an inquiry be made by the Commission staff into verified complaints of misconduct that are not obviously frivolous or unfounded, followed if appropriate by a preliminary investigation to determine if formal proceedings should be instituted. The Commission is also allowed to make such inquiry and investigation on its own motion without receipt of a verified statement.

Pursuant to rule 904.2 the judge is to be notified if a preliminary investigation is undertaken. Petitioner complains of the delay by the Commission, once these proceedings were undertaken, in complying with rule 905(a): "After the preliminary investigation has been completed, if the Commission concludes that formal proceedings should be instituted, the Commission shall without delay issue a written notice to the judge advising him of the institution of formal proceedings to inquire into the charges against him. . . ." (4) He infers that rule 905(a) notice had to be given no later than the date on which the decision to initiate formal proceedings on any charge had been made, i.e., at the time he was informally advised by letter that proceedings would be instituted.

Petitioner acknowledges that during the period prior to institution of formal proceedings the preliminary investigation was ongoing. Indeed, he concedes that between August 19, 1985, and September 18, 1986, he received seven letters from the Commission asking that he reply to potential charges involving fifty-five incidents. He argues, however, that rule 905(a) creates a right to notice equivalent to a statutory right to speedy trial. Implicit in his claim is an argument that once a decision has been made to initiate formal proceedings with regard to any incident, the Commission must proceed at once regardless of the number or gravity of other incidents that have come to light during the preliminary investigation and are still themselves being investigated.

We reject both claims. Rule 905(a) mandates neither premature institution of formal proceedings nor dismissal for failure to give "prompt" notice with regard to a decision to include one or more incidents in formal charges while the preliminary investigation of other incidents continues. Manifestly petitioner was not prejudiced by the Commission's decision to continue the investigation prior to giving notice of formal charges. He was aware of the 55 incidents that were under investigation and thus cannot complain of actual prejudice flowing from this decision.

We have observed before that the procedure of giving notice to a judge that a preliminary investigation is underway is not compelled as a matter of due process. (McCartney v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications, supra, 12 Cal.3d at p. 519.) It is unreasonable to assume, therefore, that rule 905(a) mandates dismissal simply because notice of formal proceedings is not given on a piecemeal basis. The Commission is not obliged to give notice of formal proceedings until the preliminary investigation is complete.

B. DELAY PRIOR TO HEARING

(5) Twenty-five months ensued between the service of notice of formal proceedings and the hearing in this matter. As noted above, however, petitioner had been advised of the charged incidents during the preliminary investigation. That investigation necessarily included interviews with the persons who were to be called as witnesses. We therefore reject petitioner's claim that this delay was prejudicial to the extent that he implies that any lack of recall should be attributed solely to this delay.

Moreover, the record fails to support petitioner's claims that he or any witness was unable to recall relevant details regarding some incidents, such as the Lucchesi matter. His own testimony that he recalled the incident, testimony that included reference to the case that was being tried when it occurred, refutes any suggestion of prejudice. As to other incidents in which petitioner claims "details" could not be recalled by petitioner or the witnesses (e.g., the Tricinella and Shepherd incidents), no prejudice can be shown. The reporter's transcript and documentary evidence in the form of court records of those proceedings accurately established not only what petitioner said or did, but the circumstances in which he acted. Still other attempts by petitioner to demonstrate that witnesses had testified falsely as a result of the passage of time, fail because he does not identify where in the record the testimony may be found, cannot substantiate his claim that a particular witness was "incorrect in many particulars," or relies on matters that are clearly outside the record.

Since petitioner had early notice of the charges, and the delay between formal presentation and hearing was not unduly prolonged, no presumption of prejudice from delay need or can be indulged in. Petitioner having failed to demonstrate actual prejudice, no basis for dismissal of any charge exists.

III.

FORMAL PROCEEDINGS BEFORE THE COMMISSION

(6a), (7) (See fn. 6.) The basis for these proceedings may be summarized as incidents in which Judge Kloepfer is alleged to have displayed a lack of judicial temperament in dealing with litigants, attorneys, witnesses, and attachés, thereby violating canon 3A(3) of the California Code of Judicial Conduct,[6] and to have failed to ensure the rights of defendants in criminal cases who appeared before him. All of the incidents occurred while petitioner was sitting in the West Valley Division of the San Bernardino Judicial District Municipal Court, a division located in Ontario.

The notice of formal proceedings charged petitioner in five counts. The first charged petitioner with abdicating his judicial responsibility to be patient, dignified and courteous to litigants, witnesses, attorneys and others with whom he had dealt in his official capacity. The charge was alleged to be exemplified by, but not limited to, 14 incidents occurring between 1981 and 1985. Petitioner's conduct in 10 of these incidents was found by the special masters and the Commission to be supported by clear and convincing evidence, and to constitute prejudicial conduct.[7]

The second count charged petitioner with abdicating his responsibility to ensure the rights of defendants who appeared before him in criminal cases. Five of the six incidents alleged in support of this count were found true.

The third count charged petitioner with abuse of the contempt power and the power to issue orders to show cause and bench warrants. Six incidents were alleged to support this charge, of which five were found true.

[6] All references to the canons herein are to this code. Canon 3A(3): "Judges should be patient, dignified, and courteous to litigants, jurors, witnesses, lawyers, and others with whom judges deal in their official capacity, and should require similar conduct of lawyers, and the staff, court officials, and others subject to their direction and control."

The California Code of Judicial Conduct, adapted from the American Bar Association Code of Judicial Conduct of 1972, was adopted by the California Conference of Judges on September 10, 1974, to become effective January 1, 1975. While the canons do not have the force of law or regulation, they reflect a judicial consensus regarding appropriate behavior, and are helpful in giving content to the constitutional standards under which disciplinary proceedings are charged. (Cannon v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications (1975) 14 Cal.3d 678, 707, fn. 22 [122 Cal.Rptr. 778, 537 P.2d 898]; Spruance v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications (1975) 13 Cal.3d 778, 796 [119 Cal.Rptr. 841, 532 P.2d 1209].)

We therefore expect that all judges will comply with the canons. Failure to do so suggests performance below the minimum level necessary to maintain public confidence in the administration of justice.

[7] In determining whether the Commission recommendation should be followed, we consider only the charges sustained by the Commission. (Ryan v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 45 Cal.3d at p. 526.)

The fourth count charged petitioner with abdicating his judicial responsibility to remain an objective and impartial arbiter, and acting beyond his authority on the basis of unseemly personal involvement in matters before him. Three of the five incidents alleged in support of this count were found true.

The fifth count charged abuse of power in ordering criminal defendants to pay attorney fees, citing 10 such orders in support of the count. Two were found true.

Hearings were held before the special masters in April and June 1987. The special masters submitted their proposed findings and conclusions to the Commission on July 31, 1987. On July 31, 1987, the examiners' objections, and on October 21, 1987, petitioner's objections, to the proposed report were forwarded to the Commission. The final report of the special masters was forwarded to petitioner and the examiners on December 30, 1987. In that report the special masters found 11 incidents of wilful misconduct and 14 incidents of prejudicial conduct.

After consideration of the objections of petitioner and the examiners to the final report of the special masters, and oral argument before it on March 10, 1988, the Commission found that only five of the acts underlying the recommendation of the special masters constituted wilful misconduct and that twenty acts constituted prejudicial conduct. It recommended, however, that petitioner be removed from office.

The conduct underlying each of the counts on which the Commission bases its recommendation follows.[8]

A. COUNT 1: PREJUDICIAL CONDUCT

The Commission based its unanimous finding that petitioner had engaged in prejudicial conduct by failure to comply with canon 3A(3) in 10 incidents occurring during the 1981-1985 period, each of which was independently found to constitute prejudicial conduct, and to reflect together a persistent pattern of rude, abusive, and hostile behavior. These incidents were, in chronological order:

[8]As will be apparent, petitioner's actions during one incident are, in some cases, the basis for findings under more than one count. We do not consider the total number of incidents determinative of the appropriate action, although the number is relevant. (Furey v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 43 Cal.3d at p. 1307.) In this matter, there is overlap, but the findings on these charges are considered only as evidence that petitioner's conduct offended more than one of the standards to which a judge must conform.

1. Lucchesi

A pro tem. shorthand reporter was assigned to work in petitioner's courtroom four mornings a week in 1981. She returned for the afternoon if the calendar required it. On the Monday in 1981 on which this incident occurred a jury trial that had recessed the prior Thursday was to continue before petitioner. Because petitioner conducted small claims proceedings prior to his regular calendar, and those proceedings were not reported, the reporter had gone to another courtroom to report a preliminary hearing while the regular reporter was reading back testimony to the jury in another case. Petitioner expected her in his courtroom and was unaware of the reason for her absence.

Policy in the Ontario branch of the municipal court required that a reporter regularly assigned to a judge obtain permission from that judge before being released to work in another courtroom. Noemi Lucchesi, a shorthand reporter assigned to the courtroom of Judge Merriam, received a call from petitioner's bailiff on that Monday asking if she was available to report proceedings in petitioner's court as his reporter was unavailable. In conformity with the court policy, Ms. Lucchesi told the bailiff she might be able to do so, but would have to check with Judge Merriam. The pro tem. reporter who had been reporting the trial in petitioner's court returned to her office next door to that of Ms. Lucchesi, while Ms. Lucchesi was awaiting permission. Ms. Lucchesi informed her that Judge Kloepfer needed a reporter, and she went at once to his court, apologized for being late, and explained the reason to him.

After his reporter explained the reason for her delayed appearance, petitioner called Ms. Lucchesi and accused her of being responsible for the delay of proceedings in his court. He told her this "was not to happen again," and said he would not be treated as a second-class citizen. Ms. Lucchesi understood petitioner to be complaining about her failure to comply with his request that she come to his courtroom to report the trial proceedings and attempted to explain the court policy on obtaining permission to work in another court, but Judge Kloepfer refused to hear Ms. Lucchesi's explanation. Ms. Lucchesi was so upset by petitioner's reprimand and the manner in which it was delivered that she cried and was still distraught later in the afternoon when she told her judge about the incident. She testified that she believed Judge Kloepfer to be generally unpredictable and volatile. He had a reputation of being abusive to employees and to witnesses.

When Judge Merriam later told petitioner of his concern when members of his staff were upset, Judge Kloepfer apologized to Judge Merriam. He apologized to Ms. Lucchesi the day after he had his conversation with her.

Petitioner, admitting that he was "irritated," but denying that he was abusive, explained his conduct. He testified that he had a jury trial in progress, and expected that his reporter would be present. When she arrived he had been waiting an hour. He testified that he learned from her that it was Ms. Lucchesi who had directed her to go to another court to report. He telephoned Ms. Lucchesi because he believed she did not have the authority to direct his reporter to report elsewhere.

The Commission found petitioner's explanation to be inaccurate and disingenuous. The Commission rejected his assertion that he simply made an "appropriate comment" to a court employee. Judge Kloepfer's reporter had testified that she did not recall telling him that Ms. Lucchesi instructed her to go to another department. Ms. Lucchesi was not her supervisor, she did not seek the advice of Ms. Lucchesi on where to report, and Ms. Lucchesi gave her none. The Commission concluded that even accepting petitioner's explanation for his conduct, however, he was rude and abrasive to a court employee, and thereby violated canon 3A(3).

In this incident, as in the majority of those supporting the Commission's recommendation, petitioner challenges both the sufficiency of the evidence to support the findings and the legal conclusion that the actions constitute prejudicial conduct. The record, however, supports the findings of the special masters and the Commission that petitioner angrily berated Ms. Lucchesi, reducing her to tears. While the evidence does not clearly support the finding that he did so because he felt she did not respond quickly enough to his request that she report proceedings in his courtroom, it does support a conclusion that he angrily berated a court attaché, doing so without sufficient inquiry to know whether even a mild reprimand was warranted, because he believed that she was responsible for his not having a reporter and the consequent delay. Petitioner argues that his belief was reasonable. Be that as it may, his response was not. It was, as the Commission concluded, inappropriate and prejudicial conduct. While this incident alone might not warrant discipline it is clearly relevant evidence of a pattern of conduct reflecting a lack of judicial temperament, i.e., an inability to deal evenhandedly with persons with whom he comes in contact in carrying out his judicial duties.

2. Bartell

Deputy District Attorney Bartell, who had not previously appeared before petitioner or in the Ontario courthouse in which he sat, was assigned in August 1982 to the misdemeanor jury trial calendar before petitioner and to handle a case in which another deputy had negotiated a plea bargain. Petitioner asked Bartell the reason for the negotiated disposition. She replied that she did not know, but would be glad to contact the responsible deputy during a recess to find out.

Petitioner responded: "Miss Bartell, you are an embarrassment to the People of the State of California and it's frightening to think that you represent their interests." The statement was made in a reproving tone in a courtroom full of people. Petitioner acknowledged that it was possible that he had said something critical.

3. Elizalde

In 1982 petitioner questioned Michelle Elizalde, a deputy district attorney, about the written disposition she had submitted to the court, after which he stated in open court that he was appalled that the interests of the People of the State of California rested in her hands, thereby humiliating and embarrassing her.

Although petitioner argues that he has modified the method by which he delivers criticism, and has changed his sometimes hostile and intimidating approach, the Commission noted testimony by witnesses heard in relation to other counts in this proceeding that he continued to be rude, abusive, and hostile. It therefore rejected petitioner's suggestion that it would be appropriate to take no action in this matter.[9]

4. Taylor

Pro Tem. Reporter Taylor asked a defendant whose guilty plea was being taken in February 1983 to make her responses audible, stating when the defendant nodded her head: "Excuse me. Is that a yes?" Petitioner said to Ms. Taylor: "I'll keep the record in my courtroom. I don't need any court reporter," and went on to berate Ms. Taylor before a courtroom full of people. Ms. Taylor became upset, nervous, and scared at petitioner's "out-

[9]Former Deputy District Attorney Goldman testified that when she appeared before petitioner in 1984 he occasionally exploded into "bursts of fury" at witnesses and defendants, and became irrationally angry over things that were not their fault. Deputy District Attorney Guzzino testified that at the time of the hearing petitioner had a reputation in the legal community as lacking judicial temperament. Deputy Public Defender Zavidow testified that between 1981 and 1985 petitioner was rude and intimidating to persons who appeared before him, had an "imperial attitude," and was intolerant and impatient with persons unfamiliar with court procedure.

The Commission findings as to incidents 7, 8, 10, 12, and 13 of the first count also suggest that petitioner did not modify his courtroom attitude after the Bartell and Elizalde incidents.

burst." Petitioner had never directed the defendant to speak up. His own court reporter testified that when a witness was not giving an audible response she was permitted to ask: "What did you say."

Petitioner had no recollection of Ms. Taylor reporting in his courtroom. He contends now that the proceeding was not one in which the reporter was required, and that there is no evidence that his directives to the court reporter were "inappropriate," and that his conduct was not the type of conduct affecting public esteem for the judicial office. Whether the reporter was required is irrelevant, of course. She was present for the purpose of recording the proceedings. The record established by clear and convincing evidence that petitioner's conduct was inappropriate and was of a nature that affects public esteem for the judicial office. Rather than explaining to the defendant that she must answer audibly, petitioner castigated the shorthand reporter for following a customary practice.

5. Nehmeh

On February 14, 1984, Attorney Nehmeh's motion on behalf of her client for a continuance of a misdemeanor drunk driving trial was denied in the master calendar court, and the case assigned to petitioner's court. Her motion to disqualify petitioner (Code Civ. Proc., § 170.6) was denied by the master calendar judge as untimely, and she renewed both motions before petitioner. Petitioner denied the disqualification motion as untimely and then questioned Nehmeh as to the reason the continuance was requested. Although she explained that an out-of-state witness was not available, petitioner asked: "Isn't it true you are psychologically afraid to take a case to trial?" He then asked her how many cases she had tried, and demanded that she name them and the courts in which they had been tried. His tone was angry and insulting. Attorney Nehmeh was embarrassed because her client was present.

The deputy district attorney present in the courtroom corroborated Nehmeh's testimony and recalled petitioner saying that Nehmeh did not try cases, and that she took her client's money without representing them. Petitioner's comments directed at Nehmeh's legal skills were uncomplimentary.

Petitioner recalled the case, and explained that he was concerned whether the case would ever go to trial. From prior discussions he believed that Nehmeh had never tried a case, and he was concerned about her intent and the possible need to grant a further continuance if she did not intend to try the case. He disputes Nehmeh's claim that her client was present when this incident occurred. Regardless of whether the client was present, petitioner manifested his concern about possible trial delay in an inappropriate and injudicious manner, publicly suggesting that an attorney was incompetent to represent her client.

6. Cooke

In May 1984, petitioner interrupted a defense witness in this criminal case who had been asked only two questions. He told her that "we have rules in terms of how we proceed here. And you have to understand them. And I don't want to have to re-explain them and have objections.

"First of all, stop, and don't say anything ... First rule is you keep your mouth shut."

The reprimand was given when the witness tried to elaborate on or explain her answer to a question. Petitioner's tone was described as "impatient and angry" and "forceful and intimidating."

Petitioner challenged the accuracy of the reporter's transcript and of the reporter who testified. He believed the witness had been nervous and had made a comment not reflected in the transcript. He wanted to stop her from continuing to talk, but would no longer admonish a witness in this manner. He would instead try to help a witness relax and understand the procedures, and would not make her feel threatened by the rules.

Petitioner argues that in context his direction to the witness to keep her mouth closed was not rude or inappropriate. Our review of the record suggests otherwise. In this incident, as in others, the manner in which petitioner addressed lay witnesses reflects impatience, anger, and an intimidating lack of courtesy in explaining court procedure.

7. Shepherd

The Commission unanimously found that during a nonjury trial of this criminal case on August 13 and 14, 1984, petitioner was hostile to, criticized and chastised a defense witness, made clear by cross-examining the witness that he disbelieved him,[10] and inappropriately threatened the witness with sanctions.[11] Petitioner was openly hostile to the defense during the [10] Petitioner claimed that it was appropriate for him to admonish the witness for failing to follow proper "procedure" in answering questions, and to warn him that he might be held in contempt if he persisted in doing so. As the Commission observes, however, contempt procedures are not appropriately invoked against an inexperienced lay witness whose answers are merely nonresponsive.

[11] The special masters found all of the allegations of misconduct related to this count to be true except the charge that petitioner had been rude and hostile toward that defense witness.

During the trial petitioner twice held the defendant in contempt for attempting to say something to the court; sentenced the defendant to two days in jail on each contempt finding; trial, acted in an intimidating manner toward defense counsel,[12] was personally abusive and insulting to the defendant, and made rude references to the physique and personality of the defendant at sentencing. The Appellate Department of the San Bernardino County Superior Court reversed the judgment of conviction for the reason that petitioner had displayed such animosity toward the defendant that the defendant had been denied "even the semblance of a fair trial."

Although the special masters did not include petitioner's cross-examination of the witness in this case as a basis for their recommendation, the record supports the finding of the Commission that petitioner's cross-examination reflected hostility and disbelief. He did not limit himself to questions directed to eliciting clarifying testimony. He told the witness his testimony did not make sense, and engaged in argumentative dialogue, all of which supports the finding of the Commission. (8) Addressing the trial court's overly aggressive examination of a witness in a similar situation, we cautioned that the court must not undertake the role of prosecutor or defense counsel if public confidence in the impartiality of the criminal justice system is to be maintained. We emphasized there that: "It is fundamental that the trial court . . . must refrain from advocacy and remain circumspect in its comments on the evidence, treating litigants and witnesses with appropriate respect and without demonstration of partiality or bias." (People v. Carlucci (1979) 23 Cal.3d 249, 258 [152 Cal.Rptr. 439, 590 P.2d 15].)

The Commission rejected petitioner's explanation that by his remarks to the defendant at sentencing he was just scolding the defendant to deter future misconduct and his claim that discipline was unnecessary as he had already been sufficiently criticized in the unpublished appellate department opinion reversing the judgment of conviction, a decision that was widely circulated among members of the local bar. The Commission noted that while petitioner asserted that, as a result of those events, he will never again and lectured the defendant in an insulting and demeaning manner about his physique and appearance. He referred to or described the defendant variously as one of the "Magnificent Seven bad guys"; "macho"; "a person on an egotistical trip that believes 'hey it's all right if I can get away from it—I'm a big guy and I have to answer to nobody' "; "your hormonal situation and your attitudes are so high that you feel you can get away with those things"; "you have biceps that are probably as big as my thigh."

[12] Both the attorney representing the defendant in this matter and Court Reporter Lucchesi (count 1) testified that petitioner's abusive and intimidating behavior deterred them from questioning or challenging his actions because they feared they would be placed in custody. In this latter proceeding, the effect of petitioner's intimidation may well have affected the adequacy of defense counsel's representation of the defendant. Counsel testified that he was intimidated to the point that he felt compelled to withdraw a request to recall a witness, and did not challenge the propriety of the contempt citations directed to this client when they were made.

deliver that type of lecture when sentencing, petitioner has not acknowledged any wrongdoing and has not demonstrated an understanding of the need to reform his conduct.

8. Tricinella

In September 1984, Andrew Tricinella appeared as a prosecution witness in a criminal case being tried before petitioner. He had never been in a courtroom before. Although an attorney had interposed an objection to a question put to Mr. Tricinella almost immediately after he began his testimony, Mr. Tricinella began to answer. Petitioner interrupted, and the following "dialogue" ensued:

PETITIONER : "Mr. Tricinella, when someone makes an objection, they are talking to me, not you. If you interrupt again, I would—"

THE WITNESS : "I have never been here before."

THE COURT : "You can be punished with a fine or jail. Keep your mouth shut. It is not directed to you. If there is an objection, it is directed to me. I am the Judge here. You are not. I have to rule on the objection without flak coming from the side. Please remain silent until I ask you to answer the question or sustain the objection, at which point you may not answer the question."

Mr. Tricinella testified that he believed petitioner was going to send him to jail. As a result of the reprimand, he did not want to be involved with the court system again. He felt as if he were on trial. A court reporter who viewed and heard the incident testified that petitioner's remarks were made in an angry and demeaning tone, and that although Mr. Tricinella had tried to answer the question put to him as best he could, petitioner treated him as if he were stupid. This witness also testified that petitioner had a reputation as being rude, impatient and demeaning to witnesses. She had personally observed him to be rude to witnesses on many occasions.

The prosecutor who witnessed this incident testified that petitioner became "furious" with Mr. Tricinella and exploded into a rage. She had never seen a judge become so angry and impatient with a witness who simply did not understand court procedure. Mr. Tricinella told her afterward that he never wanted to come to court again, or to be embarrassed and humiliated that way again. He felt that he was an honest citizen who witnessed a crime, but was made to feel like a criminal. This prosecutor had appeared before petitioner frequently between March and October 1984. She testified that the incident was not unusual. Petitioner occasionally exploded into bursts of fury at witnesses and defendants, and treated them irrationally, becoming angry at things that were not their fault.

Petitioner claimed that the transcript did not accurately report all of Mr. Tricinella's statements, but conceded that his admonition to the witnesses was "too long" and "maybe a little too harsh." He now argues that admonishing a witness to keep his mouth shut, when coupled with an appropriate explanation of the procedure, while too harsh is neither rude nor misconduct. Again, we adopt the finding of the Commission. In this incident, as in others, petitioner was impatient and discourteous in dealing with a lay witness who obviously did not understand the manner in which testimony is elicited in a judicial proceeding. Such conduct reflects adversely on the judiciary, has a negative impact on public esteem for the judicial process, and is prejudicial to the administration of justice.

9. Mendez

Jaime Mendez was a defendant in a criminal matter pending before petitioner on February 21, 1985. Because he had arrived late his attorney had not had an opportunity to adequately discuss the case with Mendez, who was Spanish speaking. Counsel therefore requested a continuance at pretrial hearing scheduled for that date. When petitioner learned the reason for the request, he threatened the defendant with incarceration.

Both an audiotape and a written transcript establish that petitioner asked the defendant, through an interpreter, whether he understood that the only way the court could ensure that the defendant would comply with the procedures of the court was to put him in custody. When the defendant failed to reply, petitioner remanded him to custody stating: "Either he does understand or he doesn't, and if he sits there and looks like a bump on a log and has no ability to respond to me that he understands intelligently what is being interpreted to him in Spanish, I have no confidence that he will follow the directions of the court, and therefore I will cage him, in effect, in jail and bring him back . . . uh . . . manacled and he will appear when I order him to appear." Petitioner did not question the defendant prior to threatening him with custody to determine what it was that the defendant did not understand.

Counsel had explained to petitioner that it had not been clear to the defendant, who came from Los Angeles, that he was to report first to the office of the public defender, and that he, the deputy public defender, had not been able to find an interpreter. Petitioner eventually acquiesced in the request for a continuance and the defendant remained free.

Petitioner conceded that his language might have been inappropriate, but maintained that he was simply attempting to convey to the defendant the idea that "bad things" could happen if he was not able to understand the court proceedings. The Commission unanimously concluded that this incident constituted prejudicial conduct. We agree, and note again that while this incident alone might merit no more than a private admonition, it is evidence of a continuing pattern of misconduct which reflects poor judgment and lack of judicial temperament.

10. Saxe

Defendant Saxe appeared before petitioner with his attorney, on October 1, 1985, for a stipulated continuance. During the proceeding, petitioner took a waiver of potential conflict because counsel for Saxe also represented a codefendant. When petitioner asked Saxe if he waived the conflict, Saxe whispered to his attorney that he did not understand what the judge was telling him. Counsel whispered back an explanation, at which point petitioner threatened the defendant with a contempt citation, stating: "Mr. Saxe, I am talking to you, sir, and when I talk to you I expect you to pay attention with [sic] me and not start a conversation with your attorney. Do that again sir, I am going to hold you in contempt of court and jail you."

When the defendant's attorney explained the exchange, petitioner told the defendant that if he did not understand, he was to talk to petitioner. Petitioner's tone was loud and threatening. The defendant believed petitioner was going to send him to jail.

Petitioner testified that he made the statements because he believed the defendant had "tuned him out" and begun talking to his attorney. He also claimed that the attorney involved, who had testified regarding the incident, had a "mistaken recollection" of the events, although the testimony was corroborated by a reporter's transcript.

Once again, petitioner claims that his conduct was not inappropriate, and once again he fails to recognize the injudicious nature of his assumption that the defendant should have known better than to refer to his attorney for a clarification of the explanation being given by petitioner, and of his immediate threat to impose contempt sanctions on the defendant for this perceived transgression. Petitioner's argument that no one was harmed reflects his inability to appreciate the manner in which impulsive, discourteous, threatening, and arbitrary statements by a judge affect public perception of the judiciary and the justice system. Misconduct of this nature is prejudicial to the administration of justice because it leads the public to question whether justice is administered evenhandedly by the court.

(6b) Together these incidents reflect a continuing, pervasive pattern of conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice, and an inability on the part of Judge Kloepfer to appreciate the grave nature of the misconduct, thus casting doubt on his protestations that such misconduct will not recur. We adopt as our own the findings and conclusion of the Commission with regard to count 1.

B. COUNT 2: FAILURE TO ENSURE CRIMINAL DEFENDANTS' RIGHTS

Again by unanimous vote, the Commission found that on five occasions during the 1985-1986 period petitioner abdicated his responsibility to ensure the rights of criminal defendants. The special masters found wilful misconduct in each instance, but the Commission concluded that in three only prejudicial conduct occurred. These incidents were, in chronological order:

1. Dyer

Defendant David Dyer appeared before petitioner on February 8, 1985, for arraignment on criminal charges and probation violation in four cases, three of which went back to 1980 and 1981. The delay in disposition occurred because the defendant had failed to appear, and in one of the cases counsel had not been appointed for that reason. The defendant appeared without counsel and advised petitioner that he wished to plead guilty. Petitioner failed to notify counsel who had been appointed in two of the cases and proceeded in their absence. He accepted a guilty plea and an admission of probation violation without eliciting proper waivers, and sentenced the defendant without obtaining a probation report or notifying counsel.

Counsel was not appointed or asked to advise the defendant in any of the cases. No presentence report was requested. A total of 1,171 days in custody was imposed.

Based on the record of this proceeding, petitioner's disingenuous claim that the defendant wanted to proceed and that petitioner believed the public defender's representation had concluded earlier, and petitioner's assertion that the probation report would not tell him anything he did not know, the Commission concluded that petitioner's actions constituted wilful misconduct.

While petitioner argues that his omissions in this case amounted to no more than procedural error, the Commission could conclude on this record that petitioner knowingly failed to ensure the constitutional rights of a criminal defendant and did so to avoid the burden of proceedings in which the defendant would have adequate representation. The record supports the conclusion of the Commission that petitioner's actions constituted wilful misconduct.

2. Clark

Kenneth Clark appeared before petitioner on February 21, 1985, for a misdemeanor pretrial conference. After appearing in propria persona at his prior appearance before petitioner the defendant had retained an attorney, but he had not spoken with the district attorney. Petitioner thereupon remanded the defendant to custody for failing to comply with the court's earlier direction that he report for an interview with an organization that screened for appointment of counsel and for not speaking with the district attorney. When the defendant asked if he might say something, petitioner replied: "You may not."

Clark did not report for an interview because he had retained counsel whom he had arranged to meet at the courthouse for the pretrial conference. Because of a miscommunication he did not meet the attorney, but he did appear as required. He was unaware of the requirement that he speak with the district attorney about a possible disposition. Petitioner did not permit the defendant to explain.

Bail was set for the defendant without the opportunity for a hearing and in the absence of his attorney. He was jailed until he was able to post bail.

The special masters found that petitioner had acted in bad faith in this incident, and therefore concluded that his actions constituted wilful misconduct. The Commission found the actions to be only prejudicial conduct.

Petitioner concedes that he should have permitted the defendant to speak, and regrets making the order remanding him to custody without opportunity to explain. He claims, however, that his conduct was atypical and is unlikely to recur. We disagree with petitioner's characterization of his conduct as atypical. To the contrary, it is all too typical of his pattern of discourteous remarks, threats and intimidation, and punitive rulings made on the basis of unfounded assumptions. The findings of the Commission and its conclusion that this incident constituted prejudicial conduct is supported by clear and convincing evidence.

3. Pearson

Counsel for defendant Pearson appeared before petitioner on February 22, 1985, for a scheduled hearing on a suppression motion. He had made all appearances on behalf of the defendant who had not been ordered to appear in court, and counsel had advised petitioner at this proceeding that "under the code I can appear even though if [sic] she's not here." Petitioner nonetheless issued a $5,000 bench warrant for the arrest of the defendant.

Petitioner now claims that he lacked confidence in counsel's authority to appear on behalf of the defendant, but did not offer this explanation earlier. He argues that based on counsel's representation regarding two other clients on behalf of whom he had appeared before the Pearson matter was called, he reasonably believed that the defendant had not authorized counsel to appear. He does not satisfactorily explain, however, why his doubts regarding counsel's veracity justified issuance of a bench warrant for the client, rather than a continuance and an order that the defendant appear. Petitioner's suggestion that he was justified in issuing the warrant because the attorney said he might as well issue a warrant is also unavailing as is his suggestion that because the warrant was not issued immediately counsel could have produced his client and caused the warrant to be withdrawn. Issuance of the warrant was proper only if the defendant had been ordered to appear and failed to do so. (See Pen. Code, § 978.5.) Petitioner's explanation suggests an abdication of his responsibility to determine whether the presence of the defendant was necessary before her presence was required, and an abuse of his power to issue warrants.

The special masters found that this action constituted wilful misconduct. The Commission found only prejudicial misconduct.[13] Clear and convincing evidence supports the finding and conclusion of the Commission.

4. Dow

On August 26, 1985, when petitioner assigned this criminal case to another judge for trial, the defendant's counsel advised petitioner that he planned to file an affidavit of prejudice against that judge during the recess. Counsel did not have the preprinted form with him, and petitioner refused him an opportunity to get the form. Petitioner invited counsel to make the motion orally, and heard counsel's sworn statement that he believed the judge was prejudiced and should be disqualified. Counsel cited "Penal Code section 170.6," rather than Code of Civil Procedure section 170.6.

[13] Counsel for the Commission argue that petitioner acted as he did in order to punish counsel, who had not been adequately prepared in representing defendant in matters heard earlier. The brief concedes, however, that the Commission "apparently accepted petitioner's claim that he did not act in bad faith. . . ."

Petitioner denied the motion even though he assumed it was made under the correct section, had not advised counsel of the manner in which the motion was deemed insufficient, and knew what counsel was attempting to do on behalf of his client. In these proceedings he explained that the motion was defective because counsel had stated that the judge he sought to disqualify was "prejudiced," rather than stating in statutory language that the defendant believed he "could not receive a fair trial" before that judge. He did not believe that trial before a prejudiced judge should be equated to inability to obtain a fair trial. He continues to assert that his denial of the motion was proper.

The Commission found this to have been prejudicial conduct, reducing the severity of the finding from that of the special masters who found the action to have been taken in bad faith. We agree that this conduct was at least prejudicial conduct. (9) A disqualification motion made under Code of Civil Procedure section 170.6 does not require a showing of actual prejudice. Under the statute, the defendant's right to peremptorily disqualify a judge on timely motion is automatic. (McCartney v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications, supra, 12 Cal.3d at p. 531.) After denying counsel the opportunity to obtain the preprinted form on which to make his motion, petitioner denied the oral motion he invited on the wholly irrelevant ground that the motion was not worded in the exact language of the statute.

5. Padilla

Defendant John Padilla appeared in propria persona before petitioner on December 6, 1985, in a probation violation matter that had already been continued several times pending resolution of a "driving under the influence" case then pending in the Los Angeles County Judicial District. The same conduct was alleged as the basis for each proceeding. Petitioner granted another continuance, but ordered the prosecutor to obtain the police reports and be prepared to prove the probation violation on January 10, 1986.

Defendant appeared on January 10, 1986, again representing himself, and presented a copy of a docket sheet reflecting dismissal of the Los Angeles matter on January 6, 1986, on motion of the prosecutor. The probation violation hearing then commenced even though the defendant explained to petitioner that the Los Angeles matter had been dismissed because the defendant had not been the driver of the car. The arresting officer gave hearsay evidence in an effort to establish that the defendant had been the driver. When petitioner then asked the defendant if he had any questions to put to the prosecution witness, the defendant stated that he needed counsel and had been advised by the public defender in the Los Angeles matter that the probation violation would be disposed of when he advised the court of the dismissal.

Defendant had never waived counsel. Petitioner nonetheless denied defendant's repeated requests for counsel, found the charged violation true, and remanded the defendant to custody. The public defender was appointed only when the defendant appeared for sentencing, and on January 17, 1986, petitioner sentenced the defendant to six months in the county jail.

The defendant filed both a notice of appeal and a petition for writ of habeas corpus. Notwithstanding the pendency of the appeal, but pursuant to a stipulation by counsel, petitioner reasserted jurisdiction in the matter, set aside the sentence, and released the defendant from custody. On February 14, 1986, the public defender filed an affidavit of prejudice against petitioner which petitioner denied even though he recognized that this was the first appearance by counsel. He then set the probation violation matter for a new hearing before himself on March 7, 1986. After a hearing on that date, at which only hearsay evidence supported the violation charge, and three witnesses testified that the defendant had not been driving the car, petitioner again found the defendant to be in violation of probation and sentenced him to four months in jail. Petitioner imposed sentence without arraigning the defendant for judgment or permitting counsel an opportunity to argue the sentencing issue.

Witnesses who observed the initial hearing testified that the defendant was clearly unable to effectively represent himself at the hearing, during the course of which he made additional requests for counsel, acknowledged that he had been "intoxicated," but denied that he had been driving the vehicle involved in the Los Angeles prosecution.

The Commission rejected petitioner's explanation that because the defendant had appeared without counsel when he pleaded guilty to the charge on which probation was granted, he believed in good faith that counsel had been waived at the time of the revocation hearing, and found petitioner's actions in this proceeding constituted both wilful misconduct and prejudicial conduct.[14]

[14]Counsel for the Commission go far beyond the findings of the special masters or the Commission in speculating as to petitioner's motives in this and other incidents. Here they argue that petitioner improperly asserted jurisdiction over the case and entered the order setting aside the judgment in order to shield himself from appellate review of his conduct and to ensure that he would retain the power to hear the matter and impose judgment.

The same deputy attorneys general who prosecute matters before the Commission act as counsel for the Commission when review of a Commission recommendation is before this Petitioner contends that none of these actions constituted misconduct, including his failure to inquire before proceeding with the revocation hearing whether the defendant waived the right to counsel. His argument, that he reasonably assumed the defendant's prior appearances without, counsel reflected a continuing waiver is unpersuasive. It is apparent that, since the defendant had expected a dismissal, was unprepared for the hearing, and the hearing involved contested factual issues, it was unlikely that the defendant would be able to competently represent himself. Petitioner's insistence on proceeding to hearing without obtaining a waiver of counsel, his subsequent refusal to appoint counsel, and the means by which he reasserted jurisdiction over the case after recognizing his error,[15] all support the conclusion of the Commission.

C. COUNT 3: ABUSE OF CONTEMPT POWER AND POWER TO ISSUE ORDERS TO SHOW CAUSE AND BENCH WARRANTS

The Commission's finding that petitioner abused his contempt power, and his authority to make orders to show cause and issue bench warrants, is based on five incidents during 1984 and 1985, some of which also underlie prior counts and are considered here not as independent incidents, but as evidence relevant to the appropriate discipline. As to the first four incidents involving the contempt power, the Commission found that petitioner had engaged in prejudicial conduct. In the fifth, involving issuance of orders to show cause and bench warrants, the Commission found both wilful misconduct and prejudicial conduct.

court. They repeat the reasoning and argument urged before the special masters to support discipline, even when the Commission did not agree with the findings of the special masters or gave petitioner the benefit of the doubt as to sufficiency of the evidence on issues such as bad faith.

We hesitate, therefore, to characterize some of the argument as that of the Commission, and have omitted reference to most of the speculative effort to ascribe improper motives to petitioner's conduct. It is true, however, that petitioner had no jurisdiction to set aside the judgment once the notice of appeal had been filed. Since the municipal court has no jurisdiction in habeas corpus, petitioner could not act on the assumption that, because he could grant that relief, it was proper to accelerate the process by reasserting jurisdiction over the probation violation matter.

[15] By reasserting jurisdiction over the matter, notwithstanding the pendency of the appeal, petitioner denied the defendant the right he would otherwise have had upon reversal to peremptorily disqualify him from hearing further matters in the case. (See Code Civ. Proc., § 170.6, subd. (2).) While petitioner's actions in this and other cases might permit an inference that he intended to deny this defendant that opportunity, and thus engaged in wilful misconduct, we cannot say that the evidence of such intent is clear and convincing. His conduct of the initial revocation hearing in which the defendant's requests for counsel were denied is independent support for the conclusion of the Commission that this incident constituted wilful misconduct, however.

On August 14, 1984, petitioner summarily adjudged a criminal defendant appearing before him (see ante, at p. 844) to be in contempt. He did so when the defendant asked "how come" after his request to say something was rebuffed by petitioner. Without prior warning or explanation, petitioner ordered: "You are in contempt of court. I cite you for contempt of court. I will fine you at the end of these proceedings." In further response to the defendant's protestation "but—," petitioner said: "Sir, you are again in contempt of court."

The defendant had apologized to the court, explaining that he did not know how court procedures operated and did not know he was not allowed to speak. The defendant's attorney also apologized on his behalf. Petitioner nonetheless sentenced the defendant to two days in jail on each contempt finding.

Petitioner testified that the defendant had spoken in an angry tone of voice and "looked like he was fuming." He believed it was inappropriate for the defendant to speak out after the verdict was given, and citing the defendant for contempt "did the trick."

Other witnesses in the courtroom at the time testified, however, that the defendant was "quite humble" and did nothing to warrant the contempt citation. He was not loud, angry, or disrespectful when he asked to address petitioner. The defendant's attorney testified that his client had been surprised and confused by the court's verdict that had been just announced and wanted to make an inquiry of the court. Petitioner's tone was described as angry and demeaning.

2. Tricinella

In this matter, described above on page 846, on September 11, 1984, petitioner threatened a witness with fine or jail when defense counsel objected that his answer to the prosecutor's question was not responsive. He may have done so because the witness continued to speak after the objection was interposed, but the reporter's transcript of the trial does not reflect any statement by the witness made after the objection and before the threat.

3. Cotterman

Lynn Cotterman was in defendant's courtroom as a spectator on January 8, 1985, because a preliminary hearing was to be heard in a matter in which her brother was the defendant. During sentencing in an unrelated case, she stood up to leave the courtroom but tripped over her son's feet and struck her knee on a bench. Petitioner cited her for contempt when she said "shit," ordered her held in custody, and shortly thereafter heard her explanation and apology.[16] He nonetheless found her in contempt and ordered her to serve six hours in jail. She was subsequently released with four and one-half hours of the sentence set aside after her brother's attorney interceded on her behalf.

Petitioner explained that he believed Ms. Cotterman's expletive was a comment on the proceedings before the court at the time. Had he believed her explanation that her comment was a reflexive response to tripping and hitting her knee, he would have absolved her of the contempt citation. He sentenced her, however, without making any inquiry to clarify or confirm the inference he drew. The special masters and the Commission necessarily rejected petitioner's explanation in finding this conduct to be an abuse of the contempt power and, as such, prejudicial conduct.

4. Day/Follman

Misdemeanor defendant Day was released on posting 10 percent bail on August 17, 1985,[17] notwithstanding a docket entry stating she was not eligible for release on that basis. The bail was posted in her name. She signed for it. Follman, who had apparently provided the funds, but had not agreed that the money could be used to pay any fine imposed on the defendant, was given the receipt for the bail.

On September 3, 1985, Day failed to appear. Petitioner issued an order to show cause to Follman, directing him to show cause why he should not be required to post the balance of the bail. Notice was sent to Follman that a hearing was set for September 16, 1985, and when he did not appear, petitioner issued a $1,000 bench warrant for his arrest.

[16] As Ms. Cotterman regained her balance and began to walk out, petitioner told his bailiff to "grab that blonde lady for contempt of court." The bailiff did, and Ms. Cotterman was taken to the jury box where she was scared and began to cry. After her explanation that she had tripped over her son, and her apology, she was sentenced, taken to the county jail handcuffed to another woman, and held for one and one-half hours until being returned to the courtroom. Petitioner released her, stating that she would not have to serve the rest of the time because her son was upset, but if it happened again she would be sentenced to five days in jail.

[17] Former section 1269d of the Penal Code then authorized the release of persons held pending trial on misdemeanor charges upon posting of 10 percent of the amount of bail fixed for the offense. The defendant was required to execute a release agreement, appearance bond, and, if required by the court, an agreement to specified terms or conditions to assure his appearance in court. Having done so and deposited the appropriate sum, the defendant was entitled to be discharged from custody.

Petitioner explained that when he learned that his order prohibiting 10 percent bail had not been complied with he undertook to inquire into the reason, discovered that Follman had provided the funds for the 10 percent bail, and believed that Follman had acted illegally by posting the bail because even if the 10 percent provision had been applicable, the sum must be posted by the defendant. He ordered Follman to appear because he wanted to find out the address of the defendant and why that happened.

Court records, however, indicated the probable reason for the release—the courtroom clerk had not entered the restriction on 10 percent bail on the order committing the defendant to the custody of the sheriff. Nothing in the record supported petitioner's belief that Follman had acted as an "unlicensed bondsman" or gave reason to believe that he was a person subject to the court's jurisdiction or power simply by reason of having possibly supplied a defendant with funds to pay a bail fee. (See Code Civ. Proc., § 128.)

The Commission concluded, as had the special masters, that because petitioner knew, or should have known, that his assertion of jurisdiction over Follman was beyond his authority, and he acted in bad faith, this conduct was wilful misconduct. We agree. (10) Ordering a person to appear in court when no matter requiring his attendance is pending constitutes serious misuse of the judicial office. (See Cannon v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications, supra, 14 Cal.3d at pp. 701-702, fn. 19.)

In this incident (see ante, at p. 848), in October 1985, petitioner threatened a criminal defendant with contempt because he whispered to his attorney. The Commission concluded that petitioner engaged in prejudicial misconduct under this charge also.

(6c) We adopt the findings and conclusion of the Commission as to each of the incidents in which petitioner used or threatened to use the contempt power. In the Saxe incident petitioner assumed without inquiry that the defendant was being disrespectful and resorted to a threat to use his contempt power as the means by which to force a termination of the communication. In the Cotterman incident he assumed erroneously, and again without inquiry, that Ms. Cotterman was being disrespectful and that her comment was directed to the proceedings. He exercised his contempt power in circumstances in which a reprimand, or at most exclusion from the courtroom, should have been sufficient to maintain order and prevent disruption. And rather than explaining or affording counsel the opportunity to explain to Tricinella, a lay witness, why his testimony was not responsive, petitioner treated the objectionable answer as a contempt. In the Shepherd matter the defendant was held in contempt for attempting to speak when a simple admonition that he should address the court through counsel or should seek leave to address the court should have been sufficient.

(11) Because it carries with it a "heightened potential for abuse" (Taylor v. Hayes (1974) 418 U.S. 488, 500 [41 L.Ed.2d 897, 908, 94 S.Ct. 2697]), the contempt power should be the last resort of a judge in maintaining control in his courtroom. It should be used with "great prudence and caution" (Furey v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 43 Cal.3d at p. 1314; People v. Turner (1850) 1 Cal. 152, 153), and never to intimidate litigants and witnesses, or in a manner that interferes unnecessarily with a litigant's ability to consult with counsel. Petitioner's injudicious response in these incidents abused the contempt power and the power to issue orders to show cause. As such it was prejudicial misconduct, and in the Follman incident, wilful misconduct.

D. COUNT 4: FAILURE TO REMAIN OBJECTIVE

The Commission found that petitioner failed to remain objective and became personally involved in matters before him on the basis of three incidents.

1. Giella

On May 7, 1981, after the prosecutor moved to dismiss a receiving stolen property charge against a criminal defendant, believing that the charges could not be sustained without evidence that had been ordered suppressed, petitioner refused to dismiss this case. He told the prosecutor that he had read the police report and there was enough evidence available to permit the trial to continue. Petitioner also stated that he felt the defendant was guilty, but denied an oral disqualification motion that was then made by defendant's counsel.

The Commission finding of prejudicial misconduct[18] in this matter is based on petitioner's refusal to disqualify himself even though he had prejudged the case. In so doing, the Commission implicitly rejected petitioner's testimony that he did not recall expressing a view regarding the defendant's guilt,[19] and petitioner's argument that because counsel stated the motion was made under Code of Civil Procedure section 170.5, it was properly denied as untimely.[20]

[19]The disqualification motion was made in chambers in the absence of the court reporter.

2. Bowman

The deputy district attorney prosecuting this misdemeanor embezzlement case was called away by a family emergency after the first day of trial. The deputy assigned to take over the case requested a continuance to prepare, but three jurors indicated that they would be inconvenienced if the matter were put over to the following Monday. Without inquiring as to the nature of the inconvenience, petitioner expressed his view that the case was not complex and that it should not take counsel more than one-half hour to prepare. He denied the requested continuance, but declared a recess until 1:30 p.m. of the same day.

During the recess the People sought to compel the granting of the motion by filing a petition for writ of mandate in the superior court. Counsel advised petitioner after the recess that a writ was coming, but petitioner ordered a witness to take the stand, denied another request for a continuance, and threatened the prosecutor with a contempt citation if the matter were raised again.

An alternative writ was issued, and was served on petitioner shortly thereafter. Petitioner declared a recess and announced that he was going to call the superior court judge who had issued the writ. When he was unable to do so, he declared a recess until the following morning, not to the date requested and stated in the alternative writ. After the prosecutor advised petitioner that he might have to seek further relief, petitioner criticized him and the office of the district attorney for their lack of preparation and the filing of the petition for writ of mandate, and expressed regret that he had granted the continuance.

The prosecutor sought and, on the next day was granted, a second alternative writ ordering petitioner to grant the requested continuance or show cause why he should not be ordered to do so. Petitioner then excused the [20] Former section 170, subdivision (5) (now § 170.1, subd. (a)(6)), required a judge to disqualify himself or herself if the judge believed for any reason that he could not be impartial. No motion was or is necessary to trigger this obligation, which is one independently imposed by canon 3C(1): "Judges should disqualify themselves in a proceeding in which their disqualification is required by law, or their impartiality might reasonably be questioned, including but not limited to instances where:

"(a) the judge has a personal bias or prejudice concerning a party, or personal knowledge of disputed evidentiary facts concerning the proceedings."

jury, attributing to the prosecutor responsibility for any hardships the jurors might suffer as a result. Two of the jurors then explained that they had planned to be out of town on the Monday to which the continuance had been requested, and the parties agreed to a mistrial.

Petitioner later "angrily" asked the chief deputy district attorney why the writ had been sought, called a meeting with senior members of the branch office of the district attorney to express his displeasure with the handling of the Bowman case which made him "look bad," and remained angry at the office for "pulling a fast one" on him. Finally, on April 29, 1983, petitioner distributed to all judges in the county, the public defender, and the district attorney, a memorandum he had authored on the topic of extraordinary writs. The memorandum was critical of the district attorney for seeking, and the superior court for granting, the writ.

The Commission found that petitioner had wilfully failed to comply with the alternative writ, and had thereafter displayed unseemly personal involvement in the matter. It concluded that the acts constituted wilful misconduct and prejudicial misconduct. (12) We conclude, however, that the evidence supports only a finding of prejudicial conduct.[21]

3. Marshall

On June 6, 1984, petitioner stated at the end of a preliminary hearing on a felony complaint charging this defendant with 13 theft-related offenses, [21] The special masters found that misconduct was not shown by clear and convincing evidence in this matter.

Counsel for the Commission speculate that they did so because petitioner might have been justified by the fact that the prosecutor improperly made his motion for a continuance and presented the writ to petitioner in the presence of the jury.

This incident does reflect unseemly personal involvement, and prejudicial conduct, when petitioner undertook to criticize the office of the district attorney for exercising its right to seek extraordinary relief. However, the record does not establish misconduct in a wilful refusal to obey the writ. Notwithstanding the argument of the Commission that the writ was a "peremptory writ on its face" because the return date fell after the date to which the trial was to be continued, an alternative writ is just that. It gives the respondent an option to comply, or to show cause before the issuing court why the court should not order the respondent to grant the relief sought by the petitioner. Therefore, unless the superior court had ordered a stay of proceedings pending disposition of the petition for writ of mandate, petitioner was free to continue the trial. While the Commission argues that the evidence supports an inference that petitioner understood the writ as requiring him to continue the matter for the full period, the fact that it was worded as an alternative writ and set forth a return date casts doubt on whether it should have been treated as a peremptory writ. This precludes finding clear and convincing evidence of wilful misconduct in petitioner's failure to obey the writ.

We note, however, that since petitioner was the respondent in the writ proceeding, his attempt to communicate ex parte with the judge before whom that matter was pending was itself improper. (Gov. Code, § 68070.5, subd. (b).)

that the defendant was "fraudulent, a liar, and deceitful." He increased the $13,000 bail that had been posted by the defendant's grandmother to $150,000, and ordered that attorney fees of $1,500 for representation by the public defender be paid and taken from the bail already posted. When advised of the source of the bail, petitioner responded that perhaps she was another victim.

The bail was increased even though the prosecutor had advised that the defendant's record did not indicate that he was a flight risk, and had not requested the increase in bail. The defendant had made all court appearances. He was married and had a young child. He had no criminal record or prior contacts with law enforcement.

(13) (See fn. 23.) At the time petitioner ordered payment of attorney fees, the public defender's office continued to represent the defendant,[22] and the court's docket reflected that the person who posted the bail had refused permission to use the funds for costs.[23] The fee award was nonetheless taken from that bail pursuant to petitioner's order.

Implicit in the inclusion of this incident in count 4 is a conclusion by the Commission that petitioner's actions in this matter reflected a personal involvement, or distaste for the defendant which overrode objectivity. The Commission concluded that petitioner's actions in this matter constituted prejudicial misconduct. The special masters had concluded that wilful misconduct was established by the evidence.

E. COUNT 5: ABUSE OF POWER TO MAKE FEE ORDERS

The Commission relied on two incidents to support its finding that petitioner had abused his power to make fee orders.

[22] Penal Code section 987.8, subdivision (b), authorizes a fee hearing "upon conclusion of the criminal proceedings in the trial court." That language had been construed in People v. Spurlock (1980) 112 Cal.App.3d 323, 328 [169 Cal.Rptr. 320] as referring to the date of judgment. In conducting the preliminary hearing petitioner had acted as a magistrate, but argued that he believed the hearing was authorized because criminal proceedings in his court had concluded.

[23] The bail had actually been posted by defendant's relatives in the name of his father. Bail posted by a nondefendant must be returned on demand. (Pen. Code, § 1297.) That section authorizes the court to order bail deposits made by a defendant be applied to fines and costs if the funds "remain[ ] on deposit at the time of a judgment." Even that authorization does not permit application of the funds to attorney fees absent consent of the defendant. (Gubler v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1984) 37 Cal.3d 27, 42 [207 Cal.Rptr. 171, 688 P.2d 551].)

1. Black

Richard Black was represented by a deputy public defender at a five-day jury trial after which he was convicted of driving under the influence and found to have suffered two prior convictions. The public defender had made only one pretrial appearance on his behalf, to announce readiness for trial. On February 24, 1984, Black was sentenced to 150 days in the county jail, and a fine of $586 with a $30 assessment was imposed on February 24, 1984. Then, without advising the defendant of his right to a hearing, and without taking any evidence on the cost of the services or the ability of the defendant to pay, petitioner ordered him to reimburse the county $2,000 for the services of the public defender. When the public defender protested that the amount was excessive and asked for a hearing, petitioner responded that "you've had it" and chastised counsel for misuse of county funds in making the inquiry on behalf of the defendant.[24] Petitioner told the defendant that if he did not pay the attorney fees he would remain in jail, and later told counsel, who had inquired again, that the defendant could sell his car to pay the fees since he was to lose his right to drive for three years.

The defendant's 10-year-old car was owned by his parents. The defendant had no money of his own. A declaration subsequently filed by the public defender calculated the cost of representing the defendant as $715. A modification hearing was held on August 27, 1984, at which petitioner made no inquiry into the ability of the defendant to reimburse the county. When the public defender argued that the cost to the county for the representation was substantially less than the reimbursement ordered, petitioner told him that the subject of the hearing was civil in nature and that his expenditure of time was an abuse of county funds. The fee award was reduced to $750. Petitioner did not inform the defendant of his right to seek modification. The defendant's parents paid the county $750.

Petitioner did not dispute his failure to comply with the statutory prerequisites to a fee award. He explained that he had based his order on his knowledge that the defendant owned a sports car worth between $8,000 and $12,000, and evidence at trial which led him to conclude that the defendant raised and sold livestock. In fact, the evidence at trial did not establish that the defendant owned the car free and clear, or that he owned and traded in livestock. As noted, he did not own the car. His parents, who had purchased it for $2,500, did. His livestock consisted of a leased mare he hoped to breed.[25]

[24] Penal Code section 987.8, subdivision (a), requires notice and hearing before a fee reimbursement order is made. The notice must specify the cost of legal assistance provided, and advise the defendant of his procedural rights. (id., subd. (d).) At the hearing the defendant is entitled to be heard in person, to present evidence, to confront and cross-examine witnesses, to have the evidence disclosed to him, and to receive a written statement of the findings of the court. (id., subd. (e).) The court must find that the defendant has the present ability to pay before making a reimbursement order.

The Commission found that petitioner acted in bad faith in this matter and concluded that his actions constituted wilful misconduct.

Petitioner's conduct in this matter is also the subject of the third incident in count 4. On June 6, 1984, at the close of a preliminary hearing, petitioner conducted a hearing in which he assessed attorney fees of $1,500 to be paid by the defendant and ordered that it be taken out of the bail the defendant had posted.

Petitioner had given the defendant no notice that the hearing was to be held, or of his rights, and made the order without regard to the ability of the defendant to pay for attorney services. No evidence was presented on the cost of public defender services. The deputy who had represented the defendant had made five brief appearances other than the preliminary hearing, and had done very little preparation. Petitioner concluded that 20 hours had been spent on the case, and charged the defendant $75 per hour.

The special masters found that this incident was wilful misconduct, but the Commission concluded that petitioner's actions constituted only prejudicial conduct. In so doing the Commission may have accepted petitioner's claim that he did not act in bad faith because he believed that Penal Code section 1297 authorized withholding of attorney fees from bail deposits. In concluding otherwise in Gubler v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 37 Cal.3d at page 42, this court recognized that prior reliance on the [25] At the hearing petitioner stated that he had calculated the cost of services of the public defender at $50 per hour. The deputy assigned was paid at a rate of $14 to $15 per hour. The Commission argues that petitioner could not have believed in good faith that the cost of a deputy public defender's services in San Bernardino County could be $50 per hour, but offers nothing to support this assertion other than the earning rate of the particular deputy. We need not decide here whether a reimbursement order must be tied to the cost of the particular deputy's service or may be based on an average cost of providing service. We note in this regard that the county's costs are not limited to the salary of the assigned deputy. They include the expense of supervisory and clerical personnel, investigators, general office expenses, and many other items of overhead.

It is arguable, therefore, that the cost might be measured by hours devoted to the particular defendant in relation to the total number of hours of client representation furnished by the office of the public defender to all clients during the fiscal year.

statute as authority for such orders would not constitute misconduct. As in Gubler, however, this incident involved not only the improper withholding order, but the summary manner in which the hearing was announced and conducted.

Petitioner's attempt to justify the procedure on grounds that neither the defendant nor his attorney objected, requested a continuance, or offered any evidence suggesting that the defendant was unable to pay, is unavailing. It is manifest that petitioner made no effort to accord basic procedural fairness to the defendant. Even assuming that petitioner was unaware of the substantive requirements of Penal Code section 987.8,[26] and that his conduct in that regard was simply judicial error, the manner in which the proceeding was conducted alone supports the Commission's conclusion.

Notwithstanding the initial determination that the defendant was eligible for public defender services, petitioner assumed that the bail posted in defendant's name was his, and ordered withholding without any evidence regarding the defendant's future needs.

The Commission findings and conclusion in this matter, as in the foregoing, are supported by clear and convincing evidence.

IV.

MITIGATION

(14) The purpose of Commission proceedings is not punishment, but protection of the public, ensuring evenhanded and efficient administration of justice, and the maintenance of public confidence in the integrity of the [26] Penal Code section 987.8 defines the term: " 'Ability to pay' means the overall capability of the defendant to reimburse the costs, or a portion of the costs, of the legal assistance provided to him or her, and shall include, but not be limited to, all of the following:

"(A) The defendant's present financial position.

"(B) The defendant's reasonably discernible future financial position. In no event shall the court consider a period of more than six months from the date of the hearing for purposes of determining the defendant's reasonably discernible future financial position. Unless the court finds unusual circumstances, a defendant sentenced to state prison shall be determined not to have a reasonably discernible future financial ability to reimburse the costs of his or her defense.

"(C) The likelihood that the defendant shall be able to obtain employment within a six-month period from the date of the hearing.

"(D) Any other factor or factors which may bear upon the defendant's financial capability to reimburse the county for the costs of the legal assistance provided to the defendant.

judicial system. (§ 18(c); Furey v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 43 Cal.3d at p. 1320.) Our purpose is to determine the nature of the discipline, if any, that is necessary to achieve these goals. We therefore consider evidence offered by the judge in explanation and/or mitigation of his conduct. There can be no mitigation for maliciously motivated judicial misconduct, however. (Gonzalez v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1983) 33 Cal.3d 359, 377 [188 Cal.Rptr. 880, 657 P.2d 372].)

Petitioner was admitted to the bar in 1969 and served thereafter as a deputy district attorney in the office of the San Bernardino County District Attorney, becoming a chief deputy in 1976. He is married and has two children. He was elected to the bench and took office in January 1981. He was reelected in a contested election on June 3, 1986. He was elected presiding judge of the San Bernardino Municipal Court District for 1986 and was reelected for 1987.

Several witnesses, including colleagues on the bench and attorneys who appear before him, testified that petitioner is a person of unquestioned honesty and integrity. None of the charges against petitioner suggest otherwise. (15) This evidence, and that which confirms that petitioner had a good reputation for legal knowledge and administrative skills are not mitigating, however.[27] Honesty and good legal knowledge are minimum qualifications which are expected of every judge. (Cal. Code Jud. Conduct, canons 1 and 3.) Neither these qualities nor a judge's administrative skills can mitigate either "wilful misconduct" or "conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute." (§ 18(c).)

Moreover, petitioner's experience as a deputy district attorney suggests that he was well acquainted with the constitutional and procedural rights of criminal defendants. (McCullough v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 49 Cal.3d at p. 199; Wenger v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1981) 29 Cal.3d 615, 653-654 [175 Cal.Rptr. 420, 630 P.2d 954].) His conduct in the incidents in which defendants' rights were violated, in issuing orders to show cause and in the imposition of contempt sanctions, suggest that rather than using his knowledge and experience to ensure the rights of persons appearing in his courtroom, petitioner was impatient and frustrated by the need to comply with, and sought to avoid, procedures we deem necessary to the fair and evenhanded administration of justice.[28]

(16) The testimony of persons who were not present, and thus cannot assess the serious nature of the incidents of misconduct, but nonetheless believe petitioner to be a fair and patient person whose judicial temperament is appropriate, also is not persuasive. (Cannon v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications, supra, 14 Cal.3d at pp. 705-707.) The record belies petitioner's claim that he has learned from past experience and has modified his courtroom behavior.[29] It demonstrates instead an inability to appreciate the importance of, and conform to, the standards of judicial conduct that are essential if justice is to be meted out in every case.

(6d) That petitioner's conduct of other proceedings during his tenure on the bench has been unremarkable cannot overcome the evidence of a continuing, pervasive pattern of misconduct. (Gonzalez v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 33 Cal.3d at pp. 377-378.) Four charges of wilful misconduct and twenty-one charges of prejudicial conduct[30] have been established. The incidents underlying these charges occurred over the full span of petitioner's judicial career, continuing until and after receipt by the Commission of the first complaint in 1985. Petitioner's lack of judicial temperament is manifest.

The record does not suggest that petitioner has, or will be able to, overcome this trait and that similar incidents will not recur. For this reason

[28] Petitioner offered evidence in the form of the opinion of Judge Martin A. Hildreth, presiding judge of the county, who has been a judge of the municipal court since 1973, that petitioner was the "finest administrator we've ever had as a Presiding Judge." Qualities as an administrator, however, do not translate into an ability in the individual case before the judge to be "patient, dignified, and courteous to litigants, jurors, witnesses, lawyers, and others with whom judges deal in their official capacity" (canon 3A(3)), and to accord "every person who is legally interested in a proceeding, or that person's lawyer, full right to be heard according to law . . . ." (Canon 3A(4).)

[29] We acknowledge, in this regard, the testimony of Attorney Thomas B. Ritchie, a past president of the Western San Bernardino Bar Association, that petitioner has matured in office, has become one of the finer judges sitting in the West Valley court, and is now well respected. The same witness offered evidence that petitioner has served the community off the bench as a director of the Inland Mediation Board, and in bench/bar committee work.

Numerous attorneys and judges offered evidence of their experience in petitioner's court and their observations of his performance, all expressing admiration and a view that he should be commended for the quality of his service on the bench, rather than censured or removed.

[30] This number does not include those acts of prejudicial conduct also found to be wilful misconduct.

comparison of the discipline imposed in other cases, as petitioner suggests, is not fruitful. Our role is to determine, in the individual case, the action necessary to protect the public and the reputation of the judiciary. The evidence fully supports the conclusion of the Commission that this purpose requires that petitioner be removed from the bench.

DISPOSITION

We order that Judge Kenneth Lynn Kloepfer, judge of the San Bernardino Municipal Court District, San Bernardino County, be removed from office. He shall, however, if otherwise qualified, be permitted to resume the practice of law (Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (d)) on condition that he pass the Professional Responsibility Examination. This order is effective upon the finality of this decision in this court.

Petitioner's application for a rehearing was denied January 25, 1990. Kaufman, J., did not participate therein.

[No. S042149. July 20, 1995.]

G. DENNIS ADAMS, a Judge of the Superior Court, Petitioner, v. COMMISSION ON JUDICIAL PERFORMANCE, Respondent.

SUMMARY

On the recommendation of the Commission on Judicial Performance, the Supreme Court ordered that a superior court judge be removed from office. Preliminarily, the court held that the commission's combined roles as investigator, prosecutor, and adjudicator, as well as litigation adversary in proceedings by the judge challenging the commission's decision to hold open hearings, did not create an unacceptable risk of actual bias on the part of the commission so as to deny the judge his right to due process. Neither did the commission's vigorous opposition to the judge's attempt to vacate the open-hearing order, using as legal counsel the same attorneys who were prosecuting the charges, inevitably prejudice the commission against him with respect to the merits of the charges, so as to create a strong probability of bias against him. The court held that removal from office was the appropriate discipline for the judge, who engaged in successive extrajudicial transactions with a litigant who had obtained a substantial damage award in a court trial presided over by the judge, and attorneys who appeared before him over a significant period of time, creating an appearance of serious impropriety and thereby tending to diminish the public esteem of the judiciary—a consequence the judge either deliberately ignored or was unable to appreciate. The court held that clear and convincing evidence supported the charge that the judge engaged in seven separate instances of prejudicial conduct in his transactions with the litigant, a car dealer, four of which transactions involved the attorney representing the litigant, which attorney frequently appeared before the judge. Such conduct could be construed, from the viewpoint of an objective observer, as improperly using the judicial office to advance the judge's personal interest and permitting the appearance of special influence. Clear and convincing evidence also supported two charges that the judge engaged in prejudicial conduct in accepting gifts or financial benefits from attorneys or their law firms whose interests had come and were likely to come before the judge, and that in four separate instances the judge assisted or otherwise communicated with members of a law firm regarding matters pending before the court. Finally, the court held that the charge that the judge made material misstatements or omissions to the Commission on Judicial Performance in four instances was also supported by clear and convincing evidence, which charges, in particular, warranted the judge's removal from office. (Opinion by The Court. Separate dissenting opinion by Mosk, J.)

HEADNOTES

Classified to California Digest of Official Reports

(1) Judges § 6.2—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Grounds —Willful Misconduct—Elements.—Under Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, former subd. (c)(2), "willful misconduct in office" by a judge has two elements: the judge's misconduct must be willful, i.e., done with malice or bad faith and it must be committed in office, i.e., while acting in a judicial capacity. The element of malice or bad faith, in turn, must meet a two-pronged test: the judge must have (1) committed acts he or she knew or should have known to be beyond his or her power; (2) for a purpose other than faithful discharge of judicial duties.

(2) Judges § 6.2—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Grounds —Prejudicial Conduct.—Prejudicial conduct, or "conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute" (Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, former subd. (c)) may be committed by a judge while acting either in a judicial capacity or in other than a judicial capacity. The provision that the conduct must be that which "brings the judicial office into disrepute" does not require actual notoriety, but only that the conduct, if known to an objective observer, would appear to be prejudicial to public esteem for the judicial office. Unlike willful misconduct, prejudicial conduct does not require the presence of bad faith, but may occur when a judge, though acting in good faith, engages in conduct that adversely would affect the esteem in which the judiciary is held by members of the public who become aware of the circumstances of the conduct. The subjective intent or motivation of the judge is not a significant factor in assessing whether prejudicial conduct has occurred under this standard. Although a judge may perform the necessary judicial functions diligently, competently, and impartially, his or her inability to discern (and thus to avoid) extrajudicial activities that reasonably would be perceived as damaging to the judiciary may place that judge's fitness for judicial office in doubt.

(3) Judges § 6.2—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Grounds —Prejudicial Conduct—Canons of Judicial Conduct.—The canons set forth in the California Code of Judicial Conduct are relevant to the determination whether a judge's actions constitute "conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute" (Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, former subd. (c)) in that the canons reflect a consensus as to the standards of conduct and appropriate behavior to which judges properly should be held. The failure of a judge to comply with the canons suggests performance below the minimum level necessary to maintain public confidence in the administration of justice.

(4) Judges § 6.2—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Grounds—Acceptance of Gifts.—Under Cal. Code Jud. Conduct, former canon 5C(4), providing that in general judges should not accept gifts if the donor is a party or other person whose interests have come or are likely to come before the judge, subject to specified exceptions, a judge's acceptance of gifts from those whose interests appear before the court bears an obvious appearance of impropriety, it is inherently wrong, and it has a subtle, corruptive effect, no matter how much a particular judge may feel that he or she is above improper influence. In determining the propriety of activity that arguably might qualify as social hospitality, an exception to the prohibition against acceptance of gifts, the focus is on the reasonable perceptions of an objective observer, rather than the motive or intent of the judge.

(5) Judges § 6.4—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Proceedings—Review by Supreme Court.—In reviewing a report and recommendation by the Commission on Judicial Performance concerning the discipline of a judge, the Supreme Court independently evaluates the evidence taken in the commission proceedings and must sustain the charges of misconduct if there is clear and convincing evidence sufficient to prove them to a reasonable certainty. In resolving disputed issues of fact, the court gives special deference to the determination of the special masters, who are best able to evaluate the credibility of the witnesses appearing before them. The court must then determine whether the conduct found to have occurred is a basis for censure or removal and if so, the appropriate sanction. In making the latter determinations, the court accords great weight to the conclusions of the commission, recognizing its expertise in matters involving judicial conduct.

(6) Judges § 6.4—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Proceedings—Role of Commission on Judicial Performance—Multiple Functions as Creating Inherent Bias.—In disciplinary proceedings against a judge by the Commission on Judicial Performance, the commission's combined roles as investigator, prosecutor, and adjudicator, as well as litigation adversary in proceedings by the judge challenging the commission's decision to hold open hearings, did not create an unacceptable risk of actual bias on the part of the commission so as to deny the judge his right to due process. Neither did the commission's vigorous opposition to the judge's attempt to vacate the open-hearing order, using as legal counsel the same attorneys who were prosecuting the charges, inevitably prejudice the commission against him with respect to the merits of the charges, so as to create a strong probability of bias against him. The exchange of remarks between the judge's counsel and the commissioners at oral argument concerning an argument by the judge about public confidence in the proceedings merely reflected the commissioners' unwillingness to let the argument of the judge's counsel pass without testing the basis for that argument and assessing whether the judge's actions, in view of his opposition to public hearings, were truly consistent with his counsel's position. The colloquy demonstrated a normal function of oral argument and provided no basis for the conclusion that the commission penalized the judge for challenging the open-hearing order.

(7) Judges § 6.2—Removal—Grounds—Automobile Transaction With Litigant.—The Commission on Judicial Performance properly found a judge guilty of prejudicial conduct (Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, former subd. (c)) by initiating an automobile transaction with, and actively soliciting the assistance of, a car dealer who was a litigant in favor of whom the judge had rendered an exceedingly large monetary judgment, and whose interests remained before the judge while the case was pending on appeal. The nature of the transaction was significant in that it involved the sale of a used vehicle, generally providing leeway for bargaining and flexibility in setting the purchase price. In so acting, the judge violated the proscription against conduct giving rise to the appearance of impropriety, including extrajudicial activities that may cast reasonable doubt on the individual's capacity to act impartially as a judge, and business dealings that reasonably may be perceived as exploiting the judge's position. To an objective observer of the transaction, the judge would appear to have been seeking to use his office to collect for past deeds, and to procure a benefit for himself.

(8) Judges § 6.2—Removal—Purchase of Vehicle From Litigant With Assistance of Litigant's Attorney.—The Commission on Judicial Performance properly found a judge guilty of prejudicial conduct in violation of Cal. Code Jud. Conduct, former canons 2 and 5, proscribing conduct giving rise to the appearance of impropriety, by initiating a vehicle purchase with an automobile dealer who had been a successful litigant in a court trial presided over by the judge. Moreover, the litigant's attorney paid the balance owed on the purchase price, and that attorney's firm frequently came before the judge. The judge's conduct readily could be construed as an attempt to collect for judicial services rendered in the litigation, and otherwise to use his judicial office to advance his personal interests.

(9) Judges § 6.2—Removal—Grounds—Attendance at Dinner Celebrating Litigant's Victory.—The Commission on Judicial Performance properly found that a judge's attendance at a dinner given in celebration of a satisfaction of a judgment in litigation presided over by the judge in a court trial constituted prejudicial conduct. Regardless of the judge's motives, or whether he was biased or impartial in the judicial proceedings, his attendance at the dinner indisputably gave rise to the appearance of partiality in favor of a litigant and the litigant's attorney whose very substantial interests had come before him. Under these circumstances, the dinner could not be characterized as ordinary social hospitality within the meaning of Cal. Code Jud. Conduct, former canon 5C(4)(b).

(10) Judges § 6.2—Removal—Grounds—Acceptance of Favor From Attorney—Repair of Vehicle.—The Commission on Judicial Performance properly found a judge guilty of prejudicial conduct in relying, for the financial arrangements for the repair of a vehicle, on an attorney whose interests frequently came before the judge, and in favor of whose client the judge had rendered a substantial verdict in a recent court trial. Regardless whether the judge had knowledge of the attorney's payment for the repairs, his failure to obtain a bill for the repairs directly from the car dealer and his reliance on the attorney to verify the cost reflected that the judge turned a blind eye toward the possibility of receiving special treatment, whether from the car dealer or the attorney, or both. To an objective observer, the judge would appear to have been seeking to use his judicial office to advance his personal interests, placing in doubt both his independence and his integrity.

(11) Judges § 6.2—Removal—Grounds—Acceptance of Sweater From Successful Litigant.—The Commission on Judicial Performance properly found a judge guilty of prejudicial conduct in accepting a sweater worth $150 from a litigant who had shortly before received satisfaction of a large judgment in a court trial conducted by the judge. Although the judge did not solicit the gift, under the circumstances it was incumbent on him to return it to the litigant in order to avoid any doubt regarding the judge's independence or any appearance of impropriety.

(12) Judges § 6.2—Removal—Grounds—Acceptance of Dinner Invitation and Loan of Computer From Attorney.—A judge who awarded a multimillion dollar judgment to a litigant in a court trial was guilty of improper action in accepting a "rain check" dinner invitation from the litigant's attorney, who had proffered the invitation following the judge's inability to present the attorney with an award at a dinner celebrating his success in the litigation over which the judge had presided. Under the circumstances, the dinner could not be viewed as ordinary social hospitality within the meaning of Cal. Code Jud. Conduct, former canon 5C(4)(b). The judge was also guilty of improper action in accepting a loan of a computer from the attorney. However, the conduct in accepting the dinner invitation did not constitute prejudicial misconduct, since simply allowing the attorney to "pick up the tab" for dinner would not have placed in doubt, from the prospective of an objective observer, the independence and impartiality of the judge. Similarly, because the attorney had agreed to collaborate on the writing of a novel by the judge, the computer loan would not have appeared to an objective observer to be a special favor conferred as a result of the judge's judicial office.

(13) Judges § 6.2—Removal—Grounds—Acceptance of Fee Write-off From Law Firm Appearing Before Judge.—A judge's receipt of a fee write-off in a fairly substantial amount from a law firm that regularly appeared before him constituted prejudicial conduct, violating both the general proscription against a judge's acceptance of gifts from attorneys who are likely, or whose firms are likely, to appear before the judge, and the proscription against conduct permitting the inference of special influence over a judge. To an objective observer, the conduct would have compromised the independence and integrity of the judiciary.

circumstance that the condominium was offered free of charge to any member of the public interested in purchasing it. However, the judge's participation in fishing trips sponsored by the law firm did constitute prejudicial misconduct in violation of the general proscription against the acceptance of gifts. The circumstances that the activities were provided by law firms, rather than a bar association or other legal association, cast doubt on the judge's independence, as it may be assumed that law firms do not as a general rule sponsor fishing trips for the benefit of the general public.

(15a, 15b) Judges § 6.2—Removal—Grounds—Failure to Disclose or Disqualify Self—Matters Relating to Attorneys With Whom Judge Had Relationship.—The Commission on Judicial Performance properly determined that a judge who had a personal relationship with an attorney with whom he collaborated on a novel, and from whom he accepted a dinner and a laptop computer, was disqualified with respect to any matter involving the attorney or his law firm. Likewise, the judge was disqualified with respect to any matter involving a law firm with whom the judge had a long-standing relationship and from whom he accepted a legal fee write-off. The judge was also disqualified with respect to a firm from whose senior partner the judge accepted a free stay at a condominium, which partner the judge regularly appointed as a special master. Under the circumstances, a person aware of the gifts and favors reasonably might entertain a doubt as to the judge's independence and ability to remain completely impartial with respect to matters involving the attorneys or their respective firms. With respect to matters as to which the judge's role was solely to preside over settlement conferences or settlement-related matters, his failure to disclose did not constitute improper action under Code Civ. Proc., § 170.1, subd. (6), but his failure to disclose or obtain a written waiver of disqualification (Code Civ. Proc., § 170.3) before presiding in a capacity other than as a settlement judge constituted improper action.

(16) Judges § 12—Disqualification—Grounds—Relationship to Party or Counsel—Nature of Proceedings—Duty of Disclosure.—The Code of Civil Procedure does not provide for any specific obligation of on-the-record disclosure of grounds for disqualification under circumstances in which the judge performs one of the limited functions permitted of a disqualified judge. Even when the ground for disqualification is a judge's receipt of gifts from one of the parties or their attorney, a judge's failure to disclose the ground for disqualification is not required when conducting a limited function permitted under Code Civ. Proc., § 170.4, such as presiding over a settlement conference.

(17) Judges § 6.2—Removal—Grounds—Providing Legal Advice to Attorney and Members of Attorney's Law Firm.—The Commission on Judicial Performance properly found that a judge who provided legal advice to an attorney and members of the attorney's law firm on cases being handled by that firm, failed to promote public confidence in the integrity and impartiality of the judiciary and was guilty of prejudicial conduct. The judge's active participation, regardless of motive, in the preparation of two settlement conference briefs in cases that were to come before another member of the court on which the judge served also demonstrated a disregard for the integrity of the bench and constituted prejudicial misconduct. The judge's review and approval of a motion in another case that was to come before one of the judge's judicial colleagues, and his action in soliciting a copy of a special verdict in a case similar to one over which he was presiding, and imparting his opinion to the attorney representing a litigant in the case before the judge, was prejudicial conduct.

(18) Judges § 6.2—Removal—Grounds—Misrepresentations and Omissions in Response to Inquiries by Commission on Judicial Performance.—The Commission on Judicial Performance properly found that a judge engaged in willful misconduct by making material omissions and misrepresentations, and demonstrating a lack of candor, in response to inquiries by the commission regarding complaints of misconduct. In each instance in which the judge responded to the commission's inquiries, he was acting in a judicial capacity. The inquiry was directed to the judge because he was a judge, and his reply was required as one of his judicial functions. The judge demonstrated bad faith because in his response he made material omissions that he knew or should have known were "beyond his authority," and for a purpose other than the faithful discharge of his judicial duties.

(19) Judges § 6.4—Removal—Proceedings—Mitigation.—Although evidence of a judge's qualifications for and contribution to the judicial system during the course of a lengthy judicial career does not mitigate or excuse willful misconduct or prejudicial conduct, the Supreme Court may take those factors into account in considering the totality of the circumstances that are pertinent to its determination of the appropriate discipline. In making that determination, the court considers the purpose of a disciplinary proceeding, which is not punishment, but rather the protection of the public, the enforcement of rigorous standards of judicial conduct, and the maintenance of public confidence in the integrity and independence of the judicial system.

(20) Judges § 6.4—Removal—Proceedings—Evidence in Support of Removal as Appropriate Sanction.—Removal from office was the appropriate discipline for a judge who engaged in successive extrajudicial transactions with a litigant who had obtained a substantial damage award in a court trial presided over by the judge, and attorneys who appeared before him over a significant period of time, creating an appearance of serious impropriety and thereby tending to diminish the public esteem of the judiciary (Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18), a consequence the judge either deliberately ignored or was unable to appreciate. Clear and convincing evidence supported the charge that the judge engaged in seven separate instances of prejudicial conduct in his transactions with the litigant, a car dealer, four of which transactions involved the litigant's attorney, who frequently appeared before the judge. Such conduct could be construed, from the viewpoint of an objective observer, as improperly using the judicial office to advance the judge's personal interest, and permitting the appearance of special influence. Clear and convincing evidence also supported two charges that the judge engaged in prejudicial conduct in accepting gifts or financial benefits from attorneys or their law firms whose interests had come and were likely to come before the judge, and that in four separate instances the judge assisted or otherwise communicated with members of a law firm regarding matters pending before the court. The charge that the judge made material misstatements or omissions to the Commission on Judicial Performance in four instances was also supported by clear and convincing evidence, which charges, in particular, warranted the judge's removal from office.

OPINION

THE COURT.—The Commission on Judicial Performance (Commission) has filed in this court its recommendation that G. Dennis Adams, a judge of the Superior Court of San Diego County (petitioner), be removed from office. (See Cal. Rules of Court, rule 919(a).)[1] In support of its recommendation, the Commission submitted findings of fact and conclusions of law determining that petitioner had committed a variety of actions that constituted wilful misconduct in office, conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute, and improper action. (Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, former subd. (c).)[2] In response, petitioner filed a petition to modify or reject the recommendation (see rule 919(b)) or, in the alternative, for remand for a new hearing before the Commission, on the ground that petitioner was denied due process of law at his hearing.

We conclude, after independently reviewing the record, that petitioner's due process challenge to the disciplinary proceedings before the Commission has no merit, and that the record supports all of the charges of wilful misconduct and most (but not all) of the charges of prejudicial conduct, and also establishes improper action. With respect to the appropriate discipline, we uphold the recommendation of the Commission that petitioner be removed from office.

I

Petitioner was a judge of the Municipal Court of San Diego County, El Cajon Judicial District, from December 16, 1975, to March 9, 1979, was appointed to the Superior Court of San Diego County in 1979, and was elected and reelected to the superior court for successive terms in 1980, 1986, and 1992.

On December 10, 1992, following an extensive preliminary investigation (rule 904.2), the Commission filed a notice of formal proceedings against petitioner, alleging (in four counts) facts charged as constituting both wilful misconduct and prejudicial conduct. Petitioner filed an answer denying the

References to wilful misconduct connote wilful misconduct in office; those to prejudicial conduct connote conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute, and those to improper action connote improper action or a dereliction of duty, all within the meaning of article VI, section 18, former subdivision (c).

charges. Thereafter, the Commission filed a first amended and second amended notice,[3] and petitioner answered, again denying the charges.[4]

In October and November 1993, three special masters[5] appointed by this court held a seventeen-day evidentiary hearing on the issues presented (rules 907-908). The examiners (in this case, deputies of the Office of the Attorney General)[6] prosecuted the charges against petitioner, who was represented by private counsel. Following the conclusion of the hearing, the special masters transmitted to the Commission their proposed report, together with findings of fact and conclusions of law. As to count 1, the masters concluded that the allegations of petitioner's receipt of special benefits had not been established, but that the alleged facts that were found to be true sustained most (but not all) of the charges of separate instances of prejudicial conduct; as to counts 2 and 3, the masters found that certain of the alleged facts had not been established, and the alleged facts that were found to be true did not sustain the charges of either wilful misconduct or prejudicial conduct; and as to count 4, the masters found the alleged facts that were found to be true demonstrated "negligent" prejudicial conduct,[7] but not wilful misconduct. The special masters concluded in their report that petitioner was not guilty of wilful misconduct and that in no instance had he acted in bad faith, but that he was guilty of prejudicial conduct.

[4]The Commission concluded that the charges involved moral turpitude, corruption, or dishonesty (within the meaning of former subdivision (f) of article VI, section 18), and that opening the hearing to the public on the charges would serve to maintain public confidence in the judiciary and would further the interests of justice. (Art. VI, § 18, former subd. (f)(3); rule 907.2(c).) On these grounds, the Commission determined to open the hearing to the public, notified the parties of its decision, and scheduled a press release. In response, petitioner filed in this court, in the first instance, a petition for writ of mandate (or other appropriate relief), seeking to stay issuance of the press release and to maintain the confidentiality of the proceedings before the Commission. After we transferred the matter to the Court of Appeal, Fourth Appellate District, the Commission determined to proceed with a closed hearing on the formal charges and otherwise to maintain the confidentiality of the proceedings.

In transferring the matter to the Court of Appeal, we ordered that the Commission maintain the confidentiality of the proceedings and that the record remain sealed during the pendency of the proceedings in that court. The Court of Appeal issued an order to show cause and subsequently filed an opinion granting in part and denying in part the relief sought by petitioner. On petition of both parties, we granted review and ultimately upheld in its entirety the Commission's order authorizing a public hearing. (Adams v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1994) 8 Cal.4th 630 [34 Cal.Rptr.2d 641, 882 P.2d 358] (Adams I).)

[5]The special masters were Patti S. Kitching (associate justice, Court of Appeal), Spurgeon Avakian (superior court judge, retired), and Charles E. Goff (municipal court judge, retired).

[6]The term "examiner" refers to "the counsel designated by the Commission to gather and present evidence before the masters or Commission with respect to the charges against a judge." (Rule 922(f).) Government Code section 68702 directs the Attorney General to act as the Commission's counsel generally, and in investigations or proceedings upon request.

[7]The term "negligent," modifying prejudicial conduct, does not appear in the pertinent constitutional provision.

The examiners filed a lengthy statement of objections to the report of the special masters, disputing in particular the conclusion that certain facts had not been proved and that other facts did not amount to wilful misconduct or prejudicial conduct. The report of the Commission, filed with this court in September 1994, confirmed the special masters' findings with respect to the alleged facts found by the special masters to be true, and found true additional allegations that the masters had concluded had not been proved. The Commission differed significantly from the masters in assessing particular acts as wilful misconduct or prejudicial conduct, concluding that the facts found to be true sustained charges of four separate instances of wilful misconduct and thirteen separate instances of prejudicial conduct, as well as several instances of improper action. By a vote of six to two, the Commission recommended that petitioner be removed from office.

II

In Kennick v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1990) 50 Cal.3d 297 [267 Cal.Rptr. 293, 787 P.2d 591, 87 A.L.R.4th 679], we summarized the applicable standards governing our review of a disciplinary recommendation of the Commission. Under the California Constitution, a judge may be censured publicly or removed from office for action that constitutes "wilful misconduct in office" or "conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute," and may be admonished privately if found to have engaged "in an improper action or a dereliction of duty . . . ." (Art. VI, § 18, former subd. (c)(2).)[8]

(1) "Wilful misconduct in office" has two elements: the judge's misconduct must be wilful, i.e., done with malice or in bad faith, and it must be committed in office, i.e., while acting in a judicial capacity. The element of malice or bad faith, in turn, must meet a two-pronged test: the judge must

[8]Former subdivision (c) of article VI, section 18 (the constitutional provision in effect at the time of the instant proceedings), provided in part: "On recommendation of the Commission on Judicial Performance the Supreme Court may . . . (2) censure or remove a judge for action occurring not more than 6 years prior to the commencement of the judge's current term that constitutes wilful misconduct in office, persistent failure or inability to perform the judge's duties, habitual intemperance in the use of intoxicants or drugs, or conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute. The Commission on Judicial Performance may privately admonish a judge found to have engaged in an improper action or a dereliction of duty, subject to review in the Supreme Court in the manner provided for review of causes decided by a court of appeal."

With the passage of Proposition 190 at the November 8, 1994, election (operative March 4, 1995) section 18 of article VI was amended in several significant respects. Among other amendments to this constitutional provision, former subdivision (c) was amended and redesignated as subdivision (d).

have (1) committed acts he or she knew or should have known to be beyond his or her power, (2) for a purpose other than faithful discharge of judicial duties. (Kennick v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 50 Cal.3d at pp. 313-314; Kloepfer v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1989) 49 Cal.3d 826, 832 [264 Cal.Rptr. 100, 782 P.2d 239, 89 A.L.R.4th 235].)

(2) Prejudicial conduct, or "conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute" (art. VI, § 18, former subd. (c)), may be committed by a judge either while acting in a judicial capacity, or in other than a judicial capacity. (Kennick v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 50 Cal.3d at p. 314.) The provision that the conduct must be that which "brings the judicial office into disrepute" does not require actual notoriety, but only that the conduct, if known to an objective observer, would appear to be prejudicial to public esteem for the judicial office. (Geiler v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications (1973) 10 Cal.3d 270, 284 [110 Cal.Rptr. 201, 515 P.2d 1].) Unlike wilful misconduct, prejudicial conduct does not require the presence of bad faith, but may occur when a judge, though acting in good faith, engages in conduct that adversely would affect the esteem in which the judiciary is held by members of the public who become aware of the circumstances of the conduct. (Kloepfer v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 49 Cal.3d 826, 832; McCullough v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1989) 49 Cal.3d 186, 191 [260 Cal.Rptr. 557, 776 P.2d 259].) The subjective intent or motivation of the judge is not a significant factor in assessing whether prejudicial conduct has occurred under this standard. (Gonzalez v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1983) 33 Cal.3d 359, 376 [188 Cal.Rptr. 880, 657 P.2d 372].) Although a judge may perform the necessary judicial functions diligently, competently, and impartially, his or her inability to discern (and thus to avoid) extrajudicial activities that reasonably would be perceived as damaging to the judiciary may place that judge's fitness for judicial office in doubt.

(3) The canons set forth in the California Code of Judicial Conduct are relevant to the determination whether a judge's actions constitute "conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute," in that the canons reflect a consensus as to the standards of conduct and appropriate behavior to which judges properly should be held. (Adams I, supra, 8 Cal.4th at pp. 661-662.) "The failure of a judge to comply with the canons 'suggests performance below the minimum level necessary to maintain public confidence in the administration of justice.'" (Id. at p. 662.)

The acts of misconduct charged in the present proceeding are alleged to have occurred while the 1975 version of the Code of Judicial Conduct was in effect, prior to adoption of the 1992 version of that code, and thus our assessment of petitioner's conduct is governed by the earlier version of the code. We therefore shall review those pertinent canons as they appeared in the 1975 version. (The pertinent text of the prior version of the canons was adopted in substance in the 1992 version of the code, except where otherwise noted. All references to canons refer to the canons of the Code of Judicial Conduct.)[9]

Former canon 2 provided that a judge should avoid impropriety and the appearance of impropriety in all of the judge's activities and, as a consequence, must accept restrictions on his or her conduct that might be viewed as burdensome by the ordinary citizen. Former canon 2B provided that judges "should not lend the prestige of their office to advance the private interests of others; nor should judges convey or permit others to convey the impression that they are in a special position to influence them." Former canon 5C(1) provided that judges "should refrain from financial and business dealings that tend to reflect adversely on their impartiality, interfere with the proper performance of their judicial duties, exploit their judicial position, or involve them in frequent transactions with lawyers or persons likely to come before the courts on which they serve."

A significant portion of the charges against petitioner involve petitioner's alleged acceptance of gifts, financial benefits, or preferential treatment from attorneys or law firms that appeared before petitioner, and from a litigant in a case over which petitioner presided. The canons, as well as other rules and regulations, pertaining to and governing the propriety of the acceptance of gifts by judges, are therefore particularly apposite to our review of the charges in the present case. (4) Former canon 5C(4) provided that, in general, judges should not accept gifts if the donor is a party or other person whose interests have come or are likely to come before the judge, subject to specified exceptions. Recently, in our decision in Adams I, we noted that a judge's acceptance of gifts from those whose interests appear before the court bears an obvious appearance of impropriety, " 'is inherently wrong,' " and " 'has a subtle, corruptive effect, no matter how much a particular judge may feel that he is above improper influence.' " (Adams I, supra, 8 Cal.4th at p. 663.)

One of the specified exceptions under former canon 5C(4) to the prohibition against acceptance of gifts from those whose interests have (or are likely to) come before the court, is "ordinary social hospitality." (Former canon 5C(4)(b).) The Judicial Ethics Committee of the California Judges Association has defined ordinary social hospitality as follows: "It is that type of social event or other gift which is so common among people in the judge's community that no reasonable person would believe that (1) the donor was intending to or would obtain any advantage or (2) the donee would believe that the donor intended to obtain any advantage." (Cal. Judges Assn., Jud. Ethics Com., Opn. No. 43 (1994) at p. 4, published in Rothman, Cal. Judicial Conduct Handbook.) Again, in determining the propriety of activity that arguably might qualify as social hospitality, the focus is upon the reasonable perceptions of an objective observer, rather than the motive or intent on the part of the judge.

The California Political Reform Act of 1974 requires that any gift in excess of $50 be reported on a statement requiring disclosure of "[a]ssets and income of public officials which may be materially affected by their official actions . . . ." (Gov. Code, § 81002, subd. (c); see id., §§ 81000, 87207.) As will be shown, petitioner reported on several occasions his receipt of gifts on his yearly financial disclosure statement.

(5) In reviewing the report and recommendation by the Commission, this court independently evaluates the evidence taken in the Commission proceedings and must sustain the charges of misconduct if there is clear and convincing evidence sufficient to prove them to a reasonable certainty. (Kennick v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 50 Cal.3d at p. 314.) In resolving disputed issues of fact, we give special deference to the determinations of the special masters, who were best able to evaluate the credibility of the witnesses appearing before them. (Id. at pp. 314-315.) We must then determine whether the conduct found to have occurred is a basis for censure or removal and, if so, the appropriate sanction. In making the latter determinations, we accord great weight to the conclusions of the Commission, recognizing the expertise of the Commission in matters involving judicial conduct. (Kloepfer v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 49 Cal.3d at p. 832; McCullough v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 49 Cal.3d at p. 191.)

III

Before turning to the specific evidence against petitioner and the merits of the Commission's findings and conclusions, we shall address petitioner's threshold contention that the disciplinary proceedings before the Commission were tainted by a lack of neutrality and a strong probability of bias against him on the part of the Commission, resulting in a denial of his right to due process of law.

(6) Petitioner contends that the Commission's combined roles as investigator, prosecutor, and adjudicator, as well as litigation adversary, created an unacceptable risk of actual bias on the part of the Commission, thereby denying him his right to due process. He maintains that the administrative procedures governing the proceedings before the Commission, in conjunction with the Commission's efforts (collateral to its determination of the merits of the charges) to validate its order opening the proceedings to the public, resulted in an unconstitutional risk of a biased decisionmaker, because the Commission did not remain a neutral body but assumed an adversarial role during the investigatory and adjudicatory stages.

Petitioner acknowledges that we rejected a somewhat similar argument in Kloepfer v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 49 Cal.3d at pages 833-835, in which the subject of judicial disciplinary proceedings raised a due process challenge to the Commission's role in the disciplinary proceedings. The judge in Kloepfer complained, as does petitioner, that the Commission did not provide a neutral forum, because the accusatory, investigatory, and adjudicatory functions were combined so that the adjudicatory process did not comport with generally accepted standards of due process.

In examining this argument in Kloepfer, we turned to the principles articulated by the United States Supreme Court in Withrow v. Larkin (1975) 421 U.S. 35 [43 L.Ed.2d 712, 95 S.Ct. 1456]. In Withrow, the court observed that, in order to prevent unfairness, our legal system refuses to tolerate proceedings in which the risk of actual bias on the part of the decisionmaker is inconsistent with the guarantee of due process. In Withrow, itself, however, the court rejected a challenge to the procedures of a medical licensing board that possessed both investigatory and adjudicatory functions, concluding that, in general, it is appropriate to presume the integrity of those serving as adjudicators in an administrative proceeding, and, accordingly, that a challenge on such a ground carries a very high burden of persuasion. (421 U.S. at pp. 47 [43 L.Ed.2d at pp. 723-724].)

We concluded in Kloepfer that the challenged procedures of the Commission involved even less potential for biased decisionmaking than those upheld by the high court in Withrow. We noted that the prosecutorial function rested largely with examiners from the Attorney General's office, that the Commission independently reviews the evidence and makes its own findings and conclusions, and that this court is the final decisionmaker and must review the evidence and independently assess its weight and significance. (49 Cal.3d at p. 835.) We therefore concluded that the procedures to which the judge objected did not create an unacceptable risk of bias either on the part of the Commission or on the part of the court as the ultimate decisionmaker.

Petitioner contends that the circumstances in the present case, in which petitioner challenged the Commission's open-hearing order in a collateral writ proceeding (see Adams I, supra, 8 Cal.4th 630), created a significantly greater risk of bias against him than the risk of bias present in Kloepfer. He argues that the Commission's role as his opponent in that collateral proceeding, in seeking to validate the open-hearing order, converted the Commission from a neutral forum to an adversarial party. He argues that the Commission's vigorous opposition to his attempt to vacate the open-hearing order, using as legal counsel the same attorneys who were prosecuting the charges, inevitably prejudiced the Commission against him with respect to the merits of the charges, creating a strong probability of bias against him.

The Commission ordered open the hearing for the purpose, and in the interest, of maintaining public confidence in the judiciary and its disciplinary procedures, pursuant to the provisions of article VI, section 18, former subdivision (f). Having determined that the charges against petitioner involved moral turpitude, dishonesty, or corruption, and that an open hearing would best serve public confidence and the interests of justice, the Commission was bound to seek implementation of the open-hearing procedures, as one of the duties required of it under the foregoing former provision of the California Constitution predating Proposition 190. The Commission's use of the Attorney General as legal counsel for this purpose was appropriate under Government Code section 68702, and did not create any risk of bias on the part of the Commission greater than if different counsel had been employed—any counsel retained by the Commission for this purpose would have assumed the role of advocate in representing the Commission.

Not surprisingly, petitioner cites no authority in support of his contention that the Commission's defense of its open-hearing order rendered the Commission a biased tribunal. Petitioner's premise would lead to the absurd consequence that an administrative agency charged with adjudication of a claim in an administrative proceeding would be disqualified from performing its function whenever it was required to assert or defend its position against the claimant in a matter preliminary to a final determination of the merits of the claim. Such a result would be inconsistent with a large body of decisional law relating to administrative proceedings (see, e.g., Summers v.

City of Cathedral City (1990) 225 Cal.App.3d 1047 [275 Cal.Rptr. 594]; Park Motors, Inc. v. Cozens (1975) 49 Cal.App.3d 12 [122 Cal.Rptr. 337]) and essentially would emasculate the ability of an agency to serve many of the functions for which it is responsible. As the high court explained in Withrow, in all adjudicatory proceedings the judge or other decisionmaker frequently renders preliminary or interlocutory orders (e.g., issuing arrest warrants based upon a finding of probable cause, or a preliminary injunction) that, except in unusual circumstances, do not give rise to a presumption of bias precluding that decisionmaker from making a finding of guilt or innocence in a criminal proceeding or a final adjudication of the merits of a dispute in a civil proceeding. (421 U.S. at p. 56 [43 L.Ed.2d at pp. 728-729].)

In a related argument, relying upon remarks made by a number of Commission members during oral argument before the Commission, petitioner appears to contend that the record establishes actual bias or prejudice on the part of particular Commission members.

During the course of his argument before the Commission, petitioner's counsel noted that the disciplinary proceeding raised questions regarding public perception of the judiciary and suggested that public confidence in the proceedings would best be served if the Commission accorded serious weight to the findings and conclusions of the special masters, who diligently had heard all the evidence.

Commissioner Andy Guy questioned petitioner's counsel regarding that suggestion, asking: "If you were so interested in the public, the public outrage, why did you try to keep this thing secret from the public all the way through? No open hearing?" Commissioner Essegian noted shortly thereafter, with regard to Commissioner Guy's comments, that "there has been a real effort here to keep everything confidential." In closing argument, the examiner suggested that the reason petitioner had not sought to open the proceedings to the public was that he knew the public would be outraged by the truth.

Petitioner contends the foregoing comments of the Commission members, considered in conjunction with the examiner's argument, reflect the Commission's improper consideration of the earlier writ proceeding in formulating its disciplinary recommendation. He argues that the Commission's consideration of this collateral matter constituted an abuse of the Commission's discretion and "tainted" the proceedings.

The record fails to establish that the determination by the Commission of the appropriate disciplinary recommendation was based upon a desire improperly to penalize petitioner for having challenged the open-hearing order.

The issue whether the Commission properly issued its open-hearing order was resolved in the collateral writ proceeding that remained separate in all respects from the hearing and determination of the charges on the merits. The Commission's findings and conclusions that led to its disciplinary recommendation are based upon the evidence adduced at the hearing on the merits of the charges. The exchange between petitioner's counsel and the commissioners at oral argument simply reflects the commissioners' unwillingness to let counsel's argument pass (as to how the public confidence best would be served) without testing the basis for that argument and assessing whether petitioner's actions were truly consistent with his counsel's position. The colloquy demonstrates a normal function of oral argument and provides no basis for the conclusion that the Commission penalized petitioner for challenging the open-hearing order.

For these reasons, we conclude the record fails to support petitioner's claim that the Commission proceedings were tainted by actual bias or prejudice against him (or by an unacceptable risk thereof), in violation of due process requirements.

Turning to the charges against petitioner and the merits of the Commission's findings and conclusions, we first set forth the uncontroverted factual scenario underlying a substantial portion of the allegations of misconduct.

From August through October of 1985, petitioner presided over the trial in a complex civil case, Security Pacific National Bank v. Williams (Super. Ct. San Diego County, 1985, Nos. 457727 and 457728), between the named bank and James Williams, an automobile dealer. The litigation involved an action by the bank against Williams to enforce personal guaranties for indebtedness that had been executed by Williams, and a related cross-action by Williams against the bank, seeking tort damages for alleged fraud and other misconduct in the course of his transactions with the bank. Williams was represented in the litigation by Attorney Patrick Frega.

The trial commenced as a jury trial but concluded as a court trial. Following the presentation of evidence, petitioner devoted approximately 100 hours to drafting his written decision. In early 1986, petitioner rendered the decision, awarding judgment in favor of Williams in the amount of approximately $5 million, expressly reserving jurisdiction to determine attorney fees and costs on appeal. Security Pacific appealed from the judgment.

The matter was pending on appeal from mid-1986 to August 31, 1989, when the judgment was affirmed by the Court of Appeal in an unpublished opinion. (Security Pacific National Bank v. Williams (Aug. 31, 1989) D004365).) On January 9, 1990, the appellate court issued its remittitur. On January 22, 1990, Patrick Frega filed in the trial court a motion for attorney fees and costs on appeal. The motion was scheduled to be heard on February 27, 1990, in petitioner's courtroom. In late January 1990, Security Pacific paid the judgment in full, including interest, in a total amount exceeding $7 million. On January 29, 1990, Frega signed an acknowledgment of satisfaction of judgment in full, as well as a waiver of attorney fees, and caused to be removed from the trial calendar the motion for fees and costs.

From 1989 through 1991, petitioner engaged in five business transactions with Williams and his dealership, involving the purchase and repair of automobiles. Four of these five transactions also involved Attorney Frega.

We shall consider the charges that were upheld by the Commission as framed in the four counts set forth in the notice of formal proceedings,[10] first reciting the specific allegations and then reviewing the evidence presented before the special masters, the findings and conclusions of the special masters, and the findings and conclusions of the Commission.

Count 1: Count 1 alleges that petitioner and members of his family received gifts and financial benefits from Williams, including discounts and favorable prices for the purchase of automobiles and for repairs. Count 1 sets forth seven separate incidents, including five automobile-related transactions, a celebration dinner, and the gift of a sweater.

(A) The purchase of the 1986 Mercedes.

Subcount (a) alleges that in early 1989, while the Security Pacific case remained pending on appeal, petitioner personally contacted Williams, requesting that the car dealer search for a used Mercedes automobile for petitioner's wife. Williams sold a 1986 Mercedes 300E to petitioner in March 1989, personally setting the sales price at $20,537, an amount that allegedly appeared to be favorable to petitioner.

The record reflects that in 1989, approximately three years following entry of judgment in the Security Pacific case, but while the case remained pending on appeal, petitioner contacted Williams, indicating that he was looking for a used automobile for his wife. At the time, petitioner had no personal or other relationship with the car dealer, other than having seen him on occasion at social events. In his answer to the formal notice, petitioner explained his motive in contacting this particular car dealer: "I contacted Mr. Williams because I did not want to deal with used car salesmen who would try to hassle or negotiate a price. I simply indicated to Mr. Williams . . . that I expected to pay fair value for it." Williams testified that petitioner told him that he did not want any "special deal" and that Williams should "make money" on the transaction. Williams thereafter delivered to petitioner a used Mercedes 300 E, bearing approximately 57,000 miles, that had been traded in to the dealership. At the time, petitioner did not inquire regarding the purchase price. Petitioner later telephoned Williams to inform him that his wife was pleased with the Mercedes and asked Williams to inform him as to the amount that he owed. Williams personally set the base sales price at $20,537. Petitioner paid the total purchase price of $22,532.15, without further inquiry or negotiation, and without investigating the prices of comparable vehicles or otherwise attempting to determine the fair market value of the Mercedes. He indicated to Williams that he would rely upon the auto dealer's professional judgment "if you think it's a good car and a good deal."

Expert testimony was presented regarding the fair market value of the Mercedes, establishing that used automobile prices are determined by a number of factors, including the "Kelly Bluebook" value, the type of dealership, the mileage and condition of the vehicle, and the profit margin for the dealership. The examiners presented evidence that the sales price of $20,537 was approximately $5,000 below market value. The testimony of the former Mercedes owner, however, among other evidence, indicated that as a result of the terms of the sale of a new vehicle to the former Mercedes owner, the actual cost of the Mercedes to Williams was $18,000. At this cost, after servicing the vehicle prior to sale, the dealership realized a total profit in the range of $2,000, an amount in excess of the average profit realized on a retail used-automobile sale for the dealership.

The special masters found that Williams did not confer any special benefit upon petitioner with respect to the purchase price charged for the Mercedes. In this regard, the special masters found that the amount of profit realized by Williams on the transaction was critical to the determination of whether he gave petitioner a "good deal," and that even the examiners acknowledged that a profit in excess of $2,000 would be commercially reasonable. For these reasons, the masters concluded that the price set by Williams was not unduly favorable. The masters nevertheless concluded that petitioner's actions in engaging in a business relationship with Williams—after rendering an enormous judgment in favor of this litigant—undermined public confidence in the judiciary, because a person aware of the circumstances of the transaction reasonably might entertain a doubt as to whether it was "tilted in [petitioner's] favor by reason of the decision he had made."

The Commission found that petitioner initiated the Mercedes transaction with Williams with the expectation of receiving favorable treatment, and that petitioner purchased the Mercedes on terms more favorable than those normally made available to members of the general public. In this regard, the Commission found, contrary to the finding of the special masters, that the amount of profit realized by Williams on the transaction was not determinative of whether petitioner was charged a favorable price by the automobile dealer.

The Commission concluded it was improper for petitioner to engage in a business transaction with Williams after awarding him a multimillion dollar judgment in a court trial, and while the case remained pending on appeal with jurisdiction reserved by petitioner for the determination of attorney fees and costs on appeal. The Commission concluded petitioner's actions were contrary to canons 2A and 4D(5) of the Code of Judicial Conduct and characterized this misconduct as an abhorrent disregard for the integrity of the judicial office that was harmful to public confidence in the judiciary. The Commission unanimously concluded petitioner's actions constituted prejudicial conduct.

We conclude the record does not contain clear and convincing evidence that petitioner initiated the transaction with the expectation of receiving a financial favor. Petitioner's explanation for contacting Williams rather than some other used automobile dealer (he did not wish "to deal with used car salesmen who would try to hassle or negotiate a price") is plausible and supported by the testimony of Williams that petitioner affirmatively stated he did not seek any "special deal."

We also agree with the finding of the special masters that the record fails to provide clear and convincing evidence that petitioner paid a price for the purchase of the Mercedes that was unduly favorable to him and that would not have been offered to members of the public. The Commission's expert testimony that the purchase price was approximately $5,000 below market value was controverted in part by expert testimony presented by petitioner, establishing that when a used Mercedes is traded to a non-Mercedes dealership, the dealership generally will seek to wholesale the vehicle as quickly as possible, rather than sell it to the general public, in order to recover immediately the dealer's cash investment.

(7) Regardless whether petitioner received a discount or other financial benefit, however, the foregoing circumstances establish that petitioner initiated a business transaction with, and actively solicited the assistance of,

Williams, a litigant in favor of whom petitioner had rendered an exceedingly large monetary judgment and, even more significantly, whose interests remained before petitioner while the case was pending on appeal. The nature of the transaction also is significant—the sale by an automobile dealership of a used vehicle, generally providing leeway for bargaining and flexibility in setting the purchase price. In so acting, petitioner violated the general proscription against conduct giving rise to the appearance of impropriety (former canon 2), including extrajudicial activities that may cast reasonable doubt upon the individual's capacity to act impartially as a judge, and business dealings that reasonably may be perceived as exploiting the judge's position (see former canon 5(C)). To an objective observer of the transaction, petitioner would appear to have been seeking to use his office to collect for past deeds, and to procure a benefit for himself. Both the size of the purchase, and the flexibility of the pricing in particular, likely would render the transaction questionable from the perspective of an objective observer. Petitioner's actions would have placed in doubt his ability to act with integrity, independence, and impartiality. We therefore uphold the charge of prejudicial conduct set forth in subcount (a).

(B) The celebration dinner and purchase of the Jeep.

Subcount (b) alleges that in approximately February 1990, petitioner attended a dinner hosted by Frega in celebration of the satisfaction (in January 1990) of the judgment in the Security Pacific litigation (a judgment totaling, with accrued interest, in excess of $7 million). The dinner was attended by approximately 25 guests, including Williams, Frega, and members of Frega's law firm. Frega paid for the dinner at a cost of approximately $1,500.

The evidence established that Frega hosted the celebratory dinner at a restaurant. Petitioner and his wife arrived late, stayed approximately 45 minutes, and then departed. While there, they each consumed some food but no alcoholic beverages.

Subcount (b) further alleges that, approximately two months after satisfaction of the judgment, and following his attendance at the celebratory dinner, petitioner contacted Williams, asking the automobile dealer to locate a used vehicle for his daughter. On or about March 22, 1990, Williams delivered a 1988 Jeep Cherokee to petitioner, setting the sales price at $13,500, totalling $14,796.74 with tax and license—an amount that allegedly appeared to be unduly favorable to petitioner. At that time, the sole consideration tendered by petitioner for the Jeep was the trade-in of a 1983

Oldsmobile, reflected on the sales invoice as having a value of $800. On April 16, 1990, petitioner paid an additional $5,000 for the Jeep. On or about June 4, 1990, "Patrick Frega, counselor at law, a professional corporation," issued a check to Williams for $9,796.74, a sum equal to the total sales price of $14,796.74, less the $5,000 paid on April 16. A notation on the check indicated that the payment related to "Williams v. Security Pacific National Bank." By check dated June 7, 1990, petitioner wrote a check to Frega personally in the amount of $5,672.40. The check indicated that it was a "payoff" on the Jeep.

The record reflects that at the time he contacted Williams regarding the Jeep, petitioner told the dealer he could afford to pay approximately $5,000 to $5,500 plus the trade-in value of the 1983 Oldsmobile. Williams testified petitioner emphasized that he did not want "any favors" and that the dealer should "make money" on the transaction. Williams was aware, however, that petitioner was experiencing financial difficulties as a result of the dissolution of his marriage. Approximately two weeks later, Williams delivered a 1988 Jeep Cherokee to petitioner. At the time, petitioner was aware that the value of the vehicle likely exceeded the amount he had indicated to Williams he could afford. He did not raise this issue with Williams or otherwise inquire regarding the purchase price. A few days later, petitioner telephoned Williams to confirm that he would purchase the vehicle.

An invoice for the transaction dated March 22, 1990, was prepared by the dealership, listing the base price of the Jeep at $13,500, with a total sales price of $14,796.74. The invoice reflected a credit in the amount of $800 for the Oldsmobile. On May 7, 1990, the dealership sold the Oldsmobile for $800.

At the time he confirmed he would purchase the Jeep, petitioner was neither presented with a sales invoice nor asked to sign any contract; no arrangements were made with Williams for payment or for financing the purchase, and petitioner was not sent a bill. Apart from the trade-in of the Oldsmobile, petitioner made no payment on the purchase price until April 16, 1990, when he paid the dealership $5,000 that he had borrowed from his father. At that time, petitioner inquired of Williams regarding the balance owed on the purchase price. Williams insisted (incorrectly) that the balance had been satisfied by the trade-in of the Oldsmobile. Petitioner testified that he simply "could not get a number out of [Williams]" but was aware that additional sums were owed.

In late May, petitioner requested that Frega ascertain the balance due on the purchase of the Jeep. A few days later, when Frega reported back that petitioner owed $5,672.40, petitioner wrote a check to Frega personally for that amount. Frega testified he did not inform petitioner of the true balance owed, because Frega was aware of petitioner's financial difficulties as a result of the pending dissolution of petitioner's marriage. Frega therefore made a unilateral decision to "loan" petitioner the approximate $4,000 additional amount owed, with the intention of recovering the loan at a later date, and wrote a check to the dealership in the amount of $9,796.74.

Williams testified that prior to the Jeep purchase transaction he had had a long-standing, ongoing "understanding" with Frega that, with respect to any customer referred by Frega to Williams, if Williams felt that "I [Williams] didn't make enough money or if I was going to get stuck on the hook or if it was maybe the difference between wholesale and retail, that he [Frega] would take care of the difference." At the time of the Jeep transaction, Williams considered petitioner to be a customer referred by Frega and thus covered by this understanding.

The special masters found that in purchasing the Jeep from Williams, petitioner had not been seeking any financial advantage from the dealer, and concluded that petitioner had been unaware of the gift conferred upon him by Frega until after the commencement of the Commission investigation. The special masters concluded, however, that under the circumstances petitioner should have been alerted to the risk that his conduct might have endangered the public esteem in which the judiciary was held, and that his actions therefore amounted to prejudicial conduct.

The Commission found that the total amount paid by petitioner (the $800 value of the Oldsmobile trade-in plus the cash payments of $5,000 and $5,672.40) was below the fair market value of the Jeep. The Commission concluded that it was misconduct for petitioner to engage in the Jeep transaction with Williams in light of the circumstances that petitioner had entered a multimillion dollar judgment in favor of Williams that recently had been paid in full and recently had attended a celebration dinner occasioned by satisfaction of the judgment. Contrary to the finding of the special masters that petitioner had not been seeking any financial advantage, the Commission found that petitioner had initiated this transaction with Williams in the expectation of receiving favorable treatment, and that in fact he received benefits that a member of the general public would not have received, both in the manner in which the transaction was conducted and the price that was charged.

The Commission unanimously concluded that petitioner's actions both with regard to his purchase of the Jeep and his attendance at the celebratory dinner were contrary to current canons 2A and 4D(5) and constituted prejudicial conduct.

(8) Clear and convincing evidence supports the charges of misconduct alleged in subcount (b) of count 1, and we adopt the conclusion of the Commission that petitioner engaged in prejudicial conduct. As with the transaction involving the purchase of the 1986 Mercedes, petitioner's conduct in initiating a transaction with the automobile dealer, in this instance shortly following the payment in full of the substantial judgment in the Security Pacific litigation, violated the proscription of former canons 2 and 5 against conduct giving rise to the appearance of impropriety. Petitioner's testimony that he thought he would be getting a "fair deal" from the dealer (rather than a "special deal") is not inherently incredible, and we defer to the findings of the special masters that petitioner did not initiate the transaction with the expectation of receiving favorable treatment. To a member of the public, however, petitioner's actions, shortly following the euphoria surrounding satisfaction of a multimillion dollar monetary judgment rendered by petitioner in a court trial, readily could be construed as an attempt by petitioner to exploit his judicial office for personal advantage. Although petitioner insisted that he wished to pay fair market value for the Jeep, his insistence could well be viewed as disingenuous under the circumstances, particularly where Williams had delivered the vehicle to him without presenting a sales contract or otherwise setting the purchase price, and did not require immediate payment. Furthermore, the record provides clear and convincing evidence that petitioner received favorable terms in the manner in which the transaction was handled—terms that would not have been afforded to members of the public. He was not required to sign a sales contract, and he made payment on the purchase price on a schedule of his own choice rather than in accordance with the method of payment generally required by the dealership for similar purchase transactions.

Regardless whether petitioner had actual knowledge that he had not paid fair market value for the Jeep, or that Frega had paid the balance owed on the purchase price, petitioner's reliance upon Frega to finalize the transaction strongly suggested impropriety. Frega represented Williams, the litigant in favor of whom petitioner had awarded the multimillion dollar judgment following a court trial, and, pursuant to a contingency fee arrangement, Frega had a 40 percent interest in the amount of the final judgment following affirmance on appeal. Additionally, matters involving the Frega firm frequently came before petitioner. The record establishes that, in placing himself in Frega's hands, petitioner deliberately ignored the strong possibility that Frega ultimately would arrange for petitioner to pay less than fair market value for the Jeep, a favor that Williams already had attempted to confer upon him. Thus petitioner's conduct readily could be construed as an attempt to collect for judicial services rendered in the Security Pacific litigation, and otherwise to use his judicial office to advance his personal interests. To an objective observer, petitioner's integrity and impartiality would appear to have been placed in doubt.

(9) We also adopt the conclusion of the Commission that petitioner's attendance at the dinner given in celebration of the satisfaction of the judgment in the Security Pacific litigation constituted prejudicial conduct. Again, regardless of petitioner's motives, or of whether he was biased or impartial in the judicial proceedings involving the Security Pacific litigation, his attendance at the dinner indisputably gave rise to the appearance of partiality in favor of a litigant and his attorney whose very substantial interests had come before him. Under these circumstances, the dinner could not be characterized as ordinary social hospitality within the meaning of former canon 5C(4)(b).

(C) The Jeep repair.

Subcount (c) alleges that in or about November and December 1991, Williams's dealership performed repairs on petitioner's daughter's Jeep. The dealership discounted by 10 percent the cost of parts and labor, resulting in a balance due of $8,500. On December 9, 1991, petitioner paid Williams $7,000. On that same day, "Patrick Frega, counselor at law, a professional corporation," issued a check to Williams's dealership in the amount of $1,500 toward payment of the bill.

The evidence established that the Jeep had been severely damaged in an accident. Petitioner contacted Williams regarding the cost to repair the vehicle and was informed it would range from $8,000 to $8,500. Petitioner expressed his displeasure with the estimate, indicating it would make more sense economically to scrap the vehicle for salvage value. Williams replied he would investigate the availability of used parts, which would lower the cost of repairs. Williams ultimately directed the preparation of a repair order estimate that would not exceed $8,500.

Frega subsequently informed petitioner that Williams had advised him the repairs could be performed at a cost of $7,000. Because of his earlier conversation with Williams, petitioner assumed Williams had found used parts for the repairs. He telephoned Williams and authorized him to proceed.[11] Williams's dealership sent a bill in the amount of $8,500 to petitioner's former residence, where his ex-wife continued to reside with their children. In December 1991, three weeks after the Jeep was delivered to petitioner's daughter, petitioner paid Williams $7,000. Without petitioner's knowledge, Frega wrote a check to the dealership in the amount of $1,500 for the balance owing.

The special masters found that Williams had billed the cost of repairs at $8,500 but had not sent the bill to petitioner, and that petitioner reasonably believed the cost of repairs was $7,000. The masters further found that the $8,500 bill resulted in a substantial gross profit for Williams, and that even at a charge of $7,000, Williams still would have realized a gross profit of more than $1,700, so that Williams had not conferred any special benefit upon petitioner. The masters further found that prior to the investigation petitioner had not had any knowledge of the $1,500 payment made by Frega. The masters finally concluded, however, that petitioner's actions constituted prejudicial conduct because of the risk of the appearance of impropriety.

The Commission concluded that the Jeep repair transaction was "not handled in the manner that repair transactions involving members of the general public were handled," noting the circumstances that petitioner had not been required to make payment immediately upon delivery of the vehicle, and that Frega had been involved in the transaction. The Commission found that petitioner initiated this transaction with the expectation of receiving favorable treatment, and concluded that it was improper for petitioner to engage in a business transaction with Williams, particularly in view of the circumstance that petitioner was aware that Williams previously had attempted to confer a special favor upon him in connection with the purchase of the Jeep.

The Commission concluded that petitioner's actions with regard to the Jeep repair were contrary to canons 2A and 4D(5), demonstrated a lack of integrity, and constituted prejudicial conduct.

We conclude the record fails to provide clear and convincing evidence that petitioner initiated this transaction with Williams with the expectation of receiving favorable treatment. Petitioner's choice of Williams to perform the repairs was logical in light of the circumstance that Williams's dealership had sold him the Jeep and the urgency of the situation (the Jeep had to be towed from the scene of the accident to a body shop). The record also supports the finding of the special masters that petitioner reasonably believed that the cost of the repairs was $7,000, in light of his previous conversations with Williams.

We also defer to the finding of the special masters that the $7,000 price paid by petitioner was commercially reasonable, in light of the evidence indicating that it resulted in a substantial markup for Williams above cost. A colloquy between petitioner's counsel and Williams at the hearing before the masters is illuminating in this regard: "[Counsel]: How far would you go down on a deal in an ordinary business setting, you know, somebody you didn't know that brings a car in for repair that they've purchased from you, what percentage of mark-up over your cost would you go down to before you'd let them take the deal—the repair somewhere else? [¶] [Williams]: If I got involved, I would let them come down to somewhere in the neighborhood of around 40 percent. [Counsel]: Okay, so you could make 15, $1,800 on a repair like this, rather than lose the deal, you'd take that? [Williams]: Sure." (Italics added.) We also defer to the finding of the special masters that petitioner was truthful in his testimony that he was unaware of Frega's $1,500 contribution toward the repair bill.

(10) As with the Jeep purchase transaction, however, petitioner's reliance upon Frega for the financial arrangements, in view of his relationship with this attorney and the frequency with which Frega's interests came before petitioner, clearly was improper. Regardless whether petitioner had knowledge of Frega's payment, his failure to obtain a bill for the repairs directly from Williams, and his reliance upon Frega to verify the cost, reflect that petitioner turned a blind eye toward the possibility of receiving special treatment, whether from Williams or Frega, or from both men. To an objective observer, petitioner would appear to have been seeking to use his judicial office to advance his personal interests, placing in doubt both his independence and his integrity. We therefore conclude the record supports the charge of prejudicial conduct with regard to this incident.

Subcount (d) alleges that in 1991, Williams's dealership and Frega arranged for a rental car for petitioner's daughter while her Jeep Cherokee was being repaired. In January 1992, Frega paid the $1,063.53 bill for the car rental.

The evidence established that, after petitioner's daughter visited Williams's dealership to discuss the repair of the Jeep, she was transported in a shuttle bus from the dealership to a rental car agency. After the agency informed her that because she "wasn't old enough, that there might be problems" in obtaining a rental car, she returned home (where she resided with her mother, petitioner's ex-wife). She later telephoned petitioner at the courthouse to inform him that she had been unsuccessful in obtaining a vehicle for her use while the Jeep was being repaired. Petitioner telephoned Frega, inquiring whether Williams's dealership had "loaner cars," and Frega responded that they did, advising that he would look into the matter. Frega subsequently arranged for a rental in his name, authorizing use of his American Express card as security for the bill. Petitioner was aware his daughter had been provided with a vehicle for use during the course of the repairs but testified that prior to the investigation he had been unaware of the financial arrangements.

The special masters concluded that petitioner's conduct relating to the automobile rental constituted prejudicial conduct.

The Commission found that petitioner had engaged in misconduct in contacting Frega regarding the rental, and specifically in asking the attorney to intervene under circumstances where a "loaner" previously had been refused to petitioner's daughter. The Commission further found that petitioner had received a special benefit in the manner in which the rental transaction was handled. The Commission concluded that petitioner's actions with regard to the automobile rental were contrary to canons 2A and 4D(5), demonstrated a lack of integrity, and constituted prejudicial conduct.

Clear and convincing evidence supports the Commission's findings, which in turn support the conclusion that petitioner engaged in prejudicial conduct. Regardless whether petitioner had knowledge of the financial arrangements involved in the automobile rental, including Frega's payment of the bill, petitioner's actions in contacting Frega and permitting him to intervene in a transaction involving Williams strongly suggest that petitioner was seeking to use his judicial office to advance his personal interests and those of a family member. Petitioner's conduct also permitted the inference that Frega was in a special position to influence petitioner, another violation of the Canons of Judicial Ethics.

Subcount (e) alleges that in 1991, Williams gave petitioner "a set of wheels" for petitioner's 1981 Mercedes. In May 1991, when Williams's dealership had detail, refinish, and polish work performed on the Mercedes at a cost of $511.82, Frega paid the bill.

The evidence established that in May 1991, shortly before petitioner and his wife left for a one-month vacation abroad, petitioner arranged to leave the 1981 Mercedes at Williams's dealership to have detailing work performed in his absence. He arranged for Frega to meet him at the dealership so that Frega could drive him home. When petitioner and Frega met with the "fleet manager," petitioner advised the manager to contact Frega if any questions arose in his absence regarding the work to be performed. The job was completed at a cost of $511. Without authorization, Williams also had an old set of Mercedes rims placed on the vehicle. The fleet manager instructed the body work department to bill Frega, and a bill for $511 for buffing and polishing was sent to him. Frega paid the bill in July 1991. After the vehicle was delivered to petitioner's residence, petitioner upon his return from vacation noticed the replacement rims. He then telephoned Williams, told him the work was acceptable, and asked him to send a bill. Petitioner, however, never was billed and never paid for any of this work.

The special masters concluded that petitioner's conduct amounted to prejudicial conduct. As with the prior transactions with Williams, the Commission also determined that petitioner had engaged in misconduct, particularly in making no effort to ensure that he received a bill or paid for this work. The Commission concluded that petitioner's actions with regard to this transaction were contrary to canons 2A and 4D(5), demonstrated a lack of integrity, and constituted prejudicial conduct. Clear and convincing evidence, set forth above, supports the findings and conclusions of the Commission, which we adopt as our own.

(F) The gift of a sweater from Williams.

(11) Subcount (f) alleges that in December of 1990 (the year Williams received satisfaction of his multimillion dollar judgment), Williams gave petitioner a gift of a sweater, which petitioner accepted. Petitioner reported the gift of the sweater, valuing it at $150, on his financial disclosure statement.

The special masters concluded that the incident was of de minimis importance and that petitioner's mere failure to return the gift did not amount to prejudicial conduct.

The Commission reached a different conclusion, observing that because the gift was from a litigant in favor of whom petitioner had awarded a multimillion dollar judgment, and was given the same year the judgment was paid (shortly after petitioner attended a dinner in celebration of that payment), petitioner's acceptance of the gift constituted prejudicial conduct.

We agree with the conclusion of the Commission. Although petitioner did not solicit the gift, under the circumstances it was incumbent upon him to return it to Williams in order to avoid any doubt regarding the judge's independence or any appearance of impropriety.

In conclusion, we find that clear and convincing evidence supports the numerous charges of prejudicial conduct set forth in count 1 that were sustained by the Commission.

Count 2: Count 2 alleges that petitioner received gifts from attorneys, including Frega, whose interests had or were likely to come before the judge. In proceedings (including settlement conferences) involving these attorneys, petitioner failed to disqualify himself or make full disclosure on the record of his relationship with these attorneys or their firms, or to obtain a written waiver of disqualification. In particular in cases where petitioner's sole involvement was to preside over settlement conferences, he failed to make adequate disclosure of his relationship with these attorneys or the gifts he had received from them.

We shall address each of the instances of charged misconduct that were sustained by the Commission.

(A) Gifts and favors from Frega.

In 1987, Frega was honored by the San Diego Trial Lawyers Association as "trial lawyer of the year," as a result of his success in the Security Pacific litigation. Frega asked petitioner to present the award to him at an awards dinner. Petitioner was unable to attend the dinner but agreed to take a "rain check." Frega and his wife took petitioner and his wife to the "rain check" dinner (the term alleged in count 2) on July 2, 1987. On his financial statement filed for that year, petitioner reported the value of the dinner at $100.

Count 2 further alleges that petitioner reported accepting a loan of Frega's computer from December 1, 1987, to June 30, 1988, and from November 1, 1989, to December 31, 1990, valuing the loans at $1,300.

Count 2 additionally alleges the monetary gifts and payments made by Frega in connection with the automobile-related transactions that comprise the charges set forth in count 1.

The record reflects that at the "rain check" dinner, petitioner discussed with Frega a novel that petitioner was writing, and the two men agreed informally to collaborate on the novel. At the time of this dinner, the Security Pacific case was pending on appeal, with petitioner having reserved jurisdiction to determine attorney fees and costs on appeal. Additionally, petitioner was acting as the settlement judge in a case involving the Frega firm, and was assigned as judge for all purposes in another case in which Frega's firm represented several of the plaintiffs. Previously, in 1986 and 1987, petitioner had been the settlement judge in a case involving the Frega law firm, in which Frega's clients received in excess of $500,000 in settlement proceeds.

To facilitate the writing of the book, petitioner accepted the loan of Frega's laptop computer, reporting the value of the loan in the financial disclosure statements filed by petitioner for consecutive years.

During the period of the loan of the computer to petitioner, a personal friendship developed between the two men, and six cases in which one or more of the parties were represented by Frega's law firm were pending before petitioner. All six of these actions were settled on terms under which the parties represented by Frega's law firm received substantial, and in some cases multimillion dollar, sums in settlement proceeds.

In 1988, after their personal friendship had developed, petitioner informed Frega that he no longer would preside over any matter in which Frega appeared. Frega paraphrased petitioner as informing him that " 'I've gotten to the point where I don't believe I can hear your cases. So what I'll do is since I've got settlement conferences or cases for your partner, Tiffany, I will hear cases until there's a contested motion or ruling I have to make as to questions of fact, and I will recuse myself.' "

The special masters found that the "rain check" dinner was part of an exchange of social amenities among personal friends and did not amount to misconduct. They found the computer loan amounted to at most "improper action."

(12) The Commission concluded that petitioner's acceptance of the "rain check" dinner, after awarding Frega's client a multimillion dollar judgment that was pending on appeal following a court trial, and while cases handled by Frega's law firm either had come or were likely to come before petitioner, amounted to prejudicial conduct.

The Commission concluded that the computer loan could not properly be characterized as an exchange of social amenities, and that in light of the circumstance that the loan was made while Frega's law firm was handling cases that were pending before petitioner, petitioner's acceptance of the loan constituted prejudicial conduct.

We conclude that petitioner's conduct in accepting the "rain check" dinner and the computer loan constituted improper action. In both instances, petitioner violated the general proscription against a judge's acceptance of gifts under former canon 5C(4). The "rain check" dinner cannot be viewed as ordinary social hospitality within the meaning of former canon 5C(4)(b) where, prior to the dinner, petitioner had had no personal relationship with Frega, and the dinner was occasioned by Frega's having prevailed in a court trial over which petitioner had presided. Simply allowing Frega to "pick up the tab" for a dinner, however, in and of itself, would not have placed in doubt, from the perspective of an objective observer, the independence and impartiality of petitioner, and his acceptance of this favor therefore did not rise to the level of prejudicial conduct. Similarly, because Frega had agreed to collaborate on the writing of petitioner's novel, the computer loan would not have appeared to an objective observer to be a special favor conferred as a result of petitioner's judicial office and thus did not constitute prejudicial conduct.

The Commission made no separate findings or conclusions with regard to the alleged receipt of gifts from Frega in connection with the Jeep purchase, Jeep repairs, car rental, and detailing of the 1981 Mercedes. As indicated previously, we conclude the record lacks clear and convincing evidence that petitioner was aware of Frega's contributions in connection with these transactions, although, as indicated above, petitioner's reliance upon Frega's involvement in the transactions constituted prejudicial conduct.

(13) Count 2 further alleges that in 1985, petitioner was represented in a legal proceeding by the law firm of Ault, Midlam & Deuprey. Petitioner was a personal friend of Tom Ault, a senior partner of the firm. In December 1986, petitioner accepted a legal fee write-off of $600 from the firm, which he reported on his financial disclosure statement. After 1986, members of the law firm appeared before petitioner in numerous cases.

The record reflects that on December 31, 1985, the Ault firm billed petitioner for legal services in the amount of $1,000. Between January 15, 1986, and September 8, 1986, petitioner made monthly payments of $50 toward this account. In December 1986, the Ault law firm wrote off the remaining balance of $600 and informed petitioner of this fact. Petitioner reported the fee write-off on his financial disclosure statement, overvaluing it at $800.

Both the special masters and the Commission concluded that the fee write-off could not be characterized as an exchange of social amenities among friends and that it constituted improper action.

We conclude that petitioner's receipt of a fee write-off in a fairly substantial amount from a law firm that regularly appeared before him constituted prejudicial conduct, violating both the general proscription against a judge's acceptance of gifts from attorneys who are likely, or whose firms are likely, to appear before the judge, and the proscription against conduct permitting the inference of special influence over a judge. To an objective observer, petitioner's conduct would have compromised the independence and integrity of the judiciary.

(C) Gifts and favors from the law firm of Duckor & Spradling.

(14) Count 2 alleges that in October 1989, petitioner accepted the use of a desert resort condominium owned by Michael Duckor, a senior partner of the law firm of Duckor & Spradling, for a three-night stay. Since 1989, members of the Duckor firm have appeared before petitioner in a number of cases, and petitioner regularly has appointed Michael Duckor as a special master.

The evidence established that in approximately June 1989, petitioner began to appoint Duckor as a special master in cases involving construction defects, the attorney having acquired a reputation for exceptional skill in the resolution of these cases. Within a year, Duckor's special master activities comprised 50 percent of his practice. In 1989, approximately two-thirds of his special master activities, and in 1990 approximately 20 percent, resulted from appointment by petitioner.

Duckor testified that in the fall of 1989, he informed petitioner that he had placed his desert resort condominium on the market for sale. The condominium was made available to all prospective buyers free of charge. Petitioner testified that he spent the weekend at the condominium because he and his then fiancée were considering buying such a unit as a "weekend getaway." Ultimately petitioner decided not to purchase the condominium, and he and his fiancee subsequently purchased a resort condominium in Mexico. Duckor later sold his condominium to an unrelated party.

The condominium had a rental value of approximately $100 to $250 per day. Petitioner reported this condominium stay on his financial disclosure statement, listing its value as $220.

Count 2 further alleges that petitioner was a guest of the Duckor firm on a day fishing trip. The evidence established that on two occasions, once in 1989 and again in 1990, petitioner, together with approximately thirty other persons, was a guest on these trips sponsored by the Duckor firm and another firm, during which petitioner did not fish but read books and socialized with other judges and attorneys who were present. Each trip cost the firms approximately $130 per person.

The special masters concluded that petitioner's acceptance of the condominium stay and the fishing trips were exchanges of social hospitality and did not constitute misconduct. The Commission concluded, however, in light of the circumstance of Duckor's appointment as special master by petitioner in construction-defect cases, that petitioner's acceptance of the condominium stay and fishing trips constituted "improper action."

We adopt as our own the conclusion of the Commission that petitioner's use of Duckor's condominium constituted improper action. The California Judges Association Judicial Ethics Committee has declared the acceptance of such a gratuity to be improper: "A judge should decline the use of a boat or vacation home offered by an attorney who appears regularly in the judge's court, because such use would constitute a gift, but the judge may rent the boat or home from the attorney for the reasonable value of its use." (Cal. Judges Assn., Jud. Ethics Com., Judicial Ethics Update (Oct. 1989) p. 2, published in Rothman, Cal. Judicial Conduct Handbook.) This instance of misconduct did not rise to the level of prejudicial conduct, given the circumstance that the condominium was offered free of charge to any member of the public interested in purchasing the resort condominium.

We further conclude that petitioner's participation in the fishing trips constituted prejudicial conduct. Accepting these outings, cosponsored by a law firm whose interests regularly came before petitioner, violated former canon 5C(4)'s general proscription against the acceptance of gifts. The circumstances that these recreational activities were provided by law firms, rather than a bar association or other legal association (whose sponsorship of such an event for the benefit of judges generally would be appropriate) cast doubt upon petitioner's independence. We may assume that law firms do not as a general rule sponsor fishing trips for the benefit of the general public.

(D) Failure to disclose or disqualify.

Count 2 further alleges that in proceedings before petitioner, in which the Frega, Ault, and Duckor firms appeared, petitioner improperly failed to disqualify himself, make adequate disclosure on the record of his relationship with the members of these firms, or obtain a written waiver of disqualification.

Before turning to the findings and conclusions of the special masters and the Commission regarding this allegation, we shall review the rules governing a judge's obligations of disclosure and disqualification.

Code of Civil Procedure section 170.1 provides that a judge shall be disqualified under a variety of circumstances, including (but not limited to) circumstances where (1) the judge has personal knowledge of disputed evidentiary facts concerning the proceeding, (2) the judge has served as a lawyer in the proceeding, (3) the judge has a financial interest in the subject matter of or in a party to the proceeding, (4) the judge, his or her spouse, or a close relative is a party to the proceeding, (5) a lawyer, or a spouse of a lawyer, in the proceeding is the spouse, former spouse, child, sibling, or parent of the judge or the judge's spouse, or (6) "[f]or any reason . . . a person aware of the facts might reasonably entertain a doubt that the judge would be able to be impartial. Bias or prejudice towards a lawyer in the proceeding may be grounds for disqualification."[12] (Code Civ. Proc., § 170.1, subd. (a)(6), italics added.)

Code of Civil Procedure section 170.3 sets forth the procedure to be followed in the situation where a judge determines himself or herself to be disqualified. The judge must not participate further in the proceeding, except as provided in section 170.4, unless his or her disqualification is waived by the parties. (§ 170.3, subd. (a).) Subdivision (b) of section 170.3, setting forth the procedure for waiver, provides in pertinent part: "A judge who determines himself or herself to be disqualified after disclosing the basis for his or her disqualification on the record may ask the parties and their attorneys whether they wish to waive the disqualification . . . . A waiver of disqualification shall recite the basis for the disqualification, and is effective only when signed by all parties and their attorneys and filed in the record." (Code Civ. Proc., § 170.3, subd. (b)(1).) [12]The 1992 version of canon 3E provides that "[a] judge should disqualify himself or herself in a proceeding in which the judge's impartiality might reasonably be questioned, or in a proceeding in which disqualification is required by law." The commentary to this canon explains that the reference to "required by law" pertains to the disqualification provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure.

The prior version of canon 3 pertaining to disqualification (which governed petitioner's obligations of disclosure and disqualification under the circumstances alleged in the formal notice) did not contain the following commentary, which appears in the 1992 version: "A judge should disclose on the record information that the judge believes the parties or their lawyers might consider relevant to the question of disqualification, even if the judge believes there is no actual basis for disqualification."

Even in the event a judge is disqualified in a particular case or proceeding, however, he or she is permitted to perform limited judicial functions, including presiding over settlement conferences (Code Civ. Proc., § 170.4, subd. (a)(6)), without any statutory obligation of disclosure.

The special masters found that between 1985 and 1991, petitioner was assigned the majority of construction-defect cases filed in the San Diego County Superior Court, having established an efficient standard operating procedure for their processing which frequently resulted in their early resolution (usually by means of settlement). These cases generally were handled by a limited number of local attorneys—approximately 150. Petitioner developed an expertise in managing these construction-defect cases and was in great demand as a settlement conference judge. The cases often were complex, involving multiple parties, and it was not uncommon for as many as 50 attorneys to attend a hearing or conference in a single case. As a result, attorneys generally noted their attendance on a sign-in sheet instead of announcing their names orally on the record, and accordingly petitioner frequently was unaware of a particular attorney's affiliation with a specific law firm. The masters expressly found that petitioner acted reasonably in not ascertaining the name and firm association of each attorney in attendance at these mass conferences. The masters also found that the evidence (including the testimony of many of the attorneys who had attended the proceedings before petitioner involving one of the three law firms) reflected there was no indication of any bias or prejudice on the part of petitioner in favor of or against any attorney.

The special masters further found that petitioner's personal relationships with Frega and Ault generally were known among the attorneys who appeared before petitioner, and that he frequently made affirmative reference to these relationships. On occasion, attorneys appearing before petitioner orally waived potential grounds for disqualification. The masters concluded that the disclosures made by petitioner were reasonable under the circumstances, and that petitioner reasonably concluded that persons aware of the facts would not entertain a doubt as to whether he would be impartial in matters that he heard involving the law firms of these attorneys.

The Commission's determination differed substantially from the special masters' assessment of the circumstances of petitioner's limited disclosure and failure to disqualify himself. The Commission concluded that petitioner's relationship with the three attorneys (Frega, Ault, and Duckor) and their law firms, including petitioner's receipt of gifts from them, was such that a person aware of these circumstances reasonably might entertain a doubt as to petitioner's ability to be impartial in presiding over proceedings involving the firms in question. The Commission found that, although in some cases petitioner orally disclosed the nature of his relationship with these firms, such as the Ault firm's representation of petitioner, he did not disclose any of the financial benefits and gifts that he had received, such as the legal-fee write-off, and in no case did he obtain a written waiver of disqualification. In cases in which petitioner's sole involvement was presiding over settlement conferences, the Commission concluded that petitioner failed to make adequate disclosure of his relationship with the attorneys and their law firms and the gifts he had received from them. The Commission identified specific cases involving the three law firms and concluded that petitioner's failings with regard to his obligations of disclosure and disqualification in these cases constituted improper action.[13]

(16) As we have explained, the fact of petitioner's disqualification in a particular matter did not preclude his presiding over settlement conferences (§ 170.4, subd. (a)(6)), and the record reflects that in the majority of the cases involving the Frega and Ault firms that were identified by the Commission, petitioner's role appears to have been limited generally to conducting or coordinating settlement conferences or the consummation of settlement agreements. As explained above, the Code of Civil Procedure does not provide for any specific obligation of on-the-record disclosure under circumstances in which the judge performs one of the limited functions permitted of a disqualified judge.

The Commission urges that, when the ground for disqualification is a judge's receipt of gifts from one of the parties or their attorney, a judge's failure to disclose the ground for disqualification, even when conducting a limited function permitted under Code of Civil Procedure section 170.4, such as presiding over a settlement conference, is inconsistent with the requirement of canon 2A that judges at all times "promote[] public confidence in the integrity and impartiality of the judiciary." The Commission accordingly proposes that a judge's receipt of gifts from an attorney necessitates the judge's on-the-record disclosure of that circumstance in all instances in which that attorney or his or her law firm appears before the judge.

In the absence of any specific statutory requirement or canon governing a judge's obligation of disclosure under these circumstances, however, we conclude that such a prophylactic requirement of disclosure more appropriately should be promulgated by the adoption of a statutory enactment or a specific canon of ethics. Although the commentary to the 1992 version of canon 3E recommends that a judge disclose information that the parties or their attorneys might consider relevant to the issue of disqualification (even if the judge believes there are no actual grounds for disqualification or other circumstances precluding the judge from proceeding in the particular matter) (see fn. 12, ante), that particular permutation of the duty of disclosure was not in effect at the time of petitioner's alleged omissions in the present case, and we decline to hold petitioner to a standard beyond the general proscription against conduct creating the appearance of impropriety under canon 2.

(15b) We conclude, with respect to matters as to which petitioner's role was solely to preside over settlement conferences or settlement-related matters, that petitioner's failure to disclose on the record his relationship with the three firms did not constitute improper action under the Code of Civil Procedure or the Code of Judicial Conduct. Under different circumstances, a judge's relationship with an attorney or law firm might be such that his or her role in presiding over a settlement conference might create an appearance of impropriety. We defer to the findings of the special masters in this regard, however, concluding that the record lacks clear and convincing evidence of circumstances giving rise to an appearance of impropriety on petitioner's part in settlement-related proceedings.

With respect to cases in which petitioner acted in a capacity other than as settlement judge, the circumstance of his disqualification necessitated that he disclose on the record the grounds for his disqualification and obtain a written waiver of disqualification in accordance with Code of Civil Procedure section 170.3 before proceeding. Because the record reflects that in certain cases, involving the Frega, Ault, and Duckor law firms, petitioner's role exceeded the scope of presiding over settlement-related matters or of performing other limited permissible functions, we conclude that his failure to disclose on the record in general terms the nature of his relationship with the three firms (or to obtain a written waiver of disqualification) violated the requirements of section 170.3 and therefore constituted improper action.

Count 3: Count 3 alleged that petitioner provided legal advice to Frega and members of Frega's law firm on cases being handled by that firm, in a manner that failed to promote public confidence in the integrity and impartiality of the judiciary, in the following alleged instances:

(i) In late 1988 or January 1989, petitioner assisted George Manning, an associate of Frega's firm, in the preparation of a settlement conference brief in an action that was pending in the San Diego County Superior Court.

(ii) In 1989, petitioner again assisted Manning in the preparation of a settlement conference brief in an action that was pending in the San Diego Superior Court.

(iii) In 1989, petitioner met with Frega to discuss a case that was pending in the San Diego County Superior Court in which Frega's firm represented the plaintiff. Petitioner provided advice with regard to a contemplated "Tarasoff motion" (Tarasoff v. Regents of University of California (1976) 17 Cal.3d 425 [131 Cal.Rptr. 14, 551 P.2d 334, 83 A.L.R.3d 1166], involving the special relationship between doctor and patient giving rise to a duty to warn foreseeable victims) prepared by the Frega firm, which subsequently was filed.

(iv) Between February 1988 and April 1988 (while the Security Pacific National Bank v. Williams litigation was pending on appeal), petitioner communicated with Frega regarding a case entitled Security Pacific National Bank v. Gustafson that was pending in the Los Angeles County Superior Court, involving the same plaintiff and cross-defendant—and similar issues relating to lender liability—as in the Security Pacific National Bank v. Williams case, which then was pending on appeal. At Frega's request, petitioner reviewed and provided his opinion regarding a special verdict rendered in that case.

The record reflects, with respect to subcounts (i) and (ii), that petitioner and Manning were close friends. Petitioner had assisted Manning in obtaining employment with the Frega firm, and petitioner was concerned about Manning's diminishing confidence and difficulties in his relationship with Frega. Motivated by this concern, petitioner assisted Manning in the preparation of settlement conference briefs in two cases, in one case drafting an "issue analysis" that Manning incorporated almost verbatim into a brief.

With respect to subcount (iii), the record reflects the Frega firm represented the plaintiff in a medical malpractice case that had been assigned to Manning and another associate in the firm, Paula Tupper. In 1989, petitioner discussed the case with Manning, suggesting the filing of a "Tarasoff in limine motion." Manning related his discussion with petitioner to Tupper, who already had considered filing such a motion, independently of petitioner's suggestion. Petitioner reviewed the written motion drafted by Tupper, commenting that she had "done a good job."

With respect to subcount (iv), the record reflects petitioner communicated with Frega regarding the Gustafson case and asked Frega to send him a copy of the special verdict rendered in that case. Petitioner later volunteered to Frega his view that it appeared Frega had lost the case.

The special masters concluded the evidence failed to sustain the charges of misconduct alleged in count 3. The masters found that in assisting Manning, petitioner simply was acting out of a compassionate concern for a friend, attempting to bolster Manning's confidence in himself as a lawyer and his ability to try cases effectively. With respect to petitioner's communications with Frega, the masters concluded that, in the absence of clear and convincing evidence that petitioner had discussed any of the legal issues presented in the cases, neither wilful misconduct nor prejudicial conduct was shown.

(17) The Commission reached a significantly different assessment of petitioner's conduct, concluding that petitioner engaged in misconduct as charged in count 3, having improperly assisted and communicated with Frega and members of his firm in pending cases, contrary to canon 2A. The Commission found that petitioner's active participation in the preparation of settlement conference briefs in cases that were to come before another member of the court upon which petitioner served, demonstrated a disregard for the integrity of the bench and constituted prejudicial conduct. The Commission further concluded that petitioner's review and approval of a Tarasoff motion in another case that was to come before one of petitioner's judicial colleagues amounted to egregious misconduct, demonstrating a disregard for the integrity of the bench, and constituted prejudicial conduct. The Commission finally concluded that petitioner's conduct in soliciting a copy of the special verdict in the Security Pacific National Bank v. Gustafson case and volunteering his opinion that Frega appeared to have lost the case, at a time when the case of Security Pacific National Bank v. Williams—which involved one of the same attorneys, the same plaintiff and cross-defendant, and issues similar to those in the Gustafson case—remained pending on appeal, amounted to prejudicial conduct.

We conclude that clear and convincing evidence establishes four instances of prejudicial conduct, as charged in count 3. Motive aside, in assisting Manning in the preparation of settlement conference briefs, and discussing with Frega or members of his firm the Tarasoff motion, petitioner violated the canons of judicial ethics that proscribe conduct giving rise to the appearance of a party's special influence over a judge, or the judge's bias against or prejudice in favor of an attorney. From the perspective of an objective observer, and particularly from the viewpoint of opposing counsel in these cases, petitioner's conduct could be construed as relating information known or peculiarly available to members of the San Diego County Superior Court bench that was not known or made available to other attorneys. Petitioner's act of soliciting the special verdict in the Security Pacific National Bank v. Gustafson case, and providing his view as to its significance, cast doubt upon his independence and impartiality with respect to the Security Pacific National Bank v. Williams litigation, which remained pending on appeal, particularly from the perspective of opposing counsel in that case.

Count 4: Count 4 alleges that, in response to inquiries by the Commission regarding complaints of misconduct, petitioner made material omissions and misrepresentations and demonstrated a lack of candor, as follows:

(i) In the course of its investigation, the Commission inquired of petitioner by letter dated October 18, 1991, regarding the gift (which the judge had declared) of the $150 sweater received from Williams (discussed, ante), asking him to comment and supply information "regarding any appearances before [petitioner] by any of the donors [of gifts], or any attorney or entity associated with a donor, since January 1, 1985." Petitioner was directed to "[p]lease describe any appearance by a donor or associate, and indicate whether you have taken any legal action affecting a donor or associate, or whether you have recused yourself from a case involving a donor or associate." Petitioner responded by letter that the sweater "was a Christmas gift from Williams who is a personal friend and has no business before me." Petitioner failed to disclose that Williams had been a litigant who had appeared before petitioner in 1985 and 1986, and in favor of whom petitioner had awarded a judgment of approximately $5 million following a court trial.

(ii) The Commission inquired by letter dated October 18, 1991, regarding petitioner's declaration of a gift of legal services by the law firm of Ault, Midlam & Deuprey, requesting information regarding any appearances by that law firm in cases before petitioner. Petitioner responded by letter dated November 1, 1991: "Because of our friendship, Tom Ault has never appeared in front of me," failing to disclose that members of the law firm had appeared before petitioner on several occasions since January 1, 1985.

(iii) The Commission inquired by letter dated October 18, 1991, regarding declared gifts from Frega, requesting information as to any appearances by Frega or other members of Frega's law firm in cases before petitioner. Petitioner responded that "Pat Frega does not appear in front of me and I will not hear one of his cases." He also stated, "I will not hear a Frega case." In a follow-up letter, the Commission inquired whether Frega had appeared before petitioner prior to giving him the gifts. Petitioner falsely responded that "Mr. Frega last appeared before me in 1984." Petitioner failed to identify numerous cases involving Frega or his firm that had come before petitioner since 1984, including the Security Pacific National Bank v. Williams litigation.

(iv) The Commission inquired by letter dated October 18, 1991, regarding petitioner's declared stay at Duckor's desert condominium. Petitioner responded: "I recuse myself from all Duckor matters although the court uses him as a special master in cases involving construction defects." He failed to disclose that the Duckor & Spradley firm had appeared before him in three cases.

Both the special masters and the Commission determined that petitioner was acting in a judicial capacity in responding to the inquiries of the Commission. The special masters concluded that in his responses petitioner, although demonstrating a lack of candor, had not acted in bad faith, and that in each instance petitioner had committed "negligent" prejudicial conduct, but not wilful misconduct.

(18) The Commission, however, reached a different assessment of petitioner's dereliction, concluding that on each occasion petitioner demonstrated bad faith because in his responses he made material omissions that he knew or should have known were "beyond his authority," and for a purpose other than the faithful discharge of his judicial duties. The Commission concluded that in each instance petitioner engaged in wilful misconduct.

With respect to petitioner's response set forth in subcount (i), the Commission specifically found that petitioner's explanation that he believed the Security Pacific National Bank v. Williams trial to have taken place in 1984 was inherently incredible. The case was a "cause celebre" that received widespread press coverage and involved the largest nonjury award that petitioner had entered up to that time. Petitioner's "Trial Judge of the Year" award from the San Diego Trial Lawyers Association in 1986 was the result of petitioner's role in that litigation. The Commission concluded that petitioner's omission in this regard was material.

With respect to petitioner's response set forth in subcount (ii), the Commission concluded that, at the time he submitted his written reply, petitioner must have known that the import of the Commission's inquiry called for him to disclose that the Ault firm had appeared before him in several cases. By his reply, petitioner demonstrated a lack of candor.

With respect to petitioner's response set forth in subcount (iii), the Commission concluded that it was unreasonable for petitioner to assume he was obligated to disclose only those instances in which Frega personally appeared before him, and not instances in which a member of Frega's firm regularly appeared before him. At the time petitioner submitted his written reply, he knew that the import of the Commission's inquiry required that he disclose all responsive material information and at the least that the Frega firm had appeared before him in several matters, including the Security Pacific National Bank v. Williams case.

Similarly, with respect to petitioner's response set forth in subcount (iv), the Commission found that at the time he submitted his written reply, petitioner must have been aware that the import of the Commission's inquiry called for him to disclose that the Duckor & Spradley firm had appeared before him in several cases.

We agree with the conclusion of the Commission that in each instance, in responding to the Commission's inquiries, petitioner was acting in a judicial capacity. The Commission's inquiry was directed to petitioner because he is a judge, and his reply was required as one of his judicial functions. We also agree that in each instance petitioner's conduct demonstrated bad faith, as defined, ante. Petitioner either knew or should have known that his responses were either inaccurate or incomplete. Although it may not be expected that petitioner would be able to identify the name of every case involving the three law firms that had come before him since 1985, petitioner reasonably should have been expected to disclose that the firms had appeared before him since January 1, 1985, and to identify at least some of their cases in some fashion. Petitioner's act of providing false and misleading information to the Commission—the governmental entity charged with the protection of the public from judicial corruption—obviously was made for a purpose other than the faithful discharge of his duties. We therefore uphold the charges of wilful misconduct in count 4 that were sustained by the Commission.

Petitioner presented substantial evidence in mitigation of the charges, relating to his competence, diligence, and dedication in the performance of his judicial functions over the course of his judicial career. When appointed to the municipal court, petitioner devoted significant time and effort to the "El Cajon Experiment," a project authorizing municipal court judges to perform certain functions of a superior court in the El Cajon Municipal Court facility. When appointed to the superior court in 1979, for several years petitioner was assigned to the juvenile department, where he participated in establishing programs providing juveniles with an alternative to placement in the California Youth Authority, and activities diverting them from involvement in delinquency. In 1987, petitioner began to devote his efforts to the management of construction-defect cases, which comprised a significant portion of the matters pending in the San Diego County Superior Court. This type of litigation often was complex, involving numerous parties and attorneys, extensive discovery, and other pretrial procedures. Petitioner developed a standard operating procedure for the management of these cases, and by 1988 was considered by counsel to be the "judge of choice" for assignment of such matters.

Several judges and numerous attorneys testified to their perception of petitioner's outstanding legal and administrative skills, noting his significant contributions toward streamlining the court system and implementing a "fast-track" system.

Finally, petitioner testified before the special masters that, although at the time of the various instances of misconduct it was his perception that he had not sought out, and had not received, any special favors or benefits by reason of his judicial office, he ultimately has recognized that his conduct might have created an appearance of impropriety, damaging the prestige of his judicial office, further recognizing that therefore he had acted improperly. Petitioner's testimony further emphasized that, in hindsight, his personal relationship with Frega and his social relationship with Williams were inappropriate and inconsistent with the standards of conduct called for by his judicial office, and that he "had learned his lesson."

career, does not mitigate or excuse petitioner's wilful misconduct or prejudicial conduct. (Spruance v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 13 Cal.3d 778, 800.) We may, however, and do take these factors into account in considering the totality of the circumstances that are pertinent to our determination of the appropriate discipline. (See McCartney v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications (1974) 12 Cal.3d 512, 539-540 [116 Cal.Rptr. 260, 526 P.2d 268].)

VI

The special masters found that, although petitioner had failed to appreciate the possible perception by the public of his business and social dealings, there was no evidence that petitioner's rulings or other actions executed in the exercise of his judicial duties were based upon any criteria other than the merits of the matters before him. In the course of the testimony of 57 witnesses,[14] in addition to the other evidence presented, there was no suggestion that petitioner had demonstrated any improper bias or prejudice in favor of or against any attorney or litigant. Without rendering a specific disciplinary recommendation, the masters noted their view of petitioner "as an unusually competent and innovative judge who used poor judgment in certain instances, rather than as a scoundrel who has disgraced the Bench."

In rendering its disciplinary recommendation of removal, the Commission noted specifically that it had taken into account petitioner's generally successful tenure as a judge, but emphasized that the charged misconduct began in 1987 and continued for a significant portion of petitioner's judicial career.

In making our independent determination of the appropriate disciplinary sanction, we consider the purpose of a Commission disciplinary proceeding—which is not punishment, but rather the protection of the public, the enforcement of rigorous standards of judicial conduct, and the maintenance of public confidence in the integrity and independence of the judicial system. (Adams I, supra, 8 Cal.4th at p. 637; Kloepfer v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 49 Cal.3d at pp. 864-865.)

In past judicial disciplinary proceedings that have resulted in a judge's removal from office, the misconduct that we have determined justified this most severe of disciplinary sanctions generally has involved a pattern of arbitrary, irrational, and inappropriate conduct of the judge while acting on the bench in dealings with litigants, attorneys, witnesses, and other persons, or while otherwise performing his or her judicial functions, and an abuse of his or her judicial powers and authority. In Kloepfer v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 49 Cal.3d 826, for example, the judge had engaged in persistent rude, abusive, hostile, and irrational behavior in dealings with litigants, attorneys, witnesses, and court personnel, often humiliating or demeaning them in the courtroom setting, and regularly abrogated the rights of criminal defendants, accepting guilty pleas from and sentencing defendants in the absence of defense counsel, and arbitrarily adjudging criminal defendants in contempt. In McCullough v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 49 Cal.3d 186, the judge previously had been censured publicly for failing to decide a case that had been pending before him for six years, and the judge thereafter engaged in misconduct by directing a jury to find a defendant guilty in a criminal proceeding, and conducting the trial of two other defendants in the absence of their attorneys, among other derelictions on the bench. In Spruance v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications, supra, 13 Cal.3d 778, the judge was found to have conducted his court in a bizarre and unjudicial manner, engaging in a pervasive course of acting vindictively toward attorneys who sought to have the judge disqualified or who appealed from his decisions, and to have permitted his business relationships and social friendships improperly to influence his judicial rulings (e.g., according preferential treatment to his longtime friends and political supporters). (See also Cannon v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1975) 14 Cal.3d 678 [122 Cal.Rptr. 778, 537 P.2d 898] [the judge committed 21 acts of wilful misconduct and 8 other acts of prejudicial conduct, including an egregious abuse of the contempt power, often arbitrarily ordering the incarceration of public defenders and thereby depriving their clients of effective assistance of counsel].)

With respect to count 1, we conclude clear and convincing evidence supports the charges that petitioner engaged in seven separate instances of prejudicial conduct in his transactions with Williams (four of which involved Frega), in petitioner's attendance at the celebratory dinner, and in his acceptance of the sweater. As we have indicated, however, the record does not support the allegations that petitioner received any special financial benefit in the Mercedes purchase transaction, or that he initiated any of these transactions with the expectation of receiving favorable treatment. We also conclude the record fails to establish by clear and convincing evidence that petitioner solicited or had any knowledge of Frega's financial contributions in these transactions. His reliance upon Frega, however, manifests negligent if not deliberate ignorance of the likelihood that Frega would confer some financial favor or other special benefit upon him. In all instances, petitioner's conduct could be construed, from the viewpoint of an objective observer, as improperly using his judicial office to advance his personal interests, and permitting the appearance of special influence over the judge.

With respect to count 2, clear and convincing evidence supports two of the charges that petitioner engaged in prejudicial conduct in accepting gifts or financial benefits from attorneys or their law firms whose interests had come and were likely to come before petitioner, and also establishes that petitioner engaged in three separate instances of improper action. Once he was disqualified in any matter involving these attorneys or law firms, to the extent petitioner acted in a capacity other than settlement conference judge his failure to disclose on the record the grounds for disqualification and obtain a written waiver constituted improper action.

With respect to count 3, clear and convincing evidence supports the charges that petitioner engaged in four separate instances of prejudicial conduct in assisting or otherwise communicating with members of Frega's firm regarding matters pending before the San Diego County Superior Court, as well as a matter before another court involving parties, attorneys, and issues related to those involved in the Security Pacific National Bank v. Williams litigation.

Finally, with respect to count 4, clear and convincing evidence supports the charges that petitioner engaged in four separate instances of wilful misconduct in making material misstatements or omissions to the Commission. These sustained charges, in particular, warrant petitioner's removal from office. There are few judicial actions in our view that provide greater justification for removal from office than the action of a judge in deliberately providing false information to the Commission in the course of its investigation into charges of wilful misconduct on the part of the judge.

The record accordingly establishes that petitioner engaged in successive extrajudicial transactions that extended over a significant period of time, creating an appearance of serious impropriety and thereby tending to diminish the public esteem of the judiciary—a consequence petitioner either deliberately ignored or was unable to appreciate. Under these circumstances, we uphold the disciplinary recommendation of the Commission that petitioner be removed from office.

VIII

We order that Judge G. Dennis Adams, judge of the San Diego County Superior Court, be removed from office. He shall, however, if otherwise qualified, be permitted to resume the practice of law (art. VI, § 18, subd. (d)) on condition that he pass the Professional Responsibility Examination. Our order is effective upon finality of this decision in this court.

MOSK, J.—I dissent.

G. Dennis Adams has been a good judge for his 20 years on the bench. Of that there is no doubt. The special masters—three experienced jurists—so found. The underlying evidence was compelling.

"[Judge Adams] attended high school in San Diego and was graduated from the University of San Diego Law School in 1965. He was number two in his class academically, received the highest grade in his classes numerous times, worked on the Law Review, and was designated the outstanding graduate of 1965. In 1983 he received the alumnus of the year award from his law school. After law school he received a Ford Foundation Fellowship Scholarship Stipend in Political Science and went to work for [Senator] Mark Hatfield of Oregon as a speech writer. He then served in the military, worked for a future Attorney General of Oregon and then returned to San Diego to practice law. He practiced as a Federal Public Defender for six months and then joined his father in a law practice for approximately seven years. [Citation.]

"[Judge Adams] was appointed to the San Diego Municipal Court in 1975. While on that court he became heavily involved in the design of courts, spending many hours developing the East County Regional Center and lobbying that project through the Board of Supervisors. Beginning in 1975, [he] also participated in the so-called El Cajon Experiment, which project authorized Municipal Court Judges in El Cajon to perform certain superior court functions, both civil and criminal, in the El Cajon Municipal Court facility. This avoided the apparent necessity of establishing a branch superior court in El Cajon. [He] redrafted a bill to establish this experiment and lobbied it through the California Legislature. This project increased court efficiency in both criminal and civil matters and is still being utilized.

"[Judge Adams] was appointed to the superior court in 1979 and elected and re-elected for successive terms in 1980, 1986, and 1992. After about one year in the domestic relations department, [he] was assigned to juvenile court for several years. There, he became actively involved with legislation and programs to keep children out of the California Youth Authority. One, called 'Children In Placement[,'] involved several hundred volunteers, each assigned to monitor two or three cases for the juvenile court. This program is still operating.

"In a further attempt to help children in the juvenile justice system, [Judge Adams] initiated cooperation between the court and Vision Quest, an organization which works with children, providing them with alternative activities to delinquency involvement. The San Diego Juvenile Court is still using this means of delinquency prevention and rehabilitation.

"[Judge Adams] served in various trial departments until 1987, when he became heavily involved in cases alleging construction defects in residential housing tracts, which comprised a very important part of the case load in San Diego county in ensuing years. These cases involved numerous parties and attorneys, called for extensive discovery and other pretrial procedures, and placed a premium on skillful and diligent case management and settlement efforts. By 1988, he was generally considered the judge of choice by counsel on all sides of construction defect cases, and all such cases were assigned to him for management purposes. . . .

"During his time on the bench, [Judge Adams] has also taught in several law schools. He taught trial technique for five years at the University of San Diego Law School, later taught juvenile law at California Western University, and then constitutional law for five years at National University. He has also taught at a number of Continuing Education of the Bar and Rutter Group programs.

"While we are concerned about [Judge Adams's] behavior in certain respects—especially as to the charge in Count Four regarding his responses to the Commission [on Judicial Performance's] staff, and as to Count One his failure to appreciate, at the time, the possible public interpretation of his engaging in business dealings with an auto dealer [James Williams] and an attorney [Patrick Frega] in whose favor he had previously rendered a huge judgment, we have seen no evidence that his judicial work was based on anything other than the merits of the matters he was handling. We see him as an unusually competent and innovative judge who used poor judgment in certain instances, rather than as a scoundrel who has disgraced the Bench. This proceeding does not involve an evaluation of his total performance as a judge, but to the extent that the evidence from 57 witnesses has touched on that question, it suggests that he might come out well on such a test."

Just as there is no doubt that Judge Adams has been a good judge for his 20 years on the bench, there is also no doubt that he has subjected himself to discipline by certain of his acts and omissions off the bench. Indeed, he concedes the point.

But what discipline is appropriate for Judge Adams? Removal from office? I think not.

In determining appropriate discipline under former subdivision (c) of section 18 of article VI of the California Constitution, which governs the proceedings here, we seek as our "ultimate objective . . . to protect the judicial system and the public which it serves from judges who are unfit to hold office." (McComb v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1977) 19 Cal.3d Spec. Trib. Supp. 1, 9; accord, Wenger v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1981) 29 Cal.3d 615, 654 [175 Cal.Rptr. 420, 630 P.2d 954]; Furey v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1987) 43 Cal.3d 1297, 1320 [240 Cal.Rptr. 859, 743 P.2d 919]; see Kloepfer v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1989) 49 Cal.3d 826, 864-865 [264 Cal.Rptr. 100, 782 P.2d 239, 89 A.L.R.4th 235].)

The discipline that is appropriate for any given judge is the sanction that is necessary to achieve the goal of protecting the public and the judicial system itself. (See Kloepfer v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 49 Cal.3d at p. 865.)

As to Judge Adams, removal is not necessary for that purpose. From all that appears, public censure would be adequate: he has shown himself to be willing and able to reform.

Let us focus on what all apparently agree to be the most serious charges, those contained in count 1 and count 4.

It cannot be denied that Judge Adams deserves discipline for his acts and omissions in count 1. The incidents involving automobile dealer James Williams and Attorney Patrick Frega were several. But, as the majority show, all of them occurred within a period of time that was relatively brief. And, as the majority effectively concede, none of them was tainted by venality.

Neither can it be denied that Judge Adams deserves discipline for his acts and omissions in count 4. His responses to inquiries by the Commission on Judicial Performance were in fact inaccurate and incomplete.

Contrary to the majority's conclusion, however, they did not constitute wilful misconduct.

Wilful misconduct has been defined simply as "unjudicial conduct which a judge acting in his judicial capacity commits in bad faith . . . ." (Geiler v.

Commission on Judicial Qualifications (1973) 10 Cal.3d 270, 284 [110 Cal.Rptr. 201, 515 P.2d 1].)

The majority assert that Judge Adams was "acting in his judicial capacity" when he made his responses. (Geiler v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications, supra, 10 Cal.3d at p. 284.) He was not. A physician is not providing medical services when he participates in an investigation into his conduct by the Medical Board's Division of Medical Quality. Similarly, a judge is not performing judicial functions when he participates in an investigation into his conduct by the commission.

The majority also assert that Judge Adams made his responses "in bad faith." (Geiler v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications, supra, 10 Cal.3d at p. 284.) He did not. The question, of course, goes to his state of mind. The special masters, who saw him testify and heard his testimony, found in his favor. The majority have no basis to do otherwise. They ought to give such a finding "special weight," reflecting as it does the special masters' evaluation of his credibility. (Fitch v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1995) 9 Cal.4th 552, 556 [37 Cal.Rptr.2d 581, 887 P.2d 937].) Instead, they give it no weight at all. Furthermore, they totally ignore the following undisputed fact, which the special masters evidently considered of critical import in this regard. At the time pertinent here, Judge Adams's fiancée, now his wife, was suffering from life-threatening breast cancer, for which she was subjected to various surgical procedures, and she then faced the prospect of life-threatening radiation treatment as therapy against the malignancy. Judge Adams had given himself over to caring for her, and was altogether preoccupied with her condition. Perhaps if these circumstances had not obtained, the majority's claim that he "either knew or should have known that his responses were either inaccurate or incomplete" might be sound. (Maj. opn., ante, at p. 910.) But since they did, their assertion is undermined by common human experience.

As to Judge Adams, as I stated above, removal is not necessary to protect the public and the judicial system itself. Certainly, such a sanction would be sharply out of line with our prior decisions. The majority recognize as much. "In past judicial disciplinary proceedings that have resulted in a judge's removal from office, the misconduct that we have determined justified this most severe of disciplinary sanctions generally has involved a pattern of arbitrary, irrational, and inappropriate conduct of the judge while acting on the bench in dealings with litigants, attorneys, witnesses, and other persons, or while otherwise performing his or her judicial functions, and an abuse of his or her judicial powers and authority." (Maj. opn., ante, at pp. 912-913, italics added.) Judge Adams, obviously, has not engaged in a "pattern of arbitrary, irrational, and inappropriate conduct . . . while . . . performing his . . . judicial functions," nor has he "abuse[d] . . . his . . . judicial powers and authority." Quite the opposite. He has been a good judge for his 20 years on the bench.

All that the majority can say in support of removal is that, in their view, Judge Adams's "extrajudicial transactions" have "creat[ed] an appearance of serious impropriety" and have "thereby tend[ed] to diminish the public esteem of the judiciary . . . ." (Maj. opn., ante, at p. 914.) In so many words, they announce that he must be removed because of certain of his acts and omissions off the bench, even though he has in fact properly performed his judicial functions during his long tenure and, as the record shows, has actually increased his community's confidence in its judges. No reasonable person could agree. I surely cannot.

Because the appropriate discipline for Judge Adams is not removal but public censure, I must, and do, dissent.

Petitioner's application for a rehearing was denied September 14, 1995. Mosk , J., was of the opinion that the application should be granted.

[No. S043789. Oct. 5, 1995.]

GLENDA KRAFT DOAN, a Judge of the Municipal Court, Petitioner, v. COMMISSION ON JUDICIAL PERFORMANCE, Respondent.

SUMMARY

Following a report by special masters appointed by the Supreme Court, the Commission on Judicial Performance recommended, pursuant to Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, former subd. (c), that the court remove a municipal court judge from office for willful misconduct in office, conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute, and persistent failure or inability to perform her duties.

The Supreme Court concluded that the judge should be removed from office, and denied her request for permission to resume the practice of law, since her conduct was found to have involved moral turpitude, dishonesty, and corruption. The court held that the commission properly concluded, on the basis of clear and convincing evidence, that the judge engaged in willful misconduct in a matter relating to a criminal defendant to whom she owed money and in a matter relating to a criminal defendant who was a nephew of a close personal friend. Further, the commission properly concluded, on the basis of clear and convincing evidence, that the judge engaged in conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice in a matter relating to another criminal defendant who was also a nephew of her close personal friend and in a matter relating to the same friend when she was charged with criminal conduct. Similarly, the commission properly concluded that the judge engaged in conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice by failing to report loans obtained from three friends in her annual statements of economic interests as required by Gov. Code, § 87200 et seq., by accepting a loan from a court clerk who was under her practical supervision, by accepting a loan from a lieutenant in the police department who served as the department's court liaison officer, by failing to list all creditors in a bankruptcy petition filed jointly with her husband, and by offering to provide legal services for her friend's husband, who had been convicted of, and imprisoned for, federal felony narcotics trafficking offenses, after the judge had borrowed substantial sums of money from the friend. With respect to conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice, the court held that, although it is sufficient that "actual observers," as opposed to "objective observers," view the conduct in question to be prejudicial, it is not necessary. Moreover, the court held that the commission properly concluded, on the basis of clear and convincing evidence, that the judge persistently failed to perform her duties in a diligent fashion by her habitual tardiness in commencing court sessions. The court also held that the judge was proven by clear and convincing evidence to have engaged in willful misconduct by requesting two friends, during the course of the commission's preliminary investigation of her, not to give their cooperation to its agents, and that the specific request that the friends not discuss loans she had obtained from them was not merely conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice. Finally, the court held that removal of the judge from office was warranted, since it was the only sanction that would guarantee protection of the public and the judicial system. (Opinion by The Court.)

HEADNOTES

Classified to California Digest of Official Reports

(1a-1c) Judges § 6.2—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Grounds—Willful Misconduct.—Willful misconduct such as to warrant discipline of a judge pursuant to Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, former subd. (c), means unjudicial conduct which a judge acting in his or her judicial capacity commits in bad faith. "Bad faith" on the part of a judge entails either an intent, motivated by actual malice, to commit an act that he or she knows or should know is beyond his or her lawful power or an intent to commit an act, even within his or her lawful power, for a corrupt purpose, that is, for any purpose other than the faithful discharge of judicial duties. A view that the "bad faith" required for willful misconduct does not encompass an intent by a judge to commit an act for a corrupt purpose if such act is within his or her lawful power would yield untenable results.

judicial office or willful misconduct out of office, that is, unjudicial conduct committed in bad faith by a judge not then acting in a judicial capacity. Although it is sufficient that "actual observers," as opposed to "objective observers," view the first type of conduct to be prejudicial to the administration of justice, it is not necessary. (Disapproving language in Wenger v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1981) 29 Cal.3d 615, 622-623 [175 Cal.Rptr. 420, 630 P.2d 954]; McCartney v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications (1974) 12 Cal.3d 512, 534 [116 Cal.Rptr. 260, 526 P.2d 268]; Kennick v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1990) 50 Cal.3d 297, 314 [267 Cal.Rptr. 293, 787 P.2d 591]; Gubler v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1984) 37 Cal.3d 27, 46 [207 Cal.Rptr. 171, 688 P.2d 551]; and Roberts v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1983) 33 Cal.3d 739, 748 [190 Cal.Rptr. 910, 661 P.2d 1064] to the extent it suggests that it is necessary that the "actual observers" view the conduct in question to be prejudicial to the administration of justice.)

(3) Judges § 6.2—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Grounds—Persistent Nonperformance of Duties.—Persistent nonperformance of duties such as to warrant discipline of a judge pursuant to Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, former subd. (c), entails a pattern of legal or administrative omissions or inadequacies in the performance of a judge's duties. It does not entail any intentional disregard of such duties.

(4) Judges § 6.2—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Grounds—Misconduct—Judges' Standard of Conduct—As Based on Code of Judicial Conduct.—The question of misconduct such as to warrant discipline of a judge pursuant to Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, former subd. (c), implicates the standard of conduct to which judges are held. That standard is manifested, in part, in the California Code of Judicial Conduct and its canons. Adopted by California judges themselves, the code does not have the force of law or regulation. Nevertheless, its canons reflect a judicial consensus regarding appropriate behavior, and are helpful in giving content to Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, former subd. (c).

(5a, 5b) Judges § 6.4—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Proceedings—Function of Supreme Court.—In determining the ultimate issue whether to remove a judge from office for misconduct under former Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, former subd. (c), the Supreme Court proceeds independently. It is true that the Commission on Judicial Performance has the power to make a recommendation of removal (Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, former subd. (c)), and that its making of such a recommendation is a prerequisite to a subsequent order to that effect on the part of the court. However, it is the court that removes, not the commission, although the court does give special weight to the commission's recommendation. In determining the issues that underlie the removal of a judge from office under Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, former subd. (c), the court also proceeds independently. It may remove a judge only for certain specified kinds of misconduct, and may find such misconduct only if it is proved by clear and convincing evidence, with the burden resting on the examiners for the commission. In this regard, the court itself makes findings of fact and conclusions of law, giving weight to the findings and conclusions of both the special masters and the commission. When they vary, the court favors the conclusions of the commission over those of the special masters due to the commission's expertise in matters of judicial conduct, whereas it favors the findings of the special masters over those of the commission due to the special masters' ability to evaluate the credibility of witnesses. Finally, in deciding whether to impose discipline under Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, former subd. (c), and, if so, what form such discipline should take, the court seeks as its ultimate objective to protect the judicial system and the public which it serves from judges who are unfit to hold office, determining what sanction, if any, is necessary to achieve this goal.

(6a-6c) Judges § 6.2—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Grounds—Willful Misconduct—Personal Involvement in Criminal Case as Advocate for Defendant—Failure to Disqualify Self From Conduct of Bail Review Hearing or to Disclose Relationship With Defendant.—The Commission on Judicial Performance properly concluded, on the basis of clear and convincing evidence, that a judge engaged in willful misconduct within the meaning of Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, former subd. (c), in a matter relating to a criminal defendant to whom she owed money. The judge's cited acts and omissions included: ex parte contacts with the defendant, his wife, and two police officers involved in the defendant's case; personal involvement in the case as an advocate for the defendant in violation of Cal. Code Jud. Conduct, former canon 2B (judges not to allow family, social, or other relationships to influence judicial conduct or judgment); initiation of an "investigation" as to the propriety of an own-recognizance release for the defendant by contacting one of the police officers; questioning both officers as to whether they believed the defendant was guilty; failure to disqualify herself from the defendant's bail review hearing or at least to disclose her pertinent relationships and activities, in spite of her implicit recognition that such action was necessary; and manipulation of the hearing through intentional misstatements and omissions of material fact in order to achieve an own-recognizance release for the defendant. This was more than conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice, since the "bad faith" required for willful misconduct encompasses an intent by a judge to commit an act for a corrupt purpose if such act is within his or her lawful power.

(7) Judges § 6.2—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Grounds—Willful Misconduct—Failure to Disqualify Self From Conduct of Pretrial Conference in Criminal Matter or to Disclose Close Personal Relationship With Defendant's Aunt.—The Commission on Judicial Performance properly concluded, on the basis of clear and convincing evidence, that a judge engaged in willful misconduct within the meaning of Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, former subd. (c), in a matter relating to a criminal defendant whose aunt was a close personal friend. The judge had borrowed substantial sums of money from the friend and, in turn, had done legal work in an effort to free the friend's husband from prison. The judge's cited acts and omissions included: failure to disqualify herself from conducting the defendant's pretrial conference or to disclose her relationship to the defendant's aunt or several discussions they had about the case; and use of the authority of her judicial office to attempt to influence the outcome of the pretrial conference by exerting pressure on the deputy district attorney to reduce the charges for the corrupt purpose of further ingratiating herself with her friend in order to advance their relationship. Although a second judge who heard the defendant's case when the first judge eventually disqualified herself testified that the charges originally brought against the defendant were not appropriate, what was dispositive was not the correctness of the first judge's legal opinion but the impropriety of her surrounding behavior.

(8a-8c) Judges § 6.2—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Grounds—Conduct Prejudicial to Administration of Justice—Failure to Disqualify Self From Conduct of Pretrial Conference in Criminal Matter or to Disclose Close Personal Relationship With Defendant's Aunt.—The Commission on Judicial Performance properly concluded, on the basis of clear and convincing evidence, that a judge engaged in conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice within the meaning of Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, former subd. (c), in a matter relating to a criminal defendant whose aunt was a close personal friend. The judge had borrowed substantial sums of money from the friend and, in turn, had done legal work in an effort to free the friend's husband from prison. The judge's cited acts and omissions included the failure to disqualify herself from conducting the defendant's pretrial conference or at least to disclose her relationship to the defendant's aunt or the discussions they had about the case—an omission that gave rise to the appearance of impropriety. Because the judge's community was small an "objective observer" might not have viewed as prejudicial to the administration of justice the fact that she had a relationship with the defendant's aunt or even engaged in discussions with her about the case. But he or she would have seen matters differently as to the judge's failure to at least disclose the relationship and the discussions. Also, even if "actual observers" among the voters who reelected the judge after the conduct in question did not view her acts and omissions as prejudicial to the administration of justice, they apparently had only limited knowledge of her improprieties. Nor was it necessary to a finding that her conduct was prejudicial that actual observers viewed it as such.

(9) Judges § 6.2—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Grounds —Conduct Prejudicial to Administration of Justice—Giving Assurances to Friend as to Outcome of Criminal Prosecution Against Her.—The Commission on Judicial Performance properly concluded, on the basis of clear and convincing evidence, that a judge engaged in conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice within the meaning of Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, former subd. (c), in a matter relating to a close personal friend who had been charged with criminal conduct. At all times pertinent to the conduct, the friend was providing small loans and meals to the judge and her family. The judge's cited acts and omissions included: the giving of assurances to the friend as to the outcome of the prosecution against her, with an implication of inside information and influence; and an apparent intent to mislead the friend in order to continue to obtain money and food. At the evidentiary hearing before special masters, the judge's testimony was favorable to her position, but that of the friend, her sister-in-law, and another mutual friend was not, and, as against the commission and the special masters, there was no reason to generally believe the judge and disbelieve the others. Further, it was not necessary to a finding that her conduct was prejudicial to the administration of justice that "actual observers" viewed it as such. Also, the judge's assertion that any assurances she may have given to the friend as to the outcome of the prosecution against her proved ineffective in view of the fact that she eventually paid no heed to them but chose to retain counsel was not relevant.

(10) Judges § 6.2—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Grounds —Conduct Prejudicial to Administration of Justice—Violation of Statutory Obligation to Report Loans in Annual Statement of Economic Interests.—The Commission on Judicial Performance properly concluded, on the basis of clear and convincing evidence, that a judge engaged in conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice within the meaning of Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, former subd. (c), by failing to report loans obtained from three friends in her annual statements of economic interests as required by Gov. Code, § 87200 et seq. The judge's cited acts and omissions included the violation of an obligation imposed on her as a public official by statute, which (it appeared) had to be viewed as flagrant and deliberate in light of the fact that she had been publicly reproved for similar acts and omissions in the past. The judge testified that she had failed to disclose one of the loans because she had forgotten to do so, but the failure to report the other loans was intentional. Although one of the loans was in the form of a line of credit, the statutory exception allowing nondisclosure of loans in the form of retail installment or credit card transactions under $10,000 on an account maintained in the creditor's regular course of business was inapplicable, since the judge's debt was not to the holder of such an account, but to her friend. Also inapplicable was the exception for loans from certain close family members, since, although the judge testified at the evidentiary hearing before special masters that her friend was "like a sister," she was not a member of her family. Further, it was not necessary to a finding that the judge's conduct was prejudicial to the administration of justice that "actual observers" viewed it as such.

(11) Judges § 6.2—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Grounds —Conduct Prejudicial to Administration of Justice—Financial Dealings Reasonably Perceived as Exploiting Judicial Position—Acceptance of Loan From Member of Court Staff.—The Commission on Judicial Performance properly concluded, on the basis of clear and convincing evidence, that a judge engaged in conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice within the meaning of Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, former subd. (c), by accepting a loan from a court clerk who was under her practical supervision. Although the loan was "secured" (the judge had written a postdated check in the amount of the loan payable to the clerk), of small amount, and had a short term, the judge had been on notice that she could not properly borrow money from the clerk, since she had been privately admonished for doing so three years earlier. The judge's cited acts and omissions included obtaining a loan from the clerk, a member of the court staff, in violation of Cal. Code Jud. Conduct, canon 4D(1)(a), which counsels judges not to engage in financial and business dealings that may reasonably be perceived as exploiting their judicial position. It was not necessary to a finding that the judge's conduct was prejudicial to the administration of justice that "actual observers" viewed it as such.

(12) Judges § 6.2—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Grounds —Conduct Prejudicial to Administration of Justice—Financial Dealings Involving Frequent Transactions With Persons Likely to Come Before Court—Acceptance of Loan From Police Department's Court Liaison Officer.—The Commission on Judicial Performance properly concluded, on the basis of clear and convincing evidence, that a judge engaged in conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice within the meaning of Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, former subd. (c), by accepting a loan from a lieutenant in the police department who served as the department's court liaison officer. The judge's cited acts and omissions included obtaining a loan from the lieutenant, who routinely presented her with complaints and warrant applications, in violation of Cal. Code Jud. Conduct, canon 4D(1)(b), which counsels judges not to engage in financial and business dealings that involve them in frequent transactions or continuing business relationships with persons likely to come before their court. Although the judge asserted that the loan was made to her family trucking business and not to her personally, and testified as such at the evidentiary hearing before special masters, the lieutenant testified otherwise, and both the special masters and the commission believed the lieutenant. Further, it was not necessary to a finding that the judge's conduct was prejudicial to the administration of justice that "actual observers" viewed it as such.

(13) Judges § 6.2—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Grounds —Conduct Prejudicial to Administration of Justice—Failure to List All Creditors in Bankruptcy Petition.—The Commission on Judicial Performance properly concluded, on the basis of clear and convincing evidence, that a judge engaged in conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice within the meaning of Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, former subd. (c), by failing to list all creditors in a bankruptcy

petition filed jointly with her husband. In supporting declarations, she stated that all creditors had been listed, but, in fact, she knowingly and intentionally omitted various creditors. Although prior to filing the petition, she and her husband had retained a bankruptcy attorney who advised her that she was not required to list all creditors, such as those to whom she owed small amounts of money for household goods and services, she informed him of only one of her unlisted debts, and told some of the unlisted creditors that she would omit or had omitted them because she wanted to make repayment in full. The judge's cited acts and omissions included the filing of her bankruptcy petition with its incomplete list of creditors. She could not reasonably have relied on the advice of the attorney that she was not required to list all creditors because (it appeared) she only informed him of one of the debts in question. The other debts were not for small amounts of money for household goods and services, but were for relatively large sums and/or business expenses. The judge's conduct did not enhance the esteem for the judicial office on the theory that the only way for her to have taken responsibility for the debts in question was to fail to list creditors in her bankruptcy petition, since she need only have reaffirmed.

(14) Judges § 6.2—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Grounds —Persistent Nonperformance of Duties—Habitual Tardiness in Commencing Court Sessions.—The Commission on Judicial Performance properly concluded, on the basis of clear and convincing evidence, that a judge persistently failed to perform her duties in a diligent fashion within the meaning of Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, former subd. (c), as a result of her habitual tardiness in commencing court sessions. On some occasions, she arrived at the courthouse late. On others, she arrived on time but attended to separate matters. On yet others, because she preferred to take the bench only once each session, she simply declined to do so until all parties in all actions were ready to proceed. She inconvenienced attorneys, parties, and witnesses, including law enforcement personnel who had been called away from their normal duties, and led them to express impatience and anger. Further, she was the subject of complaints presented to other judges, the county court executive officer, and the county administrative officer, and received advisements from all four. The judge's cited acts and omissions included her habitual tardiness in commencing court sessions, despite complaints and advisements, in violation of Cal. Code Jud. Conduct, canon 3B(8), which counsels judges to dispose of all judicial matters fairly, promptly, and efficiently, and advises them in its commentary to be punctual in attending court.

(15) Judges § 6.2—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Grounds —Conduct Prejudicial to Administration of Justice—Offering to Provide Legal Services for Convicted Felon.—The Commission on Judicial Performance properly concluded, on the basis of clear and convincing evidence, that a judge engaged in conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice within the meaning of Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, former subd. (c), by offering to provide legal services for her friend's husband, who had been convicted of, and imprisoned for, federal felony narcotics trafficking offenses, after the judge had borrowed substantial sums of money from the friend. The judge's cited acts and omissions included her offer to conduct legal research for her friend's husband. At the evidentiary hearing before special masters, the judge's testimony was favorable to her position, but that of the friend and another mutual friend was not, and, as against the commission and the special masters, there was no reason to generally believe the judge and disbelieve the others. Further, it was not necessary to a finding that her conduct was prejudicial to the administration of justice that "actual observers" viewed it as such.

(16) Judges § 6.2—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Grounds —Willful Misconduct—Refusal to Cooperate With Investigation of Commission on Judicial Performance.—A judge was proved by clear and convincing evidence to have engaged in willful misconduct within the meaning of Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, former subd. (c), by requesting two friends, during the course of a preliminary investigation of the judge by the Commission on Judicial Performance, not to give their cooperation to its agents. Specifically, the judge asked the friends not to discuss loans she had obtained from them with the agents. This constituted willful misconduct, and was not merely conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice. The judge's cited acts and omissions included a refusal to cooperate with, or give reasonable assistance and information to, the commission's agents in the course of the preliminary investigation, in violation of Gov. Code, § 68725. At the evidentiary hearing before special masters, the judge's testimony was favorable to her position, but that of the two friends was not, and, as against the commission and the special masters, there was no reason to generally believe the judge and disbelieve the others.

(17) Judges § 6—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Willful Misconduct, Conduct Prejudicial to Administration of Justice, and Persistent Nonperformance of Duties—Removal From Office as Necessary to Protect Public and Judicial System.—In judicial disciplinary proceedings before the Supreme Court under Cal. Const., art.

VI, § 18, removal of a judge from office for willful misconduct, conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice, and persistent nonperformance of duties, was warranted, since it was the only sanction that would guarantee protection of the public and the judicial system. The Supreme Court's findings of fact and conclusions of law established beyond peradventure that the judge did not possess the integrity and impartiality necessary to carry out the obligations of office, and that she displayed moral turpitude, dishonesty, and corruption. Although she was reelected to office after the conduct in question, the voters apparently had only limited knowledge of her improprieties, and, in any event, it was the court's determination that was dispositive. Further, she did not show herself to be ready, willing, and able to reform under a less severe sanction. Despite two public reprovals and one private admonishment on prior occasions for conduct similar to that which was the subject of the current charges, she continued to engage in the prohibited conduct.

OPINION

THE COURT.—These are formal judicial disciplinary proceedings under section 18 of article VI of the California Constitution. Under former subdivision (c) thereof, the Commission on Judicial Performance (hereafter sometimes the Commission) has recommended that we remove from office Glenda Kraft Doan, a judge of the municipal court, for certain misconduct that "occurr[ed] not more than 6 years prior to the commencement of [her] current term"—specifically, "wilful misconduct in office," "conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute," and "persistent failure or inability to perform [her] duties."[1] Under rule 919(b) of the California Rules of Court, Doan has filed what we have deemed a petition for a writ of review, asking us to reject or modify the Commission's recommendation.[2]

[1]Under present subdivision (d) of section 18 of article VI of the California Constitution, as a general matter the Commission may now itself remove a judge from office and not merely recommend that we do so.

I. BACKGROUND

On January 27, 1994, after a preliminary investigation, the Commission filed a notice of formal proceedings against Doan. The notice recited that, between January 3, 1983, and June 29, 1992, Doan had been a judge of the Justice Court for the Corcoran Judicial District of Kings County, and that since June 29, 1992, she had been a judge of the Municipal Court for the Kings Judicial District of Kings County, Corcoran Division, into which the justice court had been consolidated. It went on to charge her in five counts with wilful misconduct, conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice, and persistent nonperformance of duties, as specified below.

Count one contained allegations to the following effect: in 1993, Doan and her husband, James Doan, owed about $400 to Miguel Meneses, their former gardener, for his services; in a felony action instituted against Meneses relating to conspiracy to possess cocaine for sale, Doan improperly engaged in ex parte contacts, including providing Meneses with legal advice; she failed to disclose her pertinent relationships and activities to the prosecution; she intentionally made a material misstatement of fact designed to mislead the prosecution as to the appropriateness of Meneses' release on his own recognizance; and, by failing to timely disqualify herself from, or at least disclose her pertinent relationships and activities at, a contested bail review hearing that resulted in her release of Meneses on his own recognizance, she failed to act with the impartiality expected of judicial office.

Count two contained allegations to the following effect: Doan engaged in a continuing pattern of failure to report income or loans in the statement of economic interests that she was required to file annually with the Fair Political Practices Commission pursuant to Government Code section 87200 et seq.; in 1989, she had been publicly reproved by the Commission for failing to report income in excess of $75,000; in 1990, she had been privately admonished by the Commission for failing to report loans obtained from Helen Cabell, a member of the court staff; in spite of the foregoing discipline, in 1991, she borrowed $3,000 from Russell Williams, a lieutenant in the Corcoran Police Department and its liaison with her court, insisted that there be no written evidence of the transaction, failed to report the loan, and had not yet made repayment; also in 1991, she borrowed about $10,410 from Hugh Osburn, who frequently appeared in her court for himself and for his business, Western Counties Insurance Brokers, failed to report the loan, and had not yet made repayment.

[2]See Geiler v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications (1973) 10 Cal.3d 270, 275, footnote 5 [110 Cal.Rptr. 201, 515 P.2d 1]: "[W]hen we receive a petition challenging the recommendation of the Commission, we deem it proper to treat it as a petition for a writ of review."

Count three contained allegations to the following effect: Doan improperly exploited her office by engaging in financial dealings with members of the court staff, including obtaining a loan of $740 from Cabell in 1993, purportedly for the benefit of one of her daughters; in addition, she involved herself in continuing business relationships with persons who appeared in her court: she obtained unpaid services, as evidenced by the debt of about $400 to Meneses; she also obtained loans—in 1991, she borrowed $3,000 from Lieutenant Williams and about $10,410 from Osburn; sometime before 1992, she borrowed about $10,000 from Morris Proctor; subsequently, she presided over a sentencing hearing involving Proctor's son; she did not disqualify herself or at least disclose her pertinent relationships and activities; she had not yet made repayment of the loan.

Count four contained allegations to the following effect: Doan failed to act in a manner that promotes confidence in the integrity of the judiciary; on June 29, 1993, she and her husband filed a voluntary petition of bankruptcy; they were required to list all creditors; in supporting declarations executed under penalty of perjury, she stated in substance that they had done so; her statement, however, was deliberately false, in that they had omitted, inter alios, Lieutenant Williams, Osburn, Proctor, and Fabrie Jewelers.

Count five contained allegations to the following effect: because she was habitually tardy in commencing court sessions, Doan persistently failed to perform her duties in a diligent fashion; her habitual tardiness adversely affected those who came into the courtroom and those who served on the court staff; and it continued despite repeated expressions of concern by the county administrative officer, the county court executive officer, another municipal court judge, and representatives of law enforcement agencies.

On March 8, 1994, Doan filed an answer. She denied the charges of wilful misconduct, conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice, and persistent nonperformance of duties.

On July 6, 1994, the Commission filed an amended notice of formal proceedings against Doan. The amended notice recited her judicial tenure as the original had done. It went on to charge her in seven counts with wilful misconduct, conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice, and persistent nonperformance of duties, as specified below.

Count one realleged Doan's acts and omissions, as stated in the same-numbered count of the original notice of formal proceedings, with regard to the Meneses matter. It also contained new allegations to the following effect: in 1992, she borrowed $4,500 for a term of one year without interest from Darlene Jones, who owned a restaurant in Corcoran, and had yet to make repayment except for about $750; subsequently, three events occurred, one involving Darren Powell, a nephew of Darlene, another involving Kenneth Jones, also a nephew, and yet another involving Darlene herself; first, Doan was assigned to preside over a misdemeanor action against Powell relating to resisting arrest and possessing an open container of an alcoholic beverage in a motor vehicle; she learned that Powell was Darlene's nephew; she commented to Darlene that she would "take care of the matter"; at a pretrial conference, she did not disqualify herself or advise any party of her comment to Darlene or her relationship with her as a friend and debtor; she was approached by the prosecutor and defense counsel with a proposal for a negotiated disposition, under which Powell would plead guilty to the resisting-arrest charge, with no jail time, and the People would move to dismiss the open-container charge; she rejected the proposal essentially as unfavorable to Powell; she continued the matter; later Judge Ronald J. Maciel, the judge of the Municipal Court for the Kings Judicial District of Kings County, Lemoore Division, accepted substantially the same proposal; second, she and Darlene were present at Darlene's restaurant one day when they saw Kenneth and a companion, Victoria Gamez, arrested for the misdemeanor of possession of an alcoholic beverage by a minor; Darlene expressed concern about the pair "getting into trouble" with the law; Doan assured her that she would "take care of the matter" and see to it that they would receive at most a sentence of community service, possibly involving an educational program at the California State Prison at Corcoran; she then presided over proceedings in misdemeanor actions against the pair; she subsequently dismissed the action against Gamez, and accepted a guilty plea from Kenneth and admitted him to probation on condition that he complete an educational program at the California State Prison at Corcoran; at no time did she advise the parties of her witnessing of the underlying incident, her relationship with Darlene, or her discussion with Darlene about the matter; third, she learned that a misdemeanor action had been brought against Darlene for obstructing an officer; she discussed the charge with Darlene; she advised her against retaining counsel because she had already spoken with Judge Maciel, who was assigned to the proceedings, and "the matter would be taken care of"; she did in fact speak with Judge Maciel about the case.

Count two realleged Doan's acts and omissions, as stated in the same-numbered count of the original notice of formal proceedings, with regard to her continuing pattern of failure to report income or loans in her annual statement of economic interests, specifically the $3,000 loan from Lieutenant Williams and the $10,410 loan from Osburn, both obtained in 1991 and not yet repaid. It also contained new allegations to the following effect: beginning in 1991, she repeatedly borrowed money from Koma Howard, a resident of Corcoran, and routinely and periodically billed, for the education of the older of her two daughters, a line of credit that Howard had established for herself; by arrangement, she was required to repay Howard in the amount of $200 each month, and in the spring of 1994, had an outstanding balance of $4,107.64; in 1991, she borrowed $9,000 from Daisy Smith, a correctional officer assigned to the California State Prison at Corcoran, and had yet to make repayment; in 1992, she borrowed the sum of $4,500 from Darlene Jones, which she had yet to repay except for about $750, and from time to time in apparently the same period also borrowed small sums of $10 or $20 from her, which she had yet to repay.

Count three realleged Doan's acts and omissions, as stated in the same-numbered count of the original notice of formal proceedings, with regard to her financial dealings and business relationships with Meneses, Cabell, Lieutenant Williams, Osburn, and Proctor.

Count four realleged Doan's acts and omissions, as stated in the same-numbered count of the original notice of formal proceedings, with regard to her failure to list all creditors in her bankruptcy petition, omitting, inter alios, Lieutenant Williams, Osburn, Proctor, and Fabrie Jewelers. It also contained new allegations that she omitted Darlene Jones, Howard, and Smith as well.

Count five realleged Doan's acts and omissions, as stated in the same-numbered count of the original notice of formal proceedings, with regard to her persistent failure to perform her duties in a diligent fashion.

Count six, which was new to the amended notice of formal proceedings, contained allegations to the following effect: at some time after obtaining the $4,500 loan in 1992, Doan informed Darlene Jones that she could not make repayment but would instead "work off" the debt by providing her with legal assistance, specifically, by helping to prepare a petition for writ of habeas corpus on behalf of Darlene's husband, Rodney Jones, who had been convicted of federal felony narcotics trafficking offenses and was incarcerated in a federal correctional institution in Arizona; she indicated her intent not to sign the petition herself, but to have an attorney to do so, because it would be "illegal" for her to sign a pleading in such a matter; she asked for and received legal papers and transcripts pertinent to Rodney's case; in the spring of 1993, she traveled with persons including Darlene to the federal correctional institution in Arizona, identified herself to the authorities there as a judge, and visited Rodney; she repeatedly stated that she would have Rodney "out of prison by Christmas" of 1993.

Count seven, which also was new to the amended notice of formal proceedings, contained allegations to the effect that, during the course of the Commission's preliminary investigation, Doan asked Darlene Jones and Howard, who were material witnesses, not to give their cooperation to its agents, specifically, not to discuss the $4,500 loan she had obtained from Darlene.

Doan did not file an answer to the amended notice of formal proceedings.

On June 14, 1994, at the Commission's request, we appointed three special masters to hear and take evidence in the matter and to report to the Commission. The evidentiary hearing was bifurcated. By the Commission's order under rule 907.2 of the California Rules of Court, it was open to the public on the first four counts of the amended notice of formal proceedings. Pursuant to rule 902(a) of those same rules, it was confidential on the last three.[3] The Commission appeared through its examiners. Doan, who was personally present, appeared through counsel.

On October 7, 1994, the special masters issued their report. Applying the standard of proof by clear and convincing evidence with the burden resting on the examiners, they made extensive, and largely unanimous, findings of fact and conclusions of law.[4] Their findings and conclusions were generally in accord with the allegations of the amended notice of formal proceedings,

[3]Under former subdivision (f)(3) of section 18 of article VI of the California Constitution, the Commission had authority to "open hearings to the public," "in the pursuit of public confidence and the interests of justice, . . . in the event charges involve moral turpitude, dishonesty, or corruption . . . ." On its view that former subdivision (f)(3) might authorize it to open a hearing only as to such charges, the Commission decided to bifurcate the evidentiary hearing in this matter. It determined that the first four counts of the amended notice of formal proceedings involved moral turpitude, dishonesty, or corruption, and hence might be heard in public. It determined that the last three counts either did not or might not, and hence should be heard in confidence. Subsequently, in Adams v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1994) 8 Cal.4th 630, 657-658 [34 Cal.Rptr.2d 641, 882 P.2d 358], we concluded that former subdivision (f)(3) authorized the Commission to open a hearing as to all charges if any one involved moral turpitude, dishonesty, or corruption. Under new subdivision (j) of section 18 of article VI, all hearings "shall be open to the public for all formal proceedings instituted after February 28, 1995."

[4]In this context, as generally, "findings of fact" include the resolution of both pure questions of fact and predominantly factual mixed questions of law and fact, and "conclusions and as such were unfavorable to Doan. They included determinations that she engaged in conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice and persistently failed to perform her duties. One of the special masters would have determined that she committed wilful misconduct in the matters relating to Meneses and Darlene's nephew Darren Powell.[5]

On December 1, 1994, after the examiners and Doan had each filed a statement of objections to the special masters' report, the Commission conducted a hearing, which, like the evidentiary hearing, was open to the public as to the first four counts of the amended notice of formal proceedings and confidential as to the last three.[6] Pursuant to former subdivision (a) of section 8 of article VI of the California Constitution, the Commission then comprised nine members, a majority of whom were judges.[7] The examiners argued and responded to questions. Doan, who was personally present, appeared through counsel, who argued and responded to questions on her behalf.

On December 12, 1994, the Commission issued its decision. Applying the standard of proof by clear and convincing evidence as did the special masters, it made extensive, and largely unanimous, findings of fact and conclusions of law. As a general matter, its findings and conclusions, although more detailed, were substantially similar to the special masters'—except that they were even more in accord with the allegations of the amended notice of formal proceedings, and as such were even more unfavorable to Doan. They included determinations that she engaged in conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice and persistently failed to perform her duties. They also included determinations, like those of the dissenting special master, that she committed wilful misconduct in the matters relating to Meneses and Darlene's nephew Darren Powell.[8] The Commission dismissed the charges in Count Two as to the Osburn debt and the Smith loan, and in Count Three as to the Osburn debt, the Proctor loan, and the Meneses debt, having determined, apparently unanimously, that the underlying allegations had not been proved by clear and convincing evidence. On review of the entire record, it unanimously recommended that we remove Doan from office. Under former subdivision (a) of section 18 of article VI of the California Constitution, she became disqualified from acting as a judge, but without loss of salary, by reason of this recommendation, and has remained so during its pendency.[9]

[7]Pursuant to present subdivision (a) of section 8 of article VI of the California Constitution, the Commission now comprises 11 members, a majority of whom are not judges.

On January 12, 1995, Doan filed the petition with which we are here concerned.

II. THE LAW

Under former subdivision (c) of section 18 of article VI of the California Constitution, we may remove a judge from office only for certain specified kinds of misconduct: (1) "wilful misconduct in office"; (2) "conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute"; (3) "persistent failure or inability to perform the judge's duties"; and (4) "habitual intemperance in the use of intoxicants or drugs."

Pertinent here are three of the four specified kinds of misconduct, to wit, wilful misconduct, conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice, and persistent nonperformance of duties.

(1a) Wilful misconduct was originally defined (Spruance v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications (1975) 13 Cal.3d 778, 795 [119 Cal.Rptr. 841, 532 P.2d 1209]) as "unjudicial conduct which a judge acting in his judicial capacity commits in bad faith" (Geiler v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications, supra, 10 Cal.3d at p. 284). It was subsequently elaborated through a gloss given to one of its phrases: "Bad faith" on the part of a judge entails either an intent, motivated by "actual malice," to commit an act that he knows or should know is beyond his lawful power or an intent to commit an act, even within his lawful power, "for a corrupt purpose, i.e., for any purpose other than the faithful discharge of judicial duties." (Spruance v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications, supra, 13 Cal.3d at pp. 795-796; accord, Cannon v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications (1975) 14 Cal.3d 678, 695 [122 Cal.Rptr. 778, 537 P.2d 898]; Gonzalez v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1983) 33 Cal.3d 359, 365 [188 Cal.Rptr. 880, 657 P.2d 372]; Gubler v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1984) 37 Cal.3d 27, 45-46 [207 Cal.Rptr. 171, 688 P.2d 551]; see Gubler v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 37 Cal.3d at p. 46, fn. 7 [noting in substance that "bad faith" as an intent by a judge to commit an act that he knows or should know is beyond his lawful power must be motivated by "actual malice"]; Furey v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1987) 43 Cal.3d 1297, 1304-1305 [240 Cal.Rptr. 859, 743 P.2d 919] [to similar effect].)

[9]Under present subdivision (a) of section 18 of article VI of the California Constitution, a judge removed from office by the Commission (see fn. 1, ante) becomes disqualified from acting as such, but without loss of salary, by reason of a petition to review the Commission's determination.

(2a) Conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice has been defined as either "conduct which a judge undertakes in good faith but which nevertheless would appear to an objective observer to be not only unjudicial conduct but conduct prejudicial to public esteem for the judicial office" (Geiler v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications, supra, 10 Cal.3d at p. 284) or "wilful misconduct out of office, i.e., unjudicial conduct committed in bad faith by a judge not then acting in a judicial capacity" (id. at p. 284, fn. 11).

(3) Persistent nonperformance of duties entails a pattern of legal or administrative omissions or inadequacies in the performance of a judge's duties. (See McCullough v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1989) 49 Cal.3d 186, 191 [260 Cal.Rptr. 557, 776 P.2d 259].) It does not entail any intentional disregard of such duties. (See Mardikian v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1985) 40 Cal.3d 473, 482 [220 Cal.Rptr. 833, 709 P.2d 852].)

(4) The question of misconduct obviously implicates the standard of conduct to which judges are held. That standard is manifested, in part, in the California Code of Judicial Conduct and its canons. (Adams v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 8 Cal.4th at p. 661.) Adopted by California judges themselves,[10] the code does "not have the force of law or regulation . . . ." (Adams v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 8 Cal.4th at p. 661.) Nevertheless, its canons "reflect a judicial consensus regarding appropriate behavior, and are helpful in giving content to" former subdivision (c) of section 18 of article VI of the California Constitution. (Kloepfer v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1989) 49 Cal.3d 826, 838, fn. 6 [264 Cal.Rptr. 100, 782 P.2d 239, 89 A.L.R.4th 235] accord, Adams v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 8 Cal.4th at pp. 661-662.)

(5a) In determining the ultimate issue whether to remove a judge from office for misconduct under former subdivision (c) of section 18 of article VI of the California Constitution, we proceed independently. (See Spruance v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications, supra, 13 Cal.3d at p. 799, fn. 18.) It is true that the Commission has the power to make a recommendation of removal. (Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, former subd. (c), as amended by initiative Gen. Elec. (Nov. 8, 1988) see, e.g., Geiler v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications, supra, 10 Cal.3d at p. 275.) It is also true that its making of such a recommendation is a prerequisite to a subsequent order to that effect on our part. (E.g., Geiler v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications, supra, 10 Cal.3d at p. 276; see Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, former subd. (c), as amended by initiative, Gen. Elec. (Nov. 8, 1988).) But it is we who remove, not the Commission. (Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, former subd. (c), as amended by initiative, Gen. Elec. (Nov. 8, 1988); see, e.g., Geiler v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications, supra, 10 Cal.3d at p. 276.) This does not mean that we ignore its views. We do not. Rather, in recognition of its "expertise . . . in matters involving judicial conduct," we give "special weight" to its recommendation. (Kloepfer v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 49 Cal.3d at p. 832.)

In determining the issues that underlie the removal of a judge from office under former subdivision (c) of section 18 of article VI of the California Constitution, we also proceed independently. (See Spruance v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications, supra, 13 Cal.3d at p. 799, fn. 18.) As stated, we may remove a judge only for certain specified kinds of misconduct. We may find such misconduct only if it is proved by clear and convincing evidence, with the burden resting on the examiners for the Commission. (E.g., Geiler v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications, supra, 10 Cal.3d at p. 275; see, e.g., Spruance v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications, supra, 13 Cal.3d at pp. 784-785.)[11] In this regard, we ourselves make findings of fact and conclusions of law. (E.g., Geiler v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications, supra, 10 Cal.3d at p. 276; Cannon v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications, supra, 14 Cal.3d at p. 685.) But we do not do so, as it were, in a vacuum. Applying the indicated standard of proof (see Geiler v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications, supra, 10 Cal.3d at pp. 276-277), special masters initially make findings and conclusions (see id. at p. 275). Applying the same standard (ibid.), the Commission, in turn, makes findings and conclusions of its own, unaffected by those of the special masters (ibid.). Generally, we give "weight" to both the findings and conclusions of both the special masters and the Commission. (E.g., Wenger v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1981) 29 Cal.3d 615, 622 [175 Cal.Rptr. 420, 630 P.2d 954].) When they vary, we favor the conclusions of the Commission over those of the special masters "because of its expertise in matters of judicial conduct" (McCullough v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 49 Cal.3d at p. 191; accord, e.g., Adams v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1995) 10 Cal.4th 866, 880 [42 Cal.Rptr.2d 606, 897 P.2d 544]; Kloepfer v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 49 Cal.3d at p. 832), whereas we favor the findings of the special masters over those of the Commission "because of [their] ability to evaluate the credibility of . . . witnesses" (McCullough v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 49 Cal.3d at p. 191; see, e.g., Adams v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 10 Cal.4th at p. 880; Furey v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 43 Cal.3d at p. 1304).[12]

[11]The misconduct in question, of course, must first be charged. (See Kennick v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1990) 50 Cal.3d 297, 315 [267 Cal.Rptr. 293, 787 P.2d 591]; see also Gonzalez v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 33 Cal.3d at p. 365 [holding that it is "the allegations" that must be proved by clear and convincing evidence]; Roberts v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1983) 33 Cal.3d 739, 746 [190 Cal.Rptr. 910, 661 P.2d 1064] [to similar effect].)

Finally, in deciding whether to impose discipline under former subdivision (c) of section 18 of article VI of the California Constitution and, if so, what form such discipline should take, we seek as our "ultimate objective . . . to protect the judicial system and the public which it serves from judges who are unfit to hold office." (McComb v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1977) 19 Cal.3d Spec. Trib. Supp. 1, 9 [138 Cal.Rptr. 459, 564 P.2d 1]; accord, Wenger v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 29 Cal.3d at p. 654; Furey v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 43 Cal.3d at p. 1320; see Kloepfer v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 49 Cal.3d at pp. 864-865 [stating that the "purpose of Commission proceedings is . . . protection of the public, ensuring evenhanded and efficient administration of justice, and the maintenance of public confidence in the integrity of the judicial system"]; Adams v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 10 Cal.4th at p. 912 [to similar effect].) The answer depends on what sanction, if any, is necessary to achieve this goal. (Kloepfer v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 49 Cal.3d at p. 865.)

III. ANALYSIS

The issue that we must resolve is, of course, whether Doan has in fact subjected herself to discipline by her conduct and, if so, what discipline she requires.

[12]Although we proceed independently in determining the underlying issues bearing on the removal of a judge from office under former subdivision (c) of section 18 of article VI of the California Constitution, we are limited in the following regard: we may not find misconduct as to a charge that the Commission has dismissed either because the facts alleged were not proved by clear and convincing evidence or because the facts alleged, even if so proved, did not amount to misconduct under the law. (Spruance v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications, supra, 13 Cal.3d at pp. 784-785, fn. 5; see, e.g., Wenger v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 29 Cal.3d at p. 622.)

A. Prior Discipline

The following three matters were established before the special masters and accepted by the Commission.

In 1989, the Commission publicly reproved Doan for conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice. It stated to the effect that, since January 3, 1983, she had served as a judge of the Justice Court for the Corcoran Judicial District of Kings County; as she was then permitted, she continued to practice law; through 1986, she received from a client payments totaling more than $75,000, which were not given for legal services; she variously described the payments as gifts, loans, and income; before receiving the payments, she did not comply with former rule 5-101 of the Rules of Professional Conduct of the State Bar of California, relating to the avoidance of interests adverse to a client; she did not inform her law firm about the payments; she failed to disclose the payments, as required, in her annual statement of economic interests; because she engaged in the conduct in question off the bench, did not compromise her performance as a judge so far as the evidence disclosed, expressed great remorse, and had a long record of civic service, she was sanctioned only with public reproval.

In 1990, the Commission privately admonished Doan for "improper action[s]" within the meaning of former subdivision (c) of section 18 of article VI of the California Constitution. It stated to the effect that, on at least two occasions, she prevailed on a member of the court staff—stipulated at the evidentiary hearing to be Helen Cabell—to lend her several thousand dollars; although she eventually repaid the loans, she violated former canon 5C(1) of the California Code of Judicial Conduct, which counseled judges, inter alia, to refrain from financial and business dealings that exploit their judicial position; further, she failed to disclose the loans, as required, in her annual statement of economic interests, but appeared to have done so out of negligence and not wilfully.

Also in 1990, the Commission publicly reproved Doan apparently for conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice. It stated to the effect that, in 1988, she was approached in private by an acquaintance and was asked to help obtain the release of a relative who had just been arrested for serious crimes of violence and who was within the exclusive jurisdiction of the superior court because he was under the age of 18; she then telephoned a superior court judge at home, told him she knew the youth's family and considered them "good people," and asked him to release the youth under supervision but without bail; he declined, stating that the request was improper; at a hearing the next day, he disclosed the telephone conversation; she also telephoned a deputy probation officer and requested him to recommend the youth's release pending the hearing; he refused; a day or two later, she encountered him in court and repeated her request; he again refused; in acting as she did, she violated former canon 2B of the California Code of Judicial Conduct, which counseled judges, inter alia, not to lend the prestige of their office to advance the private interest of others; subsequently, in response to a request by the Commission for comment on the matter, she falsely stated that she had not attempted to help gain release for the youth; because she ultimately recognized that she had acted inappropriately and promised that she would not do so again, she was sanctioned only with public reproval.

B. The Present Charges

The question before us here is whether any of the charges against Doan for wilful misconduct, conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice, and persistent nonperformance of duties that were set up in the amended notice of formal proceedings and that survived dismissal by the Commission have been proved by clear and convincing evidence. In giving our answer, we shall proceed count by count.

1. Count One

Count one has four parts, concerning the matters in which Doan involved herself relating to Miguel Meneses, Darlene Jones's nephew Darren Powell, Darlene's nephew Kenneth Jones, and Darlene herself.

a. The Meneses Matter

(6a) The Commission's findings of fact and conclusions of law are set out in material part and with minor modifications below. They are unanimous and, although more detailed, substantially similar to those of the special masters, except as noted.

On March 6, 1993, the Commission's findings begin, Miguel Meneses conducted Miguel's Gardening Service together with his wife, Lydia Meneses. Doan and her husband, James Doan, had been customers. Meneses had dealt primarily with James. Meneses had terminated service to the Doans in 1988. At that time, he was owed $400. He did not take any legal action to collect. On the date in question, he was arrested, in a "reverse sting operation," as a suspected member of a conspiracy to possess cocaine for sale, and was booked into the Corcoran Police Department jail. Sergeant David Frost of the Corcoran Police Department, who was in charge of the narcotics unit, was the supervising officer. Ray Garcia of the same department was the investigating officer. At 7:15 that evening, Doan signed a document entitled "Probable Cause for Warrantless Arrest" as to Meneses for participation in the conspiracy, setting bail according to a schedule.

On the morning of March 7, 1993, which was a Sunday, the Commission's findings continue, Lydia Meneses went to Doan's home, bringing her children. She had received a telephone call from Meneses, who said he was in jail and did not know why; she became distraught. Having little knowledge of legal matters, she went to seek advice and a referral to an attorney. Lydia and Doan were mere acquaintances, not friends. Lydia did not ask Doan to help get Meneses out of jail, and did not ask her about bail proceedings. Doan became concerned about Lydia and her situation. She attempted to reach Officer Garcia at the Corcoran Police Department, but was unsuccessful because he was off duty, and left a request that he call her at home. Receiving the request from the department at 9 a.m., he did so. In the ensuing conversation, she said that Meneses was her gardener, had been around her home, and had earned her trust, and that Lydia was one of her friends; using Meneses' given name, she asked why "Miguel" had been arrested and whether he was surely involved in the underlying transaction; he responded, adding that, on his arrest, Meneses was found in possession of a marked $100 bill that had earlier been used by an undercover agent in making a purchase; three times, she asked his opinion about a release for Meneses on his own recognizance; each time, it appears, he responded that, since the decision belonged to the court, he would take no position, either in support of or in opposition to such a release; he did not say that he gave his consent. She had asked his opinion on criminal matters in the past, although never before had she contacted him when he was off duty. He had expressed his opinion to her in the past, including his objection to a release, and was not afraid to do so. Through Sergeant Manuel Gonzales, she made arrangements for a visit with Meneses in jail—an act that had been uncommon for her in the past. She asked Gonzales whether he thought Meneses was guilty, and told him that she would subsequently disqualify herself from the case. At the jail, Lydia and Meneses met for about 15 minutes in the presence of Gonzales alone. Near the end of the time, Doan came by and informed Lydia she intended to leave. Lydia spoke both English and Spanish, Meneses only Spanish, and Doan only English. Doan told Lydia to advise Meneses that he needed the services of an attorney and that he should not make any statement until he had obtained such services.

On the morning of March 8, 1993, the Commission's findings go on, Sergeant Frost went to Doan's chambers, having heard from Officer Garcia that she might release Meneses on his own recognizance. He stated that he was opposed to such a release. He explained: Meneses was involved with large quantities of cocaine, in the range of one to three kilograms; he had recently made hand-to-hand sales; on his arrest, he was found in possession of the marked $100 bill that had earlier been used by an undercover agent in making a purchase; he was reportedly conducting transactions with youngsters and young adults in the Corcoran area; and his residence had been subject to a search warrant based on his sales activity. Frost also stated that he knew of the business relationship between Meneses and the Doans, and believed that it "would be a problem." She said she had not had any indication that Meneses was involved in such matters.

On March 9, 1993, the Commission's findings continue, Meneses was arraigned, and counsel appointed, in the Municipal Court for the Kings Judicial District of Kings County, Hanford Division, by Judge John G. O'Rourke. Bail was set at $100,000. A bail review hearing was set for March 11 in the same court.

On March 11, 1993, the Commission's findings go on, Doan presided over Meneses' bail review hearing. By this time, she had developed a strong personal interest in Meneses' case, largely because she wanted to help Lydia. At the hearing, she made no disclosure. Moreover, she represented that Officer Garcia did not oppose an own-recognizance release for Meneses—an intentional omission of material fact, inasmuch as Garcia also did not support such a release. Deputy District Attorney Michael Casaus requested a bench conference because he believed that Meneses must have been a confidential informant. At the bench, Doan further represented that Garcia was closer to supporting an own-recognizance release than merely not opposing such a release—an intentional misstatement of material fact. She did not mention Sergeant Frost's opposition—another intentional omission of material fact. She proceeded to release Meneses on his own recognizance subject to certain terms and conditions. Casaus considered her representations at the hearing so unusual that he later inquired of his supervisor whether Meneses was in fact a confidential informant. Within a day, Meneses was returned to custody on an unrelated Tulare County arrest warrant.

In acting and failing to act as she did, concluded the Commission unanimously and one of the special masters, Doan committed wilful misconduct. Her cited acts and omissions included: ex parte contacts with Lydia, Meneses, Officer Garcia, and Sergeant Frost; personal involvement in the case as an advocate for Meneses in violation of former canon 2B of the California

Code of Judicial Conduct, which counseled judges, inter alia, not to allow their family, social, or other relationships to influence their judicial conduct or judgment; initiation of an "investigation" as to the propriety of an own-recognizance release for Meneses by contacting Officer Garcia; questioning Officer Garcia and Sergeant Gonzales as to whether they believed Meneses was guilty; failure to disqualify herself or at least to disclose her pertinent relationships and activities, in spite of her implicit recognition that such action was necessary; and manipulation of the bail review hearing through intentional misstatements and omissions of material fact in order to achieve her desired result, which was an own-recognizance release for Meneses. According to the conclusion of two of the special masters, however, she engaged only in conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice.

Having independently reviewed the record in its entirety, we believe that the Commission's findings as stated above are essentially correct, and we adopt them as our own. In effect, Doan does not challenge the facts themselves. Rather, she attempts to dispute the inferences that the facts support. She would have us view her acts and omissions as praiseworthy or at least not such as would subject her to discipline. The record prohibits us from doing so.

We also believe that the Commission's conclusions as stated above are substantially sound, and we adopt them as our own. Doan argues that, at most, she engaged in conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice, as two of the special masters had concluded, and did not commit wilful misconduct. (1b), (6b) Her argument, like the two special masters' conclusion, rests on the premise that the "bad faith" (Geiler v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications, supra, 10 Cal.3d at p. 284) required for wilful misconduct does not encompass an intent by a judge to commit an act "for a corrupt purpose, i.e., for any purpose other than the faithful discharge of judicial duties" (Spruance v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications, supra, 13 Cal.3d at p. 796), if such act is within his lawful power. We recognize that some language in some opinions might perhaps be read to support that premise. (See Wenger v. Commission on Judicial Performance, 29 Cal.3d at p. 622, fn. 4; Ryan v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1988) 45 Cal.3d 518, 531 [247 Cal.Rptr. 378, 754 P.2d 724, 76 A.L.R.4th 951]; McCullough v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 49 Cal.3d at p. 191; Kloepfer v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 49 Cal.3d at p. 832; Kennick v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 50 Cal.3d at pp. 313-314; Adams v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 10 Cal.4th at pp. 877-878.) (1c) A reading of this sort, however, should not be indulged. For it would yield untenable results, such as a conclusion that "bad faith" could not characterize the mental state of a judge who rendered judgment in exchange for a bribe on the ground that the rendering of judgment was within his lawful power.

(6c) Accordingly, we are of the opinion that Doan has been proved by clear and convincing evidence to have committed wilful misconduct in the Meneses matter.

b. The Powell Matter

(7) The Commission's findings of fact and conclusions of law are set out in material part and with minor modifications below. Except as noted, they are unanimous and, although more detailed, substantially similar to those of the special masters.

Doan and her husband James, the Commission's findings begin by way of introduction, had a trucking business. In 1989, it began to fail. In the summer of 1992, creditors started to attach the couple's business and personal bank accounts. The Doans' efforts to turn the business around would fail, and they would file a voluntary petition of bankruptcy on June 29, 1993. To return to the summer of 1992: Doan's best friend was Koma Howard and one of her closest friends was Darlene Jones. The three women frequently walked and talked together in the evenings. They saw each other daily. Darlene was a frequent guest in Doan's chambers. Darlene owned and operated a restaurant in Corcoran called Roy's Drive-In. Her husband, Rodney Jones, had been convicted of federal felony narcotics trafficking offenses and was imprisoned at the Federal Correctional Institute in Phoenix, Arizona. On August 11, 1992, Darlene lent Doan $4,500, interest free, at her urgent request, on an oral agreement that she would repay the loan within a year. Doan asked for cash, stating that her bank account had been attached and that she would lose her office if outstanding checks were returned unpaid. Darlene complied, purchasing a cashier's check in the amount indicated. She made the loan to Doan personally and not to the trucking business. Darlene explained that she had set aside the money for Rodney's legal fees. Through the fall of 1993, Doan frequently told Darlene, Howard, and Kathy Jones, who was Darlene's sister-in-law, that she was working on Rodney's case. She said that she was conducting legal research, which included reviewing trial transcripts and briefs. She also said that Rodney would be home by Christmas of 1993. As a consequence, Darlene lent her additional money, provided free meals to her and to her family and friends, allowed her to take food from the restaurant when she was not present, and drove her to and from court. Doan asked whether she would have to repay the loan if she got Rodney home by December of 1993; Darlene said she would not. In the spring of 1993, Doan went with Darlene and Rodney's brother, Jimmy Jones, to visit Rodney in prison. She told Darlene that she would give the results of her legal research to an attorney who would represent Rodney, and that she would thereby reduce the amount of attorney fees she would have to pay. She recommended, among other attorneys, William Logan, who had appeared in her courtroom several times over the years. She then accompanied Darlene to Logan's office. There, Darlene retained Logan to represent Rodney. Afterward, Logan spoke with Doan several times on the telephone about the matter. At appearances in her courtroom, he received documents concerning the case, which Doan had been given by Darlene. At two meetings in Logan's office, Doan explained to Darlene in lay terms some of the legal matters under discussion. On other occasions, she told Darlene and Howard that she could no longer hold judicial office and practice law at the same time, and stated that she would not sign any pleading or other document. As it turned out, Rodney was not released by Christmas of 1993. At the time of the evidentiary hearing in mid-1994, Doan had repaid only a portion of the loan she had obtained from Darlene. It was not proved by clear and convincing evidence that she did not conduct the legal research in question. (It was so proved, according to the special masters.)

On July 11, 1992, the Commission's findings continue, Darren Powell was arrested by officers of the Corcoran Police Department for resisting arrest and possessing an open container of an alcoholic beverage in a motor vehicle. Powell was Darlene's nephew. Doan knew that he was. After review, Deputy District Attorney Gayle Helart charged Powell with resisting arrest and possessing the open container. Doan spoke to Darlene in Howard's presence about the case on several occasions during its pendency. Each time, she made substantially the same statement: she would take care of the matter and Darlene should not worry. Before a pretrial conference set for October 5, 1992, Helart and Marianne Brock, who was Powell's attorney, reached an agreement on a negotiated disposition with Powell's concurrence: Powell would plead guilty to the resisting-arrest charge, and the People would move to dismiss the open-container charge and would recommend a fine and no jail time. Doan presided at the conference. Brock sought to determine whether Doan was inclined to impose any jail time, which might disrupt the agreement. Doan then stated, inter alia, that she did not believe that Powell should plead guilty to the resisting-arrest charge at all because, she asserted, he would then have that conviction on his record permanently; Brock had a good chance of obtaining a not guilty verdict from a jury because one of the arresting officers was not well liked in the community and because there might be a viable defense of voluntary intoxication; Brock should notice a motion to suppress; and Helart was an inexperienced prosecutor and had apparently overcharged. She spoke directly to Powell: he would be making a mistake by pleading guilty to the resisting-arrest charge, and should consider pleading not guilty; Helart would further review the matter and might reduce the charge to disturbing the peace. Helart protested that Doan should not have made the latter statement because it was not true. Brock said that Powell wished to plead guilty to the resisting-arrest charge that day. Thereupon, Doan called Helart and Brock into chambers. She continued to attempt to persuade Helart to reduce the charge to disturbing the peace. Helart stood firm. Then, at Brock's request, she continued the matter. At no time did she disclose her relationship to Darlene or her discussions with her about the case. Brock subsequently noticed a suppression motion but then, finding no merit, declined to proceed. At Helart's request, Doan eventually disqualified herself. On April 27, 1993, Judge Ronald J. Maciel of the Municipal Court for the Kings Judicial District of Kings County, Lemoore Division, to whom the matter had been reassigned, accepted substantially the same plea agreement that Helart and Brock had originally reached with Powell's concurrence.

In acting and failing to act as she did, concluded eight members of the Commission and one of the special masters, Doan committed wilful misconduct. Her cited acts and omissions included: failure to disqualify herself or to disclose her relationship to Darlene or her discussions with her about the case; and use of the authority of her judicial office to attempt to influence the outcome of Powell's pretrial conference by exerting pressure on Deputy District Attorney Helart to reduce the charge of resisting arrest to disturbing the peace, for the corrupt purpose of further ingratiating herself with Darlene in order to advance their relationship. According to the conclusion of one member of the Commission and two of the special masters, however, she engaged only in conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice.

Having independently reviewed the record in its entirety, we believe that the Commission's findings as stated above are essentially correct, and we adopt them as our own. Doan challenges the facts. At the evidentiary hearing, the witnesses included Darlene, Howard, Deputy District Attorney Helart, Attorney Brock, Judge Maciel, and Doan herself. The testimony of Doan was favorable to her position. That of the others, especially Darlene, Howard, and Helart, was not. Calling herself "blameless," and suggesting that Darlene, Howard, and Helart are not, Doan asks us to generally accept her testimony and reject theirs on credibility grounds. The special masters, who saw the witnesses and heard their words, believed Darlene, Howard, and Helart and disbelieved Doan. After reviewing the record, the Commission did so as well. So now do we.

We also believe that the Commission's conclusions as stated above are substantially sound, and adopt them as our own. Doan argues, as noted, that she was "blameless." Under the facts found, she was not. She asserts that the appropriate charge in the Powell matter was, in fact, disturbing the peace and not resisting arrest. In support, she relies on testimony by Judge Maciel to the same effect. What is dispositive, however, is not the correctness of her legal opinion but the impropriety of her surrounding behavior. We recognize that one of the members of the Commission and two of the special masters concluded that she engaged only in conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice and did not commit wilful misconduct. Their conclusion—evidently for the special masters and apparently for the Commission member—rests on the erroneous premise that the "bad faith" (Geiler v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications, supra, 10 Cal.3d at p. 284) required for wilful misconduct does not encompass an intent by a judge to commit an act "for a corrupt purpose, i.e., for any purpose other than the faithful discharge of judicial duties" (Spruance v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications, supra, 13 Cal.3d at p. 796), if such act is within his lawful power.

Accordingly, we are of the opinion that Doan has been proved by clear and convincing evidence to have committed wilful misconduct in the Powell matter.

c. The Kenneth Jones Matter

(8a) Set out below in material part and with minor modifications are the Commission's findings of fact and conclusions of law, which are unanimous and, although more detailed, substantially similar to those of the special masters.

On August 22, 1992, according to the Commission's findings, Kenneth Jones, then 20 years old, and a companion, Victoria Gamez, then 18 years old, were detained across the street from Darlene Jones's restaurant and cited by Kings County deputy sheriffs as minors in possession of alcohol. Although not a witness to the incident, Doan was present at the restaurant with Darlene and Howard at the time it transpired. Kenneth was Darlene's nephew. Doan knew that he was. Howard went to ask the couple what had happened and came back to tell Doan and Darlene. In response to concerns expressed by Darlene, Doan said, "It isn't anything serious, do not worry about it. I will put him through a program that will keep it off his record." By these words, she was referring to the "Rock Program," which she had helped develop to provide youthful offenders with a "shock experience" at the California State Prison at Corcoran. She customarily gave minors charged with possession of alcohol the opportunity to attend this program. On September 28, 1992, she presided at a pretrial conference for Kenneth: she offered him an opportunity to attend the program, and he accepted. At no time did she disclose her relationship to Darlene or her discussions with her about the case. It does not appear, however, that the relationship or the discussions affected the disposition. Her words quoted above could be viewed as a statement of fact about her standard and indeed invariable practice in such cases. That same day, she also presided at a pretrial conference for Gamez: she dismissed the action.

In acting and failing to act as she did, concluded the Commission, Doan committed conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice. Her cited acts and omissions included the failure to disqualify herself or at least to disclose her relationship to Darlene or her discussions with her about the case—an omission that gave rise to the appearance of impropriety.

Having independently reviewed the record in its entirety, we believe that the Commission's findings as stated above are essentially correct, and we adopt them as our own. Doan does not challenge the facts. If she had, she would not have been successful. The record would defeat any such attempt.

We also believe that the Commission's conclusions as stated above are substantially sound, and we adopt them as our own. Doan denies impropriety. She refers to one of the requirements of conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice, viz., that an "objective observer" must view the conduct in question to be such. (Geiler v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications, supra, 10 Cal.3d at p. 284.) She then argues that an "objective observer," if he had knowledge of the community of Corcoran and its residents, would not view her acts and omissions thus. Let us assume for argument's sake that an "objective observer" must be deemed knowledgeable about Corcoran. The result is not favorable to Doan. Because the community of Corcoran is small and its residents few, an "objective observer" might not view as prejudicial to the administration of justice the fact that Doan had a relationship with Darlene or even engaged in discussions with her about the case. But he would see matters differently as to her failure to at least disclose the relationship and the discussions. She appears to claim that, in light of the fact that she was reelected to office in June of 1994, "actual observers" among the voters did not view her acts and omissions as prejudicial to the administration of justice. We are concerned with an "objective observer" and not with the "actual observers." Furthermore,

"actual observers" among the voters apparently had only limited knowledge of her improprieties; certainly, the formal proceedings against her remained confidential until after the election. (2b), (8b) To be sure, it is sufficient that the "actual observers" view the conduct in question to be such. (See McCartney v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications (1974) 12 Cal.3d 512, 534 [116 Cal.Rptr. 260, 526 P.2d 268].) But, contrary to her assertion, it is not necessary. (2c) We recognize that in Wenger v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 29 Cal.3d 615, it is stated: "Prejudicial conduct must be 'conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute.' ([Cal.] Const., art. VI, § 18, [former] subd. (c); italics added.) The italicized words do not require notoriety, but only that the conduct be 'damaging to the esteem for the judiciary held by members of the public who observed such conduct.' (McCartney v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications (1974) 12 Cal.3d 512, 534 [116 Cal.Rptr. 260, 526 P.2d 268].)" (Wenger v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 29 Cal.3d at pp. 622-623, fn. 4; accord, Kennick v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 50 Cal.3d at p. 314; Gubler v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 37 Cal.3d at p. 46; Roberts v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 33 Cal.3d at p. 748.) To the extent that the quoted language suggests that it is necessary that the "actual observers" view the conduct in question to be prejudicial to the administration of justice, it is mere dictum, finds no support in the quoted decision, is unsound, and is hereby disapproved.

d. The Darlene Jones Matter

On May 6, 1993, according to the Commission's findings, Darlene Jones was cited for obstructing a public officer in the performance of his duties as he was executing a creditor's "till tap" at her restaurant. She was subsequently charged with the underlying offense. On June 9, 1993, at the time set for arraignment, Doan disqualified herself. Judge Maciel was assigned to the matter. More than once while the charges were pending, in the presence of Koma Howard and Kathy Jones, Doan made statements to Darlene such as the following: "Do not worry, I will take care of it." "Everything will be okay." "You do not need an attorney, do not waste your money on it." "I will talk to Judge Maciel about it." "I have talked to Judge Maciel about it and everything has been taken care of. Nothing is going to happen." "We do it all the time. I can do him a favor and he can do me a favor, judges do that." Doan did in fact speak with Judge Maciel: she told him that she had disqualified herself and, on his inquiry, that the case involved obstructing a public officer as he was executing a creditor's "till tap" and had arisen out of a "mess up" by attorneys in an underlying civil action. She did not, however, request any favors or preferential treatment for Darlene. Darlene eventually retained counsel. On August 23, 1993, at a pretrial conference presided over by Judge Maciel, she entered a plea of guilty to a reduced charge of disturbing the peace, and was ordered booked and released, placed on probation for one year, and fined $145. At all times pertinent here, Darlene was providing small loans and meals to Doan and her family. Doan wanted to continue to obtain money and food from Darlene—hence, her efforts to give the impression that she was assisting in the case.

In acting and failing to act as she did, concluded eight members of the Commission and all three of the special masters, Doan engaged in conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice. Her cited acts and omissions included: the giving of assurances to Darlene as to the outcome of the prosecution against her, with an implication of inside information and influence; and an apparent intent to mislead Darlene in order to continue to obtain money and food. According to the conclusion of one member of the Commission, however, she committed wilful misconduct.

Having independently reviewed the record in its entirety, we believe that the Commission's findings as stated above are essentially correct, and we adopt them as our own. Doan challenges the facts. As noted, at the evidentiary hearing, the witnesses included Darlene, Howard, Kathy Jones, and Doan herself. The testimony of Doan was favorable to her position; that of Darlene, Howard, and Kathy Jones was not. Against the Commission and, more notably, the special masters, Doan asks us to generally believe her and disbelieve the others. We will not.

We also believe that the Commission's conclusions as stated above are substantially sound, and we adopt them as our own. As a major premise, Doan argues that conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice requires that the "actual observers" must view the conduct in question to be such. As a minor premise, she asserts that Darlene, the primary "actual observer," could not have so viewed her acts and omissions because of what she deems to be Darlene's bad character. We need not detain ourselves with the minor premise. We must simply reject the major premise out of hand. As explained, the "requirement" that she claims to discern is nonexistent. She states that any assurances she may have given to Darlene as to the outcome of the prosecution against her proved ineffective in view of the fact that she eventually paid no heed to her words but chose to retain counsel. She fails to show, and we fail to see, the relevance of her assertion.

Accordingly, we are of the opinion that Doan has been proved by clear and convincing evidence to have committed conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice in the Darlene Jones matter.

2. Count Two

(10) As pertinent here, count two has three parts, concerning Doan's failure to report in her annual statement of economic interests loans she had obtained from Lieutenant Russell Williams, Koma Howard, and Darlene Jones.

a. The Williams Loan

The Commission's findings of fact and conclusions of law are set out in material part and with minor modifications below. Although more detailed, they are substantially similar to those of the special masters and, except as noted, are also unanimous.

Like other public officials—the Commission's findings begin by way of introduction—Doan was required to file a statement of economic interests annually with the Fair Political Practices Commission pursuant to Government Code section 87200 et seq. She was under an obligation to disclose, among other things, all loans of $250 or more made to her or her husband and all loans of $10,000 or more made to any business in which she had an interest of at least 10 percent. She was not under an obligation to disclose, among other things, loans from certain close family members or retail installment or credit card transactions under $10,000 if the account was maintained in the creditor's regular course of business.

On April 23, 1991, the Commission's findings continue, Russell Williams lent Doan $3,000, interest free, to be repaid within six months. The two had known each other for many years, and lived only four houses from each other. He was a lieutenant in the Corcoran Police Department. At that time, he served as the department's court liaison officer. In such capacity, he routinely presented Doan with complaints and warrant applications; she did not supervise him and he had no particular stake in her decisions. On the date in question, she went to his office. She requested a loan with no written evidence of the transaction. She was distraught, explaining that the trucking business was causing severe financial problems. He complied with her request. He made the loan to her personally, and not to the trucking business; he did so out of friendship, and not because of her position. He retired later that year. She did not make repayment within six months. On June 6, 1994, she gave him a check drawn by her husband in the amount of $1,500. The evidence does not disclose whether this instrument was drawn on a personal or business account. She did not disclose the loan in her statement of economic interests for 1991 or 1992, but did so for 1993. At the evidentiary hearing, she testified that she failed to make the disclosure because she had forgotten to do so. She also testified that she resented the requirement of filing such a statement and considered it an invasion of privacy.

In acting and failing to act as she did, concluded six members of the Commission and all three of the special masters, Doan engaged in conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice. Her cited acts and omissions included the violation of an obligation imposed on her as a public official by statute, which must be viewed as flagrant and deliberate in light of the fact that she had been publicly reproved for similar acts and omissions in 1989. According to the conclusion of three members of the Commission, however, she committed wilful misconduct.

Having independently reviewed the record in its entirety, we believe that the Commission's findings as stated above are essentially correct, and we adopt them as our own. Doan does not, and cannot, challenge the facts.

We also believe that the Commission's conclusions as stated above are substantially sound, and we adopt them as our own. Doan denies impropriety. As a major premise, she argues that conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice requires that the "actual observers" must view the conduct in question to be such. As a minor premise, she asserts that "actual observers" among the voters did not so view her acts and omissions because she was reelected to office in June of 1994. But, as explained, the "requirement" that she claims to discern is nonexistent. Furthermore, the "actual observers" among the voters apparently had only limited knowledge of her improprieties.

Accordingly, we are of the opinion that Doan has been proved by clear and convincing evidence to have committed conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice in the matter of the Williams loan.

b. The Howard Loans

Set out in material part and with minor modifications below are the Commission's findings of fact and conclusions of law, which are unanimous and, although more detailed, substantially similar to those of the special masters.

Beginning in May of 1991, according to the Commission's findings, Doan and Koma Howard engaged in a series of transactions wherein Howard drew checks on a line of credit payable to Doan or to another on her behalf. The transactions involved an amount of at least $1,400 to make good checks Doan had drawn on her personal bank account, which had become depleted because of levies related to the failure of the trucking business. Doan had two daughters: Jayme was the older and Megan the younger. Later in 1991 and also in 1992 and 1993, Howard drew checks in the amount of $6,716 on her line of credit payable to the California State Polytechnic University for Jayme. On June 21, 1993, she drew a check in the amount of $400 on her line of credit payable to Jayme herself; Doan cashed the check at a market, applied $150 to her account there, and received the rest in cash. On one occasion, Doan charged an undisclosed amount to an account Howard had with a retail store, with the latter's permission, to buy Jayme and Megan a television set and videocassette recorder for Easter. She made payments to Howard's line of credit and to Howard's account with the retail store, and was current at the time of the evidentiary hearing in mid-1994. She did not disclose these loans in her statement of economic interests for 1991, 1992, or 1993. Her failure to do so was intentional. Inapplicable was the exception for retail installment or credit card transactions under $10,000 on an account maintained in the creditor's regular course of business: her debt was not to the holder of such an account, but to Howard. Also inapplicable was the exception for loans from certain close family members: although Doan testified at the evidentiary hearing that Howard was "like a sister," she was not a member of her family.

In acting and failing to act as she did, concluded the Commission, Doan engaged in conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice. Her cited acts and omissions included the violation of an obligation imposed on her as a public official by statute, which (it appears) must be viewed as flagrant and deliberate in light of the fact that she had been publicly reproved for similar acts and omissions in 1989.

Having independently reviewed the record in its entirety, we believe that the Commission's findings as stated above are essentially correct, and we adopt them as our own. Doan does not, and cannot, challenge the facts.

We also believe that the Commission's conclusions as stated above are substantially sound, and we adopt them as our own. With the same argument about the views of "actual observers" that she used as to the Williams loan, Doan denies impropriety. That argument was unpersuasive there. It is unpersuasive here as well.

Accordingly, we are of the opinion that Doan has been proved by clear and convincing evidence to have committed conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice in the matter of the Howard loans.

c. The Darlene Jones Loan

Set out in material part and with minor modifications below are the Commission's findings of fact and conclusions of law, which are unanimous and, although more detailed, substantially similar to those of the special masters.

On August 11, 1992, it will be recalled, Darlene Jones lent Doan $4,500, interest free, to be repaid within a year. The transaction and its circumstances are described above (see, ante, at pp. 320-321), and need not be repeated here. Doan did not disclose the loan in her statement of economic interests for 1992 or 1993. Her failure to do so was intentional. There was insufficient evidence to establish with certainty the dates or amounts of the various small loans that were alleged in the amended notice of formal proceedings.

In acting and failing to act as she did, concluded the Commission, Doan engaged in conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice. Her cited acts and omissions included the violation of an obligation imposed on her as a public official by statute, which (it appears) must be viewed as flagrant and deliberate in light of the fact that she had been publicly reproved for similar acts and omissions in 1989.

Having independently reviewed the record in its entirety, we believe that the Commission's findings as stated above are essentially correct, and we adopt them as our own. Doan does not, and cannot, challenge the facts.

We also believe that the Commission's conclusions as stated above are substantially sound, and we adopt them as our own. With the same argument about the views of "actual observers" that she used as to the Williams and Howard loans, Doan denies impropriety. That argument was unpersuasive there. It is unpersuasive here as well.

Accordingly, we are of the opinion that Doan has been proved by clear and convincing evidence to have committed conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice in the matter of the Darlene Jones loan.

3. Count Three

As pertinent here, count three has two parts, concerning Doan's financial dealings and business relationships with Helen Cabell and Lieutenant Russell Williams, in the form of loans she had obtained.

a. The Cabell Loan

In 1993, according to the Commission's findings, Helen Cabell was a clerk assigned to the Municipal Court for the Kings Judicial District of Kings County, Corcoran Division, and served Doan from time to time in the courtroom. She had held the same position in the Justice Court for the Corcoran Judicial District of Kings County for several years prior to the 1992 consolidation, and served Doan regularly in the courtroom. Before consolidation, she had come under Doan's administrative supervision. Afterwards, she did not; she nevertheless continued under her practical supervision. The two women frequently deposited their checks in the bank at the same time, with one of them doing the transactions for both. On August 10, 1993—even though she had known for several months that she was the subject of a preliminary investigation by the Commission—Doan asked Cabell for a loan for one or two days to cover her daughter Jayme's college expenses. The two women "exchanged" checks: Cabell drew a currently dated check for $740 payable to Jayme and Doan drew a postdated check in the same amount payable to Cabell; a day or two later, Cabell cashed Doan's check. The two women were lifelong friends, who, at the time of the evidentiary hearing in mid-1994, continued to do banking for each other. Moreover, the loan here was, so to speak, "secured," of small amount, and with a short term. Nevertheless, Doan was on notice that she could not properly borrow money from Cabell: she had been privately admonished for doing so in 1990. Furthermore, despite the change in administrative supervision, Cabell remained under Doan's practical supervision.

In acting and failing to act as she did, concluded the Commission, Doan engaged in conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice. Her cited acts and omissions included obtaining a loan from Cabell, a member of the court staff, in violation of canon 4D(1)(a) of the California Code of Judicial Conduct, which counsels judges not to engage in financial and business dealings that may reasonably be perceived as exploiting their judicial position.

Having independently reviewed the record in its entirety, we believe that the Commission's findings as stated above are essentially correct, and we adopt them as our own. Doan does not, and cannot, challenge the facts.

We also believe that the Commission's conclusions as stated above are substantially sound, and we adopt them as our own. Doan denies impropriety. As a major premise, she argues that conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice requires that the "actual observers" must view the conduct in question to be such. As a minor premise, she asserts that the sole "actual observer," Cabell, did not so view her acts and omissions. Whether the latter is supported as a matter of fact is of no consequence. That is because the former, as explained, is unsound as a matter of law.

Accordingly, we are of the opinion that Doan has been proved by clear and convincing evidence to have committed conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice in the matter of the Cabell loan.

b. The Williams Loan

(12) Set out in material part and with minor modifications below are the Commission's findings of fact and conclusions of law, which are unanimous and, although more detailed, substantially similar to those of the special masters.

On April 23, 1991, it will be recalled, Lieutenant Russell Williams lent Doan $3,000, interest free, to be repaid within six months. The transaction and its circumstances are described above (see, ante, at pp. 327-328), and need not be repeated here.

In acting and failing to act as she did, concluded the Commission, Doan engaged in conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice. Her cited acts and omissions included obtaining a loan from Lieutenant Williams, who routinely presented her with complaints and warrant applications, in violation of canon 4D(1)(b) of the California Code of Judicial Conduct, which counsels judges not to engage in financial and business dealings that involve them in frequent transactions or continuing business relationships with persons likely to come before their court.

Having independently reviewed the record in its entirety, we believe that the Commission's findings as stated above are essentially correct, and we adopt them as our own. Doan challenges the facts. She asserts in substance that Lieutenant Williams made the loan to the trucking business and not to her personally. At the evidentiary hearing, the witnesses included Williams and Doan herself. The testimony of Doan was favorable to her position. That of Williams was not. The special masters, who saw the witnesses and heard their words, believed Williams and disbelieved Doan. After reviewing the record, the Commission did so as well. So now do we.

We also believe that the Commission's conclusions as stated above are substantially sound, and we adopt them as our own. With the same argument about the views of the sole "actual observer" that she used as to the Cabell loan, Doan denies impropriety. That argument was unpersuasive there. It is unpersuasive here as well.

Accordingly, we are of the opinion that Doan has been proved by clear and convincing evidence to have committed conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice in the matter of the Williams loan.

4. Count Four

(13) Count four concerns Doan's failure to list all creditors in her bankruptcy petition.

The Commission's findings of fact are set out in material part and with minor modifications below. They are unanimous and, although more detailed, substantially similar to those of the special masters.

On June 29, 1993, according to the Commission's findings, Doan and her husband filed a voluntary petition of bankruptcy. They were required to list all creditors. In supporting declarations executed under penalty of perjury, she stated in substance that they had done so. Nevertheless, and with knowledge and intent, she omitted as creditors Fabrie Jewelers, Lieutenant Russell Williams, Hugh Osburn, Morris Proctor, Darlene Jones, Koma Howard, and Daisy Smith. Prior to filing the petition, she and her husband had retained Franklin Samples, an attorney who held himself out as an expert in bankruptcy and had practiced in that area since 1957. He advised her that she was not required to list all creditors, such as those to whom she owed small amounts of money for household goods and services. She informed him of her debt to Williams, but not of any of the others. She told Fabrie Jewelers, Williams, and Darlene that she would omit, or had omitted, them because she wanted to make repayment in full.

The Commission's conclusions of law are set out in material part and with minor modifications below. They are unanimous. But unlike their findings of fact, they differ from those of the special masters, as noted.

In acting and failing to act as she did, concluded the Commission, Doan engaged in conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice. Her cited acts and omissions included the filing of her bankruptcy petition with its incomplete list of creditors. She could not reasonably have relied on the advice of Attorney Samples that she was not required to list all creditors because (it appears) she did not inform him of any of the debts in question other than that to Lieutenant Williams. Those other debts were not for small amounts of money for household goods and services, but for relatively large sums and/or for business expenses. By contrast, according to the conclusion of the special masters, she did not subject herself to discipline: she relied on Samples's advice, which although of questionable soundness was nevertheless given by a purported expert.

Having independently reviewed the record in its entirety, we believe that the Commission's findings as stated above are essentially correct, and we adopt them as our own. In substance, Doan challenges what she takes to be the characterization of her intent as fraudulent. No such label, however, is attached. But we do note that, in the declarations supporting her bankruptcy petition, which were executed under penalty of perjury, she stated in substance that she and her husband had listed all creditors—when, with knowledge and intent, she had omitted those identified above.

We also believe that the Commission's conclusions as stated above are substantially sound, and we would adopt them as our own. Doan denies impropriety. But her major premise—that conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice requires that the "actual observers" must view the conduct in question to be such—is unsound as a matter of law. We decline Doan's request to "find that her conduct . . . enhances the esteem for the judicial office . . . ." (Italics added.) She implies that the only way for her to "tak[e] responsibility" for the debts in question was to fail to list creditors in her bankruptcy petition. That is not the case. She need only have reaffirmed.

Accordingly, we are of the opinion that Doan has been proved by clear and convincing evidence to have committed conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice by failing to list all creditors in her bankruptcy petition.

5. Count Five

(14) Count five concerns Doan's habitual tardiness in commencing court sessions.

Set out in material part and with minor modifications below are the Commission's findings of fact and conclusions of law, which are unanimous and, although more detailed, substantially similar to those of the special masters.

On July 1, 1992—the Commission's findings begin by way of introduction—the Justice Court for the Corcoran Judicial District of Kings County was consolidated into the Municipal Court for the Kings Judicial District of Kings County as the Corcoran Division. That court had three judges: Judge John G. O'Rourke in the Hanford Division, Judge Ronald J. Maciel in the Lemoore Division, and Doan in the Corcoran Division. Judge Maciel had been the presiding judge since consolidation. The Hanford Division had two departments: Judge O'Rourke sat in one; Judge Maciel and Doan sat alternately in the other, as well as in their own divisions.

In 1992 and 1993, the Commission's findings continue, Doan was habitually tardy in commencing court sessions by an hour to an hour and a half. On some occasions, she arrived at the courthouse late. On others, she arrived on time but attended to separate matters. On yet others, because she preferred to take the bench only once each session, she simply declined to do so until all parties in all actions were ready to proceed. She inconvenienced attorneys. She did the same to parties and witnesses, including law enforcement personnel who had been called away from their normal duties, and led them to express impatience and anger. She was the subject of complaints presented to Judge Maciel, Judge O'Rourke, the county court executive officer, and the county administrative officer, and received advisements from all four. She almost always completed her calendar before the close of day. But by making a late start, she caused court staff to make mistakes in their attempt to keep pace as she rapidly disposed of the matters at hand. Beginning in mid-1993, she became less tardy, but only somewhat.

In acting and failing to act as she did, concluded the Commission, Doan persistently failed to perform her duties in a diligent fashion. Her cited acts and omissions included her habitual tardiness in commencing court sessions, despite complaints and advisements, in violation of canon 3B(8) of the California Code of Judicial Conduct, which counsels judges to dispose of all judicial matters fairly, promptly, and efficiently, and advises them in its commentary to be punctual in attending court.

Having independently reviewed the record in its entirety, we believe that, with one exception, the Commission's findings as stated above are essentially correct, and we adopt them as our own. The exception is this: it has not been proved by clear and convincing evidence that, by making a late start, Doan caused court staff to make mistakes. But for this point, Doan does not, and cannot, challenge the facts.

We also believe that the Commission's conclusions as stated above are substantially sound, and we adopt them as our own. Doan denies impropriety. Her argument, however, misses its mark. It is not directed against persistent nonperformance of duties, with which we are here concerned. Instead, it focuses on conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice, with which we are not. In any event, it falls of its own weight. Its major premise—that conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice requires that the "actual observers" must view the conduct in question to be such—is unsound as a matter of law. Its minor premise—that "actual observers" among the voters did not so view her acts and omissions because she was reelected to office in June of 1994—is dubious. "Actual observers" among the voters apparently had only limited knowledge of her improprieties. By contrast, "actual observers" among the parties, witnesses, and attorneys who came into the courtroom had fuller knowledge. And, to judge from their complaints, less favorable views.

Accordingly, we are of the opinion that Doan has been proved by clear and convincing evidence to have persistently failed to perform her duties in a diligent fashion by her habitual tardiness in commencing court sessions.

6. Count Six

(15) Count six concerns Doan's offer to provide legal services on behalf of Darlene Jones's husband Rodney, who had been convicted of, and imprisoned for, federal felony narcotics trafficking offenses.

Set out in material part and with minor modifications below are the Commission's findings of fact and conclusions of law, which are unanimous and, although more detailed, substantially similar to those of the special masters, except as noted.

On August 11, 1992, it will be recalled, Darlene Jones lent Doan $4,500, interest free, to be repaid within a year. The transaction and its circumstances are described above (see, ante, at pp. 320-321), and need not be repeated here. Suffice it to say that Doan offered to conduct legal research for Darlene's husband. The Commission determined that it was not proved by clear and convincing evidence that she did not follow through. The special masters determined that it was.

In acting and failing to act as she did, concluded the Commission, Doan engaged in conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice. Her cited acts and omissions included her offer to conduct legal research for Darlene's husband.

Having independently reviewed the record in its entirety, we believe that the Commission's findings as stated above are essentially correct, and we adopt them as our own. Doan makes the same challenge to the facts that she made previously. At the evidentiary hearing, the witnesses included Darlene, Koma Howard, and Doan herself. The testimony of Doan was favorable to her position. That of Darlene and Howard was not. Against the Commission and, more notably, the special masters, Doan asks us to generally believe her and disbelieve the others. We will not.

We also believe that the Commission's conclusions as stated above are substantially sound, and we adopt them as our own. Doan's argument to the contrary is similar to others she has used. Its major premise—that conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice requires that the "actual observers" must view the conduct in question to be such—is unsound as a matter of law. Its minor premise—that Darlene and Howard, the primary "actual observers," could not have so viewed her acts and omissions because of what she deems to be their bad character—need not be considered.

Accordingly, we are of the opinion that Doan has been proved by clear and convincing evidence to have committed conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice by offering to provide legal services on behalf of Darlene's husband.

7. Count Seven

(16) Count seven concerns Doan's request to Darlene Jones and Koma Howard, during the course of the Commission's preliminary investigation, not to give their cooperation to its agents.

Set out in material part and with minor modifications below are the Commission's findings of fact and conclusions of law, which are unanimous and substantially similar to those of the special masters.

During the course of the Commission's preliminary investigation, according to the Commission's findings, Doan told Darlene and Howard she did not want them to discuss the loans she had obtained from them with the Commission's agents.

In acting and failing to act as she did, concluded the Commission, Doan engaged in conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice. Her cited acts and omissions included a refusal to cooperate with, or give reasonable assistance and information to, the Commission's agents in the course of the preliminary investigation, in violation of Government Code section 68725, which provides that a judge, among others, must do so.

Having independently reviewed the record in its entirety, we believe that the Commission's findings as stated above are essentially correct, and adopt them as our own. Doan again makes the same challenge to the facts that she made previously. At the evidentiary hearing, the witnesses included Darlene, Howard, and Doan herself. The testimony of Doan was favorable to her position. That of Darlene and Howard was not. Against the Commission and, more notably, the special masters, Doan asks us to generally believe her and disbelieve the others. We will not.

We also believe that, with one exception, the Commission's conclusions as stated above are substantially sound, and we adopt them as our own. The exception is this: by telling Darlene and Howard she did not want them to discuss the loans she had obtained from them with the Commission's agents, Doan committed wilful misconduct and did not merely engage in conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice. (Cf. Adams v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 10 Cal.4th at pp. 908-911 [concluding that, by making material misrepresentations and omissions during the course of a preliminary investigation by the Commission, a judge committed wilful misconduct].) Doan denies impropriety. Her argument, however, misses its mark. It is not directed against wilful misconduct, with which we are here concerned. Instead, it focuses on conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice, with which we are not. In any event, it falls of its own weight. We simply modify words spoken above. The major premise—that conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice requires that the "actual observers" must view the conduct in question to be such—is unsound as a matter of law. The minor premise—that Darlene and Howard, the primary "actual observers," could not have so viewed her acts and omissions, apparently because they were or became "undercover" agents for the Commission—need not be considered.

Accordingly, we are of the opinion that Doan has been proved by clear and convincing evidence to have committed wilful misconduct by requesting Darlene and Howard, during the course of the Commission's preliminary investigation, not to give their cooperation to its agents.

C. Discipline

(5b) In deciding whether to impose discipline under former subdivision (c) of section 18 of article VI of the California Constitution and, if so, what form such discipline should take, we seek as our ultimate objective to protect the public and the judicial system itself from judges who are unfit to hold office, determining what sanction, if any, is necessary to achieve this goal.

(17) After independent consideration, we are of the opinion that, in accordance with the Commission's recommendation, we should indeed remove Doan from office for wilful misconduct, conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice, and persistent nonperformance of duties. We believe that only that sanction will guarantee protection of the public and the judicial system.

In order to carry out the obligations of office, a judge must possess integrity and impartiality and conduct himself accordingly. Doan did not. She displayed moral turpitude, dishonesty, and corruption. Our findings of fact and conclusions of law establish the point beyond peradventure. They are set out at length above, and need not be repeated here. Merely recall Doan's involvement in the matters relating to Miguel Meneses, Darlene Jones's nephews Darren Powell and Kenneth Jones, and Darlene herself. Recall as well Doan's offer to provide legal services on behalf of Darlene's husband Rodney. These incidents reveal that, as a judge, Doan looked to, and pursued, her own personal interests. Indeed, in the Powell affair, she went so far as to put a thumb on the scales of justice, and did so that she might profit from its verge.

Doan again asserts challenges to our findings and again raises arguments against our conclusions. In the course of our discussion, we found these very challenges unsuccessful and these very arguments unpersuasive. We do so here as well. She invokes her reelection to office in June of 1994. The voters, however, apparently had only limited knowledge of her improprieties. Certainly, the formal proceedings against her remained confidential until after the election. In any event, it is our determination that is dispositive. And our determination is removal.

Of course, we would hesitate to remove a judge who showed himself ready, willing, and able to reform under a less severe sanction.

Doan, however, is not such a judge. Quite the opposite is true. To use the words of one of the examiners, she is apparently the "most disciplined judge in the State of California"—meaning, obviously, the most sanctioned.

Doan did not learn from her public reproval in 1989 for, inter alia, failure to make full disclosure in her annual statement of economic interests. She again failed to make full disclosure in 1991, 1992, and 1993, with regard to one or more of the loans she had obtained from Lieutenant Russell Williams, Koma Howard, and Darlene Jones.

Neither did Doan learn from her private admonishment in 1990 for, inter alia, engaging in financial dealings that exploited her judicial position—specifically, by borrowing money from Helen Cabell, who served her regularly as a courtroom clerk. She again engaged in financial dealings that exploited her judicial position—again, specifically, by borrowing money from Cabell, who continued to serve her from time to time as a courtroom clerk—in 1993. She did so even though she had known for several months that she was the subject of a preliminary investigation by the Commission.

Lastly, Doan did not learn from her public reproval in 1990 for lending the prestige of her office to advance the private interest of others. She again lent the prestige of her office to advance the private interest of others, even though she had promised not to do so in connection with the 1990 public reproval, in the matters relating to Darlene's nephew Darren Powell in 1992, Meneses in 1993, and Darlene herself in 1993.

In sum, Doan has had three opportunities for reformation. She will have no more.

IV. DISPOSITION

For the reasons stated above, we conclude that Judge Glenda Kraft Doan, a judge of the municipal court, should be removed from office.

It is so ordered.

Under former subdivision (d) of section 18 of article VI of the California Constitution, a judge whom we remove from office is suspended from the practice of law unless and until we order otherwise.

Doan moves for permission to resume the practice of law. We deny her request. She relies on Geiler v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications, supra, 10 Cal.3d 270, and Gonzalez v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 33 Cal.3d 359. There, we permitted a removed judge to resume practice. (Geiler v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications, supra, 10 Cal.3d at p. 287; Gonzalez v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 33 Cal.3d at p. 378.) But we did so, at least in part, because we did not find moral turpitude, dishonesty, or corruption. (Gonzalez v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 33 Cal.3d at p. 378; see Geiler v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications, supra, 10 Cal.3d at p. 287.) Here, by contrast, we do so find. It is true that, in Adams v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 10 Cal.4th 866, we permitted a removed judge to resume practice in spite of an at least implied finding of moral turpitude, dishonesty, or corruption. But, to our mind, the acts and omissions that underlay removal there were less significant than those here.

We hasten to add that our denial of Doan's motion is without prejudice to the making of a new motion with proof of her rehabilitation, present fitness to practice, and present learning and ability in the general law. (Cf. Rules Proc. of State Bar, div. V, Standards for Atty. Sanctions for Prof. Misconduct, std. 1.4(c)(ii) [dealing with actual suspension from the practice of law for a period of two years or more].)

On November 6, 1995, the opinion was modified to read as printed above.

THOMAS B. FLETCHER, a Judge of the Superior Court, Petitioner, v. COMMISSION ON JUDICIAL PERFORMANCE, Respondent.

SUMMARY

The Commission on Judicial Performance recommended that the Supreme Court remove a judge from office for willful misconduct and "conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute" (Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, former subd. (c); now Cal. Const., art. art. VI, § 18, subd. (d)).

The Supreme Court ordered that the judge be removed from office. The court held that removal from office was warranted. The judge committed multiple acts of willful and prejudicial misconduct, including ex parte communications with parties or witnesses in several criminal cases, multiple undignified reactions to parties' disqualification motions, and mishandling of criminal cases. Together, these incidents reflected a continuing, pervasive pattern of misconduct, and the judge's lack of judicial temperament was manifest. Also, the incidents of misconduct occurred during virtually the judge's entire term in office, and his previous legal experience should have acquainted him with proper procedures. Moreover, rather than expressing contrition, the judge instead alleged there was a conspiracy against him. This belied any claim that he had learned from past experience and had modified his courtroom behavior. It demonstrated instead an inability to appreciate the importance of, and conform to, the standards of judicial conduct that are essential if justice is to be meted out in every case. Thus, censure was not sufficient. (Opinion by The Court. Dissenting opinion by Kennard, J., with Mosk, J., concurring.)

HEADNOTES

Classified to California Digest of Official Reports

(1) Judges § 6.2—Discipline—Removal From Office—Grounds—Willful Misconduct in Office—Standard.—Under Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, former subd. (c) (now Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (d)), which authorizes removal of a judge from office for "willful misconduct in office," "willful misconduct" is unjudicial conduct committed in bad faith by a judge acting in his judicial capacity. To support a finding of bad faith, the evidence must establish that the judge performed a judicial act (1) for a corrupt purpose, which is any purpose other than the faithful discharge of judicial duties, or (2) with knowledge that the act was beyond the judge's lawful judicial power, or (3) that exceeded the judge's lawful power with a conscious disregard for the limits of the judge's authority. Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, former subd. (c), also authorized removal of a judge from office for "conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute." Prejudicial misconduct includes acts that a judge undertakes in good faith but which nevertheless would appear to an objective observer to be not only unjudicial conduct but conduct prejudicial to public esteem for the judicial office. It also includes willful misconduct out of office, i.e., unjudicial conduct committed in bad faith by a judge not then acting in a judicial capacity. In this context, bad faith means a culpable mental state beyond mere negligence and consisting of either knowing or not caring that the conduct being undertaken is unjudicial and prejudicial to public esteem.

[See 2 Witkin, Cal. Procedure (4th ed. 1996) Courts, § 74 et seq.]

(2) Judges § 6.4—Discipline—Removal From Office—Recommendation by Commission on Judicial Performance—Review by Supreme Court.—In reviewing the recommendation of the Commission on Judicial Performance to remove a judge for willful or prejudicial misconduct under Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, former subd. (c) (now Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (d)), the Supreme Court may consider only those misconduct charges that the commission has sustained. The court independently reviews the evidentiary record and will sustain the charges of misconduct only if clear and convincing evidence proves them to a reasonable certainty. The court gives special weight to the special masters' factual determinations, because the special masters had the advantage of observing the demeanor of the various witnesses. In addition, in recognition of the commission's expertise, the court accords great weight to the commission's conclusions of law. Based on its factual findings and legal conclusions, the court then determines independently what, if any, discipline is appropriate.

(3) Judges § 6.2—Discipline—Removal From Office—Grounds—Prejudicial Misconduct in Office—Improperly Taking and Using Photograph of Court Personnel for Campaign Purposes.—A judge committed prejudicial misconduct under Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, former subd. (c) (now Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (d)), by improperly taking and using a photograph of court personnel for campaign purposes. The judge himself admitted that at least part of his purpose in having the picture taken was to assist his campaign. By insisting, over the objections of several court personnel, that everyone participate in the photograph, by securing cooperation by stating that the picture was simply a personal memento, and by failing to disclose his intent to use the picture in his campaign, the judge committed prejudicial misconduct both in taking and using the picture for campaign purposes.

(4) Judges § 6—Discipline—Judicial Canons—Binding Effect.—Although the canons of judicial conduct do not have the force of law or regulation, they reflect a judicial consensus regarding appropriate behavior, and are helpful in giving content to the constitutional standards under which disciplinary proceedings are charged. The California Supreme Court therefore expects that all judges will comply with the canons, and the failure to do so suggests performance below the minimum level necessary to maintain public confidence in the administration of justice.

(5) Judges § 6.2—Discipline—Removal From Office—Grounds—Prejudicial Misconduct in Office—Handling of Criminal Defendant's Request for Drug Diversion.—Substantial evidence supported the conclusion of the Commission on Judicial Performance that a judge had committed prejudicial misconduct in his handling of a criminal defendant's request for drug diversion. The judge had engaged in ex parte communications with the defendant's uncle (whom the judge knew) and the defendant's parents, and the judge determined that there existed a conflict of interest that disqualified him from ruling on the issue of diversion. When defense counsel requested that the judge consider diversion despite a probation officer's recommendation to deny diversion, the judge deferred to the district attorney, who recommended diversion. The judge committed prejudicial misconduct by failing to disqualify himself after the ex parte communications. The judge was disqualified under Code Civ. Proc., § 170.1, subd. (a)(6) (grounds for disqualification of judge). He had personal feelings about the propriety of granting diversion and participating in the decision, based on his ex parte communications and the defendant's comment to his attorney that diversion was "a done deal." This disqualification could not be waived (Code Civ. Proc., § 170.3, subd. (b)(2)(A)). Further, since the decision whether to allow diversion was the judge's, he should have set the matter for a different judge rather than defer to the district attorney. His decision to delegate his judicial power to the district attorney constituted prejudicial misconduct.

(6) Judges § 6.2—Discipline—Removal From Office—Grounds—Willful Misconduct in Office—Handling of Criminal Defendant's Request for Drug Diversion—Alteration of Minute Order.—Substantial evidence supported the conclusion of the Commission on Judicial Performance that a judge had committed willful misconduct by altering a minute order directing a criminal defendant to drug diversion. The judge had engaged in ex parte communications with the defendant's relatives, determined that there existed a conflict, and deferred to the district attorney's recommendation of diversion. The judge directed the court clerk to alter a minute order and, contrary to court policy, not to indicate that she had changed the order. The evidence strongly suggested he took this action after receiving the commission's inquiry about his ex parte communications in the case. This was prejudicial misconduct, regardless of the nature of the alterations. By forwarding only the altered order, the judge presented the commission with a grossly incomplete and misleading response. Second, the altered information reflected the judge's disqualification on future diversion violation hearings, but did not indicate that diversion was granted in accordance with the district attorney's recommendation. Third, the record did not support the judge's claim that the entry on the order was completed "completely contemporaneously with" the diversion hearing. Fourth, a conflict existed between the order and the reporter's transcript of the hearing, and given the circumstances of this matter, the transcript was entitled to more credence. Finally, the record indicated that, in light of the judge's conflicting explanations concerning the nature of the documents sent to the commission, it was necessary to have marked the altered order "corrected."

(7) Judges § 6.2—Discipline—Removal From Office—Grounds—Prejudicial Misconduct in Office—Ex Parte Contacts With Criminal Defendant Concerning Defendant's Compliance With Plea Bargain.—A judge committed prejudicial misconduct by engaging in improper ex parte contacts with a criminal defendant. Under a plea agreement, the defendant pleaded guilty to violating court orders, violating a protective order, and allowing or causing a child to suffer, and sentencing was continued with dismissal to follow after a year if he committed no further violations and obeyed court orders. The case remained pending before the judge, and the defendant often appeared before the judge for compliance review. When the defendant talked about committing suicide and other violent acts, the judge recommended that the defendant seek counseling or attend a men's fellowship group that the judge led. At the fellowship meetings the defendant

discussed the problems that led to the criminal charges pending before the judge, and by his own admission, the judge viewed himself as the defendant's probation officer. Thus, the judge would have had to disqualify himself from hearing any allegations that the defendant violated his plea bargain. Further, even though the fellowship group members looked to the Bible for guidance, labeling the judge's conduct as prejudicial misconduct did not violate the judge's right to practice his religion. A judge may not participate in an ongoing support group where defendants with cases pending before him or her discuss their attempts to comply with the terms of their plea bargains.

(8) Judges § 6.2—Discipline—Removal From Office—Grounds—Prejudicial Misconduct in Office—Ex Parte Contacts With Criminal Defendant—Effect on Sentencing.—A judge committed prejudicial misconduct by engaging in improper ex parte contacts with a criminal defendant and by taking an active part in the subsequent sentencing of the defendant. The defendant attended the same church as the judge, had worked on the judge's campaign, and participated in a men's fellowship group that the judge led. When the defendant pleaded guilty to a second offense of driving with excessive blood-alcohol content, the judge felt uncomfortable sentencing the defendant and decided to allow counsel to agree to the punishment. However, at the time of sentencing, the judge proposed that, in lieu of a fine and a jail sentence, the defendant would be required to perform community service by working on the construction of an addition to the courthouse. Subsequently, after the addition was not approved, the judge gave the defendant a list of possible community service projects from which to choose. This was prejudicial misconduct. The judge recognized that his ex parte contacts created a conflict, and his initial solution was simply to cede the sentencing decision to counsel. He did not disclose his ex parte contacts to the district attorney or to defense counsel. Moreover, despite his ex parte contacts and his decision not to participate in sentencing, the judge took control of sentencing and imposed an unusually lenient sentence that included no actual jail time.

(9) Judges § 6.2—Discipline—Removal From Office—Grounds—Prejudicial Misconduct in Office—Ex Parte Contacts With Criminal Defendant—Traffic Offender.—A judge committed prejudicial misconduct in handling the case of a traffic offender. The judge knew the offender, informally discussed the offender's situation at a restaurant, and agreed to give the offender an extension of time in order to perform community service in lieu of a fine. The judge then altered the official court file to reflect his informal handling of the matter. This ex parte handling of the matter confused the offender and required the judge to give the offender still another chance after a warrant was issued when the offender failed either to pay a fine or to perform community service.

(10) Judges § 6.2—Discipline—Removal From Office—Grounds—Prejudicial Misconduct in Office—Ex Parte Contacts With Criminal Defendant—Continuation of Matter Involving Defendant Known to Judge.—A judge committed prejudicial misconduct in continuing to preside over a zoning violations case despite his personal knowledge of the relevant circumstances and his ongoing personal relationship with the defendant. The defendant had been on probation for brandishing a firearm and subsequently participated in a men's fellowship group that the judge led. At the group's meetings, the judge counseled the defendant about the defendant's personality and marital problems. Also, the judge was aware of the zoning violations and had advised the defendant to resolve them. Because of the conflict that these contacts created, the judge exercised no substantive judgment in considering the district attorney's continuance requests. By his own admission, the judge thought the district attorney was giving the defendant too much time to clean up his property, creating a potential for another confrontation with his neighbor. But for his decision not to make substantive rulings in the case, the judge might not have acceded to all of the continuance requests. Rather than participating in the case under these circumstances, he should have recused himself. In failing to do so, the judge committed prejudicial misconduct.

(11) Judges § 6.2—Discipline—Removal From Office—Grounds—Prejudicial Misconduct in Office—Ex Parte Contact With Witness.—A judge committed prejudicial misconduct by having an ex parte contact with a witness in a criminal prosecution for assault with a deadly weapon, a BB rifle. The district attorney proposed that the defendant plead guilty to simple battery and receive a sentence of eight days of community service and a fine, since the victim had no objection, and since the Army might not accept the defendant if he served a jail term. At the court hearing, the judge telephoned the park ranger who had arrested the defendant and conducted a conversation without putting the telephone on a speaker so the defendant and counsel could only hear the judge's side of the conversation. During the conversation, the judge referred to the defendant as a "punk" and made comments such as "That's what I thought. Bad attitude." After, the call, the judge stated that the ranger affirmed that the defendant had a bad attitude, and the judge stated that he would not accept the prosecutor's proposed plea bargain. This constituted prejudicial misconduct. Even if the judge was concerned about embarrassing the ranger, this did not excuse the judge's decision to exclude counsel and the defendant from a conversation in which he obtained information that influenced his handling of the case. Furthermore, there was nothing to show that the parties stipulated that the judge could make these calls or exclude them from his conversation.

(12) Judges § 6.2—Discipline—Removal From Office—Grounds—Prejudicial Misconduct in Office—Ex Parte Contacts Concerning Bench Warrants.—A judge committed prejudicial misconduct in making ex parte contacts with defendants who were subject to bench warrants. On multiple occasions, the judge telephoned defendants, including defendants he knew, for whom bench warrants had been issued to advise them to come to court. The judge should not have conducted court business through informal, ex parte contacts over the telephone. Even if the judge believed that this was the most efficient way to handle these warrants or that some of the arrest warrants might have been improper, he was not entitled to address this problem through ex parte telephone contacts.

(13) Judges § 6.2—Discipline—Removal From Office—Grounds—Prejudicial Misconduct in Office—Prejudgment of Evidence.—A judge committed prejudicial misconduct during a criminal prosecution for driving under the influence by expressing his prejudgment of a defense witness's credibility. During the preliminary hearing, defense counsel requested a continuance to subpoena a witness who would testify that he, rather than the defendant, was driving during the incident at issue. The judge stated that he had dealt with the witness in the past and that "his credibility is not too high." He further stated that the witness and a prosecution witness were both recovering alcoholics who could not be believed. The judge was not simply fulfilling his duty as a judge to disclose his personal knowledge and opinion of a defense witness. He failed to disclose his opinion of the witness at the start of the preliminary hearing despite his knowledge that the witness was the defendant's primary witness; the judge waited until after hearing the arresting officers' testimony before informing defense counsel. More important, the judge made his remarks to persuade defense counsel not to call the witness and to agree to end the preliminary hearing. This attempt to influence counsel's handling of the case by disclosing his bias against the defendant's primary witness and his prejudgment of that witness's credibility constituted prejudicial misconduct.

(14) Judges § 6.2—Discipline—Removal From Office—Grounds—Prejudicial Misconduct in Office—Reaction to Party's Attempt to Disqualify Judge—Refusal to Appoint Defense Counsel.—A judge committed prejudicial misconduct during a criminal prosecution by refusing to appoint a public defender who had stated her intention to disqualify the judge. The defendant was not represented at the preliminary hearing, and he asked the public defender, who had been in the courtroom, to accompany him while he considered a plea offer. When they returned to the courtroom, the public defender stated that the defendant was qualified for representation and asked to be appointed. She then began negotiating on the defendant's behalf, believing she was representing the defendant, since the judge's previous practice was to accept her representation without a formal statement of appointment. When the public defender believed that the judge's comments indicated that he would not be fair and impartial, she stated that she would seek to disqualify him. The judge then asked for a qualification form and eventually appointed a different public defender. In so retaliating against the public defender, the judge committed prejudicial misconduct. The judge raised a question regarding the public defender's representation only after she indicated her intent to disqualify him. Also, his request for a qualification form for defendant was contrary to his prior practice, and he appointed a substitute public defender without inquiring or commenting further about the defendant's eligibility. These facts indicated that the judge's purported concern about the public defender's alleged failure to qualify the defendant was merely a pretext for his decision to exclude the public defender because of her expressed intent to disqualify him.

(15a, 15b) Judges § 6.2—Discipline—Removal From Office—Grounds—Prejudicial Misconduct in Office—Reaction to Party's Attempt to Disqualify Judge—Anger at Defense Counsel.—A judge committed prejudicial misconduct in a criminal case by his angry reaction to defense counsel's motion to disqualify the judge. The defendant was accused of shoplifting four rolls of developed film. The judge approved of defense counsel's suggestion of informal diversion, but when the prosecutor suggested a $150 fine, defense counsel stated that the defendant could not afford it. When the judge asked how the defendant could claim she could pay for the items but not the fine, defense counsel detected animosity on his part and moved to disqualify him. At the time of this matter, the pertinent canon of judicial conduct required that a judge should be patient, dignified, and courteous to litigants, jurors, witnesses, lawyers, and others with whom the judge deals in an official capacity. In this case, the judge responded angrily the very first time defense counsel, understandably concerned that the judge had become impatient with the defendant, mentioned disqualification. He immediately began yelling at defense counsel about her use of the disqualification procedure. After expressing his view that the defendant's explanation was not credible, the judge returned to the disqualification issue, again yelling at defense counsel that he was "sick and tired" of her disqualification threats and was "not going to have it anymore." Even though defense counsel's conduct may have contributed to the undignified atmosphere, in light of the entire incident, the judge's behavior in response to the disqualification attempt constituted prejudicial misconduct.

(16) Judges § 8—Powers and Duties—Control of Attorney's Behavior.—Cal. Code Jud. Ethics, canon 3B(4), directs a judge to "require" lawyers to be "patient, dignified, and courteous" in their courtroom behavior. In performing this duty, trial judges confronted with disruptive, contumacious, stubbornly defiant attorneys must be given sufficient discretion to meet the circumstances of each case.

(17a, 17b) Judges § 6.2—Discipline—Removal From Office—Grounds—Willful Misconduct in Office—Refusal to Dismiss Criminal Complaint.—A judge committed willful misconduct by refusing to dismiss a criminal complaint and by reviewing the file and subpoenaing witnesses. The defendant had been charged with driving under the influence of alcohol with a prior conviction for driving with excessive blood-alcohol content. As part of a plea bargain in a separate matter, the district attorney moved to dismiss the charges, and the judge refused and ordered the district attorney to file an amended complaint adding another prior conviction allegation. The district attorney again moved to dismiss, and the judge denied the motion on the ground that there should be a trial for a recidivist drunk driver. The district attorney stated that it was improper for the judge to consider the defendant a drunk driver without personal knowledge of the facts and asked the judge to disqualify himself. The judge committed prejudicial misconduct. He attempted to intrude on the district attorney's authority, but not by simply suggesting a course of action; the judge, by having his clerk review the file and subpoena all prosecution witnesses, took it upon himself to do the district attorney's job. He thus deprived the defendant of an impartial judge. Moreover, the judge took his actions because of a personal conflict with the district attorney, who was a political rival.

(18) Judges § 8—Powers and Duties—Impartiality.—There is a compelling public interest in maintaining a judicial system that is, both in fact and as publicly perceived, fair, impartial, and efficient. Thus, judges cannot be advocates for the interests of any parties; they must be, and be perceived to be, neutral arbiters of both fact and law who apply the law uniformly and consistently.

(19a-19c) Judges § 6.2—Discipline—Removal From Office—Grounds—Willful Misconduct in Office—Involvement in Investigation of Church Pastor.—The evidence was insufficient to support a finding that a judge committed willful or prejudicial misconduct by asking a police officer, who was investigating a child molestation case, to investigate whether the suspect's church pastor was a licensed counselor. Although the judge had been a member of the same church and had had a dispute with the pastor, he was not acting in a judicial capacity. First, he was not performing one of the functions generally associated with his position as a judge. Second, although the judge was in his chambers when he met with the officer, that location was simply a convenient meeting place that the officer selected. The meeting had nothing to do with the judge's work as a judge, but rather his status as someone who knew individuals involved in the matter that the officer was investigating. Third, there was no evidence that the judge attempted to curry favor with the officer on account of his judicial status. Nor did the pastor's deposition testimony that the officer "felt obligated to perform the investigation" constitute clear and convincing evidence that the judge used, or attempted to use, his authority as a judge for improper ends. Further, the record did not indicate that the judge attempted to pressure the officer into investigating the pastor, and as a church elder, the judge was legitimately concerned about the pastor's conduct and his qualifications. Finally, the only evidence that the judge asked the officer to investigate the pastor was hearsay that did not amount to clear and convincing evidence.

(20) Evidence § 33—Hearsay—Weight Accorded.—Even unchallenged hearsay statements should be evaluated for what they are worth. The statements should be weighed by the trier of fact the same as other evidence and may be disregarded where shown to be unconvincing or insubstantial.

(21) Judges § 6.4—Discipline—Recommendation by Commission on Judicial Performance—Review by Supreme Court—Factual Findings.—On review of a recommendation by the Commission on Judicial Performance of discipline of a judge, the California Supreme Court accords special weight to the factual findings of the special masters, not to those of the commission.

(22a, 22b) Judges § 6.2—Discipline—Removal From Office—Grounds—Prejudicial Misconduct in Office—Continuing to Preside Over

Criminal Case After Disqualification Motion.—A judge committed prejudicial misconduct arising from his continuing to preside over a criminal case after a motion for disqualification had been lodged. He did not commit misconduct by refusing to transfer the matter after the disqualification motion and deciding to consider whether the defendant's right to a speedy trial had been violated. At most this constituted legal error that was not subject to discipline. Nor did he commit prejudicial misconduct in resuming the hearing despite the issuance of a writ ordering him to accept the peremptory challenge to qualification or in suggesting that the defendant's remedy was to petition for a writ. However, the judge did commit prejudicial misconduct in responding to his peremptory disqualification by publicly criticizing the prosecutors and the county court on the record. The judge expressed "shock" and "embarrassment" about the conduct of the "officers of the court" and accused them of "playing games" notwithstanding their pledge to uphold the law, support the Constitution, and protect "the people's rights." He also proclaimed that he did not "want anything to do with this court again."

(23) Judges § 6—Discipline—Legal Errors.—A judge should not be disciplined for mere erroneous determination of legal issues that are subject to reasonable differences of opinion, including questions concerning the limitations on the judicial power.

(24) Judges § 6—Discipline—Commission on Judicial Performance—Purpose of Proceedings.—In making its independent determination of the appropriate disciplinary sanction, the California Supreme Court considers the purpose of a Commission on Judicial Performance disciplinary proceeding, which is not punishment, but rather the protection of the public, the enforcement of rigorous standards of judicial conduct, and the maintenance of public confidence in the integrity and independence of the judicial system. The court's task is to determine the nature of the discipline, if any, that is necessary to achieve these goals.

(25) Judges § 6.2—Discipline—Removal From Office—Grounds—Multiple Acts of Willful and Prejudicial Misconduct in Office.—Removal from office was warranted for a judge who committed multiple acts of willful and prejudicial misconduct, including ex parte communications with parties or witnesses in several criminal cases, multiple undignified reactions to parties' disqualification motions, and mishandling criminal cases. In disciplinary proceedings, the number of wrongful acts is relevant to determining whether they were merely isolated occurrences or, instead, part of a course of conduct establishing a lack of temperament and an inability to perform judicial functions in an evenhanded manner. In this case, the judge twice committed willful misconduct, and he committed prejudicial misconduct on multiple occasions. Together, these incidents reflected a continuing, pervasive pattern of misconduct, and his lack of judicial temperament was manifest. Also, the incidents of misconduct occurred during virtually the judge's entire term in office, and his previous legal experience should have acquainted him with proper procedures. In any event, lack of experience cannot mitigate willful misconduct. Moreover, rather than expressing contrition, the judge instead alleged there was a conspiracy against him. This belied any claim that he had learned from past experience and had modified his courtroom behavior. It demonstrated instead an inability to appreciate the importance of, and conform to, the standards of judicial conduct that are essential if justice is to be meted out in every case. Thus, censure was not sufficient.

OPINION

THE COURT.—Judge Thomas B. Fletcher of the Madera Superior Court has petitioned for review of the recommendation of the Commission on Judicial Performance (Commission) that we remove him from office for willful misconduct and "conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute" (prejudicial misconduct). (Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, former subd. (c) (former subdivision (c)), see now art. VI, § 18, subd. (d).)[1] Judge Fletcher (petitioner) concedes that he committed some of the misconduct underlying the recommendation and that "his actions call for severe censure." However, he contests many of the Commission's misconduct findings and argues that removal "is inappropriately harsh under the facts" of this case. Having independently reviewed the record, we find clear and convincing evidence to sustain all but one of the Commission's misconduct findings. Moreover, although some of the incidents of misconduct may seem relatively minor, many unquestionably are not, and the record as a whole establishes a persistent pattern of misconduct that reflects a lack of judicial temperament. Accordingly, we adopt the Commission's removal recommendation.

[1]In 1994, by approving Proposition 190, the voters significantly changed the procedure for disciplining judges under article VI, section 18 of the California Constitution. Because the conduct at issue here occurred before the constitutional amendments took effect on March 1, 1995, we apply the former version of article VI, section 18. (Dodds v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1995) 12 Cal.4th 163, 168, fn. 1 [48 Cal.Rptr.2d 106, 906 P.2d 1260] (Dodds).)

I. PROCEDURAL BACKGROUND

In 1988, petitioner was elected, and then appointed, as Judge of the Sierra Justice Court in Madera County. He was later reelected to that office for a term beginning in January 1995. However, at that time, he became a municipal court judge of the Sierra Judicial District by operation of Proposition 191. By virtue of court consolidation on July 1, 1998, while this matter was pending, petitioner became a judge of the Madera Superior Court.

In February 1995, the Commission voted to initiate formal proceedings against petitioner. It later prepared a notice of formal proceedings alleging numerous counts of either willful or prejudicial misconduct, and two amended notices of formal proceedings. On February 20, 1996, before three special masters this court appointed, an eight-day hearing began on the charges in the Commission's second amended notice of formal proceedings, which alleged nineteen counts (many with subcounts) of either willful or prejudicial misconduct. The special masters filed their final report with the Commission on June 4, 1996, finding that petitioner had committed either willful or prejudicial misconduct in a number of the instances alleged.

After hearing oral argument as scheduled on August 22, 1996, the Commission ordered the case submitted. Petitioner, who failed to appear on August 22, moved to vacate submission, explaining that he had received a letter containing the notice of the August 22 argument but never opened it. The Commission granted the motion and held argument on October 23, 1996. It issued its decision and recommendation on January 10, 1997. Seven members of the Commission voted to recommend petitioner's removal from office; the remaining three members voted for severe public censure. Petitioner filed his petition with this court in July 1997.[2]

II. APPLICABLE LEGAL STANDARDS

(1) As relevant in this case, former subdivision (c) authorized removal of a judge from office for "willful misconduct in office." Willful misconduct is "unjudicial conduct committed in bad faith by a judge acting in his

[2]Resolution of this case has been delayed significantly by repeated filing extensions that petitioner requested so that he could address the numerous misconduct counts underlying the Commission's removal recommendation.

judicial capacity." (Spruance v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications (1975) 13 Cal.3d 778, 795 [119 Cal.Rptr. 841, 532 P.2d 1209] (Spruance).) As we recently explained in Broadman v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1998) 18 Cal.4th 1079, 1092 [77 Cal.Rptr.2d 408, 959 P.2d 715] (Broadman), to support a finding of bad faith, the evidence must establish that the judge performed a judicial act (1) "for a corrupt purpose (which is any purpose other than the faithful discharge of judicial duties)," or (2) "with knowledge that the act is beyond the judge's lawful judicial power," or (3) "that exceeds the judge's lawful power with a conscious disregard for the limits of the judge's authority."

Former subdivision (c) also authorized removal of a judge from office for prejudicial misconduct, i.e., "conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute." Prejudicial misconduct includes acts that a judge "undertakes in good faith but which nevertheless would appear to an objective observer to be not only unjudicial conduct but conduct prejudicial to public esteem for the judicial office." (Geiler v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications (1973) 10 Cal.3d 270, 284 [110 Cal.Rptr. 201, 515 P.2d 1], fn. omitted.) It also includes "wilful misconduct out of office, i.e., unjudicial conduct committed in bad faith by a judge not then acting in a judicial capacity." (Id. at p. 284, fn. 11.) "In this context, bad faith means a culpable mental state beyond mere negligence and consisting of either knowing or not caring that the conduct being undertaken is unjudicial and prejudicial to public esteem. In sum, to constitute prejudicial conduct, a judge's actions must bring 'the judicial office into disrepute,' that is, the conduct would appear to an objective observer to be prejudicial to ' "public esteem for the judicial office." (Broadman, supra, 18 Cal.4th at p. 1089.) We independently review the evidentiary record and will sustain the charges of misconduct only if clear and convincing evidence proves them to a reasonable certainty. (Kennick v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1990) 50 Cal.3d 297, 314 [267 Cal.Rptr. 293, 787 P.2d 591, 87 A.L.R.4th 679] (Kennick).) We give " 'special weight' " to the special masters' factual determinations, because they "had the advantage of observing the demeanor of the various witnesses. Based on our factual findings and legal conclusions, we then determine independently what, if any, discipline is appropriate. (Id. at pp. 168-169.)

III. SPECIFIC CHARGES

As we have noted, petitioner concedes he committed prejudicial misconduct in some instances. However, he challenges many of the Commission's findings of prejudicial misconduct and all of its findings of willful misconduct. Because they are relevant to the proper level of discipline, we first briefly summarize the uncontested charges. We then consider the contested charges.

A. Conceded Prejudicial Misconduct

1. Count Four: Improper Entry of Judgment Against Nonparty

On November 30, 1992, in a small claims matter involving construction work done on property, judgment was entered for Thorn Hertwig against Tyrone Henderson as agent for Rickey Henderson. In January 1993, Hertwig amended his claim to add Rickey Henderson as a defendant. On May 24, 1993, the parties appeared for trial, and petitioner conducted a settlement conference. Also present was Ben Savage, the realtor who had sold the property to Rickey Henderson, who came to court as a witness for Hertwig. The parties agreed to a settlement, and a judgment was entered on May 24, 1993, directing Rickey Henderson to pay Hertwig $1,357.93. According to petitioner, the judgment did not mention Savage because Savage, although agreeing to pay damages, did not want a judgment entered against him. Savage disputed petitioner's recollection, testifying that he did not agree or respond when petitioner stated at the settlement conference that Savage should pay half of the damages. Savage later failed to pay Hertwig. In February 1994, although Savage had never been named or served in the action, petitioner directed entry of a "corrected" judgment that identified him as a defendant and directed him to pay damages. Savage appealed to the superior court, which reversed the judgment.

On these facts, the Commission unanimously concluded that petitioner committed prejudicial misconduct because he "made no effort to comply with or follow the law when he entered judgment" without providing Savage, who was never named as a party, notice and an opportunity to be heard. The Commission reasoned that petitioner "acted solely upon his belief that Savage ought to pay, and his pique that [Savage] did not." Petitioner does not contest the Commission's findings and conclusion. (See Gonzalez v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1983) 33 Cal.3d 359, 374 [188 Cal.Rptr. 880, 657 P.2d 372] (Gonzalez) [basing discipline on "disregard for even the minimal requirements of fairness and due process"].)

2. Count Ten: Improper Comments About Counsel

Attorney Nancy Staggs, who was representing a criminal defendant before petitioner, did not appear at a scheduled hearing. After an unrecorded telephone conference with Staggs's office, petitioner stated in open court: "She shouldn't be handling criminal cases. [¶] Here's another example of a civil attorney who shouldn't be handling criminal cases." Petitioner then commented that Staggs "probably had something more important to do today, like go to a PTA meeting." He continued: "She has a whole bunch of kids. She's been having kids ever since I've known her." Before the special masters, petitioner denied making these comments, suggested that the court reporter "made [them] up" to assist petitioner's political opponents, and stated that he had instead made complimentary remarks about Staggs. However, he also admitted sending Staggs a letter of apology. In his petition to this court, petitioner "accepts the [Commission's unanimous] finding that his statements concerning Ms. Staggs were inappropriate and could be deemed" prejudicial misconduct. (See Kennick, supra, 50 Cal.3d at p. 325 [basing finding of prejudicial misconduct on "unprofessional, demeaning and sexist" remarks].)

3. Count Fourteen: Improper Use of Court Staff for Campaign Purposes

During the first half of 1994, petitioner was running for reelection; the primary was scheduled for June 7, 1994. At the end of a court session in late April 1994, petitioner had a group photograph taken of court staff and others who appeared before him. Petitioner's clerk and the public defender initially declined petitioner's request that they pose for the picture. The public defender was busy with clients when petitioner came to her office and made the request. However, after petitioner "insisted" that they participate, both reluctantly agreed. Petitioner's clerk felt that petitioner had "ordered" her to participate and that she had no choice.

Based on petitioner's representations, almost all of those photographed believed the picture was simply a personal memento; none understood that petitioner would use it in his reelection campaign.[3] Indeed, both the public defender and the clerk had informed petitioner they did not want to be involved in the campaign. Despite this knowledge and contrary to his representations, in May 1994, petitioner asked a local newspaper to print the photograph. The newspaper responded that, because of the imminent election, it would not do so without charge, and that it would publish the photograph only as a paid advertisement. Petitioner agreed to pay to have the picture published. On May 26, one week before the election, the picture appeared in the paper with the caption, "PAID POLITICAL ADVERTISEMENT."[4]

On this record, the special masters concluded that "part of [petitioner's] motivation in placing the advertisement was to assist his re-election campaign," and that by failing to get consent from those photographed, his "conduct surrounding the taking and use of the photograph . . . constitute[d]" prejudicial misconduct. The Commission unanimously agreed.

In this court, petitioner "concedes the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain" the conclusion that he committed prejudicial misconduct in using the photograph for political purposes without getting consent from all participants. However, he contests the conclusion that his conduct surrounding the taking of the photograph constituted prejudicial misconduct.

4. Count Seventeen: Telling Clerk She Was in Contempt

On August 12, 1992, petitioner met in his chambers with a court clerk to discuss her "pending termination from employment." After petitioner informed the clerk of the meeting's purpose and that he was tape-recording their conversation, the clerk replied that she did not want to discuss the issue unless her union representative was present, and she started to leave. Petitioner then stated: "Sit down . . . . I am ordering you to sit down here and talk to me." The clerk left petitioner's chambers. Petitioner followed her and "ordered her back into the office," but "she refused to come" and made a telephone call. As she made the call, petitioner, who was "upset," said "loudly": "[Y]ou are in contempt." Petitioner "does not dispute" the Commission's unanimous finding that he committed prejudicial misconduct in making this statement.

[4]In his answer, petitioner stated that the newspaper "may have told [him] that [the picture] would be labeled, 'PAID POLITICAL ADVERTISEMENT.' "

5. Count One A: Ex Parte Communications Regarding Richard Henderson

After his arrest on June 26, 1994, Richard Henderson was charged with possession of cocaine and marijuana. Petitioner later spoke with Henderson's uncle, who asked petitioner whether Henderson's mother could talk to him about Henderson's case and about helping Henderson with his drug problem. Petitioner replied that she could call him, but advised that she should not discuss the case with him. Henderson's uncle, who is a clergyman, expressed an interest in counseling Henderson.

Henderson's mother telephoned petitioner at his home a few days later to discuss her son's case and to make an appointment to see petitioner. She related Henderson's version of the arrest to petitioner. She also told petitioner that her son had a drug problem and smoked marijuana with his father. She requested that her son receive a heavy sentence that included Christian counseling. Petitioner, who knew the case would be before him, told her the district attorney would decide whether Henderson received drug counseling as part of any disposition. Petitioner did not believe the contact was improper because he viewed it as "a confidential mother asking for help for her son" and he "believed that [Henderson] would not even know of the conversation." Petitioner did not believe Henderson was entitled to know petitioner was communicating with Henderson's family members regarding his drug use. During the conversation, petitioner set up a meeting with Henderson's parents for sometime during the next two weeks.

On August 2, at the beginning of a hearing on Henderson's case, petitioner met with counsel in his chambers and disclosed his discussion with Henderson's parents and uncle about counseling, and the uncle's desire to be involved in the counseling. He also informed counsel that, because of these contacts, he was "out of this case," and the probation department should consider whether Henderson qualified for diversion and counseling.

After the probation department prepared the diversion report, but before a scheduled September 6 diversion hearing, petitioner met with Henderson's parents in his chambers. He gave them a copy of the diversion report and the police report "so they could see the situation there and the problems that they ha[d] with their son." He also advised them about how to deal with Henderson. Henderson's parents again requested that their son receive a heavy sentence that included Christian counseling. Petitioner replied that he could not order someone to receive Christian counseling.

Sometime after Henderson received diversion, his father left a telephone message for petitioner. When petitioner returned the call, Henderson's father stated that Henderson was not complying with diversion requirements. Petitioner then determined that the probation department had not received notice Henderson was on diversion because the minute order did not reflect this disposition.

The Commission unanimously found that petitioner's ex parte contacts with members of Henderson's family constituted prejudicial misconduct. Petitioner concedes that these contacts "gave 'rise to an appearance of impropriety,'" "could reasonably be considered prejudicial to public esteem for the judicial office," and "constituted prejudicial conduct." (4)(See fn. 5.) (See former Cal. Code Jud. Conduct, now Cal. Code Jud. Ethics, canon 3B(7), adopted eff. Oct. 5, 1992 [prohibiting ex parte communications].)[5]

B. Contested Charges

1. Counts One A and Three: Handling of the Henderson Matter

In connection with the Richard Henderson matter, the Commission also unanimously concluded that petitioner committed prejudicial misconduct in failing to disqualify himself and willful misconduct in directing alteration of court records to mislead the Commission.

(a) Count One A: Failure to Disqualify

At the August 2 hearing on Henderson's case, defense counsel stated that Henderson had said petitioner was a friend of Henderson's uncle and that diversion was "a done deal." According to petitioner, on hearing this information, he concluded that Henderson did not deserve diversion because he was using his parents and uncle to manipulate the court. At that point, petitioner determined that his ex parte contacts and his feelings about Henderson had created a conflict and he decided to disqualify himself from making the diversion decision. Petitioner informed counsel of his decision, referred the matter to the probation department for preparation of a diversion report, and scheduled a diversion hearing for September 6. The probation department's report recommended against diversion, finding Henderson statutorily ineligible because of a prior conviction.

[5]Although the canons of judicial conduct "do not have the force of law or regulation, they reflect a judicial consensus regarding appropriate behavior, and are helpful in giving content to the constitutional standards under which disciplinary proceedings are charged. [Citations.] [¶] We therefore expect that all judges will comply with the canons. Failure to do so suggests performance below the minimum level necessary to maintain public confidence in the administration of justice." (Kloepfer v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1989) 49 Cal.3d 826, 838, fn. 6 [264 Cal.Rptr. 100, 782 P.2d 239, 89 A.L.R.4th 235] (Kloepfer).) We cite the canons that were effective on the date of the misconduct that petitioner committed.

At the September 6 hearing, the district attorney expressed willingness to consider diversion despite the recommendation. After Henderson's counsel asked the court to consider diversion, petitioner replied: "Well, I don't want to consider it. Number one is because . . . I know his uncle. I've talked to his uncle about getting him diversion and getting him treatment. And because of that, I don't think I should make the decision." Defense counsel then asked: "Should we send it down to Madera Justice Court?" Petitioner replied: "No. I—if you two can work it out, that's fine with me. I'll go along with anything. [¶] I just want to put it on the record that I've talked to his uncle about helping him on a diversion, if he gets diversion. [¶] And I think if I got involved in overruling the Probation Department at this point, I think it would be a conflict."

Contrary to his stated intent, petitioner then discussed with counsel Henderson's prior conviction, the reported level of his drug use, and his family situation, remarking on comments Henderson's uncle had made to petitioner about this subject. When defense counsel suggested getting a second probation report, petitioner replied: "I don't think they're going to change their mind." Counsel then asked: "You don't want to have another report?" Petitioner responded: "No. That would just tick them off." Defense counsel then expressed doubt about the probation department's conclusion regarding statutory eligibility. Petitioner then interjected: "Yeah, well, the problem is, too, it says here, a 'daily use of cocaine.' [¶] And diversion . . . was originated for people who are in danger or might become endangered. When you have a regular user, C.R.C. is the place for them." Petitioner also expressed doubt about the relevance of the fact that Henderson had not been caught using drugs for some time. Finally, petitioner asked: "What do the People want to do?" The district attorney then suggested getting a "rap sheet" and noted "numerous instances" where the court, on the prosecution's recommendation, had overridden the probation department's recommendation. Petitioner replied: "Absolutely. No problem with that. [¶] But I told you I have a conflict with that." At counsel's suggestion, petitioner then continued the diversion hearing to September 20 and set it before himself.

At the hearing on September 20, the district attorney recommended diversion. Petitioner responded: "All right. [¶] I told you that I wasn't going to make the decision in this. It's up to you." Henderson's counsel "ask[ed] for the court's order for diversion even though the [probation] report [did] not seem to be too favorable." Petitioner replied: "All right. [¶] Then . . . under the People's recommendation, I'll grant you diversion." He also directed Henderson to appear on March 21, 1995, for review of his compliance with the terms of diversion. Petitioner later explained to the Commission: "I should have denied the [diversion] request and set the case for another hearing with another Judge, but knowing that the Court usually goes along with the D.A. recommendation in these type [sic] of cases, and the problem of getting a visiting Judge on a Tuesday for one case, I went along with the D.A. and granted diversion."

On this record, the Commission unanimously adopted the special masters' conclusion that petitioner committed prejudicial misconduct by "fail[ing] to disqualify himself after the ex parte communications" and improperly "delegat[ing] his [judicial] power [to order diversion] away to the District Attorney to avoid a conflict." Petitioner challenges these conclusions, noting that he "fully disclosed his [ex parte] contact," he indicated he did not want to decide the diversion question because of a conflict, the parties did not seek his recusal, and he had no independent duty to disqualify himself. He also challenges the conclusion that he improperly delegated his judicial authority, arguing that diversion was a "foregone conclusion" in this case.

(5) We find clear and convincing evidence to support the Commission's conclusions. By statute, a judge "shall be disqualified" if "[f]or any reason (A) the judge believes his or her recusal would further the interests of justice, (B) the judge believes there is a substantial doubt as to his or her capacity to be impartial, or (C) a person aware of the facts might reasonably entertain a doubt that the judge would be able to be impartial." (Code Civ. Proc., § 170.1, subd. (a)(6).) Petitioner was disqualified under this provision; he himself testified before the special masters that he had personal feelings about the propriety of granting diversion and that he should therefore not participate in the decision, based on his ex parte communications and Henderson's comment to his attorney that diversion was "a done deal." As petitioner later explained to the Commission: "I wasn't going to make the [diversion] decision, because I felt if I denied diversion it would look like I was mad at them, which I was. [¶] I was very angry at Mr. Henderson for playing games with his family . . . . And I felt that I needed to get out of the case." Disqualification based on the judge's "personal bias or prejudice concerning a party" may not be waived. (Code Civ. Proc., § 170.3, subd. (b)(2)(A).) Moreover, even as to waivable disqualifications, a waiver must be written, "signed by all parties and their attorneys and filed in the record." (Code Civ. Proc., § 170.3, subd. (b)(1); see Adams v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1995) 10 Cal.4th 866, 906 [42 Cal.Rptr.2d 606, 897 P.2d 544] (Adams).) Thus, petitioner's suggestion that the parties waived the disqualification is unconvincing.

We also agree that petitioner improperly delegated his judicial authority regarding diversion to the district attorney. Petitioner incorrectly contends that, because diversion was a "foregone conclusion" in this case, delegating this decision did not constitute prejudicial misconduct. Regardless of the likelihood that Henderson would receive diversion, as petitioner conceded during the Commission proceedings, "legally it was [petitioner's] decision," and he "should have . . . set the case for another hearing with another Judge" rather than address his conflict by ceding his power to the district attorney. Petitioner's decision to follow the latter course constituted prejudicial misconduct. (See McCartney v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications (1974) 12 Cal.3d 512, 532 [116 Cal.Rptr. 260, 526 P.2d 268] (McCartney) [judge improperly delegated judicial power and committed misconduct by imposing sentences bailiff suggested]; cf. Fewel v. Fewel (1943) 23 Cal.2d 431, 436 [144 P.2d 592] [judicial decisionmaking " 'may not be delegated to investigators or other subordinate officials or attachés of the court, or anyone else' "].)

(b) Count Three: Alteration of Court Records

The record contains three documents entitled "Notice, Sentence, Commitment Form" that purport to memorialize Henderson's September 20 diversion hearing. As to disposition, the first, exhibit No. 17, is blank. The second, exhibit No. 18, appears to be a copy of the first with addition of the following handwritten entry for Henderson's sentence: "Formal Diversion granted. Father to find counselling program."[6] The third, exhibit No. 19, appears to be a copy of the second with a handwritten addition indicating, "per Dan Pursell," who was the district attorney on the case. Toward the bottom of the form, the following phrase was added to exhibit No. 19: "Judge Fletcher Disqualifies himself for any violation of Diversion Hearings." Finally, a handwritten "Post-it" note attached to exhibit No. 19 stated: "Judge Fletcher—disq. himself."

On October 26, one of the court clerks, Fran Saunders, faxed exhibit No. 18 to the probation department to inform it of the diversion disposition. On October 25, the Commission sent petitioner a letter of inquiry regarding the ex parte contacts and the grant of diversion in the Henderson matter. Petitioner's December 30 response to the Commission letter attached a copy of exhibit No. 19, but did not inform the Commission that the exhibit contained entries that did not appear on exhibit No. 18. On November 2, the Commission obtained a copy of exhibit No. 18 from the probation department as part of the investigation of petitioner. In January 1995, the Commission asked petitioner to comment on allegations that, between October 26, 1994, and his December 30 response to the Commission, during the Commission's investigation, he directed alteration of the original minute order.

Saunders testified as follows regarding preparation of these documents: On September 20, 1994, or sometime after that date but before October 26, she prepared a minute order in the form of exhibit No. 18.[7] She received a telephone call from the probation department regarding the status of the case. In response to the inquiry, on October 26, she faxed the probation department a copy of the then existing minute order, which was in the form of exhibit No. 18.[8] A few days later, petitioner approached Saunders and directed her to change the minute order to reflect that he had disqualified himself from future hearings in the case and that diversion was granted "per Dan Pursell." She asked petitioner whether he wanted her to prepare an amended minute order, because the court's policy was to prepare amended orders when existing orders were changed. Petitioner "said no, he didn't, just to change it." Saunders did not recall petitioner's stating in court on September 20 that he was disqualifying himself from hearings on diversion violations. She testified that the minute order she originally prepared would have reflected that disqualification had she heard petitioner make that statement.

(6) On this record, we agree with the Commission's unanimous conclusion that petitioner committed willful misconduct in his handling of the minute orders. Petitioner directed the clerk to alter a minute order and, contrary to court policy, not to indicate she had changed the order. The evidence strongly suggests he took this action after receiving the Commission's inquiry about his ex parte communications in the case. Petitioner told the Commission he received the inquiry within 48 hours of an October 26 telephone conversation with Henderson's father, and Saunders testified that petitioner directed her to alter the minute order within a few days of that date. In any event, petitioner submitted a copy of exhibit No. 19 to the Commission with his December 30 response without disclosing that he had directed alteration of the minute order to support his explanation of the events in the Henderson case. Petitioner's actions in this regard constituted willful misconduct. (See Wenger v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1981) 29 Cal.3d 615, 643-645 [175 Cal.Rptr. 420, 630 P.2d 954] (Wenger) [backdating affidavit was willful misconduct].)

In defense of his actions, petitioner argues that he did not commit willful misconduct because the alterations simply conformed the minute orders to the docket entry for the September 20 hearing, which petitioner asserts "was completed contemporaneously with the court session" and constituted the court's "official minutes." This docket entry, petitioner maintains, "was the source of all of the material added to Exhibit 17, to make Exhibits 18 and 19 in order to accurately reflect what had occurred." "This being so," petitioner continues, "Exhibits 17, 18 and 19 are merely draft documents that cannot be 'altered' and would not mislead experienced readers." According to petitioner, "[t]he editing of a draft document cannot be an impermissible alteration if the draft document is, as yet, incomplete."

[7]The testimony was uncertain regarding the origin of exhibit No. 17, the blank minute order that Henderson signed. The official court file did not contain a copy of an order in this form. Both Saunders and the court's supervising clerk speculated that exhibit No. 17 was a copy of a minute order that was prematurely distributed to the parties at the September 20 hearing before the proceedings were completed and the appropriate entries were made.

[8]Saunders did not recall petitioner's telling her that the minute order was incorrect and incomplete or asking her to send a copy of a corrected order to the probation department.

For several reasons, petitioner's response is unpersuasive. First, regardless of the docket entry, the fact remains that, during the Commission's investigation of the Henderson matter, including petitioner's role in granting diversion, petitioner directed alteration of the order, directed that the order not indicate that it had been altered, and sent the Commission a copy of the altered order without detailing the circumstances. By forwarding only the altered order, petitioner presented the Commission with a grossly incomplete and misleading response. (See Adams, supra, 10 Cal.4th at pp. 910-911 [judge's inaccurate and incomplete responses to the Commission constituted willful misconduct].)

Second, the record contradicts petitioner's contention that the docket entry reflects all of the information added to the orders. The entry states: "Diversion granted; Judge Fletcher disq. himself for any violation of Diversion hrgs." Although this entry reflects petitioner's disqualification on future diversion violation hearings, it does not indicate that diversion was granted "per Dan Pursell." This alteration of the order was important to support petitioner's claim that, because he had disqualified himself, he let the prosecutor make the initial diversion decision.

Third, the record also does not support petitioner's claim that the docket entry was "completed contemporaneously with" the September 20 hearing. The initials of the supervising clerk, Velma Dee Buchanan, appear beside the docket entry, indicating that she made it. However, Buchanan was not the clerk for the September 20 hearing; Saunders was. Moreover, Buchanan learned about petitioner's alleged disqualification sometime after September 20, when petitioner discovered that the case file did not reflect disqualification and informed Buchanan of the situation. The record thus suggests that Buchanan made the docket entry sometime after, and not contemporaneously with, the September 20 hearing.

Fourth, a conflict exists between the docket entry and the reporter's transcript of the September 20 hearing. Unlike the docket entry, but consistent with Saunders's recollection, the hearing transcript does not reflect that petitioner disqualified himself from future diversion violation hearings. On the contrary, it shows that petitioner ordered the parties to appear before him again on March 21, 1995, for a compliance review hearing. Consistent with the transcript, on March 21, 1995, Henderson appeared before petitioner for a diversion review hearing.[9] Given all of the circumstances we have detailed, and the court reporter's certification that the transcript "comprise[d] a full, true, and correct transcript" of the September 20 hearing, we afford the reporter's transcript more credence than the docket entry. (See People v. Smith (1983) 33 Cal.3d 596, 599 [189 Cal.Rptr. 862, 659 P.2d 1152].)

Finally, petitioner's current contention that it was unnecessary to mark the altered orders as "corrected" stands in stark contrast to his position and the uncontradicted testimony before the special masters. In addition to Saunders's testimony regarding court policy, which we have already discussed, petitioner testified that Saunders should have followed court procedures for preparing an amended minute order in complying with his order to make the alterations. While cross-examining Saunders, he reiterated that court policy required her to indicate on the altered order that it was "corrected or amended," and he challenged her testimony that he "told [her] to break that policy and violate the law." And, in closing argument to the Commission, petitioner again stressed that, "if [clerks] add anything to a minute order after the defendant signed, they are supposed to mark it amended and supposed [to] get the defendant to agree to it." Buchanan, the court's supervising clerk, confirmed petitioner's position, testifying that court policy prohibits clerks from altering signed minute orders like exhibit No. 18 without indicating across the top that they are corrected orders and distributing copies to all parties. She also testified that petitioner's policy was to ask for preparation of a corrected minute order if he discovered that a minute order did not reflect his verbal order. Thus, petitioner's current position is directly contrary to the uncontradicted evidence in the record.

Indeed, petitioner's newly minted explanation is just another example of his vague and contradictory representations throughout these disciplinary proceedings regarding these documents. Petitioner maintains that Saunders faxed exhibit No. 18 to the probation department at his request after he learned from Henderson's father on October 26 that Henderson was not complying with diversion requirements. In his February 1995 response to the Commission's January 1995 inquiry about the matter, petitioner stated: "I don't recall looking at the minute order or the file on 10-26-94." Regarding the differences between exhibit Nos. 18 and 19, he stated: "The only explanation I can offer is that Ms. Saunders sent a FAX copy to the probation department and then added the rest at some later time." In his answer to the Commission's notice of formal proceedings, petitioner gave a different account. He there maintained that, after receiving the call from Henderson's father on October 26, he "pulled the file," discovered that the minute order did not correctly reflect that Henderson had been granted diversion pursuant to the district attorney's "decision" and that petitioner had disqualified himself, and "ordered" Saunders to make the necessary corrections and send it to the probation department. Petitioner's testimony before the special masters was initially consistent with this latter account, although he additionally noted that the minute order he found in the file on October 26 was in the form of exhibit No. 18.[10] However, after being confronted with his previous position in his February response, petitioner began to waver as to whether he looked at the file after the October 26 phone call. Later, in arguing his case to the Commission, petitioner changed his account once again. He told the Commission that his "only order to Ms. Saunders was to fax" the minute order to the probation department. Contrary to his testimony before the special masters, petitioner told the Commission that he had not ordered Saunders to amend the minute order. When asked whether he "direct[ed] her to change it in any way," petitioner replied, "No, I did not," and he suggested that Saunders made the changes on her own initiative.[11] Of course, as we have explained, petitioner has shifted his position yet again in this court, conceding that he directed Saunders to prepare a corrected minute order, but arguing that this action did not constitute misconduct because the altered documents were merely incomplete draft orders.

Petitioner's representations regarding his disclosures to the Commission on this topic are similarly confused and inconsistent. Petitioner initially testified that, with his December 30 response to the Commission's inquiry about ex parte communications, he sent copies of both exhibit Nos. 18 and 19 to show that the order had been altered. He then explained that he obtained a copy of exhibit No. 18 on October 26 when he reviewed the file after talking with Henderson's father. Later, however, he testified that he copied exhibit Nos. 18 and 19 when he received the Commission's inquiry about the matter. He also later testified that he sent the exhibits, not with his December 30 response, but with his February 1995 response to the Commission's January 1995 inquiry about the altered minute orders. Regarding his submission of minute orders to the Commission, he then testified: "I'm sorry. I don't recall now. . . . I remember sending two minute orders, but I don't remember which they were and when I looked at them . . . ." Later, petitioner again testified that he sent the two minute orders in response to the [10]This testimony supports Saunders's testimony that she prepared a minute order in the form of exhibit No. 18 before October 26.

[11]During his testimony before the special masters, petitioner suggested that Saunders had made changes "to make it look like [he] was falsifying documents."

Commission's January 1995 inquiry, but he could not recall how he got a copy of the order in the form of exhibit No. 18. Before the Commission, however, petitioner appeared to state that he first received a copy of the minute order in the form of exhibit No. 18 from the Commission as part of its January 1995 inquiry. This last statement was consistent with the Commission's position that petitioner never submitted a copy of a minute order in the form of exhibit No. 18 and that he had only submitted a copy of exhibit No. 19. Petitioner's continually shifting explanations regarding these exhibits are further evidence of his willful misconduct in attempting to deceive the Commission. (See Adams, supra, 10 Cal.4th at pp. 910-911 [judge's inaccurate and incomplete responses to the Commission constituted willful misconduct].)

2. Count One B: Ex Parte Contacts With Peter Vanderputten

In connection with the dissolution of his marriage, Peter Vanderputten was criminally charged with violating court orders, violating a protective order, and allowing or causing a child to suffer. Under an agreement with the district attorney, Vanderputten pleaded guilty to the charges, and sentencing was continued, with dismissal to follow after a year if he committed no further violations and obeyed court orders. The case remained pending before petitioner until he dismissed the charges in accordance with the plea agreement. During that time, Vanderputten often appeared before petitioner for compliance review. At some point, Vanderputten talked about committing suicide and other violent acts. In response, and to protect Vanderputten and his family, petitioner recommended that Vanderputten seek counseling. As an alternative, petitioner advised Vanderputten that he was welcome to attend a Saturday morning men's fellowship group that petitioner led. Vanderputten attended petitioner's fellowship group a few times. The men at the group were "supporting him and trying to get him to leave his wife alone, and . . . obey all laws, to act like a reasonable person."

violated his plea bargain. We agree with petitioner's concession and conclude that he committed prejudicial misconduct with regard to Vanderputten. (See Code Civ. Proc., § 170.1, subd. (a)(6).)

We reject petitioner's claim that this conclusion violates his constitutional right to practice his religion. While presiding over a pending criminal case and after recommending that a defendant obtain counseling, petitioner invited that defendant to petitioner's fellowship group specifically to discuss and address the problems underlying the criminal charges. That, as part of addressing those problems, the group members would look to the Bible for guidance does not make our inquiry regarding petitioner's conduct an issue of religious freedom. As a judge, petitioner may not participate in an ongoing support group where defendants with cases pending before him discuss their attempts to comply with the terms of their plea bargains.[12]

3. Count One C: Ex Parte Contacts With Dennis Jonathan

In January 1991, Dennis Jonathan was charged with driving with an illegal blood-alcohol concentration and having a prior drunk driving conviction. On March 25, he appeared with counsel before petitioner, pleaded guilty to the charge, and admitted the prior conviction. Petitioner accepted the plea and then offered to postpone sentencing "for a couple months and see how [Jonathan was] doing on [his] programs," i.e., so Jonathan could "prove to the court that [he] ha[d] control over [his] drinking." After Jonathan accepted petitioner's offer, petitioner stated: "I do have personal knowledge of Mr. Jonathan and his programs, by the way." Jonathan's counsel replied that she was aware of this fact. No one was at the hearing for the prosecution.

Petitioner's acquaintance with Jonathan began when he offered to help petitioner get elected. Petitioner next saw Jonathan in late 1988, when he appeared before petitioner on a hit-and-run charge. According to petitioner, he disclosed to counsel during that proceeding that he knew Jonathan from the campaign, that he "felt uncomfortable in sentencing Mr. Jonathan, [and] that the only way [he] would hear the case . . . was that the sentence would be agreed between [counsel] . . . ." Petitioner was concerned "that Mr. Jonathan might think he got a special favor . . . ." Petitioner next saw Jonathan at the church that petitioner and Jonathan's parents attended. Later, in 1989, Jonathan appeared before petitioner on his first drunk driving charge. After taking Jonathan's guilty plea, petitioner sentenced him to the "usual" sentence for first-time offenders.

[12]We also reject petitioner's suggestion that he received inadequate notice of this charge. In its second amended notice of formal proceedings, the Commission cited Vanderputten's attendance at the "men's prayer breakfast group on Saturday mornings" as an example of petitioner's "engag[ing] in improper ex parte communications," "fail[ing] to disqualify [him]self" despite ex parte communications, and "tak[ing] action which appeared unusually lenient toward defendants after engaging in ex parte communications." These allegations afforded petitioner ample notice regarding the Vanderputten case.

After his first drunk driving conviction, Jonathan began attending petitioner's Saturday morning men's fellowship group. Before his 1991 arrest, Jonathan attended group meetings approximately once a month for six to eight months. At group meetings, Jonathan disclosed that he was an alcoholic and that he needed help. After his 1991 arrest, but before sentencing, Jonathan attended two or three more group meetings. At a meeting before his first court appearance, he informed petitioner that he had " 'made a terrible mistake, . . . slipped on [his] sobriety and . . . received a ticket for driving under the influence.' "[13] According to Jonathan, petitioner "was sympathetic."

Petitioner testified that he decided to leave Jonathan's sentence to the agreement of counsel because of these contacts. Petitioner was concerned that, if he sentenced Jonathan, "the appearance might be that [petitioner] . . . was lenient, no matter what [he] did." Petitioner "didn't want anyone to say that [he] was lenient . . . because [Jonathan] got people to vote for [petitioner] and his parents went to the [church petitioner] attended." According to petitioner, he advised the district attorney that he knew Jonathan, that he would preside in the case if counsel did not object, but that he would leave it to counsel to agree on the sentence because of his concern about claims of leniency. The district attorney, however, did not recall that petitioner made any of these disclosures.

Because Jonathan needed to get to work, he appeared for sentencing on July 30 before court was in session. Sentencing occurred in petitioner's chambers. The district attorney was present, but defense counsel was not. Petitioner had contacted defense counsel about the matter, and she had replied that her attendance was unnecessary because she knew what the sentence would be. She and the district attorney had agreed to recommend a sentence of a fine and jail time. According to petitioner, Jonathan waived his right to have counsel appear for sentencing; there is no record of the proceedings to verify petitioner's claim. Notwithstanding his purported decision to leave Jonathan's sentence to counsel, petitioner proposed that, in lieu of the fine and jail sentence, Jonathan be required to perform community service in the form of construction work on a proposed addition to the courthouse. Petitioner eventually imposed this sentence. The district attorney characterized this sentence as "unusual," noting that in 99 percent of the cases of second-time offenders, service of a minimum 10-day jail sentence is required.

[13]Petitioner is thus incorrect in asserting that "no discussion of the case took place" at the fellowship meetings.

Over a year later, petitioner saw Jonathan in the court clerk's office. With no attorneys present, he informed Jonathan that the addition to the courthouse had not been approved and that he would have to perform his community service in another way. Petitioner asked Jonathan how he wanted to fulfill his sentence. According to Jonathan, petitioner gave him a list of options from which to choose. Petitioner then modified Jonathan's sentence in accordance with Jonathan's preference.

(8) On this record, we agree with the Commission's unanimous conclusion that petitioner committed prejudicial misconduct in handling the Jonathan matter. As in the Henderson matter, petitioner recognized that his ex parte contacts with Jonathan created a conflict, and his initial solution was simply to cede the sentencing decision to counsel. He did not disclose his ex parte contacts to the district attorney, and there is no evidence that he disclosed even to defense counsel that he had discussed the offense with Jonathan at a fellowship meeting. Moreover, despite his ex parte contacts and his decision not to participate in sentencing, petitioner took control of sentencing and imposed an unusually lenient sentence that included no actual jail time. Petitioner himself admitted that suspension of the jail sentence and fine was not part of "the normal sentence" for a second drunk driving offense. Over a year later, petitioner modified the sentence through additional ex parte contacts with Jonathan, without involvement of either defense counsel or the district attorney. The record thus contains clear and convincing evidence that petitioner committed prejudicial misconduct in his handling of the Jonathan matter. (See former Cal. Code Jud. Conduct, canon 3A(4), as adopted eff. Jan. 1, 1975, see now Cal. Code Jud. Ethics, canon 3B(7); Code Civ. Proc., § 170.1, subd. (a)(6).)

We reject petitioner's claim that Jonathan's sentence was "within customary local guidelines for the rare, or exceptional case." The record shows that service of jail time was not required only where a single parent could not care for her small children during incarceration or the defendant had a physical problem or was elderly. Petitioner has identified no circumstance that justified treating the Jonathan matter as an exceptional case.

Robert Reagan, Jr., approached petitioner "at [a] restaurant and complained about a speeding violation and told [petitioner] he did not have the money to pay for it." Petitioner "knew" Reagan "by his many appearance[s] in court." Petitioner and Reagan also had attended the same school functions because their children had attended the same school for at least 10 years. Petitioner replied that Reagan "could do community service for the fine. Mr.

Reagan agreed and [petitioner] gave him a couple of month[s] to complete and show proof." Petitioner also told Reagan that he had to attend traffic school. Petitioner then "went back to court," "pulled the file," and indicated that he had given Reagan "an extension" to perform his community service. A few months later, a warrant issued because Reagan had not paid his fine. In court, Reagan stated that "he did not understand what had happen[ed] and asked for another chance to do the service and attend traffic school . . . ." In his response to the Commission charges, petitioner stated: "Because I had handled it, and I did not have a clerk do it, I felt that I should give him one more chance, and if he failed this time, it would be properly documented by a clerk. Then he would be charged with failure to pay."

(9) We agree with the Commission's unanimous finding that petitioner committed prejudicial misconduct in handling the Reagan matter. (See former Cal. Code Jud. Conduct, canon 3A(4), as adopted eff. Jan. 1, 1975, see now Cal. Code Jud. Ethics, canon 3B(7); Code Civ. Proc., § 170.1, subd. (a)(6).) Petitioner informally discussed Reagan's situation at the restaurant and agreed to give him an extension of time in order to perform community service in lieu of a fine. Petitioner then altered the official court file to reflect his informal handling of the matter. According to petitioner's own response, his ex parte handling of this matter confused Reagan and required him to give Reagan still another chance after a warrant was issued when he failed either to pay or to perform community service.

5. Count One E: Ex Parte Contacts With Steven Pearson

In July 1990, petitioner placed Steven Pearson on probation after he pleaded guilty to brandishing a firearm. Sometime after sentencing, Pearson began attending petitioner's Saturday morning fellowship meetings. According to petitioner, Pearson had "serious spousal abuse problems," was a "very sick man," and had a "very violent temper." Pearson discussed, and petitioner counseled him about, these problems during the fellowship meetings. Pearson became "a real problem" for petitioner and his wife, and they had "to discourage him from seeking [them] out."

While Pearson was on probation, he and his wife were charged with violating zoning laws by keeping piles of junk in their yard. Petitioner was personally aware of the circumstances underlying the charge; he had stopped by Pearson's property, seen the junk in the yard, and advised Pearson to dispose of it. Petitioner believed that Pearson, and not his wife, was responsible for the violation, and petitioner told the district attorney of his belief. According to petitioner, he also told the district attorney he was disqualifying himself from hearing the case. The district attorney, however, did not recall petitioner's saying anything about the Pearsons or whether he had a problem with them.

Consistent with his practice in similar cases, the district attorney asked that the matter be continued until, and dismissed when, the Pearsons cleaned up their property. At the district attorney's request, petitioner continued the matter two or three times. Petitioner did not believe that the conflict created by his ex parte contacts and his knowledge of the zoning violation prevented him from ordering a continuance. However, petitioner also believed that the district attorney gave Pearson too much time to clean up the property and should have forced Pearson to act more quickly. Petitioner remembered that Pearson's earlier brandishing offense involved a neighbor who was angry about junk in Pearson's yard.

(10) On this record, we agree with the Commission's unanimous finding that petitioner committed prejudicial misconduct in continuing to preside over the zoning case despite his personal knowledge of the relevant circumstances and his ongoing personal relationship with Pearson through the fellowship meetings. Because of the conflict that these contacts created, petitioner exercised no substantive judgment in considering the district attorney's continuance requests. By his own admission, petitioner thought the district attorney was giving Pearson too much time to clean up his property, creating a potential for another confrontation with his neighbor. But for his decision not to make substantive rulings in this case, petitioner might not have acceded to all of the continuance requests. Rather than participating in the case under these circumstances, he should have recused himself. (See former Cal. Code Jud. Conduct, canon 3A(4), as adopted eff. Jan. 1, 1975, see now Cal. Code Jud. Ethics, canon 3B(7); Code Civ. Proc., § 170.1, subd. (a)(6).) In failing to do so, he committed prejudicial misconduct.

6. Count One F: Ex Parte Contacts With Witnesses

On July 27, 1993, Eddie Riegle appeared without counsel before petitioner for arraignment on a misdemeanor charge of assault with a deadly weapon (a BB rifle). The district attorney requested a brief continuance for plea negotiations, indicating his belief that the shooting was accidental. He wanted to discuss the incident with the victim. He also wanted to investigate how various sentence requirements would affect Riegle's Army service, which was to begin the next month.

On August 3, Riegle again appeared before petitioner without counsel. Under a plea bargain, the district attorney proposed that Riegle plead guilty to simple battery and receive a sentence of eight days of community service and a fine. The district attorney explained that he had discussed the sentence with the victim, who had no objection. Petitioner then suggested that Riegle serve eight days in jail in lieu of the community service. Gary Whitley, a friend of Riegle's who was an inactive attorney and who was appearing as a character witness, responded that the Army would not accept Riegle under that sentence. Petitioner replied that the charge was too serious for a sentence of only eight days of community service. Petitioner then granted Riegle's request for time to consider the matter, and Riegle left the courtroom.

When Riegle returned and his case was called again, Kimberly Fletcher, the public defender, accompanied him and attempted to negotiate with petitioner for the sentence the district attorney had proposed. During this period, and while on the bench, petitioner telephoned both the victim and the park ranger who arrested Riegle. Because both were unavailable, petitioner left messages for them.

While court was still in session, the ranger returned petitioner's call. Petitioner took the call at the bench, but did not put it on the speaker phone, so Riegle and counsel could hear only petitioner's side of the conversation. According to petitioner, he intended to put the call on the speaker phone, but decided not to because the ranger became irate upon learning of the proposed plea bargain. Petitioner repeated in open court parts of his conversation with the ranger as it occurred and related more of it after the call ended. The evidence consistently showed that, during the call, petitioner referred to Riegle as a "punk" and made comments like, "That's what I thought. Bad attitude." After the call, petitioner again stated: "Just what I thought. This ranger has affirmed that he had a bad attitude. He's a punk kid." Petitioner also expressed the opinion that Riegle should be tried and that he would be convicted. Petitioner also stated that he would not accept the negotiated plea bargain.

[14]The Commission charged that petitioner "frequently telephoned victim witnesses and/or law enforcement personnel from court during pretrial proceedings to obtain their views and information concerning matters before [him]." However, the record contains only scant evidence of contacts other than in the Riegle matter. A court reporter testified generally that petitioner had made such calls six to twelve times, but could not recall a specific incident other than the Riegle matter. Similarly, an attorney who appeared before petitioner testified asserted concern about embarrassing the ranger does not excuse his decision to exclude counsel and the defendant from a conversation in which he obtained information that influenced his handling of the case.

Contrary to petitioner's assertion, the evidence in the record does not show the parties stipulated that petitioner could make these calls or exclude them from his conversation with the ranger. According to Whitley, petitioner made the calls "[w]ithout telling anyone what he was going to do." Kimberly Fletcher similarly testified that no one suggested petitioner make these calls; he acted "spontaneously," and "on [his] own." Consistent with this evidence, the hearing transcript does not reflect that petitioner either requested or received stipulations to his ex parte contact with the ranger.[15]

7. Count One G: Ex Parte Contacts Regarding Bench Warrants

The Commission alleged that, on numerous occasions, petitioner "telephoned defendants, including defendants [he] knew, for whom bench warrants had been issued to advise them to come to court." In his answer and testimony, petitioner admitted that he made these calls approximately 25 to 30 times. Petitioner explained that he informed these individuals the court was processing a warrant on them and that the warrant would not issue if they appeared in court. Before placing the calls, petitioner did not inform the district attorney or determine whether the individuals had counsel. Nor did he ask about this latter fact during the calls. In petitioner's view, this practice saved time for the understaffed clerk's office, by eliminating the need to process warrants for those who responded to petitioner's calls. Petitioner discontinued this practice when another judge informed him that it might violate the separation of powers doctrine and create conflicts.

that petitioner made such calls from the bench over counsel's objection, but she could not identify specific incidents.

[15]In arguing to the contrary, petitioner cites the district attorney's testimony that, "on a number of occasions," petitioner made telephone calls when he wanted to verify information relating to a proposed settlement, and that "counsel" stipulated to these contacts. However, this testimony described only petitioner's general practice and did not specifically address the Riegle incident.

that petitioner simply believed that his informal handling of these warrants was the most efficient way to conduct the court's business. In any event, petitioner's speculation "that maybe some of [the arrest warrants] were improper" does not excuse his decision to address this problem through ex parte telephone contacts.

8. Count Eight: Prejudgment of Evidence in the Wickham Matter

On November 1, 1994, petitioner presided over a preliminary hearing on a felony drunk driving charge against Aaron Wickham. At the outset of the hearing, defense counsel explained that Jon Fry was the driver of the car and could "completely exculpate" Wickham, and that a continuance was necessary to subpoena Fry. After petitioner heard testimony from the arresting officers and Wickham, defense counsel again requested a continuance because of Fry's absence. Petitioner proposed a week's continuance, and defense counsel objected, arguing that Wickham should not have to remain in custody that long "when he's got a guy to come in to say that he wasn't driving." Petitioner then explained that credibility determinations would be made by the jury during trial, not by the court during the preliminary hearing.

Defense counsel then asked whether petitioner was saying "that [he] wouldn't believe [Fry]." Petitioner replied: "This court has dealt with Jon [Fry] many, many times, and his credibility is not too high." Counsel objected that petitioner was "prejudging [Fry's] testimony." Petitioner replied: "No. I'm just warning counsel that he has come into this Court and he's been before this court many times. And he's broken many promises to this court and has many failures to appear in court. And I hope you don't expect the court to regard his testimony like any other citizen in the community." Petitioner suggested that he might dismiss the case if Wickham got the prosecution's sole eyewitness to admit she had lied to the police, and then explained: "But when you want me to waive [sic] who believes who and who witnesses things, that's the jury's job; that's not the court's job." Petitioner then stated that he did not "believe [the prosecution witness] would have much more credibility in this court than Jon [Fry]. They're both recovering alcoholics that are working hard to try to stay out of trouble." Defense counsel then interjected, "So you can't believe one or the other really." Petitioner replied: "Right. It's a tie." After defense counsel started to express hope that petitioner "might be convinced by—," petitioner interrupted and said, "I'm willing to listen." Petitioner also expressed skepticism about Fry's testimony, noting that he had failed to say anything when he was in court during Wickham's arraignment. Petitioner explained: "What I'm trying to say, Counsel, is why didn't [Fry] volunteer that information to the court if he knew his friend was being charged with him driving the car?"

According to petitioner, he believed that defense counsel would withdraw the continuance request after hearing petitioner's remarks about Fry. In his testimony before the special masters, petitioner explained: "I was trying to convince [defense counsel] that we should end th[e] preliminary hearing; that the Court ha[d] heard enough to hold the defendant to answer . . . ." Knowing that defense counsel was unfamiliar with Fry's background, petitioner made his remarks "with anticipation that [defense counsel] would see the futility of prolonging the hearing and wasting court time." Petitioner also stated that, based in part on his view of Fry's "credibility," petitioner "wouldn't have changed [his] mind" even if Fry had testified at the preliminary hearing that he had been the driver.

(13) On this record, we agree with the Commission's unanimous conclusion that petitioner committed prejudicial misconduct during the Wickham case by expressing prejudgment of Fry's credibility. The record does not support petitioner's contention, raised for the first time in this court, that he was simply fulfilling his duty as a judge to disclose his personal knowledge and opinion of a defense witness. Petitioner's contention is inconsistent with his failure to disclose his opinion of Fry at the start of the preliminary hearing despite his knowledge that Fry was Wickham's primary witness; petitioner waited until after hearing the arresting officers' testimony before informing defense counsel. More importantly, by his own admission, petitioner made his remarks to persuade defense counsel not to call Fry and to agree to end the preliminary hearing. Indeed, contrary to his current position that he made his remarks simply to fulfill some ethical or judicial duty, petitioner acknowledged in his answer to the Commission's allegations "that there is no excuses [sic] for putting on the record, the past performances and opinions of the witnesses." We agree with petitioner's earlier assessment of his conduct. His attempt to influence counsel's handling of the case by disclosing his bias against Wickham's primary witness and his prejudgment of that witness's credibility constituted prejudicial misconduct. (See Dodds, supra, 12 Cal.4th at p. 176 [judge's "prejudgment in the handling of cases . . . constituted prejudicial conduct"]; Roberts v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1983) 33 Cal.3d 739, 744-745, 748 [190 Cal.Rptr. 910, 661 P.2d 1064]; McCartney, supra, 12 Cal.3d at p. 533 [in examining witness, judge "may not . . . become an advocate for either party or cast aspersions or ridicule upon a witness"].)

9. Counts Eleven A, Eleven C: Inappropriate Reactions to Disqualification Attempts

(a) Count Eleven A: Riegle Matter

As we have previously set forth, on August 3, 1993, defendant Eddie Riegle appeared before petitioner without counsel, accompanied only by Gary Whitley, an inactive attorney who was present as a character witness. After refusing to accept the negotiated plea bargain and insisting that Riegle serve time in jail, petitioner granted Riegle's request for time to consider the matter, and Riegle left the courtroom. Kimberly Fletcher, the public defender, was present in court at the time and observed these proceedings.

As Riegle and Whitley left the courtroom, they asked Fletcher to accompany them. After determining that Riegle qualified for representation by the public defender, Fletcher returned to the courtroom with Riegle, informed petitioner that Riegle qualified for representation and had asked her to represent him, and asked to be heard on the matter. According to Fletcher, she "started to negotiate on" Riegle's behalf, and petitioner "talked to [her] as though [she] was the attorney of record." At this point, Fletcher believed she was representing Riegle, because petitioner's previous practice in similar circumstances had been to accept her representation without formally stating that he was appointing the public defender. Fletcher repeatedly asked petitioner to "go on the record," but petitioner refused.

As we have also previously explained, during the court proceedings, petitioner discussed the matter by telephone with the park ranger who had arrested Riegle. Given petitioner's comments about Riegle after the call, Fletcher concluded that petitioner could not be fair and impartial, and she indicated that she would attempt to disqualify him. Although Fletcher had been discussing the case with petitioner for at least 10 minutes at this point, petitioner replied that Fletcher was interfering in a case in which she had not been appointed. Fletcher reminded petitioner that in the outer hall she had qualified Riegle for representation and that petitioner had been dealing with her as Riegle's attorney. Petitioner then suggested that Riegle did not qualify for representation, and he asked for a qualification form. He had not previously made a similar request of Fletcher during her almost four years as public defender, and he had not mentioned a concern about Riegle's eligibility for public representation before Fletcher's remark about disqualification. Fletcher cited these facts as further evidence of petitioner's bias in the case. Petitioner replied: "Fine. You're emotionally involved in this case. You're way out of line, and I'm going to remove you and appoint conflict counsel." Petitioner did not, at this point, refer to Riegle's qualification for public representation.

When petitioner finally called the case, he indicated that Riegle was requesting a public defender and that he was appointing Linda Thompson instead of Fletcher. Fletcher objected, explaining that no conflict existed and that petitioner had refused to call the case, had asked for a public defender application, and had stated unsupported conclusions about Riegle's eligibility for representation. Petitioner then stated: "The record should also reflect that Ms. Fletcher has interceded in this case without being requested or without appointment. [¶] And I think she's become personally and emotionally involved in this case, so I'm disqualifying her to represent this defendant." Fletcher again objected, reiterating that petitioner had no grounds for removing her and stating that "the Court's behavior has been inappropriate in this matter." Petitioner then stated: "Ms. Fletcher, you're getting close to contempt. And I would suggest that you sit down and be quiet." According to Fletcher, petitioner "was angry when this was going on, once [she indicated her intent to disqualify] him."

(14) On this record, we agree with the Commission's unanimous finding that petitioner committed prejudicial misconduct in refusing to appoint Kimberly Fletcher while immediately appointing another public defender to represent Riegle. Petitioner raised a question regarding Fletcher's representation of Riegle only after she indicated her intent to disqualify him. His request for a qualification form for Riegle was contrary to his prior practice. He appointed a substitute public defender without inquiring or commenting further about Riegle's eligibility. These facts indicate that petitioner's purported concern about Fletcher's alleged failure to qualify Riegle for representation was merely a pretext for his decision to exclude Fletcher from the case because of her expressed intent to disqualify him. In so retaliating against Fletcher, petitioner committed prejudicial misconduct.[16] (See In re Rasmussen (1987) 43 Cal.3d 536, 538 [236 Cal.Rptr. 152, 734 P.2d 988] [judge committed misconduct in "displaying a lack of impartiality to, and petty harassment of attorneys who filed affidavits of prejudice against him," and in "discouraging the exercise of peremptory disqualification rights by inappropriate means"].)

(b) Count Eleven C: Tippets Matter

On September 14, 1993, Deborah Tippets appeared before petitioner on a charge of shoplifting four packages of developed film. Her attorney, Kimberly Fletcher, suggested a disposition of informal diversion. After some discussion of the facts of the case and Tippets's explanation, petitioner suggested "a one-year dispo and have her do some things." Fletcher indicated that the proposal was "acceptable." The district attorney then suggested payment of $150 in court costs as well. Tippets indicated she could not afford that amount. Petitioner responded: "Well, one minute you tell us you're wealthy and can pay for stuff, and the next minute, you say . . . you can't pay $150.00 fine." After Tippets explained that she had just moved, petitioner abruptly declared: "All right. Let's set it for trial, then." Tippets and Fletcher then attempted to explain Tippets's financial situation. Petitioner seemed to ignore these comments, responding by simply asking: "When do you want to try it?"

After petitioner immediately repeated this question, Fletcher stated: "I'm going to have to [disqualify] you, your Honor. I think there's some animosity here." Fletcher later explained to the Commission that she based her action on her perception that petitioner "had gotten angered by [Tippets's] comments . . . that she couldn't even afford $150, and lost patience. [Fletcher] was concerned it would be difficult at this time for [petitioner] to be impartial, given the long conversation with [Tippets] at that point." Fletcher was also acting on "what [she] perceived [were petitioner's] feelings about single women with kids out of wedlock [and] interracial [children]."

Petitioner replied: "There's no animosity. I'm trying to settle the case." Fletcher started to reply, when petitioner interjected: "[I]f you don't want me to get involved in settling cases, then I won't. But you get me involved. And then as soon as I get involved in it, then you say, 'Oh, we're going to have to [disqualify] you' because I'm trying to encourage settlement." According to the court reporter's notation in the hearing transcript, petitioner was yelling at this point. The reporter testified before the special masters that her practice was to indicate in the transcript the demeanor of the person speaking—here that petitioner was yelling—"[w]hen it was so out of the ordinary." In his testimony, petitioner confirmed that he "probably" was yelling when he made this statement. Petitioner also testified that, in his view, he had been trying to help Fletcher persuade Tippets to take the plea offer, and that he was "shocked" that Fletcher "suddenly turned against" him by mentioning disqualification.

After petitioner and Fletcher discussed Tippets's comments regarding her ability to pay for the allegedly stolen film and her inability to pay the suggested fine, petitioner asked whether Tippets had made a statement to the store security guard. The district attorney replied she had told the security guard she put the film "under [a] blanket because [her] baby's bottle was leaking, and she didn't want the liquid on the photographs." As Tippets attempted to speak, petitioner interrupted and exclaimed: "Inconsistent. Inconsistent." Contrary to petitioner's exclamation, Tippets's statement to the security guard was consistent with the explanation she gave petitioner earlier in the hearing.[17] Fletcher apparently tried to explain this fact, and to suggest that petitioner's comment supported her concern that petitioner felt animosity toward Tippets.

[17]Tippets explained at the hearing that two of her children were "grabbing at the film and going through it," so she put it "next to the baby in between the infant carrier. . . And the

Nevertheless, petitioner continued: "I've been in this job for 35 years. I can tell when people have a little bit of shaky background as far as their position. And if . . . they're changing statements and changing reasons why they did something, then it gives you an indication that maybe there was an intent there." According to petitioner, he was expressing his view that neither he nor a jury would believe Tippets's explanation and that she would be convicted.

As Fletcher attempted to respond, petitioner continued: "But if you don't want me to get involved in trial settlements anymore, then I won't. [¶] But I try to settle cases to save taxpayers' money and to save her a possibility of going to jail and being convicted of a serious crime. [¶] But if you don't want me to do that, I won't do that anymore. [¶] I won't give you an indicated sentence. [¶] And you can just do your thing."

The transcript then shows the following exchange as petitioner and Fletcher argued with each other:

"MS. FLETCHER: Well, I—

"THE COURT: (Yelling) but I'm getting sick and tired of you . . . threatening me with [disqualification]. [¶] And I'm not going to have it anymore.

"MS. FLETCHER: Then, Your Honor, a simple solution would be not to make these prejudicial statements and—

"THE COURT: (Yelling) then don't get me involved in trial settlements.

"MS. FLETCHER: —misstating her statements.

"THE COURT: (Yelling even louder) but if you ever threaten a judge in Fresno on a [disqualification], you'll be held in contempt. I guarantee you.

"MS. FLETCHER: And I can guarantee you that threatening counsel because you have been [disqualified] will get you in trouble with Judicial Council. And that is not contempt.

"THE COURT: I haven't been—I haven't been [disqualified].

"MS. FLETCHER: Well, all we have to do is read this record back. [¶] I just moved to do it.

liquid was leaking out of the [baby's] bottle onto the film. [¶] So [she] took the baby blanket and covered the film, but [she] didn't completely cover it."

"THE COURT: Fine. [¶] Oh, you just moved to disqualify me?

"MS. FLETCHER: Yes.

"THE COURT: Oh, okay.

"MS. FLETCHER: Let's set it for trial. And I'm moving—

"THE COURT: I can't set it for trial." Petitioner then set the case for trial before a different judge.

Petitioner denied that he was yelling during this exchange. However, the court reporter testified that he was speaking in a "[l]oud voice," was "rising up" or "raising forward," and was "very angry."

In his answer to the Commission charges, petitioner explained: "[I] admit[], in retrospect, that [I] was a little too pushy, probably because of [my] lack of confidence in Ms. Fletcher, in convicting [sic] her client that the offer was in her best interest. At the time there was not sufficient funds in the county there was a hiring freeze [sic], the court was short two clerks out of five authorized, and the need to save money was paramount at the time. With the trial date that week, it was imperative that we reach a settlement on the day in question."

(15a) On this record, we agree with the Commission's conclusion (by a vote of nine to one) that petitioner committed prejudicial misconduct in his handling of the Tippets case. At the time of the Tippets matter, former California Code of Judicial Conduct, canon 3B(4), effective October 5, 1992, provided that "[a] judge should be patient, dignified, and courteous to litigants, jurors, witnesses, lawyers, and others with whom the judge deals in an official capacity . . . ." (See now Cal. Code Jud. Ethics, canon 3B(4), as adopted eff. Apr. 15, 1996 [currently imposing same duty].) Petitioner's conduct during the Tippets hearing fell far short of this standard, bringing the judicial office into disrepute. (See Kloepfer, supra, 49 Cal.3d at pp. 857-858; In re Rasmussen, supra, 43 Cal.3d at p. 538; McCartney, supra, 12 Cal.3d at pp. 531-532.)

In reaching this conclusion, we are not unmindful of Attorney Kimberly Fletcher's conduct. We also recognize that "[a] court has authority to control courtroom conduct of an attorney that is in flagrant disregard of elementary standards of proper conduct and to temper [counsel's] speech in order 'to insure that courts of law accomplish that for which they were created—dispensing justice in a reasonable, efficient and fair manner.' [Citation.]"

(15b) However, the record here shows that petitioner responded angrily the very first time Fletcher, understandably concerned that petitioner had become impatient with Tippets, mentioned disqualification. He immediately began yelling at Fletcher about her use of the disqualification procedure. After expressing his view that Tippets's explanation was not credible, petitioner returned to the disqualification issue, again yelling at Fletcher that he was "sick and tired" of her disqualification threats and was "not going to have it anymore."[18] The situation then escalated, with Fletcher asserting that petitioner could avoid being disqualified by refraining from making prejudicial and inaccurate statements, petitioner yelling in reply that Fletcher should not get him involved in settlements and that another court would treat her disqualification threat as contempt, and Fletcher answering that threatening counsel in response to a disqualification motion would "get [petitioner] in trouble with Judicial Council." Although we do not condone Fletcher's conduct, viewing the incident in its entirety, we conclude that petitioner's behavior in response to the disqualification attempt constituted prejudicial misconduct. (See Dodds, supra, 12 Cal.4th at p. 176 [judge committed prejudicial misconduct by "interrupting and yelling loudly and angrily at counsel and a litigant"]; Wenger, supra, 29 Cal.3d at p. 629 [judge entitled to take remedial steps in response to counsel's intemperate language committed willful misconduct by misusing contempt power]; Cannon v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications (1975) 14 Cal.3d 678, 706 [122 Cal.Rptr. 778, 537 P.2d 898] [judge improperly used punitive action as first, rather than last, "means of controlling proceedings"].)

[18]The record does not support petitioner's perception that Fletcher often sought to disqualify him. According to Fletcher, the Tippets matter was only the second case in which she had sought to disqualify petitioner. The first case was the Riegle matter, which had occurred the previous month. The only other case was during late July or early August 1994, well after the Tippets matter. Thus, between 1990, when she became a public defender, and August 1994, when she left the position, she sought to disqualify petitioner only three times. The district attorney confirmed that Fletcher did not frequently seek to disqualify petitioner.

10. Count Twelve: Inappropriate Handling of the Toschi Matter

In January 1989, the Madera County District Attorney charged Michael Toschi with the misdemeanors of driving under the influence of alcohol and driving with an excessive blood-alcohol concentration and alleged that he had suffered one prior conviction for the former offense. On May 10, as part of a plea bargain involving a separate felony charge of assault with a deadly weapon, the district attorney moved to dismiss the drunk driving case. The original plea bargain did not expressly encompass the drunk driving charges because counsel were unaware of them when they reached the bargain. The district attorney sought dismissal after concluding that the plea bargain would have included these charges had counsel known of them.

Petitioner, who was then assigned to the Madera Justice Court, denied the motion, stating "that the state Department of Motor Vehicles desired certain actions be taken against" Toschi. Toschi's counsel interpreted petitioner's comments as a statement of his own desires and an indication that he had already concluded Toschi was guilty. After denying the motion, petitioner ordered the district attorney to file an amended complaint adding a second alleged prior drunk driving conviction. The district attorney complied with petitioner's order on May 16, 1989.

During pretrial proceedings on May 17, the district attorney informed petitioner that he was "going to move the Court to strike the amended complaint and make a motion to dismiss." Without waiting for the motion to be made and without argument, petitioner immediately responded: "Motion denied." The district attorney then asked whether petitioner had "any knowledge of the facts in this case." Petitioner replied that he did not, but that he knew from "the printout" that Toschi had two prior convictions. Petitioner then explained that, despite his lack of knowledge about the facts of the case, he was denying the dismissal motion because he thought "in the interest of justice, a man with a drunk driving and two priors should go to trial." The district attorney responded that petitioner could not know Toschi "was a drunk driver unless [petitioner] ha[d] knowledge of the facts of the case," and that petitioner was not required to assume the truth of the complaint without such knowledge. Regarding the latter statement, petitioner replied: "All right. Well, the Court does."

Petitioner and the district attorney continued to argue about whether it was proper for petitioner to deny the dismissal motion without knowledge of the facts of the case. Petitioner then explained his understanding that the district attorney's motion was "[b]ased on a plea bargain, not based on the evidence," and that the plea bargain was an inadequate basis for dismissing the case, given the danger that a recidivist drunk driver posed to the community.

Unsatisfied with petitioner's explanation, the district attorney "demand[ed] immediate trial" and "ask[ed] [petitioner] to disqualify [him]self on the grounds that [he] ha[d] . . . apparent knowledge of the facts in this case." The district attorney asserted that, given petitioner's "apparent knowledge of the facts in this case, [he] would be prejudiced." Petitioner denied the motion and set the case for trial before him.

After the hearing, and without the request or knowledge of either party, petitioner ordered the court clerk to review the police reports in the case file and issue subpoenas to all witnesses. According to petitioner, he took this action because the district attorney had said he would not subpoena the witnesses. At the time, petitioner believed he "had authority to order witnesses where the District Attorney was going to not act in his official capacity to do that."

At petitioner's direction, the clerk later spoke by telephone directly with a subpoenaed witness from the police department and determined that the witness was not available for the scheduled trial date. Petitioner then contacted defense counsel, informed her of this problem, and asked her to agree to a continuance. Counsel refused and later corrected petitioner when he indicated that she had agreed to the continuance.

Based on these contacts "and some information that [petitioner] ha[d] also talked to some other potential witnesses in the case," counsel concluded that petitioner "himself [was] desirous of trying the case . . . ." Counsel felt that petitioner "had overstepped [his] bounds" and "become a prosecutor instead of an impartial magistrate, and that [Toschi] wasn't going to get a fair trial." On May 31, counsel therefore made a formal motion to disqualify petitioner, asserting that his actions and his statements during the prior hearing showed that he had prejudged the case. Over petitioner's opposition, the motion was granted.

Throughout the Commission's disciplinary proceedings, petitioner maintained that his actions in the Toschi matter resulted from his personal concerns about the district attorney, Paul Avent. Avent had unsuccessfully run against petitioner in a 1988 judicial election and, according to petitioner, was "very bitter" about the election, had "accused [petitioner] of stealing his votes and cheating to get his judges [sic] job," and had "expressed that he would never forgive [petitioner] for stealing his job." Petitioner believed that Avent had tried to "pull[] things" in the courts of other judges he had unsuccessfully opposed and "then reported them in the paper."

According to petitioner, he "was warned . . . by [his] bailiff [that Avent was] going to try to pull something on [petitioner], to get [petitioner] in trouble . . . ." When Avent appeared in the Toschi matter, petitioner "realized for the first time that this was the case that Mr. Avent was going to pull something." Petitioner explained: "I thought that I outwitted [Avent] by telling him that the motion was decided and not in the interest of justice and . . . Mothers Against Drunk Drivers [sic] was pretty heavy. All the publicity going on. I could see my name in the paper, 'Judge Fletcher dismisses drunk driving with two priors without cause.' [¶] So I denied the motion, and Mr. Avent challenged me in court that he could go ahead and set the jury trial. He wasn't going to call any witnesses. I had two options. I had an option to recuse him and appoint the attorney general to . . . prosecute Mr. Toschi, which would [have] disqualified me from sitting in Madera from then on, because the Madera D.A.'s office do [sic] not take those things lightly and have blanketed other judges that stand up to him. [¶] And I felt the only option I had was to bluff him into thinking that the court was going to subpoena witnesses."

Before the special masters, petitioner conceded that, having ordered the district attorney to allege additional charges and the clerk to subpoena witnesses, he "probably should have" disqualified himself. Similarly, in his answer to the Commission, petitioner stated: "In hind sight [sic] and now with six years of experience, I only had 5 month [sic] at the time, I would have disqualified myself for the Jury trial. Even though I was not prejudiced or bias [sic], or knew anything about the case, it might have had the appearance that I was in some was [sic] bias [sic]. It is easy to see that now, back then I was bound and determine [sic] to prove that I was not bias [sic] . . . ."

(17a) On this record, we agree with the Commission's unanimous conclusion that petitioner committed willful misconduct in handling the Toschi matter. We reached a similar conclusion on analogous facts in Ryan v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1988) 45 Cal.3d 518 [247 Cal.Rptr. 378, 754 P.2d 724, 76 A.L.R.4th 951]. There, after learning that the district attorney intended to prosecute a sodomy charge as a misdemeanor, the judge contacted the district attorney ex parte and urged him to pursue the matter as a felony. (Id. at p. 535.) Although the judge's action did not prejudice the defendant (because the district attorney did not follow the suggestion), we nevertheless found that the judge committed willful misconduct. We explained: "Judge Ryan attempted to intrude into the charging authority of the administrative branch of government. Moreover, he deprived the defendant of an impartial magistrate by advocating a harsher charge." (Ibid.) Here, petitioner also attempted to intrude on the district attorney's authority, but not by simply suggesting a course of action; petitioner, by having his clerk review the file and subpoena all prosecution witnesses, took it upon himself to do the district attorney's job. He thus deprived Toschi of an impartial judge.

Indeed, as petitioner conceded during the special masters' hearing, he "probably should have" disqualified himself as a result of his actions. Petitioner's order that the witnesses be subpoenaed was "particularly destructive of the image of the court as an impartial forum for the determination of truth." (McCartney, supra, 12 Cal.3d at p. 533.) (18) As we recently explained in Broadman, "there is a compelling public interest in maintaining a judicial system that both is in fact and is publicly perceived as being fair, impartial, and efficient." (Broadman, supra, 18 Cal.4th at p. 1103.) Thus, "[j]udges . . . cannot be advocates for the interests of any parties; they must be, and be perceived to be, neutral arbiters of both fact and law [citation] who apply the law uniformly and consistently." (Id. at p. 1100.) (17b) Petitioner's action in directing the clerk to subpoena witnesses "create[d] the public impression that [he] ha[d] abandoned the judicial role to become an advocate for [his] own ruling" in denying the prosecution's motion to dismiss the charges against Toschi. (Id. at p. 1101; see also Wenger, supra, 29 Cal.3d at p. 632 [judge who "inject[ed] himself into a proceeding" by undertaking a collateral investigation without consulting the parties committed prejudicial misconduct].)

Moreover, petitioner took this action because of a personal conflict with a political rival. According to petitioner, he considered "two options" to address his concern that Avent was trying to damage him politically: "recuse [Avent] and appoint the attorney general to . . . prosecute Mr. Toschi," or "bluff [Avent] into thinking that the court was going to subpoena witnesses." Petitioner chose the latter option because of his concern that the former would result in his own disqualification in all future proceedings involving the Madera District Attorney. In choosing the latter option for personal reasons and, as the Commission found, to "[b]luff[] and battl[e] with political opponents," petitioner committed a judicial act for a purpose other than the faithful discharge of his judicial duties. (See In re Rasmussen, supra, 43 Cal.3d at p. 538 [misconduct to initiate probation revocation proceedings for "personal reasons other than the faithful discharge of [judicial] duties"]; Wenger, supra, 29 Cal.3d at p. 652 [judge committed willful misconduct in taking judicial action motivated by personal animosity].) He thus committed willful misconduct.[19]

11. Count Thirteen B: Investigation of Larry Bjorklund

In 1989, petitioner joined a church at which Larry Bjorklund was pastor. Between that time and May 1992, when he became inactive in the church, [19]Given our conclusion, we need not consider the parties' arguments as to whether petitioner had statutory authority to order the clerk to subpoena the witnesses.

petitioner, who was a church elder, and Pastor Bjorklund had a number of disputes. According to Pastor Bjorklund, petitioner was very critical of his preaching, his doctrinal approach, and his general performance as a pastor. Based on petitioner's perception of the pastor's personal problems, petitioner doubted Pastor Bjorklund's pastoral abilities. At a church meeting in early 1992, petitioner accused Pastor Bjorklund of giving a heretical and blasphemous sermon and impliedly accused him of having an extramarital affair. Petitioner became inactive at the church a short time later.

According to petitioner, at some point during this period, Detective Sergeant Milt Gauthier of the Madera Sheriff's Office came to petitioner's chambers to discuss a child molestation investigation involving a member of petitioner's church. Gauthier wanted to learn what petitioner knew about the alleged victim's father. During the conversation, Gauthier stated that the pastor had counseled and interviewed the alleged victim for 15 to 20 hours, trying to get her to admit that her father had molested her. In response, petitioner told Gauthier that he "had some real concerns about [the pastor's] methods in trying to . . . prove a case against [the alleged victim's father], because [the pastor] was upset at" the alleged victim's father.

Petitioner, who was a church elder at the time, also voiced concern about the church's potential civil liability for permitting the pastor to provide counseling if he were not licensed. According to petitioner, Gauthier also expressed interest in determining the pastor's licensing status, suggesting that counseling without a license might be a misdemeanor under a county ordinance. Petitioner then stated: "Well, you know, don't do it for me. If you run across any information whether he's licensed or not, I'd like to know. I want to advise the church Board if we have a risk going on." When Gauthier replied that he intended to call the "State Board of Licensing," petitioner replied: "That's up to you. . . . I'd appreciate knowing what you find out." A short time later, Gauthier delivered a written summary of his investigation to petitioner, which indicated that the pastor was not licensed, that he had not had a license revoked, and that he probably did not need to be licensed.

Other than petitioner's testimony, the only evidence before the Commission regarding this incident came from a deposition the pastor gave pursuant to a stipulation and order of the presiding special master. The deposition was ordered in anticipation of the pastor's unavailability for trial. On direct examination, and without objection by petitioner, the pastor testified that he received a call after petitioner had left the church from someone named Gene, who informed him that petitioner "had ordered an investigation into [the pastor's] credentials as a pastoral counselor." After the pastor called the sheriff's office to investigate the information, he received a visit from Gauthier, who "told [him] that [petitioner] had . . . asked [Gauthier] to do an investigation to find out about [the pastor's] qualifications as being a pastoral counselor," and that petitioner "had some concern about the church maybe being legally . . . liable." Prompted by petitioner's questions on cross-examination, the pastor testified that Gene Zimmerman, who was with the Madera Employees Union, had first contacted him about the "alleged investigation." The pastor also reiterated on cross-examination, again without objection, that Gauthier had "explain[ed] the circumstances under which he felt obligated to perform th[e] investigation, but he had been directed by [petitioner]." Petitioner then asked, "Is that what he told you?" The pastor replied: "That's the word. That's what he told me."

On this record, the special masters found that, by asking Gauthier "to share information gathered during the course of his investigation, [petitioner] was using the prestige of his office for a personal purpose." They concluded: "Although, this incident does not constitute the 'instigation' of any criminal investigation for a personal purpose, it nevertheless constitutes willful misconduct." The Commission found that petitioner had "prevailed upon Sergeant Gauthier to inquire and advise [him] regarding the license status of Pastor Bjorklund for reasons that were entirely personal and unrelated to Sergeant Gauthier's investigation" of the molestation case. Finding that Gauthier had acted "because [petitioner] invoked his authority as a judge to request the report," and not "out of friendship" or "as a favor," the Commission unanimously concluded that petitioner "abused the judicial power and committed willful misconduct in office" by "ask[ing] Sgt. Gauthier to conduct an investigation of his rival for a personal purpose."

Petitioner contends that there is no competent evidence to support the finding that he asked Gauthier to investigate the pastor. He argues that the pastor lacked personal knowledge regarding petitioner's role in the inquiry, that the pastor's deposition testimony on this subject is inadmissible hearsay, and that we should not consider it despite his failure to object during the Commission proceedings.

(19a) We do not reach the merits of petitioner's evidentiary objection because, even crediting the pastor's testimony, we find the evidence insufficient to support the Commission's willful misconduct conclusion. Even if we assume that petitioner asked Gauthier to investigate the pastor, we find that petitioner was not acting in a judicial capacity when he did so. "First, petitioner was not performing one of the functions generally associated with his position as a judge. [Citations.]" (Dodds, supra, 12 Cal.4th at p. 175.) "Second, though petitioner was [in his chambers] when he met with [Gauthier], that location was simply a convenient meeting place that [Gauthier] selected. The meeting had nothing to do with petitioner's work as a judge, but rather his status as [someone who knew individuals involved in the matter] that [Gauthier] was investigating. [Citation.]" (Ibid.) Finally, there is no evidence that petitioner "attempt[ed] to curry favor with [Gauthier] . . . on account of his judicial status. [Citation.]" (Id. at p. 176.)

Nor does the pastor's deposition testimony that Gauthier "felt obligated to perform th[e] investigation" constitute clear and convincing evidence that petitioner "use[d], or attempt[ed] to use, his authority as a judge for improper ends . . . ." (Dodds, supra, 12 Cal.4th at p. 172.) "To hold that petitioner acted in a judicial capacity simply because his [request] carried with it a degree of authority due to his status as a judge . . . would mean that a judge is always acting in a judicial capacity when he [or she] talks to [law enforcement personnel]. We decline to interpret 'judicial capacity' so broadly." (Id. at p. 175.)

Nor, on the totality of the circumstances in this case, do we find clear and convincing evidence that petitioner committed prejudicial misconduct. The record does not indicate that petitioner attempted to pressure Gauthier into investigating the pastor. In the context of a conversation that Gauthier initiated by coming to petitioner's chambers and seeking his help in the molestation investigation, and given Gauthier's expressed concern about the pastor's counseling of the alleged victim, petitioner's request (assuming he made it) that Gauthier determine the pastor's licensing status does not constitute prejudicial misconduct. As a church elder, petitioner was legitimately concerned about the pastor's conduct and his qualifications. Although judges must be careful not to take advantage of their position, petitioner's position as a judge did not disable him from making a request of the sheriff's office that any other member of the community with similar concerns could make.

Moreover, having independently reviewed the evidentiary record, and even considering the pastor's testimony, we do not find clear and convincing evidence to support the Commission's conclusion that petitioner "asked Sgt. Gauthier to conduct an investigation of" the pastor. (20) Even unchallenged hearsay statements "should be evaluated . . . for what they are worth." (San Bernardino Valley Water Dev. Co. v. San Bernardino Valley Mun. Water Dist. (1965) 236 Cal.App.2d 238, 266 [45 Cal.Rptr. 793].) They should " 'be weighed by the trier of facts the same as other evidence and may be disregarded where shown to be unconvincing or insubstantial. [Citation.]' " (Estate of Moore (1956) 143 Cal.App.2d 64, 74 [300 P.2d 110].) (19b) Here, there are good reasons to question the pastor's hearsay testimony. The record shows that both the pastor and Gauthier could be considered petitioner's opponents. The Commission's findings support this conclusion, describing petitioner's relationship with the pastor and with Gauthier as, respectively, "hostile and strained" and "not one of mutual friendship and trust." Notably, unlike the Commission, the special masters did not find that petitioner initiated the investigation, but found only that he "asked Sgt. Gauthier to advise him if he discovered during the course of his investigation that [the pastor] was not a licensed counselor" and "to share information gathered during the course of his investigation." (21) On review, we accord special weight to the factual findings of the special masters, not of the Commission. (19c) Given the special masters' finding and petitioner's direct testimony on the matter, even considering the pastor's testimony, we do not find clear and convincing evidence that petitioner directed Gauthier to investigate the pastor or committed prejudicial misconduct in asking Gauthier to share the results of his inquiry.[20]

Because we find insufficient evidence of willful or prejudicial misconduct, we dismiss the charge contained in count thirteen B of the second amended notice of formal proceedings.[21]

12. Count Sixteen: Improper Conduct in the Rivas Matter

Petitioner, sitting as a visiting judge in the Madera Justice Court of Madera County, was assigned to preside in a criminal case against Lisa Rivas. On April 3, 1990, the district attorney filed a peremptory challenge against petitioner under Code of Civil Procedure section 170.6. Petitioner called the Rivas case the next day, noting that the hearing was "just a motion to disqualify." When petitioner asked about the March 30 preliminary hearing, the district attorney started to respond, and then stated: "No offense—People filed a [Code of Civil Procedure section] 170.6 motion, so I don't think the Court should inquire into what happened on the 30th. [¶] People are prepared to let this Court set some new dates closer to today's date to help [defense counsel] and his client and for that limited purpose only." When petitioner again asked about the prior hearing, the district attorney stated that the inquiry was "inappropriate," given the disqualification motion. Petitioner then stated, without any input from defense counsel: "Well, first we have got to find out whether the defendant's constitutional rights and statutory rights were violated with respect to a speedy preliminary hearing before you can get to any issues." In response to the district attorney's continued objection, petitioner stated, "I don't think you can use [Code of Civil Procedure section] 170.6 to violate constitutional rights," and "I want to make that determination before I proceed."

[20]Petitioner's conduct was significantly different from the conduct we found improper in Broadman. There, motivated by personal animosity, Judge Broadman made a concerted effort "to affect the outcome in [a] legal malpractice case" against Attorney Arthur Kralowec. (Broadman, supra, 18 Cal.4th at p. 1106.) Judge Broadman twice summoned to his chambers plaintiff's attorney in the malpractice case and offered assistance in strengthening plaintiff's case; initiated (without request) discovery efforts on plaintiff's behalf; and appeared in the courtroom during trial of the malpractice case " 'just [to be] an asshole.' " (Ibid.) Here, by contrast, Gauthier sought out petitioner and solicited his knowledge of the parties involved in the ongoing criminal investigation, including the pastor. Moreover, Gauthier prompted petitioner's comments about the pastor's licensing status by remarking that the pastor had spent 15 to 20 hours trying to get the alleged victim to admit that her father had molested her. Petitioner simply did not engage in the kind of intentional interference that we found to be prejudicial misconduct in Broadman.

[21]Given our conclusion, we deny petitioner's request that we consider and take judicial notice of additional documentary evidence attached to his petition. The additional evidence purports to be an interview transcript in which Gauthier gave an account of the incident that differs substantially from petitioner's. We deny the request for the additional reason that, as petitioner explains, the transcript was "supplied by the Commission counsel during discovery." Petitioner offers no explanation for his failure to introduce the evidence during the Commission proceedings.

Over the district attorney's objection, petitioner then considered the speedy hearing question. Defense counsel asserted that Rivas had not waived her right to a speedy preliminary hearing. The district attorney, while continuing to object, asserted that Rivas had waived time so that the court could hear certain defense motions. When the district attorney asserted that petitioner lacked jurisdiction to determine whether Rivas had waived time, petitioner replied, "You're wrong," and explained, "You cannot file a [Code of Civil Procedure section] 170.6 [motion] and violate somebody's constitutional rights or statutory rights." Petitioner then directed the court reporter to get her notes from the preliminary hearing. Because the reporter's notes were not readily accessible, petitioner continued the hearing to April 6. He explained that "[t]he only issue" he would consider at the continued hearing was whether Rivas had waived time, explaining, "I can't hear [the case] for any other purposes."

On April 6, the district attorney sought and obtained an alternative writ of mandate and prohibition ordering petitioner to accept the peremptory challenge in the Rivas matter or to show cause for not doing so, and prohibiting him "from presiding in [the] case until further order of [the issuing] court." The district attorney served the writ on petitioner. At defense counsel's request, petitioner called the Rivas matter later that day. At the start of the hearing, petitioner acknowledged that he was "in possession of" the writ.[22] Responding to a question about his intent in light of the writ, petitioner explained: "I cannot hear this case for any other purpose than to determine whether [Rivas's] ten-day in custody right to a prelim[inary hearing] had been violated, and take judicial notice if that has been violated . . . [¶] . . .

[22]The district attorney testified that he personally served petitioner with the signed writ in chambers before the April 6 hearing in the Rivas case. Given this testimony, and the transcript of the April 6 hearing, during which petitioner acknowledged that he was "in possession of" the writ, we reject petitioner's challenge to the adequacy of the evidence that he received the writ before the April 6 hearing.

based on the record, the court records. I can't hear any contested issue of fact or law."

The district attorney disagreed with petitioner, insisting that he could take no action in the case of any kind, including considering the speedy hearing question. In response, defense counsel urged petitioner to determine the speedy hearing issue, arguing that it did not involve the merits of the case and that the constitutional right to be free from illegal detention outweighed the prosecution's statutory right to disqualify. Petitioner replied to defense counsel: "I think the defense ought to file a writ with the superior court that granted this writ, advising that court that your client's constitutional rights or statutory rights at least are being violated by keeping her in custody past her ten-day limit without her waiver, and without finding a good cause by the magistrate that continued the case. I think that's your remedy."

After a comment from defense counsel, petitioner continued: "It just shocks me that this can happen, that people that are supposed to be protectors of the peoples' rights, protecting of property, protecting of everything that we stand for, are playing games this way. It's just shocking to me." Petitioner continued: "I feel very strongly I don't want anything to do with this court again in Madera, and I'm going to take action to try to keep myself from even coming down here anymore. That's how strongly I feel about it. It's shocking to be associated with officers of the court, people who have pledged to uphold the law and support the Constitution, take this kind of action. It just shocks me beyond belief. Makes me embarrassed to even be associated with such people. [¶] Anyway, that's your remedy, I think . . . ." Finally, after defense counsel insisted that Rivas was being remanded to custody "without any redress of her grievances," petitioner commented, "Seems to me she has some legal remedies." Petitioner took no further action in the case.

(22a) On this record, we agree with the Commission's unanimous conclusion that petitioner committed prejudicial misconduct in his handling of the Rivas matter, but not for all of the reasons that the Commission cited.

The Commission concluded that petitioner committed prejudicial misconduct by "fail[ing] to transfer the Rivas case after the filing of the [peremptory challenge] and [deciding] to continue the case to his own calendar." However, we agree with the special masters that petitioner's initial decision to consider the speedy hearing question despite the peremptory challenge at most constituted a legal error. Although Code of Civil Procedure section 170.6 prohibits a properly challenged judge from "hear[ing] any matter . . . which involves a contested issue of law or fact," as the Commission notes, under Code of Civil Procedure section 170.4, subdivision (a)(1), a disqualified judge may "[t]ake any action or issue any order necessary to maintain the jurisdiction of the court pending the assignment of a judge not disqualified." Under Penal Code section 859b, "[w]henever [a] [criminal] defendant is in custody," and absent a waiver or good cause, the court "shall dismiss the complaint if the preliminary examination is set or continued beyond 10 court days from the time of the arraignment, . . . and the defendant has remained in custody for 10 or more court days solely on that complaint . . . ." Petitioner's belief that, notwithstanding the peremptory challenge, he could determine the speedy hearing question to preserve the court's jurisdiction "had at least enough merit to prevent the holding of it from constituting misconduct." (Wenger, supra, 29 Cal.3d at p. 647, fn. 13.) (23) "[A] judge should not be disciplined for mere erroneous determination of legal issues, including questions of limitations on the judicial power, that are subject to reasonable differences of opinion. [Citation.]" (Gubler v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1984) 37 Cal.3d 27, 47-48 [207 Cal.Rptr. 171, 688 P.2d 551].)

(22b) Nor on this record do we find that petitioner committed prejudicial misconduct in resuming the hearing on April 6 despite issuance of the writ or in suggesting that Rivas's remedy was to petition for a writ. On April 4, petitioner had continued the case to April 6, and called the case on that date only at the request of defense counsel. Defense counsel and the prosecutor then argued about whether petitioner could consider the speedy hearing issue despite issuance of the writ. Defense counsel insisted that petitioner could proceed because Rivas's constitutional rights outweighed the prosecution's statutory right of disqualification and the illegal detention issue did not present a factual issue or touch on the merits of the case. Only then did petitioner, concluding that he could not proceed, suggest that Rivas file a writ, stating: "I think that's your remedy." We conclude that these actions did not constitute prejudicial misconduct.[23]

Nevertheless, we agree with the Commission that petitioner's comments at the end of the April 6 hearing constituted prejudicial misconduct. As we have noted, petitioner expressed "shock[]" and "embarrass[ment]" about the conduct of the "officers of the court," and accused them of "playing games" notwithstanding their pledge to uphold the law, support the Constitution, and protect "the peoples' rights." Petitioner also proclaimed that he did not "want anything to do with this court again in Madera." We agree with the Commission that petitioner committed prejudicial misconduct in responding to his peremptory disqualification by publicly criticizing the prosecutors and the Madera court on the record. (See Kloepfer, supra, 49 Cal.3d at p. 842 [inappropriate remarks about counsel]; In re Rasmussen, supra, 43 Cal.3d at p. 538 [basing misconduct finding on "intemperate, open-court criticism of a fellow judge"]; Gonzalez, supra, 33 Cal.3d at p. 371 [judge committed misconduct by making "insulting and derogatory comments from the bench and in his chambers impugning the character and competence of his judicial colleagues"].)

IV. DISCIPLINE

Seven members of the Commission recommended petitioner's removal from office. The three remaining members voted against removal, and for severe public censure. As we have explained, petitioner concedes that he committed numerous acts of prejudicial misconduct. He also concedes that "his actions call for severe censure . . . ." However, like the minority of the Commission members, he urges that public censure is the appropriate sanction.

(25) After independent consideration, we agree with the majority of the Commission members that petitioner's removal from office is necessary to protect the public and the judicial system. "The number of wrongful acts is relevant to determining whether they were merely isolated occurrences or, instead, part of a course of conduct establishing 'lack of temperament and ability to perform judicial functions in an even-handed manner.' [Citation.]" (Wenger, supra, 29 Cal.3d at p. 653.) We have determined that petitioner twice committed willful misconduct and committed prejudicial misconduct on multiple occasions. "Together these incidents reflect a continuing, pervasive pattern of" misconduct. (Kloepfer, supra, 49 Cal.3d at p. 849.) "Petitioner's lack of judicial temperament is manifest."[24] (Kloepfer, supra, at p. 866.)

Petitioner blames much of his misconduct on inexperience and asserts that he has learned from his mistakes. He argues that "[t]he lack of available judicial education courses for justice court judges from 1988 to 1991, and the massive caseload facing a lone rural municipal court judge from 1988 through 1994, left [him] with limited access to judicial education and training material." He further asserts that "virtually all" of the instances of misconduct "were directly related" to this alleged "lack of available training" and "massive workload."

We find petitioner's arguments unpersuasive. The incidents of misconduct occurred between 1989 and 1994, during virtually petitioner's entire term in office before the Commission filed formal charges in early 1995. (See Kloepfer, supra, 49 Cal.3d at p. 866 [noting that misconduct incidents "occurred over the full span of petitioner's judicial career"].) Moreover, petitioner's 11 years as a deputy district attorney before he became a judge "should have acquainted him with criminal procedures. . . . His abuses in the civil matters . . . [are] too serious to be explainable by inexperience." (Wenger, supra, 29 Cal.3d at p. 654.) "In any event, lack of prior experience simply cannot mitigate wilful misconduct: if petitioner did not have the legal background and temperament to avoid committing malfeasance in office, he should not have sought election to the court." (Furey v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1987) 43 Cal.3d 1297, 1320 [240 Cal.Rptr. 859, 743 P.2d 919].)

Moreover, contrary to the contrite tone he sounds in this court, petitioner's primary response to the misconduct allegations during the Commission proceedings was to allege a conspiracy against him. During closing argument before the Commission, petitioner stated: "I just want to point out to the Commission that just about most of the witnesses that gave damaging testimony against me were all bias [sic]. They were all in concert together.

required nor determinative."].) The dissent also maintains that the record reflects nothing more than a judge in a small community who sometimes has had difficulty separating his judicial role from his role in the community. (Dis. opn. of Kennard, J., post, at p. 922.) Although petitioner's membership in a relatively small community arguably relates to his apparent inability to refrain from ex parte contacts, it should not excuse this misconduct. Nor does it have any bearing on petitioner's willful misconduct in altering minute orders to mislead the Commission and becoming an advocate against a criminal defendant because of his political rivalry with the prosecutor, or on his prejudicial misconduct in making improper comments about counsel, using court staff for campaign purposes, abusing his contempt powers, reacting inappropriately to disqualification attempts, prejudging cases, and publicly criticizing public officers. Finally, the dissent's view that the record lacks any hint that petitioner is corrupt, venal, or biased (dis. opn. of Kennard, J., post, at p. 922) does not require a different result. "Honesty" is one of the "minimum qualifications which are expected of every judge." (Kloepfer, supra, 49 Cal.3d at p. 865; see also Wenger, supra, 29 Cal.3d at p. 653 [ordering removal despite lack of evidence that judge used his office for illicit gain or neglected his work].)

They had meetings. They associate with each other. They had all one intent and purpose, to get me removed from the bench." After attacking the credibility and motives of specific witnesses (referring to one as "the main instigator behind a lot of these things"), petitioner commented: "I think there was a lot of shocking—to me, the bias, the false testimony that I observed in that hearing, it devastated me, put me back into the care of my doctor under stress and tension and depression." Petitioner closed by attacking his head clerk, asserting: "She was a heavy supporter of a person that opposed me in the election and she was very vindictive . . . . She gave information out to everyone that we discussed in confidence. She told other clerks or people down the hall, and I started out thinking that I was going to be accepted as a judge in that community, but I didn't realize the power of the people that resented me to be there and really did not want to cooperate with me."

Petitioner made similar comments during opening argument before the special masters, asserting that the Commission's evidence came from "biased witnesses" and that its witness list "is mainly people who have decided that they had some ax to grind against me . . . ." He insisted that "a lot of this is generated out of retaliation for [his] firing a clerk . . . ." He further asserted: "So we have a lot of biased people that have their own agenda why they want to get me or hurt me or in some way attack me . . . ." Petitioner repeated this theme in his testimony before the special masters. For example, regarding alteration of the minute orders in the Henderson matter, petitioner suggested that his clerk was "involved with a group of people that were sending everything they could find on [him] to the Commission" and that she had altered one of the orders "to make it look [to the Commission] like [he] was falsifying documents."

We agree with the Commission that petitioner's conspiracy claims are reminiscent of those we considered in Gonzalez. There, in imposing a removal sanction, we commented: "In the final analysis Judge Gonzalez utterly fails to grasp either the substance or seriousness of the numerous charges levelled against him by the Commission. Despite multiple admonitions and the normal evidentiary limitations of the hearing process, Judge Gonzalez has treated this investigation as an attack on his character. . . . He persists in his theory that his adversaries conspired to record his every misdeed and regards virtually every allegation as personally motivated. Rather than respond affirmatively and convincingly to the specific charges, he expend[ed] most of his defense effort in attacking the character and credibility of the adverse witnesses. While he concedes there may be certain minor irregularities in his judicial manner and procedures, he denies he has ever deliberately abused his judicial office and generally refuses to admit he has done anything improper." (Gonzalez, supra, 33 Cal.3d at p. 377.)

In summary, the record "belies petitioner's claim that he has learned from past experience and has modified his courtroom behavior. It demonstrates instead an inability to appreciate the importance of, and conform to, the standards of judicial conduct that are essential if justice is to be meted out in every case." (Kloepfer, supra, 49 Cal.3d at p. 866, fn. omitted, original italics.) It "does not suggest that petitioner has, or will be able to, overcome [his demonstrated lack of judicial temperament] and that similar incidents will not recur." (Ibid.) "Mere censure of petitioner would woefully fail to convey our utter reproval of any judge who allows malice or other improper personal motivations to infect the administration of justice." (Spruance, supra, 13 Cal.3d at p. 802.) Thus, like the Commission, we conclude that petitioner's removal from office is necessary to protect the public and the judiciary's reputation.[25]

V. DISPOSITION

We order that Judge Thomas B. Fletcher, judge of the Madera Superior Court, be removed from office. He shall, however, if otherwise qualified, be permitted to resume the practice of law (Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (d)) on condition that he pass the Professional Responsibility Examination. This order is effective upon the finality of this decision in this court.

KENNARD, J., Dissenting.—The majority finds that petitioner, Judge Thomas B. Fletcher, committed two instances of willful misconduct and a number of instances of conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice. It concludes that he should be removed from office. I disagree with the majority's conclusion that removal is the proper sanction for Judge Fletcher's misconduct, as well as with one of its findings of willful misconduct. None of Judge Fletcher's acts of misconduct involved corruption or moral turpitude, and he has sought to reform his conduct. Removal is not necessary to protect the public and the judiciary. Instead, in my view, public censure is the appropriate sanction in this case.

I

As we recently explained, willful misconduct requires a finding by clear and convincing evidence that the judge acted in bad faith. "A judge acts in bad faith only by (1) performing a judicial act for a corrupt purpose (which is any purpose other than the faithful discharge of judicial duties), or (2) performing a judicial act with knowledge that the act is beyond the judge's lawful judicial power, or (3) performing a judicial act that exceeds the [25]The dissent asserts that removal is inappropriate in part because petitioner has expressed remorse and resolved to do better. (Dis. opn. of Kennard, J., post, at p. 923.) However, as our discussion demonstrates, "[t]he difficulty with [petitioner's] professed enlightenment is its delayed arrival." (Wenger, supra, 29 Cal.3d at p. 654.) "Mitigation of wrongdoing requires more than an unfulfilled intent to reform." (Ibid.)

judge's lawful power with a conscious disregard for the limits of the judge's authority." (Broadman v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1998) 18 Cal.4th 1079, 1092 [77 Cal.Rptr.2d 408, 959 P.2d 715].)

In the matter of Michael Toschi (count twelve), Judge Fletcher refused the prosecutor's request, as part of a plea bargain, to dismiss drunk driving charges against Toschi and instead took steps to subpoena witnesses for trial. I agree that this was misconduct. But the record lacks clear and convincing evidence of the bad faith required for willful misconduct. There is no evidence that Judge Fletcher knew he was acting beyond his judicial powers or that he acted with conscious disregard of whether he was acting beyond his powers. Nor is Judge Fletcher's suspicion that the prosecutor was trying to trick him into an erroneous dismissal that would portray him in a bad light clear and convincing evidence that he was acting for a corrupt purpose other than the faithful discharge of his judicial duties. Rather, he seems to have honestly believed that dismissal was an inappropriate resolution of the drunk driving charges against Toschi. Thus, I disagree with the majority that there is clear and convincing evidence that Judge Fletcher acted with the bad faith required for willful misconduct. Instead, I would find his conduct in this instance to be prejudicial conduct.

II

As our system of judicial discipline with its range of sanctions recognizes, not every instance of judicial shortcoming deserves the ultimate sanction of removal. We remove judges from office only when necessary for "the protection of the public, the enforcement of rigorous standards of judicial conduct, and the maintenance of public confidence in the integrity and independence of the judicial system." (Adams v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1995) 10 Cal.4th 866, 912 [42 Cal.Rptr.2d 606, 897 P.2d 544].) That standard is not met here.

It is important to note what is absent in this case. There is no hint that Judge Fletcher is corrupt or venal. There is no suggestion that the judge's decisions have been colored by bias or favoritism. There is no suggestion of the judge's incompetence or dereliction of duty.

What the record reveals instead is a judge who has discharged his duties diligently and in good faith but who sometimes has had difficulty in separating his judicial role from his role in the community. Especially in small communities like Judge Fletcher's town of Bass Lake in Madera County, the lawyers who become judges are often active and prominent figures deeply involved in the life of the community. Becoming a judge requires the lawyer to disengage from those connections and assume a more detached role. Most of the instances of misconduct by Judge Fletcher have arisen from his failure at times to maintain the detachment inhering in the office of judge, especially by engaging in ex parte contacts with parties and witnesses. On occasion, he has also displayed a quick temper in court.

Although Judge Fletcher's conduct deserves sanction, the judicial system and the public will be adequately protected by public censure; removal is not necessary. As this court said in Doan v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1995) 11 Cal.4th 294, 339 [45 Cal.Rptr.2d 254, 902 P.2d 272], "we would hesitate to remove a judge who showed himself ready, willing, and able to reform under a less severe sanction." On the record here, Judge Fletcher is such a judge, and he should not be removed from office. He has expressed remorse and resolved to do better. He does not "generally refuse[] to admit he has done anything improper." (Gonzalez v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1983) 33 Cal.3d 359, 377 [188 Cal.Rptr. 880, 657 P.2d 372].) The most recent of the acts of misconduct in this case occurred in 1994. It does not appear that since then the Commission on Judicial Performance has brought any new formal charges against Judge Fletcher. On the facts of this case, public censure is a more appropriate sanction than, as the majority concludes, removal from office.

A review of our recent judicial discipline cases confirms my view that public censure is the appropriate sanction here. In Broadman v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 18 Cal.4th 1079, the disciplined judge committed willful misconduct by intentionally misleading a criminal defendant and his counsel in the course of a hearing. Abusing the judicial process, the judge "tricked" an HIV-positive criminal defendant and his defense counsel into agreeing to a continuance of the sentencing hearing so the judge could attempt to craft a sentence that would deny medical treatment to the defendant in prison. The judge also committed prejudicial conduct in two instances: (1) He attempted to influence the outcome of a civil action against an attorney with whom he had a longstanding personal dispute; and (2) he improperly commented to the press about two pending cases in which he was the judge, and continued to do so even after the Commission on Judicial Performance sent him two letters telling him to desist.

In my view, these instances of willful misconduct and prejudicial conduct, and the state of mind in which they were committed, are more egregious and offensive and do more to bring the judiciary into disrepute than does the misconduct that Judge Fletcher has committed. The discipline imposed in Broadman v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 18 Cal.4th 1079, however, was only public censure; the discipline imposed by the majority here is removal from office.

The most recent cases in which we removed a judge from office involved misconduct far more egregious than Judge Fletcher's. In Doan v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 11 Cal.4th 294, 339, we removed from office a judge who had displayed "moral turpitude, dishonesty, and corruption." The judge's willful misconduct included intervening on behalf of a defendant, her gardener, in a pending criminal case while at the same time presiding over his case; corruptly attempting to influence the outcome of a criminal case she was presiding over to ingratiate herself with the defendant's aunt, a friend of the judge's who had lent the judge money; and instructing witnesses not to cooperate with the Commission on Judicial Performance. The judge's prejudicial conduct included failing to disclose, in a criminal case against another nephew of the same friend who had lent the judge money, her relationship with the defendant and failing to disclose that she had discussed the case with her friend; intervening in a criminal case in which the defendant was the friend who had lent her money; failing to report in her financial disclosure forms various loans she had received; borrowing money from a court subordinate and from a police officer who regularly presented warrant applications to her; failing to list in her bankruptcy petition all her creditors; habitual tardiness in commencing court sessions; and offering to provide legal services to a convict whose wife had loaned the judge money. Nothing in this case comes close to that level of misconduct.

In Adams v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 10 Cal.4th 866, we removed a judge who committed willful misconduct by deliberately providing false information to the Commission on Judicial Performance and who committed prejudicial conduct by accepting gifts and favors from attorneys and a litigant appearing before him and assisting those attorneys in cases pending before the court of which he was a member and before another court. No form of misconduct is more destructive of public confidence in the judiciary than is bribery. And even without a quid pro quo, the image of a judge accepting gifts from lawyers and litigants corrodes the public trust in the judiciary. Accordingly, even though we concluded in Adams that the gifts and favors the judge had received had not corruptly influenced his decisions, removal was nonetheless warranted. Again, nothing in this case approaches the level of the misconduct in Adams.

For the reasons stated above, I would censure Judge Fletcher rather than remove him from office, the same conclusion reached by the three of the members of the Commission on Judicial Performance.

Mosk, J., concurred.

Petitioner's application for review by the Supreme Court was denied March 17, 1999. Kennard, J., was of the opinion that the petition should be granted.

| INQUIRY CONCERNING A JUDGENO. 138 (Judge D. Ronald Hyde) | DECISION AND ORDER OF PUBLIC CENSURE |

This is a disciplinary matter concerning D. Ronald Hyde, Judge of the Alameda County Municipal Court, Livermore-Pleasanton-Dublin Judicial District. The Notice of Formal Proceedings alleges seven counts of misconduct, all generally concerning misuse of the judicial office.

Prior to filing an answer to the Notice, Judge Hyde submitted a proposed disposition of the matter to trial counsel. The proposed disposition, along with a stipulated statement of facts, was submitted to the Commission on May 8, 1996.

Having reviewed the facts as stipulated by the parties and pursuant to the stipulated disposition, the Commission now makes the following findings of fact and conclusions of law.

Statement of Facts

The Commission accepts as true the following statement of stipulated facts:

1. Judge D. Ronald Hyde has been a judge of the Alameda County Municipal Court, Livermore-Pleasanton-Dublin Judicial District, from December 19, 1982, to the present.

2. In the fall of 1990, Judge Hyde asked certain court employees to access DMV records for the purpose of obtaining the addresses of former classmates in connection with a class reunion. After compiling the list, one of the employees, at the direction of Judge Hyde, sent the list to a third party involved in organizing the reunion. In 1991, when the Clerk/Administrator sent a memorandum to all court employees asking such employees to acknowledge the restrictions on use of DMV records, Judge Hyde, believing himself to not be a "court employee," declined to sign the acknowledgment.

3. Between 1991 and 1995, Judge Hyde asked various court employees to access DMV records for the purpose of obtaining information regarding motorists that was not related to court business.

4. In 1991, 1993, and 1994, a court secretary performed typing, photocopying, and other services in connection with a paralegal class which Judge Hyde taught at a local College. This included typing a lengthy lesson plan, typing mid-term and final examinations, photocopying class materials, mailing out graded final examinations using court envelopes and postage, and typing correspondence. All of this work translated into the equivalent of approximately ten working days over the entire period. On May 9, 1994, the Clerk/Administrator advised Judge Hyde that he considered the use of court resources in this regard to be excessive. Although Judge Hyde generally ceased this practice, he did, on May 13, 1994, cause a court secretary to send a personal letter and make copies of the final examination.

5. Between 1992 and 1995, Judge Hyde used a county facsimile machine to send approximately 57 personal facsimile transmissions to Idaho.

6. Between 1990 and 1994, Judge Hyde requested that a court secretary send approximately 48 personal letters, approximately 43 of which were sent on official court stationery. These letters were composed during the work day by utilizing county computers.

7. On January 14, 1991, Judge Hyde requested that the court secretary type an "affidavit in lieu of appearance" that he submitted in connection with a complaint regarding a neighbor's dog, which he filed in his personal capacity.

8. In 1992, Judge Hyde requested that the court secretary type up his application for a federal judgeship. Judge Hyde then had a discussion with the Clerk/Administrator regarding the best way to get the application to San Francisco on short notice, and the application was ultimately driven to San Francisco by a court attendant utilizing a county vehicle.

9. On or about October 23, 1995, Judge Hyde and a court employee had a conversation regarding the employee's occasional trips to Oakland to deliver evidence. This conversation related to Judge Hyde's need to pick up forms relating to his candidacy for re-election, and the court employee interpreted Judge Hyde's questions regarding these trips to be a request that the court employee spend personal time picking up the needed forms. Ultimately, a division chief produced evidence to be delivered to Oakland by the court employee, although there was not a particular necessity that the evidence be delivered at that time, and while delivering the evidence the court employee also obtained the re-election forms which were needed by Judge Hyde.

10. In 1993 and 1994 there were occasions when Judge Hyde brought his elementary school-aged daughter to work and the court secretary and other court employees assisted in watching her activities. On one occasion in 1993, during her break, a court employee picked up Judge Hyde's daughter from a dental appointment during what would be considered work hours. Judge Hyde was unable to accomplish this task because he was unable to leave court.

11. Between 1990 and 1995, the court secretary performed work for Judge Hyde that benefited a particular Club, an organization of which Judge Hyde was a member and past President. In 1990 and 1991, the equivalent of approximately 40 work hours were spent doing work that included preparing a 73-page guest list, a 7-page ticket number list, and a 7-page alphabetical list and correspondence for the Club's Cabaret Night; inserting approximately 1,000 pre-printed invitations into envelopes, as well as addressing the envelopes; and typing the by-laws, constitution, membership committee forms, an information pamphlet, an affidavit and an article for the newsletter of the Club. She also typed approximately 61 pieces of Club-related correspondence, approximately 32 of which were printed on official court stationery, and 20 of which were sent on the courthouse facsimile machine or by using county postage.

12. During 1991 and 1992, Judge Hyde requested that the court secretary create a 94-page mailing list for a particular Charity; whereupon she also generated copies of a fund-raising letter addressed to those on the mailing list. Additionally, she typed labels, envelopes, by-laws, and personnel policies relating to the Charity. The court secretary spent the equivalent of approximately 24 work days on such tasks.

13. In November, 1991, Judge Hyde and a clerk/administrator had a conversation regarding utilization of the court secretary's time, during which the clerk/administrator formed the impression that Judge Hyde was attempting to intimidate him regarding his job security.

14. Between 1990 and 1994, Judge Hyde failed to report on his annual verified Statement of Economic Interests form the following items: a) income received from a local College during 1993 and 1994; b) a $28,000 personal loan in 1993; and c) a trip to Hong Kong received as a raffle prize in 1993. Judge Hyde represents (and the Commission accepts as true) that this failure was inadvertent and amended statements will be filed.

15. Between 1990 and 1995, Judge Hyde used official court stationery to send letters to the following business entities or public officials under circumstances in which the use of court stationery could have been interpreted to lend the prestige of judicial office to personal or private interests: a) a letter to an Insurance Company forwarding a Claim of Loss form regarding a burglary at Judge Hyde's home; b) a letter to the Presidents of two airlines complaining of flight delays experienced during a trip; c) a letter, written in Judge Hyde's capacity as President of the Board of Directors of a Charity, to a mayor and the members of a City Council on behalf of a business' "request for modification of their PUD;" d) a letter to a life insurance company regarding changes to Judge Hyde's insurance policy; e) a letter to a book publisher regarding a billing dispute; and f) a letter to the President of a Bank reconfirming Judge Hyde's interest in serving as a member of the Board of Directors of a Fair.

16. Between 1991 and 1995, Judge Hyde made sexually-related comments toward female court employees which were deemed to be offensive by some court employees who overheard the statements. For example, during the week of October 23, 1995, Presiding Judge Hugh Walker and two division chiefs were having a conversation regarding court policies and procedures when Judge Hyde commented to a female division chief, "Are we having a PMS day?"

17. Between 1993 and 1995, Judge Hyde was absent from the courthouse for six and three-quarters days without reporting them as vacation time. Additionally, there were other days when Judge Hyde absented himself from the courthouse without reporting the time as vacation time and regularly left the courthouse when the Friday calendar was completed, sometimes as early as noon. On some days when Judge Hyde was absent, as well as on some days when he was present, the county incurred the expense of utilizing a commissioner to hear civil trials, small claims matters, or traffic matters.

18. None of the acts related above concern the manner in which Judge Hyde conducted his courtroom proceedings or deported himself while on the bench. It was Judge Hyde's impression that utilizing the work time of court personnel did not result in the impairment or nonproduction of necessary court business. Judge Hyde represents (and the Commission accepts as true) that he has taken measures to ensure that neither court personnel nor county equipment is utilized in any manner or in any activity that is not strictly court-related.

Basis for Accepting a Stipulated Disposition

The stipulated facts admit substantially all of the allegations set forth in the Notice of Formal Proceedings. As noted above, the Commission also accepts Judge Hyde's representations of fact as being true.

In a separate signed statement, Judge Hyde also represented that he:

> ". . . is aware of the inappropriateness of the actions reflected by the Agreed Statement of Facts and assures the Commission that these actions will not be repeated in the future.

The Commission has concluded, in view of Judge Hyde's response to the Notice and his assurances that the challenged conduct has ceased and will not resume, that discipline less than removal from office would be appropriate. The Commission therefore accepts the proposed disposition and agrees that it will not order that Judge Hyde be removed from office. In proposing this disposition, Judge Hyde waived the right to a hearing and to petition the Supreme Court for review.

Discipline

The Commission has carefully reviewed the record. The stipulated facts establish repeated instances of conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice.* As noted, the Commission's principal concern in this matter is whether Judge Hyde should be removed from office. Short of removal, the next most serious level of discipline available to the Commission is public censure.

The Commission concludes that the appropriate discipline is a severe public censure. The Commission vote was 8 to zero.

Order

For the reasons set forth herein, the Commission orders that Judge D. Ronald Hyde be, and he hereby is, issued a severe public censure.

Dated: May 10, 1996

William A. Masterson
Chairperson

* The use of DMV records for personal purposes comes very close to willful misconduct in office. The stipulated facts do not afford, however, clear and convincing evidence that Judge Hyde's actions were performed in a judicial capacity. Dodds v. | INQUIRY CONCERNING A JUDGENO. 139 | DECISION AND ORDER IMPOSING PUBLIC CENSURE |

This is a disciplinary matter concerning Jose Angel Velasquez, Judge of the Monterey County Municipal Court, Salinas Division. Formal Proceedings having been instituted, this matter is now before the Commission on Judicial Performance pursuant to Rule 127 of the Commission's Rules of Practice (discipline by consent).

The Commission has determined that public censure is appropriate.

APPEARANCES

Trial counsel for the Commission on Judicial Performance are Jack Coyle, Dennis Coupe, and Valerie Marchant (San Francisco). Counsel for Judge Velasquez are James Friedhofer, Douglas R. Reynolds, Lisa K. Roberts and Lewis, D'Amato, Brisbois & Bisgaard (San Diego).

PROCEDURAL HISTORY

Formal proceedings were instituted in this matter by the Commission's Notice of Formal Proceedings dated August 30, 1996, which was later amended on October 29, 1996.[1] The Notice sets forth four counts of misconduct and concludes by alleging that Judge Velasquez committed willful misconduct in office, conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice, or improper action -- three categories of misconduct specified as being grounds for judicial discipline in article VI, section 18 of the California Constitution.

[1] All references to the Notice of Formal Proceedings herein are to the First Amended Notice of Formal Proceedings.

Served: 4-16-97
BW CJP (CCP §1019.5(b))

Judge Velasquez filed a verified Answer to the Notice on November 20, 1996. The Answer admitted many of the factual allegations of the Notice but disputed the inferences and conclusions alleged, and specifically denied willful misconduct in office or conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice. The Answer did not deny that Judge Velasquez' actions constituted improper action.

Judge Velasquez' Answer also asserted thirteen affirmative defenses to the Notice, including lack of subject matter jurisdiction and constitutional privileges for freedom of speech, freedom of religion, and freedom of expression.

Upon receipt of Judge Velasquez' Answer, the Commission requested that the California Supreme Court appoint special masters, pursuant to Rule 121. The Honorable Joanne C. Parrilli of the First District Court of Appeal, the Honorable Stanley Weisberg of the Los Angeles County Superior Court and the Honorable Cerena Wong of the Sonoma County Municipal Court were appointed and are presently serving as special masters in this proceeding.

Pretrial hearings and motions were heard by the masters, and a formal hearing to hear argument and take evidence was commenced before the special masters in San Jose, California on April 7, 1997. Shortly after the hearing commenced, and stimulated by an inquiry from the masters about possible resolution of this matter, counsel for the parties requested a brief adjournment to discuss disposition by consent. A stipulation was tentatively proposed to the Commission, through Commission Counsel, and it appearing that a disposition could be obtained, further hearings were suspended so that a stipulated resolution of this matter could be presented to the Commission.

The matter is now before the Commission, pursuant to Rule 127, upon stipulated facts and an agreement that -- if discipline by consent is accepted by the Commission in lieu of a full hearing -- discipline no more severe than a public censure would be imposed.

FINDINGS OF FACT

In a verified statement, submitted in conjunction with the stipulation proposing resolution of this matter, Judge Velasquez admits the truth of the charges set forth in the Notice, waives review by the Supreme Court, states that he is not acting under duress, and consents to a sanction of public censure.

In the accompanying stipulation, signed by Judge Velasquez and all counsel, the parties stipulate as follows:

COUNT ONE

Judge Velasquez displayed a crucifix (approximately 9" by 6" in size) on the wall behind the bench during an arraignment calendar in December 1995. The crucifix was visible to the public. A deputy district attorney and deputy public defender expressed concern about the display to Judge Velasquez. Judge Velasquez acknowledged their concerns and removed the crucifix later that day. He displayed the crucifix as an expression of his personal religious belief. He did not intend to offend anyone.

Judge Velasquez' actions in Count One constituted conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice.

COUNT TWO

In December 1995, Judge Velasquez received a form letter from a group called the Reproductive Rights Coalition, soliciting names to be listed in an upcoming newspaper advertisement in the Monterey Herald celebrating the 23rd anniversary of Roe v. Wade. Judge Velasquez returned a form attached to the solicitation authorizing the use of his name as "Judge Jose Angel Velasquez." The advertisement appeared in the Monterey Herald on January 22, 1996, with the judge's name and title. The form that Judge Velasquez filled out and the information he received did not state that a solicitation of funds would be part of the advertisement.

Judge Velasquez' actions in Count Two constituted conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice.

COUNT THREE

Upon his initial assignment to a municipal court misdemeanor trial calendar, in January 1996, Judge Velasquez made it known publicly that, effective February 8, he would impose 31 to 45 days in jail plus 30 AA meetings for first time DUI offenders, 75 to 90 days in jail plus 45 to 60 AA meetings for second DUI offenders, and 180 days in jail plus 90 AA meetings for third time DUI offenders. Those sentences would have been lawful under the California Vehicle Code. However, the DUI policy, as announced, appeared to not allow for exceptions, and therefore created the appearance of prejudgment of DUI cases.

Judge Velasquez' actions in Count Three constituted conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice.

COUNT FOUR

Between February 23, 1996, and April 5, 1996, Judge Velasquez made public statements disparaging fellow Monterey County judges and certain Monterey County attorneys. The statements were made both on and off the bench, in open court, in documents Judge Velasquez filed in court, in newspapers and on television broadcasts. The facts set forth in Count Four (a - m) of the Amended Notice of Formal Proceedings are incorporated herein by reference.

Judge Velasquez' actions in Count Four constituted willful misconduct.

MITIGATION

In mitigation, the actions described above took place within 10 months of Judge Velasquez assuming the bench and within 4 months of his initial assignment to a misdemeanor trial division; the public disparagement ceased in April 1996 and has not been repeated.

Judge Velasquez has requested that the Commission note his cooperation during its investigation.

DISCIPLINE

The parties agree that based upon the foregoing, Judge Velasquez shall be publicly censured.

The allegations of Count Four, which are incorporated by reference in the stipulation above, are that:

Between February 1, 1996, and April 30, 1996, you made public statements disparaging your fellow Monterey County judges on the municipal court bench and superior court bench, as well as certain attorneys who appeared before you. You made disparaging statements about your fellow judges both on and off the bench, in open court, in documents you filed in superior court, to newspaper reporters and on television broadcasts. Your statements impugned the integrity and impartiality of the judiciary. Your comments about attorneys occurred in March 1996, while you were on the bench and court was in session.

You made the following disparaging statements:

a. On the morning of February 23, 1996, in the DUI cases of defendant Pinney, you made disparaging statements in open court that include but are not limited to the following:

> "... and the reason why I am going on the record is that Jose Angel Velasquez in Department 4, who was elected by the people, has been treated unfairly and unjustly by Presiding Judge Stephen Sillman, in making special treatments and calendaring assignments for various cases. I don't critique or criticize this particular case, but just the activities of a presiding judge with respect to 170.6s."

In the afternoon of February 23, 1996, in the same cases, you made disparaging statements in open court that include but are not limited to the following:

> "In this case Judge, Presiding Judge Stephen Sillman called me to his chambers and we had a rather heated discussion in terms of filing the 170.6s, and a discussion about special treatment or not treatment. For the record ... the Presiding Judge had changed the orders on several occasions... The procedure for the filing of 170.6s he says it's a special, it's not special arrangements, I say that as against me, it's being racially discriminatory, that's a factual finding, and that he's been meaning to maneuver my calendar for whatever purposes he may have ... and I told him to his face that he is racially discriminatory as against me ... and that it has been his doing to give me every individual clerk to work with my calendar not allowing me to have a continuity ... and there's been changes of policy on a daily basis and on a case per case basis and there have been special arrangements made in this particular court today, on a special case which is unique at his doing. He claims not to, but that is what I am stating on the record and he can challenge me on it."

b. On March 7, 1996, defense attorney Lawrence Biegel appeared before you regarding defendants Pinney and Zaouk. Mr. Biegel wished to disqualify you pursuant to Code of Civil Procedure section 170.1 because he represented Court Administrator Kay McCormick regarding matters that directly involved you. You made disparaging statements in open court about your fellow judges and about attorney Biegel, including but not limited to the following:

"I have made allegations on the record that there is racial discrimination being aimed and targeted by or towards me, there is an actual conspiracy between several members of the municipal court bench and superior court bench and I know that it's extended to members of the California Bar ... My question for the record is, in the commission of legal malpractice, has this client been advised, that is Mr. Morgan Patrick Pinney, for this commission of legal malpractice by your law firm, and if it hasn't, why hasn't that happened? Now I am making blatant and open accusations that the presiding judge of the Municipal Court, Stephen A. Sillman, is part of a conspiracy with members of the Superior Court bench ... also with administrators from this court and heads of other departments in their manipulations and maneuvering of my court calendar to make me look bad because of politics. ... for me to disqualify myself ... would be to engage in the perpetration of what I see a conspiracy by various members. ... my reason for making this record clear is that I detect and I suspect, and this is on the record, that there is collusion with respect to the maneuvering between Sillman, McCormick and your law office to circumvent to the idea of 170.6 and to legally get this case out of my court ..."

c. On March 18, 1996, you filed in municipal court an "Answer To Motion To Recuse" in the DUI cases of defendant Pinney and the case of defendant Zaouk. In each answer, you made disparaging statements about your fellow judges and about the Cominos and Biegel law firm, including but not limited to the following:

"So, having committed legal mal-practice, as publicly advised by a locally well-known certified criminal law attorney ... one of the only legal ways to circumvent this problem is to represent a trumped-up client against me ... I have publicly called upon a thorough investigation into a clandestine conspiracy formed by several judicial members of the Municipal and Superior Courts of Monterey County to publicly make me look bad. It is public knowledge that both presiding judges for the Municipal and Superior Court are publicly working against me because of their personal discontent with my election. ... I feel that for me to acquiesce to this disqualification which in effect is a pretext and cover-up to the commission of legal mal-practice by the Cominos and Biegel Law Office ... would be tantamount to my own perpetration of an unethical and illegal furtherance of a crime and conspiracy ... the entire Monterey County judiciary is presently involved in a major internal dispute ... it is my position that several judicial branch members, elected officials and court administrators have 'huddled' and decided to engage [defense attorney Biegel's] services, so as to give him the legal way out of having failed to timely file his 170.6s."

d. On March 21, 1996, in open court, in the DUI case of defendant Wyatt, you made statements criticizing the DUI sentences imposed by your fellow judges, and also made statements that implied that the District Attorney's Office did not want defendants who were guilty of DUI charges to be appropriately punished. Your statements include but are not limited to the following:

"... let me explain to you. I've been a lawyer before, now I'm a judge. I'm a tough judge. One state, the toughest in the State of California. So my colleagues here are complaining that I'm being too tough. The DAs are complaining that I'm too tough.... All the lawyers in the State of California are complaining that I'm too tough on people that are convicted for drunk driving. So, even though the public wants to be protected from drunk drivers and you're innocent until proven guilty, I am giving you - I'm fully disclosing to you that if you go next door, you will be given five days by another judge."

e. On March 21, 1996, in the DUI case of defendant Tavares, you made statements in open court criticizing the DUI sentences imposed by your fellow judges, including:

"Mr. Daniel Tavares, they're going to be filing a paper to disqualify me so that you can be taken to another judge in this county and be given a slap on the wrist - five days. You don't have to go to jail at all. That's how Monterey County are going to be protected by - from drunk drivers."

f. On March 21, 1996, in the case of defendant Russell, you made disparaging statements in open court about the judge who previously had the case, including stating that the judge may have committed "legal malpractice" in handling the case.

You also made disparaging statements about the deputy district attorney who had previously handled the case, including stating that the deputy district attorney may have committed "legal malpractice." The deputy district attorney you referred to was not present when you made those statements.

g. On March 29, 1996, in the case of defendant Picazo, you made statements in open court disparaging Deputy Public Defender Ruth McVeigh. These statements were made in Ms. McVeigh's absence. These statements include but are not limited to the following:

> "... it's been a problem, with her comportment, with her demeanor and with her lack of respect for any in-chambers conversations. Not only with me the individual or as a judge, but also with her continuous disrespect for the Deputy DA.... Ms. McVeigh has contemptuously, intentionally and we'll find out, she is next door. If she is next door she has a right to be there and I will wait, but I believe Ms. McVeigh has a personal problem with - and I will have my secretary (unintelligible) call Ms. McVeigh's boss and ask whether she is in her office and she has problems with this court. Maybe she should be reassigned."

h. On March 29, 1996, after a deputy public defender filed a peremptory challenge or disqualification in the cases of defendants Picazo, White and Rosas, you made statements in open court disparaging the deputy public defenders to their clients. No deputy public defender was present when you made these statements, which include but are not limited to the following:

> "... your attorneys have failed to look into the files and see what is in them and their fault and their demeanor in here and failure to (unintelligible) of the court.... I think, in this case you may have a case against them for their abandoning you in court ... you may want to hire a lawyer to sue the public defender's office for their reckless disregard of your due process rights.... I'll say that to Mr. Lawrence [the Public Defender] himself. ... I think individual people within the public defender's office are having their personal problems brought in here and they're attacking various members, including the deputy public - district attorney in cases, simply because they are not getting their way. And today I am telling you that I feel sorry for you as ... a judge, because your rights are being trampled upon by your own lawyers. They are failing to represent you.... I'll tell you one thing, this tape recording you can pay $10 and ... go get yourself a lawyer and copy it. Okay? And if they want to talk to me they have a pager they can call my family and I will come back from wherever I am. You may hire yourself a real lawyer that's going to represent your rights. The public defenders are real lawyers but in this county several of them are just disrespecting you as a human being. And I think that's offensive and that's a crime and that's a legal malpractice.... Three of the lawyers have come in here and abandoned you without even bothering to tell you what they have done or explained to you what the procedure is ... But I am just trying to explain to people here that your lawyers are not doing their jobs for you. And I say that about Mr. Kleinkopf who was in here, I say that about Ms. McVeigh ... All three of you can have a copy of this tape for free at the court's expense and ... and you should actually file a Morrissey [sic] hearing because you can say these lawyers are not representing your rights, they are just abandoning. I am making all these legal - factual findings because I am here talking to you. You may want to talk to the next judge and then ask for help because right now you have been abandoned, you've been left naked.... Because your lawyers chose to disrespect and disregard your files and they want to make me to be the bad guy and I'm not the bad guy.... They chose to leave you in a courtroom with a judge and with a deputy DA without even telling you what was going on. That's the worst of representation that any lawyer can give in the State of California."

In addition to disparaging the deputy public defenders, these statements improperly interfered with the attorney-client relationship.

i. In an interview with KCCN television, you made disparaging statements about Judges Sillman, Duffy, Curtis and Scott that were broadcast on the evening news on April 1, 1996, including but not limited to the following:

"And even though I say that Judge Sillman is racist, and Wendy Duffy is racist, and Richard Curtis is racist and Russell Scott is racist, I have told them that it will be my intent to make friends of them. ... They're wanting to use statistics against me; that I am not carrying my own weight, that is caseload. But the reason for that is the defense attorneys are disqualifying me because I will give convicted drunk drivers a serious sentence and not a slap on the wrist."

j. In an interview with KCBA Fox 35 television, you made disparaging statements that were broadcast on the evening news on April 3, 1996, including but not limited to the following:

"My colleagues have resisted to accept the results of a valid district election that was as a result of the democratic process. ... Now I am the beneficiary of much of the hatred and distaste of many of my colleagues on the bench. ... My colleagues on the municipal court bench have chosen to make my life miserable and at the present time are wanting to coerce me by yanking me out of the department that I have been handling effectively, efficiently and competently because of my ... strong stance on DUI."

k. In an interview with KCCN television, you made disparaging statements about your fellow judges that were broadcast on the evening news on April 3, 1996, including but not limited to the following:

"They are racist and they distaste me and have publicly tried to humiliate me with the intent to assassinate my character and to disparage my reputation."

l. You made disparaging statements which appeared in an April 4, 1996, article in the Coast Weekly entitled "Legal Briefings," including but not limited to the following:

"There's a conspiracy amongst local judges ... They dislike me and will do anything they can to assassinate my character and disparage my reputation.... There's tampering going on with my computer ... and things being moved around my office. My fear is that these guys and ladies will come in here and plant something. In their quest to assassinate my character, they will do anything.... We all make mistakes ... but all these guys make it seem like I'm a total animal out of control."

m. You made disparaging statements which appeared in an April 5, 1996, article in The Californian. You compared your colleagues' treatment of you to a recently videotaped beating of illegal immigrants in Southern California, and stated: "[b]ut the battering these people have performed on me has been emotional."

The Commission acknowledges Judge Velasquez' admission that the forgoing facts are true, and it therefore adopts the forgoing as setting forth its findings of fact.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

Judge Velasquez' actions with respect to the crucifix, his endorsement of one side in the ongoing debate about abortion, and his DUI policy manifest prejudgment with respect to certain religious or moral principles, and by inference, a bias against those having different religious or moral principles. The bench is not a pulpit nor soapbox for self-expression. A litigant is entitled to assume that a judge's attention will be focused entirely upon the relevant facts of his or her case, and that his or her cause will be judged dispassionately -- without consideration of anyone's religion, or history of abortion, or the judge's political considerations (such as the "get tough policy" for DUI violations adopted and announced in a dispute with other judges).

Such conduct by a judge is prejudicial to the administration of justice and brings the judicial office into disrepute.

Most troubling is the fourth count. Judge Velasquez affirmatively used the judicial office, and his position as judge, to accuse others who were neither parties nor witnesses before his court -- and in fact who were not even present in his court -- of bias and misconduct. Especially troubling are those instances where Judge Velasquez, speaking from the bench and to the news media, publicly accused fellow judges of racial bias, thereby calling into question the integrity and impartiality of Monterey County judges and the judicial system itself. The appropriate forum for allegations of misconduct by judges is the Commission on Judicial Performance, and for lawyers, the appropriate forum is the State Bar. Neither the Monterey Municipal Court nor the news media were an appropriate forum for Judge Velasquez' comments.

The Commission therefore concludes that Judge Velasquez committed conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice in Counts One, Two, and Three, and that he committed willful misconduct in office as alleged in Count Four.

DISCIPLINE

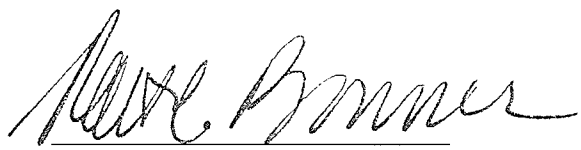
As stated, this matter is before the Commission for disposition under Rule 127. The stipulated findings include one count of willful misconduct, based upon thirteen instances of improper action, and three counts of conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice. As in any case in which willful misconduct has been proved, the initial focus of the Commission's consideration must be whether the public interest can be protected by any form of discipline short of removal from office. Removal is ordinarily reserved for the most serious cases, and this is a serious case.

In submitting this matter pursuant to Rule 127, the parties have agreed that, if approved, the Commission will impose discipline no more serious that public censure.[2] If the Commission is not satisfied that public censure would be sufficient, it may return this matter to the special masters for further hearings and findings of fact. Once the special masters have made their report, the matter would return to the Commission for further deliberations. At that time, the Commission would be free to impose any sanction that it concluded was appropriate, including removal from office.

[2] Other than removal, the levels of discipline available to the Commission include dismissal with an advisory letter, issuance of a private admonishment, issuance of a public admonishment, or issuance of a public censure. Of those options, public censure is the strongest sanction available.



Two facts -- particularly when coupled with the Commission's enhanced authority under Proposition 190 -- persuade the Commission that removal from office is not warranted on the facts of this case. One, Judge Velasquez acted with integrity and good faith in admitting forthrightly the facts that constitute the misconduct alleged; and two, prior to the time that formal proceedings were instituted by the Commission, and throughout the past year, Judge Velasquez has refrained from further misconduct. Further evidence and hearings would not change these facts.

While there may be a risk to the public interest that Judge Velasquez will resume his conduct at some later date, the Commission now has the authority, granted by Proposition 190, to suspend Judge Velasquez from office if he should do so. (See Rule 120.) In these circumstances, the majority of the Commission concludes that removal is not required, but that no lesser discipline than public censure would be adequate.

The Commission therefore concludes that public censure is the appropriate disposition for this case. The Commission's vote was 8 to 2, with one Commissioner abstaining.

This decision and order shall constitute the order of public censure.

INQUIRY CONCERNING JUDGE JAMES RANDAL ROSS

SUMMARY

A disciplinary matter was brought concerning a retired superior court judge.

The Commission on Judicial Performance censured the judge and barred him from receiving assignments, appointments, or references of work from any California state court. The commission concluded that the judge committed eight instances of willful misconduct, plus five instances of conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice. The judge committed conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice when he became angry with an insurance company and its counsel, lost his ability to be objective, and ordered the insurance company's president to appear in court. The judge had no proper justification for threatening the insurance company's counsel with contempt for bringing a motion to stay, and he inappropriately used his contempt powers to embarrass the insurance company's counsel because he was angry with him. This constituted willful misconduct. The judge committed prejudicial conduct by throwing an object in court because an attorney purportedly violated the judge's in limine ruling. The judge violated Cal. Code Jud. Ethics, canon 2B(2), by lending the prestige of the judicial office to promote and sell a book, which constituted prejudicial conduct. The judge committed prejudicial conduct by telling an inappropriate, undignified, and offensive joke during the trial of a civil action involving alleged sexual molestation. The judge committed misconduct by becoming embroiled and abusing judicial authority to advance his own personal interests. He obtained waivers of future complaints against him to the commission as well as waivers to the filing of any civil suits against him. He also threatened retaliation if complaints were made to the commission or if civil suits were filed against him. These acts constituted willful misconduct. With regard to the appropriate sanction, the commission noted that the judge remained steadfast that he had done no wrong. There was no basis for the commission to assume or conclude that the judge was ready, willing, and able to reform—under any sanction. The judge, having resigned from office, was not subject to removal. The next available option was an order of public censure plus an order barring the judge from sitting on assignment. A lesser sanction, such as a public admonishment, would have allowed him to sit again as a superior court judge on assignment. (Opinion by Robert C. Bonner, Chairperson.)

HEADNOTES

(1) Judges § 6—Discipline—Prejudicial Misconduct—Demeanor.—The judge engaged in prejudicial misconduct when he ordered an insurance company to settle the case for the purpose of punishing the insurance company and its attorney and treated the attorney in an angry, discourteous and impatient manner. The judge told the attorney that the Court of Appeal would laugh at his argument.

(2) Judges § 6—Discipline—Willful Misconduct—Abuse of Contempt Power.—The judge committed willful misconduct when he threatened the insurance company's counsel with contempt without justification for bringing a motion to stay. The judge ordered the attorney to leave his courtroom, and threatened to hold the attorney in contempt if he said "one more word." The judge inappropriately used his contempt powers to embarrass the insurance company's counsel because he was angry with him.

(3) Judges § 6—Discipline—Willful Misconduct—Abuse of Contempt Power—Denial of Due Process.—The judge engaged in prejudicial misconduct when he called witnesses to the stand for an improper purpose and without providing notice to the witnesses or the litigant, and by threatening an attorney with contempt for objecting to this proceeding.

(4) Judges § 6—Discipline—Prejudicial Misconduct—Embroilment.—The judge engaged in prejudicial misconduct when he threatened to order the appearance of an attorney whose appearance was not necessary. The judge was embroiled and his threat was punitive.

(5) Judges § 6—Discipline—Prejudicial Misconduct—Slamming Tablet on Bench.—The judge engaged in prejudicial misconduct when he dramatically slammed a tablet down on the bench, causing pencils to go flying, for the purpose of embarrassing an attorney.

(6) Judges § 6—Discipline—Prejudicial Misconduct—Misuse of Public Resources—Selling Books from Chambers.—The judge engaged in prejudicial misconduct and misused public resources by selling a book he authored from his chambers and through his bailiff to jurors and attorneys.

(7) Judges § 6—Discipline—Prejudicial Misconduct—Inappropriate and Offensive Joke.—The judge engaged in prejudicial misconduct by making an inappropriate and offensive joke of a sexual nature from the bench.

(8) Judges § 6—Discipline—Willful Misconduct—Coercing Waiver of Right to File Complaint with the Commission.—The judge engaged in willful misconduct by coercing litigants and their counsel under threat of contempt to waive their legal rights, including their right to file a complaint with the Commission on Judicial Performance, and by compelling indemnification if a party filed such a complaint.

(9) Judges § 6—Discipline—Multiple Incidents of Misconduct—Same Proceeding or Occurrence.—To the extent that multiple incidents of misconduct arise out of the same proceeding or occurrence, the Commission on Judicial Performance has considered this in assessing discipline. ## OPINION

BONNER, Chairperson.—This disciplinary matter concerns Judge James Randal Ross (retired), formerly a judge of the Orange County Superior Court. The Commission on Judicial Performance (Commission) concludes that Judge Ross committed willful misconduct in office and conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute. The Commission censures Judge Ross and bars him from receiving assignments, appointments, or references of work from any California state court.

PROCEDURAL HISTORY

Judge Ross served as a judge of the Orange County Superior Court from 1983 to 1995. The events which are the subject of this matter took place during the 1992 to 1995 time period, while Judge Ross was serving as a full-time superior court judge. Judge Ross retired on July 7, 1995.

This matter was commenced on December 11, 1996, with the issuance of a notice of formal proceedings. The notice was amended on June 2, 1997. Judge Ross filed answers to both notices and denied any misconduct.

At the Commission's request, the Supreme Court appointed three special masters to conduct an evidentiary proceeding and to prepare a written report.[1] Eighty witnesses testified during the hearing that commenced on July 29, 1997, and concluded on August 8, 1997. Thereafter the masters prepared findings of fact and conclusions of law which were filed with the Commission on November 21, 1997.

On January 2, 1998, Judge Ross filed objections to the masters' report, and after further briefing, the matter was set for oral argument before the Commission on March 12, 1998. Nine members of the Commission participated.[2]

FINDINGS AND CONCLUSIONS

The first amended notice of formal proceedings sets forth five counts of alleged misconduct. Counts one, four and five allege unjudicial conduct on the bench. Count two alleges use of the judicial office for personal gain, specifically promotion and sale of a book written by Judge Ross. Count three alleges sleeping during certain specified jury trials.[3]

The Commission has reviewed the record of proceedings before the special masters, and the arguments raised by the parties in their briefs before the Commission. The evidence of misconduct found by the masters is clear and convincing. For the reasons set forth hereafter, the Commission adopts the findings of fact contained in the special masters' report as its own. Based on the masters' findings, the Commission dismisses count three, and concludes that respondent engaged in willful misconduct or conduct prejudicial as to counts one, two, four and five.

[1] The special masters were Justice Patti S. Kitching of the Court of Appeal, Second Appellate District, Division Three, Judge John E. Dearman of the San Francisco County Superior Court, and Judge Michael T. Garcia of the Sacramento County Superior Court.

[2] The Commission normally consists of 11 members. There were two vacancies on the Commission at the time of oral argument.

[3] The masters found a failure of proof as to the third count, and trial counsel have not filed objections. That count is therefore dismissed.

While the Commission adopts the masters' detailed findings which are incorporated in this decision as an appendix, the facts are summarized here only as background for the Commission's ruling on discipline.[4]

Count One (A)—Zapone v. Jaridly

Count one arises out of the conduct of a civil action entitled Zapone v. Jaridly, an automobile accident case in which State Farm had undertaken the defense of its insured. As trial preparation proceeded, State Farm became aware of facts creating a coverage issue. It withdrew its previous settlement offers. On December 1, 1993, State Farm, through its attorney Sherman Spitz, filed a declaratory judgment action in federal court.

The allegations of misconduct arise from four incidents.

The December 16, 1993 Incident—Conduct Prejudicial

On December 16, 1993, the parties in the underlying civil action appeared before Judge Ross for a mandatory settlement conference. Attorney Sherman Spitz, who represented State Farm in the declaratory judgment action, attended along with two claims people from State Farm.

Following the familiar settlement conference procedure of meeting with the parties (and their insurers) separately, Judge Ross met with defense counsel in chambers. Also included in this meeting were the State Farm representatives. Judge Ross was told of the coverage dispute, the declaratory judgment action, and advised that in view of the absence of coverage (based upon alleged fraud by the insured Jaridly), State Farm would make no settlement offer.

Judge Ross said he did not want to hear that an insurance company would not pay any money at a settlement conference, and that he was going to try all issues, including the declaratory relief issue, in his courtroom.

According to Spitz, Judge Ross said he was finding that Spitz and State Farm had acted in bad faith in connection with the settlement conference and he was going to order sanctions. He asked the State Farm representatives in chambers, "How much are you going to pay?" Spitz told them not to respond. Spitz explained that he did this because Judge Ross had already said he would award sanctions, there was no court reporter present in chambers, and his instruction was for the purpose of protecting his clients.

[4] In the event of a discrepancy between the masters' findings and those made herein by the Commission, the Commission intends that these findings shall prevail.

Judge Ross testified that he turned to the State Farm representatives and said, "Well, how much money do we have today?" According to Judge Ross: "Out of the clear blue, over to the right rose this figure of Mr. Spitz and said 'Nobody in this room will say one word on behalf of—because I am representing State Farm. I have it from the highest authority. This case is not worth a plugged nickel. We're not paying a plugged nickel. Mandatory settlement conference over.' "

Any difference between Judge Ross's version and the version recounted by Attorney Spitz is immaterial. Both accounts conclude that the conference was ended and the matter was taken up in open court, on the record. Either version sets the stage for what happened next. As set forth in the masters' report:

"[Judge Ross] testified he told the parties he needed time to go to the bathroom and put his robe on. However, he did not go to the bathroom. Rather, he put on his robe and stepped into the hallway where he observed Spitz telling Ellis and Syverson that they better back Spitz up or else they wouldn't be in State Farm any longer. Respondent testified he told Spitz that was improper and Spitz replied that respondent was a liar. Respondent testified Spitz further said: 'Further, Judge Ross, you little bastard, if you fuck with me, I'll see to it that you're no longer a judge. And I've got State Farm's billions behind me.' "

"Spitz denied he told the adjusters on the way to the courtroom to back him up if they still wanted to be with State Farm. He also denied that he and respondent had such a conversation in the hallway. Ellis testified there was no such discussion between herself and Spitz in the hallway after they all left chambers on December 16."

"We are unpersuaded by respondent's testimony of his perception of the hallway events. We find the statements attributed to Spitz in the hallway did not occur."

Once in court and on the record, Judge Ross—with no motion or urging of any party—ordered that State Farm have Ed Rust, the president of State Farm, appear for a sanctions hearing. Rust was in the corporate office in Bloomington, Illinois. The masters found that Judge Ross was "extremely irate, caustic. . . . Yelling at Sherman Spitz, pointing his finger at him."

The transcript of the hearing indicates that Spitz asked if he could be heard before the court made a ruling, but he was not allowed to do so. When Spitz asked Judge Ross what authority he relied on to order Rust into court, Judge Ross—who was upset and red in the face—replied, "Stick around counsel" in a sarcastic tone.

According to the masters:

"Respondent admitted he was 'furious' and 'angry' and he tried to compose himself. We are not persuaded by respondent's testimony that he wanted to call Ed Rust in to settle the case and to explain it to Rust in spite of the personal problems that would cause respondent."

"We find that Spitz explained to respondent why he felt there was a question of coverage and that issue would be decided in the declaratory relief action. After he told respondent State Farm would not pay a 'plugged nickel,' respondent loudly asked the State Farm representatives how much they were going to pay, and Spitz told the State Farm representatives not to respond. Respondent was very angry; he told Cullins, Spitz and the State Farm representatives they could have personal exposure, they could be tried for conspiracy, Spitz and State Farm had acted in bad faith in connection with the settlement conference, he was going to order sanctions, and he would hold a sanctions hearing right then. Respondent also said he was going to try all issues, including the declaratory relief issue in his courtroom.

"In some circumstances it may be appropriate to order in the head of an organization to settle a case, but here the order was only made for the improper purpose of punishing State Farm and Spitz. State Farm did not make a frivolous argument regarding coverage, and it was inappropriate for respondent to tell the parties they could have personal exposure, that they could be tried for conspiracy, to tell them he was going to award sanctions and to tell them he was going to hold a contempt hearing. Respondent had no authority to try the declaratory relief action which had been filed in federal court. Respondent was angry, discourteous and impatient with the State Farm attorneys and witnesses. It was also discourteous to tell Spitz he could make his argument to the Court of Appeal and they would laugh at him."

(1) The masters concluded regarding the first incident alleged in count one (A): "We find that respondent committed conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice when he became angry with Spitz and State Farm, lost his ability to be objective and ordered Ed Rust to appear on December 16, 1993." We agree with the masters' findings and conclude that Judge Ross engaged in conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice.

The December 29, 1993 Incident—Willful Misconduct

On or about December 9, 1993, Spitz filed a motion to stay the Zapone v. Jaridly matter pending the outcome of the declaratory relief action in federal court. Judge Ross heard the motion on December 29, 1993. The entire incident is set forth on two pages of transcript and, except for the statement of appearances by counsel, is set forth here in its entirety:

"Judge Ross: Mr. Spitz, what right do you have to come into this court and make a special appearance for State Farm making a motion on behalf of State Farm when State Farm is not a party to the action?

"Spitz: Well, your honor, we believe that we're a stakeholder in the action from the standpoint that my client—

"Judge Ross: Can you give me a case where when you're a stakeholder you can come in and take over a courtroom?

"Spitz: May I explain, your honor?

"Judge Ross: No, you cannot, sir.

"Spitz: I don't believe that I am trying to take over.

"Judge Ross: Deputy Martini.

"Bailiff: Counsel.

"Judge Ross: You will follow my directions that I am now going to give.

"Bailiff: Yes, your honor.

"Judge Ross: And that is Mr. Spitz has no right in this courtroom. He is not a party, he is not representing any party, and in addition thereto I am not here for—quoting him—for him to have fun, unquote. Therefore, if he says one more word even under his breath in this courtroom I will hold him in contempt of court and you will take him to the Orange County jail.

"Bailiff: Understood.

"Judge Ross: Understood, Mr. Martini?

"Bailiff: Understood.

"Judge Ross: All right. Let us proceed. Mr. Spitz, you will either leave or get out of the way.

"Bailiff: Sir, please wait in the hallway.

"Judge Ross: Unless you want to say one more word. Since this motion was made by a person or organization who is not a party to the action it has no validity and will not be heard by this court. That's the end of it.

Gentlemen, I'm sorry that you had to come. I'm sorry that someone brought a motion when they had no right to bring a motion but I have no control over people filing papers unfortunately."

The testimony before the masters was undisputed that when Judge Ross was making the above quoted remarks, he was yelling and upset. He was highly agitated. After Judge Ross had threatened Spitz with contempt if he said "one more word," Spitz walked to the back of the courtroom and found a seat. Spitz felt his client had not been given a fair opportunity to be heard and he felt embarrassed for the system and for himself.

The courtroom was full because December 29th was law and motion day. The masters concluded: "We find by clear and convincing evidence that respondent abused his contempt authority. He had no proper justification for threatening Spitz with contempt for bringing a motion to stay. Respondent inappropriately used this hearing and his contempt powers to embarrass Spitz because he was angry with him."

(2) The masters found this constituted willful misconduct and conduct prejudicial. We agree with the masters' findings and determine that Judge Ross committed willful misconduct.

The January 3, 1994 Incident—Willful Misconduct

On Monday, January 3, 1994, Judge Ross called the trial calendar and again took up Zapone v. Jaridly. This was the date that Judge Ross had set for Ed Rust, the president of State Farm, to appear regarding the issue of settlement.

Prior to the hearing, Spitz filed papers stating that Rust would not be appearing as ordered and setting forth the reasons for Rust's nonappearance.

After taking appearances, and noting that now four lawyers were present on behalf of State Farm, Judge Ross purported to characterize what had happened in chambers on December 16th. He asked Spitz to "confirm" Judge Ross's version and the following colloquy and events occurred:

"Spitz: No, not for those reasons. May I explain?

"Judge Ross: No, you can't because you're a liar because that's what you told them and I'll go up against you any time and my reputation against yours because you told them—

"Spitz: That's not what happened, your honor."

Judge Ross then, with no further discussion or notice, called State Farm representative Lynn Ellis to come forward, had her sworn by the clerk, and began to ask her questions. Spitz objected and Judge Ross responded, "You made your record, counsel. Miss Ellis, please take the stand. We're going to straighten this out once and for all." Judge Ross proceeded to examine the State Farm representative about the events in chambers on December 16th and about an alleged incident in the hallway between Judge Ross's chambers and the courtroom.

Spitz objected on the ground that Judge Ross was being argumentative with and harassing the witness, and on the additional ground: "We have not been given notice of this particular hearing. I object to this whole proceeding going forward, your honor, with all due respect." Judge Ross replied: "Take your writ. Right now I am talking and the next time I start talking you're in contempt of court when you interrupt this court. You can do anything else you want, but you're not going to interrupt this proceeding." Spitz testified he thought he would go to jail if he persisted. Spitz testified that Judge Ross was very accusatory, bellicose and sarcastic.

Judge Ross next called a second State Farm representative to the stand, had him sworn, and questioned him about the events in chambers on December 16th. He then dismissed the witness.

At one point Spitz asked to be heard and to make a record. Judge Ross said: "No, you can't counsel. We already determined that that's the decision of the court. . . . No. There will be no record by you, Mr. Spitz."

Judge Ross then asked the third State Farm representative to come forward. Judge Ross asked her, "What is your authority from State Farm, your limits?" She replied she had policy limits authority (of up to $100,000). Judge Ross said that the ramifications of the case made it a multimillion dollar case, and that it would even rival a $60 million judgment against Farmers.[5] Spitz again asked if he could make a record and Judge Ross stated: "No, you can't, counsel. All you do is talk and talk and talk and backwards and forwards. I'm going to make the orders. If you don't like it, fine. You're not to go any further. You've defrauded this court continually, lied to it, and I'm not going to take any more."

[5] Plaintiff was not asking for $60 million or any seven-number figure. As events later developed, despite the rulings by Judge Ross against State Farm, the case settled for $85,000. The case settled because Judge Ross said he was going to strike the answer and enter default, Judge Ross said the case had a value of seven figures, and Judge Ross had imposed monetary sanctions. Given these things and respondent's demeanor, State Farm's trial attorney felt Judge Ross was prejudiced and would not provide a fair trial.

Judge Ross thereupon found willful disobeyance of the court order requiring Rust to appear. He sanctioned Spitz and his firm $5,000, defense counsel (hired by State Farm) and his firm $5,000, and State Farm $5,000. State Farm's defense counsel asked to be heard, but Judge Ross would not allow him to speak.

Judge Ross again ordered Rust to be present on January 12, 1994.

Spitz again asked for an opportunity to make a record and Judge Ross again denied that request. Neither Spitz nor State Farm were afforded an opportunity to respond to Judge Ross's assertions of fact, or any sort of hearing, before sanctions were imposed.

(3) Regarding this incident, the masters concluded: "We find by clear and convincing evidence that respondent had an improper purpose in calling Ellis and Syverson to the witness stand. Respondent was primarily interested in proving that he was right and Spitz was wrong regarding Spitz's order to the State Farm representatives not to speak. Respondent violated the due process rights of the witnesses and State Farm because he gave no notice he would examine these witnesses, he did not allow cross-examination of the witnesses and he did not allow State Farm to put on contrary evidence. Again, he misused his contempt powers when he threatened to hold Spitz in contempt for objecting to this 'star chamber' proceeding."

The masters found this conduct to constitute both willful misconduct and conduct prejudicial. We agree and conclude that Judge Ross's conduct constituted willful misconduct and conduct prejudicial.

The January 26, 1994 Incident—Conduct Prejudicial

Following the events of January 3, State Farm agreed to a settlement. When questions about the settlement arose, another hearing was held on January 26, 1994.

Judge Ross stated his understanding that the settlement would be for $100,000, and not $85,000. Judge Ross said: "If that's untrue let's get Mr. Rust out here. . . . Since he's in town let's get him here tomorrow or Friday. . . . Maybe my information is incorrect. If he's not here and he is still in Bloomington he can come out and make a big show and I'm [sic] put it over until Friday. Which do you want, counsel, unless this matter is resolved or do you want to come back and make him come back from Bloomington next week? I don't really care."

The attorneys eventually confirmed the amount was $85,000 total, with $60,000 from State Farm. After hearing this report, Judge Ross stated: "Well, then fine. I'm wrong and they are right. Okay. Fine. Then a $60,000 settlement."

The masters stated: "We find that respondent again had an improper purpose. There was a dispute over $15,000 which was easily resolved by communicating with lawyers who had negotiated the settlement. Respondent knew or should have known that it was not necessary to have Rust appear to settle the dispute. Respondent knew local adjusters had authority up to $100,000 to settle a case. Respondent was threatening to order Rust to appear merely because of his anger with State Farm. [¶] . . . [¶]

(4) "We conclude this was prejudicial conduct because it was 'prejudicial to public esteem for the judicial office.' (Geiler v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications (1973) 10 Cal.3d 270, 284 [110 Cal.Rptr. 201, 515 P.2d 1].)" The Commission agrees. Judge Ross was embroiled in the cases and his threat as to State Farm was punitive.

Count One (B)—Harris v. Chevron

Judge Ross was charged with unjudicial conduct for throwing an object in court and yelling at an attorney in the case of Harris v. Chevron.

There is no factual dispute that Judge Ross slammed a tablet down on the bench and excused the jury. The gesture was dramatic and caused pencils to go flying. The purported justification, according to Judge Ross, was that Attorney DeGomez had repeatedly violated one of his in limine rulings.

Judge Ross stated that he tells attorneys that his practice as regards in limine rulings is that "if you violate my rule in limine the first time, I'll be nice. The second time I will not be nice. And the third time I'll do everything that I can to embarrass you."

The masters summarized the evidence:

(5) "We find by clear and convincing evidence that, in the presence of the jury, respondent became angry at Mr. DeGomez during cross examination when Mr. DeGomez was questioning in areas in violation of in limine rulings. Respondent slammed a legal pad onto the bench, causing pencils to go flying. Respondent then dismissed the jury and yelled at Mr. DeGomez for several minutes loudly enough to be heard in the hallway through a closed door.

"Even if Mr. DeGomez violated an in limine motion, respondent's response was unjudicial and constitutes prejudicial conduct. (See McCartney v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications (1974) 12 Cal.3d 512, 538 [116 Cal.Rptr. 260, 526 P.2d 268].) Respondent's stated purpose of embarrassing the attorney was improper. Additionally, respondent was not patient, dignified and courteous, in violation of Canon 3B(4). We find this constitutes prejudicial conduct." The Commission agrees.

Count Two

Judge Ross was charged with violating California Code of Judicial Ethics canon 2B(2) by lending the prestige of the judicial office to promote and sell a book.

Judge Ross is the author of a book entitled I, Jesse James. From approximately 1989 through his retirement in 1995, he kept the book available for sale in the courthouse. In one case, a juror testified that a copy of Judge Ross's book was provided by the bailiff and passed among the jurors either in the jury box or the hallway.

Transcripts in one trial show that Judge Ross discussed the book with jurors in open court and told them it was for sale in chambers, and that he would autograph it. Other jurors testified that Judge Ross discussed the book from the bench. Some bought copies in chambers after the trial.

During the Walker trial in 1995, Judge Ross sold books to the attorneys participating in the trial. One juror—who also bought a book—testified that he was aware that one of the attorneys had purchased a book and believed that the attorney had done it to "suck up" to the judge.

The masters found:

(6) "The evidence is clear and convincing that respondent sold copies of his book from his chambers and through his bailiff to jurors and attorneys. Most sales occurred after trials were over and took place in his chambers where respondent was available to autograph the book. Respondent did not explicitly advertise the book but did mention it in court in response to inquiries about it. Respondent established a procedure whereby copies of the book could be purchased through the bailiff who took the order and recorded it on order forms found at the bailiff's desk in court. The book had received widespread national and local media attention. [¶] . . . [¶]

"Respondent has committed conduct prejudicial to the public's esteem for the judiciary by selling the books from his chambers. There is no evidence of pressure being exerted by respondent to buy his book. However, by informing attorneys and jurors from the bench or through his bailiff that the book was for sale after the trial in his chambers or from his bailiff and that he was available to autograph it, respondent was lending the prestige of his judicial office for personal pecuniary gain. Granted, the profits were minimal since it appears that less than 100 books were sold at $2.95 profit per book. However, it still constitutes prejudicial conduct in violation of the judicial integrity provisions of Canons 1 and 2A and the prohibition against using the judicial office to advance personal interests in Canon 2B.

"Also, the procedure established by respondent to sell his books from the courthouse was an inappropriate use of public judicial resources. Using bailiffs to assist in the sales was also a misuse of public resources.

" 'A judge may not misuse the administrative resources available to the judge. To accomplish a judge's varied administrative responsibilities . . . a judge has individuals, equipment, and facilities at his or her command. . . . A judge may not use these resources for personal financial gain. . . .' (Shaman, Lubet and Alfmi, Judicial Conduct and Ethics (2d ed. 1995) § 6.13.)

"We find these separate violations of the Canons constitute one incident of prejudicial conduct." The Commission concurs.

Count Four

Judge Ross was charged with unjudicial conduct for telling an inappropriate, undignified and offensive joke during the trial of Wellema v. Wall in 1994.

The Wall case was a civil action involving alleged sexual molestation. Plaintiffs' attorney described the nature of the case: "The allegations involved my client from the time she was 12 years old, for several years being sexually abused by the defendant, including sodomy, use of alcohol, use of vodka enemas, use of pins penetrating her nipples and other foreign objects, involved the use of rubber clothing. To summarize, disgusting conduct over at least six years of time, as I recall."

During the course of the trial, with the parties present, the jury absent, and with a medical witness on the stand, Judge Ross told the following joke: "Did you hear about the psychologist that had this man in for testing for the Rorschach—if I'm saying it right—test and he said what's this one, and the man looks at him and says that's a man and a woman having intercourse. So, he showed him the next one. He says that's two women making love. He turned over the third one. What's this? Oh, that's a gang intercourse. And he turned over another one. Oh, they are having sodomy, a man and a woman. About that time the doctor said man, I think you're a pervert, and the man looked at him and said don't talk about me, doctor, they are your pictures." Up to 30 people were present in the courtroom, including the plaintiff, who testified that she was "stunned."

(7) The Masters found: "Respondent committed prejudicial conduct by telling an inappropriate and offensive joke while on the bench in violation of the judicial integrity provision of Canons 1 and 2A and the provisions of dignity and courtesy of Canon 3B(4). This is especially the case in light of the sensitive subject matter of the case. Respondent was clearly demeaning to the public esteem for the judiciary by his thoughtlessness. (See Ryan v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1988) 45 Cal.3d 518, 544–545 [247 Cal.Rptr. 378, 754 P.2d 724].)" We agree.

Count Five

Judge Ross is charged in count five with misconduct by becoming embroiled and abusing judicial authority to advance his own personal interests, specifically that:

1. He obtained waivers of future complaints against respondent to the Commission and of the filing of potential civil suits.

2. He threatened retaliation if complaints were made to the Commission or if civil suits were filed against respondent.

3. He obtained an agreement to indemnify himself for costs incurred in Commission proceedings.

4. He made contempt proceedings conditional upon the agreement to waivers and indemnification.

David and Janie Walker v. Daniel Craig, Hi-Standard Automotive was an action for personal injury arising out of an automobile accident. Plaintiff was Janie Walker, a reserve Costa Mesa police officer, whose police car was rear-ended by an allegedly drunk driver. Her husband, David Walker, was a sergeant in the Costa Mesa Police Department. There were two defendants, one the driver of the car that rear-ended Officer Walker and the other a products liability defendant.

The trial was protracted, and while Judge Ross's arguments all focus upon the alleged misconduct of counsel trying the case, our focus is upon Judge Ross's conduct, and whether he stayed within the bounds of judicial ethics.

As explained below, Judge Ross committed serious misconduct by coercing litigants and their counsel under threat of contempt to waive their legal rights, including their right to file a complaint with the Commission, and by compelling indemnification if a party filed such a complaint.

On June 12, 1995, after weeks of trial had already passed, Sergeant Walker was on the stand being examined by one of the counsel for the two defendants. Plaintiff's counsel (Eisenberg) whispered words to defense counsel (Erickson) to which she took offense. According to the transcript, she said, "I don't need that kind of language directed at me."

Judge Ross admonished counsel that there would be no further conversation between counsel, or he would commence a contempt proceeding. He did not ask what had been said, but he made clear that he would not tolerate further interruptions due to exchanges between counsel. (That action is not challenged, and based upon a review of the transcript, it appears to be appropriate.)

The trial resumed. Sergeant Walker remained on the stand.

At the end of the day, Sergeant Walker complained to plaintiff's counsel (Eisenberg) that Attorney Himes had extended his middle finger to him. This incident did not take place in Judge Ross's presence, and he did not learn about it until the next day.

The next morning, which was June 13th, Judge Ross began with an apparent reference to the then ongoing investigation by the Commission. He indicated that he wanted to record what had transpired the preceding afternoon. He then ordered defense counsel (Erickson) "to tell me the exact words as best she can remember yesterday afternoon approximately 4:10 what Mr. Eisenberg whispered to you." Erickson complied: "He's an abrasive mother-fucker and I'm going to make the client pay." The apparent reference was to defense counsel Himes—whom Eisenberg thought was being abrasive during his examination of Sergeant Walker.

Judge Ross found such language extremely offensive and thereupon entered the following order:

"I'll tell you what I'm going to do. At this time I'm going to do the following. It will not affect the case and that's why I've asked Mrs. Walker and Sergeant Walker to come up to the counsel table.

"However, if one word of the incident yesterday or this morning is ever reported back to me and it gets back I will release the transcript of yesterday afternoon and this morning to the following: the Orange County Register, the Los Angeles Times, the Orange County Bar Association, the Orange County Trial Lawyers Association, the California Trial Lawyers Association, whatever their new name is, the State Bar of the State of California so that they may act accordingly." After concluding his comments about the inappropriateness of such comments, including a reference to his concern that "I get reported to somebody like the Judicial Performance Commission," Judge Ross called for the jury to be brought in.

At that time, prior to the jury returning, Attorney Eisenberg addressed the court and related the story of how Himes had given the finger to Sergeant Walker the afternoon before. Himes denied it; Sergeant Walker claimed it happened. Judge Ross directed that "there will be no more of that," and the jury was eventually brought in.

The examination of Sergeant Walker resumed.

The remainder of the morning session continued without notable incident. Sergeant Walker's examination was concluded. The defense rested. Plaintiff began rebuttal.

At the beginning of the afternoon session, however, Attorney Himes advised the court of a new incident. According to Himes, the bailiff had told him (Himes) that he (the bailiff) had overheard Sergeant Walker say that Walker hopes that Himes "lives in a metal house." According to Himes, the bailiff "confronted" Walker about that statement. According to Himes, Walker responded, "After this is over that he's done some investigation and has determined that I'm doing something illegal and he's going to report me to the State Bar."

The transcript does not contain any elaboration on the "metal house" reference, nor indicate whether Sergeant Walker was speaking quietly with an expectation of privacy, or even an indication as to whom the comment was addressed.

When Judge Ross inquired, the bailiff confirmed that Himes had correctly stated what the bailiff had overheard. Judge Ross characterized the alleged statement as being "atrocious" and "absolutely fantastic."—"Police officers making such absolutely ridiculous statements in court where they can be overheard."

Sergeant Walker, having been excused, was not in court.

Judge Ross then said, "If you want him brought in here we'll have a contempt proceeding for contempt of court and I'll put him in jail right now."

"THE COURT: If you want Mr. Walker brought back I'll go get him. I mean I'll send the marshal out to get him. If it needs to be in handcuffs I'll do it.

"He was told—he was sitting here—on this kind of attitude.

"Do you want him brought back?

"MR. HIMES: Your honor, I would like to have honestly some admonition made if in fact—

"THE COURT: All right. When can Sergeant Walker be here?" He ordered plaintiff, Janie Walker, to telephone her husband and "get him here." The trial resumed.

When Sergeant Walker arrived, Judge Ross called him forward and recited the allegation made by Himes,[6] which Judge Ross unequivocally characterized as contempt of court: "That is in my opinion contempt of court and you have the right to remain silent and have a full and complete hearing on it." He told Sergeant Walker that a finding of contempt would result in financial sanctions and incarceration.

Himes restated that he was only seeking an admonition. Erickson suggested that perhaps counsel could resolve the matter by stipulation.

[6] The transcript reflects a lengthy dialog in which Judge Ross attempts to conduct a contempt proceeding. With respect to Sergeant Walker's alleged contempt, the transcript shows:

"THE COURT: . . . Sergeant Walker, I have a very serious charge against you. I am going to repeat it to see if the deputy, I'm saying it correct.

"That Yesterday at approximately 4:30 p.m. that is or 1630 in Marine and Army and Air Force time that you made the following statement, and would you repeat again what you said previously, the first part of the statement?

"THE BAILIFF: Sergeant Walker made a statement to me that Mr. Himes better live in a metal house at which time I confronted him said you don't make those kind of remarks in my courtroom, and he stated he didn't mean it in a threatening manner, he meant it similar to people who live in glass houses don't throw rocks.

"Then he said he had information that Mr. Himes was involved in some illegal activity and he would report him to the State Bar at the end of the trial.

"THE COURT: All right. Sergeant Walker, you have the right to remain silent. This will be a hearing on a contempt proceeding.

"MR. EISENBERG: Ah.

"THE COURT: And I will set it because there is no question in this court's mind that this is contempt of court. It is one of the most terrible things I've ever heard and you're entitled to counsel so you can remain silent or you can say you want to talk now.

"I don't care. But you have the right to remain silent. You also have the right to an attorney. If you cannot afford an attorney one will be appointed for you for the order to show cause hearing for contempt."

Judge Ross stated that a contempt-related situation had caused him personal grief and financial losses because it resulted in a complaint to the Commission. Judge Ross then directed counsel to see if a stipulation could be reached to which all parties could fully agree.

Counsel presented a stipulation in which Sergeant Walker agreed not to make any complaint to the State Bar, and Himes agreed not to make any allegation of contempt against Sergeant Walker. Judge Ross rejected the stipulation unless the following language was included: "The parties and counsel also waive any claims against Judge Ross of a civil nature or before the Judicial Performance Commission." That language was handwritten by Erickson at the bottom of the stipulation. No contempt hearing was held.

Thereafter, Judge Ross required plaintiff and Sergeant Walker to state on the record that they were not coerced into the waiver. In fact, the Walkers were coerced. Each believed that Sergeant Walker would suffer incarceration unless they agreed to Judge Ross's requests.

The trial continued for another week. The final incident occurred on June 20, 1995 when Judge Ross cited Eisenberg for contempt during his closing argument. Again, all counsel worked out a stipulation to resolve the problem and reduce it to a writing. When it was submitted for approval, Judge Ross required the following language be added: "The parties and all counsel also waive any claims against Judge James Ross of a civil nature or before the Judicial Performance Commission."

With respect to complaints that the court's conduct was prejudicial to Walker and retaliatory, Judge Ross replied that if Eisenberg or his client were going to sue or report respondent to the Commission, he would proceed with a contempt hearing.[7]

Plaintiff was not in the courtroom. Judge Ross called Sergeant Walker forward and asked him to waive his and his wife's right to file an action against Judge Ross.

Judge Ross stated there would be a contempt hearing if there was no waiver and, in response to Sergeant Walker's request to consult with counsel, Judge Ross asked Eisenberg to speak with Mr. Walker. Eisenberg reminded the court that he did not represent Sergeant Walker. Judge Ross again stated there would be a contempt hearing without the waiver.

Sergeant Walker then gave his personal waiver to respondent. The masters found that this waiver was made under duress, and we concur.

[7] Judge Ross also said, "I assume—and if you sue me Mr. Eisenberg, I'll get your ass for the rest of your life."

Judge Ross then demanded that Sergeant Walker make the same waiver on behalf of his wife. Walker gave the requested waiver on her behalf.

Judge Ross then required, in addition, a promise of indemnification: "Will you further indemnify James R. Ross for any action that she brings or anything to the Judicial Performance Commission which could cost me many thousands and thousands and thousands and thousands of dollars?" Sergeant Walker replied, "Yes, sir." Walker did so because he believed that Judge Ross would send Eisenberg to jail and impose sanctions of $500,000. "I felt that the only way we were going to proceed with my case—my wife's case, was to appease the judge again."

The masters made the following findings and conclusions regarding count five:

Waivers

"Respondent requested and received waivers of any complaints to the Commission on Judicial Performance as well as waivers to the filing of any civil suits against respondent on June 13, 1995 and June 20, 1995. Each of these acts was unjudicial conduct. Canon 1 requires a judge to uphold the integrity and independence of the judiciary. Canon 2A requires that a judge shall act at all times in a manner that promotes public confidence. Respondent's request and receipt of immunity from civil suit and disciplinary scrutiny for his conduct during the trial impugns the very foundation of judicial integrity. A judge must accept constant public examination freely and willingly. Respondent's attempt to circumvent the public's ability to have his conduct reviewed by the constitutional process which purpose is to provide the public with safeguards against judicial abuse undermines public confidence.

"Respondent's request for the waivers was intentional. Respondent made the request and received waivers on two separate occasions. These acts were beyond the lawful power of a judge. Even if the requests for waivers of public scrutiny were lawful, they were specifically for a purpose other than the faithful discharge of judicial duties. Respondent on the record placed the value to him of such waivers at $50,000. Respondent requested and received the waivers for his own personal financial benefit.

"Respondent was on the bench conducting a jury trial when he made the request for and received the waivers. Further, the request and receipt of waivers required respondent to use his judicial powers for an improper purpose. Respondent was acting in his judicial capacity.

"We find respondent committed two separate acts of willful misconduct, one on June 13, 1995, and one on June 20, 1995." The Commission agrees.

Conditional Contempt

"Canon 1 requires a judge to uphold the integrity and independence of the judiciary. Canon 2A requires that a judge shall act at all times in a manner that promotes public confidence. Canon 3B(2) requires that a judge be faithful to the law regardless of fear of criticism. Respondent stated on each occasion that if he did not receive the waivers he requested, he would proceed with contempt hearings. Respondent took a recess for the purpose of research to make certain he conducted the contempt hearing against Dave Walker without committing error. Once respondent received the waivers, he did not conduct the contempt hearings even though respondent believed such hearings were appropriate. Respondent failed to address the acts he identified as contempt in a lawful manner. This breach of duty erodes public confidence in the judiciary as noted by several of respondent's witnesses who were jurors during the trial; it questions the integrity of the judiciary; and, it certainly is not a faithful adherence to the law. Failure to proceed in a lawful contempt action in trade for a waiver of scrutiny of respondent's ethical behavior is a violation of the most serious nature.

"Respondent's request was intentional. The record is clear that if counsel and the Walkers did not agree to the requested waivers, a contempt hearing would be held. Respondent's decision to conduct a contempt hearing as provided for by law under the facts known to respondent in each situation was well within his lawful power as a judge. However, respondent requested and received the waivers for his own personal financial benefit. This purpose was not for the faithful discharge of judicial duties and constitutes bad faith.

"Respondent was on the bench conducting a jury trial when he requested and received the waivers. Further, the request and receipt of waivers required respondent to use his judicial powers for an improper purpose. Respondent was acting in his judicial capacity.

"We find the respondent committed two separate acts of willful misconduct, one on June 13, 1995, and one on June 20, 1995." The Commission agrees.

Indemnification

"On June 20, 1995, after respondent received the waivers he requested from counsel and Dave Walker, he further requested Dave Walker to indemnify respondent for any civil or judicial performance action Janie Walker might bring against respondent. Dave Walker complied under duress. This request shakes the core of a fair and accessible court system. This is a classic chilling factor that impedes lawful inquiry into judicial performance. A judge making and receiving such indemnification violates Canon 1 requiring a judge to uphold the integrity and independence of the judiciary and Canon 2A which requires that a judge shall act at all times in a manner that promotes public confidence.

"The request for indemnification was directly made on respondent's own initiative. It was intentional and beyond any possible lawful purpose.[8] Additionally, it was done for the purpose of respondent's own personal financial benefit. This constitutes bad faith.

"Respondent was on the bench conducting a jury trial when he requested and received the waivers. Further, the request and receipt of waivers required respondent to use his judicial powers for an improper purpose. Respondent was acting in his judicial capacity.

"We find this constitutes a single act of willful misconduct." The Commission agrees.

Dissuading the Filing of Complaints by Threats of Retaliation

"Canon 1 requires a judge to uphold the integrity and independence of the judiciary. Canon 2A requires that a judge shall act at all times in a manner that promotes public confidence. Canon 3B(2) requires that a judge be faithful to the law regardless of fear of criticism. Canon 3D requires a judge to take appropriate action when a lawyer exhibits unprofessional conduct in the presence of the judge.

(8) "Respondent's threat to send the transcript to various media and professional organizations violates multiple Canons. First, this is an unacceptable way to deal with perceived misconduct. Direct communication to the lawyer to correct the behavior or a referral to the appropriate disciplinary body is the proper course. Second, this approach demeans the integrity of the judiciary. Lastly, the public expects and deserves the judiciary to immediately address and correct the problem with the proper tools. This can only be viewed as respondent employing an inappropriate method of threatening counsel with public censure without due process of a disciplinary proceeding.

[8] Additionally, article VI, section 18, subdivision (h) of the Constitution provides: "No civil action may be maintained against a person, or adverse employment action taken against a person, by an employer, public or private, based on statements presented by the person to the commission."

"Respondent's extraction of a waiver regarding the reporting of respondent's activities to the Commission on Judicial Performance is inexcusable and impugns the very foundation of judicial integrity. Failure to proceed in a lawful contempt action in trade for a waiver of scrutiny of the respondent's ethical behavior is willful misconduct.

"Respondent's act was intentionally done after an evening had passed which afforded ample time for reflection regarding the appropriate course of action. Respondent's announcement of his plan to contact the media and professional organizations in a retaliatory fashion was not a lawful approach to the problem of an attorney's unprofessional conduct in a courtroom. Finally, even if lawful, this underlying purpose was not for a faithful discharge of judicial duties. The primary overriding purpose was for respondent's own personal financial benefit. Respondent did not want to have this trial or his conduct reviewed by the Commission on Judicial Performance and was willing to discourage the filing of complaints by the use of a threat.

"Respondent was on the bench conducting a jury trial when he requested and received the waivers. Further, the request and receipt of waivers required respondent to use his judicial powers for an improper purpose. Respondent was acting in his judicial capacity.

"We find this constitutes a single act of willful misconduct." Again, the Commission agrees.

JUDGE ROSS'S ARGUMENTS AND OBJECTIONS SUBMITTED FOR COMMISSION REVIEW

Judge Ross submitted written objections to the masters' report. He argues that he did nothing wrong, and that if any discipline is imposed, it should be no more severe than a public admonishment.

Judge Ross's factual objections do not identify any particular finding as being in error.[9] His briefs contain numerous statements of facts which either have no citation to the record, or, if cited, no support in the record. The Commission values the masters' report and gives their findings great weight, especially respecting credibility determinations. Having carefully reviewed the record, the Commission concludes that the masters' findings are fully supported by the evidentiary record.

It follows that the Commission finds no merit to Judge Ross's assertions that do not square with the masters' findings. In arguing that Judge Ross did nothing wrong in the Walker case, for example, Judge Ross's written objections assert: "There was no coercion; all parties testified on the record that they were signing the waivers of their own free will."[10] Reference to the cited pages shows that each witness testified that in order to avoid jail or other threats from Judge Ross, they had signed waivers in order to keep Judge Ross from putting Sergeant Walker in jail.

[9] The Commission's rules specify that: "Objections to the masters' report and all factual statements shall be specific and shall be supported by reference to the book and page number of the record." (Rules of Com. on Jud. Performance, rule 130(a).)

The unqualified statement in Judge Ross's brief that the parties testified they exercised their own free will is not accurate. We specifically find, as the masters did, that Janie Walker and her husband were coerced into signing the waivers, and that each believed that Sergeant Walker would suffer incarceration if they did not do so.

In another instance, Judge Ross's brief asserts, without citation: ". . . Judge Ross's intention was not to embarrass Spitz, but to keep order in his courtroom. Judge Ross had ruled that Spitz was not a party to the motion, and that he should stop addressing the court out of turn; when Spitz refused to follow the ruling the court had made, and continued to speak out of turn, Judge Ross told him he would hold him in contempt. This was not done to embarrass him, but to keep order in the courtroom. The calendar was full that day and court proceedings needed to continue in a timely fashion." (Underscoring added.) The underlined portion is not a fair characterization of the record, which is quoted in the findings above. There was no evidence that Spitz refused to follow a court ruling, nor that he "continued to speak out of turn." With respect to Judge Ross's treatment of Spitz, the masters found—with no contradiction in the evidence from Judge Ross or from any other witness—that it was Judge Ross who was upset and yelling, not Spitz.

In short, the Commission finds no merit to Judge Ross's assertions of error by the masters.

[10] At oral argument, Judge Ross's counsel continued to assert that the extortion of waivers was not through the exercise of judicial authority:

"CHAIRMAN BONNER: Is it your position that the waivers that were given by the attorneys and the parties were freely and voluntarily given?

"MS. SUWCZINSKY: Absolutely.

"CHAIRMAN BONNER: You're telling us that Judge Ross did not use his position of authority in any way to induce the parties and litigants to enter into these waivers?

"MS. SUWCZINSKY: No, he did not. He gave the litigants a choice: Either fill out the waiver, or let's go forward with contempt proceedings and declare a mistrial.

"CHAIRMAN BONNER: But if you say, you know, 'Either sign the waiver or we're going to have contempt proceedings,' as to you, counsel, isn't that coercive?

"MS. SUWCZINSKY: No. Not if stated as—as the way Judge Ross stated, it was 'We are going to have contempt proceedings. We are going to have this trial stopped. We are going to have a mistrial.'

"The only way that's not going to happen is if everybody here agrees to just forget what's been happening so far and start from a clean slate and waive everyone's complaints against everyone else since everybody's been doing so many egregious things in the courtroom."

With respect to Judge Ross's legal arguments, they all share the same defect: they are not based upon the record. In each instance, Judge Ross starts with the premise that he did not do anything wrong, and concludes, therefore, that he was not acting in bad faith, and that he did not commit misconduct. Judge Ross's arguments simply do not address the facts as found by the masters, and the Commission.

The record does reflect that Judge Ross may have encountered some difficult situations, and as the masters noted, Judge Ross "exercised great patience numerous times during the trial of Walker v. Craig." All judges encounter difficult cases and difficult attorneys. No matter what the situation, however, there can be no justification for demands of waiver, conditioning contempt upon signing stipulations, or extorting promises purporting to preclude complaints to the Commission.

DISCIPLINE

Judge Ross served for 12 years as a judge of the Orange County court. He has no record of prior discipline. The masters—who observed Judge Ross and evaluated his credibility—found a lack of credibility. With respect to the incident involving Spitz in the hallway, for example, the masters found that the statements attributed to Spitz "did not occur." Our own review of the record persuades us that Judge Ross's description of certain events is not reliable.

On the other hand, Judge Ross called a large number of witnesses to testify that he has a good reputation as a judge. He practiced law for 29 years, and according to some witnesses, he was hard working and had other characteristics that one would expect a judge to have.

As the masters concluded, however, after recitation of the evidence in mitigation: "Respondent's evidence of his honesty, legal knowledge, reputation for appropriate courtroom control and the difficult circumstances of various trials cannot mitigate the serious nature of the multiple acts of willful misconduct and prejudicial conduct he committed." We agree. (See also Kloepfer v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1989) 49 Cal.3d 826, 865 [264 Cal.Rptr. 100, 782 P.2d 239].)

(9) By adopting the masters' findings, the Commission has found eight instances of willful misconduct, plus five of conduct prejudicial. To the extent that multiple incidents of misconduct arose out of the same proceeding or occurrence, the Commission has considered this in assessing discipline. The Commission's action is based upon the nature of this misconduct and its effect on the public and the judicial system, rather than a mere tally of the number of instances of misconduct. (See Furey v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1987) 43 Cal.3d 1297, 1313, 1315 [240 Cal.Rptr. 859, 743 P.2d 919] [overlapping charges not counted separately for discipline].)

As noted, Judge Ross's briefs and arguments continue to assert that his conduct was blameless. It is evident that Judge Ross has no basis for appraising his future conduct—and that events such as those described above could happen again if he were to sit as a judge.

(10) We recognize that willful misconduct does not compel removal from office. Indeed, the Commission recognizes that a lesser sanction may be appropriate for a judge "who showed himself ready, willing, and able to reform under a less severe sanction." (See Doan v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1995) 11 Cal.4th 294, 339 [45 Cal.Rptr.2d 254, 902 P.2d 272].) In this case, however, Judge Ross does not acknowledge any wrongdoing, nor is there any suggestion in the evidence or in the briefs that he would change his behavior if he were to resume judicial duties. In his brief filed January 15, 1998, Judge Ross continues to assert: "Respondent never committed any act of wilful misconduct, or prejudicial misconduct so sanctions should not be given."

At oral argument, Judge Ross remained steadfast that he had done no wrong. With respect to extracting waivers from the parties of their constitutional rights to complain to the Commission, Judge Ross's response remained that, "I made the best decision, I thought, for everybody."

Thus, from what appears in the record, and what appeared at oral argument, there is no basis for the Commission to assume or conclude that Judge Ross is ready, willing and able to reform—under any sanction. (See Doan v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 11 Cal.4th 294.)

As was the case in Kloepfer v. Commission on Judicial Performance: "The record does not suggest that petitioner has, or will be able to, overcome this trait and that similar incidents will not recur. For this reason comparison of the discipline imposed in other cases, as petitioner suggests, is not fruitful. Our role is to determine, in the individual case, the action necessary to protect the public and the reputation of the judiciary. The evidence fully supports the conclusion of the Commission that this purpose requires that petitioner be removed from the bench." (Kloepfer v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 49 Cal.3d at pp. 866–867.)

sanction, we consider the purpose of a Commission disciplinary proceeding—which is not punishment, but rather the protection of the public, the enforcement of rigorous standards of judicial conduct, and the maintenance of public confidence in the integrity and independence of the judicial system. [Citations.]"

Judge Ross, having resigned from office, is not subject to removal. The next available option is an order of public censure plus an order barring Judge Ross from sitting on assignment. The Commission was granted such authority by Proposition 190.[11] Lesser sanctions, such as a public admonishment, would allow Judge Ross to sit again as a superior court judge on assignment.

Given the egregious misconduct presented in this case, the Commission orders that Judge Ross be publicly censured, and that he be barred from receiving any assignment, appointment, or reference of work from any California state court.

This decision shall constitute the order of public censure and bar.

Commission members Robert C. Bonner, Esq., Ms. Ophelia Basgal, Mr. Mike Farrell, Hon. Lois Haight, Hon. Daniel M. Hanlon, Patrick M. Kelly, Esq., Hon. Vincent J. McGraw, Ms. Harriet Salarno, and Donald E. Vinson, Ph.D., voted for the public censure and bar. There were two vacant positions on the Commission.

[11] "The commission may also bar a former judge who has been censured from receiving an assignment, appointment, or reference of work from any California state court." (Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (d).)

INQUIRY CONCERNING JUDGE GEORGE W. TRAMMELL III

SUMMARY

A disciplinary matter was brought concerning a retired superior court judge.

The Commission on Judicial Performance censured the judge and barred him from receiving assignments, appointments or reference of work from any California state court. The commission concluded that the judge engaged in willful misconduct in carrying on, and actively concealing, a sexual relationship with a criminal defendant, while she was a probationer under his supervision and he was presiding over the criminal cases against her two codefendants, and in using his judicial office to further his relationship with the defendant. The judge acted in his judicial capacity in presiding over hearings and ruling on motions concerning all three defendants while he had an undisclosed sexual relationship with one of them. His actions were in bad faith as he acted for a corrupt purpose—to further his relationship with the defendant. The judge's misconduct compromised the integrity and independence of the bench and could not be tolerated. His misconduct warranted removal from office—a sanction not available to the commission because of his retirement. However, because of the passage of Proposition 190, the judge could not avoid all discipline by retiring from the bench. Accordingly, the commission imposed the maximum discipline available to it. (Opinion by Robert C. Bonner, Chairperson.)

HEADNOTES

(1) Judges § 6—Willful Misconduct—Sexual Relationship with Criminal Defendant.—The judge engaged in willful misconduct in carrying on, and actively concealing, a sexual relationship with a criminal defendant, while she was a probationer under his supervision and he was presiding over the criminal cases against her two codefendants, and in using his judicial office to further his relationship with the defendant.

(2) Judges § 6—Willful Misconduct—Elements.—There are three elements of willful misconduct committed by a judge: (1) unjudicial conduct, (2) committed in bad faith, (3) by a judge acting in his or her judicial capacity.

(3) Judges § 6—Discipline—Grounds—Willful Misconduct—Conduct Prejudicial—Ex Parte Communications.—Ex parte communications that were made by the judge in his judicial capacity and were made in bad faith constituted willful misconduct. Ex parte communications that were not judicial acts, and those that were judicial acts but for which there was not clear and convincing evidence of a corrupt purpose, were prejudicial conduct.

(4) Judges § 6—Censure of Former Judge—Assignments Barred.—Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (d), provides that the Commission on Judicial Performance may censure a former judge, and, where appropriate, may also bar a former judge who has been censured from receiving an assignment, appointment, or reference of work from any California state court.

BONNER, Chairperson.—This disciplinary matter concerns Judge George W. Trammell III (retired), formerly a judge of the Los Angeles County Superior Court. The proceedings arose from allegations that Judge Trammell entered into a clandestine intimate relationship with one of three codefendants, that he continued to preside over their cases, that he allowed that relationship to influence his actions and that he engaged in numerous improper ex parte communications. The Commission on Judicial Performance (Commission) concludes that Judge Trammell committed willful misconduct in office and conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute. The Commission censures Judge Trammell and bars him from receiving assignments, appointments or reference of work from any California state court.

PROCEDURAL HISTORY

Judge Trammell served on the Los Angeles County Municipal Court from May 25, 1971, until January 31, 1988, and served on the Los Angeles County Superior Court from January 31, 1988, until January 10, 1997, when he retired.

The Commission's investigation of allegations concerning Judge Trammell led to the filing on February 4, 1998, of a notice of formal proceedings. Judge Trammell declined to file a verified answer, citing the Fifth Amendment of the United States Constitution.

As provided for by rule 121(b) of the Rules of the Commission on Judicial Performance, the Supreme Court appointed three special masters to conduct an evidentiary hearing and to prepare a written report.[1] Judge Trammell participated in the initial proceedings before the special masters, but declined to participate in the evidentiary hearing that was held on July 20 and 21, 1998. On September 22, 1998, the special masters filed their final report with the Commission.

Judge Trammell declined to file a brief on the special masters' report, as provided by rule 130 of the Rules of the Commission on Judicial Performance, and failed to respond to a letter from Commission counsel providing him with an opportunity to be heard orally before the Commission, as provided by rule 132 of the Rules of the Commission on Judicial Performance.[2] Accordingly, the matter was submitted to the Commission on December 9, 1998, without oral presentations. Nine members of the Commission participated in the consideration of the case.[3]

FINDINGS

In the spring of 1995, Ming Jin (Jin), Pifen Lo (Lo), Jin's ex-wife with whom he lived with their three children, and Yu Chang Chu (Chu), apparently their live-in babysitter and Jin's lover, were arrested. The case was assigned to Judge Trammell. The charges included two counts of kidnapping for purposes of extortion, assault of one victim with a semiautomatic firearm, several counts of robbery, several counts of laundering money, possession of explosives, possession of silencers, possession of counterfeit computer software, and three counts of child endangerment because the explosives and guns were in the house where the three children lived. The most serious charges were lodged against Jin and Chu and carried punishments of life sentences without parole. The charges against Lo exposed her to a potential sentence of 12 years.

[1] The special masters were Justice Robert R. Puglia of the Court of Appeal, Third Appellate District (presiding), Justice Daniel J. Kremer of the Court of Appeal, Fourth Appellate District, Division One, and Judge Francisco P. Briseño of the Orange County Superior Court.

[2] The office of trial counsel submitted a three-page opening brief and responded to Commission counsel's letter stating that they did not seek to make an oral presentation to the Commission.

On January 18, 1996, Judge Trammell accepted Lo's plea of no contest to certain nonviolent felonies. On April 26, 1996, a sentencing hearing was held. Judge Trammell suspended imposition of judgment and sentence and placed Lo on probation for five years with the conditions, among others, that she pay a fine of $100,000, make restitution in the amount of $400,000 and submit to psychiatric and psychological counseling.

Several days later, Lo returned to court to pick up some papers connected with her probation. When informed by the bailiff that Lo was there, Judge Trammell invited her into his chambers and spoke to her with only her brother-in-law present.

In April 1996, Judge Trammell had also rejected motions to suppress evidence which Chu and Jin had attempted to file. Subsequently, Jin pled guilty to the nonviolent felonies and these charges were dismissed as to Chu. Judge Trammell then presided over a jury trial of Jin and Chu on the violent felony charges. In early July, both were convicted on the violent felony charges. Jin and Chu filed motions for new trial that were still pending when Judge Trammell left the bench in January 1998.

In late August and early September 1996, Judge Trammell contacted a deputy sheriff because of a number of unusual occurrences which he felt were designed to intimidate him[4] and because he had received birthday cards from Jin, Chu and Lo, and wanted to know how they knew his birth date. The deputy sheriff offered to install a surveillance camera at the judge's residence, but the judge declined stating that he and a prior live-in girlfriend had purchased a camera. The deputy sheriff testified that the prior girlfriend denied that they had purchased a camera.

On September 13, 1996, Judge Trammell asked Chu's attorney to appear before him. When she arrived, he told her in the presence of the district attorney that he was unhappy with her performance and intended to appoint an attorney to investigate whether she rendered ineffective assistance. The attorney requested to be relieved as counsel for Chu, but Judge Trammell denied the request.

[4] The deputy sheriff testified that Judge Trammell told him that someone posing as him had deactivated his daughter's residential alarm, that he had reported prowlers at his home to the local police, and that one night when he came home, "he discovered a shotgun that he had purchased was now lying in the middle of his bed with . . . a round in the chamber, and he normally did not leave it that way for safety purposes."

On September 20, 1996, Chu was brought from jail to Judge Trammell's chambers by his bailiff. Judge Trammell then met with Chu in his chambers and discussed her potential sentence and Jin. Chu allegedly indicated that she would like to have a vegetarian diet and would like to attend a pottery class.

Lo testified before the special masters that on September 18, 1996, Judge Trammell contacted her by telephone and asked her to come to his chambers. She went to the courthouse and waited outside Judge Trammell's chambers until he ushered her into his room. Lo testified that Judge Trammell asked her if she had sent the birthday cards and she admitted that she had. Lo also testified that they discussed Jin and his possible sentence. She further testified that Judge Trammell complimented her, touched her, and kissed her. The meeting ended when someone sought entry into the judge's chambers and Judge Trammell let Lo out a side door.

Lo testified that on Saturday, September 21, 1996, Judge Trammell contacted her by telephone and asked her to come to his house. On Sunday, September 22, 1996, Lo went to Judge Trammell's house. They talked for awhile, they discussed Jin, and according to Lo, engaged in sexual intercourse over her objections.

Lo testified that from then through December 1996,* she visited Judge Trammell at least once a week and that they often engaged in sexual intercourse. During this period of time, Judge Trammell and Lo spoke to each other frequently by telephone. In their conversations Judge Trammell allegedly discussed how he might be able to terminate Lo's probation after only a year and advised her on how she might seek the return of property seized by the police, including a Mercedes automobile. At some point in time, Lo obtained a pager and Judge Trammell left numerous coded messages on Lo's pager.

During this time, Judge Trammell continued to preside over matters concerning Lo, Chu and Jin. Chu informed her attorney of her September 20 meeting with Judge Trammell, and the attorney prepared a motion to disqualify Judge Trammell. Jin also filed a motion to disqualify Judge Trammell.

On October 4, 1996, Chu's attorney received a phone call from Judge Trammell's clerk instructing her to prepare a motion to reduce Chu's bail to $45,000. On October 9, 1996, the attorney filed the motion to reduce bail.

The motions to disqualify and the motion for bail were set for hearing on October 18, 1996. When Chu's attorney arrived at the courthouse she was told that Chu wished to see her. The attorney consulted with Chu who insisted that she withdraw the motion to disqualify. The attorney withdrew the motion and Jin's counsel withdrew his motion to disqualify. Judge Trammell nonetheless addressed the motions, denied the allegations in the motions, and declined to recuse himself. Judge Trammell did not disclose his relationship with Lo. At one point during the hearing, Judge Trammell, while accusing Jin of having others, including Lo, do his bidding, disingenuously commented "whatever the name of your wife or ex-wife." Judge Trammell also granted Chu's motion for bail, reducing it to $25,000 purportedly to allow her to attend the pottery class, should she not be able to raise the bail.

At the end of October 1996, Judge Trammell called an indigent criminal defense appointment panel and requested that a particular attorney be appointed to represent Lo. The judge did not inform Lo's attorney of record of this request. When the attorney telephoned Judge Trammell's clerk to determine the nature of the appointment, Judge Trammell spoke directly to the attorney. Judge Trammell reportedly told the attorney that Lo had written a letter to the court requesting the return of property seized in conjunction with the criminal case and he wanted the attorney to prepare a motion for return of property for Lo. The attorney filed a motion for return of property. The letter written by Lo, however, was dated November 6, after the conversation between the attorney and the judge.

On December 5, 1996, Judge Trammell contacted Lo's probation officer, purportedly to inquire about a status report. Judge Trammell allegedly told the officer that he thought that the requirement of psychological counseling was no longer necessary and that Lo's probation need not continue for the full five years.

On December 6, 1996, Judge Trammell heard argument on the motion for return of property. Prior to the hearing, before the district attorney arrived, Judge Trammell informed Lo's appointed counsel that the district attorney intended to file amended forfeiture papers. At the hearing, the district attorney argued against the motion, Judge Trammell responded to the arguments, and then ordered the return of most of the property.

Lo's appointed attorney testified that several days later, Judge Trammell telephoned him to tell him that he had heard that the district attorney did not intend to comply with his order to return the property.[5] The attorney further testified that in a telephone conversation Judge Trammell told him that Jin and Chu had filed motions for a new trial based on ineffective assistance of counsel, that he thought they were well taken, and that he believed Lo's case had been "over filed" and that she had "over pled." The judge told the attorney that when Lo approached the one-year anniversary of her probation, he wanted the attorney to file a motion to terminate probation, which he would be inclined to grant.

On January 2, 1997, jail personnel intercepted correspondence from Jin to Lo which contained a "petition" alleging sexual misconduct by Judge Trammell. The document alleged, among other things, that Lo had collected pubic hair from the judge as proof of their sexual relationship. On January 6, 1997, two deputy sheriffs and their supervisor met with Judge Trammell and showed him the intercepted "petition." When asked, Judge Trammell admitted that Lo had been to his house once or twice, that he had called her four or five times and had taken her to dinner. He admitted telling her that he loved her, but denied having had sexual intercourse with her.

On January 6, 1997, without notice to counsel, Judge Trammell issued an order canceling the probation condition requiring Lo to receive counseling.

On January 9, 1997, Judge Trammell was served with a search warrant for his home and chambers. The following day he retired from judicial office.

FINDINGS OF FACT

The special masters found clear and convincing evidence[6] supporting four findings of fact and the Commission adopts those findings of facts.

First, the Commission finds that Judge Trammell had a sexual relationship with Lo from mid-September 1996 through early January 1997. During this period, Lo was Judge Trammell's probationer and a codefendant of Chu and Jin, both of whom had been convicted of felony charges and were awaiting Judge Trammell's rulings on their motions for a new trial and sentencing. The evidence supporting the existence of the sexual relationship includes Lo's testimony, telephone billing records showing numerous calls between Judge Trammell and Lo, four telephone conversations between Judge Trammell and

Lo (which Lo taped), and Judge Trammell's admission to a deputy sheriff of a romantic, albeit not sexual, relationship with Lo.

Second, the Commission finds that Judge Trammell actively endeavored to keep the existence of his relationship secret. Despite presiding over a number of hearings in matters concerning Lo, Chu and Jin, Judge Trammell did not mention his relationship with Lo, and at one point, gave the impression that he did not even know her name. This finding is also supported by Lo's testimony, by Judge Trammell's use of Lo's pager to send coded messages, and the deputy sheriff's testimony that Judge Trammell declined to have a surveillance camera installed at his residence, stating incorrectly that he already had such a camera.

Third, the Commission finds that Judge Trammell misused his judicial office in an attempt to further his relationship with Lo. He counseled Lo on how to seek the return of seized property, arranged for the appointment of an attorney specifically to assist Lo in securing the return of property, and then ruled on the motion. Both the attorney and Lo's probation officer testified as to Judge Trammell's intent to reduce Lo's term of probation from five years to one. Finally, just before he resigned from the bench, Judge Trammell, on his own motion and without notice to the district attorney or counsel, ordered the condition of probation requiring Lo to submit to psychological counseling eliminated.

Fourth, the Commission adopts the special masters' findings that Judge Trammell engaged in at least 13 improper ex parte communications with Lo and Chu, defendants in criminal proceedings over which he was presiding, and with attorneys involved in those proceedings. Among the improper ex parte communications are his April 29 and September 18, 1996 meetings with Lo in his chambers, his September 20, 1996 meeting in his chambers with Chu, his September 22 meeting with Lo at his home, his numerous telephone conversations with Lo in which he discussed pending matters in Lo's and Jin's cases, his instruction to Chu's attorney to prepare a motion for bail, and his telephone conversations to the attorney he appointed to represent Lo on her motion for return of property.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

(1) The Commission concludes, as did the special masters, that Judge Trammell engaged in willful misconduct in carrying on, and actively concealing, a sexual relationship with Lo, while she was a probationer under his supervision and he was presiding over the criminal cases against her two codefendants, and in using his judicial office to further his relationship with Lo.

(2) There are three elements of willful misconduct: (1) " 'unjudicial conduct,' " (2) " 'committed in bad faith,' " (3) " 'by a judge acting in his judicial capacity.' " (Dodds v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1995) 12 Cal.4th 163, 172 [48 Cal.Rptr.2d 106, 906 P.2d 1260].) Here Judge Trammell acted in his judicial capacity in presiding over hearings and ruling on motions concerning Lo, Chu and Jin while he had an undisclosed sexual relationship with Lo. His actions were in bad faith as he acted for a corrupt purpose[7]—to further his relationship with Lo.

"Unjudicial conduct" is measured by reference to the California Code of Judicial Ethics and Judge Trammell's conduct violated a number of canons. He violated canon 1 of the California Code of Judicial Ethics by compromising the independence and integrity of his office by presiding over criminal proceedings while maintaining a clandestine sexual relationship with one of the defendants. He violated canon 2A by engaging in personal conduct that created doubt as to his impartiality in respect to each of the rulings in the criminal proceedings (which followed the commencement of the relationship). Judge Trammell violated canon 2B(1) by allowing his relationship with Lo to influence his judicial conduct and judgment and by conveying the impression that Lo was in a special position to influence him. He violated canon 3E by failing to disclose his relationship with Lo and failing to disqualify himself, and he violated canon 4A by participating in a clandestine relationship with Lo while she was his probationer and he was presiding over proceedings against her codefendants.

Judge Trammell's ex parte communications with Lo concerning the return of Lo's property and all of his ex parte communications with Lo's attorney constitute willful misconduct as they were made in his judicial capacity, were made in bad faith (for the corrupt purpose of furthering his relationship with Lo), and violated California Code of Judicial Ethics canons 1 and 2 by compromising the integrity and independence of the judiciary and the appearance of impartiality.

Judge Trammell's other ex parte communications, with Lo, with Chu, and with Chu's attorneys, constitute prejudicial conduct. His communications with Lo in which he discussed Lo's probation or the criminal proceedings as they related to Jin and Chu violated California Code of Judicial Ethics canons 1 and 2, but the special masters found that they were not judicial acts. Judge Trammell's ex parte communications with Chu and her attorney also violated canons 1 and 2 and were judicial acts, but the special masters found that there was not clear and convincing evidence that they were for a corrupt motive.

[7] A judge acts in bad faith when he or she performs a judicial act for a corrupt purpose which is a "purpose other than the faithful discharge of judicial duties." (Broadman v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 18 Cal.4th at p. 1092.)

DISCIPLINE

(4) As Judge Trammell has retired from office, he is not subject to removal. The California Constitution (art. VI, § 18, subd. (d)) provides, however, that the Commission may censure a former judge, and, where appropriate, "may also bar a former judge who has been censured from receiving an assignment, appointment, or reference of work from any California state court."

The Commission has found that for more than three months Judge Trammell participated in a clandestine sexual relationship with a probationer, who was also a codefendant to two others whose criminal cases were pending before him. The facts reveal that Judge Trammell put himself in a position to be compromised and permitted the situation to continue by failing to disqualify himself once he established a totally inappropriate liaison with Lo. In addition, Judge Trammell not only failed to disclose the relationship, he actively used his position as a judge to further that relationship. He initiated calls to attorneys, counseled Lo and the attorneys on how to proceed, and ruled on the motions that the attorneys filed at his direction. Furthermore, there is no indication that Judge Trammell contemplated any closure to this situation. The end came only when jail officials intercepted correspondence from Jin to Lo which alleged that Judge Trammell had a sexual relationship with Lo. Even then, Judge Trammell was less than forthcoming about the relationship, and, without notice to counsel, he issued an order canceling the probation condition requiring Lo to receive counseling.

The Commission notes that Judge Trammell had served on the bench for 25 years when he first met Lo. He clearly understood not only that the relationship was improper but also that he could not ethically continue to preside over her case and those of her codefendants. Judge Trammell's misconduct compromised the integrity and independence of the bench and cannot be tolerated. His misconduct warrants removal from office—a sanction not available to the Commission because of his retirement. Since the passage of Proposition 190, a judge can no longer avoid all discipline by retiring from the bench. Accordingly, the Commission imposes the maximum discipline available to it. We publicly censure Judge Trammell and we bar him from receiving any future assignments, appointments or references.

Accordingly, the Commission orders that Judge George W. Trammell III be publicly censured, and that he be barred from receiving any assignment, appointment, or reference of work from any California state court.

This decision shall constitute the order of public censure and bar.

Commission members Robert C. Bonner, Esq., Mr. Mike Farrell, Hon. Daniel M. Hanlon, Patrick M. Kelly, Esq., Mr. Luke Leung, Ms. Ramona Ripston, Ms. Harriet Salarno, and Donald E. Vinson, Ph.D., voted for the public censure and bar. Ms. Ophelia Basgal and Hon. Lois Haight did not participate. There was one vacant position on the Commission.

| INQUIRY CONCERNING A JUDGENO. 133 | DECISION AND ORDER OF PUBLIC CENSURE |

This is a disciplinary matter concerning William M. Ormsby, Judge of the Inglewood Municipal Court, Los Angeles County. The Second Amended Notice of Formal Proceedings alleges thirteen counts of misconduct, the common theme being unjudicial conduct while sitting as a municipal court judge.

A formal hearing commenced before a panel of Special Masters in October, 1995 and was continued until January, 1996. After testimony had begun, a stipulated disposition was reached between Judge Ormsby and trial counsel for the commission. The proposed disposition was submitted to and accepted by the commission on February 1, 1996, subject to the parties submitting an agreed statement of facts.

The commission having reviewed the facts as stipulated by the parties and pursuant to the stipulated disposition, it now makes the following findings of fact and conclusions of law.

Statement of Facts

The commission accepts as true the following statement of stipulated facts:

1. Judge William M. Ormsby has been a judge of the Los Angeles Municipal Court, Inglewood Judicial District, from July 17, 1981, through the present.

2. In approximately February of 1994, Judge Ormsby remanded to custody the girlfriend of a defendant charged with gun possession who had accompanied the defendant to court. Judge

Ormsby called the woman forward and immediately remanded her to custody for whispering to her boyfriend in court. Judge Ormsby did not follow proper contempt procedures. Approximately one-half hour later, Judge Ormsby had the woman returned to court. She explained that her boyfriend had said something to her, and that she had told him that they should not talk. Judge Ormsby released her at that time.

3. On approximately February 13, 1990, Judge Ormsby ordered Rhonda Coulon, 90M00035, remanded for whispering in the courtroom. Judge Ormsby did not follow proper contempt procedures. Ms. Coulon was released later that day.

4. On the morning of February 21, 1990, Judge Ormsby ordered the defendant in People v. Gerardo Villaruel, 90M00215, remanded for whispering. Judge Ormsby had told Mr. Villaruel and two other men, in English, that no talking was allowed in court. About an hour later, one of the other men whispered in Mr. Villaruel's ear. Judge Ormsby called both men forward and ordered them remanded to custody without following proper contempt procedures. When counsel objected, Judge Ormsby refused to hear argument before calling the other cases on his calendar. When counsel was allowed to speak, counsel argued that due process required notice and a hearing before incarceration, and pointed out that Mr. Villaruel spoke Spanish. Judge Ormsby told counsel to present points and authorities on the afternoon calendar. In the afternoon, Judge Ormsby recalled the matter and released Mr. Villaruel.

5. On approximately February 20 or 21, 1990, Judge Ormsby ordered Ray Anderson, 90M01263, into custody for appearing to fall asleep in court. Judge Ormsby did not follow proper contempt procedures. Mr. Anderson was released later that day.

6. On occasion, when represented defendants who have failed to appear and have had bench warrants issued for their arrest later appeared in court, Judge Ormsby has refused to let counsel speak for them, stating that because bench warrants have been issued, they no longer have counsel.

7. In People v. Timothy Duffy, 89M03491, on January 10, 1990, the defendant appeared with counsel and was placed on probation upon condition that he serve either 30 days in jail or 90 days home arrest. The matter was continued for proof of acceptance into home arrest program. On February 22, 1990, the defendant appeared without his attorney of record and told Judge Ormsby that he was not in the home arrest program because he had been sentenced by another judge in another case to one year in jail. Judge Ormsby imposed the sentence of 30 days in jail, concurrent to the one year sentence, upon the defendant in the absence of his retained attorney, although Judge Ormsby knew that the defendant had counsel.

8. In People v. Charlie H. Mepham, 90M02273, Judge Ormsby told the defendant that the services of the public defender were for trials and that if he wanted diversion he could not have a public defender. Mr. Mepham appeared before Judge Ormsby on May 16, 1990, and stated that he was in a drug rehabilitation program. He apparently had been referred to the probation department for a diversion eligibility report before entering the program. Judge Ormsby noted that the case was on calendar for diversion eligibility and asked Mr. Mepham if he wished to be placed on diversion. Mr. Mepham replied, "Actually, I'd like to have a public defender, your honor." Judge Ormsby responded: "Public defender is for prosecution. I am going to place you on diversion. Once you are placed on diversion, you no longer have the public defender. The public defender is here in case you want to go to trial on this matter. Is that what you want to do is go to trial on the matter?" Mr. Mepham replied that he did not, and that he wished to submit a letter from the program and have the program considered as a diversion program. Judge Ormsby declined to place Mr. Mepham on diversion without a determination by the probation department that the program the defendant had entered was satisfactory, and referred the defendant to the probation department.

9. On February 9, 1993, in People v. Tonia Lynn Taylor, 93M09671, Judge Ormsby was rude and insulting to Deputy Public Defender David Marsh. In denying the defendant's motion for appointment of a handwriting expert, Judge Ormsby referred to the written materials submitted by the defense as "garbage" and "weak and insipid." In an opinion reversing Judge Ormsby's ruling, the Court of Appeal for the Second Appellate District, Division Two, noted that proper judicial discretion must be exercised in conformity with the spirit of the law and stated, "Obviously, such a spirit is lacking when the court itself engages in conduct violative of our Code of Judicial Conduct which requires that '...a judge should be patient, dignified, and courteous to litigants, jurors, witnesses, lawyers, and others with whom judges deal in an official capacity....'"

10. On January 11, 1993, in People v. James Bishara, 92Ml0291, Judge Ormsby made insulting and disparaging comments to Deputy Public Defender David Marsh. Mr. Marsh requested a continuance to investigate the case further in order to determine whether to request appointment of a fingerprint expert. Judge Ormsby stated several times, in an insulting manner, that Mr. Marsh's theory of the case was nonsensical and ridiculous, or words to that effect. Approximately ten other defendants represented by Mr. Marsh were present in court and witnessed Judge Ormsby's disparagement of Mr. Marsh.

11. On December 10, 1992, in People v. Grisham, 92M05977, Judge Ormsby made insulting remarks to Deputy Public Defender David Marsh. In denying a motion to suppress under Penal Code section 1538.5 brought by Mr. Marsh, Judge Ormsby characterized Mr. Marsh's theory as "marshmallow." Judge Ormsby employed a mocking tone in his statements.

12. On December 17, 1992, in the case of People v. Morin, Judge Ormsby reacted angrily to Deputy Public Defender David Marsh when he requested that Judge Ormsby address the issue of whether or not the defendant could travel to Mexico while released from custody pending trial.

13. On June 10, 1993, in the case of People v. Fuller, case no. 92M09152, Judge Ormsby suggested that Deputy District Attorney William Thomas might have committed misconduct by asking to interview the wife of a defendant before she testified at trial. When Mr. Thomas stated that if Judge Ormsby believed he had committed misconduct it would be appropriate to refer the matter to the State Bar, Judge Ormsby replied that, "I don't think because of your inexperience or because of your ignorance that I will do that."

14. On July 28, 1994, defendant Robert Lowery appeared before Judge Ormsby unrepresented for arraignment on theft charges. Mr. Lowery told Judge Ormsby that he was unemployed and attending school. Judge Ormsby forced him into an unnecessary colloquy regarding what he was learning in school. Judge Ormsby questioned him in a manner which was demeaning, visibly embarrassing Mr. Lowery in open court.

15. On occasion, Judge Ormsby put inordinate pressure on prosecutors to offer dispositions and on defendants to enter guilty pleas. On other occasions, Judge Ormsby engaged in conduct which appeared aimed at avoiding conducting preliminary hearings in cases which involve multiple counts or multiple defendants. In such cases, Judge Ormsby pressured defendants to waive preliminary hearings and prosecutors to offer dispositions.

16. On occasion, when defendants scheduled to appear in court for pretrial conferences were late, Judge Ormsby ordered them remanded to custody upon their arrival in court; Judge Ormsby then advised that if the defendant was willing to plead guilty he would be released that day, but if the defendant wished a trial, the trial would be set within thirty days and the defendant kept in custody until trial.

17. In the summer of 1994, an in-custody defendant was offered an opportunity to plead guilty for credit for time served; when the defendant refused the offer and opted for a jury trial, Judge Ormsby stated that he would proceed with jury selection that day (a Tuesday) and then recess the trial until the following Monday, with the defendant to remain in custody.

18. On December 17, 1992, Judge Ormsby criticized Deputy Public Defender David Marsh for filing motions to suppress under Penal Code section 1538.5. Judge Ormsby stated that the question of standing was going to come up, whether or not it was raised by the People. On February 4, 1993, in the case of People v. Cervantes, case no. 92M08973, Judge Ormsby sua sponte refused to allow David Marsh to call witnesses on the issue of standing in a motion to suppress under Penal Code section 1538.5. The appellate department of the superior court found this to be reversible error.

19. In People v. Yvonne R. Cleveland, 89M09659, at a jury trial held in 1990, Judge Ormsby refused to allow a defendant charged with battery to call a police officer to testify about an inconsistent statement he heard the alleged victim make at the time of the incident.

20. Judge Ormsby refused to accept written or oral Tahl waivers in the driving under the influence case of People v. Tai, 92M04129, in which the defendant entered a guilty plea on January 4, 1994. When the prosecutor pointed out that it was necessary that waivers be in the record in order for the conviction to be used as a prior conviction in any subsequent proceedings, Judge Ormsby indicated that he did not care.

21. Judge Ormsby frequently and arbitrarily dismissed misdemeanor cases on the day set for trial if the prosecution was unable to proceed that day, without giving consideration to the prosecution's requests to trail the cases within the 10-day grace period set forth in Penal Code section 1382. Judge Ormsby stopped dismissing cases under these circumstances in 1994.

22. On or about February 27, 1990, Judge Ormsby remanded Edgar Poz, 89M09497, for being late to court without giving him or Michael Russo, the deputy public defender representing him, an opportunity to explain his tardiness. Believing that Mr. Russo had made inconsistent statements about when he had seen Mr. Poz in court that morning, and confusing Mr. Poz with another defendant, Judge Ormsby refused to hear from Mr. Russo or Mr. Poz as to why Mr. Poz was late. Judge Ormsby rudely cut off Mr. Russo when he attempted to speak, stated that he was not concerned with what his understanding was because he had been wrong on things before, and directed him to sit down. Mr. Russo filed an affidavit pursuant to Code of Civil Procedure section 170.6. Judge Ormsby continued the case to the following day before another judge, rather than transferring it immediately to another judge. Mr. Russo was able to have the case called by another judge on February 27; and Mr. Poz was released on the original bail amount.

23. On May 9, 1989, Deputy Public Defender Fred Brennan appeared before Judge Ormsby in the case of People v. Seller, 89M01068. Mr. Brennan and the prosecution had agreed upon a proposed disposition of the matter, which was presented to Judge Ormsby. Judge Ormsby rejected the proposed settlement and, without request from the defendant, gave an indicated sentence should the defendant plead guilty. Mr. Brennan asked that the case be set for trial and orally moved to disqualify Judge Ormsby under Code of Civil Procedure section 170.6. The case was continued to July 11, 1989. On the same day, May 9, 1989, Mr. Brennan executed a written affidavit pursuant to Code of Civil Procedure section 170.6. The affidavit was accidentally dated May 5, 1989. When the case came before Judge Ormsby on July 11, 1989, Mr. Brennan reminded Judge Ormsby that he had challenged him pursuant to Code of Civil Procedure section 170.6, and stated that an affidavit had been filed on May 9, 1989. Judge Ormsby stated that the challenge was untimely because it was made after he gave an indicated sentence. Mr. Brennan requested a continuance to seek appellate review of Judge Ormsby's order. Judge Ormsby denied this request without prejudice, and continued the case to July 12, 1989. Thereafter, Judge Ormsby's clerk told Mr. Brennan that the affidavit was not in the court file. Mr. Brennan checked his files and found that the affidavit he had executed was still there; he immediately filed it with the clerk. On July 12, 1989, Judge Ormsby accused Mr. Brennan on the record of unethical conduct, stating that Mr. Brennan had engaged in "forum shopping" by attempting to disqualify him after he gave an indicated sentence. Judge Ormsby also accused Mr. Brennan of committing a fraud on the court by representing that the affidavit had been filed on May 9 when it had not been, and stated that the written affidavit had been back dated. Judge Ormsby then denied the disqualification motion, but recused himself from further proceedings in the case. Thereafter, without giving Mr. Brennan an opportunity to respond, Judge Ormsby stated his intention to refer Mr. Brennan to the State Bar and ordered Mr. Brennan "not to appear in my courtroom again, either as public or private counsel." On July 13, 1989, Mr. Brennan's supervisor, Deputy Public Defender Alvin Nierenberg, went to Judge Ormsby to attempt to clarify the situation. Mr. Nierenberg made comments in defense of Mr. Brennan. Judge Ormsby said that if Mr. Brennan was in court when he took the bench, he would warn him to leave and then have him arrested if he did not. Judge Ormsby said, ". . . if I come out and he is in my court, I will give him warning that he is not to be here; and if he does not leave, I will have my bailiff arrest him, take him into custody and I will begin contempt proceedings against him because it will be a direct contempt." When Mr. Nierenberg asked the basis of the contempt, Judge Ormsby declined to state one. When Mr. Nierenberg attempted to discuss the matter further, Judge Ormsby stated that the record was closed, ordered everything further to be off the record, and ordered Mr. Nierenberg physically removed from the courtroom. The appellate department of the superior court granted a writ preventing enforcement of Judge Ormsby's order barring Mr. Brennan from his courtroom. The State Bar found insufficient evidence that Mr. Brennan had engaged in impropriety.

24. On February 23, 1994, Judge Ormsby unnecessarily threatened Deputy Public Defender Lois Bruton with contempt. Ms. Bruton had conferred with her in-custody clients in the court's holding cell instead of conferring with three out-of-custody clients, whose cases Judge Ormsby wished to resolve that morning. Judge Ormsby chastised Ms. Bruton for this, and then attempted to appoint alternate counsel for a defendant appearing for arraignment, although the public defender had not declared a conflict. When Ms. Bruton attempted to make a record that there was no conflict and that the public defender was prepared to represent the defendant, Judge Ormsby threatened her with contempt.

25. On December 13, 1993, the defendant in People v. Alonzo Harris, 93M09733, appeared before Judge Ormsby on time and advised that he had not been able to get to the public defender's office to be interviewed as Judge Ormsby had directed. Judge Ormsby remanded Mr. Harris to custody. The prosecutor agreed to dispose of the matter for a $300 fine and penalty assessment. Judge Ormsby refused to accept the disposition at that time and continued the matter to the following day, with the defendant to remain in custody, "to see how he's going to pay the fine." On December 14, 1993, Judge Ormsby questioned Mr. Harris about when he had last worked and why he could not find work. Judge Ormsby then refused to give Mr. Harris credit against the fine for time spent in custody on the ground that his failure to go to the public defender's office was "worth the two days in county jail." Judge Ormsby also stated that because bail was set and the defendant could not make bail, the time he served in custody would be in addition to the fine.

26. None of the acts by Judge Ormsby, described above, involved personal corruption or gain. Judge Ormsby has acknowledged his mistakes and appears to have significantly improved his judicial conduct. A medical condition may have contributed to some of the conduct described above.

Conclusions of Law

The commission has independently reviewed the facts set forth above, and reached the following conclusion of law: Judge Ormsby's conduct constituted wilful misconduct in office and conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute.

Discipline

The stipulated facts warrant discipline, and could warrant removal from office. In the present case, however, the commission is persuaded that Judge Ormsby--having admitted his misconduct--is genuinely repentant and is unlikely to resume the conduct.

In reaching an agreement to terminate these proceedings and withdraw it from the Special Masters, the commission advised Judge Ormsby that it would not recommend or impose any discipline more severe than that of a severe public censure. Judge Ormsby further agreed that this order would be effective when entered; he has waived any right to further review.

The commission concludes that the appropriate discipline is a severe public censure. The commission vote was six to zero.

ORDER

For the reasons set forth herein, the commission orders that Judge William M. Ormsby be, and he hereby is, issued a severe public censure.

INQUIRY CONCERNING FORMER JUDGE ROBERT C. BRADLEY

SUMMARY

A disciplinary matter was brought concerning a superior court judge, who retired during the proceedings.

The Commission on Judicial Performance ordered that the judge be publicly censured and that he be barred from receiving any assignment, appointment, or reference of work from any California state court. The bar was without prejudice to the judge's filing, no sooner than a year after the entry of the commission's order, a motion to lift the bar to assignment, appointments, and reference of work. The commission concluded that the judge had violated Cal. Code Jud. Ethics, canons 1, 2A, 2B(2), by repeatedly driving under the influence of alcohol and engaging in abusive and threatening behavior while he was intoxicated. The judge's appearance at the courthouse while under the influence of alcohol and his persistent failure to perform his duties violated Cal. Code Jud. Ethics, canon 3C(1). The commission concluded that the judge's conduct constituted, at a minimum, prejudicial misconduct, habitual intemperance, and persistent failure or inability to perform judicial duties. The judge did not dispute that his conduct warranted a public censure, and the commission noted the importance of reassuring the bench and the public that his misconduct would not be overlooked. (Opinion by Daniel M. Hanlon, Chairperson.)

HEADNOTES

(1) Judges § 6.2—Discipline—Prejudicial Conduct—Definition.—Prejudicial conduct refers to conduct that would appear to an objective observer to be not only unjudicial but prejudicial to public esteem for the judicial office.

(2) Judges § 6—Discipline—Grounds—Substance Abuse.—The judge's appearance at the courthouse while under the influence of alcohol impaired the integrity of the court and weakened public confidence in the judiciary, as did his knowing violation of a court order.

(3) Judges § 6—Discipline—Grounds—Violation of Condition of Probation and Court Order.—The judge, who violated the no-alcohol condition of his probation and knowingly violated an emergency protective order, violated Cal. Code Jud. Ethics, canons 1 and 2A.

(4) Judges § 6—Discipline—Grounds—Conduct Prejudicial to Public Esteem.—The judge's continued alcohol abuse, violation of court orders and unlawful conduct were prejudicial to public esteem for the judicial office and violated Cal. Code Jud. Ethics, canons 1 and 2A.

(5) Judges § 6—Discipline—Violation of Court's Zero Tolerance Policy on Alcohol.—The judge violated Cal. Code Jud. Ethics, canon 3C(1), when his continued abuse of alcohol led him to violate the court's zero tolerance policy and to be relieved of his duties when he showed up at the courthouse intoxicated.

(6) Judges § 6.4—Discipline—Purpose of Proceedings—Former Judges.—The purpose of a Commission on Judicial Performance disciplinary proceeding is not punishment, but rather the protection of the public, the enforcement of rigorous standards of judicial conduct, and the maintenance of public confidence in the integrity of the judicial system. The ultimate objective is to protect the judicial system and the public that it serves from judges who are unfit to hold office. The ultimate standard for judicial conduct must be conduct that constantly reaffirms fitness for the high responsibilities of judicial office. The bench and the public should be reassured that unethical actions will not be overlooked if the offending judge's term expires before the commission's proceedings are completed.

(7) Judges § 6.2—Discipline—Grounds—Fitness for Assignment.—The former judge, who had repeatedly driven under the influence of alcohol, engaged in abusive and threatening behavior while he was intoxicated, appeared at the courthouse while under the influence of alcohol, and persistently failed to perform his duties, could not be found fit to sit on assignment. There was no guarantee of recovery, and his current sobriety had been achieved under controlled circumstances. Furthermore, the judges and lawyers who testified in support of his sitting on assignment conditioned their endorsements on his first maintaining an extended period of sobriety.

OPINION

HANLON, Chairperson.—This disciplinary matter concerns Judge Robert C. Bradley, formerly a judge of the Ventura County Superior Court. The proceedings arose from a series of actions by Judge Bradley commencing with his arrest for driving under the influence of alcohol on December 6, 1997, and culminating with his arrest on May 5, 1998, for riding a bicycle under the influence of alcohol. The commission finds that the nine counts charged in the second amended notice of formal proceedings were established by clear and convincing evidence, that Judge Bradley's actions violated the California Code of Judicial Ethics and that his actions constituted at least conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute, habitual intemperance, and persistent failure or inability to perform his judicial duties, as those terms are used in article VI, section 18, subdivision (d) of the California Constitution. The commission hereby publicly censures Judge Bradley and bars him from receiving assignments, appointments or references of work from any California state court. This bar from receiving assignments, however, is without prejudice to Judge Bradley's filing, no sooner than a year after the entry of this order, a motion to remove the bar based on a showing that he has maintained, and is maintaining, complete sobriety.

PROCEDURAL HISTORY

Judge Bradley became a municipal court judge in 1983 and was elevated to the superior court in 1984. In 1996 and 1997, he was the presiding judge of the Ventura County Superior Court. His term of office ended on December 31, 1998, and he did not seek reelection.

Formal proceedings in this matter were commenced with the filing on March 20, 1998, of a notice of formal proceedings and a notice of intention to temporarily disqualify under rule 120(b) of the Rules of the Commission on Judicial Performance. On April 1, 1998, following receipt of Judge Bradley's response to the notice of intention, the commission issued an order of disqualification barring Judge Bradley from acting as a judge pending further order of the commission or until the completion of formal proceedings.

A first amended notice of proceedings was filed on June 22, 1998, and a second amended notice of proceedings was filed on August 24, 1998. Judge Bradley filed his response to the second amended notice of proceedings on October 13, 1998.

As provided for by rule 121(b) of the Rules of the Commission on Judicial Performance, the Supreme Court appointed three special masters to conduct an evidentiary hearing and prepare a written report. The evidentiary hearing was held on December 7 and 8, 1998, before Justice William Stone, presiding, of the Court of Appeal, Fifth Appellate District, Justice Judith Haller of the Court of Appeal, Fourth Appellate District, Division One, and Judge Richard Patsey of the Contra Costa County Superior Court. On February 23, 1999, the special masters filed their report.

Judge Bradley and trial counsel filed opening, responding and reply briefs with the commission. In addition, Judge Bradley filed two motions to allow the taking of additional evidence and trial counsel filed opposition to the motions. The commission granted Judge Bradley's motions to allow the taking of additional evidence only insofar as the tendered declarations of Judge Bradley and Dr. Moglen were ordered filed.

On May 12, 1999, the matter was orally argued before the commission. All members of the commission were present. Mr. William Smith presented argument on behalf of trial counsel and Mr. Thomas Brayton of Jones, Mahoney, Brayton & Soll represented Judge Bradley. Judge Bradley also spoke on his own behalf.

FINDINGS

Judge Bradley in his presentation to the commission as well as in his testimony before the special masters admitted that he has had problems with alcohol since his service in Vietnam in 1969. He voluntarily checked into a residential program in 1980, and in November 1991 he voluntarily participated in a residential treatment program at the Betty Ford Center for 28 days. He attended Alcoholics Anonymous meetings after his stay at the Betty Ford Center, slowly tapering off and ceasing by the end of 1992. He resumed his association with Alcoholics Anonymous sometime in 1996.

Judge Bradley admitted virtually all of the factual allegations and did not object to the special masters' findings. The special masters found that the following facts were established by clear and convincing evidence, and the commission makes the following findings.

One night in the latter half of 1997, Ventura County Sheriff's deputies stopped Judge Bradley after he had run two stop signs. Judge Bradley smelled of alcohol, admitted that he had been drinking and appeared to be impaired. The deputies did not administer a field sobriety test and did not ask him how much he had had to drink. The deputies decided to drive Judge Bradley approximately one mile to his home rather than arrest him. The deputies indicated they may have done this as a "professional courtesy," although they may have made the same decision had he not been a judge. On the drive home, Judge Bradley asked the deputies not to disclose the incident to anyone.

At approximately 9:00 p.m. on December 6, 1997, Judge Bradley was stopped by the California Highway Patrol in the city of Ojai in Ventura County for running a stop sign and failing to use a turn signal. The officer noted that he exhibited objective signs of alcohol intoxication, such as slurred speech and the strong odor of alcohol. Field sobriety tests were administered and Judge Bradley's performance was unsatisfactory. During the tests, Judge Bradley informed the officer that he was a Ventura County Superior Court judge and urged the officer to allow him to drive home. At one point, Judge Bradley turned from the officer and walked back to his car, saying he was going to drive straight home. The officer instructed him to stop, which he did. Judge Bradley was arrested for driving under the influence of alcohol.

After being taken to jail, a breath test was administered which revealed that Judge Bradley's blood-alcohol level was 0.23/0.21 percent, well above the legal limit of 0.08 percent. He violated Vehicle Code section 23152, subdivisions (a) and (b), driving under the influence and driving with an unlawful blood-alcohol level. Judge Bradley falsely told the officer that he had had only one glass of wine to drink and that he did not feel the effects of alcohol. On February 24, 1998, Judge Bradley pled guilty to driving with an unlawful blood-alcohol level and was sentenced to three years' probation.

At approximately 9:00 p.m. on January 3, 1998, a Santa Paula police officer stopped to assist Judge Bradley who was standing by his car in a turn lane. As the officer exited his vehicle, Judge Bradley entered his car and drove to a gas station and attempted to change a flat tire. The officer approached Judge Bradley and noticed that his car had fresh damage. Judge Bradley could not explain how the car had been damaged. He smelled strongly of alcohol and was very unsteady as he attempted to change the tire.

After a second officer arrived, Judge Bradley was given field sobriety tests, which he performed unsatisfactorily. During the tests, he asked one of the officers, "Don't you know who I am?" When told that the officer did not know, Judge Bradley asked him not to continue because an arrest would ruin his life and his career. He asked to be driven home. Judge Bradley was placed under arrest for driving under the influence of alcohol.

The officers found two pint-sized bottles of vodka, three-quarters empty, on the front passenger's seat of Judge Bradley's car and a half-empty bottle of vodka in a paper bag on the floor in front of the passenger's seat. Judge Bradley falsely stated that he had had only one beer and one drink and that he did not feel the effects of alcohol.

During the booking process, Judge Bradley was very distraught. He repeatedly stated that his life would be ruined if he was booked for driving under the influence, and again asked the officers if they knew who he was. During fingerprinting, Judge Bradley said he was not going to continue and started to walk out of the booking area. After a minor struggle with an officer, he cooperated and completed the booking process. A blood test revealed that he had been driving with a blood-alcohol level of 0.27.

On February 24, 1998, Judge Bradley pled guilty to driving with an unlawful blood-alcohol level and was sentenced to five years on probation and 30 days in jail. He completed the jail sentence on March 17, 1998, and enrolled in an inpatient alcohol rehabilitation program. Unfortunately, after he completed the program, Judge Bradley continued to abuse alcohol.

Judge Bradley's two arrests for driving under the influence of alcohol received extensive negative newspaper coverage and were widely known in the legal community as well as by the general public. On January 8, 1998, the presiding judge of the Ventura County Superior Court gave Judge Bradley a confidential memorandum stating: "Because of recent events it is essential that you not have any alcohol in your system while performing any of your duties as a judge. Therefore, under my authority as presiding judge, I am imposing a policy of 'zero tolerance' regarding you and alcohol. You are not to be alcohol positive while engaged in the performance of any of your judicial duties. Any violation of this condition will be considered a breach of your judicial responsibilities."

On the morning of January 13, 1998, Judge Bradley arrived at the Ventura County Courthouse under the influence of alcohol. Although he had no cases set for court that day, the courthouse was open to the public beginning at 8:00 a.m. The executive officer of the superior court was contacted between 8:30 and 9:00 a.m. and she and the assistant presiding judge went to Judge Bradley's chambers at approximately 10:00 a.m. Judge Bradley smelled of alcohol, exhibited an unusually relaxed demeanor and spoke nonsensically. When confronted with the fact that he appeared to be under the influence of alcohol, Judge Bradley initially denied, then admitted, that he had been drinking. The assistant presiding judge, in the absence of the presiding judge, relieved Judge Bradley of all judicial assignments, and that afternoon the executive officer drove Judge Bradley to an alcohol treatment facility.

The week before, on January 5, 1998, the presiding judge had gone to Judge Bradley's chambers to assess his condition on his first day back to work after his second arrest. Judge Bradley began discussing his wife's relationship with a deputy district attorney. Judge Bradley said something to the effect of: "Maybe I ought to blow them both away." Judge Bradley had never met or talked to the deputy district attorney. The presiding judge did not believe that the statement constituted an actual threat, and he attributed it to Judge Bradley's depressed emotional state. Nonetheless, the presiding judge thought he should not ignore the comment and informed the district attorney of the comment. At the district attorney's request, Judge Bradley met with him to discuss the statement. When the deputy district attorney was informed of the statement, it caused him "some concern" for his safety.

On or about January 23, 1998, Judge Bradley entered a 90-day inpatient alcohol treatment program. He left before completing the program and continued to abuse alcohol. On February 18, 1998, Judge Bradley left the following message on the deputy district attorney's voice mail: "[The district attorney] said I should call you about a potential death problem—threat. I don't think this is a situation that we should even discuss on the phone—whatever. I'll call you later on. Bye-bye." The deputy district attorney did not recognize the voice and was unsure if it was a threat. When it was established that it was Judge Bradley who left the message, his concern for his safety increased.[1]

The next day, February 19, 1998, Judge Bradley telephoned the executive officer and told her that he was no longer at the inpatient program and was coming back to work on March 2. On February 20, 1998, Judge Bradley again telephoned the executive officer. He was intoxicated during the conversation, and said that he had been drinking since leaving the inpatient program. He said that he "really did it this time"; he had left an explicit voice mail message for the deputy district attorney at his office indicating that if the attorney continued a sexual relationship with his wife, he was going to kill him. In fact, Judge Bradley had not left such a message. The executive officer informed the presiding judge of what Judge Bradley had told her. When the attorney was informed of this statement by Judge Bradley, it increased his concern for his safety, but this concern was lessened when he was told the statement referred to the message that Judge Bradley had previously left on his voice mail.

On February 21, 1998, the Ventura County District Attorney's Office learned that Judge Bradley had left San Diego by train, intending to return to the Ventura area. This information was given to the presiding judge. On February 23, 1998, after discussing the matter with all supervising judges of the Ventura County courts, the presiding judge barred Judge Bradley from the courthouse. The presiding judge took this action because Judge Bradley had been relieved of his duties, had no reason to be at the courthouse, and was exhibiting very poor judgment.

[1] The masters noted that they had listened to the tape and that Judge Bradley sounded calm and nonthreatening.

Between December 8, 1997, the first workday following his arrest on December 6, 1997, and March 30, 1998, the date that the commission issued an order suspending Judge Bradley, he was available for work only six days. He was in inpatient rehabilitation programs for 63 days and incarcerated for 20 days.

At approximately 2:00 a.m. on April 25, 1998, Judge Bradley took a cab from Ventura to the family residence in Ojai. He pried open a window with a knife he found in the shed and entered the house. His estranged wife and their children were living there. Judge Bradley had not lived in the house for approximately 14 months. When the wife discovered Judge Bradley was in the house she told him to leave. He refused, noting that the house was still his. They argued verbally and engaged in a minor mutual "pushing and shoving match." In the course of the argument Judge Bradley told his wife that he would kill her, but she did not take this as a real threat. She called the police.

When the police arrived they found Judge Bradley asleep in an upstairs bedroom. He was verbally abusive to the officers and uncooperative. It was apparent that Judge Bradley had been drinking and he was placed under arrest for violating the no-alcohol condition of his probation stemming from the driving under the influence cases. The officers contacted the "on duty" judge who issued an emergency protective order prohibiting Judge Bradley from having contact with his wife and children. He was told of the order and given a copy of it.

Later that morning from jail, Judge Bradley made two brief telephone calls to his wife, unsuccessfully seeking her help with posting bail. After he was released from jail, he left three messages on his wife's answering machine. None was threatening, but in one message Judge Bradley admitted he was violating the protective order by calling.

On May 14, 1998, Judge Bradley admitted he had violated his probation in the two driving under the influence cases. On June 26, 1998, he was sentenced to 180 days in jail. Also on June 26, he pled no contest to two counts of violating the emergency protective order. The court suspended the 365-day jail sentence for violating the protective order and placed him on probation for three years on the condition he serve 30 days in jail concurrent to the sentence in the driving under the influence cases.

At approximately 10:00 p.m. on May 15, 1998, a Ventura police officer saw Judge Bradley attempting to stand up in a street near railroad tracks after apparently falling off a bicycle. He stumbled as he unsuccessfully attempted to remount the bike. As the officer approached Judge Bradley and asked for identification, she recognized him. The officer was aware that he was on probation for driving under the influence of alcohol. Judge Bradley exhibited symptoms of being under the influence of alcohol. He admitted he had been drinking and was arrested for violating the no-alcohol condition of his probation. A breath test administered at the station revealed that Judge Bradley had a blood-alcohol level of 0.22/0.21 percent. On June 26, 1998, he pled no contest to riding a bicycle under the influence of alcohol and was fined.

CONCLUSIONS

The special masters concluded that on each of the seven counts concerning specific actions Judge Bradley engaged in conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute.

Count one concerned Judge Bradley's driving under the influence of alcohol on December 6, 1997. The special masters found that he intentionally broke the law by driving under the influence, unnecessarily informing the officer that he was a judge, asking to be allowed to drive himself home, and untruthfully telling the officer that he had only one glass of wine to drink. They found that Judge Bradley violated canons 1, 2A and 2B(2) of the California Code of Judicial Ethics by these actions, "which eroded the integrity of his office, undermined public confidence in the judiciary and [that he] improperly sought to use the prestige of his office to advance his personal interests."

Similarly, on count two which concerned Judge Bradley's driving under the influence of alcohol on January 3, 1998, the masters noted that he "brazenly broke the law by driving under the influence and with a blood alcohol level of .27 percent," "was not truthful about how much alcohol he had consumed," and "was prepared to tell the officers that he was a judge and asked for special treatment." In addition, his "behavior during booking when he was uncooperative, walked away from the fingerprinting process and briefly struggled with an officer" constitutes, by itself, prejudicial misconduct. The masters concluded that Judge Bradley's actions violated California Code of Judicial Ethics canons 1, 2A and 2B(2).

The masters were of the opinion that Judge Bradley's conduct as alleged in counts one and two did not constitute willful misconduct because he had not been acting in his judicial capacity when he was driving or during the arrest procedures. The masters note that in Kennick v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1990) 50 Cal.3d 297, 318–319 [267 Cal.Rptr. 293, 787 P.2d 591], the "Supreme Court found Kennick's conduct—referring to his judicial status and the fact that the California Highway Patrol has cases before the court and suggesting the officer lose the paperwork—did not occur while Kennick was acting in a judicial capacity, and therefore could not be willful misconduct." The masters concluded that Judge Bradley's actions were significantly less egregious than the conduct in issue in Kennick.

(2) The masters concluded that the actions charged in count four concerning Judge Bradley's coming to the courthouse when intoxicated in violation of the zero-tolerance policy constituted prejudicial misconduct. Judge Bradley's appearance at the courthouse while under the influence of alcohol impaired the integrity of the court and further weakened public confidence in the judiciary, as did his knowing violation of a direct order from the presiding judge. The masters concluded that these acts violated California Code of Judicial Ethics canons 1 and 2A. They further noted that Judge Bradley "was on specific notice that such conduct would not be tolerated by the superior court, but chose to ignore the repercussion—that he would be relieved of his duties. Consequently, as a result of his own conduct, respondent was rendered unable to diligently discharge his duties and thereby violated canon 3C(1)."

The masters concluded that Judge Bradley's actions charged in count five concerning his threats and telephone calls involving the deputy district attorney constituted prejudicial misconduct. They found that the incidents, when considered as a whole, "demonstrate at the very least respondent's poor judgment and continued alcohol abuse." Judge Bradley's statements about and to the deputy district attorney were the most serious actions. "While these statements could have been construed as threats to physically harm the deputy district attorney, they appear to be more the product of respondent's emotionally depressed state than a legitimate threat to use violence." The masters nonetheless concluded that Judge Bradley's conduct constituted

[2] The masters noted that count three alleged that on two occasions Judge Bradley was driven home by law enforcement officers because he had been drinking and driving. Trial counsel conceded that they did not prove there was a second incident.

prejudicial misconduct, citing Cannon v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications (1975) 14 Cal.3d 678, 685, footnote 4, and 704–705 [122 Cal.Rptr. 778, 537 P.2d 898] (prejudicial conduct where judge verbally threatened to kill her apartment manager). They further noted "whenever a judicial officer makes statements that indicate an intent to break the law and/or commit violent acts upon another, public esteem for the judiciary will undoubtedly suffer great damage. This is so whether or not the judicial officer's statements are innocuous."

(5) In addition, the masters found that Judge Bradley demonstrated a persistent failure or inability to perform judicial duties as charged in count six. During the four-month period from December 8, 1997, to March 30, 1998, he was available for work only six days. The masters found that the responsibility for Judge Bradley's unavailability during the bulk of the period lay directly with him. They noted that while it is generally not misconduct when a judge is unavailable because he or she is voluntarily seeking treatment for alcoholism, here the treatment sought was a direct consequence of Judge Bradley's unlawful behavior, and his continued abuse of alcohol which led him to violate the zero-tolerance policy and to be relieved of his duties when he showed up at the courthouse intoxicated. The masters opined that the actions of the presiding and assisting presiding judges were prudent responses to Judge Bradley's "protracted intemperate and irresponsible behavior." His conduct violated California Code of Judicial Ethics canon 3C(1).

Finally, the masters found that Judge Bradley demonstrated habitual intemperance in the use of intoxicants or drugs as charged in count nine. They recognized that there is no published authority interpreting the state's constitutional provision for removing or censuring judges on the grounds of habitual intemperance, but concluded that Judge Bradley's "excessive abuse of alcohol as outlined in Counts One through Eight constituted habitual intemperance by any generally accepted meaning of the term, including that contemplated by our state Constitution."

The masters rejected Judge Bradley's argument that "habitual intemperance" as used in article VI, section 18, subdivision (d) of the California Constitution violated principles of due process because it was unconstitutionally vague. The masters note that in analyzing whether a statute is void for vagueness there is a strong presumption that legislative enactments be upheld unless their unconstitutionality is clear (citing Williams v. Garcetti (1993) 5 Cal.4th 561, 568 [20 Cal.Rptr.2d 341, 853 P.2d 507]) and that in determining whether language is impermissibly vague, we ask whether the language provides a "person of ordinary intelligence a reasonable opportunity to know what is prohibited, so that he may act accordingly." (Grayned v. City of Rockford (1972) 408 U.S. 104, 108 [33 L.Ed.2d 222, 92 S.Ct. 2294].) The masters concluded that given its context in a provision dealing with judicial discipline, "habitual intemperance" provides adequate notice to judicial officers of what conduct is proscribed.

The commission agrees with the special masters' conclusions that Judge Bradley's actions violated the California Code of Judicial Ethics. The commission also agrees that Judge Bradley's actions as charged in counts one through five and seven and eight constituted at a minimum prejudicial misconduct. As Judge Bradley's term has expired and he agrees that he should be publicly censured, the commission need not determine whether any of his actions, such as showing up at the courthouse intoxicated and in violation of a specific zero-tolerance policy, might also constitute willful misconduct.

MITIGATION

The masters note that a substantial portion of the testimony concerned Judge Bradley's presentation of mitigation evidence. Nine witnesses, representing a broad cross-section of Ventura County's judicial and legal community, testified as to Judge Bradley's professional conduct, including one appellate judge, two superior court judges, a court administrator, the district attorney, the public defender, and three experienced trial attorneys. Before his first arrest, Judge Bradley "was viewed as a bright, thorough, hard-working and fair-minded judge." The witnesses opined that if he were able to maintain an extended period of sobriety, they would have no hesitation in having Judge Bradley hear and resolve their cases if permitted to sit on assignment. The masters found the witnesses' testimony "highly credible and persuasive," noting that the testimony of two of Judge Bradley's colleagues, whose court had suffered as a result of his behavior, was particularly compelling.

The masters found Judge Bradley's evidence concerning his ability to overcome his alcohol dependency less convincing. His intoxication led to six known incidents since December 6, 1997, "notwithstanding his having sought treatment in four in-patient rehabilitation programs. Although respondent has made an effort to control his sobriety, as of the time of the hearing, his efforts had not been successful."

The masters noted that in October 1998, Judge Bradley was diagnosed as suffering from posttraumatic stress syndrome (PTSS). Dr. Moglen, his psychiatrist, attributed this disorder to the 10 and one-half months respondent was in Vietnam. The masters found that Judge Bradley testified convincingly that he first abused alcohol in Vietnam as a diversion from his combat experience. Dr. Moglen expressed confidence respondent's PTSS can be treated successfully, and noted that with successful treatment there is a higher probability Judge Bradley can gain prolonged control over his sobriety. Dr. Moglen conceded, however, that success cannot be guaranteed. As Judge Bradley's new treatment plan was scheduled to commence immediately after the hearing, the masters declined to comment on the likelihood of success.

The declarations accepted by the commission suggest that Judge Bradley is in recovery. Judge Bradley states that: (1) he has not consumed alcohol since December 2, 1998; (2) in January 1999 he commenced working at a 48-hour-a-week job; (3) following an inpatient program from December 11 through December 18, 1998, he has been in an outpatient program that will continue through the middle of June; and (4) that he attends therapy sessions and Alcoholics Anonymous sessions seven days a week. Dr. Moglen states that Judge Bradley is taking Antabuse on a daily basis and is randomly tested for alcohol and that he is no longer depressed and is not experiencing the symptoms of PTSS. Dr. Moglen admits that there is no guarantee that Judge Bradley will maintain his sobriety, but opines that he will.

DISCIPLINE

Article VI, section 18, subdivision (d) of the California Constitution provides that the commission may "censure a . . . former judge . . . for action . . . that constitutes willful misconduct in office, persistent failure or inability to perform the judge's duties, habitual intemperance in the use of intoxicants or drugs, or conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute." The subdivision further states: "The commission may also bar a former judge who has been censured from receiving an assignment, appointment, or reference of work from any California state court."

(6) The Supreme Court has consistently stated that the purpose of a commission disciplinary proceeding is not punishment, " 'but rather the protection of the public, the enforcement of rigorous standards of judicial conduct, and the maintenance of public confidence in the integrity . . . of the judicial system.' " (Broadman v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1998) 18 Cal.4th 1079, 1112 [77 Cal.Rptr.2d 408, 959 P.2d 715], quoting Adams v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1995) 10 Cal.4th 866, 912 [42 Cal.Rptr.2d 606, 897 P.2d 544].)

Some of the variations of this theme sounded by the Supreme Court include: " '[t]he purpose of these proceedings is not to punish errant judges but to protect the judicial system and those subject to the awesome power that judges wield' " (Dodds v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1995) 12 Cal.4th 163, 179 [48 Cal.Rptr.2d 106, 906 P.2d 1260], quoting Furey v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1987) 43 Cal.3d 1297, 1320 [240 Cal.Rptr. 859, 743 P.2d 919], citing Doan v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1995) 11 Cal.4th 294, 314 [45 Cal.Rptr.2d 254, 902 P.2d 272]); the " 'ultimate objective [is] . . . to protect the judicial system and the public which it serves from judges who are unfit to hold office' " (Doan, supra, 11 Cal.4th at p. 314, quoting McComb v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1977) 19 Cal.3d Spec. Trib. Supp. 1, 9 [138 Cal.Rptr. 459, 564 P.2d 1]); and "[t]he ultimate standard for judicial conduct must be conduct which constantly reaffirms fitness for the high responsibilities of judicial office" (Geiler v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications, supra, 10 Cal.3d at p. 281).

Judge Bradley's conduct clearly warrants a public censure. He concedes as much. More importantly, the bench and the public should be reassured that such actions by a judge are unethical and will not be overlooked if the offending judge's term expires before the commission's proceedings are completed.

(7) The question of whether Judge Bradley should be barred from assignment is a more complicated matter. The commission's primary trust is to the public and it cannot at this time find that Judge Bradley is fit to sit on assignment. The commission was impressed with Judge Bradley's forthrightness when he appeared before the commission and hopes that his recovery will be speedy and complete, but as Judge Bradley admitted, there is no guarantee of such a recovery. The commission is mindful of the concerns raised in trial counsel's opposition to the motion to allow the taking of additional evidence, that Judge Bradley's alleged current sobriety has been achieved under controlled circumstances[3] and provides no assurance of his future fitness. Furthermore, as noted by the masters, the judges and lawyers who testified in support of Judge Bradley sitting on assignment conditioned their endorsements on Judge Bradley first maintaining an extended period of sobriety.

The commission was also impressed with Judge Bradley's record as a judge prior to December 6, 1997, and notes that despite his now admitted long-standing problems with alcohol there were no reported incidents prior to that date of these problems ever interfering with his performance of his judicial duties. Judge Bradley argues that, should he demonstrate over an extended period of time that he can maintain complete sobriety, it would be in the public's interest for him to be eligible to sit on assignment. The commission, without in any way committing itself to this approach, does not wish to foreclose Judge Bradley from making such an argument should he achieve its predicate—the maintenance of sobriety over an extended period of time.[4] Accordingly, the commission's bar to Judge Bradley receiving assignments is without prejudice to Judge Bradley's filing, no sooner than a year after the entry of this order, a motion to lift the bar to assignments, appointments and reference of work.

The commission orders that Judge Robert C. Bradley be publicly censured, and that he be barred from receiving any assignment, appointment or reference of work from any California state court. This bar is without prejudice to Judge Bradley's filing, no sooner than a year after the entry of this order, a motion to lift the bar to assignment, appointments and reference of work.

This decision shall constitute the order of public censure and bar.

[3] Among the controlling circumstances are: (1) Judge Bradley is taking Antabuse; (2) he is randomly tested for alcohol; (3) he is in an intense outpatient program; (4) he resides with three other recovering alcoholics; (5) he attends programs and sessions seven days a week; and (6) he is on probation on his criminal convictions.

[4] The California Constitution's provision authorizing the commission to permanently bar a former judge from assignments, arguably includes implicitly the authority to impose a lesser penalty—for example, a bar for a limited period of time. The commission recognizes that the parties did not brief this issue, that it has not previously asserted such implicit authority, and, of course, that any lifting of a prior bar to assignments would in no wise be binding on the Chief Justice. The issues inherent in the proposition that the commission might remove a bar to assignments will have to be addressed if and when Judge Bradley makes such a motion. Thus, the commission's indication that Judge Bradley may file a motion to remove the bar should not be construed as implying that the motion would necessarily be granted even though the factual predicate for the motion is met.

Commission members Hon. Daniel M. Hanlon, Ms. Lara Bergthold, Mr. Mike Farrell, Hon. Madeleine I. Flier, Michael A. Kahn, Esq., Mrs. Crystal Lui, Hon. Risë Jones Pichon, Ms. Ramona Ripston, Ms. Julie Sommars, and Donald E. Vinson, Ph.D., voted for the public censure and bar. Commission member Patrick M. Kelly, Esq., did not participate.

| Inquiry Concerning Judge Fred L. Heene, Jr.No. 153 | DECISION AND ORDER IMPOSING PUBLIC CENSURE |

This is a disciplinary matter concerning Judge Fred L. Heene, Jr., of the San Bernardino County Superior Court. Formal proceedings having been instituted, this matter is before the Commission on Judicial Performance pursuant to rule 127 of the Rules of the Commission on Judicial Performance (discipline by consent).

APPEARANCES

Trial Counsel for the Commission on Judicial Performance are Jack Coyle and William Smith. Counsel for Judge Heene is James E. Friedhofer of Lewis, D'Amato, Brisbois & Bisgaard.

PROCEDURAL HISTORY

Formal proceedings were instituted in this matter by a Notice of Formal Proceedings dated February 26, 1999. The Notice set forth nine counts of misconduct pursuant to article VI, section 18 of the California Constitution. On April 29, 1999, Judge Heene filed a response to the Notice of Formal Proceedings. As provided for by rule 121(b) of the Rules of the Commission on Judicial Performance, the Supreme Court appointed three special masters to conduct an evidentiary hearing and to prepare a written report.[1]

CONSENT AGREEMENT

Following the holding of a prehearing conference by the special masters and the scheduling of an evidentiary hearing,[2] Judge Heene submitted a proposed disposition by consent. The "Proposed Disposition" recites the following factual stipulations.

---

[1] The special masters are Justice Marcel Poché of the Court of Appeal, First Appellate District, Division Four (presiding), Judge Barbara A. Lane of the Superior Court of Ventura County and Judge Jerry E. Johnson of the Municipal Court of Los Angeles County.

[2] In light of the commission's disposition of the matter, the hearing scheduled to commence November 1, 1999 is cancelled.

COUNT ONE

People v. Fullerton

On the morning of July 30, 1996, Judge Heene presided over the preliminary hearing in the rape case of People v. Fullerton. The alleged victim (referred to as Ms. Doe) testified inconsistently with what she had told police. Ms. Doe testified that she had given the police information that was not true. At the conclusion of her testimony, Judge Heene ordered that she be taken into custody, stating:

> Okay, ma'am, you are not allowed to leave. The bailiff is ordered to take her into custody and I am going to set bail in the amount of $25,000 and ask that charges be filed ... She has admitted to this Court a crime.

Deputy District Attorney Friedman, who was prosecuting the preliminary hearing, asked that Judge Heene take a recess before taking the witness into custody; Judge Heene refused. When Friedman noted that there were no charges pending against Ms. Doe, the judge stated that she had admitted a crime in court and again ordered her remanded. Shortly thereafter, Deputy District Attorney Hansen, Friedman's supervisor, appeared in court and expressed concern that the witness had been taken into custody under such circumstances. The judge again stated that the witness had admitted a crime. When Hansen noted that the district attorney's office had not made a determination as to whether a crime had been committed, the judge responded that Ms. Doe had admitted on cross-examination that she had filed a false police report.

Shortly thereafter, Judge Heene released Ms. Doe from the custody of the bailiff to her attorney upon the condition that she was not free to leave the courthouse. Ms. Doe had been in the custody of the bailiff for approximately 10 minutes. The preliminary hearing was thereafter concluded. After the lunch recess, Judge Heene had Ms. Doe brought into the courtroom, and told her that he was ordering a transcript to be prepared for the district attorney's office to review to possibly file criminal charges. Judge Heene stated that he was going to order a day for Ms. Doe to return to court, then withdrew that order at Friedman's request. He then told Ms. Doe that she was free to leave.

COUNT TWO

People v. Reis

On February 10, 1997, Judge Heene presided over the court trial on a speeding ticket in the case of People v. Reis. After the police officer testified, Judge Heene asked defendant Reis, who was representing himself, to tell his side of the story. The following then occurred:

> MR. REIS: Do I get to cross-examine the officer?
> THE COURT: No, sir. You tell me your side of the case.

MR. REIS: Oh. I thought – I misunderstood. I thought we got to cross-examine the officer also.

THE COURT: Sir, it is early on Monday morning.

MR. REIS: I don't want to offend you.

THE COURT: Okay. All right. I asked you to tell me your side of the case.

THE COURT: Okay.

THE COURT: Now, for the third time, would you please tell me you side of the case?

Judge Heene did not allow the defendant to cross-examine the officer. The defendant then explained that he was going 55 mph, not 58 as testified to by the officer, and explained why he believed that his speed was safe for the conditions at the time. Judge Heene told the defendant that the speed limit was 45, and that he was going to impose a fine. The case was then concluded. The conviction was reversed by the Appellate Department of the Superior Court, on the basis that the defendant should have been allowed to cross-examine the officer.

COUNT THREE

People v. Boykin

On December 1, 1997, Judge Heene presided over the case of People v. Boykin. Defendant Boykin was charged with the infraction of driving a vehicle with expired registration. Boykin had entered a not guilty plea on November 13, 1997, and the matter was set for a court trial on December 15, 1997. Boykin appeared on December 1, 1997, because he had been unable to pay the $200 bail set on November 13. Boykin was representing himself.

Judge Heene stated as follows:

THE COURT. Okay. Tell you what. Get rid of the car, that will get you some money, and then we will get rid of the ticket, okay? Then you will solve my problem because you won't be driving. You will solve everybody else's problem because the car is gone and you will have some money; right?

THE DEFENDANT: Yes, sir.

THE COURT: Okay.

THE DEFENDANT: Hopefully I can get some money now that I am working.

THE COURT: Be back here December 11, okay, December 11th showing that the car is sold, okay.

THE DEFENDANT: Well, if I can't sell it by then, I mean, I can't make people buy it, sir. I don't –

...

THE COURT: Do you know how to determine the sale price of something?

THE DEFENDANT: No, sir.

THE COURT: You start at a nickel and you work up. And when you are down to the last person, then that's the sale price. All right? I guarantee you, offer that thing up for a hundred dollars, you are going to have some buyers, aren't you?

THE DEFENDANT: Not necessarily on the car, if you seen the car.

THE COURT: Then a tow company will buy it.

THE DEFENDANT: For 20 dollars or so.

THE COURT: Right. You be back here with that car gone on December 11th. Because one of the two of you is going to be gone on December 11th, all right? All right. We have been playing around with this since July. Make it happen. December 11th you are here, either you have a sale that's been registered with DMV showing the car is gone, or we will give you some vacation time to think about it.

THE DEFENDANT: What if I get it registered by then?

THE COURT: Did you hear me? Was I not clear? Make the car gone on December 11th or you will get some vacation time. Is that clear?

THE DEFENDANT: Yes, sir.

Defendant Boykin appeared before Judge Heene on December 11 and stated that he had sold his car. Judge Heene imposed court costs of $10, and the case was dismissed.

COUNT FOUR

People v. Lopez

On December 30, 1997, Judge Heene presided over the misdemeanor case of People v. Lopez. Defendant Lopez had been previously ordered by another judge to do community service in lieu of a fine, as part of a sentence for driving on a suspended license and two vehicle code infractions. Lopez had not completed the community service work before the due date of December 13, 1997, and came to the courthouse on December 30, 1997, to request an extension. Lopez had not been scheduled to appear in court on December 30. (No notification of failure to complete the hours had been filed with the court.) She was sent to Judge Heene's department.

She appeared without an attorney. Judge Heene inquired whether she had completed the community service or paid the fine, and she said that she had not. The following occurred:

> THE COURT: Have a seat right there ma'am (pointing). All right. Ms. Lopez, stand up, please. This Court has tried 16 different – well, three different ways to try to help you get it paid. It is $1,314, we divide that by 30, and that's 44 days in the county jail. You will be remanded into custody. Okay. Good luck to you.
>
> MS. LOPEZ: Your Honor, can I say something?
>
> THE COURT: Sure. What do you want to say?
>
> MS. LOPEZ: I just had a baby. And when I was pregnant, I was on bed rest from two months on and I couldn't do my community service.
>
> THE COURT: Did you come into court and tell them that?
>
> MS. LOPEZ: No, I didn't, your Honor.
>
> THE COURT: Okay. Good luck.
>
> MS. LOPEZ: I have a seven-day old baby at home.
>
> THE COURT: Ma'am, you should have thought about that a long time ago.

Judge Heene did not inform the defendant that he was conducting a violation of probation hearing, nor otherwise advise her of her rights in connection with a probation violation hearing.

COUNT FIVE

People v. Hillmann

In January 1998, Judge Heene presided over a jury trial in the case of People v. Hillmann. The trial was completed and the jury began deliberations. On January 13, 1998, a juror was late to court. He was replaced with an alternate juror. When the late juror appeared, Judge Heene asked for his explanation for being late, then found him in contempt and remanded him. Judge Heene did not cite the juror for contempt or otherwise inform the juror that he was conducting a contempt hearing before finding him in contempt.

COUNT SIX

People v. MacLeod

On February 19, 1998, a defendant charged with speeding and a related misdemeanor for failure to attend traffic school appeared before Judge Heene for arraignment on the misdemeanor in the case of People v. MacLeod. Defendant MacLeod appeared without an attorney. She had not entered a plea on the traffic ticket; criminal proceedings had been stayed pending the completion of traffic school. MacLeod had not entered a guilty or no contest plea (or a not guilty plea) on the misdemeanor. The following occurred:

> THE COURT: ...What seems to be the problem?
>
> THE DEFENDANT: Well, I came to court once and I got an extension to January 1st.
>
> THE COURT: Yeah, I know that. You got actually two extensions.
>
> THE DEFENDANT: And I did lose my job. I wasn't able to pay the fine in full.
>
> I do have the original money for the original fine, I just don't have the additional fine.
>
> THE COURT: Well, ma'am, it is $589 at the present time.
>
> THE DEFENDANT: Uh-huh.
>
> THE COURT: Okay. Can you pay that today?
>
> THE DEFENDANT: No, I only have $329, the original –
> THE COURT: Well, it will be $589 or 20 days in the county jail. Okay. You are remanded into custody. Good luck to you.

Judge Heene sentenced the defendant in the absence of a plea of guilty or no contest or conviction at trial. The defendant then paid the fine of $589 and was released.

COUNT SEVEN

People v. Howell

On March 24, 1998, Judge Heene presided over a pretrial hearing in the misdemeanor case of People v. Howell. Defendant Howell appeared without an attorney and requested that the public defender be appointed. Howell stated that he had been unemployed since February 1998 and had almost depleted his other resources. The following occurred:

> THE COURT: How do you expect to eat next week?
>
> THE DEFENDANT: I just received an income tax return of one thousand dollars.
>
> THE COURT: Okay.
>
> THE DEFENDANT: And in the meantime I expect to be looking for employment.
>
> THE COURT: Okay. Now we are getting to the real crux of the situation. When was the last time that you filled out an employment application for work?
>
> THE DEFENDANT: That would be prior to my employment with the City of Chino Hills.
>
> THE COURT: Yeah. Okay. I strongly suggest, sir, that (a) you use that tax return money to get an attorney; and (b) that you go out and find a job right away, okay?
>
> THE DEFENDANT: I intend to do that.
>
> THE COURT: The Court will not appoint the Public Defender at this point in time. You are an able-bodied person. You can get a job, okay? There is lot [sic] of jobs out there. I would suggest you go find one. All right. Now based on all of that, you want to go back and talk to the D.A. in earnest about the case?
>
> THE DEFENDANT: Yes, sir.
> THE COURT: Good. Okay.

The case was continued to April 7, when the defendant appeared without an attorney and asked for a continuance. The case was continued until April 28. On April 21, the defendant appeared on a new felony charge and stated that he had not worked for two months. Judge Heene appointed the public defender on both cases.

COUNT EIGHT

People v. Anderson

On May 6, 1998, Judge Heene presided over a probation revocation hearing in the misdemeanor case of People v. Anderson. Defendant Anderson appeared without an attorney. Without advising Anderson of his constitutional rights regarding revocation of probation (e.g., the rights to an attorney, a hearing, and to subpoena and examine witnesses), Judge Heene reinstated and modified the terms of Anderson's probation by adding 30 days to the jail sentence, and remanded him.

COUNT NINE

People v. Aguilar

On May 6, 1998, Judge Heene presided over a probation revocation hearing in the misdemeanor case of People v. Aguilar. Defendant Aguilar appeared without an attorney. Without advising Aguilar of her constitutional rights regarding revocation of probation (e.g., the rights to an attorney, a hearing, and to subpoena and examine witnesses), Judge Heene reinstated and modified the terms of Aguilar's probation by imposing community service hours in lieu of a fine.

* * *

In the "Proposed Disposition" Judge Heene and Trial Counsel also stipulated that the commission may impose discipline for any or all of the allegations in the Notice of Formal Proceedings, not to exceed a public censure.

The "Proposed Disposition" is signed by Judge Heene, his attorney and by Trial Counsel. It is accompanied by an affidavit of consent for discipline signed by Judge Heene admitting the truth of the charges as alleged in the Notice of Formal Proceedings, stating that he freely and voluntarily consents to the imposition of discipline up to and including a public censure, and waiving review by the Supreme Court.

DISCIPLINE

The commission adopts the factual stipulations set forth in the "Proposed Disposition" and finds that in these stipulations Judge Heene has admitted all of the factual allegations set forth in the Notice of Formal Proceedings.

The commission finds that Judge Heene's actions constitute misconduct under article VI, section 18(d) of the California Constitution. His actions on each count violated the Code of Judicial Ethics, canon 1 ("a judge shall uphold the integrity and independence of the judiciary") and canon 2A ("a judge shall respect and comply with the law and shall act at all times in a manner that promotes public confidence in the integrity and impartiality of the judiciary"). In addition, Judge Heene's actions on all the counts, other than count seven, violated several subsections of canon 3B ("a judge shall perform the duties of judicial office impartially and diligently").

The commission, in accepting the "Proposed Disposition," carefully reviewed the Notice of Formal Proceedings and determined that Judge Heene's misconduct does not rise to a level that recommends his removal from office. The commission concludes that public censure is the appropriate disposition for this case. The nine incidents in slightly less than two years are not isolated unrelated incidents of misconduct. In every instance, Judge Heene failed to respect the rights of unrepresented individuals. The "Proposed Disposition" recites no mitigating factors. The commission notes, however, that Judge Heene has not been previously disciplined and that his entry into the "Proposed Disposition" implicitly signals appreciation of his misconduct.

Commission members Justice Daniel Hanlon, Mr. Mike Farrell, Judge Madeleine Flier, Mr. Michael Kahn, Mr. Patrick Kelly, Mrs. Crystal Lui, Judge Rise Jones Pichon, and Ms. Ramona Ripston voted to impose a public censure. Commission members Ms. Lara Bergthold and Ms. Julie Sommars did not participate in this matter. There is one vacancy.

This decision and order shall constitute the order of public censure.

INQUIRY CONCERNING JUDGE W. JACKSON WILLOUGHBY

SUMMARY

A disciplinary matter was brought concerning a superior court judge.

The Commission on Judicial Performance publicly censured the judge. The commission concluded that the judge engaged in a pattern of inappropriate conduct in the workplace toward female employees consisting of (1) the improper and unwanted touching of his bailiff's breasts; (2) staring at and asking to see his bailiff's breasts; (3) making a sexually suggestive comment to a deputy sheriff; and (4) making a crude and derogatory reference about a female deputy district attorney. These activities violated Cal. Code Jud. Ethics, canons 1 and 2A. The judge's touching of his bailiff's breasts as well as his staring at her breasts and asking to see them constituted conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brought the judicial office into disrepute. Public censure, rather than removal from office, was the appropriate sanction. The judge recognized the impropriety of his touching his bailiff's breasts and issued a public apology. Whatever his motive, the judge immediately sought additional information and training on avoiding sexual harassment. The commission could not conclude that the judge's pattern of inappropriate conduct was so continuing or pervasive as to preclude his reformation. (Opinion by Patrick M. Kelly, Commission Member.)

HEADNOTES

(1) Judges § 6—Discipline—Pattern of Sexually Inappropriate Conduct—Female Court Employees.—The judge engaged in a pattern of inappropriate conduct in the workplace toward female court employees consisting of (1) the improper and unwanted touching of his bailiff's breasts; (2) staring at and asking to see his bailiff's breasts; (3) making a sexually suggestive comment to a deputy sheriff; and (4) making a crude and derogatory reference about a female deputy district attorney. These activities violated Cal. Code Jud. Ethics, canons 1 and 2A. The judge was publicly censured for his conduct.

[Cal. Forms of Pleading and Practice (2009) ch. 317, Judges, § 317.85; 2 Witkin, Cal. Procedure (5th ed. 2008) Courts, §§ 55, 56, 73.]

(2) Judges § 6—Violations of Canons—Alcohol in Courtroom.—The judge did not violate the canons by asking his clerk to join him in having an alcoholic drink in the courtroom during business hours when court was not in session and no members of the public were present.

(3) Judges § 6—Prejudicial Conduct—Definition.—Prejudicial conduct by a judge means conduct which a judge undertakes in good faith but which nevertheless would appear to an objective observer to be not only unjudicial conduct but conduct prejudicial to public esteem for the judicial office.

(4) Judges § 6—Willful Misconduct—Elements.—To commit willful misconduct in office, a judge must (1) engage in conduct that is unjudicial and (2) committed in bad faith, (3) while acting in a judicial capacity.

(5) Judges § 6—Wilful Misconduct—Prejudicial Misconduct—Judicial Capacity.—The judge who engaged in a pattern of inappropriate sexual conduct towards female court employees engaged in prejudicial misconduct rather than willful misconduct because the judge was not acting in a judicial capacity, an element of willful misconduct.

(6) Judges § 6—Discipline—Censure or Removal.—Under Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (d), the Commission on Judicial Performance has the authority to censure a judge or remove a judge for action that constitutes willful misconduct in office or conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute.

(7) Judges § 6—Disciplinary Proceedings—Purpose.—The purpose of judicial disciplinary proceedings is not punishment, but rather the protection of the public, the enforcement of rigorous standards of judicial conduct, and the maintenance of public confidence in the integrity and independence of the judicial system. In determining whether to remove a judge from office or to publicly censure a judge, the Commission on Judicial Performance must carefully consider whether the judge's misconduct requires such a severe remedy and whether any lesser discipline would meet these purposes.

(8) Judges § 6—Disciplinary Proceeding—Precedent.—The Commission on Judicial Performance is not bound by precedent in determining the appropriate discipline in judicial disciplinary proceeding. The factual variations are too great to permit meaningful comparison in many instances. Nonetheless, the commission's decision on what discipline to impose should be informed by some comparison with similar cases.

(9) Judges § 6—Discipline—Number of Wrongful Acts Committed.—The number of wrongful acts committed by a judge is relevant to determining whether they were merely isolated occurrences or, instead, part of a course of conduct establishing lack of judicial temperament and inability to perform judicial functions in an evenhanded manner.

(10) Judges § 6—Discipline—Pattern of Inappropriate Sexual Conduct—Female Court Employee.—On the facts as found by the masters, the commission could not conclude that the judge's pattern of inappropriate conduct was so continuing or pervasive as to preclude his reformation. The commission's reluctance to remove the judge should not be construed to suggest that the commission will not in the future remove a judge from office, even for a single act of prejudicial misconduct, where warranted.

KELLY, Commission Member.—This disciplinary matter concerns Judge W. Jackson Willoughby, a judge of the Placer County Superior Court. Judge Willoughby (respondent) was born in 1935. Respondent was appointed to the Placer County Municipal Court in March 1993, and was elevated to the superior court in 1997.

SUMMARY

(1) The commission finds that Judge Willoughby engaged in a pattern of inappropriate conduct in the workplace toward female employees consisting of (1) the improper and unwanted touching of his bailiff's breasts; (2) staring at and asking to see his bailiff's breasts; (3) making a sexually suggestive comment to a deputy sheriff; and (4) making a derogatory reference to a female deputy district attorney. These activities violate the California Code of Judicial Ethics, canons 1 and 2A, as alleged in the second amended notice of formal proceedings. The commission finds that the allegations concerning the judge's court clerk in 1997 and 1998 were not proved by clear and convincing evidence. For the reasons set forth in this decision, the commission publicly censures Judge Willoughby.

PROCEDURAL HISTORY

Formal proceedings in this matter commenced with the filing on March 18, 1999, of a notice of formal proceedings. On March 31, 1999, respondent filed his verified answer. The notice was amended on June 28, 1999, and August 26, 1999, and respondent filed verified answers to the amended notices on July 12, 1999, and August 26, 1999.

As provided for by rule 121(b) of the Rules of the Commission on Judicial Performance, the Supreme Court appointed three special masters to conduct an evidentiary hearing and to prepare a written report. The evidentiary hearing was held in three parts, commencing on September 7, 1999, and concluding on October 18, 1999, before Justice Paul Turner, presiding, of the Court of Appeal, Second Appellate District, Judge Ken M. Kawaichi of the Superior Court of Alameda County, and Judge Marguerite L. Wagner of the Superior Court of San Diego County. The special masters filed their report to the commission on January 3, 2000.

Following the receipt of objections and briefs from respondent and the office of trial counsel, the matter was orally argued before the commission on March 8, 2000, and reargued on May 2, 2000. Mr. Jack Coyle presented argument on behalf of trial counsel and Mr. Michael S. Sands presented argument on behalf of respondent.

FINDINGS OF FACT ON SUSTAINED COUNTS

Paragraph one of count one of the second amended notice of formal proceedings alleged that, from approximately November 1997 through June 1998, respondent engaged in a pattern of inappropriate conduct in the workplace toward female court employees, in violation of the California Code of Judicial Ethics, canons 1, 2A, 3B(4) and 3B(5). The count set forth specific charges concerning five persons.

1. Deputy M___. The notice alleged that, in April 1998, respondent's bailiff, Deputy M___, had breast implant surgery of which respondent was aware and that, following the surgery, respondent frequently stared at her breasts and on more than one occasion asked when he would get to see her breasts. Moreover, it was alleged that on "a Monday in May 1998, in chambers, you rubbed [your bailiff's] breasts. The contact was not consensual."

The bailiff testified that she had worked in law enforcement for 13 years and became respondent's courtroom bailiff in 1995 or 1996. The bailiff explained that she decided to tell respondent about her scheduled breast implant surgery because she would be "off for a period of time" and would not be in uniform for a couple of weeks when she came back. A day or two before the surgery, the bailiff and the clerk met with Judge Willoughby in his chambers and advised him that the bailiff was going to have breast implant surgery. The bailiff testified that they showed respondent a pamphlet, that he asked if it was a safe procedure and told the bailiff that she was sexy just the way she was. The bailiff also testified that she had been losing weight at that time and that respondent had told her how nice she looked. She did not find the remark offensive because everybody was telling her that.

The masters' report sets forth the bailiff's version of the incident as follows: "[She] testified that on either May 4 or May 1, 1998, she went into Judge Willoughby's chambers in order to tell him the parties were ready for court to be called to order. After her breast augmentation surgery, Deputy M___ experienced an infection, which required she take an antibiotic. The infection did not affect her ability to work although she was not in uniform. Judge Willoughby was walking out of the restroom and he said to Deputy M___: 'Come here. Come here.' Deputy M___ testified his tone of voice was such that it sounded as though Judge Willoughby was making an order to her. She testified the following then happened: 'He gave me a hug and told me he hoped that I was feeling better.' The hug lasted for a very brief period of time. Thereupon, according to Deputy M___, Judge Willoughby grabbed her. Judge Willoughby then began to rub both of her breasts. She testified, 'He just open-handedly grabbed both of my breasts and started rubbing.' She described that he was using both hands. She did not know how long Judge Willoughby was rubbing her breasts nor if he said anything. She then walked into the courtroom."

Respondent agreed that he had touched one of his bailiff's breasts but testified that the incident occurred differently. The bailiff developed an infection after the surgery and told respondent that she was experiencing an infection. Respondent testified that some time before the incident, while fully clothed, the bailiff lifted her breast and pointed to the area of the infection. The masters' report summarizes respondent's version of the incident as follows: "[The bailiff], wearing civilian clothing, entered the chambers being used by Judge Willoughby and made a number of complaints about her personal life. Judge Willoughby testified that he tried to comfort her and told her, 'hang in there, it will get better.' Judge Willoughby testified the following occurred: 'Well, we, I hugged her, we hugged each other actually. So I had my arms around her and I was kind of patting her on the back.' Judge Willoughby testified that he then touched one of Deputy M___'s breasts. He testified as follows: 'Well, what happened was probably the biggest mistake of my life. My hands went from holding her and it came around the side and I apparently caressed her left breast for a moment and then when I realized what I'd done, I immediately took my hand away.' He testified his right hand touched her left breast. Judge Willoughby described Deputy M___'s reaction after he withdrew his hand as follows, 'I saw someone whom I thought felt better, was less upset than she was when she came into the chambers . . . [¶] she looked up at me and said, thank you for caring about me.' Judge Willoughby said nothing back to Deputy M___ according to his testimony.

Judge Willoughby described his immediate reaction to the act of touching Deputy M___'s left breast as follows: 'Well, I was utterly humiliated and embarrassed over what I'd done. I guess I was playing ostrich and I kind of put my head in the sand and hoped that it would go away. I think, I believe that if I had been smart enough to apologize right then and there I don't think all of this would have happened. I think she would have accepted that. But I didn't.' "

The masters also note respondent's testimony that, sometime after the incident, he again hugged his bailiff when she was upset about a case involving a defendant who was convicted of driving under the influence of alcohol. He testified that she was crying and he hugged her. He described what occurred during the hug as follows: "Because when it occurred I was conscious of what happened the last time and I wasn't going to let that mistake happen again. So I was very careful when I, when we disengaged from the hug, put my hands at my side and not let them wander."

The masters found that the bailiff's version of what occurred was more credible. They found respondent's recollection of the facts not to be persuasive for a number of reasons including: (1) respondent's claim that he did not act out of a sexual impulse was not credible, and he "offered no credible alternative explanation"; (2) respondent claimed he was humiliated the instant he grabbed his bailiff's breast and that "she thanked him for caring about her after he grabbed her breast," but "[t]here is no credible evidence she was then or ever thankful for being grabbed in the breast area"; (3) there is no merit to respondent's testimony that he did not know the bailiff was on duty when he touched her and that he did not know she was a subordinate; (4) "the argumentative nature of Judge Willoughby's unwillingness to admit that he intentionally touched [the bailiff] is unpersuasive"; and (5) although respondent testified that the bailiff referred to the breast augmentation surgery as a "boob job," every other witness who was asked denied that the bailiff used that phrase.

The masters noted that the bailiff testified that, after she returned from surgery, respondent stared at her breasts and that respondent never denied that after her surgery he would stare at her breasts. Although other witnesses testified that they had not seen respondent look at women's breasts, they had not observed respondent and his bailiff in April and May 1998. The masters concluded that there was "clear and convincing evidence Judge Willoughby stared at Deputy M___'s breasts as she testified."

The masters also found that respondent asked to see the bailiff's breasts, citing her testimony, their lack of confidence in his testimony and his admitted touching of her breast.

2. Deputy Sheriff P___. The notice charges that in approximately April 1998, a bailiff for another judge, Deputy Sheriff P___, was changing her uniform shirt in a hallway in the courthouse when she observed respondent standing nearby staring at her. When she asked if she was in his way, he answered, "I could stand here and watch you undress all day."

The deputy sheriff testified that she was removing her uniform shirt in the hallway in the courthouse where she has a locker. Under her uniform shirt she wore a T-shirt. As she was doing so, she looked up and saw respondent watching her. She asked him if he needed to get by her as she was blocking access through the hall to a bathroom. She testified that respondent answered, "No, I could stand here and watch you all day get undressed." Respondent could not recall such an occurrence. He admitted that if he had said something to the effect of what the deputy sheriff stated it would have been done in a facetious or sarcastic fashion. The masters found that the events happened as the deputy sheriff testified.

3. Deputy District Attorney M___. The notice charges that on at least one occasion respondent, in the presence of his clerk and bailiff, referred to a female deputy district attorney as "Old Iron Tits."

The bailiff and the clerk testified that one day when they were walking with respondent to lunch outside the courthouse, Deputy District Attorney M___ was walking nearby and that respondent mentioned that he called the deputy district attorney "Old Iron Tits." Respondent did not recall the incident but admitted that he probably referred to the attorney in the derogatory fashion alleged. Before the masters, respondent testified that he thought the deputy district attorney did a great job in court and that the nickname did not originate with him, he had heard the phrase at a judges' meeting. When asked by a master, respondent refused to identify the one or more judges who used the phrase. The masters found that respondent made the remark and that it constituted prejudicial conduct.

4. Courtroom Clerk Ms. S___. The notice charges that between approximately March and September 1996, on more than one occasion in the courthouse, respondent "pressed [his] lips together and made a kissing sound directed towards" his former clerk "apparently to thank her for work she had done." It is further alleged that during the same period of time, when the clerk asked if she could work in her office because her presence in court was not necessary, respondent answered, "I just want you to sit there and look pretty."

The former clerk testified that, when she was employed as respondent's law and motion clerk, she lacked the training necessary to handle the long hours and heavy calendar. Accordingly, she asked respondent whether she could leave the courtroom during the law and motion calendar to complete her paperwork in her office. She testified that respondent said, "I just want you to sit there and look pretty." Respondent testified that he did not require his former clerk to be in the courtroom when she was not needed. He did not recall saying anything like "just sit there and look pretty." The masters found that there was "clear and convincing evidence that Judge Willoughby made the statement concerning sitting in the courtroom and looking pretty."

The masters noted that the former clerk testified that respondent would pucker his lips and kiss from afar and that her testimony was essentially uncontradicted. They also noted that respondent's wife testified that he often engaged in the "kissing" motion and in hugging people.

The masters determined that respondent's actions concerning his bailiff, his statement to the deputy sheriff, and his derogatory reference to a deputy district attorney constituted a pattern of inappropriate conduct in the workplace towards female court employees as charged in the second amended notice of formal proceedings.[1] In making this finding, the masters had the benefit of observing the demeanor of the various witnesses, and accordingly their determination is entitled to special weight. (Dodds v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1995) 12 Cal.4th 163, 168 [48 Cal.Rptr.2d 106, 906 P.2d 1260].) The commission has reviewed the record and adopts the masters' finding that respondent engaged in a pattern of inappropriate conduct in the workplace towards female court employees.

FINDINGS OF FACT ON DISMISSED COUNTS

1. Count one. This count also alleged that in November 1997, respondent pressed his "groin area into the buttocks of [his] clerk," while in chambers, and that from approximately 1997 through June 1998 "[he] frequently stared at clerk [M___'s] breasts, while you were in court and elsewhere in the courthouse."

The clerk's testimony supported the allegations and the masters found her to be a credible witness, but they concluded that the allegations were not sustained by clear and convincing evidence. They noted that over time the clerk's testimony had changed. At her deposition in her civil action she stated that the incident with respondent occurred on November 26, 1997, and that she telephoned two friends after the incident. At the hearing, she was no longer sure as to when the incident occurred. Furthermore, her telephone records failed to disclose any telephone calls to her friends on November 26, 1997. The masters noted that the clerk testified that she immediately left work after the incident, but her work records for November 26, 1997, indicate that she did not leave work early.

[1] Respondent properly contends that the allegations concerning his former court clerk cannot be considered part of the pattern of inappropriate conduct because the pattern is alleged in the notice to have existed between November 1997 and June 1998, and the incidents concerning the former court clerk took place in 1996. Nonetheless, as the incidents were charged and fully litigated before the masters, the masters could properly consider the incidents in determining whether respondent had engaged in a subsequent pattern of inappropriate conduct.

The masters also noted that when the clerk first gave a statement to an investigator in the summer of 1998, she had forgotten many of the details of the incident. She stated, "When he went by, rather than just walking, what he did was brush up—basically going groin to fanny. And you could just say that maybe he was just scooting by." In her deposition in the civil action and before the masters, the clerk testified that she was leaning over a chair in chambers when respondent walked up behind her and pressed his groin against her backside, and stayed there for a little while. She stated that "it felt like he was becoming aroused." There was uncontradicted medical and testimonial evidence that this could not have occurred. Furthermore, the clerk's friends were unable to corroborate her details.

The masters noted that while the clerk and respondent's bailiff [Deputy M___] testified that respondent stared at his clerk's breasts, other witnesses who were queried on the subject, including two women whose testimony was otherwise adverse to respondent, denied ever having seen respondent stare at his clerk's breasts or the breasts of other women. The masters found that in light of the conflicting evidence, the examiners had failed to carry the burden of proving the allegation by clear and convincing evidence.

The commission agrees that the allegations concerning the clerk were not sustained by clear and convincing evidence and they are dismissed.[2]

2. Count two. The second amended notice charged that, in August 1997 when the clerk [Ms. M___] was in respondent's courtroom during normal business hours helping respondent prepare for a judicial conference, he "came into the courtroom with a bottle of alcohol and asked her if she wanted to join [him] in a drink. [The clerk] acquiesced and [he] made two alcoholic drinks, one of which [he] drank in the courtroom." The notice alleges that this conduct violated canons 1 and 2A of the California Code of Judicial Ethics.

(2) The masters found that the incident occurred but that there was no violation of any canon. They note that at no time did a member of the public enter the courtroom while the clerk had the drink and that there was no evidence that the drink affected her in connection with her duties. They also note that there was no evidence that offering a drink to the clerk—who was clearly an adult—violated any criminal statute and that there was credible evidence that the historic courthouse had "been used for several activities where alcohol has been served and consumed by state and county dignitaries." There was no evidence of a pattern or practice of using the courthouse for drinking or that respondent ever was under the influence of alcohol while on the bench.

The commission agrees with the masters that the evidence on count two does not support a finding of any violation of the California Code of Judicial Ethics and count two is dismissed.[3]

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

(3) The masters found that respondent's conduct on all the proven factual allegations in count one constituted prejudicial misconduct. In Kennick v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1990) 50 Cal.3d 297, 314 [267 Cal.Rptr. 293, 787 P.2d 591], the California Supreme Court reiterated that prejudicial conduct "means 'conduct which a judge undertakes in good faith but which nevertheless would appear to an objective observer to be not only unjudicial conduct but conduct prejudicial to public esteem for the judicial office.' (Geiler v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications [(1973)] 10 Cal.3d 270, 284 [110 Cal.Rptr. 201, 515 P.2d 1] . . . .)" (See also Broadman v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1998) 18 Cal.4th 1079, 1104 [77 Cal.Rptr.2d 408, 959 P.2d 715].)

(4) Trial counsel suggest that the commission could conclude that respondent's touching of his bailiff's breasts constituted willful misconduct. In Broadman v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 18 Cal.4th at page 1091, the Supreme Court reiterated that to commit willful misconduct in office, "a judge must (1) engage in conduct that is unjudicial and (2) committed in bad faith, (3) while acting in a judicial capacity." Trial counsel opine that the "judicial capacity" element might be met, even though respondent was not acting as a "judge" at the time, by the fact that the touching took place in respondent's chambers. They argue that respondent's judicial work is the only reason that he and the bailiff were in his chambers at the time of the incident.

The commission declines to adopt trial counsel's approach at this time. Such a determination would not enlarge the discipline options available to the commission, as the Constitution allows for the removal of a judge for "conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute" as well as for willful misconduct.[4] Furthermore, the cases cited by trial counsel do not necessarily compel their conclusion.[5]

(5) The commission agrees with the masters that respondent's touching of his bailiff's breasts as well as his staring at her breasts and asking to see them constitute conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute.

The commission also agrees with the masters that Judge Willoughby's statement to the deputy sheriff, his reference to a deputy district attorney as "Old Iron Tits," his command to his former court clerk to "sit there and look pretty," and his making the "kissing motion" toward his former court clerk, Commission on Judicial Performance* (1989) 49 Cal.3d 186, 191 [260 Cal.Rptr. 557, 776 P.2d 259] (The Supreme Court reiterated that prejudicial conduct, although "less grave" than willful misconduct, "may nevertheless, by itself, justify removal."); Geiler v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications, supra, 10 Cal.3d at page 284, footnote 11 ("It should be emphasized that our characterization of one ground for imposing discipline as more or less serious than the other does not imply that in a given case we would regard the ultimate sanction of removal as unjustified solely for 'conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice which brings the judicial office into disrepute.' ").

[5] For example, in Dodds v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 12 Cal.4th at page 172, the Supreme Court stated that a judge is "acting in his judicial capacity," when he or she is performing a "judicial function," i.e. "one of the varied functions generally associated with his position as a judge, whether adjudicative or administrative in nature." The court stated that it gave weight to the location of a judge's conduct and that "when a judge is in chambers during normal working hours, he is generally, though not necessarily, acting in a judicial capacity . . . ." (Ibid.) Nonetheless, the court disagreed with the commission's finding that the judge's failure to report that a fellow judge had let the air out of the tire of a van and his interference with the investigation constituted willful misconduct. The court noted that neither the witnessing of the event nor the interference with the investigation was a function generally associated with the position of judge, and stated that although the judge was "at the courthouse when he met with the detective, that location was simply a convenient meeting place." (12 Cal.4th at p. 175.)

In Ryan v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1988) 45 Cal.3d 518 [247 Cal.Rptr. 378, 754 P.2d 724], the judge was found to have told offensive jokes to female attorneys in chambers on two separate occasions. The court stated that the judge was acting in his "official capacity" when he told a joke to two female attorneys who were in his chambers on a preliminary hearing, but noted in a footnote that it was unclear why the attorneys were present in chambers on the second occasion. (45 Cal.3d at p. 545.)

In Kennick v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 50 Cal.3d 297, the court held that the judge's attempt to have the highway patrolman misplace the paperwork on the judge's driving under the influence arrest was not willful misconduct because the improper request did not take place when the judge was on the bench or in chambers ("took place wholly outside any judicial setting" (50 Cal.3d at p. 319)). The improper request may have constituted willful misconduct if it had been made in chambers, but it does not necessarily follow that every act in chambers is a judicial act.

all constitute conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute.

DISCIPLINE

(6) In 1994 the voters of California amended the California Constitution to give the commission the authority to "censure a judge . . . or remove a judge for action . . . that constitutes willful misconduct in office . . . or conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute." (Art. VI, § 18, subd. (d).)

(7) The Supreme Court has indicated that the purpose of a commission disciplinary proceeding is not punishment, " 'but rather the protection of the public, the enforcement of rigorous standards of judicial conduct, and the maintenance of public confidence in the integrity and independence of the judicial system.' " (Broadman v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 18 Cal.4th at p. 1112, citing Adams v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1995) 10 Cal.4th 866, 912 [42 Cal.Rptr.2d 606, 897 P.2d 544].) In determining whether to remove a judge from office or to publicly censure a judge, the commission must carefully consider whether his or her misconduct requires such a severe remedy and whether any lesser discipline would meet these purposes.

A. Precedent

(8) The Supreme Court has indicated that the commission is not bound by precedent in determining the appropriate discipline in a case. In Broadman v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 18 Cal.4th at page 1112, the court in adopting the commission's recommendation of public censure noted: "According to petitioner, public censure in his case is improper because his misconduct is less egregious than that of judges publicly censured in previous cases. Proportionality review based on discipline imposed in other cases, however, is neither required nor determinative. The factual variations from case to case are simply too great to permit a meaningful comparison in many instances. 'Choosing the proper sanction is an art, not a science, and turns on the facts of the case at bar.' (Furey v. Commission on Judicial Performance [(1987)] 43 Cal.3d [1297,] 1318 [240 Cal.Rptr. 859, 743 P.2d 919].)" Nonetheless, earlier Supreme Court cases suggest that the commission's decision on what discipline to impose should be informed by some comparison with similar cases. (See Kennick v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 50 Cal.3d at pp. 339–340; Dodds v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 12 Cal.4th at pp. 178–179.)

In most instances, as in this case, neither the Supreme Court nor the commission has had any difficulty identifying inappropriate conduct toward women. However, past cases offer less guidance on the appropriate discipline.

The only time the Supreme Court removed a judge from office for sexually offensive activity was its first removal, Geiler v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications, supra, 10 Cal.3d 270. Judge Geiler was removed for numerous inappropriate acts. The court noted: "Petitioner was found to have prodded a deputy public defender with a 'dildo' during a conference in chambers one morning, and later that day to have referred to this incident twice in open court so as to curtail the victim's cross-examination of two witnesses. Petitioner was found to have approached a court commissioner from behind in a public corridor of the hall of justice and to have grabbed this victim's testicles. Petitioner was found on two occasions to have made lustful references to his female clerk, once while in chambers in the presence of a group of professional associates. Petitioner was found to have habitually used vulgar and profane language in his conversations with this clerk, and on two occasions to have used profane terms of personal abuse in reprimanding her and another woman employed by the court. Petitioner was also found to have invited two female attorneys into his chambers wherein he discoursed on the salacious nature of the evidence adduced in criminal cases concerning homosexual acts and rape, punctuating his commentary with profane terms for bodily functions." (10 Cal.3d at p. 277.)[6]

In In re Stevens (1981) 28 Cal.3d 873, 874 [172 Cal.Rptr. 676, 625 P.2d 219], the Supreme Court followed the commission's recommendation and publicly censured Judge Stevens.[7] For a period of over three years the judge had, despite objections, repeatedly initiated conversations with a married couple in which he discussed his sexual experiences and fantasies and proposed that the couple engage in various kinds of sexual activity with him and with other persons, all in explicit, vulgar, and offensive language, all to gratify his own sexual desires.

In Fitch v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1995) 9 Cal.4th 552 [37 Cal.Rptr.2d 581, 887 P.2d 937], the commission recommended that Judge

[6] In addition to this conduct, Judge Geiler was found to have improperly and unlawfully relieved deputy public defenders from representing defendants in eight cases. The court severely criticized Judge Geiler's treatment of the deputy public defenders. "Petitioner's bad faith was directed towards our legal system itself . . . . It is this commitment to institutional justice which petitioner's individual conduct threatens to corrupt. Risk of recurrence of such conduct cannot be tolerated." (Geiler v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications, supra, 10 Cal.3d 270, 286.) Accordingly, it is not a certainty that the court would have removed Judge Geiler if he had only been charged with sexually offensive conduct.

[7] Justice Richardson would have called for further briefing and set the matter for oral argument in order that the court might consider imposition of a more severe sanction.

Fitch be publicly censured for engaging in a pattern of misconduct involving inappropriate and offensive remarks to court staff, court attachés and attorneys, and nonconsensual touchings of women working under his supervision. The Supreme Court publicly censured Judge Fitch finding that he "made offensive remarks to female court reporters or clerks concerning their buttocks, breasts, or legs," "made offensive remarks to female court attachés or attorneys regarding their intimate relationships with their spouses," "made other offensive and crude remarks in the presence of court staff," and on a few isolated occasions, "singled out women working under his supervision for inappropriate and nonconsensual touching, or attempted touching. (E.g., he slapped or patted a court reporter and a court trainee on their buttocks.)" (9 Cal.4th at pp. 556–557.)

In In re Gordon (1996) 13 Cal.4th 472 [53 Cal.Rptr.2d 788, 917 P.2d 627], the commission had found that over an 18-month period of time: "Judge Gordon on several occasions made sexually suggestive remarks to and asked sexually explicit questions of female staff members; referred to a staff member using crude and demeaning names and descriptions and an ethnic slur; referred to a fellow jurist's physical attributes in a demeaning manner; and mailed a sexually suggestive postcard to a staff member addressed to her at the courthouse." (13 Cal.4th at pp. 473–474.) The Supreme Court publicly censured Judge Gordon (as recommended by the commission), noting that none of the conduct occurred while court was in session or the judge was on the bench conducting the business of the court, and that "the actions were taken in an ostensibly joking manner and there was no evidence of intent to cause embarrassment or injury, or to coerce, to vent anger, or to inflict shame . . . ." (13 Cal.4th at p. 474.)

In the last two years the commission has issued two disciplinary decisions concerning inappropriate conduct in the workplace towards female court employees. On October 26, 1998, the commission, pursuant to a unanimous vote, issued a public admonishment of Judge Harvey H. Hiber. It found that, after convincing a woman to become his courtroom clerk in the fall of 1994, Judge Hiber engaged in a pattern of insistent and unwelcome behavior. He wrote to her repeatedly while on vacation, prepared and presented the woman with a "sexual harassment waiver" (which she refused to sign), repeatedly asked her to spend time with him outside of court hours, frequently interrupted her while she was working to discuss nonwork-related matters, on one occasion called her at home, on at least one occasion brought flowers to her home when she was ill, and on one occasion, "he kissed her on the mouth after taking her to her car near the courthouse, for which he apologized." The commission noted in mitigation that Judge Hiber cooperated with the commission and had acknowledged that his actions toward his clerk were inappropriate.

Most recently on January 28, 2000, the commission issued a public admonishment of Judge John B. Gibson for engaging in a pattern of inappropriate conduct in the workplace toward female court employees. Eight separate acts of inappropriate conduct were identified. They included giving a female county employee who had just resigned an unwelcome and unconsented-to full kiss on the lips; wiggling his finger out of his judicial robes in the area of his groin and saying to Ms. Huntsman, the court clerk, "Say hello to Mr. Bobo"; sending Ms. Huntsman a memorandum that contained suggestive sexual references; commenting to Ms. Huntsman that "he really enjoyed seeing [another female employee] walk in the door with her light-colored sweater on and her 46DD bra and her nipples showing"; and commenting to a friend when Ms. Huntsman came into his chambers, "Isn't that the best looking pair of legs and ass you've ever seen?"

In mitigation the commission noted that the masters found that the judge's behavior was for the most part limited to Ms. Huntsman, that she encouraged "a less than professional relationship," and that Judge Gibson recognized that he should not have continued the relationship, as before, after he became a judge.

In deciding to publicly admonish rather than censure Judge Gibson for his "completely unacceptable conduct," the commission noted that it believed:

"[S]everal circumstances mitigate the risk of further violations by Judge Gibson of the sort proved in this matter. First, the vast majority of the incidents involved Ms. Huntsman, with whom Judge Gibson had an unusual relationship. Second, Judge Gibson has recognized his responsibility for his mistakes and has apologized for his actions. Third, the events in question all occurred over six years ago, when Judge Gibson was new to the bench; no subsequent similar conduct has been reported in the interim. Fourth, the commission has before it considerable character evidence attesting to Judge Gibson's exemplary behavior over the last six years. Furthermore, Judge Gibson has already suffered (to use his counsel's words) the 'public humiliation' of the widespread publicity of these embarrassing incidents.

"In addressing charges such as those brought against Judge Gibson by Ms. Huntsman, the commission would ordinarily be concerned that an aggrieved party might face continuing unacceptable conduct or would lack access to remedies other than those provided by the commission."

B. Mitigating considerations

Some of the considerations noted by the commission in its public admonishment of Judge Gibson are relevant to this case. Respondent's most serious misconduct concerned a single employee, his bailiff. Respondent, however, did not have the type of mitigating "unusual relationship" with his bailiff that Judge Gibson had with Ms. Huntsman.

Respondent recognizes the impropriety of his touching his bailiff's breasts and has issued a public apology. Respondent voluntarily resigned as presiding judge and admitted to the touching in his first response to the commission's inquiry. The evidence also shows that respondent of his own volition immediately sought out and attended a course on avoiding sexual harassment. Although respondent did not apologize until a civil lawsuit settled, he explained that this was because he was instructed, from the time that the bailiff told her supervisor of the judge's misconduct, not to have any contact with the bailiff. Judge Willoughby's public apology not only admitted his misconduct, but also praised the bailiff's performance as a bailiff.

Respondent had been a judge for a handful of years at the time of the incidents. He was appointed to the municipal court in 1993 and was elevated to the superior court in 1997. Respondent submitted character evidence and considerable evidence of his contributions to the judicial system. Respondent was involved in the initiation and development of various innovative judicial programs including: the drug court program in Placer County; the Driving Under the Influence Victim Impact Program; the telephone conference call program; the Placer County Domestic Violence Task Force; and the Peer Court (a program designed to assist juvenile offenders).

Respondent has certainly suffered "public humiliation" from the widespread publicity generated by his misconduct. The commission is aware that the filing of a notice of formal proceedings inherently gives rise to some "public humiliation." Respondent's exposure, however, has two unusual features. First, as a result of his misconduct and the investigation generated by his misconduct, respondent has been barred from the courthouse for over twenty months. Second, in the course of these proceedings, respondent felt compelled to reveal several aspects of his private life that should not ordinarily become a matter of public knowledge. Placer County is a relatively small county in terms of population. There can be little doubt that Judge Willoughby's neighbors now know considerably more about Judge Willoughby than Judge Willoughby, and perhaps the neighbors, would like.

In this case, the bailiff availed herself of her civil remedies. She filed a sexual harassment lawsuit against respondent, the county and the State of California. The suit was settled for $165,000. Respondent paid $10,000 from his own funds, his insurer paid $10,000, and the balance of the settlement was paid by the county and the state.[8]

Respondent's recognition of the impropriety of his actions, his public apology, his additional education on sexual harassment and the settlement of the civil lawsuit arguably suggest that there is little likelihood of the bailiff facing continuing unacceptable conduct. The other victims of respondent's prejudicial conduct also do not face continuing improper conduct. Respondent's former courtroom clerk and the former deputy district attorney are not now in Placer County, and the deputy sheriff was, and presumably remains, the bailiff for another judge.

The other cases cited as precedent weigh in favor of discipline in the form of censure or some other form of public reproval. Respondent's conduct—although completely unacceptable—is clearly different from the conduct that led to the Supreme Court's removal of Judge Geiler. Judge Fitch engaged in many more acts of misconduct than respondent did, including the touching of female subordinates, but was censured, not removed. Similarly, Judge Gordon appears to have engaged in many more incidents of misconduct than respondent and was censured, not removed. The Supreme Court noted that Judge Gordon's misdeeds were not committed while the court was in session or the judge was on the bench and that there was "no evidence of intent to cause embarrassment or injury, or to coerce, to vent anger, or to inflict shame." (In re Gordon, supra, 13 Cal.4th at p. 474.) Here, the masters found that respondent's improper touching of his bailiff's breasts was not done in his judicial capacity, and there is no suggestion that respondent ever intended to cause embarrassment, injury or shame.

C. Criteria for removal

As noted, the California Constitution provides that a judge may be removed for conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice. Furthermore, it is settled that for removal the unjudicial conduct need not "amount to moral turpitude, dishonesty or corruption" (Geiler v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications, supra, 10 Cal.3d at p. 287). However, determining whether to remove a judge from office, like choosing any other sanction is an art, not a science. (See Broadman v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 18 Cal.4th at p. 1112.)

(9) A review of the Supreme Court's opinions removing judges from office reveals two common considerations. First, the Supreme Court always noted that the judge who was being removed engaged in numerous acts of misconduct over an extended period of time. Most recently, in Fletcher v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1998) 19 Cal.4th 865, 918 [81 Cal.Rptr.2d 58, 968 P.2d 958], the Supreme Court, in agreeing with the commission's recommendation to remove Judge Fletcher, noted: " 'The number of wrongful acts is relevant to determining whether they were merely isolated occurrences or, instead, part of a course of conduct establishing "lack of temperament and ability to perform judicial functions in an even-handed manner." [Citation.]' (Wenger[ v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1981)] 29 Cal.3d [615,] 653 [175 Cal.Rptr. 420, 630 P.2d 954].) We have determined that petitioner twice committed willful misconduct and committed prejudicial misconduct on multiple occasions. 'Together these incidents reflect a continuing, pervasive pattern of' misconduct. (Kloepfer[ v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1989)] 49 Cal.3d [826,] 849 [264 Cal.Rptr. 100, 782 P.2d 239].) 'Petitioner's lack of judicial temperament is manifest.' [Fn. omitted.] (Kloepfer, supra, at p. 866.)"

[8] The clerk (Ms. M___) also filed a sexual harassment suit against respondent, the county and the state. This suit was settled for $25,000. Respondent declined to participate in the settlement of the clerk's action.

"In concluding that removal is unwarranted in this case, the dissent asserts that petitioner's conduct is less egregious and offensive than that before us in Broadman, where we imposed public censure. (Dis. opn. of Kennard, J., post, at p. 923.) However, Broadman involved only three isolated acts of misconduct. (Broadman, supra, 18 Cal.4th at p. 1112.) By contrast, this case involves a continuing and pervasive pattern of misconduct. . . ." (Fletcher v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 19 Cal.4th at p. 918, fn. 28.)

The Supreme Court has consistently commented on the numerous acts of misconduct. (See Adams v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 10 Cal.4th 866 [Judge Adams was removed from office for engaging "in successive extrajudicial transactions that extended over a significant period of time, creating an appearance of serious impropriety and thereby tending to diminish the public esteem of the judiciary—a consequence petitioner either deliberately ignored or was unable to appreciate." (10 Cal.4th at p. 914.)]; Kloepfer v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 49 Cal.3d 826 [judge removed for a continuing, pervasive pattern of misconduct—four charges of willful misconduct and twenty-one charges of prejudicial conduct]; McCullough v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 49 Cal.3d 186 [Judge McCullough was removed for committing four acts of willful misconduct and one act of persistent failure and because his failure to respond to a prior public censure evidenced a lack of regard for the commission, this court and his obligations as a judge.]; Ryan v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 45 Cal.3d 518 [judge removed for having committed four acts of willful misconduct and fourteen acts of prejudicial conduct]; Furey v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 43 Cal.3d 1297 [judge removed for eight acts of willful misconduct and ten acts of prejudicial conduct]; Gonzalez v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 33 Cal.3d 359 [judge removed for 18 counts of willful misconduct and two counts of prejudicial conduct]; Wenger v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 29 Cal.3d 615 [judge removed for nine counts of willful misconduct and one count of prejudicial conduct]; Cannon v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications (1975) 14 Cal.3d 678 [122 Cal.Rptr. 778, 537 P.2d 898] [judge removed for 21 acts of willful misconduct and eight acts of prejudicial conduct]; Spruance v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications (1975) 13 Cal.3d 778 [119 Cal.Rptr. 841, 532 P.2d 1209] [judge removed for 11 counts of willful misconduct and prejudicial conduct]; and Geiler v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications, supra, 10 Cal.3d 270 [judge removed for six counts of misconduct which included 23 specified acts].)

Second, the court often comments on the judge's failure to appreciate or to admit to the impropriety of his or her acts and that he or she is unlikely to reform. In Fletcher, supra, 19 Cal.4th 865, 919, the Supreme Court noted that "contrary to the contrite tone he sounds in this court, petitioner's primary response to the misconduct allegations during the Commission proceedings was to allege a conspiracy against him." (Ibid.) The court agreed with the commission that Judge Fletcher's conspiracy claims were reminiscent of those that the court had rejected in Gonzalez v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 33 Cal.3d 359.[9] The Supreme Court concluded as to Judge Fletcher that: "[T]he record 'belies petitioner's claim that he has learned from past experience and has modified his courtroom behavior. It demonstrates instead an inability to appreciate the importance of, and conform to, the standards of judicial conduct that are essential if justice is to be meted out in every case.' (Kloepfer, supra, 49 Cal.3d at p. 866, fn. omitted, original italics.) It 'does not suggest that petitioner has, or will be able to, overcome [his demonstrated lack of judicial temperament] and that similar incidents will not recur.' (Ibid.)" (19 Cal.4th at pp. 920–921.)

In Doan v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1995) 11 Cal.4th 294, 339 [45 Cal.Rptr.2d 254, 902 P.2d 272], the Supreme Court removed a judge for willful and prejudicial conduct that displayed moral turpitude, dishonesty and corruption. The court noted, however, that it "would hesitate to remove a judge who showed himself ready, willing, and able to reform under a less severe sanction." (Ibid.) Judge Doan, however, did not learn from her two prior reprovals and private admonishment. The court concluded, "Doan has had three opportunities for reformation. She will have no more." (11 Cal.4th at p. 340.)

[9] The court noted "[i]n the final analysis Judge Gonzalez utterly fails to grasp either the substance or seriousness of the numerous charges levelled against him by the Commission. Despite multiple admonitions and the normal evidentiary limitations of the hearing process, Judge Gonzalez has treated this investigation as an attack on his character." (Gonzalez v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 33 Cal.3d at p. 377.)

In Kennick v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 50 Cal.3d 297, the Supreme Court declined to remove Judge Kennick from office because of misconduct (it did remove him for his persistent failure or inability to perform judicial duties). The court wrote: "Viewed as a whole, petitioner's misconduct does not appear so continuing or pervasive as to preclude his reform. (Cf. Kloepfer v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 49 Cal.3d 826, 866.) Thus, it seems likely that our public censure of each of petitioner's misdeeds would have led him to correct and improve his judicial behavior. (See In re Rasmussen (1987) 43 Cal.3d 536, 538 [236 Cal.Rptr. 152, 734 P.2d 988].) Accordingly, we decline to order him removed from office for willful misconduct or prejudicial conduct." (50 Cal.3d at p. 341.)

D. Application to respondent

Since the advent of the commission, judges have been held to a higher standard of conduct than attorneys. (See Geiler v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications, supra, 10 Cal.3d at p. 287.) Here, Judge Willoughby's conduct, particularly his touching of his bailiff's breasts, is clearly unacceptable. As the masters noted, Judge Willoughby did not need any training on avoiding sexual harassment to know that it was wrong to touch his bailiff's breasts. His conduct seriously undermines confidence in his integrity and the integrity of the judiciary in violation of canons 1 and 2A of the California Code of Judicial Ethics. The public, court staff and other judges deserve to be reassured by the commission that conduct such as Judge Willoughby's touching of his bailiff's breasts is totally unacceptable and will result in serious discipline.

The commission, however, feels constrained by precedent, the criteria for removal used by the Supreme Court, and the mitigating factors in this case to publicly censure respondent rather than remove him from office. Judge Willoughby admits his conduct was clearly wrong. The conduct took place over a two-month period of time in 1998, following his bailiff's breast implant surgery. Indeed, all the proven incidents that constitute the pattern of inappropriate conduct in the workplace toward female court employees took place in the late spring of 1998.[10] Furthermore, whatever his motive, Judge Willoughby immediately sought additional information and training on avoiding sexual harassment. These facts will not allow the commission to conclude that Judge Willoughby will not or cannot correct and improve his behavior.

[10] The comment to the deputy sheriff was made around April 1998. Both the bailiff and the clerk testified that respondent's derogatory comment concerning the deputy district attorney was made in 1998. The portion of the second amended notice of formal proceedings concerning the derogatory comment is accordingly amended to conform to proof. (Rules of Com. on Jud. Performance, rule 128(a).)

In addition, the complaint that initiated this case was the first time that the commission was informed of any allegation of gender discrimination or inappropriate conduct concerning staff by respondent. Although the second amended notice of formal proceedings alleged a second incident of touching, respondent has consistently denied the allegation, the masters found that the allegation was not sustained, and trial counsel characterized the masters' finding as "a very thorough and rational analysis." On the facts as found by the masters, the commission cannot conclude that Judge Willoughby's pattern of inappropriate conduct is so continuing or pervasive as to preclude his reformation.

(10) The commission's reluctance to remove Judge Willoughby from office should not be construed to suggest that the commission will not in the future remove a judge from office, even for a single act of prejudicial conduct, where warranted. Rather, the commission in crafting the appropriate discipline for the particular facts of this case, has determined that one clearly wrongful act, coupled with a minimal number of lesser acts sufficient to constitute a pattern of inappropriate conduct in the workplace toward female court employees, constitutes a most serious violation meriting severe discipline.

Finally, the commission is mindful of the concerns over respondent's return to the bench noted by the presiding judge in his testimony before the masters. The commission must fashion its order of discipline on the basis of the materials presented to it in the formal proceedings guided by the decisions of the Supreme Court and the commission's prior decisions. The commission's decision to publicly censure respondent is not a comment on the presiding judge's past or future actions.

CONCLUSION

The commission orders that Judge W. Jackson Willoughby be censured for engaging in a pattern of inappropriate conduct in the workplace toward female court employees, and in particular for touching his bailiff's breasts.

This decision shall constitute the order of public censure.

Commission members Judge Madeleine I. Flier, Ms. Gayle Gutierrez, Mr. Patrick M. Kelly, Mrs. Crystal Lui, Judge Rise Jones Pichon, and Ms. Ramona Ripston voted in favor of the public censure. Commission members Justice Daniel M. Hanlon, Mr. Michael A. Kahn, Ms. Lara Bergthold, and Mr. Mike Farrell favored the removal of Judge Willoughby from office. There is currently one public member vacancy.

Commission members Justice Hanlon, Michael Kahn, Lara Bergthold and Mike Farrell express the opinion that: It is only by removing judges who behave as Judge Willoughby did that the commission can fulfill its duty to protect the public, enforce rigorous standards of judicial conduct, and maintain public confidence in the integrity of California's judicial system. The commission's prior decisions might suggest to some that a judge should remain on the bench even though he makes inappropriate and offensive remarks to female court employees and touches them without their consent (Fitch v. Commission on Judicial Performance), or that a judge should remain on the bench even though he makes sexually suggestive remarks to female staff members and sends a sexually suggestive postcard to a staff member, addressed to her at the office (In re Gordon). If conduct like Judge Willoughby's can take place in a California courthouse in 1998, it is clear that forms of discipline less severe than removal will not protect the public or enforce rigorous standards of judicial conduct, or maintain public confidence in the integrity of the state's judicial system. Only removal will reassure court employees that reporting conduct like Judge Willoughby's is not a futile exercise. And only removal will reassure the public that California's judges are held to an appropriate standard of conduct and that the state's judiciary is worthy of the respect and trust that is required in a society governed by law.

| INQUIRY CONCERNINGFORMER JUDGE ALFONSO D. HERMO,NO. 160 | NOTICE OF FORMAL PROCEEDINGSandDECISION AND ORDER IMPOSING PUBLIC CENSURE AND BARRING JUDGE HERMO FROM RECEIVING ASSIGNMENTS |

I. NOTICE OF FORMAL PROCEEDINGS

To Alfonso D. Hermo (retired), a judge of the Los Angeles County Municipal Court from April 1, 1968, to March 31, 1998:

Preliminary investigation pursuant to Rules of the Commission on Judicial Performance, rules 109 and 111, having been made, the Commission on Judicial Performance has concluded that formal proceedings should be instituted to inquire into the charges specified against you herein.

By the following allegations, you are charged with willful misconduct in office, conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute, improper action and dereliction of duty within the meaning of article VI, section 18 of the California Constitution providing for removal, censure, or public or private admonishment of a judge or former judge, and providing that a former judge who has been censured may be barred from receiving an assignment, appointment, or reference of work from any California state court, to wit:

On January 21, 1998, you presided in Division One of the Whittier Municipal Court. On that day, defendant Frederico Felix was scheduled to appear in Division One at 9:00 a.m. for arraignment in case number 8WH00327 on a misdemeanor charge of driving on a suspended license (California Vehicle Code, section 14601.2(a)), and on alleged probation violations in four other misdemeanor cases (case numbers 95M04965, 6WH04117, 6WH05063, and 6WH01367). You called the five Felix cases at approximately 9:55 a.m. that day. Mr. Felix failed to appear, and, as a result, you ordered warrants for Mr. Felix's arrest issued in each of the five cases and set bail at $20,000.

At some time during the afternoon on January 21, 1998, Mr. Felix appeared before you in connection with the above-referenced cases. Mr. Felix was without counsel and he conversed with you through a Spanish language interpreter. At that time, you issued an order recalling the arrest warrants, arraigned Mr. Felix, and scheduled a pretrial conference for February 9, 1998. You then told Mr. Felix, "I'm going to set bail in this case, so have a seat over there," pointing toward the jury box. You then ordered bail set at $25,000 and appointed the public defender's office to represent Mr. Felix.

Pursuant to your order, Los Angeles County Sheriff's Deputy, Al Garces, who had been your bailiff for 24 years, directed Mr. Felix to sit in a chair in front of the jury box and next to a door in the courtroom leading to an adjacent holding area. Shortly thereafter, you adjourned the proceedings for the afternoon recess. After the recess was called and after you had left the bench, Mr. Felix ran out of the courtroom. Deputy Garces briefly pursued Mr. Felix and ordered him to stop, but Mr. Felix ran out of the building and avoided capture. Deputy Garces returned to the courtroom and proceeded to your chambers, where he informed you that Mr. Felix had escaped. You responded by ordering that a warrant issue for Mr. Felix's arrest in each of the five pending cases and that bail be set at amounts totaling $175,000. You then wrote a note in one of the Felix case files, on a document labeled "Record of Proceedings in Court," stating, "def[endant] ran out of [the] courtroom."

Deputy Garces did not report Mr. Felix's escape to the sheriff's department. Instead, at approximately 9:30 a.m. the following morning, January 22, 1998, Deputy Garces falsely told his supervisor at the Whittier courthouse that you had ordered Mr. Felix released on his own recognizance. Later that morning, Deputy Garces approached you while you were on the bench and handed you the Felix files. Deputy Garces engaged you in a private conversation, during which the deputy advised you that he would be suspended from the sheriff's department for three weeks without pay for allowing Mr. Felix to escape.

You responded to Deputy Garces' statements during the bench conversation by ordering the recall of the warrants issued for Mr. Felix's arrest, and further ordering that Mr. Felix be released on his own recognizance. You also ordered reinstatement of the February 9, 1998, pretrial conference date. You marked a line through the handwritten notation "B35,000" (shorthand for $35,000 bail) and wrote "OR" (shorthand for own recognizance) on a "Record of Proceedings in Court" form pertaining to the pending Felix cases. On the same form, you also wrote "warrant recalled OR," and marked this entry with your initials, "AH." These entries, while made on January 22, 1998, appear near file date stamps reading, "Jan 21 1998." You directed your courtroom clerk to immediately notify both the district attorney's and public defender's offices that Mr. Felix's status had been changed from bail to own recognizance. Neither Mr. Felix nor his counsel was present in the courtroom during the above-described events on January 22, 1998.

You took these actions to help Deputy Garces avoid being suspended without pay for allowing Mr. Felix to escape. You understood at the time that Deputy Garces was supporting a family and had numerous debts.

On March 17, 1999, a Los Angeles County grand jury indicted you and Deputy Garces in connection with the foregoing events. The indictment charged you and Deputy Garces with one felony count of "conspiracy to obstruct justice or the due administration of the law," in violation of California Penal Code section 182(a)(5). The indictment alleged that on or about January 22,

1998, you and Deputy Garces "did willfully and unlawfully conspire together to obstruct justice, and pervert the due administration of the laws ...." The indictment further alleged that you participated in the conspiracy by means of the following overt acts: you "issued an order recalling the five arrest warrants for escapee Frederico Felix"; "wrongly issued an 'own recognizance' (OR) release for the escaped prisoner Frederico Felix on each of [his] five pending criminal cases"; "wrote 'OR' in each of the five active files for Frederico Felix and signed each entry with [your] initials, 'AH,' without legal cause"; and "failed to perform [your] duty to re-issue arrest warrants for escaped prisoner Frederico Felix."

On November 30, 1999, pursuant to plea agreements with the Los Angeles County District Attorney's Office, you and Deputy Garces each pleaded no contest to aiding and abetting a person's escape after remand to the custody of a sheriff, a violation of Penal Code, section 836.6(a), a misdemeanor. On January 19, 2000, the court suspended imposition of sentence and placed both you and Deputy Garces on two years' informal court probation. Among the terms of probation imposed on you and Deputy Garces were that each of you perform 40 hours of volunteer work and pay a $1,000 fine.

Your conduct on January 22, 1998, violated the California Code of Judicial Ethics, canons 1, 2, and 2A.

YOU ARE HEREBY GIVEN NOTICE, pursuant to Rules of the Commission on Judicial Performance, rule 118, that formal proceedings have been instituted and shall proceed in accordance with Rules of the Commission on Judicial Performance, rules 101-138.

II. DECISION

Judge Alfonso D. Hermo, his attorney, Edward P. George, Jr., and the commission's trial counsel, Jack Coyle, have submitted to the commission a proposed disposition by consent, supported by Judge Hermo's affidavit of consent[1]. Judge Hermo waives filing an answer to the notice of formal proceedings and hearings before the commission and special masters. Judge Hermo stipulates to the truth of all the factual allegations in the notice of formal proceedings. Judge Hermo further stipulates that his actions of January 22, 1998, regarding the Felix cases as set forth in the notice of formal proceedings, constitute willful misconduct in office under article VI, section 18(d) of the California Constitution, and that his conduct warrants a public censure and a bar from receiving assignments.

The commission accepts the stipulation and finds that the factual allegations in the notice of formal proceedings are true. The commission further finds that Judge Hermo's actions of January 22, 1998, regarding the Felix cases as set forth in the notice of formal proceedings, constitute willful misconduct in office under article VI, section 18(d) of the California Constitution. Judge Hermo's conduct was in violation of the California Code of Judicial Ethics, canon 1 ("a judge shall uphold the integrity and independence of the judiciary"), canon 2 (" a judge shall avoid impropriety and the appearance of impropriety in all of the judge's activities"), and canon 2A ("a judge shall respect and comply with the law and shall act at all times in a manner that promotes public confidence in the integrity and impartiality of the judiciary"). Judge Hermo's actions were committed in bad faith: his orders recalling the bench warrants and orders for manufactured, after-the-fact own recognizance releases were without legal authority, creating a misleading record, and were done for the improper purpose of doing a personal favor for his long-time bailiff rather than for the faithful discharge of his judicial duties.

As Judge Hermo has retired from judicial office, he is not subject to removal. However, article VI, section 18(d) of the California Constitution provides that the commission may "censure a ... former judge ... for action ... that constitutes willful misconduct in office ... or conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute ...." Section 18(d) also provides that the commission may "bar a former judge who has been censured from receiving an assignment, appointment, or reference of work from any California state court."

The commission accepts Judge Hermo's stipulation and finds that his conduct warrants a public censure and bar from receiving any assignment, appointment or reference of work from any California state court. In California, and elsewhere, judges have been removed from office for misconduct that included intentionally altering a court record or creating an inaccurate record. See Fletcher v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1998) 19 Cal.4th 865, 886-891 (judge directed a court clerk to alter a minute order that the judge subsequently submitted to the Commission on Judicial Performance in its altered form), Wenger v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1981) 29 Cal.3d 615, 643-645 (judge directed a clerk to backdate a document entitled "Affidavit in Support of Hearing on Contempt"), and In re Sterlinske (Wisc. 1985) 365 N.W.2d 876, 877-878 (judge dictated and signed, more than three months after the conclusion of a criminal trial, a certificate falsely attesting that a conference on proposed jury instructions and on a proposed verdict had been held in his chambers).

The commission orders that former Judge Alfonso D. Hermo be publicly censured, and that he be barred from receiving any assignment or reference from any California state court.

Commission members Mr. Michael A. Kahn, Ms. Lara Bergthold, Judge Madeline I. Flier, Ms. Gayle Gutierrez, Mr. Patrick M. Kelly, Mrs. Crystal Lui, Judge Rise Jones Pichon, Justice Vance W. Raye, and Ms. Ramona Ripston voted to issue the notice of formal proceedings, and to impose this public censure and bar from receiving assignments. Commission member Mr. Mike Farrell did not participate in this matter. There is currently one public member vacancy.

This decision and order shall constitute the order of public censure and bar.

INQUIRY CONCERNING JUDGE PATRICK B. MURPHY

SUMMARY

A disciplinary matter was brought concerning a superior court judge.

The Commission on Judicial Performance concluded that the judge's extensive absences from court from 1996 through 2000 constituted a persistent failure or inability to perform judicial duties. The judge asserted that his numerous absences were the result of illness. However, while he was on sick leave, the judge completed several courses in preparation for applying to medical school abroad and left the country without informing anyone of his whereabouts. The commission concluded that the judge was capable of performing his judicial duties and failed to do so and that the judge engaged in prejudicial misconduct by allowing his nonjudicial activities to interfere with his judicial duties. The commission also concluded that the judge engaged in prejudicial misconduct through his failure to provide documentation of his claimed illness to the presiding judge upon request. The judge engaged in willful misconduct through his malingering and fraudulent use of sick leave.

In its decision, the commission ordered the judge removed from office, but stated that if it was "determined that Judge Murphy has resigned prior to this order of removal, this decision shall be considered a public censure of former Judge Patrick B. Murphy and a bar from receiving any assignment, appointment, or reference of work from any California state court." Subsequent to the issuance of the decision, the commission was informed and confirmed that the judge resigned prior to the order of removal, and resolved, as stated in the minutes of the July 19–20, 2001 meeting, that the decision shall be considered a public censure of the former judge and a bar from receiving any assignment, appointment or reference of work from any California state court. (Opinion by Michael A. Kahn, Chairperson.)

HEADNOTES

(1) Judges § 6.2—Discipline—Grounds—Willful Misconduct—Elements.—To commit willful misconduct in office, a judge must (1) engage in conduct that is unjudicial and (2) committed in bad faith,

(3) while acting in a judicial capacity. A judge acts in bad faith only by (1) performing a judicial act for a corrupt purpose (which is any purpose other than the faithful discharge of judicial duties), or (2) performing a judicial act with knowledge that the act is beyond the judge's lawful judicial power, or (3) performing a judicial act that exceeds the judge's lawful power with a conscious disregard for the limits of the judge's authority.

(2) Judges § 6.2—Discipline—Grounds—Prejudicial Misconduct—Definition.—Prejudicial conduct is distinguishable from willful misconduct in that a judge's acts may constitute prejudicial conduct even if not committed in a judicial capacity, or, if committed in a judicial capacity, not committed in bad faith. Prejudicial conduct is either conduct which a judge undertakes in good faith but which nevertheless would appear to an objective observer to be not only unjudicial conduct but conduct prejudicial to public esteem for the judicial office, or willful misconduct out of office, i.e., unjudicial conduct committed in bad faith by a judge not then acting in a judicial capacity.

(3) Judges § 6—Removal—Persistent Failure or Inability to Perform Judicial Duties.—The judge's extensive absences from court constituted a persistent failure or inability to perform judicial duties for which a judge may be censured or removed from office under Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (d).

(4) Judges § 6—Prejudicial Misconduct—Failure to Give Precedence to Judicial Duties.—The judge engaged in prejudicial misconduct by taking extensive sick leave while applying to medical school and traveling abroad. The judge allowed his nonjudicial activities to interfere with his judicial duties in violation of Cal. Code Jud. Ethics, canons 3A and 4A(3).

(5) Judges § 6—Willful Misconduct—Failure to Cooperate with Presiding Judge—Dishonesty.—The judge committed willful misconduct by making false representations concerning his health to the presiding judge for the purpose of obtaining sick leave.

(6) Judges § 6—Prejudicial Misconduct—Failure to Cooperate with Presiding Judge.—The judge's failure to provide a doctor's note for his sick leave absences as requested by the presiding judge constituted prejudicial misconduct.

(7) Judges § 6.2—Removal—Willful Misconduct—Dishonesty.—Because the judge did not suffer from any illness disabling him from performing his judicial duties during his extensive absences, his falsely obtaining sick leave constituted malingering. This conduct violated Cal. Code Jud. Ethics, canons 1, 2A, 3A, 3C(1) and 4A(3), and constituted willful misconduct. The judge was acting in his judicial capacity in his fraudulent use of sick leave. The judge was motivated by a bad faith intent to remain on the payroll of the State of California as a full-time, sitting judge while avoiding his judicial obligations. His removal was required.

[Cal. Forms of Pleading and Practice (2009) ch. 317, Judges, § 317.85; 2 Witkin, Cal. Procedure (5th ed. 2008) Courts, §§ 55, 56, 57, 58, 76.]

(8) Judges § 6.2—Discipline—Purpose.—The purpose of a judicial disciplinary proceeding is not punishment, but rather the protection of the public, the enforcement of rigorous standards of judicial conduct, and the maintenance of public confidence in the integrity and independence of the judicial system.

(9) Judges § 6.4—Discipline—Proceedings—Determining Appropriate Sanction.—Determining whether to remove a judge from office, like choosing any other sanction, is an art, not a science. Nonetheless, the severity of the misconduct, the duration of the misconduct and evidence of contrition and willingness to reform are relevant to a determination of what discipline to impose. It should be noted, however, that removal may be appropriate even where these factors do not all weigh against the judge.

(10) Judges § 6.2—Discipline—Grounds—Dishonesty.—The public will not, and should not, respect a judicial officer who has been shown to have repeatedly lied for his or her own benefit. Honesty is a minimum qualification that is expected of every judge.

OPINION

KAHN, Chairperson.—This disciplinary matter concerns Judge Patrick B. Murphy, a judge of the Los Angeles County Superior Court. The Commission on Judicial Performance, based on Judge Murphy's absences from court from 1996 through 2000, charged Judge Murphy with persistent failure or inability to perform his judicial duties. Judge Murphy was also charged with failing to give his judicial duties precedence over all other activities and engaging in activities that interfered with the proper performance of his judicial duties, and with exhibiting a lack of candor to his presiding judge and failing to cooperate in the administration of court business. In addition, the commission charged Judge Murphy with malingering in that he "falsely claimed to be ill and/or medically disabled for the purpose of continuing to collect [his] salary without performing [his] judicial duties."

A panel of three justices, sitting as special masters, found that all the charges were supported by clear and convincing evidence. For the reasons set forth in this decision, the commission unanimously adopts the masters' findings of fact and conclusions of law and removes Judge Patrick B. Murphy from the bench.

On May 4, 2001, the commission received a faxed document purporting to be a letter of resignation from Judge Murphy to Governor Davis. Trial counsel informs us that as of the afternoon of May 8, 2001, the governor's judicial appointments secretary indicated that he did not have a letter of resignation from Judge Murphy. Accordingly, the commission believes that it is still within its authority to impose the discipline Judge Murphy merits, his removal from office. If it is determined that Judge Murphy has resigned prior to this order of removal, this decision shall be considered a public censure of former Judge Patrick B. Murphy and a bar from receiving any assignment, appointment, or reference of work from any California state court.*

PROCEDURAL HISTORY

On May 13, 1999, the commission sent Judge Murphy an investigation letter requesting that he respond to allegations of excessive absences. Judge Murphy responded with a letter first alleging that the complaint to the commission was an attempt by his political opponents to manipulate the commission. He then offered numerous medical explanations for his absences including a thyroidectomy, a congenital nonfusion of his spine, degenerative disc disease, cephalgia, sleep deprivation, stress, and "muscular pain, joint pain and abdominal pains" of increasing duration, intensity and frequency. In the course of the letter, Judge Murphy indicated that six different physicians had treated him or given him medical tests.

Judge Murphy was less than forthcoming in providing the commission with access to his medical files and his doctors. The commission was finally able to arrange for an independent medical examiner to examine Judge Murphy in the fall of 1999, resulting in a report dated November 23, 1999.

On January 14, 2000, the commission sent Judge Murphy another investigative letter requesting his response to allegations that he had failed to report for work on 157½ days in 1999.

*Reporter's Note: Subsequent to the issuance of the decision, the commission was informed and confirmed that the judge resigned prior to the order of removal, and ordered that the decision shall be considered a public censure of the former judge and a bar from receiving any assignment, appointment or reference of work from any California state court.

Judge Murphy responded by letter dated February 15, 2000, by counsel, Mr. Edward M. Moses, who complained that he had twice been denied extensions of time to respond to the investigation letter. Mr. Moses represented that he would be Judge Murphy's attorney on an application for permanent disability. He alleged that Judge Murphy had had a "syncopal episode" (a fainting spell) on September 21, 1999, at the courthouse and had been unable to return to work since then. The letter listed three physicians who were said to be of the opinion that Judge Murphy was permanently disabled. Mr. Moses never filed a disability application for Judge Murphy.

On March 3, 2000, the commission commenced formal proceedings against Judge Murphy by filing a notice of formal proceedings alleging that Judge Murphy's extensive absences from court violated the California Code of Judicial Ethics. On April 20, 2000, Judge Murphy, then represented by different counsel, filed a verified answer admitting to some significant periods of absence but otherwise denying all allegations.

The commission also continued its investigation of Judge Murphy and, on March 31, 2000, sent Judge Murphy another investigation letter alleging incidents of lack of candor with the presiding judge and of failures to cooperate with judges and other court officials in the administration of court business. Judge Murphy responded by letter dated May 5, 2000.

On July 7, 2000, the commission sent another investigative letter to Judge Murphy—this time asking him to respond to allegations of teaching evening classes on days when he took sick leave, and testifying at depositions on days that he took sick leave. The letter also alleged that from July 1999 through December 1999, Judge Murphy, while absent on sick leave, took an intense regimen of college science courses that were prerequisites to applying to medical school and applied to medical school. It was further alleged that, on January 1, 2000, Judge Murphy left Los Angeles and traveled to the island of Dominica in the West Indies in order to attend medical school on the island.

Judge Murphy, now proceeding without counsel, twice requested extensions of time in which to respond to the July 7, 2000 investigative letter and never submitted a response. On September 11, 2000, a first amended notice of formal proceedings was filed that, in addition to the allegations of persistent failure or inability to perform judicial duties (count one), set forth specific allegations of failing to give judicial duties precedence over other activities (count two), five incidents of failure to cooperate in the administration of court business (count three), and a charge of malingering by falsely claiming to be medically disabled for the purpose of continuing to collect a judicial salary without performing judicial duties (count four). On October 16, 2000, Judge Murphy filed a verified answer claiming that he suffered a medical condition that rendered him "unable to perform his judicial functions at the relevant times."

In the meantime, on April 21, 2000, in response to the commission's request, the Supreme Court appointed three special masters to hear and take evidence in this matter and to report thereon to the commission.[1] A prehearing conference was held and the evidentiary hearing was scheduled for September 18, 2000, before the masters. Judge Murphy's request for extensions of time and ultimate failure to respond to the July 7, 2000 investigation letter delayed the commission's decision to issue a first amended notice of formal proceedings, and required the cancellation of the scheduled September 18, 2000 hearing.

The commission, while sensitive to providing Judge Murphy with due process, has been concerned that it could not proceed more expeditiously in this case. Although the California Constitution[2] and the commission's rules[3] allow the commission to temporarily disqualify a judge, this requires a determination that continued service "is causing immediate, irreparable, and continuing public harm," and the disqualification would be "without loss of salary." (Rules of Com. on Jud. Performance, rule 120(b).) The commission had no choice but to marshal its evidence for presentation to a panel of special masters.

A second prehearing conference took place by telephone on Tuesday, October 3, 2000, between the masters, Mr. Jack Coyle of the office of trial counsel representing the commission, and Judge Murphy, representing himself. All agreed that the hearing could commence on January 22, 2001, and the commission issued an order noticing the hearing to be held at the Court of Appeal, Fourth Appellate District, Division Two in Riverside, California.

[1] On October 20, 2000, the Supreme Court issued an order noting that one of the initial special masters had withdrawn from the proceedings and appointed another justice to replace him. The special masters who heard the evidence and issued the report are Justice Art W. McKinster, Court of Appeal, Fourth Appellate District, Division Two (presiding special master); Justice Carol A. Corrigan, Court of Appeal, First Appellate District, Division Three; and Justice Betty Ann Richli, Court of Appeal, Fourth Appellate District, Division Two.

[2] Article VI, section 18, subdivision (b) of the California Constitution reads: "The Commission on Judicial Performance may disqualify a judge from acting as a judge, without loss of salary, upon notice of formal proceedings by the commission charging the judge with judicial misconduct or disability."

[3] Rule 120(b) of the Rules of the Commission on Judicial Performance reads, in part: "Before the commission has reached a determination regarding removal or retirement of a judge, the commission may temporarily disqualify a judge without loss of salary upon notice of formal proceedings pursuant to article VI, section 18(b) of the California Constitution if the commission determines that the continued service of the judge is causing immediate, irreparable, and continuing public harm."

The evidentiary hearing commenced on January 22, 2001, and concluded on January 25, 2001. The case in support of the charges was presented by Jack Coyle, Esq., with Valerie Marchant, Esq., and Sei Shimoguchi, Esq. Judge Murphy represented himself. The masters filed their 70-page report with the commission on April 5, 2001.

The parties were immediately sent copies of the masters' report, informed that they could file objections to the report and informed that they could request an opportunity to be heard orally before the commission. Mr. Coyle submitted a timely brief and indicated that he did not request a hearing. Judge Murphy did not tender a brief or otherwise communicate with the commission. The parties were informed on April 26, 2001, that absent objection, the matter would be taken under submission by the commission on May 9, 2001.

FINDINGS OF FACT

Judge Murphy has been a registered nurse since 1977. He enrolled in law school in 1982, worked as a nurse throughout law school, and commenced private practice as a lawyer when he was admitted to the bar in 1984. After several years he became the administrator and corporate counsel of a medical group. He remained in this position until he was elected judge in June 1992.

From 1993 through early 2000, Judge Murphy was assigned to the Citrus Judicial District Municipal Court in West Covina. He presided over a portion of the misdemeanor trial calendar during these years until he was reassigned to a small claims/miscellaneous civil calendar in April 1999.

A. Absences (Count One)

In 1996, Judge Murphy had a subtotal thyroidectomy to remove a benign tumor and began taking Levoxyl to make up for the lost thyroid function. Judge Murphy was also regularly absent during his unsuccessful campaign for superior court judge. Judge Murphy was absent from the court for 77½ days.

In 1997, Judge Murphy was the presiding judge. He missed a total of 66½ work days. Judge Murphy attributed his 29 days of sick leave to colds and flu as well as a congenital nonfusion of his spine (spina bifada occulta), which allegedly caused debilitating back pain. Judge Murphy's physician, Dr. Eshom, when called as a witness by Judge Murphy, testified that he did not think the condition "was causing [Judge Murphy] a problem."

In 1998, the court records show that Judge Murphy was absent for 96 days. Judge Murphy attributed much of his 28 days of sick leave to increasing backaches, neck aches and headaches resulting in insomnia. During the summer, Judge Murphy took over two and one-half months' accumulated vacation time. A month was used for a trip to Ireland with his mother and the rest was spent convalescing.

In 1999, Judge Murphy was absent 159½ days of which 157 days were listed on the court records as "sick" or "sick/personal" days. Judge Murphy was absent two and one-half days in January, six and one-half days in February, and all but one full day and four half days of March. He worked two and one-half days in April and did not return to the bench until July 1, 1999. The court records show no absences for Judge Murphy from then until a half day of vacation on September 16, 1999. Judge Murphy had a fainting spell at the court on September 20, 1999, and was taken to the hospital. He was absent from the court for the rest of the year.

In 2000, Judge Murphy was absent from court until April 3, 2000, when he commenced an assignment in the Los Angeles Metropolitan Court handling traffic matters, one of the least stressful assignments available to judges. Judge Murphy ceased working as of June 8, 2000, and has never returned to the court.

B. Activities That Interfered with the Proper Performance of Judicial Duties (Count Two)

1. From before 1996 through 1998, Judge Murphy taught or co-taught one or two classes a term on weekday evenings at Glendale University College of Law. The classes ran from 6:30 to 9:30 p.m. The masters found that on five days in 1996, on five days in 1997, and on two days in 1998 when Judge Murphy claimed he was too ill to work during the day, he taught or co-taught classes at night.

The masters also found that Judge Murphy taught a one- or two-hour session of the Baldwin Park Police Department's Citizen's Academy during the week of March 22, 1999, on a day that Judge Murphy was absent from work on sick leave.

2. In November 1998, a civil action was filed in a federal court alleging a scheme to hide approximately $1.7 million. Judge Murphy was named as a defendant in the action in April 1999. He was also named as a defendant in a related adversary bankruptcy proceeding. Judge Murphy testified that the cases were subsequently dismissed against him.

The masters found that on five dates in 1999 when Judge Murphy was absent from work on sick leave, he attended and testified at his depositions in these lawsuits.

3. In July 1999, Judge Murphy began formal preparations for applying to Ross University School of Medicine located on the island of Dominica in the West Indies. His preparations included completing classes required for medical school.

He applied for admission to the Cleveland Chiropractic College in Los Angeles and sought and obtained permission to enroll late in Physics I. Judge Murphy completed Physics I and its corresponding lab by the end of August 1999. The class and lab were taught in two five-hour sessions, one on Saturday and one on Sunday, for a total of 10 class hours a week. Judge Murphy had perfect attendance and earned an A in the lecture and the lab while not missing a day in the courtroom.

On September 4, 1999, Judge Murphy enrolled in Physics II and Organic Chemistry I and their corresponding labs. These classes were from 8:00 a.m. to 6:30 p.m. on Saturday and Sunday, for a total of 20 hours of class a week. Although Judge Murphy had a fainting spell on Monday, September 20, 1999, for which he was hospitalized, Judge Murphy attended 20 hours of classes on Saturday, September 25, and Sunday, September 26. At the end of October, Judge Murphy completed the classes with perfect attendance. He earned a B in Physics II lab and an A in Physics II lecture, Organic Chemistry I lecture and Organic Chemistry I lab.

On October 27, 1999, Judge Murphy enrolled in General Chemistry II and Organic Chemistry II and their corresponding labs. One class was taught on Monday and Wednesday evenings in five-hour sessions (5:30–10:30 p.m.) and the other was taught in five-hour sessions on the weekends, for a total of 20 hours of class a week. Judge Murphy completed the classes in mid-December. He missed only one class and earned A's in the classes and the labs.

In November 1999, Judge Murphy completed the College Level Examination Program in biology (known as the "CLEP" test). He earned a score in the 99th percentile. The CLEP test and the science classes at Cleveland Chiropractic were all prerequisites for Judge Murphy's medical school application.

On October 2, 1999, Judge Murphy filed an online application for Ross University. On the application he indicated that he did not have any disabilities that would interfere with the practice of medicine. On November 29, 1999, while on sick leave, Judge Murphy had a one-hour application interview at the Ross University office in Glendale, California. During the interview Judge Murphy was "very upbeat, very articulate, very responsive, very coherent" and his health appeared fine. When the interviewer asked the judge how his health was, he responded by referring only to his thyroid condition, and told the interviewer he had no health problems. Judge Murphy indicated that he was still interested in and active in scuba diving and skiing and stated that he decided to apply to medical school because "medicine was his first love, his first career desire." He requested an expedited response because he "must notify Governor Gray Davis of his intent to resign his judgeship . . . ." Judge Murphy was accepted to medical school the next week for the term commencing on January 5, 2000.

On December 17, 1999, as part of his visa application, Judge Murphy obtained a letter from the Los Angeles County Sheriff's Department to the Chief of Immigration in Dominica attesting to his lack of criminal record and good character. The letter stated, "Judge Murphy will be traveling to Dominica on a vacation."

On December 21, 1999, Judge Murphy obtained a certificate of good health from Dr. Boutros as part of his visa application. He did not obtain the certificate from Dr. Eshom, his treating physician, because he knew Dr. Eshom would not certify that he was in good health. The certificate listed Judge Murphy's thyroid condition as his only medical condition and listed Synthroid as the only medication that Judge Murphy was taking.

On December 27, 1999, Judge Murphy purchased a round trip ticket to Dominica with a departure date of January 1, 2000, and a return date of April 22, 2000 (the last day of classes at Ross University for the spring semester).

On December 30, 1999, Judge Murphy faxed a disability slip signed by Dr. Eshom and dated "12/31" from his house to the court, as he had done on a number of occasions. The slip said, "Continues to be disabled. Unable to work until further evaluation." Judge Treu considered the slip unacceptable because no specific end date had been given. He was unaware that Judge Murphy was about to leave the country.

4. On January 1, 2000, Judge Murphy left for Dominica. He did not resign his judgeship and he did not inform Judge Treu, or any other judge or court employee that he was leaving the country and planned to study medicine. In Dominica, Judge Murphy registered for classes on January 5. Classes began on January 5, and Judge Murphy picked up his picture ID card on January 9.

Judge Murphy returned home on January 14, 2000. Judge Murphy denied knowing of any adverse publicity about his attending medical school in the Caribbean prior to returning home.

C. Incidents of Lack of Candor and Failure to Cooperate in the Administration of Court Business

1. In January 1999, Judge Ralph Michael Treu became the presiding judge of the Citrus Judicial District Municipal Court. Due to Judge Murphy's extended absences for sick leave, Judge Treu kept a log from January 7 to April 27, 1999. Judge Murphy called in sick on January 20, and was not in on January 21. At a meeting with Judge Treu on January 22, Judge Murphy told him that "he may need to take significant time off in the future as directed by his physician." He further stated that he currently had no immune system left, that his thyroid condition of 1995 and 1996 resulted in the removal of a malignant tumor and that his current condition was serious. Judge Treu suggested that Judge Murphy take a less demanding assignment doing a civil overflow/small claims calendar, but Judge Murphy declined the proposal.

Judge Murphy denied characterizing the tumor as malignant. He suggested that he may have indicated that prior to the surgery there was concern that the growth to be removed was malignant, but he maintains he did not tell Judge Treu that the growth that was removed actually was malignant. Judge Murphy noted that he is a nurse and "quite facile with employing medical terms" and he claimed that Judge Treu "misconstrued" what he said because Judge Treu lacked medical training.

The masters concluded that Judge Murphy lied about his condition to induce Judge Treu to grant him additional sick leave, and the commission adopts the masters' finding. The masters noted that Judge Treu testified that prior to taking the bench he had 20 years in private practice focused on plaintiff's tort litigation and medical malpractice. The masters found that Judge Treu had sufficient medical knowledge to understand the difference between a preoperative tentative diagnosis of cancer and a postoperative finding of malignancy. The masters also noted that Judge Treu summarized his conversations with Judge Murphy in a log within 24 hours and that when he testified, Judge Treu was absolutely confident that Judge Murphy told him the tumor was malignant. Finally, the masters contrasted Judge Treu's "clear, compelling, and credible testimony on this and other issues," with their finding that Judge Murphy's testimony "generally lacked credibility."

2. On March 4, 1999, four judges complained to Judge Treu that Judge Murphy's frequent absences required them to cover his misdemeanor calendar. Judge Murphy was again absent on Monday, March 8, but worked on March 9, when he attended a judge's meeting. Judge Treu described the meeting as "acrimonious." Judge Murphy acknowledged that this characterization was correct and attributed his actions to the "frazzled" emotional state he was in as a result of his medical condition. Judge Murphy did not return to work after the March 9, 1999, judges' meeting. He next returned to the court on Friday, March 26, 1999, for another judges' meeting.

On March 26, 1999, Judge Murphy told Judge Treu that he would not be at work the following week because he was undergoing medical tests. Judge Murphy claimed sick leave for the week of March 29, but did not undergo any medical tests. Instead, on Tuesday, March 30, 1999, Judge Murphy appeared and testified at his deposition in the civil action.

When first questioned by the commission about his representation to Judge Treu, Judge Murphy admitted telling Judge Treu that he was having tests and asserted that he could identify what tests occurred if he had his complete medical records. In his verified answer, however, Judge Murphy admitted that he did not undergo any medical tests the week of March 29, 1999, and labeled his conversation with Judge Treu a misunderstanding. He claimed that he told Judge Treu only that he anticipated undergoing medical tests and asserted that since he had an HMO, the tests were performed at a later date. Judge Murphy further stated in his verified answer that Judge Treu "was in the possession of a medical certificate of disability dated March 9, 1999 and signed by Dr. Eshom," and that he did not mention the deposition because he was not thinking about it.

The masters found that Judge Murphy did tell Judge Treu that he would be absent the week of March 29, 1999, for medical tests when he would actually be testifying at his deposition on March 30, 1999, and that the purpose of the lie was to falsely claim sick leave instead of taking personal leave. The commission adopts these findings of the masters. The masters cite Judge Murphy's shifting explanations and note that again Judge Murphy's testimony generally lacked credibility. They also point out that while a doctor's note dated March 9, 1999, for a two-month medical absence does exist in Dr. Eshom's file, "Judge Murphy provided no such note to Judge Treu; Judge Treu did not have such a note, and Judge Murphy did not mention it during their conversation."

3. Judge Murphy was released from the hospital on September 22, 1999, following his fainting spell on September 20. Shortly thereafter, Judge Treu received a short note on one of Dr. Eshom's preprinted prescription pads saying, "No work x 2wks." The masters found that such disability "slips" or "certificates" or doctor's notes, "usually did not come directly from the doctor's office, but were faxed from Judge Murphy's home after normal business hours." Judge Treu received a second disability slip covering the two weeks from October 7 through October 24, a Sunday.

On Thursday, October 21, 1999, Judge Murphy left a message with the judicial secretary saying his doctor had him off for another couple of weeks. No disability slip accompanied the telephone message. The next day, Judge Treu wrote a letter to Judge Murphy acknowledging the communication and requesting a doctor's disability certificate. Although Judge Treu requested a doctor's certificate for the period of time from October 25 through November 16, 1999, in three additional letters, he never received any documentation. Judge Murphy, however, did provide disability slips from Dr. Eshom for the rest of his absences through the end of the year.

The masters note that when first questioned by the commission on this matter, Judge Murphy stated that he did not recall seeing the letters from Judge Treu and speculated that the letters may have been intercepted, destroyed or hidden because he had been living in marital discord. Judge Murphy further indicated that if he had seen the letters he may have told Dr. Eshom to send a note directly to Judge Treu. In his verified answer, Judge Murphy asserted that his phone calls were sufficient because there was no requirement that he provide any doctor's note.

The masters found that Judge Treu's request for medical documentation was justified and that Judge Murphy did not provide any documentation supporting his absences from October 25 through November 16, 1999. The commission adopts the masters' findings.

4. As noted, when Judge Murphy left the country on January 1, 2000, to attend medical school in Dominica, he did not resign his judgeship and he did not inform Judge Treu or any other judge or court employee that he was leaving the country or that he was planning to study medicine or how to contact him.

Judge Murphy contended that he was not obligated to provide the court with this information because he was on sick leave. The masters found that Judge Murphy was obligated to keep the court informed of his whereabouts and that he failed to do so. The commission adopts these findings by the masters. The masters note that Judge Chavez testified that the policy of the Los Angeles County Superior Court was to require judges away from the court to keep the court apprised of their locations and a means to communicate with them. The commission also notes that Judge Murphy testified that he occasionally undertook some judicial functions such as signing warrants while on sick leave.

Judge Murphy also testified that when he left for Dominica he was convinced that he was permanently disabled and that he thought that once his disability application was filed he would no longer be a sitting judge. To the extent that Judge Murphy proffers this as an excuse for his failure to keep the court informed of his whereabouts, his argument is rejected. The masters found that Judge Murphy's "claim that he believed his lawyer would apply for his disability leave is not credible in light of his training and sophistication and in light of the fact that he knew he had signed no such documents." Judge Murphy could not reasonably believe that he was no longer a judge when he left the country for Dominica.

5. On January 3, 2000, the judicial secretary faxed a ballot regarding court unification to Judge Murphy's home. On January 5, 2000, the secretary telephoned Judge Murphy's home and left a message to remind Judge Murphy that he had probable cause duty on Saturday, January 8, 2000. She noted that he could perform this duty at the West Covina Police Department or from his home. On January 7, the secretary left another message asking about the ballot and reminding Judge Murphy to respond as soon as possible about probable cause duty. Judge Murphy was in the West Indies and never returned the phone calls or the ballot. Another judge was assigned to perform Judge Murphy's probable cause duties.

The masters rejected Judge Murphy's argument that he was not obliged to respond because he was sick, and the commission concurs. As noted, Judge Murphy testified that he on occasion performed judicial duties even when on sick leave.

D. Malingering

1. Affirmative evidence that Judge Murphy was not ill.

The masters found that Judge Murphy was not ill in the sense that he was unable to perform his judicial duties. They note seven factors to support their finding that Judge Murphy could have performed his duties most of the time if not all of the days that he called in sick, especially during the long absences in 1999 and 2000.

a. When Judge Murphy did go to work there were no observable signs of illness. Judge Murphy's colleagues at the municipal court uniformly testified that Judge Murphy appeared to be healthy, energetic and positive when at work. There were no indications that he was struggling with any medical conditions. One judge did qualify his testimony by noting that there were times when Judge Murphy appeared to be suffering from normal illnesses such as a cold or the flu, but he continued that otherwise Judge Murphy "is probably the most upbeat and happy-go-lucky type of person I've ever met."

b. There were a number of instances when Judge Murphy was seen out in the community when he was absent from work on sick leave. The reports of these "Murphy sightings" consistently included that Judge Murphy appeared to be healthy.

c. In 1996 and 1997 during the evenings on ten days he was on sick leave, Judge Murphy taught three-hour law school classes. In 1998 he twice taught during the evenings of days he was on sick leave.

d. The masters note that Judge Murphy started taking pre-med classes for medical school in July 1999, after returning to work following his nearly four months of absences. They also note that he returned to work only after being informed that the commission was investigating his absences. After taking 10 hours of classes in July and August, Judge Murphy took 20 hours of classes a week from September through the middle of December, 1999, earning all A's except for one B. He had perfect attendance, except for one absence. He even attended 20 hours of classes on the weekend of September 26, 1999, following his fainting spell on Monday, September 20.

e. On five days in 1999 when he claimed he was ill, Judge Murphy testified at his depositions. The masters note that excluding lunch recesses, these depositions involved three to six and a half hours of deposition time.

f. On November 18, 1999, Judge Murphy took the CLEP test in biology and scored in the top 1 percent. The masters note that Dr. Eshom testified that Judge Murphy's score showed that "he's cognitively able to decipher information."

g. Finally, the masters found that his performance during the hearing before them clearly demonstrated his capacity to serve as a judge. The masters explained: "During the entire four days of hearing, Judge Murphy performed as an experienced and skilled courtroom attorney. He generally showed no weakness, lack of attention, slowness, or misunderstanding. He competently objected to evidence and argued his objections. He conducted cross-examination in discrete segments aimed at making specific points. After the first morning session on the second day, Judge Murphy requested a recess until the next day because he was 'really feeling ill' and did not think that he could continue. His request was denied. Although occasionally thereafter he complained of having a headache, his competent performance and professional demeanor continued unabated."

2. Judge Murphy's evidence that he was ill.

The masters found that Judge Murphy's evidence was less than persuasive. Judge Murphy reported having chronic, severe headaches, neck aches and backaches (partially attributable to a congenital nonfusion of a lumbar vertebra and degenerative disc disease) that prevented him from sleeping more than a couple of hours a night. Judge Murphy represented that he also suffers from chronic fatigue syndrome (CFS) and that this and other illnesses render him physically incapable of serving on the bench. He thought that the genesis of these symptoms was the thyroidectomy. Judge Murphy also claimed that he had a phobic reaction to judicial duties that aggravated his symptoms. He testified that he became frazzled because of these symptoms resulting in his "going off" on his colleagues, such as he did in March 1999 to Judge Treu. Judge Murphy said that he could perform other activities that he perceived as less stressful, including his various extrajudicial activities.

The masters note that part of the weakness of Judge Murphy's "phobia" claim is its evidentiary failings. Only Judge Murphy and Dr. Eshom testified about Judge Murphy's physical and mental condition. Judge Murphy made repeated references to diagnoses and other statements by Dr. McCord, who apparently was his psychiatrist. Judge Murphy, however, chose not to call Dr. McCord and made no representation that he was unable to do so. Furthermore, statements attributed to Dr. McCord and other doctors' hearsay statements were admitted by the masters only for the limited purposes of showing how they affected Dr. Eshom's diagnoses or opinions and of explaining Judge Murphy's subsequent conduct and state of mind.

In his April 23, 1999 letter to Judge Treu, Dr. Eshom represented that Judge Murphy suffered from chronic cephalgia (headache), fibromyalgia (body ache) and fatigue syndrome. At the hearing, under questioning from Judge Murphy, Dr. Eshom acknowledged that there was "no real scientific test that we can order for these diagnoses" and that they were formulated based on symptoms Judge Murphy presented when he came to his office. The April 1999 letter makes no mention of any difficulties stemming from spina bifida or of any judicial phobia.

Although Dr. Eshom in his testimony indicated that he would support Dr. McCord's purported "diagnoses of phobia, panic disorders, anxiety reaction specifically to the court," he did not explain why he would support such a diagnosis. The record concerning the judicial phobia is devoid of any test results allegedly conducted by Dr. McCord or any other supporting documentation. No competent evidence was presented as to the basis for Dr. McCord's alleged conclusions or even of Dr. McCord's background, experience or competence.

Despite Dr. Eshom's belief that Judge Murphy was disabled, some of his testimony indicated that Judge Murphy was not disabled. Dr. Eshom testified that Judge Murphy had not "lost his ability to analyze anything" and that his high score on the CLEP test for biology shows that "he's cognitively able to decipher information." Dr. Eshom acknowledged that there was no difference regarding "physical ability or disability" between "sitting on the judicial bench for five hours or sitting in a classroom for five hours."

Although Judge Murphy claimed that a congenital anomaly in his back caused him pain and cost him sleep, no documentation was presented to support this contention. Dr. Eshom did not mention this condition in his April 23, 1999 letter. At the hearing, Dr. Eshom testified that he was aware of the condition because Judge Murphy had told him about it, but that he did not independently examine Judge Murphy because he didn't think that it was causing Judge Murphy a problem.

Judge Murphy and Dr. Eshom testified about Judge Murphy's elevated levels of Epstein-Barr virus. The tests purportedly showing these elevated levels were not admitted into evidence, so this is unsupported hearsay.[4] In fact, no documentary evidence of Judge Murphy's medical condition was offered or admitted, except Dr. Eshom's April 23, 1999 letter, various disability slips, and Dr. Boutros's health certificate. Accordingly, Judge Murphy's insistence that the Epstein-Barr virus was the "causative agent" of CFS remains an unsupported self-serving assertion.

At the hearing, Judge Murphy elicited from Dr. Eshom an opinion that he did not believe Judge Murphy was malingering. In support of that belief, Judge Murphy cited Dr. Eshom's board certification and experience in emergency room medicine. The masters rejected this perspective noting that "Dr. Eshom's experience with emergency room malingerers in no way

[4] The masters note that although Dr. Eshom testified that moderately high levels of Epstein-Barr virus indicated a chronic debilitating infection, he also indicated that he was not an expert in that field but had read in the literature that there's a correlation of people who have CFS also having elevated Epstein-Barr virus titers. He also recognized that no mechanism had been discovered as to how the virus caused the symptoms.

prepared him for dealing with a malingerer with Judge Murphy's degree of medical sophistication" and that there was no "testimony that the emergency room malingerers were faking fibromyalgia."

The masters further noted that Dr. Eshom's opinions were shown to be suspect because of information Judge Murphy withheld about his nonjudicial activities. Judge Murphy told Dr. Eshom that he was taking some chemistry and physics classes, but he did not say he was taking five-hour classes two nights a week and another five hours each Saturday and Sunday. When Dr. Eshom wrote a disability slip for Judge Murphy following his fainting episode on September 20, Judge Murphy did not inform him that he intended to take 20 hours of classes on the weekend. Although Dr. Eshom refused to acknowledge that this information affected the validity of his diagnoses and disability slips, he did testify that knowledge of these facts would have been "helpful." He also admitted that Judge Murphy, as a registered nurse, should have known this and that Judge Murphy's attendance of 20 hours of classes during the weekends did not sound as if he were disabled.

Dr. Eshom tried to leave open the possibility that Judge Murphy's thyroidectomy might support the existence of his symptoms. In cross-examination, however, he conceded that he monitored Judge Murphy's thyroid condition to keep it "in balance" and "close to normal."

In addition, the evidence concerning Judge Murphy's efforts to obtain a disability retirement undermine his claim of being disabled. Judge Murphy testified that he had intended to resign from the bench in the fall of 1999, but that an attorney acquaintance, Mr. Moses, convinced him that he qualified for a disability retirement. He testified that he did not investigate this matter but relied entirely on the attorney. He testified that when he left the country to go to medical school on January 1, 2000, he believed that his attorney had filed a disability application. The masters, however, found that his belief was not credible. Judge Murphy further testified that when he returned from Dominica he attempted to get the necessary papers from Dr. Eshom to complete the application, but was unsuccessful. There is no explanation as to why a doctor who first stated that Judge Murphy was disabled in April 1999, and was the only witness called by Judge Murphy in the hearing in January 2001, would not issue a report in January 2000. In any event, Judge Murphy testified that he did not actually apply for disability retirement until July 2000, that he received the commission's tentative denial of the application on November 16, 2000, and took no further action on the application.[5] Judge Murphy's initial reliance on his attorney, his failure to actually apply for disability retirement until July 2000 and his acceptance of a tentative denial hardly constitute a robust presentation of his claim.

[5] Policy Declarations of the Commission on Judicial Performance, policy 5.4(6) provides that a tentative denial becomes final 30 days after issuance unless, within 30 days of the tentative denial, the judge files a request to present additional evidence.

3. Judge Murphy's lack of credibility.

The masters listed several specific reasons for finding that Judge Murphy's testimony lacked credibility.

a. The masters first point to the two false answers contained in Judge Murphy's medical certificate for Ross University. On December 21, 1999, Judge Murphy went to Dr. Boutros's office without an appointment and presented him with the health certificate from Ross University. Dr. Boutros filled it out and returned it to Judge Murphy that day. The completed certificate contained two misrepresentations: (1) the only "present medication" listed was Synthroid; and (2) only hypothyroidism was listed in response to the question "condition(s) for which you are being treated."

Judge Murphy testified that he did not go to Dr. Eshom because he knew that Dr. Eshom did not think that he was fit to go to medical school. He also did not go to Dr. McCord, who he claimed to have been seeing regularly for psychiatric treatment.

Judge Murphy had both a personal and medical relationship with Dr. Boutros. Sometime before 1996, Judge Murphy conducted Dr. Boutros's wedding in Dr. Eshom's house. Dr. Eshom and Dr. Boutros became partners, but in 1996, they ended their partnership because Dr. Eshom believed that Dr. Boutros was "very sloppy" and his character left "a lot to be desired." Dr. Eshom never shared his evaluation of Dr. Boutros with Judge Murphy, but Judge Murphy agreed that Dr. Boutros was sloppy.

Dr. Boutros was one of the physicians involved in the diagnosis and treatment of Judge Murphy's thyroid tumor in 1996. After 1996, however, Judge Murphy only saw Dr. Boutros every three or four months for such problems as upper respiratory tract infections and colds. Judge Murphy's medical appointments with Dr. Boutros were only a "minute or two" in duration and perfunctory. On these occasions Dr. Boutros did not ask, and Judge Murphy did not say, what medications he was taking.

Judge Murphy denied responsibility for the falsehoods in the certificate. He claimed he did not know what the certificate said and that Dr. Boutros completed the form. He testified that he didn't keep anything from Dr. Boutros, but Dr. Boutros didn't ask many questions. Judge Murphy also testified that he knew that Dr. Boutros had only limited knowledge of his medical conditions.

The masters found that Judge Murphy knew that if "he did not inform himself about the certificate and directly provide full information to Dr. Boutros, the certificate would inaccurately represent his medical condition and the medications he was taking." They reported that Judge Murphy very much wanted to go to medical school and that he believed that the university might not accept him if they were fully informed of his medical condition and medications. The masters note that Judge Murphy's "apparent indifference to the certificate and Dr. Boutros's answers alone justif[y] an inference of his indifference to truth when it is in his perceived interest," and they continue: "We also go further and find Judge Murphy was responsible for the falsehoods on the certificate to the same extent as if he had himself personally read the certificate and written the false answers. Judge Murphy selected Dr. Boutros precisely because Judge Murphy knew Dr. Boutros would answer the questions falsely. Since Judge Murphy obtained false answers on his certificate, we infer that Judge Murphy's testimony generally lacks credibility."

b. The masters next cite Judge Murphy's contradictory statements to Judge Treu and to Ross University. In January 1999, Judge Murphy told Judge Treu that "he has currently virtually no immune system left, that his thyroid condition of 1995 and 1996 resulted in the removal of a malignant tumor, and that his current condition is serious." The seriousness of Judge Murphy's condition (without the characterization of the tumor as malignant) was reiterated by Judge Murphy's having Dr. Eshom write a letter to Judge Treu on April 23, 1999, stating that Judge Murphy should be considered disabled because in addition to hypothyroidism, he had chronic cephalgia, syncope secondary to chronic cephalgia, chronic fibromyalgia and CFS.

In contrast, at his application interview in November 1999, Judge Murphy represented to the interviewer that he had no health problems other than that he had had thyroid surgery earlier in life and took Synthroid to stimulate his thyroid. Judge Murphy also indicated that scuba diving and skiing were "things he was interested in and was still active in."

c. Third, the masters cite a couple of particular inconsistencies in Judge Murphy's testimony. Judge Murphy claimed that despite his judicial phobia he could perform well as a law professor and as a student of demanding subjects because they were enjoyable. The masters note that Judge Murphy also testified that he loved being a judge. Judge Murphy testified that he could not return to the bench because he could not get a doctor to release him. The record shows, however, that in July 1999, after the commission began its investigation, and in April 2000, following the filing of the notice of formal proceedings, Judge Murphy returned to the bench without any doctor's "release." The masters conclude: "While Judge Murphy appeared to have some kind of excuse for virtually every eventuality, their variety and facility ultimately undermine his credibility. His responses fail under the weight of their own inconsistency and strained ingenuity."

The commission agrees with the masters and adopts their findings that Judge Murphy was not ill in the sense that he was medically unable to perform his judicial duties.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

In this section the commission considers whether Judge Murphy's actions violate sections of the California Code of Judicial Ethics and whether they constitute actions for which discipline may be imposed under article VI, section 18, subdivision (d) of the California Constitution. This section of the Constitution provides that the commission may "censure a judge or former judge or remove a judge for action occurring not more than 6 years prior to the commencement of the judge's current term or of the former judge's last term that constitutes willful misconduct in office, persistent failure or inability to perform the judge's duties, habitual intemperance in the use of intoxicants or drugs, or conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute . . . ."

(1) The Supreme Court in Broadman v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1998) 18 Cal.4th 1079, 1091 [77 Cal.Rptr.2d 408, 959 P.2d 715] reiterated that to commit willful misconduct in office, "a judge must (1) engage in conduct that is unjudicial and (2) committed in bad faith, (3) while acting in a judicial capacity." The court went on to explain that a judge "acts in bad faith only by (1) performing a judicial act for a corrupt purpose (which is any purpose other than the faithful discharge of judicial duties), or (2) performing a judicial act with knowledge that the act is beyond the judge's lawful judicial power, or (3) performing a judicial act that exceeds the judge's lawful power with a conscious disregard for the limits of the judge's authority." (18 Cal.4th at p. 1092.)

294,[] 312 [45 Cal.Rptr.2d 254, 902 P.2d 272], original italics.)" (Broadman v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 18 Cal.4th at pp. 1092–1093.)

(3) Judge Murphy's extensive absences as charged in count one clearly constitute a persistent failure or inability to perform judicial duties, especially since the beginning of 1999. Judge Murphy concedes the extensive absences, but claims he is disabled. The masters, however, concluded, and the commission agrees, that Judge Murphy was not and is not disabled, and that he "has persistently failed to perform his duties as a judge when capable of doing so."

(4) As alleged in count two, Judge Murphy considered his nonjudicial activities more important than his judicial duties and allowed them to interfere with his judicial duties. In doing so Judge Murphy specifically violated California Code of Judicial Ethics canons 3A and 4A(3) as well as the more general canons 1 and 2A.[6] The violations of the California Code of Judicial Ethics constitute incidents of conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute. They are not incidents of willful misconduct because Judge Murphy was not acting in a judicial capacity when he engaged in these activities.

(5) The five incidents of Judge Murphy's failure to cooperate with his presiding judge in the administration of court business alleged in count three violate California Code of Judicial Ethics canon 3C(1) and generally violate canons 1 and 2.[7] Judge Murphy's statement to the presiding judge that the benign thyroid tumor had been malignant constituted willful misconduct because lying to his presiding judge is a violation of the judicial canons, he was acting in his judicial capacity in discussing his assignments with the presiding judge, and his lie was in bad faith for the purpose of falsely obtaining sick leave. Similarly, Judge Murphy's misrepresentation that he would be absent for medical tests the week of March 29, 1999, constituted willful misconduct because he violated the judicial canons, he was acting in his judicial capacity, and his purpose was to falsely obtain sick leave.

(6) Judge Murphy's failure to provide a doctor's note for his sick leave absences from October 25, 1999, through November 16, 1999, constitutes

[6] Canon 1 of the California Code of Judicial Ethics states, "a judge shall uphold the integrity and independence of the judiciary" (capitalization omitted), and canon 2A states, "A judge shall respect and comply with the law and shall act at all times in a manner that promotes public confidence in the integrity and impartiality of the judiciary." Canon 3A states, "[a]ll of the judicial duties prescribed by law shall take precedence over all other activities of every judge." Canon 4A(3) provides that a judge shall conduct all extrajudicial activities so that they do not "interfere with the proper performance of judicial duties."

[7] Canon 3C(1) of the California Code of Judicial Ethics states, "[a] judge shall diligently discharge the judge's administrative responsibilities without bias or prejudice and maintain professional competence in judicial administration, and shall cooperate with other judges and court officials in the administration of court business."

conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute. The masters found, and the commission agrees, that the presiding judge's request for a doctor's note was reasonable, and that in failing to provide a doctor's note Judge Murphy violated judicial canons. Furthermore, the failure was in bad faith as it furthered his scheme—as found by the masters—to falsely obtain sick leave.

Judge Murphy's departure from the country and concomitant failure to keep the court informed of his whereabouts, and his failure to respond to the judicial secretary's inquiry concerning probable cause duty also constitute incidents of conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute. The masters found, and the commission agrees that Judge Murphy's leaving the country to attend medical school without informing anyone of his plans, location or means to communicate with him violated judicial canons. Judge Murphy's failure to respond to the judicial secretary's inquiries as to where he would perform his probable cause duty clearly violates California Code of Judicial Ethics canons 3A, 3C(1) and 4. Even if Judge Murphy did not know of the judicial secretary's inquiries, his inaction was in bad faith because by leaving the country and not informing anyone of his whereabouts he prevented the judicial secretary from contacting him.

(7) As Judge Murphy did not suffer from any illness disabling him from performing his judicial duties during his extensive absences in 1999 and 2000, his falsely obtaining sick leave constitutes malingering as alleged in count four. This conduct violates California Code of Judicial Ethics canons 1, 2A, 3A, C(1) and 4A(3) and constitutes willful misconduct. Judge Murphy was acting in his judicial capacity in his fraudulent use of sick leave. The masters concluded, and the commission agrees, that Judge Murphy was motivated by a bad faith intent of remaining on the payroll of the State of California as a full-time, sitting judge while avoiding his judicial obligations.

DISCIPLINE

(8) The commission is guided by the Supreme Court's reiteration that the purpose of a judicial disciplinary proceeding is not punishment, " 'but rather the protection of the public, the enforcement of rigorous standards of judicial conduct, and the maintenance of public confidence in the integrity and independence of the judicial system.' "[8] The commission finds that these purposes require the removal of Judge Murphy from the bench.

[8] Broadman v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 18 Cal.4th at page 1112, quoting Adams v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1995) 10 Cal.4th 866, 912 [42 Cal.Rptr.2d 606, 897 P.2d 544].

(9) The Supreme Court has observed that determining whether to remove a judge from office, like choosing any other sanction, is an art, not a science.[9] Nonetheless, the commission finds that the court's opinions indicate that the severity of the misconduct, the duration of the misconduct and evidence of contrition and willingness to reform are relevant to a determination of what discipline to impose.[10] It should be noted, however, that removal may be appropriate even where these factors do not all weigh against the judge.[11]

(10) Judge Murphy, in claiming sick leave when he was not disabled and lying to his presiding judge, engaged in willful misconduct that displays moral turpitude and dishonesty. The public will not, and should not, respect a judicial officer who has been shown to have repeatedly lied for his own benefit. The Supreme Court in Kloepfer v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1989) 49 Cal.3d 826, 865 [264 Cal.Rptr. 100, 782 P.2d 239] noted that honesty is a minimum qualification that is expected of every judge. The severity of Judge Murphy's willful misconduct might well in itself require his removal from the bench.

Judge Murphy's misconduct also continued over several years. His cavalier attitude to sick leave manifested itself as early as 1996 when he would teach law school in the evenings on days that he purported to be too ill to sit as a judge. In the spring of 1999, he demonstrated a complete disregard for his judicial duties as well as the impact his absences had on his colleagues and the court. In the fall of 1999, he felt justified in taking intense college level science classes in preparation for medical school while on sick leave. Even after he dropped out of medical school, he did not return to the bench for three months and did not file an application for a disability retirement until July 2000. Thus, the evidence shows that over several years Judge Murphy persisted in a reprehensible course of conduct.

[9] See Broadman v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 18 Cal.4th at page 1112.

[10] See, for example, Doan v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 11 Cal.4th at page 339 in which the Supreme Court removed a judge for willful and prejudicial misconduct that displayed moral turpitude, dishonesty and corruption. In Fletcher v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1998) 19 Cal.4th 865, 918 [81 Cal.Rptr.2d 58, 968 P.2d 958], the Supreme Court noted that the number of wrongful acts is relevant to determining whether they were isolated occurrences or part of an improper course of conduct. In Gonzalez v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1983) 33 Cal.3d 359 [188 Cal.Rptr. 880, 657 P.2d 372], the court noted that the record belied the judge's claim that he learned from past experience. In contrast, in Doan, the court indicated that it would hesitate to remove a judge who demonstrated readiness, willingness and ability to reform under a less severe sanction.

[11] In Geiler v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications (1973) 10 Cal.3d 270, 284, footnote 11 [110 Cal.Rptr. 201, 515 P.2d 1], the Supreme Court while explaining that " 'conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice' " was a less severe charge than "wilful misconduct," noted "[i]t should be emphasized that our characterization of one ground for imposing discipline as more or less serious than the other does not imply that in a given case we would regard the ultimate sanction of removal as unjustified solely for 'conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice which brings the judicial office into disrepute.' "

The record contains little evidence of contrition or willingness to reform. While Judge Murphy admitted that his actions were prejudicial to the administration of justice, he continued to insist on his subjective good faith based on his disabilities. Other than his insistence that he is disabled, Judge Murphy offered no evidence in mitigation. The masters, however, found that Judge Murphy was not disabled and that he had proceeded in bad faith and the commission adopts those findings. Judge Murphy has not filed any objections to the masters' report with the commission. Accordingly, there is nothing before the commission that shows contrition or willingness to reform.

Finally, it should be noted that Judge Murphy was also charged with the persistent failure or inability to perform his judicial duties. The masters found that these charges had been proved and the commission adopts those findings. Judge Murphy testified that his application for a disability retirement had been denied, and he has not indicated that he has any intention of returning to the bench or of renewing his disability application. Accordingly, even if there were not overwhelming evidence of malingering and other willful misconduct as alleged in counts three and four, and of conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice as alleged in count two, the commission would be compelled to remove Judge Murphy from the bench.

CONCLUSION

The commission orders that Judge Patrick B. Murphy of the Los Angeles County Unified Superior Court be hereby removed from the bench* for: (1) malingering by falsely claiming to be ill as charged in count four; (2) willful misconduct and prejudicial misconduct in failing to cooperate in the administration of court business as charged in count three; (3) conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute in giving nonjudicial activities precedence over, and allowing them to interfere with, his judicial duties as charged in count two; and (4) persistent failure to perform his judicial duties as charged in count one. The special masters found that the charges were sustained by clear and convincing evidence and the commission adopts the masters' findings of fact and conclusions of law. The commission concludes that its responsibilities to protect the public, enforce rigorous standards of judicial conduct and maintain public confidence in the integrity of the judiciary dictate that Judge Murphy be removed from office.

*Reporter's Note: Subsequent to the issuance of the decision, the commission was informed and confirmed that the judge resigned prior to the order of removal, and ordered that the decision shall be considered a public censure of the former judge and a bar from receiving any assignment, appointment or reference of work from any California state court.

This decision shall constitute the order of removal of Judge Patrick B. Murphy.

Commission members Mr. Michael A. Kahn, Judge Risë Jones Pichon, Ms. Lara Bergthold, Judge Madeline I. Flier, Mr. Marshall B. Grossman, Ms. Gayle Gutierrez, Mrs. Crystal Lui, and Justice Vance W. Raye, voted in favor of all the findings and conclusions expressed herein and in the removal of Judge Patrick B. Murphy from judicial office. Commission members Mr. Mike Farrell and Ms. Ramona Ripston did not participate in this proceeding. There is currently one public member vacancy.

| Inquiry ConcerningFormer Judge William H. Sullivan, No. 163 | DECISION AND ORDER IMPOSING PUBLIC CENSURE AND BARRING JUDGE SULLIVAN FROM RECEIVING ASSIGNMENTS |

This is a disciplinary matter concerning Judge William H. Sullivan, a judge of the Riverside County Superior Court from November 17, 1987, to December 31, 1999. Formal proceedings having been instituted, this matter came before the Commission on Judicial Performance pursuant to rule 127 of the Rules of the Commission on Judicial Performance.

The commission concludes, based on Judge Sullivan's stipulation, that Judge Sullivan engaged in a pattern of improper financial dealings and fiduciary activities prior to his retirement. The commission hereby publicly censures Judge Sullivan and bars him from receiving an assignment, appointment or reference of work from any California state court.

APPEARANCES

Judge Sullivan is represented by Edward P. George, Jr. Trial Counsel for the Commission on Judicial Performance is Jack Coyle.

PROCEDURAL HISTORY

A Notice of Formal Proceedings was filed on October 29, 2001, charging Judge Sullivan with four counts of unethical conduct. Judge Sullivan filed his verified answer on November 15, 2001. Pursuant to rule 121, the commission requested the appointment of three special masters, and the Supreme Court appointed Justice Norman L. Epstein, presiding, Justice Judith Lynette Haller, and Judge Thomas Pearce Anderle as masters. The masters held a pretrial conference on January 25, 2002, in Los Angeles, and the case was scheduled for an evidentiary hearing commencing on March 25, 2002, in Pasadena.

On March 21, 2002, Judge Sullivan and Trial Counsel submitted a Stipulation for Discipline by Consent pursuant to rule 127 of the Rules of the Commission on Judicial Performance. On the same day, the commission issued an order vacating the hearing date in order that the commission might consider the Stipulation at its May 2002 meeting.

THE STIPULATION FOR DISCIPLINE BY CONSENT

A. Judge Sullivan's Agreement to Discipline

Judge Sullivan and Trial Counsel propose that the commission dispose of this matter by issuing a censure and bar from receiving an assignment, appointment or reference of work from any California state court. Judge Sullivan understands that if the commission accepts the proposal, the commission may articulate the reasons for its decision and he agrees to accept any such explanatory language.

The Stipulation notes that Judge Sullivan is no longer on the bench, having retired effective December 31, 1999.

Judge Sullivan has signed and submitted an affidavit consenting to the sanction of a censure and bar from any assignments, stating that his consent is freely and voluntarily given, admitting to the truth of the charges as alleged, and waiving review by the Supreme Court.

B. The Findings of Fact

The Stipulation for Discipline sets forth the following factual stipulation, which tracks the allegations set forth in the Notice of Formal Proceedings. The commission adopts the following as its findings.

Count One

A. Respondent (Judge Sullivan) became the trustee for the Frances Campbell Living Trust in November 1984. Despite assuming judicial office in November 1987, he continued to act as trustee for the Campbell Trust until September 29, 1995, when he resigned as trustee. Respondent paid himself annual trustee fees throughout this period. (In 1996, after he resigned as Trustee, respondent refunded to the Trust all of his trustee fees.)

B. Between 1990 and 1994, respondent loaned himself $186,000 from the Campbell Trust account at PaineWebber, by writing checks from himself as trustee to himself as an individual. The dates and amounts were as follows:

|---|---|
| April 14, 1990 | $30,000 |
| July 21, 1990 | $11,000 |
| November 20, 1990 | $21,000 |
| January 24, 1991 | $11,000 |
| April 15, 1992 | $ 8,000 |
| July 13, 1992 | $22,000 |
| July 24, 1992 | $28,000 |
| March 8, 1994 | $25,000 |
| March 28, 1994 | $30,000 |

These loans were not authorized by Frances Campbell and were unsecured. Around November 20, 1990, he set an interest rate of 8% for the amounts loaned as of that date. Effective February 20, 1995, he increased the interest rate to 9.25%.

Respondent made sporadic and insufficient payments toward the monies owed, while continuing to loan himself more money. As of approximately mid-1995, he owed the Campbell Trust over $200,000 in principal and interest on these loans. The loans to respondent caused the Campbell Trust account at PaineWebber to incur interest charges. (During the accounting, respondent repaid these loans.)

C. Between 1986 and 1992, inclusive, respondent purchased for the Campbell Trust eight promissory notes secured by land originally purchased from the Johnson Heirs Trust. On several of these promissory notes, the Campbell Trust made payments to the Johnson Heirs Trust, on first deeds of trust assumed by the Campbell Trust.

Respondent made and held these promissory note investments for the Campbell Trust despite a conflict of interest. He had been a trustee of the Johnson Heirs Trust since its formation in 1981. In May 1986, he had also become a beneficiary of the Johnson Heirs Trust, as trustee of the T.H.S. Trust. (Respondent owned a one-third beneficial interest in the T.H.S. Trust, which was a business that invested in promissory notes secured by deeds of trust.) The main asset of the Johnson Heirs Trust was unimproved land near Anza, California, which the trust sold for development. Between approximately 1988 and 1993, inclusive, he purchased from the Johnson Heirs Trust many deeds of trust given for the purchase of trust land, either in his own name as an individual or as trustee of the C.T.S. Trust. (Respondent owned a one-third beneficial interest in the C.T.S. Trust, which was a business that invested in promissory notes secured by deeds of trust.)

D. Despite assuming judicial office in 1987, respondent continued to act as a trustee of the Johnson Heirs Trust until about 1996, when the trust was terminated.

E. One of the promissory notes that respondent purchased for the Campbell Trust was known by the payor name of Richardson. With a check written on the Campbell Trust account, he acquired the Richardson note in his own name as an individual, not as trustee of the Campbell Trust. He continued to hold this note in his own name, and not as trustee, until it was assigned to respondent's successor trustee in 1995.

Between 1989 and 1990, respondent failed to deposit into the Campbell Trust account at least three payments that were made on the Richardson note. In 1994, he failed to deposit into the Campbell Trust account at least two payments that were made on another promissory note that he had purchased for the trust, known by the payor name of Hunt.

F. In June 1989, respondent purchased seven promissory notes from a man named Jess Watkins, who since 1982 had been involved in purchasing and reselling unimproved land originally owned by the Johnson Heirs Trust. At least six of the promissory notes he purchased from Watkins were secured by land originally owned by the Johnson Heirs Trust, including a note known by the payor name of DiNardo.

The total cost of the seven notes was $230,000. The money came from various trusts for which respondent was the trustee; he deposited the funds into his own bank account and obtained a cashier's check for Watkins. The funds included a check for $51,000 to himself from the Campbell Trust account, dated June 12, 1989. Respondent purchased each of the seven notes from Watkins in his own name as an individual, not as a trustee for any trust. He purchased each note at a discount from the face value of the note.

In November 1989, respondent sold the DiNardo note to the Campbell Trust. He had purchased the DiNardo note from Watkins at a 10% discount. He subtracted the face value of the DiNardo note from the $51,000 he had paid to himself from the Campbell Trust account, and paid the Campbell Trust the difference, with a check from his personal account dated November 1, 1989. He retained the difference between the face value of the note and the discounted value he had paid for it in June 1989, which was approximately $3,400. He did not pay the Campbell Trust interest on the trust money that he withdrew in June 1989.

Included in the check from his personal account dated November 1, 1989, was reimbursement to the Campbell Trust for four payments on the DiNardo note that he had deposited into his personal account. He did not pay the Campbell Trust interest on the four payments for the period of time that he retained the monies.

Respondent continued to hold the DiNardo note in his own name, and not as trustee, until it was transferred to his successor trustee in October 1995.

G. In November 1989, respondent sold another one of the seven promissory notes purchased from Watkins to the Follansbee Marital Trust, for which he also was the trustee. (The Follansbees were his in-laws.) This note was known by the payor name of Lollis. The Lollis note was secured by land originally purchased from the Johnson Heirs Trust. The Follansbee Marital Trust had contributed $51,000 to the transaction with Watkins in June 1989. Respondent had purchased the Lollis note at a 10% discount. He subtracted the face value of the Lollis note from the $51,000 contributed by the Follansbee Marital Trust, and paid the Follansbee Marital Trust the difference, with a check from his personal account dated November l, 1989. He retained the difference between the face value of the note and the discounted value he had paid for it in 1989, which was approximately $3,900.

H. An accounting for the Campbell Trust was begun in approximately March 1995, at the request of Frances Campbell. In November 1995, respondent told Ms. Campbell's accountant that he would pay off about $11,000 in loans to himself from the Campbell Trust by paying off the first deed of trust on a note known by the payor name of Hein/Turner. He did so. However, this also benefited respondent and/or the C.T.S. Trust; in 1992, he had purchased the first deed of trust from the Johnson Heirs Trust, as trustee of the C.T.S. Trust.

Count Two

A. In March 1987, before respondent assumed judicial office, he witnessed the will of Olga Bye of Riverside, California. The Bye will contained a provision establishing a 12-year testamentary trust that benefited established charities. The will provided that John Neblett (a former Riverside County Superior Court judge) was to be the trustee, and that respondent had the power to appoint himself as the successor trustee should Neblett be unable or unwilling to act as trustee. The will also provided that respondent was to be the executor should Neblett be unable or unwilling to act as executor.

Respondent assumed judicial office in November 1987. In February 1988, Olga Bye died. In March 1988, the Bye will was admitted to probate in the Riverside County Superior Court.

In December 1988, executor Neblett filed the Bye estate's First and Final Account and Petition for its Settlement. In January 1989, executor Neblett filed the estate inventory. The Bye estate was valued at over one million dollars. Respondent had been managing Bye's financial affairs before her death; her estate included six promissory notes, three of which were secured by land originally purchased from the Johnson Heirs Trust, and one of which, known by the payor name of Teixeira, was originally owned in part by respondent.

Despite his conflict of interest, respondent presided over the Bye probate matter. On January 25, 1989, respondent signed an Order Settling First and Final Account, which approved the accounting for the Bye estate. Respondent's order established the Bye Testamentary Trust, and confirmed his own power to appoint himself as successor trustee to Neblett. On April 28, 1989, respondent signed an amended Order Settling First and Final Account, which also confirmed his power to appoint himself as successor trustee.

Respondent continued to preside over the Bye Trust matter until approximately August 27, 1991, while the Bye Trust was under the supervision of the Riverside County Superior Court and while annual accountings by the trustee were required. During that time, he continued to manage the Bye finances.

B. As described above in Count One (F), in June 1989, respondent purchased seven promissory notes from Jess Watkins, in his own name as an individual, at a discount using money from various trusts for which he acted as trustee. In November 1989, he sold to the Bye Trust two of those promissory notes, known by the payor names of Fletcher and Robinson. Each note was secured by land originally purchased from the Johnson Heirs Trust. Respondent had purchased the Fletcher note at a 15% discount and the Robinson note at a 10% discount. He sold the Fletcher and Robinson notes to the Bye Trust at face value. He retained the difference between the face value and the discounted value he paid, which was approximately $7,400. (This was done by subtracting the face value of the Fletcher and Robinson notes from the 1989 payoff of the Teixeira note owned by the Bye Trust, then depositing the remainder of the Teixeira payoff into the Bye Trust account at PaineWebber.)

In April 1990, respondent reimbursed the Bye Trust for payments made on these notes during the fourth quarter of 1989, which he had deposited in his personal account; he did not include interest. In August 1990, he reimbursed the Bye Trust for payments made on these notes during the first quarter of 1990, which he had deposited in his personal account; he did not include interest. Respondent continued to hold the Fletcher and Robinson notes in his own name, and not as trustee, until they were paid off in 1992 and 1997, respectively.

The 1989 trust accounting, filed by trustee Neblett, reflected the purchase of the Fletcher and Robinson notes and the Teixeira payoff. It did not disclose that the Fletcher and Robinson notes had been purchased from respondent, that they had been acquired by him at a discount and sold by him to the trust at face value, or that respondent continued to hold the notes in his own name as an individual. On June 13, 1990, respondent signed an Order Settling First Account, which approved the 1989 accounting.

The 1990 trust accounting, filed by trustee Neblett, reflected the 1989 and 1990 payments on the Fletcher and Robinson notes that had been paid to the Bye Trust by respondent. It did not disclose that these were reimbursements for payments that respondent had deposited into his own account. It did not disclose that respondent continued to hold the Fletcher and Robinson notes in his own name as an individual. (Nor did any subsequent accounting.) On April 1, 1991, respondent signed an Order Settling Second Account, which approved the 1990 accounting.

Respondent's acquisition of these promissory notes for the Bye Trust, as well as other promissory notes secured by land originally purchased from the Johnson Heirs Trust as described in (D) below, involved a conflict of interest, as set forth in Count One (C).

C. Respondent continued to preside over the Bye Trust matter until approximately August 27, 1991, when Neblett resigned as trustee. Despite having assumed judicial office, on that date, respondent nominated himself as trustee, and began acting as sole trustee. He continued to act as trustee of the Bye Trust through July 30, 1999, when he resigned as trustee. Respondent paid himself annual trustee fees throughout this period. (When respondent resigned as Trustee, he refunded to the Trust all of his trustee fees.)

D. In 1992, respondent sold to the Bye Trust five promissory notes that he owned in his own name as an individual. Each involved land originally purchased from the Johnson Heirs Trust. Respondent sold these notes to the Bye Trust at face value, for a total of approximately $140,000. The price paid to respondent by the Bye Trust, and the 1992 loan of trust funds described below in (E), caused the trust to incur cash expenses to finance its purchases from him.

Respondent filed the verified Bye Trust accounting for the year 1992, as trustee for the Bye Trust. In the accounting, he described these five notes as "seasoned obligations with good payment records." However, one of the notes, known by the payor name of Delgado, had been in default since at least April 1992.

E. The 1992 Bye Trust accounting, in reference to a promissory note known by the payor name of McFall, stated that respondent "purchased a $50,000 promissory note from an individual investor." This statement was misleading. Around March 13, 1992, respondent loaned $50,000 of Bye Trust funds to McFall, for which she executed a promissory note to him for $50,000, secured by a deed of trust to land that she owned. The promissory note set an interest rate of 14% and provided that payments of $1,750 were due quarterly starting on June 15, 1992, with the balance due on June 15, 1995.

Only one $1,750 payment was made on the McFall note, on June 15, 1992. On respondent's handwritten payment ledger, he allocated this payment entirely to interest. At an unknown point, he wrote on the payment ledger, "Interest moratorium to 6/15/95." On December 27, 1993, respondent wrote a $50,000 check on the C.T.S. Trust account to the Bye Trust account to purchase the McFall note; he did not pay to the Bye Trust any of the unpaid interest that had been due to it under the terms of the promissory note from McFall.

Respondent filed the verified Bye Trust accounting for the year 1993. It reflected that the entire principal of the McFall note had been repaid. The accounting was misleading, as it did not disclose that the McFall note had been purchased by the C.T.S. Trust, or that respondent had an ownership interest in the C.T.S. Trust.

F. On April 8, 1994, respondent loaned the C.T.S. Trust $44,500 from the Bye Trust funds. He executed a promissory note that set an interest rate of 8% and provided for quarterly payments, with the balance due in five years. The loan was unsecured.

Respondent filed the verified Bye Trust accounting for the year 1994. In the accounting, he stated that this note was "maintained current and was thereafter repurchased by the CTS Trust on December 31, 1994"; the accounting also stated that he was the trustee of the C.T.S. Trust. These statements were misleading and incomplete. His interest payments on the loan were late, and the accounting did not disclose that he had an ownership interest in the C.T.S. Trust.

G. Between May and July 1994, respondent loaned himself a total of $110,000 from the Bye Trust account. He did so by writing three checks to himself: on May 9, 1994, for $48,000; on May 12, 1994, for $12,000; and on July 12, 1994, for $50,000. At least the first two of these loans were not secured at the time made.

Respondent executed a promissory note dated May 12, 1994, for $60,000 and a promissory note dated July 12, 1994, for the total loan amount of $110,000. The promissory notes set an interest rate of 8% and required quarterly payments, with the balance due in five years. The amount of these loans and the loan described above in (F) caused the trust to incur cash expenses to finance its loans to respondent and/or the C.T.S. Trust.

The $110,000 in loans was eventually secured by the assignment to the Bye Trust of a half interest in a promissory note known by the payor name of Roome. The trust accounting for the year 1994 did not disclose the fact that the Roome note was originally given to respondent by the Roomes for their purchase of a residence owned by him.

The 1994 trust accounting, filed on April 24, 1995, stated that the first two loans (totaling $60,000) were unsecured when made and that the entire obligation was currently secured, but did not state when that occurred. On the document assigning the half interest in the Roome note to the Bye Trust, the date July 12, 1994, is typed next to respondent's signature; however, the signature was notarized on April 5, 1995, and the document was recorded on April 11, 1995.

In the verified Bye Trust accounting respondent filed for the year 1995, he stated that the $110,000 loan had been "satisfied." However, he structured that transaction so as to receive additional cash from the Bye Trust. In August 1995 he increased the trust's interest in the Roome note to 75%, or approximately $163,000, which was about $51,000 greater than the amount then owed his $110,000 loan. Respondent had previously foreclosed on the Delgado deed of trust and taken title to the real property securing the Delgado note, for about $43,000, which was the total amount then due on the note. He subtracted the approximate $43,000 he owed the trust for the Delgado transaction from the approximate $51,000 difference between the increased interest in the Roome note and the amount owing on the $110,000 loan to himself; as a result he took $7,900 in cash from the Bye Trust.

H. Respondent filed the verified Bye Trust accounting for the year 1996. In the accounting, he stated that the note known by the initial payor name of Gregory had been purchased from the Bye Trust by the T.S. Trust, of which he was also trustee. This was misleading, as he did not disclose that he held a one-half beneficial interest in the T.S. Trust, which was a business that invested in promissory notes secured by deeds of trust.

Count Three

On April 7, 1992, while presiding over Conservatorship of Harry Dostal, case No. 59398, respondent signed an order authorizing the sale of the conservatee's home located at 4340 Glenwood Drive in Riverside, California. Despite respondent's conflict of interest, on approximately June 5, 1992, he entered into an agreement to purchase the property and thereafter continued to preside over the Conservatorship of Harry Dostal case.

On June 20, 27 and 29, 1992, a Notice of Intention to Sell Real Property at a private sale on July 3, 1992, was published. On July 9, 1992, the conservator filed a petition for court confirmation of the sale to respondent. On or about July 23, 1992, he entered an order on his own motion, which advanced the date for hearing the conservator's petition for court confirmation of the sale, from August 11, 1992, to July 27, 1992. As a result of his order advancing the confirmation hearing, the notice of the proposed sale required by law was not given, and the opportunity for third parties to appear and make competing bids to purchase the property was reduced or denied.

An order confirming the sale to respondent was signed by another judge on July 27, 1992. He continued to preside over the Dostal case. On May 10, 1993, he signed an order approving the second accounting of the conservator. This included the 1992 sale to respondent of the property located at 4340 Glenwood Drive, Riverside, California. On January 14, 1994, he signed an order approving the third accounting of the conservator. On May 27, 1994, he signed an order of final discharge of the conservator.

Count Four

On respondent's verified Statements of Economic interests required by California Government Code section 87203, in the applicable years, he failed to disclose the following:

A. Trustee fees he received from the Campbell Trust;

B. Trustee fees he received from the Bye Trust;

C. Loans to himself from the Campbell Trust of $186,000 in 1990-1994;

D. Loans to himself from the Bye Trust of $110,000 in 1994; and

E. Interest in the following real properties:

C. Conclusions of Law

The Stipulation for Discipline sets forth the following conclusions concerning misconduct, and the commission adopts them as its own.

Counts One and Two

Respondent was disqualified from presiding over the Bye probate proceeding and the Bye Trust matter. He had managed Bye's financial affairs before her death, had witnessed her will, was serving as the backup executor and the backup trustee, and continued to manage the estate and trust financial affairs after her death.

Presiding under those circumstances constitutes willful misconduct. Respondent was acting in his judicial capacity. He violated the former Code of Judicial Conduct, effective January l, 1975, canon 1 (a judge should uphold integrity and independence of judiciary), canon 2 (a judge should avoid impropriety and the appearance of impropriety in all of the judge's activities), and canon 3C(1) (judges should disqualify themselves in a proceeding in which their disqualification is required by law, or their impartiality might reasonably be questioned). He acted in bad faith because the purpose of his conduct was to benefit himself, and because it was beyond his lawful power to preside over a matter where he so obviously was disqualified.

Respondent's conduct also constitutes a pattern of prejudicial misconduct. He violated the canons of ethics over a significant period of time which was prejudicial to public esteem for the judiciary.

Serving as trustee for the Johnson Heirs Trust, the Campbell Trust and the Bye Trust after taking the bench violated the Code of Judicial Ethics, canon 4E(1) (a judge shall not serve as trustee except for trust of a member of the judge's family), the former Code of Judicial Conduct, effective October 5, 1992, canon 4E(1) (a judge should not serve as trustee except for trust of member of the judge's family), and the former Code of Judicial Conduct, effective January 1, 1975, canon 5D (a judge should not serve as trustee except for trust of member of the judge's family).

Respondent misused trust funds for his own benefit, and committed other serious improprieties in his position as trustee. His conduct violated the most basic fiduciary duties and fundamental ethical obligations, as reflected in present canons 1 and 2 (a judge shall uphold integrity and independence of judiciary, shall avoid impropriety and the appearance of impropriety in all of the judge's activities), and former canons 1 and 2 (a judge should uphold integrity and independence of judiciary, should avoid impropriety and the appearance of impropriety).

Respondent's conduct violated the Code of Judicial Ethics, canon 4A(1) (a judge shall conduct all of his extra judicial activities so that they do not cast reasonable doubt on the judge's capacity to act impartially), the former Code of Judicial Conduct, effective October 5, 1992, canon 4A(1) (a judge should conduct his extra judicial activities so that they do not cast reasonable doubt on the judge’s capacity to act impartially), the Code of Judicial Ethics, canon 4D(1)(a) (a judge shall not engage in financial and business dealings that may reasonably be perceived to exploit the judge's judicial position), and the former Code of Judicial Conduct, effective October 5, 1992, canon 4D(1)(a) (a judge should not engage in financial and business dealings that may reasonably be perceived to exploit the judge's judicial position).

Respondent's conduct also violated the former Code of Judicial Conduct, effective January 1, 1975, canon 5C(1) (judges should refrain from financial and business dealings that tend to reflect adversely on their impartiality, interfere with the proper performance of their judicial duties, exploit their judicial position, or involve them in frequent transactions with lawyers or persons likely to come before the courts on which they serve), canon 5C(3) (judges should manage their investments and other financial interests to minimize the number of cases in which they are disqualified), and canon 5D (judges should not serve as fiduciary if it is likely that as a fiduciary they will be in engaged in proceedings that would ordinarily come before them).

Count Three

Presiding over this matter in connection with the property purchase and thereafter constitutes willful misconduct. Respondent was acting in his judicial capacity. He violated the former Code of Judicial Conduct, effective October 5, 1992, canons l, 2 and 3E (a judge should disqualify himself in a proceeding in which his impartiality might reasonably be questioned, or in a proceeding in which disqualification is required by law), and the former Code of Judicial Conduct, effective January l, 1975, canons l, 2 and 3C(1)/3C(1)(c) (a judge should disqualify himself when required by law, or when his impartiality might reasonably be questioned, including instances where the judge has a financial interest in the subject matter). He acted in bad faith by presiding in a matter where he was so clearly disqualified, and by advancing the hearing date for confirmation of a sale to himself.

Purchasing property from a conservatorship estate over which he was presiding constitutes prejudicial misconduct. It violated the former Code of Judicial Conduct, effective January 1, 1975, canons 1, 2 and 5C(1)/5C(3) (judges should refrain from financial and business dealings that tend to reflect adversely on their impartiality or exploit their judicial position, should manage their investments and other financial interests to minimize the number of cases in which they are disqualified).

Count Four

Respondent's failure to disclose information on his Statements of Economic Interests constitutes willful misconduct. He was required to file the statements only because he was a judge; therefore, he was acting in his judicial capacity when he completed them. (Gov. Code, § 87203; Adams v. Commission on Judicial Performance (Adams II) (1995) 10 Cal.4th 866, 910 [commission's inquiry was directed to respondent because he was a judge, and his reply was required as one of his judicial functions; therefore, judge was acting in judicial capacity in replying to commission inquiry]).

Statements of Economic Interests are filed under penalty of perjury; respondent's omission of information was unjudicial because it violated present and former canons 1 and 2. He acted in bad faith because his purpose was to conceal information.

DISCIPLINE

Judge Sullivan has stipulated, and the commission concludes, that Judge Sullivan engaged in a pattern of improper financial dealings and fiduciary activities from the time he became a judge in 1987 until he decided to retire in 1999, after learning of the commission's investigation. Furthermore, Judge Sullivan, on a number of occasions, used his judicial position to further his unethical schemes, all of which had the effect, if not the design, of benefiting him financially.

On the basis of these findings, the commission concludes that publicly censuring Judge Sullivan and barring him from receiving an assignment, appointment, or reference of work from any California state court – the maximum sanction it may levy against a former judge – is the minimum sanction necessary for "the protection of the public, the enforcement of rigorous standards of judicial conduct, and the maintenance of public confidence in the integrity and independence of the judicial system."[1] The commission would be remiss in its responsibilities if it did not root out, expose and discipline such longstanding financially motivated willful misconduct, regardless of the judge's age or health.

This decision shall constitute the public censure of Judge Sullivan and a bar from Judge Sullivan receiving an assignment, appointment, or reference of work from any California state court.

Commission members Judge Rise Jones Pichon, Justice Vance W. Raye, Ms. Lara Bergthold, Judge Madeleine I. Flier, Mr. Marshall B. Grossman, Mr. Michael A. Kahn, Mrs. Crystal Lui, and Ms. Barbara Schraeger voted to impose this public censure and bar from receiving assignments. Commission members Ms. Gayle Gutierrez, Ms. Ramona Ripston, and Dr. Betty L. Wyman did not participate in this proceeding.

| Inquiry Concerning Judge James I. Aaron,No. 164 | DECISION AND ORDER OF PUBLIC CENSURE AND STIPULATED RETIREMENT |

This is a disciplinary matter concerning Judge James I. Aaron, a judge of the Fresno County Superior Court. Formal proceedings having been instituted, this matter comes before the Commission on Judicial Performance on a Stipulation for Discipline by Consent (the Stipulation)[1] pursuant to rule 127 of the Rules of the Commission on Judicial Performance.

The commission concludes that the conduct admitted in the Stipulation – particularly Judge Aaron's promotion of and participation in a dubious investment scheme, and his avoidance of financial obligations over a lengthy period of time by writing worthless checks, making false promises, making misrepresentations and otherwise engaging in delaying tactics – constitutes, at a minimum, conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute. The commission hereby publicly censures Judge Aaron conditioned on his irrevocable retirement from judicial office within five calendar days of the issuance of this decision and order, as agreed to by Judge Aaron in the Stipulation. Should Judge Aaron fail to immediately retire from judicial office, this order may be withdrawn, formal proceedings may be resumed and Judge Aaron's failure to comply with the condition he proposed in the Stipulation will constitute additional and independent grounds for discipline.

APPEARANCES

Judge Aaron is represented by Jerome Sapiro, Jr., and David A. Sauers of The Sapiro Law Firm in San Francisco, California, and Richard Ewaniszyk of The Hegner Law Firm in Victorville, California. Trial Counsel for the Commission on Judicial Performance is Jack Coyle.

PROCEDURAL HISTORY

A Notice of Formal Proceedings (the Notice) was filed on December 19, 2001 charging Judge Aaron with six counts of unethical conduct. Pursuant to rule 121, the commission requested the appointment of three special masters. The Supreme Court appointed Justice

[1] With the issuance of this decision, the Stipulation is filed and is available to the public.

Gilbert Nares, presiding, of the Court of Appeal, Fourth Appellate District; Judge Dennis G. Cole of the Superior Court of San Bernardino County; and Judge Talmadge R. Jones of the Superior Court of Sacramento County as masters. Judge Aaron filed his verified answer on February 19, 2002, and the masters held a telephonic pre-hearing conference on April 9, 2002.

On June 21, 2002, the commission was alerted to the parties' Stipulation. The signed Stipulation for Discipline by Consent was submitted on June 26, 2002, pursuant to rule 127 of the Rules of the Commission on Judicial Performance.

THE PROPOSED DISCIPLINE

In the Stipulation, the parties request that the commission resolve this matter by issuing a public censure, without a bar to assignment, on the condition that Judge Aaron immediately retire from judicial office. Judge Aaron "agrees to irrevocably retire from judicial office effective no later than five calendar days after the commission issues a conditional order of censure pursuant to this stipulation." The Stipulation further recites that Judge Aaron "stipulates that his failure to comply with the condition that he immediately retire from judicial office will result in withdrawal of the conditional order of censure and resumption of formal proceedings, and will constitute additional and independent grounds for discipline."[2]

The Stipulation represents that Judge Aaron "understands that, if the commission accepts this proposed disposition, the commission's order may articulate the reasons for its decision," and he "agrees to accept any such explanatory language that the commission deems appropriate." Judge Aaron has also signed an affidavit consenting "to a censure and retirement from judicial office" as set forth in the Stipulation, stating that his consent is freely and voluntarily given, admitting to "the truth of the alleged charges as modified by" the Stipulation, and waiving review by the Supreme Court.

THE FACTS

The following facts are based on the Stipulation.[3]

Count One

As alleged in the Notice and agreed to in the Stipulation, in 1998 and 1999, various persons were induced to invest substantial sums of money in an investment scheme involving Westminster Financial Associates, based on promises of safety of capital and extremely large and quick profits. Judge Aaron, despite having reason to believe that the investment scheme was too good to be true, and suspecting that it might not be legitimate, introduced investors to the scheme, vouched for the personal integrity of one of the promoters (Kenneth Roper), lent the prestige of his judicial office to the scheme, and profited financially from the scheme.

[2] The Stipulation concludes with a section on mitigation, which sets forth some of Judge Aaron's accomplishments during 24 years of service on the bench and represents that Judge Aaron is held in high regard in Fresno County. In addition, Judge Aaron assures the commission that "he accepts full responsibility for his conduct and is sincerely remorseful," and that "he is diligently working to pay off his remaining obligations and has kept his house payments current."

In the fall of 1998, attorney David Mugridge appeared before Judge Aaron in drug court on behalf of a client. Immediately following the hearing, Judge Aaron requested that Mugridge meet with him in his chambers. Judge Aaron engaged Mugridge in a discussion concerning Judge Aaron's marital problems and the reactions of members of their church to those problems. Judge Aaron and Mugridge prayed together.

On a subsequent occasion during the fall of 1998, Mugridge again appeared before Judge Aaron on behalf of a criminal defendant. Judge Aaron did not recuse himself or disclose his prior meeting with Mugridge. In the interim between Mugridge's appearances before Judge Aaron, Roper approached Judge Aaron about an investment opportunity that turned out to involve Westminster Financial Associates. At the conclusion of the court hearing, Judge Aaron again met with Mugridge in his chambers. The Stipulation states that:

> While wearing his judicial robe, Judge Aaron told Mugridge that he knew that it was inappropriate for him to solicit money from Mugridge. However, after noting that both he and Mugridge were Christians, Judge Aaron advised Mugridge of what Judge Aaron characterized as an investment opportunity which could help Mugridge meet his financial goals and about which Roper had recently approached Judge Aaron. Judge Aaron described the investment in general terms as he understood them, that it was supposed to be safe and that there was a promise of quick and large returns. Judge Aaron stated that he had told his son and his best friend about it and suggested that Mugridge invest.

At the time of this conversation, Mugridge was a member of the panel maintained by the Fresno County Superior Court for appointments to represent criminal defendants in capital and special circumstances cases. Judge Aaron never appointed Mugridge to a case and did not know at that time that Mugridge received appointments and compensation from the court.

Approximately two weeks later, Mugridge again appeared before Judge Aaron in connection with the same criminal case. Judge Aaron did not recuse himself or disclose his prior meetings in chambers with Mugridge.

Again following the hearing, Judge Aaron requested that Mugridge accompany him into his chambers. While wearing his robe, Judge Aaron urged Mugridge to invest in the Westminster Financial scheme. Judge Aaron told him that "it was such a good opportunity that he had told his son and best friend about it." Subsequently, during the period shortly prior to Thanksgiving 1998, Judge Aaron made telephone calls to Mugridge at his home and office inviting him to come to a meeting of prospective investors and to meet Ken Roper, whom Judge Aaron claimed was a friend and a private banker/investment advisor.

In November and December 1998, Judge Aaron acted as host at a series of meetings attended by Roper and prospective investors. Judge Aaron introduced Roper to his son, Mugridge, and several other potential investors. Some of the meetings took place at a Fresno tobacconist shop to which Judge Aaron arranged access.

At one or more of these meetings, Judge Aaron vouched for Roper "by telling prospective investors that Roper was an investment banker whom he had known for many years through his church." The Stipulation recites that:

> Judge Aaron was present when Roper made affirmative representations of fact to induce individuals to invest in Westminster Financial. These representations included that any principal amount invested would remain safely in an attorney's trust account in a federally insured bank, and that very large returns would be realized very quickly. At the time Roper made these representations, Judge Aaron did not dispute them, despite having no reasonable ground for believing them to be true.

Judge Aaron facilitated the investment by pointing out to prospective investors at one or more of the meetings, and in other conversations that "prospective investors included David Mugridge, whom Judge Aaron identified as an attorney, Judge Aaron's son David Aaron, a friend of David Aaron whom Judge Aaron also identified as an attorney, and other persons whom Judge Aaron represented to be fellow Christians and/or long-time friends or acquaintances of his or of Roper, whom Judge Aaron referred to as his 'Christian friend.'"

Judge Aaron suggested that each person should make sure they were comfortable with the investment and should carefully consider it before investing. However, at one or more of these meetings, Judge Aaron permitted references to himself as a judge and his involvement in the plan. "An objective observer could reasonably have concluded that this encouraged the investment by indicating its soundness." Furthermore, although Judge Aaron did disclose to several of the investors "that he did not have any money to invest but expected to receive a portion of Roper's commission," he did not disclose to at least two of the investors:

1. That Judge Aaron personally was not investing in the scheme;
2. That he had entered into agreements to split commissions and/or fees with others connected with the Westminster Financial scheme, specifically Roper and Debbie Alliji; these agreements included payments to him consisting of a percentage of the dollar amounts of the investments that he procured; or
3. That he would be entitled to a percentage of any profits realized by the investors.

These persons, in deciding to invest, relied at least in part on Judge Aaron's nondisclosures. "An objective observer could reasonably have concluded that Judge Aaron's non-disclosures of these material facts facilitated the investment."

In December 1998, at one of the promotional meetings attended by Judge Aaron, it was agreed that Mugridge was the appropriate person to receive and hold the actual investment funds prior to transmitting them to a designated recipient on behalf of Westminster Financial. Accordingly, in December 1998, Mugridge executed certain documents, received investment funds from the other investors, and wire-transferred approximately $197,000 of the Fresno investors' funds "to an account maintained in Chicago by one of the principals in the scheme, James Baczynski."

In February 1999, all of the Fresno investors had been repaid their initial investment. Mugridge sent a letter to the investors indicating that he was hopeful that their profits would be received very soon.

In approximately April 1999, Judge Aaron received a payment of $20,000 from Debbie Alliji, one of the principals in the Westminster Financial scheme. "Judge Aaron accepted this money even though he knew that the Fresno investors had not received any of the profits they had been promised on their investments." Judge Aaron has continued to retain the $20,000, "despite knowing that Alliji, Roper and Baczynski have all been convicted at trial of or pled guilty to federal criminal offenses, and have been sentenced to lengthy prison terms for their roles in Westminster Financial, described by United States District Judge Oliver Wanger who presided over the trial as a 'classic Ponzi scheme.'"

Judge Aaron's conduct violated canons 1, 2A, 2B(2), 4A(2) and 4D(1) of the Code of Judicial Ethics. Judge Aaron, by participating "in an investment scheme that he suspected might not be legitimate, and which turned out to be fraudulent, and by keeping the money he received" from the scheme, violated canons 1 (failing to observe high standards of conduct to preserve the integrity and independence of the judiciary), 2A (failing to act in a manner that promotes public confidence in the integrity of the judiciary), and 4A(2) (conducting extrajudicial activities that demean the judicial office). Judge Aaron violated canon 2B(2) by lending the prestige of his judicial office to advance his own pecuniary interests and the pecuniary interests of others. Judge Aaron violated canon 4D(1) by engaging in a deal that "may reasonably be perceived to exploit the judge's judicial position," and by involving himself in a continuing business relationship with an attorney who frequently appeared before other judges in the Fresno County Superior Court.

Judge Aaron violated canon 3E of the Code of Judicial Ethics by failing to disclose, on the record, in the case involving David Mugridge, his meetings with and relationship with Mugridge.

Count Two

Judge Aaron's involvement with the Westminster Financial investment scheme included telling some investors that he believed their profits would be forthcoming and otherwise discouraging them from complaining to government authorities.

When the promised profits were not forthcoming in late-December 1998 or January 1999, Judge Aaron and Mugridge telephoned Roper, Baczynski and Alliji and had at least one meeting with Roper. The Fresno investors were repaid their initial investment in February 1999. Judge Aaron and Mugridge continued their efforts to obtain the promised profits. They made numerous telephone calls to the principals, and Mugridge and Judge Aaron met on at least one occasion in Judge Aaron's chambers where they compared notes and discussed their options.

On April 28, 1999, Mugridge wrote a letter to the Fresno investors in which he indicated that Roper had not been "completely forthright" in his dealings with them, that Roper had missed a deadline to pay investors their profit, and that he did not know whether Roper and Alliji were "crooks or simply incompetent." Mugridge's letter also stated that Judge Aaron said that Alliji had paid him a portion of his finder's fee. Subsequently, Judge Aaron received a telephone call from Roper. Judge Aaron then called Mugridge. Judge Aaron told him that Roper was very displeased by statements made by Mugridge and that Roper "wanted to assault or beat up Mugridge." Judge Aaron told Mugridge that he just wanted Mugridge to know of Roper's threat. Mugridge feared for his personal safety as a result of Roper's threat.

Starting in April 1999, Mugridge had increasing difficulty communicating directly with either Roper or Alliji, and Judge Aaron became the primary contact and conduit for information concerning Westminster Financial. "Judge Aaron repeatedly told Mugridge that, based on numerous assurances he received from Roper, Baczynski and/or Alliji, he believed payment was forthcoming, and he counseled Mugridge to be patient. At the time, Judge Aaron still suspected the investment might not be legitimate."

In October 1998, Alliji was indicted for activities in connection with an investment scheme in the Sacramento area, which was similar to the Westminster Financial scheme. Judge Aaron was aware of the indictment by June 1999.

In approximately June 1999, Judge Aaron learned that the federal authorities, including the Internal Revenue Service and the United States Attorney, were conducting a criminal investigation concerning Westminster Financial. Judge Aaron initiated contact and was interviewed by representatives of those agencies. On their behalf, Judge Aaron made clandestine recordings, "by means of a wiretap on his chambers telephone, of conversations between Roper and himself."

Subsequently in late-summer 1999, when Mugridge told Judge Aaron that he was considering complaining to governmental authorities, Judge Aaron advised him that the government was already investigating the matter and urged him not to complain. "Judge Aaron stated to the effect that the 'Feds' would let the Fresno investors realize a profit on their investments if they believed that the deal was legitimate, and that any complaint to the authorities would jeopardize the profit-realization."

In spring 1999, S. invested $125,000 in a separate scheme with Roper, Baczynski and Alliji. He had been solicited to invest by someone outside of the Fresno group. At that time, Judge Aaron had no knowledge of S.'s investment. In the summer of 1999, after S. told Baczynski that he intended to complain to the authorities concerning Westminster Financial, Baczynski referred S. to Judge Aaron. From approximately July through October 1999, Judge Aaron participated in frequent telephone calls with S., including calls that Judge Aaron initiated from his chambers.

> Throughout this period, Judge Aaron urged [S.] to be patient, advised him that the authorities were already investigating the principals, advised him not to complain to the authorities and stated to the effect that if he did so, [S.] might never have a > chance to get his money back. Judge Aaron also stated to the effect that if the investment was not legitimate he would go to the authorities with him.

The Stipulation states that Judge Aaron believed that S. might at least get his money back since the Fresno investors had received theirs. The Stipulation, however, also recites that Judge Aaron's statements to S. "might have had the effect of delaying the federal investigation: [S.] was not contacted by federal authorities until approximately September 1999."

Judge Aaron, by providing assurances to investors when he suspected the investment might not be legitimate, and otherwise discouraging them from complaining to government authorities, violated canons 1 (failing to observe high standards of conduct), 2A (failing to act in a manner that promoted public confidence in the integrity of the judiciary), 2B (2) (lending the prestige of his judicial office to advance his pecuniary interests and those of others) and 4A(2) (demeaning the judicial office) of the Code of Judicial Ethics. Judge Aaron violated canon 4D(1)(a) by dissuading Mugridge and S., who may have been influenced by the fact that Judge Aaron was a judge, from complaining to the authorities.

Count Three

During 1998 and 1999, Judge Aaron engaged in frequent telephone conversations at the court with Roper, Baczynski, and Alliji regarding the Westminster Financial scheme. Judge Aaron instructed court staff that all calls from these persons were to be put through to him either on the bench or in his chambers.

Judge Aaron's conduct violated canons 1, 2A and 3A of the Code of Judicial Ethics. He violated canon 1 by failing to observe high standards of conduct, and he violated canon 2A by failing to act in a manner that promoted public confidence in the integrity of the judiciary. Judge Aaron violated canon 3A by directing that calls from the principals in the Westminster Financial scheme be put through to him on the bench, thus giving personal matters precedence over his judicial duties.

Count Four

The Stipulation contains no findings as to Count Four, but notes that the parties request that the count be dismissed.

Count Five

Judge Aaron avoided his financial obligations over a substantial period of time by writing worthless checks, making false promises and misleading representations, failing to disclose material information, failing to communicate with his creditors and otherwise engaging in delaying tactics.

Judge Aaron failed to make payments required under the terms of loan contracts, secured by deeds of trust on his personal residence. "This resulted in the commencement of numerous foreclosure proceedings respecting his residence, including during June 1991, August 1991, January 1995, February 1995, May 1995, December 1996, January 1997, April 1997, May 1997, November 1997, December 1997, March 1998, December 1999, and April 2000." The Stipulation represents that Judge Aaron cured each default.

Judge Aaron failed to pay personal property taxes when due on his personal airplane for fiscal years 1992-1993, 1993-1994, 1994-1995 and 1995-1996. He failed to pay personal property taxes when due on his personal airplane and personal boat for fiscal year 1997-1998. Judge Aaron failed to pay personal property taxes when due on his personal boat for fiscal years 1998-1999 and 1999-2000. The County of Fresno commenced legal actions against Judge Aaron in 1997 and 1999 and levied execution on judgments in order to obtain payment of delinquent taxes, penalties and costs. The Stipulation recites that Judge Aaron has paid all of his delinquent taxes, penalties and costs.

In July 1996, Judge Aaron and his then-wife borrowed $50,000 from a couple at 2% interest per month, due in 90 days, and signed a promissory note agreeing to repay in accordance with those terms.

> The note was secured by a third deed of trust on Judge Aaron's residence property. As further ostensible "security" for the loan, Judge Aaron gave a $50,000 check dated July 16, 1996, to the creditors' attorney for him to hold; however, as disclosed by Judge Aaron there were insufficient funds in Judge Aaron's bank account at the time. Judge Aaron made no payments of either principal or interest when due.

In August 1996, Judge Aaron defaulted on the loan secured by the second deed of trust on his residence and in October 1996, he defaulted on the loan secured by the first deed of trust on his residence. Notices of default were recorded in December 1996 and January 1997, and trustee's sales were noticed for April 1997. From approximately November 1996 through July 1997, Judge Aaron made a series of assurances and/or promises to the couple or their attorney that repayment was forthcoming, and he "did so for purposes that included inducing them to not take legal action on the debt."

In March 1997, Judge Aaron tendered a check for $54,000 payable to the husband of the couple "in purported satisfaction of the principal and accrued interest owing under the July 1996 note." Judge Aaron knew that there were insufficient funds in the account on which the check was drawn to cover the check. He told the couple's attorney, that the check would be good by the end of the month when a loan Judge Aaron was obtaining to refinance his home closed. A week later, Judge Aaron forwarded to the husband and his attorney a letter on a mortgage company's letterhead stating that a $370,000 loan to Judge Aaron had been delayed but was a "virtual certainty for the week of March 31." Judge Aaron added a handwritten note reassuring the husband that money was coming and offering to "add 100.00 per day to the $54,000 until I am funded." No payment was made at that time.

In July 1997, the couple sued Judge Aaron's wife for breach of contract under the 90-day note of July 1996. In approximately March 1998, Judge Aaron refinanced his residence and obtained a new first loan of $266,000, "the terms of which required the subordination of the deed of trust" securing the couple's note. In connection with the subordination, a payment of $5,000 was made to the couple and the lawsuit was dismissed without prejudice on April 6, 1998.

During 1998, Judge Aaron attempted to renegotiate the terms of the July 1996 note. Judge Aaron proposed that the note be rewritten at 14.5% interest from July 1996 to July 1998. The Stipulation recites:

> Judge Aaron prepared a written proposal for paying off the recalculated balance either in a lump sum on July 16, 1998, or in monthly installments of $1,000 per month until his residence was refinanced at a lower rate. Judge Aaron represented that a refinancing in one year was already set up. The representation that a refinancing had been prearranged for a year in the future was misleading. Although Judge Aaron's mortgage broker had promised to process his loan papers in one year, Judge Aaron knew that such refinancing had not been prearranged.

Other than the $5,000 payment in March 1998, Judge Aaron made no payments to the couple. In October 2000, they sued Judge Aaron for breach of contract under the original note, alleging $50,000 principal and $98,000 accrued interest owed. Judge Aaron was served with the summons and complaint in approximately February 2001. He did not file any responsive pleading and a default was entered on June 14, 2001.

On April 24, 1997, Judge Aaron entered into a written agreement with a certain businessman to borrow $10,500 for 90 days at 10% interest. Two weeks later, Judge Aaron entered into a further written agreement with the businessman's company to borrow an additional $26,500 for 75 days at 10% interest. Judge Aaron added a representation to the second loan note that the loan was to be secured with a deed of trust on his personal residence. He failed to disclose to the business man that at that time "his residence was encumbered by three deeds of trust, all of which were in default, and that the holders of both the first and second deeds of trust had recorded notices of trustee's sales of the residence and thus, there was insufficient equity to secure the loan."

Judge Aaron made no payment of either principle or interest on the loans from the businessman and did not secure the second loan with a deed of trust on his residence. After efforts at collection were unavailing, the businessman in November 1998 commenced a lawsuit against Judge Aaron for breach of contract for nonpayment under the two notes, "and for constructive trust based on alleged fraud on Judge Aaron's part." Judge Aaron did not file a responsive pleading and made no appearance.

On approximately March 13, 1999, Judge Aaron and the businessman signed an agreement by which Judge Aaron stipulated to a judgment being entered in the lawsuit on March 31, 1999, for the principal, interest and court costs, unless prior thereto Judge Aaron made a $20,000 payment, "in which case the stipulated judgment would be deferred until May 15, 1999, at which time if the remaining balance had not been paid, judgment could be entered, less any payments previously made. Judge Aaron made no payments."

On or around August 12, 1999, Judge Aaron faxed a handwritten letter to the businessman proposing a meeting on August 24 and assured him that he would have a substantial payment, if not the full amount, at that time. Judge Aaron then requested a short postponement of the meeting. Judge Aaron made no payments.

On December 15, 1999, a default judgment was entered against Judge Aaron in the businessman's lawsuit in the amount of $45,677.61, together with interest at 10%. The Stipulation recites that the "judgment remains unsatisfied in the full amount."

In the middle of April 1998, Judge Aaron purchased a piano from a business for $3,620 plus tax, paying $500 down. Within 48 hours, Judge Aaron rescinded the transaction. The seller voided Judge Aaron's check, but Judge Aaron had already received the piano.

From May through December 1998, the business made repeated, unsuccessful attempts to contact Judge Aaron to arrange for the return of the piano. In December 1998, the business sent Judge Aaron a written proposal offering a 30% discount off the original purchase price, if Judge Aaron would pay the full reduced balance by the end of the year. Judge Aaron did not respond to the proposal, yet continued to retain the piano. The business reissued its offer in January 1999, stating that Judge Aaron either needed to pay or return the piano. Judge Aaron did not respond, but continued to retain the piano.

The business continued to attempt to resolve the matter on numerous occasions between February and June 1999. On July 2, 1999, Judge Aaron left a phone message with a representative of the business stating that he was buying the piano and would send a check for the full balance. On approximately July 8, 1999, Judge Aaron sent the business a check in the amount of $2,730.39 dated that day "with a handwritten note directing [the business] to negotiate the check on Judge Aaron's payday, July 31." Judge Aaron further wrote that he was going to delay his August mortgage payment to pay for the piano. When the business attempted to negotiate the check at the beginning of August, the check was returned on two successive occasions for insufficient funds. Although Judge Aaron told a representative of the business that the July 8 check bounced because he had to pay his mortgage lender, "Judge Aaron did not make a mortgage payment in either July or August."

On approximately August 23, 1999, Judge Aaron promised in a letter to the business to send a cashier's check for the full balance plus $20 as reimbursement for bank charges for the returned check. Instead, on or about September 2, 1999, Judge Aaron sent a cashier's check for $1,000 with a note that he would send the balance on Friday via overnight mail. On Friday, September 3, 1999, Judge Aaron sent a cashier's check for $100 with a note stating that this was all he could scrape together.

In October 1999, the business filed a small claims action against Judge Aaron for $1,650.39, which covered the balance owing after the 30% discount and the partial payment of $1,100. Judge Aaron initially declined service by certified mail and he was personally served in December 1999.

The Stipulation further recites:

> On approximately January 10, 2000, five days before the continued trial date, Judge Aaron telephoned a representative of [the business] and advised that any judge assigned to the case would probably be required to disqualify himself or herself once he or she realized that Judge Aaron was the defendant, and that it would require 30-60 days for an outside judge to be appointed to hear the matter. Judge Aaron then stated that he had sold some jewelry and stock, generating $1,000, and inquired whether [the business] was firm as regards the balance owing. When he was advised that the price was firm, Judge Aaron asked that a representative of [the business] meet him in his chambers on January 14, 2000 – the day before trial. At the meeting, Judge Aaron presented the [business'] representative with a cashier's check for $1,650.39. The lawsuit was dismissed on January 15, 2000.

Judge Aaron's conduct violated canons 1, 2A and 4A(2) of the Code of Judicial Ethics, and the corresponding canons of the former Code of Judicial Conduct that were in force between 1991 and 1995. Judge Aaron, by avoiding his financial obligations over a substantial period of time, writing worthless checks, making false promises and misleading representations, failing to disclose material information, failing to communicate with his creditors, and otherwise engaging in delaying tactics, failed to observe high standards of conduct (canon 1), failed to act in a manner that promotes public confidence in the integrity of the judiciary (canon 2A) and demeaned the judicial office (canon 4A(2)).

Count Six

The Stipulation recites that on numerous occasions in 1998-1999, Judge Aaron "ordered a defendant to approach the bench where Judge Aaron then conducted a 'smell test' of the defendant's hair, and/or examined the defendant's eyes." Often the defendant would admit to being under the influence of drugs.

> Judge Aaron would then announce, ostensibly based on such examination and/or admissions, that he knew the defendant was using drugs and would then order the defendant remanded. Pursuant to Judge Aaron's order, the bailiff would handcuff the defendant and hold the defendant in custody in the jury box. Judge Aaron would subsequently release the defendant later in the day with a warning.

Judge Aaron, by remanding defendants based on his personal examination of them, gave the appearance of abandoning his role as a detached neutral magistrate. In so doing, he violated canons 1, 2A and 3B(4) of the Code of Judicial Ethics.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

The parties stipulate that Judge Aaron's promotion of and participation in the Westminster Financial scheme (Count One), his representing to investors that profits would be forthcoming and his discouraging them from complaining to government authorities (Count Two), his instructing staff to put calls from the principals in the Westminster Financial scheme through to him either on the bench or in chambers (Count Three), and his avoidance of financial obligations over a substantial period of time using false promises, misrepresentations and other delaying tactics (Count Five) constitute conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute within the meaning of article VI, section 18 of the California Constitution. In addition, the parties stipulate that Judge Aaron's use of the "smell test" to determine that defendants were using drugs and placement of defendants in custody (Count Six) constituted improper actions within the meaning of article VI, section 18 of the California Constitution.

The commission concludes that Judge Aaron's conduct as alleged and stipulated to in Counts One, Two, Three and Five constitute, at a minimum, conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute, and that Judge Aaron's use of the "smell test" to determine defendants' use of drugs constitutes, at a minimum, improper action. This matter is before the commission pursuant to Stipulation for Discipline by Consent. Whether or not Judge Aaron's ethical violations may constitute more serious misconduct than that stipulated to has not been argued or briefed and a determination that the violations constituted more serious misconduct would not effect the commission's resolution of this matter.

DISCIPLINE

The commission accepts the parties' request and hereby dismisses Count Four of the Notice of Formal Proceedings. The commission remains of the opinion that the allegations in Count Four – that Judge Aaron asked Mugridge for a personal loan – set forth a violation of the Code of Judicial Ethics. The commission, however, accepts the parties' representation that material facts are in dispute and are unresoluble without a hearing. In light of the more serious misconduct to which Judge Aaron has stipulated, findings of fact and conclusions of law on Count Four would not alter the commission's disposition of this matter.

The commission is of the opinion that Judge Aaron's conduct, particularly his involvement with Westminster Financial (Counts One and Two) and his duplicitous avoidance of his financial obligations (Count Five) clearly support the imposition of severe discipline. In light of the fact that Judge Aaron will retire within five days of the filing of this opinion, the commission accepts the stipulation and imposes this public censure. The commission believes that this decision and order of public censure, along with Judge Aaron's immediate retirement, will protect the public and maintain public confidence in the integrity and independence of the judicial system.[4]

> In making our independent determination of the appropriate sanction, we consider the purpose of a Commission disciplinary proceeding – which is not punishment, but rather the protection of the public, the enforcement of rigorous standards of judicial conduct, and the maintenance of public confidence in the integrity and independence of the judicial system.

Even though Judge Aaron remains eligible for future assignments,[5] the commission trusts that those considering an assignment, appointment or reference of work will review this decision and order.

Judge Aaron is hereby publicly censured for his misconduct as set forth in this decision and order. This public censure is conditioned on Judge Aaron fulfilling his agreement to irrevocably retire from judicial office within five calendar days of the issuance of this order. Should Judge Aaron fail to comply with this condition, this decision and order may be withdrawn, the formal proceedings may be resumed, and Judge Aaron's failure to comply will constitute additional and independent grounds for discipline.

This decision shall constitute the public censure of Judge Aaron.

| Inquiry ConcerningFormer Judge Arthur S. Block, No. 167 | DECISION AND ORDER IMPOSING PUBLIC CENSURE AND BARRING JUDGE BLOCK FROM RECEIVING ASSIGNMENTS |

This is a disciplinary matter concerning Judge Arthur S. Block, a judge of the Riverside County Municipal Court from June 29, 1982 to July 28, 2000, and a judge of the Riverside County Unified Superior Court from July 29, 2000 to December 1, 2002. Formal proceedings having been instituted, this matter came before the Commission on Judicial Performance pursuant to rule 127 of the Rules of the Commission on Judicial Performance.

The commission concludes, based on Judge Block's stipulation, that Judge Block engaged in a pattern of inappropriate sexual conduct, attempted to intimidate potential witnesses during the investigation of the alleged sexual conduct, and improperly attempted to use his office to intercede in a pending matter on behalf of an acquaintance. The commission hereby publicly censures Judge Block and bars him from receiving an assignment, appointment, or reference of work from any California state court.

APPEARANCES

Judge Block is represented by attorneys Edward P. George, Jr., and Timothy L. O'Reilly of Long Beach, California, John E. FitzGerald III, of Fitzgerald & Mule of Palm Springs, and Rodney Lee Soda of Palm Desert, California. Trial Counsel for the Commission on Judicial Performance is Jack Coyle.

PROCEDURAL HISTORY

A Notice of Formal Proceedings was filed on June 13, 2002, charging Judge Block with four counts of unethical conduct. Judge Block filed his answer on July 2, 2002. Pursuant to rule 121 of the Rules of the Commission on Judicial Performance, the commission requested the appointment of three special masters and the Supreme Court appointed Judge Jack Komar of the Santa Clara Superior Court (presiding), Judge Vincent J. O'Neill, Jr., of the Ventura County Superior Court, and Judge Dana M. Sabraw of the San Diego County Superior Court as masters. The masters held a prehearing conference on August 22, 2002, and the evidentiary hearing before the masters was scheduled to commence on October 21, 2002 in Pasadena, California.

On October 17, 2002, the commission received a letter from counsel for all parties stating that they had reached an agreement in principle for a stipulated disposition and requesting that the hearing be taken off calendar so that they could reduce the terms of the settlement to writing for submission to the commission pursuant to rule 127 of the Rules of the Commission on Judicial Performance. On October 18, 2002, the commission issued an order vacating the hearing date. On December 2, 2002, Judge Block and Trial Counsel submitted a Stipulation for Discipline by Consent pursuant to rule 127.[1]

THE STIPULATION FOR DISCIPLINE BY CONSENT

A. Judge Block's Retirement and Agreement to Discipline

The Stipulation notes that Judge Block has irrevocably retired from judicial office, effective December 1, 2002.[2]

Judge Block and Trial Counsel propose that the commission dispose of this matter by issuing a censure and bar from receiving an assignment, appointment, or reference of work from any California state court. Judge Block understands that if the commission accepts the proposal, the commission may articulate the reasons for its decision and he agrees to accept any such explanatory language.

Judge Block has signed and submitted an affidavit consenting to the sanction of a censure and bar from any assignments, stating that his consent is freely and voluntarily given, admitting to the truth of the charges as set forth in the Stipulation, and waiving review by the Supreme Court.

B. The Findings of Fact and Conclusions of Law

The commission adopts the following findings of fact and conclusions of law set forth in the Stipulation for Discipline by Consent.

COUNT ONE

> A. In approximately October 2000, Deputy County Counsel Tanya Galvan appeared before Judge Block in a contested juvenile dependency case. During Ms. Galvan's argument, Judge Block wrote "relax" on her hand with a pen. Ms. Galvan felt humiliated and sat down without finishing her argument.

> Judge Block's conduct was in violation of the Code of Judicial Ethics, canons 1, 2A, 3B(4) and 3B(5), and constitutes prejudicial misconduct.

[1] With the issuance of this decision accepting the Stipulation for Discipline by Consent, the Stipulation is filed and is available to the public.

[2] A redacted copy of Judge Block's November 18, 2002 letter of retirement was submitted with the Stipulation for Discipline by Consent.

B. In approximately February 2001, Judge Block was on the bench during a recess in a juvenile dependency calendar, while attorneys in the courtroom were attempting to resolve cases. Judge Block called Deputy County Counsel Tanya Galvan to sidebar. Judge Block did not ask any other attorney to sidebar. While discussing a legal issue with Ms. Galvan, Judge Block reached out as if to fasten a button on the front of Ms. Galvan's suit. Ms. Galvan was startled and offended. She backed away and buttoned her suit herself.

Judge Block's conduct was in violation of the Code of Judicial Ethics, canons 1, 2A, 3B(4) and 3B(5), and constitutes prejudicial misconduct.

C. On May 8, 2001, Judge Block presided over a contested juvenile dependency hearing. Deputy County Counsel Tanya Galvan represented the Department of Social Services.

During the hearing, Judge Block declared a recess and requested that Ms. Galvan and the attorneys for the father and the mother meet with him in chambers. After discussing certain issues in the case, the attorneys began to leave chambers to return to the courtroom to resume the proceedings. Judge Block asked Ms. Galvan to remain and to close the door.

Judge Block was seated behind his desk, with Ms. Galvan seated across from him. Judge Block told Ms. Galvan that he was attracted to her. Judge Block walked around his desk to Ms. Galvan and had Ms. Galvan stand. Judge Block kissed Ms. Galvan, putting his tongue in her mouth.

When Judge Block released Ms. Galvan, she left chambers and returned to court. Judge Block returned to the bench and presided over further proceedings in the case without disclosing what had happened in chambers.

Judge Block's conduct was in violation of the Code of Judicial Ethics, canons 1, 2A, 2B(1), 2B(2), 3B(4), 3B(5), 3E(1) and 3E(2),[3] and constitutes, at a minimum, prejudicial misconduct.

[3] Canon 1 states that a judge shall uphold the integrity and independence of the judiciary, canon 2A states that "a judge shall respect and comply with the law and shall act at all times in a manner that promotes public confidence in the integrity and impartiality of the judiciary," canon 2B(1) states that a judge "shall not allow family, social, political, or other relationships to influence the judge's judicial conduct or judgment, nor shall a judge convey or permit others to convey the impression that any individual is in a special position to influence the judge," canon 2B(2) states that a judge shall not lend the prestige of judicial office to advance the pecuniary or personal interests of the judge, canon 3B(4) states that a judge shall be patient, dignified and courteous to litigants, lawyers and others, canon 3B(5) states that a judge "shall perform judicial duties without bias or prejudice," canon 3E(1) states a judge "shall disqualify himself or herself in any proceeding in which disqualification is required by law," and canon 3E(2) states that a judge "shall disclose on the record information that the judge believes the parties or their lawyers might consider relevant to the question of disqualification, even if the judge believes there is no actual basis for disqualification."

COUNT TWO

A. On August 2, 2000, during a conversation between Judge Block and attorneys and court staff in the courtroom, it was suggested as a joke that court interpreter Margie Stafford be held in contempt for being late.

When Ms. Stafford arrived in the hallway outside the courtroom, a public area where people were present, Deputy Rosas handcuffed Ms. Stafford over her protests and resistance and took her into the courtroom. The following then took place:

> THE COURT: Ms. Stafford, will you listen to the People please. What were you about to say?
> THE INTERPRETER: I said this better be a joke. Take them off.
> THE COURT: What were you going to say, Mr. –
> MR. DAILY: I was going to say perhaps this is the appropriate time for the order to show cause re contempt.
> THE COURT: All right. I understand bail is not available; is that correct?
> MR. DAILY: There is no bail for that.
> THE COURT: Ms. Stafford, I'm sorry but your vacation plans are somewhat awry.

Judge Block then told Ms. Stafford that it was a joke and had Deputy Rosas remove the handcuffs. Ms. Stafford felt humiliated.

Judge Block's conduct was in violation of the Code of Judicial Ethics, canons 1, 2A, 3B(4) and 3B(5), and constitutes prejudicial misconduct.

**…

COUNT THREE

The Riverside County Superior Court engaged the services of independent employment counsel, Gary Scholick, to investigate the allegations made by Tanya Galvan (the subject matter of count one). On May 23, 2001, in connection with that investigation, Judge Block was interviewed by Mr. Scholick. Mr. Scholick advised Judge Block not to discuss the investigation with anyone. He also advised him that retaliation toward any of the persons named during the interview was prohibited and might violate the law. Judge Block told Mr. Scholick that he understood and would abide by his instructions.

On May 31, 2001, Judge Block telephoned Mr. Scholick and told him that another judge had told him that interpreter Margie Stafford had reported incidents involving Judge Block that raised issues of a hostile work environment. Judge Block said that Ms. Stafford had been involved in an incident with his courtroom deputy, but that no incident involving Ms. Stafford had anything to do with sexual issues. Mr. Scholick advised Judge Block to keep the matter confidential and specifically not to speak to Ms. Stafford about the subject.

On June 5, 2001, Ms. Stafford visited Judge Block's courtroom to watch a trial that was open to the public. Upon observing Ms. Stafford seated in the public area of the courtroom, Judge Block instructed Deputy Sabas Rosas to tell Ms. Stafford that she would not be needed as an interpreter and that she was excused. Ms. Stafford told Deputy Rosas that she was not there as an interpreter, but was there because she had a personal interest in the case. Deputy Rosas related to Judge Block what Ms. Stafford had told him.

At a recess, Judge Block told Ms. Stafford not to leave. Judge Block had Ms. Stafford's supervisor, his courtroom clerk, his court reporter, and his bailiff come into his chambers. Judge Block told those assembled that he had heard rumors that Ms. Stafford had made allegations against him and that if the rumors were true, he did not think that it was appropriate for Ms. Stafford to be present in his courtroom.

Judge Block then had Ms. Stafford come into chambers with the others still present. Judge Block asked Ms. Stafford whether she had made allegations against him. When Ms. Stafford said that she had not, Judge Block told her that she was then welcome in his court.

By this conduct, Judge Block threatened banishment from a public courtroom, and threatened retaliation for complaints against him, potentially dissuading Ms. Stafford, the others present in chambers and others who became aware of his remarks, from making complaints against him. Judge Block's conduct was in violation of the Code of Judicial Ethics, canons 1, 2,[4] 2A, 2B(1) and 2B(2), and constitutes prejudicial misconduct.

COUNT FOUR

On January 7, 2001, Nechama Dina Denebeim was cited in Los Angeles for a violation of Vehicle Code section 12500(a) (unlicensed driver operating a vehicle) and section 24600/24353 (broken tail light). As of February 13, 2001, the deficiencies cited had been corrected by Ms. Denebeim. A misdemeanor complaint for failure to appear was mistakenly filed on February 22, 2001, for failure to appear on that date. Ms. Denebeim had appeared on that citation on February 16, 2001, and was given a notice to reappear on March 2, 2001.

[4] Canon 2 states that a judge shall avoid impropriety and the appearance of impropriety in all of the judge's activities.

Apparently this had been overlooked at the time the warrant for non-appearance was issued. Ms. Denebeim reappeared on March 2, and was given a new notice to reappear on March 15, 2001.

In early March 2001, the defendant's father, Yonason Denebeim, a long-time acquaintance of Judge Block's, telephoned Judge Block and complained about the manner in which his daughter had been treated by the court system regarding one of her appearances in Los Angeles traffic court, and asked him to look into the matter.

Ms. Denebeim's case was not assigned to Judge Block and was outside of his court's jurisdiction and would not have come before him for any purpose. Despite that, Judge Block had Ms. Denebeim appear in his chambers in Riverside County, where he had her relate her version of events.

On March 13, 2001, Judge Block telephoned Judge James Brandlin, the site managing judge for the Airport Court branch of the Los Angeles County Superior Court, regarding Ms. Denebeim's case. Judge Block expressed concerns regarding the manner in which the case was processed at the Airport Court and regarding the manner in which Ms. Denebeim was treated by court staff. Judge Block asked Judge Brandlin whether Ms. Denebeim's case could be handled without Ms. Denebeim appearing in Los Angeles, and whether Judge Block could personally verify that she currently possessed a valid driver's license, which he represented that she did.

Judge Brandlin responded by telling Judge Block that the defendant's appearance would be required, and that it would be inappropriate for Judge Block to verify the validity of the defendant's driver's license. Judge Brandlin followed up with a voice mail advising Judge Block not to contact him or his court again regarding the case, as it would be unethical to do so. Judge Brandlin then sent Judge Block a letter warning him that his involvement in the case might have created the appearance that the Denebeims would receive special treatment, and again advising him to not engage in any further ex parte contacts with the Los Angeles County Superior Court regarding the case while it was pending. Judge Block had no further involvement in the case.

Judge Block's conduct was in violation of the Code of Judicial Ethics, canons 1, 2, 2A and 3B(7),[5] and constitutes prejudicial misconduct.

[5] Canon 3B(7) states, in relevant part, that a judge "shall not initiate, permit or consider ex parte communications, or consider other communications made to the judge outside the presence of the parties concerning a pending or impending proceeding." The canon then sets forth certain exceptions to the prohibition, none of which are applicable to this instance.

DISCIPLINE

In adopting these findings and conclusions, the commission recognizes that some of the allegations in the Notice of Formal Proceedings are not resolved by the Stipulation. The commission, however, agrees that in light of Judge Block's retirement and the discipline, the disputed factual issues need not be resolved.[6] In addition, the allegation in Count Two that Judge Block made an offensive comment to Ms. Stafford is dismissed because the factual dispute cannot be resolved without a hearing and its resolution would not affect the discipline imposed.[7]

Similarly, the commission accepts the Stipulation's characterization of Judge Block's unethical conduct as conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute, because the misconduct is at least that, and determining that one or more of the acts of misconduct constituted willful misconduct could not result in any greater discipline.

Judge Block's admitted misconduct with Ms. Galvan and Ms. Stafford, his deliberate attempt to intimidate witnesses during an investigation after having been counseled not to, and his attempt to intercede in a pending matter on behalf of a friend, is more than enough to support the imposition of a public censure and bar from assignments. Accordingly, based on the above findings and conclusions, the commission, as authorized by article VI, section 18(d) of the California Constitution, publicly censures Judge Block and bars him from receiving an assignment, appointment, or reference of work from any California state court. This is the maximum sanction the commission may levy against a retired judge, and the appropriate sanction for "the protection of the public, the enforcement of rigorous standards of judicial

[6] The Stipulation states:

> It is alleged that Ms. Galvan did not consent to the kiss; Judge Block disputes this. The parties recognize that lack of consent would constitute a very serious aggravating circumstance. Nonetheless, the parties believe that it is unnecessary to resolve this factual issue at a hearing, for the following reasons: (1) Judge Block has retired from judicial office and has agreed to be barred from acting in a judicial capacity in the future. This sanction protects the public, the judicial system, and court employees from a repeat of such conduct. (2) The disputed issue is a factual one peculiar to this case, rather than an unanswered legal question of judicial ethics. The wrongfulness of the alleged misconduct is beyond debate. (3) The admitted misconduct is otherwise sufficient to support the proposed sanction.

[7] Paragraph B of Count Two of the Notice of Formal Proceedings reads:

> On or about the same day as the handcuffing incident described above, during a hearing over which you were presiding, Margie Stafford was leaning over a juvenile defendant for whom she was interpreting. You remarked to Ms. Stafford, in substance, that you knew why so many juveniles were requesting an interpreter. You then asked Ms. Stafford to approach the bench, and when she did, you said, in substance, that she knew why, and gestured toward and looked directly at Ms. Stafford's breasts. Ms. Stafford felt embarrassed and offended. Because of this incident and the handcuffing incident, she asked not to be assigned to your court again.

conduct, and the maintenance of public confidence in the integrity and independence of the judicial system."[8]

This decision shall constitute the public censure of Judge Block and a bar to Judge Block receiving an assignment, appointment, or reference of work from any California state court.

Commission members Judge Risë Jones Pichon, Justice Vance W. Raye, Ms. Lara Bergthold, Mr. Michael A. Kahn, Mrs. Crystal Lui, Mrs. Penny Perez, Ms. Ramona Ripston, Ms. Barbara Schraeger and Dr. Betty L. Wyman voted to impose this public censure and bar from receiving assignments. Commission members Judge Madeleine I. Flier and Mr. Marshall B. Grossman did not participate in this proceeding.

| Inquiry ConcerningFormer Judge James R. Simpson, No. 168 | DECISION AND ORDER IMPOSING PUBLIC CENSURE AND BARRING JUDGE SIMPSON FROM RECEIVING ASSIGNMENTS |

This is a disciplinary matter concerning Judge James R. Simpson, a judge of the Glendale Municipal Court from December 2, 1994 to January 21, 2000, and of the Los Angeles County Unified Superior Court from January 22, 2000 to December 10, 2001. Formal proceedings having been instituted, this matter came before the Commission on Judicial Performance pursuant to rule 127 of the Rules of the Commission on Judicial Performance.

The commission concludes, based on Judge Simpson's stipulation that, prior to his retirement, Judge Simpson presided over matters involving friends, gave favorable treatment to friends, and tried to influence other judicial officers and police in their handling of matters concerning the judge's friends. The commission hereby publicly censures Judge Simpson and bars him from receiving an assignment, appointment, or reference of work from any California state court.

APPEARANCES

Judge Simpson is represented by attorneys Edward P. George, Jr., and Timothy L. O'Reilly of Long Beach, California. Trial Counsel for the Commission on Judicial Performance is Jack Coyle.

PROCEDURAL HISTORY

A Notice of Formal Proceedings was filed on June 27, 2002, charging Judge Simpson with six counts of unethical conduct. Judge Simpson filed his answer on July 31, 2002. Pursuant to rule 121 of the Rules of the Commission on Judicial Performance, the commission requested the appointment of three special masters, and the Supreme Court appointed Justice Eileen C. Moore, presiding, Justice Dennis A. Cornell, and Judge Joan Marie Borba as masters. The masters held a prehearing conference on September 12, 2002, and the evidentiary hearing before the masters was scheduled to commence on December 9, 2002, in Santa Ana, California.

On November 20, 2002, Judge Simpson and Trial Counsel submitted a Stipulation for Discipline by Consent pursuant to rule 127 of the Rules of the Commission on Judicial Performance.[1] On November 21, 2002, the commission issued an order vacating the hearing date in order that the commission might consider the Stipulation at its December 2002 meeting.

THE STIPULATION FOR DISCIPLINE BY CONSENT

A. Judge Simpson's Agreement to Discipline

Judge Simpson and Trial Counsel propose that the commission dispose of this matter by issuing a censure and bar from receiving an assignment, appointment, or reference of work from any California state court. Judge Simpson understands that if the commission accepts the proposal, the commission may articulate the reasons for its decision, and he agrees to accept any such explanatory language.

Judge Simpson has signed and submitted an affidavit consenting to the sanction of a censure and bar from any assignments, stating that his consent is freely and voluntarily given, admitting to the truth of the charges as set forth in the Stipulation, and waiving review by the Supreme Court.

B. The Findings of Fact and Conclusions of Law

The Stipulation for Discipline sets forth findings of fact and conclusions of law tracking the allegations set forth in the Notice of Formal Proceedings:

COUNT ONE

On July 2, 1993, Allen Brandstater received a citation (number VQ08144) for violating Vehicle Code section 5204(a) (improper registration tags). Because Mr. Brandstater was a friend of Judge Simpson and was the campaign manager for his 1994 judicial campaign, Judge Simpson should have been disqualified from participating in the case pursuant to Code of Civil Procedure section 170.1(a)(6)(C).

On August 3, 1993, Mr. Brandstater appeared at the traffic counter of the Glendale Municipal Court and received an extension to September 17, 1993, to pay $10 bail and to show proof of correction. He failed to post bail or show proof of correction.

On March 8, 1994, Judge Barbara Burke issued a bench warrant for Mr. Brandstater for failure to appear. The bail amount on the warrant was $287.

[1] With the issuance of this decision accepting the Stipulation for Discipline by Consent, the Stipulation is filed and is available to the public.

On September 27, 1995, although the case was not assigned to him, Judge Simpson had his court clerk obtain the file. Judge Simpson recalled the bench warrant and continued the matter to October 4, 1995.

On October 4, 1995, Judge Simpson continued the matter to November 15, 1995 for payment of $270. Mr. Brandstater did not appear in court on November 15, 1995, and did not make payment until November 21, 1995.

Judge Simpson violated the Code of Judicial Ethics, canons 1, 2A, 2B(1) and 3E. By recalling a bench warrant issued 18 months earlier by Judge Burke and continuing the matter twice, Judge Simpson violated canons 1 (failing to observe high standards of conduct "so that the integrity and independence of the judiciary will be preserved"), 2A (failing to respect and comply with the law or act in manner that promoted public confidence in integrity of judiciary), and 2B(1) (allowing a social or political relationship to influence judge's judicial conduct or judgment, or conveying the impression that an individual was in a special position to influence the judge).

Judge Simpson violated canon 3E(1) (judge shall disqualify himself in any proceeding in which disqualification is required by law) because, due to his relationship with Mr. Brandstater, "a person aware of the facts might reasonably entertain a doubt that the judge would be able to be impartial." (Code Civ. Proc. § 170.1(a)(6)(C).) The judge also violated canon 3E(2) by failing to disclose on the record his relationship to Mr. Brandstater.

Since Judge Simpson's actions were unjudicial, were conducted in bad faith, and were taken in his judicial capacity, his conduct was willful misconduct within the meaning of article VI, section 18 of the California Constitution. Judge Simpson's conduct was unjudicial in that it violated the Code of Judicial Ethics. Judge Simpson acted in bad faith by taking judicial actions for the improper purpose of benefiting his friend and former campaign manager, Allen Brandstater. In taking judicial actions in the case, Judge Simpson was acting in a judicial capacity.

COUNT TWO

Count one is incorporated by reference.

On May 23, 1997, Allen Brandstater was charged in a misdemeanor complaint (case number 7GL02340) with driving under the influence of alcohol in violation of Vehicle Code sections 23152(a) and 23152(b). The complaint alleged that Mr. Brandstater had a blood alcohol content of .20 percent or higher within the meaning of Vehicle Code section 23206.1.

On July 2, 1997, Mr. Brandstater's lawyer appeared before Judge Simpson for a pretrial hearing. Judge Simpson stated that he could not handle the matter himself, declared a "conflict," and ordered the case transferred to Judge Laura Matz. Because of Judge Simpson's recusal and his relationship with Mr. Brandstater, Judge Simpson should have been disqualified from further participating in the case pursuant to Code of Civil Procedure section 170.3.

On August 19, 1997, Mr. Brandstater pled nolo contendere to a violation of Vehicle Code section 23152(b) and admitted the special allegation of a blood alcohol content of over .20 percent. Judge Matz sentenced Mr. Brandstater to, among other things, three years summary probation, a mandatory fine, a three month first offender alcohol treatment program (hereafter "DUI program"), and 50 extra Alcoholics Anonymous meetings.

On December 18, 1997, Judge Matz extended the deadline for Mr. Brandstater to pay the fine and attend the DUI program to March 18, 1998.

On April 9, 1998, a report of non-compliance with the DUI program requirement was filed with the court. On April 13, 1998, Judge Matz issued a bench warrant for Mr. Brandstater and set bail at $10,000. On April 14, 1998, Judge Matz revoked and reinstated Mr. Brandstater's probation and extended the proof of completion date to May 6, 1998.

On May 18, 1998, another report of non-compliance with the DUI program requirement was filed with the court. On May 19, 1998, despite the fact that he had recused himself and should have been disqualified from the case, Judge Simpson continued the matter to May 29, 1998, to allow Mr. Brandstater additional time to complete the DUI program and file proof of attendance at AA meetings.

On July 30, 1998, another report of non-compliance with the DUI program was filed with the court. On August 3, 1998, Judge Simpson revoked Mr. Brandstater's probation for failure to complete the DUI program, without appearances by the parties. On August 6, 1998, Judge Simpson ordered a bench warrant for Mr. Brandstater's arrest and set bail at $10,000.

Judge Simpson violated the Code of Judicial Ethics, canons 1, 2A, 2B(1) and 3E. By taking actions in Mr. Brandstater's case after he was disqualified, including continuing the case for 10 days when Mr. Brandstater failed to comply with the DUI school probation condition, and subsequently setting bail after revoking Mr. Brandstater's probation, Judge Simpson violated canons 1 (failing to observe high standards of conduct "so that the integrity and independence of the judiciary will be preserved"), 2A (failing to respect and comply with the law or act in manner that promoted public confidence in integrity of judiciary), and 2B(1) (allowing a social or political relationship to influence judge's judicial conduct or judgment, or conveying the impression that an individual was in a special position to influence the judge). Due to his relationship with Mr.

Brandstater, Judge Simpson should have [sic] not have participated in this case, and his judicial actions in the case violated canon 3E(1).

For the same reasons that were stated in Count One, Judge Simpson's conduct was willful misconduct within the meaning of article VI, section 18 of the California Constitution.

COUNT THREE

Count one is incorporated by reference.

On January 7, 1999, Mark Enzenauer received a citation (number 365243) for driving an unregistered vehicle in violation of Vehicle Code section 4000(a). On March 25, 1999, Mr. Enzenauer appeared before Glendale Municipal Court Commissioner Steven Lubell and pled guilty. Commissioner Lubell continued the matter to April 30, 1999 for proof of registration. On April 30, 1999, Mr. Enzenauer failed to appear and Commissioner Lubell issued a bench warrant and set bail at $500.

On May 11, 1999, Judge Simpson met in his chambers with Mr. Enzenauer and Mr. Brandstater and discussed Mr. Enzenauer's case. They told Judge Simpson that Mr. Enzenauer had received a registration ticket and had had difficulties in having his vehicle pass a smog inspection. The meeting took place while Commissioner Lubell was on the bench. Twice during the meeting, Judge Simpson called or had his clerk call Commissioner Lubell to summon him to Judge Simpson's chambers about the matter.

When Commissioner Lubell appeared in Judge Simpson's chambers later that afternoon, Mr. Enzenauer and Mr. Brandstater were present. Judge Simpson had Mr. Enzenauer's citation and was reviewing his case file. Judge Simpson asked Commissioner Lubell why Mr. Enzenauer had had to wait so long in his courtroom. Commissioner Lubell told Judge Simpson that he had not made Mr. Enzenauer wait that long. Mr. Brandstater told Commissioner Lubell that Mr. Enzenauer was a good person who had worked for him as a videographer, and Mr. Brandstater requested Commissioner Lubell's help. Judge Simpson asked Commissioner Lubell what could be done. Commissioner Lubell responded that Mr. Enzenauer could resolve the matter in open court.

Judge Simpson then ordered the case transferred back to Commissioner Lubell's court for further proceedings on May 12, 1999. Commissioner Lubell recalled the bench warrant, fined Mr. Enzenauer $135 on the ticket, and granted him an extension to June 11, 1999 to show proof of registration.

At the time of his actions, Judge Simpson knew that Mr. Enzenauer was a friend and business associate of Allen Brandstater. Due to Judge Simpson's relationship with Mr. Brandstater, Judge Simpson should have been disqualified from participating in Mr. Enzenauer's case pursuant to Code of Civil Procedure section 170.1(a)(6)(C).

Judge Simpson violated the Code of Judicial Ethics, canons 1, 2A, 2B(1), 2B(2), 3B(7) and 3E. By discussing the case with Commissioner Lubell, in the presence of Mr. Brandstater and Mr. Enzenauer, Judge Simpson violated canons 1 (failing to observe high standards of conduct "so that the integrity and independence of the judiciary will be preserved"), 2A (failing to respect and comply with the law or act in manner that promoted public confidence in integrity of judiciary), 2B(1) (allowing social or political relationships to influence judge's judicial conduct or judgment, or conveying the impression that an individual was in a special position to influence the judge), and 2B(2) (lending prestige of judicial office to advance pecuniary or personal interests of others). By discussing the case with Commissioner Lubell outside the presence of the prosecution, Judge Simpson violated canons 2B(2) (judge shall not initiate communications with sentencing judge) and 3B(7) (judge shall not initiate ex parte communications). By transferring the case to Commissioner Lubell's courtroom, Judge Simpson violated canon 3E(1) (judge shall disqualify himself in any proceeding in which disqualification is required by law).

For the same reasons that were stated in Count One, Judge Simpson's conduct was willful misconduct within the meaning of article VI, section 18 of the California Constitution.

COUNT FOUR

Count one is incorporated by reference.

On September 14, 1999, Martha Thayer received a citation (number 393301) for failing to stop for a red light in violation of Vehicle Code section 21453(a). The officer who issued the ticket gave Ms. Thayer until October 20, 1999 to appear in court. The case was never assigned to Judge Simpson. In addition, because Ms. Thayer was a good friend of Allen Brandstater and had been a friend or acquaintance of Judge Simpson for more than 30 years, Judge Simpson should have been disqualified from participating in the case pursuant to Code of Civil Procedure section 170.1(a)(6)(C).

Subsequently, Mr. Brandstater visited Judge Simpson in his chambers and asked him whether there was a way Ms. Thayer could avoid paying the fine and whether traffic school would keep the ticket from appearing on her driving record. Judge Simpson told Mr. Brandstater that Ms. Thayer could go to traffic school. Mr. Brandstater left a copy of Ms. Thayer's ticket with Judge Simpson.

Ms. Thayer did not appear in court on October 20, 1999, nor did she contact the clerk's office on or before that date to request a continuance. On October 20, 1999, Judge Simpson, or his court clerk at the judge's direction, contacted the clerk's office and requested that the matter be continued. As a result, Ms. Thayer's appearance date was continued to December 6, 1999.

Judge Simpson violated the Code of Judicial Ethics, canons 1, 2A, 2B(1), 2B(2) and 3E. By contacting the clerk's office and requesting that the matter be continued, Judge Simpson violated canons 1 (failing to observe high standards of conduct "so that the integrity and independence of the judiciary will be preserved"), 2A (failing to respect and comply with the law or act in manner that promoted public confidence in integrity of judiciary), 2B(1) (allowing social or political relationships to influence judge's judicial conduct or judgment, or conveying the impression that an individual was in a special position to influence the judge), and 2B(2) (lending prestige of judicial office to advance pecuniary or personal interests of others). Judge Simpson's failure to disqualify himself from the case violated canon 3E(1).

Since Judge Simpson's actions were unjudicial, were conducted in bad faith, and were taken in his judicial capacity, his conduct was willful misconduct within the meaning of article VI, section 18 of the California Constitution. Judge Simpson's conduct was unjudicial in that it violated the Code of Judicial Ethics. Judge Simpson acted in bad faith by taking judicial actions for the improper purpose of benefiting his friends, Martha Thayer and Allen Brandstater. By causing Ms. Thayer's case to be continued, Judge Simpson was acting in a judicial capacity.

COUNT FIVE

A. In approximately the summer of 1995, Judge Simpson contacted Glendale Municipal Court Commissioner Dona Bracke about an expired registration citation that Judge Simpson said had been issued to the son of a friend of his. The ticket was in warrant status. Judge Simpson asked Commissioner Bracke questions about the ticket, such as how such matters were handled.

B. In approximately the latter half of 1995 or early 1996, Judge Simpson went to Commissioner Bracke with another traffic ticket, told her that it had been issued to a friend of his, told her what the charge was and asked questions about the ticket, such as what the customary fine was.

C. In approximately 1996, Judge Simpson went to Commissioner Bracke's chambers with another traffic ticket that Judge Simpson told her had been issued to a friend of his. Judge Simpson asked Commissioner Bracke questions about the ticket, including what the normal fine would be. Commissioner Bracke later recused herself from the case because of the communication from Judge Simpson.

D. In approximately 1997, Judge Simpson called Commissioner Bracke to his chambers. Judge Simpson told Commissioner Bracke that the wife of a good friend of his who owned a Pasadena restaurant had received a ticket for which she was supposed to have appeared in Commissioner Bracke's courtroom. Judge Simpson told Commissioner Bracke that his friend was a very good person and had catered some events for him. Judge Simpson said that his friend had gone to court in his wife's place because she was ill, but that he left when Commissioner Bracke did not call his wife's name or acknowledge him when he answered on her behalf. As a result, a warrant had issued.

Judge Simpson asked Commissioner Bracke what his friend could do about the warrant. Commissioner Bracke said that Judge Simpson's friend could post bail on the warrant or hire a lawyer to come in. Commissioner Bracke also said that Judge Simpson's friend could bring in documentation and that her practice was to hold a warrant for two weeks if someone had a medical excuse. Judge Simpson later told his friend that he needed to bring to court some documents or medical papers.

Approximately one or two days later, Judge Simpson came through the back door of Commissioner Bracke's courtroom with his friend. Judge Simpson was wearing his judicial robe. The courtroom was full of people. Judge Simpson had his arm around his friend's shoulder, looked at Commissioner Bracke and said that this was the friend whose wife's ticket he had told her about. Judge Simpson patted his friend on the shoulder and assured him that Commissioner Bracke would take care of him. Judge Simpson walked his friend into the audience section of the courtroom to sit down.

Commissioner Bracke put the matter toward the end of the calendar to try to avoid creating the appearance that another judge could bring a friend into court to receive special treatment. When Commissioner Bracke called the case, Judge Simpson's friend responded. He had brought some documents explaining why his wife was unable to come to court. Commissioner Bracke recalled the warrant and held it for one or two weeks for the man's wife to come to court. Later that day, Judge Simpson asked Commissioner Bracke if everything went okay with the citation. Commissioner Bracke told Judge Simpson that she recalled the warrant and held it.

When Judge Simpson's friend's wife later appeared in court, Commissioner Bracke recused herself from the case because of the communications from Judge Simpson.

Judge Simpson violated the Code of Judicial Ethics, canons 1, 2A, 2B(1), 2B(2) and 3B(7). By communicating with Commissioner Bracke about pending traffic cases involving his friends and acquaintances, Judge Simpson violated canons 1 (failing to observe high standards of conduct "so that the integrity and independence of the judiciary will be preserved"), 2A (failing to act in manner that promoted public confidence in integrity of judiciary), 2B(1) (allowing social relationships to influence judge's judicial conduct or judgment, or conveying the impression that an individual was in a special position to influence the judge), and 2B(2) (lending prestige of judicial office to advance pecuniary or personal interests of others). By discussing cases with Commissioner Bracke outside the presence of one or both of the parties, Judge Simpson violated canon 3B(7) (judge shall not initiate ex parte communications).

Judge Simpson's conduct was prejudicial to the administration of justice and brought the judicial office into disrepute within the meaning of article VI, section 18 of the California Constitution. Prejudicial misconduct is "'conduct which a judge undertakes in good faith but which nevertheless would appear to an objective observer to be not only unjudicial conduct but conduct prejudicial to the public esteem for the judicial office....'" (Broadman v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1998) 18 Cal.4th 1079, 1104, cert. den. (1999) 525 U.S. 1070, citing Doan v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1995) 11 Cal.4th 294, 312.) Because Judge Simpson's purpose in approaching Commissioner Bracke is disputed, the parties do not stipulate that the judge's conduct was in bad faith, and hence willful.

COUNT SIX

In 1998, Judge Simpson asked to speak to Glendale Police Officer Randy Petersen in chambers. Once there, Judge Simpson showed Officer Petersen a ticket he had issued that day and told him that the ticket had been issued to someone Judge Simpson knew. Judge Simpson asked Officer Petersen about the circumstances of the ticket and how it could be handled. Judge Simpson's conduct implied that he wanted Officer Petersen to give his friend favorable treatment.

By communicating with Officer Petersen about a traffic ticket the officer had issued to the judge's acquaintance, Judge Simpson violated the Code of Judicial Ethics, canons 1 (failing to observe high standards of conduct "so that the integrity and independence of the judiciary will be preserved"), 2A (failing to act in manner that promoted public confidence in integrity of judiciary), 2B(1) (allowing a social relationship to influence judge's judicial conduct or judgment, or conveying the impression that an individual was in a special position to influence the judge), and 2B(2) (lending prestige of judicial office to advance pecuniary or personal interests of another).

Since Judge Simpson's actions were unjudicial, were conducted in bad faith, and were taken in his judicial capacity, his conduct was willful misconduct within the meaning of article VI, section 18 of the California Constitution. Judge Simpson's conduct was unjudicial in that it violated the Code of Judicial Ethics. Judge Simpson acted in bad faith by acting with the improper purpose of benefiting his acquaintance. By calling a police officer into his chambers to discuss a traffic ticket with the officer, Judge Simpson was acting in a judicial capacity.

C. The Commission's Adoption of the Findings and Conclusions

The commission adopts these findings of fact and conclusions of law as its findings and conclusions. The commission also concurs with Judge Simpson and Trial Counsel that those allegations in Count Five in the Notice of Formal Proceedings that remain disputed need not be resolved.[2]

DISCIPLINE

On the basis of these findings and conclusions, the commission, as authorized by article VI, section 18(d) of the California Constitution, publicly censures Judge Simpson and bars him from receiving an assignment, appointment, or reference of work from any California state court. This is the maximum sanction the commission may levy against a former judge, and the appropriate sanction for "the protection of the public, the enforcement of rigorous standards of judicial conduct, and the maintenance of public confidence in the integrity and independence of the judicial system."[3]

This decision shall constitute the public censure of Judge Simpson and a bar to Judge Simpson receiving an assignment, appointment, or reference of work from any California state court.

Commission members Judge Risë Jones Pichon, Justice Vance W. Raye, Ms. Lara Bergthold, Judge Madeleine I. Flier, Mr. Michael A. Kahn, Mrs. Crystal Lui, Mrs. Penny Perez, Ms. Ramona Ripston, Ms. Barbara Schraeger and Dr. Betty L. Wyman voted to impose this public censure and bar from receiving assignments. Commission member Mr. Marshall B. Grossman did not participate in this proceeding.

[2] The facts stipulated to in paragraphs A through C of Count Five are less detailed than those that were set forth in the Notice of Formal Proceedings. The Stipulation explained:

> The parties have omitted from paragraphs A – C of this count certain facts alleged in the Notice of Formal Proceedings that are in dispute and cannot be resolved without a hearing. The parties believe that it is unnecessary to resolve these factual disputes because (1) Judge Simpson admits that his conduct in paragraphs A – C nevertheless violated the Code of Judicial Ethics, (2) the overall stipulated misconduct is sufficient to support the proposed discipline, and (3) since Judge Simpson is a former judge, resolution of the disputed facts at a hearing would not result in discipline more severe than a censure and a bar.

The final paragraph on Page 10 is modified to read:

| Inquiry ConcerningFormer Judge Vincent J. McGraw, No. 169 | DECISION AND ORDER IMPOSING PUBLIC CENSURE AND BARRING JUDGE McGRAW FROM RECEIVING ASSIGNMENTS |

This is a disciplinary matter concerning Judge Vincent J. McGraw, a judge of the Fresno Municipal Court from October 5, 1989 to June 30, 1998, and a judge of the Fresno County Unified Superior Court from July 1, 1998 to September 20, 2002. Formal proceedings having been instituted, this matter came before the Commission on Judicial Performance pursuant to rule 127 of the Rules of the Commission on Judicial Performance.

The commission concludes, based on Judge McGraw's stipulation, that Judge McGraw during his 2002 campaign for reelection made false and misleading statements in response to questions posed by a television reporter, threatened to bring a legal action in an attempt to dissuade the publication of facts concerning him that he knew to be true, and engaged in improper campaign activities in and around the courthouse. The commission hereby publicly censures Judge McGraw and bars him from receiving an assignment, appointment, or reference of work from any California state court.

APPEARANCES

Judge McGraw is representing himself. Trial Counsel for the Commission on Judicial Performance is Jack Coyle.

PROCEDURAL HISTORY

A Notice of Formal Proceedings was filed on September 17, 2002, charging Judge McGraw with three counts of unethical conduct. Pursuant to rule 121 of the Rules of the Commission on Judicial Performance, the commission requested the appointment of three special masters. The Supreme Court appointed Justice Consuelo Maria Callahan, presiding, of the Court of Appeal, Third Appellate District; Judge Roger M. Beauchesne of the Superior Court of Stanislaus County; and Judge Donald Cole Byrd of the Superior Court of Glenn County.

Judge McGraw resigned from the bench effective September 20, 2002 and subsequently moved out of California.

On January 29, 2002, Judge McGraw and Trial Counsel submitted a Stipulation for Discipline by Consent pursuant to rule 127 of the Rules of the Commission on Judicial Performance.[1]

THE STIPULATION FOR DISCIPLINE BY CONSENT

A. Judge McGraw's Agreement to Discipline

Judge McGraw and Trial Counsel propose that the commission dispose of this matter by issuing a censure and bar from receiving an assignment, appointment, or reference of work from any California state court. Judge McGraw understands that if the commission accepts the proposal, the commission may articulate the reasons for its decision, and he agrees to accept any such explanatory language.

Judge McGraw has signed and submitted an affidavit consenting to the sanction of a censure and bar from any assignments, stating that his consent is freely and voluntarily given, admitting to the truth of the charges as set forth in the Notice of Formal Proceedings, and waiving review by the Supreme Court.

B. Findings of Fact and Conclusions of Law

The Stipulation for Discipline by Consent sets forth findings of fact and conclusions of law tracking the allegations set forth in the Notice of Formal Proceedings.

COUNT ONE

On January 12, 1999, the commission issued to Judge McGraw a notice of intended private admonishment. The private admonishment went into effect on January 26, 1999, when Judge McGraw informed the commission in writing that he would not contest the private admonishment. (Commission Rules 113, 114.) The "statement of facts and reasons" in the private admonishment included the following:

> In January 1998, the judges in the Fresno courts were given access to the Internet through the county's computer system. The policies of Fresno County and the Fresno courts specifically prohibited the use of county computers or the Internet in connection with sexually oriented, sexually explicit, or pornographic material. Judge McGraw was furnished with these policies when he was given Internet access. Beginning in January 1998, and continuing through August 1998, Judge McGraw frequently used the county computer in his chambers to access Internet sites containing sexually explicit materials. The judge's use of the computer for this purpose occurred on weekdays – > before, during and after regular court business hours – and on weekends. Records of the judge's Internet use maintained by Fresno County for the months of April 1998 through August 1998, indicate that the computer was logged on to these Internet sites, on average, approximately fifteen hours per month. Approximately eleven hours per month of this log on time occurred on weekdays between 8:00 a.m. and 5:00 p.m. The county did not maintain records of the judge's Internet use prior to April 1998. The judge's use of the computer violated the policies of Fresno County and the Fresno courts.

>
> On Friday, September 4, 1998, Judge McGraw was confronted about his inappropriate use of the computer by the presiding and assistant presiding judges of the Fresno courts. Judge McGraw was told that an investigation was underway concerning this matter and was given a copy of the county's records reflecting his Internet use in August. Judge McGraw admitted that he was the person accessing the sites reflected in the records. Judge McGraw also admitted that he was aware that his conduct violated the court and county policies prohibiting the use of the computer in connection with sexually explicit materials. During a second meeting that day with the presiding and assistant presiding judges, Judge McGraw admitted that he had been using the computer to access the Internet in the same manner and with the same frequency since January 1998, when the court obtained access to the Internet.
>
> When asked about these matters by the commission, Judge McGraw admitted that his conduct breached county computer protocol and was without excuse.

Judge McGraw ran (unsuccessfully) as the incumbent Fresno County Superior Court judge in a contested race in the March 5, 2002 judicial election. On February 25 and 26, 2002, Judge McGraw participated in two interviews with a reporter for Fresno television station KMPH concerning the 1998 misuse of his court computer, which had become an issue in the campaign. The interviews were conducted in a television studio and were tape-recorded for possible future broadcast. During the interviews, Judge McGraw made the following false and misleading statements in response to questions posed by the reporter:

A. On February 25, 2002, in response to the question whether allegations that he had accessed pornographic sites on his courthouse computer were true, Judge McGraw stated, "I don't have any information of what you're talking about," "I don't have any information whatsoever." When asked whether his statement was a denial, Judge McGraw stated, "[t]hat's a denial."

B. On February 26, 2002 (all subsequent statements through "K" were on February 26), Judge McGraw denied reports that in 1998 he had used his court computer to "surf the Internet for pornographic material," stating, "[n]o, that is not true. I categorically deny that."

C. Judge McGraw denied that he surfed the Internet for pornographic material on his work computer at the county courthouse in 1998 or at any other time, stating, "[t]hat did not take place."

D. Judge McGraw denied that he ever admitted to his then presiding judge that he had surfed the Internet for any kind of pornographic material, stating, "Not true. That did not happen.... In any way, shape or form."

E. Judge McGraw denied ever talking to his then presiding judge about "any of this," stating, "[n]o. I really don't know what you're talking about."

F. Judge McGraw denied that he ever admitted to his then presiding judge that he had misused his computer "in any way, shape or form, either in 1998 or since then," stating, "[n]o sir.... No. And, the questions you're asking me are very troubling because this is something that would have been the subject of judicial discipline and I have not been disciplined for these things that you are talking about."

G. Judge McGraw denied that he was disciplined by the Commission on Judicial Performance for improper use of his court computer, stating, "I have not been disciplined for these things that you are talking about."

H. Judge McGraw denied that he was ever privately disciplined by the Commission on Judicial Performance for improper use of his court computer or for any other reason "in any way, shape or form," stating, "[n]o ... [not] in any way."

I. Judge McGraw denied that he ever misused his court computer at any time throughout his career, stating, "[n]ot at any time ... throughout my career."

J. Judge McGraw stated that he initiated a discussion that day with the court executive officer to find out whether the court's computer system is serviced by in-house court technical personnel or by outside personnel provided by the county, and that he was informed by the court executive officer that the computers are serviced by in-house technical personnel. (In fact, Judge McGraw asked the court executive officer who had discovered that he had accessed pornographic Internet sites on his court computer.) Judge McGraw stated to the reporter that "the reason why that was important for me to know is because if our court personnel had discovered this, most likely I would have been told about it, and that has not happened. That simply is not true."

K. Judge McGraw stated that his own campaign had "spent almost all day today trying to uncover some substantiation for this story and we have not been able to substantiate the story. The story is not true." Judge McGraw further stated, "[t]he story is not true. It is false."

On March 1, 2002, portions of the interviews with Judge McGraw, including his false statements described in paragraphs A, B, C, D, E, F and G, were broadcast by KMPH in Fresno as part of a news story concerning the upcoming judicial election. Judge McGraw appeared on the program live and read a statement on-air. In that statement he recited a retraction of the pre-recorded denials. He expressed regret for having made them. He stated that he should have responded with "no comment."[2]

Honesty is a "minimum qualification" expected of every judge. (Kloepfer v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1989) 49 Cal.3d 826, 865.) Judge McGraw's conduct violated the Code of Judicial Ethics, canons 1 (failing to observe high standards of conduct so that the integrity and independence of the judiciary will be preserved), 2A (failing to act in manner that promoted public confidence in integrity of judiciary), 4A(2) (conducting extrajudicial activities that demean the judicial office) and 5B(2) (knowingly misrepresenting qualifications or any other fact concerning himself as candidate for judicial office).

The conduct constitutes prejudicial misconduct, which is generally defined as conduct which would appear to an objective observer to be not only unjudicial conduct, but conduct prejudicial to the public esteem for the judicial office. (Broadman v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1998) 18 Cal.4th 1079, 1104, citing Doan v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1995) 11 Cal.4th 294 at p. 312.)

Under these facts, prejudicial misconduct is also established by willful misconduct out of office, i.e., unjudicial conduct committed in bad faith by a judge not then acting in a judicial capacity. (Doan v. Commission, supra, 11 Cal.4th at p. 312, quoting Geiler v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications (1973) 10 Cal.3d 270, 284, fn. 11.) In this context, bad faith means a culpable mental state beyond mere negligence and consisting of either knowing or not caring that the conduct being undertaken is unjudicial and prejudicial to public esteem. (Broadman v. Commission, supra, 18 Cal.4th at p. 1093.)

[2] The commission notes that this statement was both ambiguous and misleading. Although the commission, its members and its staff are prohibited (with only a few exceptions) from disclosing any private discipline, there is no prohibition against a judge revealing that he or she had been privately disciplined.

COUNT TWO

Toward the end of the February 26, 2002 KMPH interview, Judge McGraw threatened legal action against "the station" if it published the allegations that he had denied. Judge McGraw stated, "I'm concerned if these allegations are on your newscast that my reputation, my career, twelve years on the bench, a sitting judge, is going to be damaged." Judge McGraw further stated, "I've heard of no evidence so far to substantiate the allegations. And it sounds to me like this is reckless," and that "it troubles me that if this is the subject of media coverage, that my reputation will be injured. And I'm seriously considering whether or not I shouldn't be seeking counsel and considering a lawsuit." Judge McGraw also stated that he had considered "filing a lawsuit in order to protect my reputation against a reckless story. I have been provided with no basis for the story and I know the story is not true." Judge McGraw then re-asserted his denial of the allegations, stating, "I don't know what you're talking about. I know that the allegations are not true." Judge McGraw again denied that he ever misused a county computer, stating, "[a]t no time." Judge McGraw again denied surfing the Web for pornographic sites, stating, "[t]hat's not true."

Judge McGraw's threat to bring legal action and his reiteration that the allegations were not true and that the news story lacked factual basis were made for the purpose of attempting to dissuade the publication of facts concerning him that were true and known by him to be true prior to the March 5, 2002 election.

Judge McGraw's conduct violated the Code of Judicial Ethics, canons 1, 2A, 4A(2) and 5B(2), and constitutes prejudicial misconduct for the same reasons as the conduct covered by Count One.

COUNT THREE

Prior to the March 5, 2002 election, Judge McGraw engaged in, or involved court employees in, improper campaign activities in and around the courthouse, as follows:

A. In October 2001, Judge McGraw distributed to several hundred court and county employees copies of a Petition in Lieu of Filing Fees and a request that the recipients support his candidacy for judicial office by collecting signatures on a petition. Judge McGraw provided a stamped envelope addressed to himself at his home address for the return of signed petitions to him. Judge McGraw's requests did not include a caution against the solicitation of signatures by court or county employees during working hours in court facilities. When this omission was brought to Judge McGraw's attention, he agreed with court administration's suggestion that the court should send a cautionary E-mail message to all affected court and county employees. Judge McGraw also agreed not to use any petitions circulated in this manner to county or court employees.

Although the requests for support were created using Judge McGraw's own private resources, he utilized court resources in the form of the court's interoffice mail system to distribute some or all of his requests for support.

Some court and/or county employees responded to Judge McGraw's request by soliciting signatures during working hours and/or in public facilities, activities which were prohibited by county ordinance. (Fresno County Ordinance Code, § 3.08.110(A)(1) and (2).) Some of [the] persons from whom Judge McGraw requested support were court employees subordinate to him.

B. Judge McGraw distributed a campaign brochure containing a photograph of himself and members of his judicial staff, who are employees of the Fresno county courts. Judge McGraw did not obtain the permission or consent of the staff members prior to including their photograph in his campaign brochure; some members of the staff complained about the unauthorized use of their photograph. (Fletcher v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1998) 19 Cal.4th 865, 880-881; prejudicial misconduct found where judge used photograph of court staff in reelection campaign without permission.) When this complaint was brought to the attention of Judge McGraw by court administration, Judge McGraw discontinued distribution of the campaign brochure and re-printed the campaign literature, omitting the photograph of judicial staff.

C. Judge McGraw engaged court employees and staff in conversations about his election campaign during working hours, including asking employees to obtain signatures on a petition in lieu of filing fees and asking employees for other assistance with his campaign.

D. On February 20, 2002, after finishing the 8:30 a.m. calendar, Judge McGraw failed to give precedence to his judicial duties when he left the courthouse to attend to campaign-related activities prior to the call of the 10:00 a.m. small claims calendar. Judge McGraw returned to the courthouse that morning, but not on time for the 10:00 a.m. calendar, which required some participants in calendared matters to return after lunch.

Judge McGraw's conduct violated the Code of Judicial Ethics, canons 1, 2A, 2B(2) (lending prestige of judicial office to advance his pecuniary or personal interests), 3A (failing to give judicial duties precedence over all other activities) and 5 (engaging in political activity that creates the appearance of impropriety), and constitutes prejudicial misconduct, i.e., conduct which would appear to an objective observer to be not only unjudicial conduct, but conduct prejudicial to the public esteem for the judicial office.

C. The Commission's Adoption of the Findings and Conclusions

The Commission adopts these findings of fact and conclusions of law as its findings and conclusions.

DISCIPLINE

The Supreme Court has indicated that the purpose of a disciplinary proceeding is "the protection of the public, the enforcement of rigorous standards of judicial conduct, and the maintenance of public confidence in the integrity and independence of the judicial system."[3] These goals support the issuance of a public censure and bar to assignment, even though Judge McGraw was defeated in his bid for re-election.

This decision is the only public determination that Judge McGraw (1) was privately admonished in 1999 for using the computer in his chambers to access Internet sites containing sexually explicit materials, (2) falsely denied, during his 2002 campaign for reelection, that he had been disciplined for accessing Internet sites containing sexually explicit material, (3) threatened legal action in an attempt to dissuade the publication of facts concerning him that he knew were true, and (4) engaged in improper campaign activities in and around the courthouse. This decision reassures the public that such misconduct will be investigated and disciplined even after a judge leaves office.

The censure and bar to assignments is the maximum sanction the commission may levy against a former judge and the appropriate sanction in this instance. In Inquiry Concerning Judge Patrick Couwenberg (2001), the commission found, inter alia, that the judge had deliberately and materially misrepresented his qualifications to facilitate his appointment to the bench. The commission removed Judge Couwenberg from the bench.[4] Here, Judge McGraw engaged in a similar dishonest course of conduct by knowingly uttering falsehoods to a television reporter, during his campaign for reelection, in an effort to keep information from the public.

On the basis of these findings and conclusions, the commission orders, as authorized by article VI, section 18(d) of the California Constitution, that Judge McGraw be publicly censured and barred from receiving an assignment, appointment, or reference of work from any California state court. This decision shall constitute the order of public censure and bar.

Commission members Judge Risë Jones Pichon, Justice Vance W. Raye, Ms. Lara Bergthold, Judge Madeleine I. Flier, Mr. Marshall B. Grossman, Mrs. Crystal Lui, Mrs. Penny Perez, Ms. Ramona Ripston and Ms. Barbara Schraeger voted to impose this public censure and bar from receiving assignments. Mr. Michael A. Kahn and Dr. Betty L. Wyman did not participate in this matter.

INQUIRY CONCERNING FORMER JUDGE DAVID E. WASILENKO

SUMMARY

A disciplinary matter was brought concerning a superior court judge, who retired during the proceedings.

The Commission on Judicial Performance censured the retired judge and barred him from receiving any assignment, appointment, or reference of work from any California state court. The commission concluded that the judge had committed six counts of willful misconduct, three counts of prejudicial misconduct, and one count of improper action under Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (d), regarding preferential treatment given to the judge's relatives and friends in handling cases. The judge met with a relative in his chambers and gave her advice about a speeding ticket. On several occasions, the judge diverted traffic cases to himself that involved his friends and friends of relatives, giving them more convenient procedural treatment and in some cases not imposing statutory fines. The commission determined that discussing the speeding ticket in chambers was improper action and, like the other acts, violated Cal. Code Jud. Ethics, canons 1, 2A, 2B(1), by creating an appearance and impression of favored treatment. The commission ruled that all of the other charged acts were willful misconduct because the judge abused his power by diverting the cases to himself and providing favorable substantive and procedural treatment to those with special access to the judge in violation of Cal. Code Jud. Ethics, canon 3B(1), and Code Civ. Proc., § 170, and by engaging in some ex parte communications in violation of canon 3B(7), regardless of the lawfulness of the decisions he made. The judge also violated Cal. Code Jud. Ethics, canons 3E(1), 3E(2), by failing to disqualify himself when required by Code Civ. Proc., § 170.1, subd. (a)(6)(C), and by failing to disclose information relevant to disqualification. His pattern of misconduct warranted the severest discipline available. (Opinion by Vance W. Raye, Chairperson.)

HEADNOTES

(1) Judges § 6.2—Discipline—Grounds—Ex Parte Communications—Exceptions.—Normally, ex parte communications with defendants appearing on traffic infractions would contravene Cal. Code Jud. Ethics, canon 3B(7). Nonetheless, to the extent that a judge is hearing such a case in the ordinary course of judicial business, by absenting himself, the district attorney impliedly, if not expressly, consents to the ex parte communications that necessarily occur in the judicial disposition of such matters. Adjudication of cases under such circumstances clearly is less than ideal. Moreover, the exigencies of the situation call for heightened vigilance on the part of the judge. Economic realities preclude the presence of prosecuting attorneys at most infraction trials. However, a judge involved in such a proceeding must be most circumspect in avoiding an appearance of lack of impartiality. The very absence of a prosecuting attorney makes it all the more important that the court at such trials use the utmost care to preserve not only the reality but also the appearance of fairness and lack of bias.

(2) Judges § 6.2—Discipline—Canons—Uniform Statewide Standards.—By their terms, the canons of the California Code of Judicial Ethics impose uniform statewide standards. Whenever an assigned case involves a party the judge knows, the judge must be particularly vigilant to ensure the appearance and reality of independence and impartiality. A judge may know a party more frequently in a small town than in a major metropolitan area, but the judge's ethical duties are the same irrespective of population statistics. Repeatedly diverting nonassigned cases so as to be in a position to afford preferential judicial treatment to family, friends and others specially situated is improper under the canons and intolerable in every county in the State of California.

(3) Judges § 6.2—Discipline—Grounds—Willful Misconduct.—There are three levels or types of judicial misconduct described in Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (d), that may subject a judge to discipline by the California Commission on Judicial Performance. The most serious, willful misconduct, is defined by the California Supreme Court as consisting of (1) unjudicial conduct that is (2) committed in bad faith (3) by a judge acting in his or her judicial capacity. The use of the power of judicial office to benefit a friend is a casebook example of willful misconduct.

(4) Judges § 6.2—Discipline—Grounds—Willful Misconduct—Elements.—In order to determine whether a judge's conduct is unjudicial under the first prong of the willful misconduct standard, the conduct is measured with reference to the California Code of Judicial Ethics. The failure of a judge to comply with the canons suggests performance below the minimum level necessary to maintain public confidence in the administration of justice. The bad faith requirement for willful misconduct is satisfied when a judge is (1) performing a judicial act for a corrupt purpose (which is any purpose other than the faithful discharge of judicial duties), or (2) performing a judicial act with knowledge that the act is beyond the judge's lawful judicial power, or (3) performing a judicial act that exceeds the judge's lawful power with a conscious disregard for the limits of the judge's authority. The judicial capacity prong of the willfulness test has been defined as follows: A judge is acting in a judicial capacity while performing one of the functions, whether adjudicative or administrative in nature, that are associated with the position of a judge or when the judge uses or attempts to use the authority of the judicial office for an improper purpose.

(5) Judges § 6.2—Discipline—Grounds—Prejudicial Misconduct.—Prejudicial misconduct is the second most serious type of judicial misconduct, and is a lesser included offense in willful misconduct. A primary distinction between willful and prejudicial misconduct is the presence or absence of bad faith. Unlike willful misconduct, prejudicial conduct does not require the presence of bad faith, but may occur when a judge, though acting in good faith, engages in conduct that adversely would affect the esteem in which the judiciary is held by members of the public who become aware of the circumstances of the conduct. Prejudicial misconduct may be committed by a judge either while acting in a judicial or nonjudicial capacity.

(6) Judges § 6.2—Discipline—Grounds—Improper Action.—The least serious type of misconduct is improper action, which consists of conduct that violates the California Code of Judicial Ethics, but which does not rise to the level of prejudicial misconduct. Improper conduct includes conduct that an objective observer aware of the circumstances would not deem to adversely affect the reputation of the judiciary.

(7) Judges § 6.2—Discipline—Grounds—Action in Cases Not Assigned to Judge.—It is an abuse of power for a judge to take action in cases not pending before the judge. A judge is dutybound to hear and decide all matters assigned to the judge except those in which he or she is disqualified (Cal. Code Jud. Ethics, canon 3B(1); Code Civ. Proc., § 170). The measure of the duty is coextensive with the limits of authority, that is, the judge is obligated to determine assigned cases, and forbidden to handle cases that are not before the judge as part of normal court business.

(8) Judges § 6.2—Discipline—Grounds—Preferential Treatment.—In instances of favoritism, public discipline has been imposed even for quantitatively minimal misconduct because the type of misconduct so seriously damages the reputation of the judiciary. The analysis does not turn on whether the judge's handling of defendant's case was lawful, but rather on the judge's leniency, special handling, favoritism, being influenced, and the resulting damage to the judicial institution. The defendant is not sanctioned, even in the case of the classic "fix," but rather, the judge is disciplined for harming the reputation of the judiciary by setting up a preferential system for dispensing favors for family or friends or others specially situated. This is true notwithstanding that there may be greater moral reprehensibility when there is an unlawful fix. The gravamen of the wrongdoing is the two-track system of justice—one for those with special access to the judge, and the other for everyone else.

(9) Judges § 6—Discipline—Willful Misconduct—Preferential Treatment.—By affording family, friends and others with special connections access to a preferential track of justice in six matters, the judge engaged in unjudicial conduct, in bad faith, while in a judicial capacity, thereby satisfying the three-prong test for willful misconduct. The judge's conduct was unjudicial because it was in violation of Cal. Code Jud. Ethics, canons 1, 2A, and 2B(1).

(10) Judges § 11—Disqualification—Grounds—Appearance of Bias.—Cal. Code Jud. Ethics, canon 3E(1), requires a judge to disqualify himself or herself in any proceeding in which disqualification is required by law. The cross-reference "as required by law" includes Code Civ. Proc., § 170.1, subd. (a)(6)(C), requiring disqualification if for any reason a person aware of the facts might reasonably entertain a doubt that the judge would be able to be impartial. The judge should have disqualified from the case of a young woman he considered a daughter and from the case of a young man who had long-standing close connections to the judge, as did his parents.

(11) Judges § 9—Disqualification—Duty to Disclose Relevant Information.—Even in instances where disqualification is not required under Cal. Code Jud. Ethics, canon 3E(1), a judge is obligated under canon 3E(2), in all trial court proceedings, to disclose on the record information that the judge believes the parties or their lawyers might consider relevant to the question of disqualification, even if the judge believes there is no actual basis for disqualification. The judge's failure to disclose on the record his personal and familial connections to persons appearing before him violated canon 3E(2).

(12) Judges § 6—Discipline—Grounds—Ex Parte Communication.—In instances where a defendant appeared without counsel on a straight traffic infraction, an issue of the district attorney's implied consent to ex parte communications was raised, since the district attorney has elected not to appear in these matters. In cases where a misdemeanor is also charged, the district attorney does appear and, thus, there is no issue of implied consent by the prosecutor to ex parte communication with the defendant. Where the judge communicated with individuals also charged with misdemeanors in the absence of the prosecutor, the judge violated Cal. Code Jud. Ethics, canon 3B(7).

(14) Judges § 6—Discipline—Willful Misconduct—Judicial Capacity.—The creation of the favored procedural and substantive tracks of justice and the fashioning of special treatment were done in the judge's judicial capacity and by reason of the power of his office.

(15) Judges § 6.2—Discipline—Willful Misconduct—Unjudicial Conduct—Influence—Ex Parte Communication.—Cal. Code Jud. Ethics, canon 2B(1), contains two prohibitions. The first provides that a judge shall not allow family, social, political, or other relationships to influence the judge's judicial conduct or judgment, and the second states that a judge shall not convey or permit others to convey the impression that any individual is in a special position to influence the judge. Where the judge did not personally know the defendant, the judge did not allow his relationship with each defendant to influence him in violation of canon 2B(1). Because the judge learned that the defendants were friends with persons with whom the judge had close relationships, by putting the defendants on a preferential track, the judge did "convey the impression" that the judge's friends were in a "special position to influence" the judge's handling of the defendants' cases in violation of canon 2B(1). In addition, since the defendants were charged with misdemeanors, there was no basis for finding consent by the prosecutor to the ex parte communication that took place in these cases in violation of canon 3B(7). These combined violations of canons constitute unjudicial conduct and satisfy the first part of the test for willful misconduct.

(16) Judges § 6.4—Discipline—Proceedings—Objective Standard.—The gauge of judicial misconduct rests on an objective standard. Where the judge improperly diverted nonassigned cases to himself, his recall of warrants to avoid the arrest and booking of the defendants was an abuse of discretion since none of the cases was legitimately before the judge. The improper course of conduct constitutes a serious abuse of authority that is the antithesis of the "faithful discharge of judicial duty" and is bad faith as a matter of law.

(17) Judges § 6—Discipline—Grounds—Censure—Improper Action—Appearance of Favoritism.—The judge's private meeting in chambers with his close relative and discussion of the relative's options with respect to her traffic ticket created an appearance that he was providing her with favored treatment in the resolution of her ticket. Because the judge took no action on the relative's ticket, the misconduct constituted only improper action. Under the constitution, only prejudicial or willful misconduct, not improper action, can form the basis for censure.

(18) Judges § 6.4—Discipline—Proceedings—Determination of Discipline—Factors.—The question of the appropriate level of discipline to impose on a judge is examined in the context of the purposes of Commission on Judicial Performance disciplinary proceedings, which are protection of the public, ensuring evenhanded and efficient administration of justice, and the maintenance of public confidence in the integrity of the judicial system. The disposition of a judicial disciplinary case depends in large measure on the nature and number of charges found to be true. The number of wrongful acts is relevant to determining whether they were merely isolated occurrences or, instead, part of a course of conduct establishing lack of judicial temperament and inability to perform judicial functions in an evenhanded manner. Whereas an isolated incident of wrongdoing may arise from a momentary ethical lapse, a continuing pattern reflects poor judgment and lack of judicial temperament. As to a judge who has retired from the bench, the question of suitable judicial temperament remains relevant to the question of whether a censure and bar are necessary and appropriate. A further factor to be considered in terms of whether the judge manifests unsuitability for the bench is the judge's inability or unwillingness to change behavior after less severe discipline by the commission.

(19) Judges § 6.2—Discipline—Grounds—Censure and Bar—Pattern of Preferential Treatment.—In a disciplinary matter involving a retired judge, a censure and bar—the maximum discipline available—was the appropriate discipline for favoritism in handling cases. The censure was an effort to repair the past damage to the reputation of the judiciary, and the bar was in order to safeguard the public going forward by precluding the judge from being a bench officer in California in the future. The judge committed nine incidents of willful misconduct. As the masters found, the judge engaged in a pattern of misconduct in which the judge repeatedly favored his friends with procedural shortcuts that were not available to citizens who had no relationship with the judge. There also were several instances where the judge afforded substantive breaks to the favored few. There was also the pattern, repeated in every count, of the judge diverting nonassigned cases to himself for his specialized handling. The overall scope of wrongdoing was alarming.

(20) Judges § 6—Discipline—Proceedings—Determination of Discipline—Factors—Prior Discipline.—The judge's prior discipline for remarkably similar misconduct demonstrates a lack of awareness of the problems and an unwillingness or inability to improve. The judge's failure or inability to reform suggests unsuitability for judicial office. In instances where the record does not suggest the judge has, or will be able to, overcome the trait leading to the misconduct, and that similar incidents will not recur, comparison of the discipline imposed in other cases is not fruitful.

(21) Judges § 6.2—Discipline—Grounds—Removal from Office—Preferential Treatment.—Affording preferential treatment to specially situated defendants constitutes a basis for removal, since mere censure would woefully fail to convey utter reproval of any judge who allows malice or other improper personal motivations to infect the administration of justice.

RAYE, Chairperson.—This disciplinary matter concerns Judge David E. Wasilenko (ret.), formerly a judge of the Yuba County Superior Court. Judge Wasilenko is charged in 10 counts, generally, of diverting cases to himself that were not pending before him and that otherwise would not have been assigned to him, and affording defendants—relatives, friends, and friends of friends—special favored procedural handling, and additionally in some instances, substantively lenient disposition of their traffic cases and related offenses. The judge is represented by James A. Murphy, Esq., and Harlan B. Watkins, Esq., of Murphy, Pearson, Bradley & Feeney of San Francisco, California. The examiners for the commission are Commission Trial Counsel Andrew Blum, Esq., and commission assistant trial counsel Bradford Battson, Esq.

Three special masters were appointed by the Supreme Court to hear and take evidence and to report to the commission. The masters are Hon. Rodney Davis, Associate Justice of the Court of Appeal, Third Appellate District; Hon. Ramona J. Garrett, Judge of the Solano County Superior Court; and Hon. John W. Runde, Judge of the San Mateo County Superior Court. They held an evidentiary hearing in Sacramento; in their final report to the commission, dated September 30, 2004, they found that Judge Wasilenko committed willful misconduct in six counts, prejudicial misconduct in three counts, and improper action in one count, based on findings and conclusions that we discuss here. We conclude that there were nine instances of willful misconduct, in counts two through 10, and that count one involved improper action.

Judge Wasilenko retired from his judicial office effective January 25, 2005, the day before the final oral argument before the commission. The judge did not appear at the oral argument hearing on January 26, 2005,[1] and both counsel stipulated at the hearing to waive oral argument before the commission. Accordingly, on that date the matter was taken under submission on the written record.

Article VI, section 18, subdivision (d) of the California Constitution, as pertinent to the disciplinary options available to the commission in this matter, provides that the commission may "censure a judge or former judge or remove a judge" for willful or prejudicial misconduct, and provides the commission may bar a former judge who is censured from receiving an assignment, appointment, or reference of work from any California state court. At least in light of the timing of the judge's retirement in this matter, we appear to be constitutionally prohibited by the foregoing from imposing discipline more severe than a censure and a bar against Judge Wasilenko. We do impose such maximum discipline and order Judge Wasilenko censured and barred, based on the statement of facts and conclusions and applicable law set forth in this decision.

I. Findings of Fact

The operative pleading setting forth the charges against Judge Wasilenko is the first amended notice of formal proceedings, filed on November 18, 2003. Based on the evidence adduced at the hearing before the masters, they found most of the essential facts to be true as charged. To the extent that the masters found certain facts not to have been proven, the examiner does not object,

[1] The commission has been advised that Judge Wasilenko has been absent from the bench since mid-May 2004 pursuant to his physician's orders and that his nonappearance at the oral argument was due to health-related issues.

and we concur. However, the judge objects to the lack of certain findings by the masters, and we will discuss that topic separately. Our findings here are a summary of the masters' findings; we note in brackets or through more extended discussion any significant variation between our own findings and those proposed by the masters.

Sheila Messick received a speeding ticket on September 11, 1999. Messick is married to the judge's first cousin and the judge considers her a close relative. On Messick's initiative, she met with the judge in his chambers on September 24 and discussed a family matter with him. Thereafter, the topic of conversation switched to her ticket and the available options to resolve it. With Messick present, Judge Wasilenko had the file brought to his chambers by a clerk. The case would not have come before Judge Wasilenko in the ordinary course of judicial business and there was no representative of the district attorney's office present. Upon reviewing the file, the judge told Messick the amount of the fine, verified that she was eligible to attend traffic school, and told her the cost of attending school. Without further involvement of the judge, Messick did pay the standard fine and attended traffic school.

"The Judge did not believe he was hearing the matter or otherwise taking any action on Messick's citation. Instead he was answering her questions regarding the nature of the charges and expenses she was facing." Nonetheless, if the case had come before him through a regular assignment to his department, Judge Wasilenko believes he would have been disqualified under Code of Civil Procedure section 170.1 from hearing it.

Count Two

Heather Robinson was cited on October 25, 1999, for an expired vehicle registration. Robinson lived with the judge and his family from 1996 to 1998 while she was in high school, and again for several months during mid-1999. The relationship between the judge and Robinson is considered by both of them as that of father and daughter.

Robinson was not living with Judge Wasilenko when she received the citation, but she received mail via the judge's post office box, where a courtesy notice relating to the citation was mailed to her. The judge learned of the citation when he retrieved the notice from his mailbox.

It was stipulated that Robinson's vehicle was reregistered on November 15, 1999, although neither the judge nor Robinson has any recollection of any discussion between them concerning the matter. Recollections by the judge and Robinson of other details are equally cloudy.

However, it is clear that Robinson "never appeared before [Judge Wasilenko] on the ticket." Nonetheless, on November 18 (three days after the car was reregistered), the judge requested that a clerk bring Robinson's file to his chambers. We find that the judge was alone in his chambers when the clerk arrived with the file.

Robinson's case would not have come before Judge Wasilenko in the ordinary course of judicial business and he made no disclosure, on the record or otherwise, concerning the familial relationship between him and the defendant. The judge wrote "dismissed as corrected" on the file and handed it back to the clerk. A statutorily mandated $10 administrative fee was not imposed by the judge. The masters resolved conflicting inferences and found the judge did have proof of the correction (i.e., evidence of the reregistration) prior to dismissing the case. We accept the masters' resolution and finding.

In their findings relating to count two, the masters describe certain generalized policies and procedures of the Yuba County Superior Court concerning "correctable" offenses.[2] These general practices come into play in other counts as well and are summarized as follows:

—In cases involving correctable traffic infractions, when a person mails or personally presents to a clerk in the clerk's office some proof of correction that has been signed off [verified] by law enforcement, a clerk dismisses the citation [closes the case] without any judicial involvement. In such instance, if there is no verification of the correction, a clerk submits the citation and available documentation to a judicial officer in chambers for a determination of the adequacy of proof of correction.

—There is a $10 dismissal fee fixed by Vehicle Code section 40611 applicable to the dismissal of such correctable infractions. Judge Wasilenko is of the view that he has discretion to waive this fee, and frequently does so, for financial hardship and to alleviate inconvenience to defendants.

—If someone sends documentary proof of correction to the clerk's office without paying the $10 dismissal fee, the documents are returned without dismissing the citation unless the party also has sent money to pay a fine for an accompanying offense listed in the citation. In the latter instance, a clerk will forward the file to a judge with a request to waive the $10 fee [in order to be able to close the file, thereby reducing the administrative burden of collecting the final $10. Under no circumstance is a clerk permitted independently to waive the $10 fee.][3]

[2] Robinson's expired registration is an example of such a "correctable offense." Upon submission of proof of correction of the violation, that is, evidence of reregistration of the vehicle, the case may be dismissed.

—When original documents are sent in as proof of correction, they are placed in the file. If original documents are presented to a clerk at the window, the clerk makes a copy for the file, or a notation on the file, and returns the original. If proof of correction is presented in open court, the clerk includes a notation in the minutes that the citation was dismissed with proof of correction.

Count Three

Casey Landis was cited on December 14, 1999, for failure to stop at a stop sign. Landis and the judge knew each other through a variety of church and community connections. Landis also was friends with the judge's daughters and had visited the judge's home about three times; the judge was friends with the defendant's parents.

Prior to the due date for paying the fine, Landis telephoned the judge and told him that he was about to enter the military and therefore needed to clear up the pending citation; he inquired on the telephone whether he could do community service in lieu of paying the fine. The judge told Landis he would need to appear in court and that, then, the judge would "see what he could do" regarding community service.

On March 14, 2000, the judge had a clerk bring Landis's file to chambers and told the clerk he would handle the case as a "walk-in" the next day. On March 15, Landis appeared in open court before Judge Wasilenko. The judge made no disclosure concerning his relationship with Landis or Landis's parents. After Landis pled guilty, he told the judge he could not pay the fine; his request to perform community service was granted and the fee for attending traffic school was waived by the judge. The masters infer, based on the relationships between the judge and the defendant and his parents, that the judge acted, in part, "to provide a favored procedural track through the court system for someone he knew well." We concur. The judge's substantive disposition of Landis's citation was not more lenient than Landis otherwise likely would have received, and his financial situation made him a suitable person to have his fine converted to community service.

[3] The bracketed findings are ours. They are supported by testimony and we find them relevant. It is particularly significant that the clerks cannot waive the $10 fee if a person comes to their windows. By going directly to chambers, several of the defendants escaped paying the $10 fee through an exercise of (assumed) discretion by Judge Wasilenko that otherwise would not be available from a clerk in the clerk's office. The judge's surrogate daughter, Heather Robinson, did not even need to go to chambers to get this benefit (count two).

Count Four

Casey Landis—the same defendant as in count three, who had a direct personal relationship with the judge and the judge's daughters, as well as connections with the judge through his parents—was cited on September 22, 2000, for a malfunctioning vehicle light. On October 29, 2000, he was cited again for the malfunctioning light as well as for failing to have proof of insurance. Landis failed to appear, bail was increased and holds were placed on his driver's license.

On March 26, 2001, Landis came to court on a day that "walk-in" calendars were not scheduled. He met with Judge Wasilenko in chambers. The judge had a clerk bring the files for both citations to chambers, and based on Landis showing proof that he had insurance and that the light had been fixed, the judge released the holds on Landis's license and ordered him to complete community service under the judge's personal direction. The finding that the judge had proof of the corrections prior to his taking judicial action is based on the masters' resolution in the judge's favor of conflicting inferences. We accept the masters' resolution and finding.

The masters infer, based on the relationships between the judge and the defendant and his parents that the judge acted, in part, "to provide a favored procedural track through the court system for someone he knew well." We concur. There was no evidence that Landis was in need of expedited assistance in resolving his citations or that there was any inability on his part to use "standard court procedures." The sentence imposed, however, was not more lenient than that Landis otherwise likely would have received, and the 16 hours of community service may have been on the harsh side.

Count Five

Nathan Sokoloski was cited on August 10, 2001, and charged with two misdemeanors on September 5, relating to his being under age 21 while driving a motor vehicle containing alcoholic beverages. There are long-standing close connections between the judge and both Nathan and his parents of a nature requiring Judge Wasilenko to disqualify himself.

It is standard practice in Yuba County in cases such as Sokoloski's, when a minor is charged for the first time with possession of alcohol, to divert the defendant to a youth alcohol program run by Pathways, and upon completion of the program, for the case to be dismissed. Typically, the district attorney does not object to the referral to Pathways or to the later dismissal. Normally, however, a minor defendant would need to appear in court, or hire an attorney to appear, in order to be offered the Pathways referral.

Sokoloski's case was scheduled for arraignment on September 12, 2001, in Department 5 (Judge Wasilenko sat in Dept. 4). Prior to September 11, Nathan's father, Jerry Sokoloski, told Judge Wasilenko at a Kiwanis meeting about Nathan's case and that Nathan was attending a fire training program and could not come to court on the 12th, and inquired what to do. The judge explained the Pathways referral program, stated it was discretionary with the district attorney, and said he would talk to the district attorney about a continuance so that Nathan would not need to leave training to come to court.

On September 11, Judge Wasilenko arranged for Sokoloski's case to be heard in his department (despite its being assigned to a different department for the next day). He invited Deputy District Attorney Veronica Henderson and Attorney Jud Waggoman—both of whom were in court on other matters—into chambers. Neither Nathan nor any attorney retained to represent him was present in court or in chambers. The judge asked Waggoman to act as a " 'friend of the court' " in order to " 'make a special appearance' so that both sides would be present" when he continued the case "to enable Sokolo[]ski to stay at the fire academy."

In chambers, the judge disclosed to Henderson and Waggoman that he knew the defendant and his family, told them that the defendant wanted to be referred to Pathways and that he, Judge Wasilenko, "intended to send him there, but that one of Sokolo[]ski's parents had told the Judge that Sokolo[]ski . . . would be unable to appear in court on September 12, 2001." Henderson consented to a continuance to November 1, and Waggoman ostensibly waived time on behalf of the defendant. Judge Wasilenko continued the matter to November 1, ordered it transferred back to Department 5, and stated that he, the judge, personally would provide notice to the defendant and to Pathways.

After the in-chambers conference on September 11, one of Sokoloski's parents told the judge that Nathan would need more time to complete the Pathways program because the fire training program would not be completed until November 2001. The judge replied that the alcohol program could be continued until after Nathan completed his fire training, and based on that assurance from the judge, the parents felt no need to retain counsel to represent Nathan. Following up on the new information about the delay in Nathan's completion of the fire training, Judge Wasilenko had a clerk bring the file to his chambers on September 20, and in chambers told Deputy District Attorney Henderson that Sokoloski needed additional time to complete the Pathways program. Henderson had no objection to additional time being granted, and the judge continued the matter to March 5, 2002, and again transferred the case back to the department in which it originally was scheduled to be heard.

The judge knew he was having an ex parte communication about a pending case when he spoke with Nathan's father. As of the time of the hearing before the masters, the judge was of the view that "since he knew the Sokolo[]ski family and spoke with the defendant's father about the case, he should have recused himself from the case."

The masters infer, based on the relationships between the judge and the defendant and his parents, that the judge acted, in part, "to provide a favored procedural track through the court system for someone he knew well." We concur. However, despite the judge's intercession, it does not appear that Nathan received judicial rulings or referrals different from those he likely would have received had he (or any retained counsel) presented the same information to a different judge with Veronica Henderson as the prosecutor.

Count Six

Ryan Heenan was a passenger in the car driven by Nathan Sokoloski (count five) and was cited on August 10, 2001, and criminally charged with a misdemeanor on September 5 for being an underage passenger in possession of alcohol in a motor vehicle. Although Heenan knew the judge and his daughters, the judge does not recall knowing Heenan. As a first-time youthful alcohol offender, Heenan was a suitable candidate for diversion to the Pathways program. (See discussion of Pathways in count five, ante, at p. 37.)

Heenan failed to appear on September 6, 2001, in Department 5 for arraignment; Judge Dawson ordered the issuance of a bench warrant which was held until October 25, when Heenan failed a second time to appear, whereupon the warrant issued and was delivered to the Marysville Police Department [to effectuate the defendant's arrest].

At some time after they both were cited, Nathan Sokoloski suggested to Heenan that Heenan should talk to Judge Wasilenko about "what could be done to take care of the case." Nathan told Heenan that he, Nathan, was going to talk to the judge or already had done so. On November 5, Heenan went to the judge's courtroom, and after he had conversations with a couple of bailiffs, Heenan was invited by the judge into chambers. There was nothing scheduled in Heenan's case that day, and misdemeanor arraignments were heard in Department 5 before Judge Dawson at the time. Heenan introduced himself to Judge Wasilenko, showed him the citation, and told him he had not appeared on September 5 because he was "fighting a fire in Yellowstone National Park." The judge had a clerk bring Heenan's file to chambers; it was apparent from the file that Heenan was one of Sokoloski's codefendants in that the one complaint named three defendants—Sokoloski and Heenan, as well as Timothy Goetz, the defendant in count seven.

The masters resolved conflicting inferences in the judge's favor to find that he obtained the advance approval of Deputy District Attorney Veronica Henderson to proceed in her absence, and to recall the bench warrant, reinstate Heenan on his own recognizance (O.R.), and continue the case to give Heenan time to complete the Pathways program. We accept the masters' resolution and finding. Judge Wasilenko told Heenan to enroll in Pathways, and stated that when Heenan completed the program, his case would be dismissed. The judge continued the case to December 17, 2001, for proof of completion of the Pathways program. The masters infer that the judge's intent was to spare Heenan the need to be booked on the warrant when he had good cause for not appearing, and to afford him the opportunity of diversion to Pathways, such as other similarly situated defendants generally are. We concur.

When the judge recalled Heenan's warrant, he was not aware that it had already been sent to law enforcement to effectuate Heenan's arrest. Nonetheless, Judge Wasilenko was of the view that judges retained discretion to recall such a warrant, even though according to court policy, court clerks could not place a defendant on a walk-in calendar without the defendant first being booked into jail on the warrant. The court policy was adopted by the county judges at a meeting on January 25, 2000, as reflected in the minutes of the meeting introduced into evidence before the masters as exhibit 9, providing as follows: ". . . Adopt new policy as follows: On FTA's [failures to appear] if the warrant has already gone to the law enforcement agency and defendant requests to be placed on walk-in calendar the defendant needs to be booked on said warrant, if warrant has not gone out to the agency, then defendant can be placed on the walk-in calendar on a specific date and time. . . ." (Italics added.)

The masters construe the court policy as not depriving the judges of discretion to recall a warrant even after it had gone to law enforcement. They believe it deprived court clerks of any discretion, however. In other words, if a defendant came to the clerk's window with a warrant that had gone to law enforcement, the defendant would need to be booked prior to being allowed access to a judge through the walk-in calendar or otherwise. We concur in the masters' interpretation of the court policy. As noted by the masters, "being booked into jail is necessarily a traumatic experience." It is significant that a defendant such as Heenan, who bypassed the clerks, with direct access to the judge in chambers, avoids the booking trauma. We find that this is a distinct procedural and substantive benefit to Heenan that resulted from the special access that Judge Wasilenko afforded him.

Count Seven

Timothy Goetz (like Ryan Heenan in the previous count) was a passenger in the car being driven by Nathan Sokoloski (count five) and was cited on August 10, 2001, and criminally charged with a misdemeanor on September 5 for being an underage passenger in possession of alcohol in a motor vehicle. As a first-time youthful alcohol offender, Goetz also was a suitable candidate for diversion to the Pathways program. (See discussion concerning Pathways, ante, at p. 37.)

Goetz appeared before Judge Dawson in Department 5 on September 6, and was referred to Pathways and released on O.R., with the case continued to November 1 for proof of completion of the alcohol program. Goetz failed to appear on November 1 and Judge Dawson ordered the issuance of a bench warrant; the complaint was amended to add a charge for failure to appear—another misdemeanor. For reasons that are not clear, Judge Wasilenko arranged to have Goetz's file brought to chambers the following day, November 2. The masters do find, however, and we concur, that no causal connection was shown between Judge Wasilenko requesting the file and the fact that the warrant was not sent to law enforcement.

On November 5, the same day as Heenan (count five) met with Judge Wasilenko in chambers, Goetz also met with the judge in chambers. The judge testified that he recalled being told by Goetz that he too had missed a court date because he was fighting fires. As with Heenan, the masters resolve inferences in the judge's favor to find that he again obtained Veronica Henderson's advance approval, and then rereleased Goetz on O.R., rereferred him to Pathways, and continued his case for proof of completion of the Pathways program. We accept the masters' resolution and finding. Goetz completed the Pathways program in January 2002 and his case was dismissed.

As with Heenan, the masters again infer that the judge's intent was to spare Goetz the need to be booked on the warrant when he had good cause for not appearing, and to afford him the opportunity of diversion to Pathways, such as other similarly situated defendants generally are. We concur. It does not appear that Goetz received judicial rulings or referrals different from those he likely would have received had he (or any retained counsel) presented the same information to a different judge with Veronica Henderson as the prosecutor.

Count Eight

Anthony Franks was cited on December 11, 2001, and criminally charged on December 21 with a misdemeanor for driving with a suspended license.

He failed to appear in court on January 10, 2002, and Judge Dawson issued a bench warrant that was signed by Judge Curry on January 17, 2002, and delivered to the Marysville Police Department. A Department of Motor Vehicles hold was placed on Franks's license on January 16, 2002. Franks is a friend of Heather Robinson, the judge's surrogate daughter, but the judge did not recognize Franks when he met him in chambers and does not know him.

On March 6, 2002, Franks accompanied a defendant named Jacqueline Morris to her appearance in court before Judge Wasilenko that day. She was sentenced to community service and was told by the judge to wait until the end of the court session so that the judge could give her contact information regarding her community service. At the end of the calendar, Franks accompanied Morris into chambers. When the judge was finished dealing with Morris's referral to community service, Franks "inquired about Heather." The masters determined, and we concur, that Franks did the name dropping concerning Heather Robinson at the outset of his conversation with the judge. Following a brief discussion about Heather, Franks said he had a failure-to-appear matter, and wondered if he could get a walk-in appointment. The judge said "We'll take a look," and requested a clerk bring Franks's file to chambers. In the interim, the judge asked Franks why he had failed to appear. Franks responded, untruthfully, that he had been in the Butte County jail; the judge accepted Franks's false explanation at face value.

A clerk brought Franks's file to chambers. The case was not assigned to Judge Wasilenko and arraignments were handled in a different department. Again, the masters resolve inferences in the judge's favor to find that he again obtained Veronica Henderson's advance approval, and then recalled the bench warrant, ordered Franks released on O.R. and set the matter for arraignment on May 30, 2002. We accept the masters' resolution and finding. The judge did not require Franks to be booked on the warrant. As in count six, the masters again found that in not requiring Franks to be booked, Judge Wasilenko did not violate the court policy (see discussion of court policy, ante, at p. 40) that disallowed the court clerks any discretion concerning booking on a warrant that had gone to law enforcement. Again, we concur in the masters' interpretation of the court policy. But as with the situation involving Ryan Heenan who bypassed the clerks, Franks also avoided the trauma of being booked by reason of his direct access to the judge in chambers. We find that this is a distinct procedural and substantive benefit to Franks that resulted from the special access that Judge Wasilenko afforded him.

Count Nine

Erin Porter was cited on June 14, 2002, for failing to stop at a stop sign, failing to have proof of insurance, and for having an expired registration. The judge coached Porter in softball for a couple of years while she was in high school. She calls him "Dave" and is a friend of one his daughters. The judge knows Porter's parents and knows her, but does not consider her a friend.

On July 11, 2002, Erin Porter, accompanied by her friend, Erin Hendrix, went to the courthouse where they coincidentally met a court clerk, Lisa Perkins-Sparks, who was a friend of Hendrix. Porter was uncertain where she should go concerning her ticket, and Perkins-Sparks directed her to Department 5, which was presided over by Judge O'Connor at the time. Perkins-Sparks then entered Judge Wasilenko's chambers and conveyed greetings to him from "the Erins"; he asked that they be shown in, which Perkins-Sparks did, and then departed.

In chambers, Porter told Judge Wasilenko she thought she was going to have a trial later that morning on a ticket she had received. She told Judge Wasilenko she was not driving as fast as was stated on the ticket and asked him how to contest the ticket. After verifying from Porter that she had not stopped at the stop sign, as charged, he told her it did not matter how fast she was going; the issue was the failure to stop. The judge admits he counseled Porter to take responsibility for her actions, but denies that he was giving her legal advice concerning the feasibility of mounting a defense. The judge knew that if Porter wanted to contest guilt, her trial would be in a different department from his and that it would not occur until one or two months in the future.

Porter then told Judge Wasilenko she wanted to plead guilty and take care of the matter. Instead of sending her to Department 5 or the clerk's office, the judge had a clerk bring Porter's file to his chambers. Porter pled not guilty or nolo contendere to the stop sign violation and showed the judge and the clerk proof of registration and insurance as of the time of the citation. The judge imposed a fine and penalty assessment for the stop sign violation and dismissed the insurance and registration charges. He did not impose a statutory $10 fee due in connection with the dismissal of the registration violation.

Count 10

Kris Kraus was cited on January 30, 1999, for an expired registration and cracked windshield. Following her failure to appear as agreed, a hold was placed on her license on March 23, 1999. The judge and Kraus are longtime friends and former neighbors on the same street. Their children played together, and the judge coached Kraus's two sons in Little League.

On June 10, 1999, Kraus went to Department 5 and waited all morning for her case to be heard by Judge Dawson, the judge presiding in that department. Her case had not been heard by noon; during the lunch recess, she coincidentally met Judge Wasilenko in the corridor. They talked about their families and Kraus went into the judge's chambers with him. In response to the judge's inquiry, Kraus said she had a ticket for which she had proofs of correction, adding that she had waited all morning for her case to be called and that she needed to return to work. The judge looked at Kraus's proofs, had a clerk bring the file to his chambers, and then dismissed the citation and the associated failure to appear without imposing the statutory $10 correction fee.

Factual Issues Concerning Ex Parte Communications—Canon 3B(7)

There is an issue that runs throughout this case, affecting both the findings and conclusions, that arises out of the policy of the Yuba County District Attorney not to staff pure traffic infraction cases in which the defendant appears without counsel and does not seek a trial. The policy is described by the masters as follows:

"The Yuba County District Attorney does not participate in the adjudication of traffic infractions unless the infraction is charged along with felonies or misdemeanors in a criminal complaint or a person receiving a citation charging an infraction is represented by an attorney and elects to contest the infraction in a court trial. In all other cases in which a citation is pending in the Yuba County Superior Court, the judges adjudicate the infractions without any involvement by the district attorney.

"There is no agreement with the Yuba County District Attorney that a judge need not disclose a conflict or potential conflict before adjudicating a traffic infraction or criminal charge."

Patrick McGrath, the Yuba County District Attorney, testified before the masters that the nonappearance policy is driven by budgetary and related personnel constraints and we so find. As correctly noted by the masters, however, McGrath made clear that he did not intend the policy to excuse a judge from the judge's ordinary duty to disclose an actual or potential conflict in any case. The masters found that implementation of the policy necessarily resulted in a judge having ex parte communications with the propria persona defendants who appeared on pure traffic infraction, nontrial matters.

(1) Normally, such ex parte communications would contravene California Code of Judicial Ethics canon 3B(7) (all further references to a canon are to the California Code of Judicial Ethics). Nonetheless, to the extent that a judge is hearing such a case in the ordinary course of judicial business, we agree with the masters that by absenting himself, the district attorney impliedly, if not expressly, consents to the ex parte communications that necessarily occur in the judicial disposition of such matters. Adjudication of cases under such circumstances clearly is less than ideal. Moreover, the exigencies of the situation call for heightened vigilance on the part of the judge. We concur in the views expressed by the court in People v. Marcroft (1992) 6 Cal.App.4th Supp. 1, 4 [8 Cal.Rptr.2d 544] on this point: "Economic realities preclude the presence of prosecuting attorneys at most infraction trials . . . . However, a judge involved in such a proceeding must be most circumspect in avoiding an appearance of lack of impartiality. The very absence of a prosecuting attorney makes it all the more important that the court at such trials use the utmost care to preserve not only the reality but also the appearance of fairness and lack of bias."

We believe that all of the foregoing discussion rests on an assumption that the propria persona uncontested pure infraction cases are being heard in the ordinary course of judicial business. However, none of the cases that form the basis of the charges against Judge Wasilenko fit within that pattern. As will be discussed, the judge abused his power by hearing cases that were not legitimately pending before him. Mr. McGrath was not asked about the applicability of his policy to such a situation. In view of the silence of the record, we deem it inappropriate to make findings or conclusions based on assumptions. Further, since a resolution of the issue would not affect the outcome of our ultimate decision, we do not believe it necessary to refer the matter back to the masters for the taking of additional testimony on this limited point.

In the absence of evidence, we decline to make any findings or conclusions concerning canon 3B(7) except as to the counts where it is clear that the nonappearance policy is inapplicable. The masters found the policy inapplicable in count five because Nathan Sokoloski was charged with misdemeanors. We concur, and also agree with the masters that the judge's ex parte communications in connection with count five were in violation of canon 3B(7). (See discussion, post, at pp. 52–53.) Following the same line of reasoning, we find that since misdemeanors also were charged against Ryan Heenan (count six), Timothy Goetz (count seven) and Anthony Franks (count eight), the nonappearance policy again was inapplicable, and the ex parte communications that took place in each of those counts were in violation of canon 3B(7). (See discussion, post, at p. 55.)

Factual Issues Concerning Demographics

Judge Wasilenko, through his counsel, objects to the omissions in the masters' report of the facts that the judge was born in Marysville, has lived in Yuba County his entire life and that both Marysville and Yuba County are sparsely populated. No specific relevance is attributed to these facts, but counsel make passing references to "Marysville is a small community" and that the judge "regularly sees individuals that he is familiar with on some level before him in court on traffic matters." The suggested import of these facts is not explained.

(2) By their terms, the canons impose uniform statewide standards. Whenever an assigned case involves a party the judge "knows," the judge must be particularly vigilant to ensure the appearance and reality of independence and impartiality. The situation may arise more frequently in a small town than a major metropolitan area, but the judge's ethical duties are the same irrespective of population statistics. In any case, the demographics of Marysville and Yuba County are irrelevant to the misconduct engaged in by Judge Wasilenko. Repeatedly diverting nonassigned cases so as to be in a position to afford preferential judicial treatment to family, friends and others specially situated is improper under the canons and intolerable in every county in this state.

II. Conclusions of Law

The Three Levels of Judicial Misconduct

(3) There are three levels or types of judicial misconduct described in article VI, section 18, subdivision (d), of the California Constitution that may subject a judge to discipline by the commission. The most serious, willful misconduct, is defined by the California Supreme Court as consisting of (1) unjudicial conduct that is (2) committed in bad faith (3) by a judge acting in his or her judicial capacity. (Broadman v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1998) 18 Cal.4th 1079, 1091 [77 Cal.Rptr.2d 408, 959 P.2d 715] (Broadman); Dodds v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1995) 12 Cal.4th 163, 172 [48 Cal.Rptr.2d 106, 906 P.2d 1260] (Dodds).) The use of the power of judicial office to benefit a friend is a "casebook example of wilful misconduct." (McCullough v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1989) 49 Cal.3d 186, 194 [260 Cal.Rptr. 557, 776 P.2d 259] (McCullough).)

(4) In order to determine whether a judge's conduct is "unjudicial" under the first prong of the foregoing standard, the conduct is measured with reference to the California Code of Judicial Ethics. (Dodds, supra, 12 Cal.4th at p. 172; accord, Oberholzer v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1999)

20 Cal.4th 371, 395 [84 Cal.Rptr.2d 466, 975 P.2d 663].) " 'The failure of a judge to comply with the canons "suggests performance below the minimum level necessary to maintain public confidence in the administration of justice." ' " (Adams v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1995) 10 Cal.4th 866, 878 [42 Cal.Rptr.2d 606, 897 P.2d 544] (Adams II), citing Adams v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1994) 8 Cal.4th 630, 662 [34 Cal.Rptr.2d 641, 882 P.2d 358] (Adams I).)

The "bad faith" requirement for willful misconduct is satisfied when a judge is "(1) performing a judicial act for a corrupt purpose (which is any purpose other than the faithful discharge of judicial duties), or (2) performing a judicial act with knowledge that the act is beyond the judge's lawful judicial power, or (3) performing a judicial act that exceeds the judge's lawful power with a conscious disregard for the limits of the judge's authority." (Broadman, supra, 18 Cal.4th at p. 1092.)

The "judicial capacity" prong of the willfulness test has been defined as follows: "A judge is acting in a judicial capacity while performing one of the functions, whether adjudicative or administrative in nature, that are associated with the position of a judge or when the judge uses or attempts to use the authority of the judicial office for an improper purpose." (Broadman, supra, 18 Cal.4th at p. 1104, citing Dodds, supra, 12 Cal.4th at p. 172.)

(5) Prejudicial misconduct is the second most serious type of judicial misconduct, and is a lesser included offense in willful misconduct. (Gonzalez v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1983) 33 Cal.3d 359, 369, fn. 5 [188 Cal.Rptr. 880, 657 P.2d 372].) A primary distinction between willful and prejudicial misconduct is the presence or absence of bad faith. "Unlike wilful misconduct, prejudicial conduct does not require the presence of bad faith, but may occur when a judge, though acting in good faith, engages in conduct that adversely would affect the esteem in which the judiciary is held by members of the public who become aware of the circumstances of the conduct." (Adams II, supra, 10 Cal.4th at 878, citing Kloepfer v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1989) 49 Cal.3d 826, 832 [264 Cal.Rptr. 100, 782 P.2d 239] (Kloepfer), and McCullough, supra, 49 Cal.3d at p. 191; accord, Broadman, supra, 18 Cal.4th at p. 1092.) Prejudicial misconduct may be committed by a judge either while acting in a judicial capacity, or in other than a judicial capacity. (Adams II, supra, 10 Cal.4th at p. 878, citing Kennick v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1990) 50 Cal.3d 297, 314 [267 Cal.Rptr. 293, 787 P.2d 591].)

(6) The least serious type of misconduct is improper action, which consists of conduct that violates the California Code of Judicial Ethics, but which does not rise to the level of prejudicial misconduct. (Rothman, Cal.

Jud. Conduct Handbook (2d ed. 1999) Improper Action or Dereliction of Duty, § 13.29, pp. 386–387 (Rothman).) Improper conduct includes conduct that an objective observer aware of the circumstances would not deem to adversely affect the reputation of the judiciary. (See Adams II, supra, 10 Cal.4th at p. 899 [judge's acceptance of gifts violated canons but in and of itself did not jeopardize the judge's objective appearance of independence and impartiality and thus was improper conduct, not prejudicial misconduct].)

Judge Wasilenko's Two-track System of Justice

In 2002, we removed Judge Platt from office for misconduct that included illegal "ticket fixing." (Inquiry Concerning Platt (2002) No. 162, Decision and Order Removing Judge Platt from Office, p. 1 [48 Cal.4th CJP Supp. 227, 231] (Platt). In an effort to distinguish Judge Wasilenko from Judge Platt, the judge's counsel assert that "Judge Wasilenko did not fix any tickets." (Original underscoring.) Counsel claim, instead, that the judge was dealing with what they call "correctable offenses" or "fix-it violations" that were subject to dismissal anyway upon proof that the violations had been corrected, suggesting that his actions therefore were proper.

There are three difficulties with these assertions. First, not all of the violations that are the subject of the charges against Judge Wasilenko were "correctable." In fact, most of the cases did not involve violations that fell within that category: Sheila Messick's speeding ticket in count one was not correctable; Casey Landis's stop sign violation in count three was not correctable; the underage alcohol violations by Nathan Sokoloski, Ryan Heenan and Timothy Goetz in counts five, six and seven were not correctable, nor were the failures to appear by Heenan and Goetz; Anthony Franks's failure to appear in count eight was not correctable; and Erin Porter's stop sign violation in count nine was not correctable.

(7) The second problem with the argument is that none of the subject cases was pending before Judge Wasilenko or would have come before him in the ordinary course of judicial business or normal case assignments. It is an abuse of power for a judge to take action in cases not pending before the judge. (Rothman, supra, Abuse of Judicial Power, § 3.40, p. 85 & fn. 155, citing four disciplinary decisions by this commission.) A judge is dutybound to "hear and decide all matters assigned to the judge except those in which he or she is disqualified." (Canon 3B(1); see Code Civ. Proc., § 170.) The measure of the duty is coextensive with the limits of authority, that is, the judge is obligated to determine assigned cases, and forbidden to handle cases that are not before the judge as part of normal court business. Judge Wasilenko's entire course of conduct in all 10 counts was completely improper and constituted a wholesale abuse of judicial power.

There is a final and most important deficiency in the judge's argument. The determination of whether he violated the canons does not turn on whether there was a "fix" or just a "fix-it." Rather, the gravamen of Judge Wasilenko's wrongdoing is that he set up a two-track system of justice, with special handling available for relatives, friends and others with special connections. The vice in this favoritism does not turn on the line-drawing the judge attempts, but rather, in the damage to the reputation of the judiciary from the double standard. Two earlier decisions by this commission illustrate the point.

In the first illustrative case, Judge Bruce A. Clark was publicly reproved in 1989 for one incident of misconduct involving two traffic tickets given to the daughter of a member of the California Assembly. In June 1988, the judge had an ex parte conversation in his home with the assemblywoman concerning her daughter's tickets. The cases were pending before Judge Clark, and based on the communication from the legislator, the judge struck the requirement that the daughter appear in court on the tickets, permitted her to attend traffic school in connection with both tickets, and ordered that both speeding counts be dismissed upon receipt of a traffic school completion certificate. The commission noted in its reproval letter to Judge Clark: "Because the communication from Assemblywoman Wright was in your own home, and because your judicial acts were in chambers, the prosecutor had no opportunity to participate in these proceedings, nor had the public any opportunity to observe them. The judicial decisions you made, though lawful, were unusually lenient." (Italics added.)

The commission determined that the judge's conduct violated the canons then in effect that correspond to the current canons 2A (requiring judges to promote public confidence in the integrity and impartiality of the judiciary), 2B(1) (prohibiting a judge from conveying or permitting others to convey the impression that any individual is in a special position to influence the judge), and 3B(7) (prohibiting ex parte communications in a pending proceeding).

In the second illustrative case, Judge B.J. Bjork was publicly admonished in 1995 for two incidents of misconduct. In the first underlying case, Judge Bjork was contacted in March 1994 by the clerk for another judge at that judge's request (Judge A), requesting that a member of Judge A's family, who had received a traffic citation, be permitted to attend traffic school. After Judge Bjork rejected the clerk's request, Judge A approached Judge Bjork personally, explained that the relative had previously failed to complete traffic school and requested that Judge Bjork grant the relative a second chance to attend traffic school. Judge Bjork granted the request. A few days later, in the second incident, Judge A again approached Judge Bjork on behalf of the same relative regarding a different traffic citation for driving with an inadequate muffler, for failing to be in possession of a valid driver's license, and for failure to appear. Judge A indicated that he owned the car and was responsible for the inadequate muffler and for the relative's failure to appear. Based on those representations, and Judge A's statement that he would "take care of the other counts charged in the citation, and without any proof of correction, Judge Bjork dismissed the failure to appear charge, a misdemeanor."

As with Judge Clark, Judge Bjork was found to have violated the equivalent of today's canons 2A and 2B(1). There was no mention in the decision of violations of the ex parte canon, although that would appear to have occurred as well.

The Clark case involved only one incident, and there were only two incidents in the Bjork matter. Both cases resulted in public discipline. Judge Clark did not "fix" any ticket in the sense that the defendant did not receive a sentence she was not entitled to under the law. In the commission's words, "the decisions . . . made, though lawful, were unusually lenient." This is the very distinction that Judge Wasilenko raises with his emphasis on the fact that he was dealing with "fix-it" or "correctable" infractions. The distinction was not deemed determinative in the Clark matter.

Notwithstanding the "lawfulness" of Judge Clark's actions, he was publicly reproved for the one incident because of the appearance of favoritism and special access and the ex parte contact. The commission imposed discipline because of the favoritism and special treatment and the resulting harm done to the reputation of the judiciary from the appearance of special access and influence of a legislator. That the treatment was "lenient" would seem to refer to the fact that the legislator's daughter was granted a preferential procedural track that avoided any appearance in court—facts that correspond to Judge Wasilenko's preferential procedural fast track in counts two through 10.

Judge Bjork, on the other hand, would appear to have "fixed" the second ticket as respects the misdemeanor charge. Dismissal of that charge seems like a classic "fix," even though the point is not discussed in the decision. Judge Bjork's public admonishment, however, also was based on the appearance of leniency and favoritism and special access arising out of the fact that the defendant was a relative of another judge.

(8) The Clark matter involved "lenient but lawful" treatment of the defendant, while the Bjork matter involved "lenient and unlawful" handling by the judge. In both instances, public discipline was imposed for quantitatively minimal misconduct because the type of misconduct so seriously damages the reputation of the judiciary. The analysis does not turn on the lawfulness issue, but rather, on the leniency, special handling, favoritism, being influenced, and the resulting damage to the judicial institution. The defendant is not sanctioned, even in the case of the classic "fix," but rather, the judge is disciplined for harming the reputation of the judiciary by setting up a preferential system for dispensing favors for family or friends or others specially situated. This is true notwithstanding that there may be greater moral reprehensibility when there is an "unlawful fix."

These two cases also highlight that the gravamen of the wrongdoing is the two-track system of justice—one for those with special access to the judge, and the other for everyone else. The nub of the problem is the appearance or reality that Lady Justice is blindfolded. Rather than justice being dispensed with an even hand without regard to who is before the court, the judge has lifted the blindfold, and seeing a relative or friend or some person with influence, the judge tips the scale and puts them on a special track for favored handling. This is corruption at the core of our system of impartial equal justice, and is intolerable. It is our duty to denounce the misconduct in no uncertain terms and to sanction it as the grave ethical violation that it is, in our best effort to ensure evenhanded justice, starting at the very point of access to the judge. That is the reason we impose the most severe sanction on Judge Wasilenko available to us under the circumstances.

The court clerk who was summoned to bring Heather Robinson's file to Judge Wasilenko's chambers knew of the father/daughter relationship between the judge and the defendant. Describing her reaction to witnessing the private handling by the judge of the case in chambers, the clerk testified before the masters that she "was mad after it happened" because she had just paid her own daughter's ticket and she "just didn't like it." The evil inherent in a two-track system of justice is so apparent; people "just don't like it" because it is so clearly wrong—yet these simple points obviously elude Judge Wasilenko.

Counts Two, Three, Four, Five, Nine, 10

(9) In these six counts, the masters applied the Supreme Court's three-prong standard for willful misconduct—(1) unjudicial conduct, (2) committed in bad faith, (3) while acting in a judicial capacity (see discussion, ante, at p. 46)—and found it satisfied. We reach the same conclusions for the same, and additional, reasons. We separately analyze the three parts of the test to show how each is satisfied.

Unjudicial Conduct: The masters concluded, as do we, that by affording family, friends and others with special connections access to a preferential track of justice, Judge Wasilenko violated canon 1 (requiring that a judge maintain high standards of conduct so as to uphold the integrity and independence of the judiciary), canon 2A (requiring a judge to respect and comply with the law and to act in a manner that promotes public confidence in the integrity and impartiality of the judiciary), and 2B(1) (prohibiting a judge from allowing family, social or other relationships to influence the judge's judicial conduct or judgment, and prohibiting a judge from conveying or permitting others to convey the impression that any individual is in a special position to influence the judge) in all six counts. Those violations make the conduct unjudicial.

There were additional violations of the canons as follows:

(10) Canon 3E(1): This canon requires a judge to disqualify himself or herself in any proceeding in which disqualification "is required by law." As noted by the masters, the cross-reference "as required by law" includes Code of Civil Procedure section 170.1, subdivision (a)(6)(C), requiring disqualification if "[f]or any reason . . . [¶] . . . [¶] . . . [a] person aware of the facts might reasonably entertain a doubt that the judge would be able to be impartial." In count two, the judge was handling a case not assigned to him, involving Heather Robinson, whom he considered a daughter. The judge was disqualified from handling the case based on his close relationship with the defendant. The masters so concluded and we agree. Additionally, Judge Wasilenko concedes he should have disqualified himself from hearing Nathan Sokoloski's case (count five). The masters concluded that his failure to do so violated canon 3E(1), and we agree.

(11) Canon 3E(2): Even in instances where disqualification is not required under canon 3E(1), a judge is obligated under canon 3E(2), in all trial court proceedings, to "disclose on the record information that the judge believes the parties or their lawyers might consider relevant to the question of disqualification, even if the judge believes there is no actual basis for disqualification." The masters concluded, as do we, that Judge Wasilenko violated this canon by failing to disclose on the record the nature of his relationships with Casey Landis and Landis's parents in counts three and four, the long-term relationships between Erin Porter, her family, and the judge and his family in count nine, and similar personal and familial cross-connections with Kris Kraus in count 10.

(12) Canon 3B(7): We have discussed previously (ante, at p. 45) our reluctance to make conclusions on the current record concerning violations of canon 3B(7) (prohibiting ex parte communications) in the instances where the defendant appeared without counsel and did not contest a straight traffic infraction matter. These are the matters in which the district attorney does not appear. In cases where a misdemeanor also is charged, however, the district attorney does appear, and thus there is no issue of any implied consent by the prosecutor to ex parte communication with the defendant. Accordingly, the masters found the ex parte communications in count five—where Nathan Sokoloski was charged with misdemeanors—to be in violation of canon 3B(7), and we agree.[4]

The combined violations of the foregoing canons make Judge Wasilenko's conduct "unjudicial" and satisfy the first of the three requirements for willful misconduct.

(13) Bad Faith: The masters' application to the facts of the "bad faith" portion of the test for willful misconduct led them to conclude that Judge Wasilenko acted in bad faith in these six counts, and we agree for the reasons stated by the masters as well as on additional grounds. As a starting point, the masters concluded in all six counts that Judge Wasilenko's handling of each of the cases was for the purpose of providing an expedited, convenient, favored procedure for a family member or friend or other person with special access to him. The establishment of this two-track procedural system, although not labeled as such by the masters, was found by them to be for a corrupt purpose, that is, not for the faithful discharge of judicial duty. We agree. By definition, such a corrupt purpose constitutes bad faith.

Additionally, the masters found, as do we, that Judge Wasilenko conferred favored substantive treatment on three of the defendants involved in these six counts by not imposing the $10 statutory correction fee on them. Included within this class of special beneficiaries was the judge's surrogate daughter, Heather Robinson (count two), who, as the masters note, was not even at the courthouse when her case was dismissed. The judge's friend Erin Porter (count nine) and friend and former neighbor Kris Kraus (count 10) also received this substantive benefit. The conferring of this additional favoritism further confirms the judge's corrupt purpose and bad faith.

As the masters and we have noted, none of the cases involved in these six counts was assigned to Judge Wasilenko and none would have come before him in the ordinary course of judicial business. We have stated our conclusion that the judge therefore abused his power. At least in the context of the patterned behavior here, the repeated abuse cannot be deemed to be consistent with the faithful discharge of judicial duty, and constitutes bad faith.

(14) Judicial Capacity: The creation of the favored procedural and substantive tracks by Judge Wasilenko in these six counts was done by him in his judicial capacity. The masters so concluded, as do we. Judge Wasilenko was able to fashion the special treatment in these six counts by reason of the power of his office. He acted in his judicial capacity, notwithstanding the gross impropriety of his actions.

[4] By a parity of reasoning, we find violations of canon 3B(7) in counts six, seven and eight because they also all involved misdemeanor violations. (See discussion, post, at p. 55.)

Judge Wasilenko committed willful misconduct in counts two, three, four, five, nine and 10.

Counts Six, Seven, Eight

The masters concluded that Judge Wasilenko committed prejudicial misconduct in these three counts. The defendants—Ryan Heenan, Timothy Goetz and Anthony Franks—all had been charged with misdemeanor offenses. All three had failed to appear and warrants for their arrest had issued in all three cases; in counts six and eight, the warrants had been sent to law enforcement. The judge recalled the warrants in all three cases and in counts six and seven, he diverted the youthful alcohol offenders to the Pathways program.

The masters found that in each instance, the judge's actions "were in good faith" because "they were done for the purpose of making certain that a young man that had good cause for failing to appear was not placed at risk of being arrested and booked on a bench warrant." In counts six and seven, there was an additional purpose, according to the masters, which was to ensure that the young men were "not denied the opportunity to attend the Pathways program to which similarly situated young men are routinely referred." They find that none of the three received treatment that they would not have received from a different judge with Veronica Henderson as the prosecutor.

We respectfully disagree with the masters to the extent that we conclude that all three counts involve willful misconduct. We reach that conclusion by analyzing again the three-prong test for willful misconduct.

(15) Unjudicial Conduct: The masters concluded that the judge violated canons 1 and 2A in each count, and we agree. In addition, we find the conduct violated canon 2B(1), which contains two prohibitions—the first of which provides that a judge "shall not allow family, social, political, or other relationships to influence the judge's judicial conduct or judgment," and the second of which states that a judge shall not "convey or permit others to convey the impression that any individual is in a special position to influence the judge." (Italics added.) The judge did not know any of the three defendants—Heenan, Goetz or Franks. Prior to putting each defendant on a preferential track, however, he learned that Heenan and Goetz were passengers in the car driven by the judge's friend Nathan Sokoloski, and that they were codefendants with Sokoloski, and that Franks was a friend of the judge's surrogate daughter, Heather Robinson.

In each count, the masters expressly found that the judge did not allow his relationship with each defendant to influence his judicial conduct or judgment in violation of canon 2B(1). We accept the masters' conclusion. The masters do not discuss the further point of whether the judge was influenced by his relationship with the defendants' friends. Accordingly, there is no basis for concluding that the first portion of canon 2B(1) was violated in any of the three counts.

As to the second proscription of the canon, however, we are of the opinion, based on the masters' description of the facts and our reaction to them, that Judge Wasilenko, by his actions, did "convey the impression" that his friends, the Sokoloski family, were in a "special position to influence" his handling of the Heenan and Goetz matters, and that by reason of his father/daughter relationship with Heather Robinson, she was similarly situated to influence him respecting the Franks matter. It looks to us—that is to say the judge did "convey the impression"—that upon learning of the special relationships, he afforded the special handling. We conclude that the judge did violate the second proscription of canon 2B(1).

In addition, since Heenan, Goetz and Franks all were charged with one or more misdemeanors, the district attorney's policy of not appearing in pure infraction cases was inapplicable. As with count five discussed previously (ante, at pp. 52–53), there is no basis therefore for finding consent by the prosecutor to the ex parte communications that took place in these counts. Accordingly, we find the judge violated canon 3B(7) in each of these three counts.

These combined violations of the canons constitute unjudicial conduct and satisfy the first part of the test for willful misconduct.

Bad Faith: The masters concluded that Judge Wasilenko's motivation in these three counts was to use his judicial power to save the defendants the trauma of being booked into jail on the outstanding warrants, and in counts six and seven, additionally to protect Heenan's and Goetz's opportunities for diversion to the Pathways youth alcohol program.[5] They find that the judge was acting in "good faith" in taking steps to realize these objections; we understand this to be the masters' characterization of the judge's subjective intent.

We agree with the masters' conclusion that the judge was acting to spare these young men the trauma of being booked, and to afford Heenan and [5] It is unclear that preservation of the option of referral to the Pathways program necessitated any action by Judge Wasilenko from chambers. At such time as the two defendants appeared properly and in due course before an assigned judge, the referral would appear to have been the standard practice in the county.

Goetz access to Pathways. However, we believe that there is a preliminary consideration concerning the reason the judge interceded on behalf of all three defendants. In that regard these three counts are indistinguishable from the other six counts involving willful misconduct, namely, that he was doling out preferential treatment because of special connections. It is true that Judge Wasilenko was not directly acquainted with the three defendants here. However, each of these three defendants had a direct and close link to the judge's family and close friends. The trigger point for the preferential treatment was the judge's realization of those connections. Thus, the conduct in these three counts appears to us to be part and parcel of the same two-track system based on connections leading to special access as the first six counts we discussed. The conduct cannot be reconciled with the faithful discharge of judicial duty and constitutes bad faith.

(16) We have already noted our agreement with the masters' interpretation of the Yuba County court policy concerning bookings on bench warrants that have gone to law enforcement (see discussion, ante, at p. 40), namely, that a judge, but not a clerk, retains discretion under the policy to excuse a defendant from being booked on a bench warrant upon a showing of good cause for the failure to appear. The masters' determination that the judge acted in good faith and their explanation of his intent in these three counts appears to rest on an assumed exercise of such discretion. Judge Wasilenko, however, abused his discretion since none of these cases was legitimately before him. A judge to whom the cases might be assigned might exercise discretion to recall the warrants to avoid the booking and arrest of the defendants, but Judge Wasilenko did not have such discretionary authority. In our view, the judge's actions in these three counts are part of the broad pattern of improperly diverting nonassigned cases to himself. That improper course of conduct constitutes a serious abuse of authority that is the antithesis of the "faithful discharge of judicial duty." The gauge of judicial misconduct rests on an objective standard (Furey v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1987) 43 Cal.3d 1297, 1304 [240 Cal.Rptr. 859, 743 P.2d 919]) and we conclude that the judge acted in bad faith as a matter of law.

Since these three cases involved misdemeanors, there was no consent by the district attorney to the judge's ex parte communications with these three defendants in chambers. It was totally improper for them to have had the direct access to chambers—and it was only by that means that they avoided going through the clerk's office as a prerequisite for getting on a walk-in or other court calendar. Since the warrants for Heenan's and Franks's arrests already had gone to law enforcement, they avoided being booked only because they went to chambers. Thus, the two of them did receive a substantially lenient treatment from Judge Wasilenko. They would not have received a similar disposition from another judge because they could not have had their cases heard by another judge without being booked first.

Judicial Capacity: Judge Wasilenko was able to create the favored procedural and substantive tracks in these three counts by reason of the power of his office. He acted in his judicial capacity, notwithstanding that his conduct was seriously unethical.

Judge Wasilenko committed willful misconduct in counts six, seven and eight.

Count One

(17) We agree with the masters that Judge Wasilenko created an appearance and impression that he was providing his close relative, Sheila Messick, with favored treatment in the resolution of her traffic citation, a case not assigned to him. He did this by having a clerk bring her file to his chambers, where he was alone with Messick, and then discussing the ticket with her in a private meeting. The judge violated canons 1, 2A and 2B(1). However, the judge took no action on his relative's ticket; he only confirmed with her what her options were. Messick left the judge's chambers, paid her fine and attended traffic school. We concur with the masters that this misconduct constitutes improper action. As such, however, it cannot form the basis of the censure and bar we impose on Judge Wasilenko. Under the constitution, that level of discipline may rest only on prejudicial or willful misconduct. (Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (d).)

III. Discipline

(18) We examine the question of the appropriate level of discipline to impose on Judge Wasilenko in the context of the purposes of commission disciplinary proceedings, which have been described by the Supreme Court as "protection of the public, ensuring evenhanded and efficient administration of justice, and the maintenance of public confidence in the integrity of the judicial system." (Kloepfer, supra, 49 Cal.3d at pp. 864–865.) The disposition of a judicial disciplinary case "depends in large measure on the nature and number of charges found to be true." (Furey v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 43 Cal.3d at p. 1307, fn. 2.) "The number of wrongful acts is relevant to determining whether they were merely isolated occurrences or, instead, part of a course of conduct establishing 'lack of temperament and ability to perform judicial functions in an even-handed manner.' [Citation.]" (Wenger v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1981) 29 Cal.3d 615, 653 [175 Cal.Rptr. 420, 630 P.2d 954].)

Whereas an isolated incident of wrongdoing may arise from a momentary ethical lapse, a continuing pattern as engaged in by Judge Wasilenko "reflects poor judgment and lack of judicial temperament." (Kloepfer, supra, 49 Cal.3d at p. 848.)

Recognizing that Judge Wasilenko has retired from the bench, the question of "suitable judicial temperament" remains relevant to the question of whether a censure and bar are necessary and appropriate. A further factor to be considered in terms of whether the judge manifests unsuitability for the bench is the judge's inability or unwillingness to change behavior after less severe discipline by the commission. (See Doan v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1995) 11 Cal.4th 294, 339–340 [45 Cal.Rptr.2d 254, 902 P.2d 272] (Doan) [removal of judge who failed to learn from prior discipline for similar misconduct]; McCullough, supra, 49 Cal.3d at p. 199 [failure of judge to respond to prior public censure "evidences a lack of regard for the Commission, [the Supreme Court] and [the judge's] obligations as a judge"].)

(19) Applying the foregoing considerations to Judge Wasilenko's misconduct, we conclude that a censure and bar, the maximum discipline available to us under the circumstances, is the appropriate discipline. The censure is our effort to repair the past damage to the reputation of the judiciary, and the bar is in order to safeguard the public going forward by precluding Judge Wasilenko from being a bench officer in this state in the future.

Judge Wasilenko committed nine incidents of willful misconduct. The masters found, and we concur, that the judge engaged in a "pattern of misconduct in which the Judge repeatedly favored his friends with procedural shortcuts that were not available to citizens that had no relationship with the Judge." We agree with the masters that there also were several instances where the judge afforded substantive breaks to the favored few. There is also the pattern, repeated in every count, of Judge Wasilenko diverting nonassigned cases to himself for his specialized handling. The overall scope of wrongdoing is alarming.

Judge Wasilenko was privately admonished by the commission in 1993 for misconduct that is remarkably similar in three respects to that which is present here. The earlier discipline was based on wrongdoing that included (1) transferring to his own court in 1992 two cases in which the judge's friends were the defendants, without notice to the district attorney, following an ex parte conversation with one of the friends about a recent driving under the influence arrest, (2) presiding in 1990 over a criminal matter in which his courtroom clerk was the defendant, without disclosing this basis of the disqualification on the record and without obtaining a written waiver of disqualification from both parties and (3) meeting ex parte with probation officers to discuss their presentence reports. The admonishment stated that "the commission noted with approval that Judge Wasilenko demonstrated awareness of these problems and a willingness to improve." (Italics added.)

awareness of the problems and is either unwilling or unable to improve. At the hearing before the masters, although Judge Wasilenko recalled the 1990 incident concerning which he was disciplined for failing to disclose on the record, he disputed the similarity between that incident and his current failure to disclose on the record his familial relationship with Heather Robinson (count two). He further demonstrated his lack of awareness when, at the masters' hearing, he did not even recall the occasion in 1992 when he transferred his friends' cases to his courtroom following an ex parte communication.

(20) A judge's failure or inability to reform suggests unsuitability for judicial office. (Platt, supra, No. 162 at pp. 15–16 [48 Cal.4th CJP Supp. at pp. 248–249]; accord, Doan, supra, 11 Cal.4th at pp. 339–340; McCullough, supra, 49 Cal.3d at p. 197.) The Supreme Court has said that in instances where, as here, the record does not suggest the judge "has, or will be able to, overcome" the trait leading to the misconduct, and "that similar incidents will not recur . . . [,] comparison of the discipline imposed in other cases . . . is not fruitful." (Kloepfer, supra, 49 Cal.3d at pp. 866–867.) Nevertheless, a review of earlier decisions confirms that the types of misconduct we confront here do support removal or censure/bar.

Three years ago, we removed Judge Platt from office for establishing a similar two-track system of justice by handling and attempting to influence traffic and other cases involving family and friends on a preferential basis. (Platt, supra, No. 162 [48 Cal.4th CJP Supp. 227].)[6] The Supreme Court also has removed judges who engaged in misconduct in connection with the granting of preferential treatment based on friendship or influence.

In Spruance v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications (1975) 13 Cal.3d 778 [119 Cal.Rptr. 841, 532 P.2d 1209] (Spruance), the judge was removed from office for numerous acts of misconduct, several of which included special treatment for himself as a defendant before another judge (id. at pp. 794, 799), as well as dispensing special treatment for friends and political supporters (id. at pp. 790–791 & fn. 11, 792–793, 798), and attempting to persuade the prosecutor to reduce charges against a friend in a case not pending before the judge (id. at pp. 790, fn. 10, 798). The judge in Gonzalez v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 33 Cal.3d at pages 366–368, 370, 378, also was removed for misconduct that included attempts by the judge to intercede in criminal matters on behalf of friends and benefactors.

[6] Judge Platt was found to have committed five acts of willful misconduct and one act of prejudicial misconduct in connection with dismissing or attempting to dismiss four traffic tickets, requesting another judge to grant an O.R. release to a defendant, and mentioning in a telephone conversation with a court commissioner that a friend had received a traffic ticket.

In Doan, supra, 11 Cal.4th 294, the judge was removed; the misconduct included ex parte contacts with her former gardener (and others) and acting as an advocate for the gardener, including initiating efforts for his O.R. release, failing to disqualify herself or make requisite disclosures, and manipulating the bail review hearing over which she presided in order to accomplish an O.R. release. (Id. at pp. 316–319.) Judge Doan also presided over the pretrial conference, and attempted to influence its outcome, in a case in which the defendant was a close friend of a nephew who had loaned the judge money. (Id. at pp. 320–323.) In McCullough, supra, 49 Cal.3d 186, 192–193, the judge was removed for misconduct that included special handling of a friend's misdemeanor case following an improper ex parte communication; the judge continued the case for more than two years and then dismissed it without explanation.

IV. Conclusion

In light of Judge Wasilenko's retirement from the bench, we hereby impose a censure on him as the maximum discipline we can impose. Because of his demonstrated failure to reform, and his long-running pattern of misconduct, we determine that he is lacking in requisite judicial temperament, and therefore, to protect the public from his ever sitting as a bench officer, we hereby bar him from any assignment, appointment or reference of work from any California state court.

Commission members Justice Vance W. Raye, Mr. Marshall B. Grossman, Judge Frederick P. Horn, Mr. Michael A. Kahn, Mrs. Crystal Lui, Ms. Patricia Miller, Mr. Jose C. Miramontes, Mrs. Penny Perez, Judge Risë Jones Pichon, and Ms. Barbara Schraeger voted to impose a censure and bar. There is currently one public member vacancy on the commission.

| INQUIRY CONCERNING JUDGE WILLIAM R. DANSER,No. 172 | DECISION AND ORDER IMPOSING CENSURE AND BAR |

This disciplinary matter concerns Judge William R. Danser (Retired), formerly a judge of the Santa Clara County Superior Court. The commission charges in count one that Judge Danser engaged in ticket fixing in 24 traffic cases. In one of those cases, Judge Danser is charged with improper communications with a court commissioner before whom the case was pending. He is charged with improperly transferring the remaining traffic cases to himself and then dismissing them without any legal basis.

Four additional counts charge the judge with misconduct in cases involving driving under the influence of alcohol (DUI). The judge transferred the four DUI cases to his department and then afforded preferential procedural and substantive treatment to the defendants.

The defendants in the traffic and the DUI cases were members of or closely connected to an inner circle of the judge's friends, acquaintances and court staff. They included players and employees of San Jose professional sports teams. Many of the defendants were friends of or had connections with Randy Bishop who was a friend of the judge and a detective previously with the Los Gatos Police Department.

A sixth count charges Judge Danser with abusing his judicial power by attempting to dismiss three citations issued to one of his own minor children. Finally, a seventh count charges the judge with improper demeanor and abuse of power in attempting to prevent the district attorney from obtaining a transcript of the plea and sentencing proceedings in one of the DUI cases.

Judge Danser is represented by James A. Murphy and Harlan B. Watkins of Murphy, Pearson, Bradley & Feeney of San Francisco. The examiners for the commission are Commission Trial Counsel Jack Coyle and Commission Assistant Trial Counsel Bradford Battson.

The Supreme Court appointed three special masters to hold an evidentiary hearing and to report to the commission. The masters are Hon. Harry E. Hull, Jr., Associate Justice of the Court of Appeal, Third Appellate District; Hon. Terrance R. Duncan, Judge of the Monterey County Superior Court; and Hon. Thomas E. Kelly, Judge of the Santa Cruz County Superior Court. Pursuant to a settlement agreement between the parties that later was incorporated in an order issued by the commission on July 22, 2004,[1] the masters took the matter under submission without a hearing. They issued their detailed 108-page Final Report (masters' report or M.Rpt.) to the commission on October 25, 2004. The masters concluded that Judge Danser committed willful misconduct in 34 instances and prejudicial misconduct in one other instance. We concur there were 34 instances of willful misconduct. We conclude there is insufficient evidence of any misconduct by Judge Danser in the remaining instance.

As the hearing before the masters was about to begin on the morning of July 19, 2004, the parties proposed a settlement that included Judge Danser's agreement to retire irrevocably. He did retire that same day. (See Order of July 22, Intro. ¶.) The settlement and subsequent order provide that specified charges against the judge were to be determined based on the transcript and exhibits from the judge's criminal trial (see discussion, post, p. 3). (Id., ¶ 2b.) The judge also stipulated that certain other charges were true (id., 2a), and that at a minimum, his actions constituted prejudicial misconduct within the meaning of article VI, section 18 of the California Constitution, and that under that section, the commission could issue a censure and bar against him. (Order of July 22, ¶ 3.)

Article VI, section 18, subpart (d) of the California Constitution, as pertinent to the disciplinary options available to the commission in this matter, provides that the commission may "censure a judge or former judge or remove a judge" for willful or prejudicial misconduct. That section also provides the commission may bar a former judge who is censured from receiving an assignment, appointment, or reference of work from any California state court. Given Judge Danser's retirement, we construe the constitution as prohibiting the commission from imposing discipline more severe than a censure and a bar. Judge Danser's serious misconduct warrants the maximum discipline. Our decision to impose the censure and bar, rather than a removal from office, is because of the constitutional limit on our power.

Judge Danser also was prosecuted criminally for the conduct that underlies this disciplinary proceeding. The jury found him guilty of a felony and seven misdemeanors. The case is pending on appeal (Court of Appeal, Sixth Appellate District, Case No. H027912). The determination of this matter before the commission does not hinge in any manner on the outcome of the criminal appeal because our determinations concerning the judicial misconduct are independent of the ultimate decision of whether the conduct also is criminal.

Under the Order of July 22, Judge Danser stipulated to the truth of the facts alleged in count five, concerning his efforts to dismiss his son's tickets. (Order of July 22, ¶ 2a.) As to all the other allegations, however, the judge has agreed only that the masters, and ultimately the commission, are to determine the facts based on specified agreed evidence from the judge's criminal trial. (Id., ¶2b.) Based on a review of that evidence, we agree with the masters that the following facts are true.

I. Findings of Fact

A. The Traffic Matters

1. Count One – General Findings (see M.Rpt., pp. 14-19)

In March 1997, Judge Danser engaged in improper ex parte communications with Court Commissioner Gregory Saldivar about a traffic case against Anthony Granato that was pending before the commissioner. In addition, between March 2000 and December 2002, Judge Danser caused to be transferred to his court and then dismissed 24 traffic cases involving 20 different defendants. In nine of those cases, the judge also dismissed a related charge of failure to appear, alleged as a misdemeanor. Many of the defendants in the traffic cases had a relationship with Randy Bishop, a friend of the judge who, at the time, was an officer with the Los Gatos-Monte Sereno Police Department (LGPD). The remaining defendants were either friends or acquaintances of the judge or his former or then-current court staff.

Judge Danser had known Randy Bishop through Little League since 1996. The judge was involved in Los Gatos Little League from 1992 through 2002, and was president from 1998 to 2000. Bishop helped the players with pitching and batting techniques. He also ran a diversion program for juvenile offenders, primarily involving alcohol-related offenses, through which they could perform alternative community service. At the judge's request, Bishop referred young offenders to do maintenance work and other tasks for Little League. The judge and Bishop also had professional contact in connection with the issuance of search warrants. Judge Danser wrote a letter of recommendation for Bishop in support of a grant application.

From 1999 to July 2003, Bishop worked for the San Jose Sharks professional hockey team while he was an officer with LGPD. He handled law enforcement affairs for the Sharks, for which he was paid a total of more than $50,000 over that period. Judge Danser has been a Sharks fan since about 1990, and bought season tickets to their games; he bought four season tickets for the 2001-2002 season. The defendants whose traffic cases the judge dismissed included five players or employees of the Sharks, the girlfriend of a player, an employee of the Sharks' home arena, two employees of the San Jose Earthquakes soccer team (which was run by the Sharks or their marketing arm), the girlfriend of the Earthquakes' equipment manager, and the owner of a Los Gatos restaurant frequented by Sharks players.

None of the cases Judge Danser dismissed was assigned to him and none would have come before him in the ordinary course of judicial business. There also was no proper basis under Santa Clara County court practices for transfer of any of the cases to Judge Danser's department. Judge Danser was not assigned to a traffic court department at any time during the relevant period.

Judge Danser did not conduct a hearing in any of the subject traffic cases. He made no disclosures on the record of any ex parte communications or relationships to any of the defendants or other involved persons. None of the cases was on calendar when Judge Danser dismissed the respective tickets or other charges. None of the defendants appeared in court in any of the cases, nor did any retained counsel appear on behalf of any of them.

As will be discussed in the following findings concerning the individual tickets (post, pp. 5-17), Judge Danser claimed in nearly all of the traffic cases that Bishop had told him that he, Bishop, had the approval of the officer who issued the citation, or someone allegedly acting on the citing officer's behalf, to dismiss a given citation. Based on these alleged oral representations by Bishop, for which there was no corroboration, and without creating any record, the judge dismissed the cases. The judge asserted that Vehicle Code section 40500, subdivision (d) authorized the dismissals. As pertinent here, that section provides that if an arresting officer or other officer of the same agency later determines that a citation should be dismissed "in the interest of justice," the facts justifying such dismissal shall be presented in the form of a written recommendation, filed with the court, and thereafter, the court may dismiss the case in connection with entering supporting findings on the record. As is critical, however, the section also states, "under no circumstances shall a personal relationship with any officer, public official, or law enforcement agency be grounds for dismissal." (Veh. Code § 40500(d), italics added.)

The masters rejected the judge's reliance on section 40500(d) as resting on a "plainly unsupportable interpretation of [the statute]," finding the defense to be part of a "subterfuge." (M.Rpt., p. 19.) The masters also correctly concluded that even if the conversations took place as claimed, they would not shelter the judge from the charges of judicial misconduct. On the contrary, they would buttress the conclusion of willful misconduct. (Ibid.) We concur with the masters that the statute cannot be twisted to cover these situations and that the claimed conversations likely are a sham or subterfuge. If the judge actually talked with Bishop as he claims, such ex parte communications contravened canon 3B(7) and are an additional basis for concluding the misconduct in those instances was willful. (See discussion, post, pp. 29-30.)

2. Count One – Specific Findings Concerning Individual Traffic Cases

a. Anthony Granato (see M.Rpt, pp. 20-22)

Granato was cited on December 14, 1996 for speeding and driving without a valid license. He was charged later with a misdemeanor for failure to appear on the original citation. At the time, Granato played for the Sharks. At the request of and as a favor to Randy Bishop, in March 1997 Judge Danser telephoned a court commissioner in the San Martin branch court, before whom the case was pending. The judge told the commissioner Granato wanted to plead guilty to the speeding violation and to have the other two charges dismissed. The judge also advised that no one would appear. Judge Danser and the commissioner had been friends for 25 years.

Prior to the hearing date, the commissioner decided not to accept a guilty plea in absentia, and continued the matter. Upon learning of the continuance, Judge Danser contacted another friend of his, an attorney, and asked him to resolve the matter for Granato. The attorney did not consult with Granato, but appeared before the commissioner ostensibly on Granato's behalf, and entered a guilty plea to the speeding charge. The commissioner dismissed the remainder of the case.

In the aftermath of the Granato dismissal by the commissioner, Judge Danser's presiding judge advised him he was to discontinue further communications with court commissioners concerning pending cases to avoid the impression of pressuring them. Judge Danser subsequently told Randy Bishop that his presiding judge "was not happy with what [he] had done" in the Granato case. (M.Rpt., p. 22). From that point forward, when Bishop brought a case to the judge's attention or otherwise sought his intervention, instead of contacting the commissioner to whom the case had been assigned, the judge transferred the matter to his own department and then dismissed it himself.

b. Paul Pavicich (see M.Rpt., pp. 22-24)

Pavicich was cited on February 7, 2000 for failing to stop at a metering light on a freeway on-ramp. The citing officer from the California Highway Patrol (CHP) was two cars behind Pavicich, observed the violation, and testified that Pavicich admitted he drove through the red metering light. The Pavicich family is a prominent Los Gatos family and the judge knows various family members. Judge Danser knows Paul Pavicich from Little League, and in 2000, the two of them played in a golf foursome that also included Todd Mayo and Scott Cruse. (As will be discussed, the judge dismissed tickets issued to Pavicich, Mayo, Mayo's wife and Cruse's wife.)

Pavicich told Judge Danser at Little League about his ticket. The judge directed his clerk to get the file in the Pavicich case, which she did. On March 23, 2000, the judge dismissed the case. The minute order reflects the dismissal was in the "interests of justice." The judge claimed Bishop had told him that he, Bishop, had talked "to the guys" at the Highway Patrol. The judge admitted, however, that Bishop gave him no reason the ticket should be dismissed. (M.Rpt., p. 24.)

Neither Pavicich nor a retained attorney was present in court on March 23 when the case was dismissed. The minutes reflect, however, the defendant was represented on that occasion by an attorney named Daily. The judge testified that he told Terrence Daily, an attorney who happened to be present in court, "I am going to dismiss this ticket. You can be a big hero of the Pavicich family. I will put your name on it." (M.Rpt., p. 23.) According to the judge, he thought it would be "funny" to put Daily's name in the minutes. (Id. at p. 24.)

c. Todd Mayo (see M.Rpt., pp. 24-26)

Mayo was cited by the Campbell police on April 4, 2000 for speeding. Mayo and the judge had been friends since about 1996, through Little League and golf, and had other social connections. Mayo talked to Judge Danser about his ticket. The judge claimed he dismissed the ticket after Bishop said the issuing "cops" who had no objection to it being dismissed. (M.Rpt., pp. 25-26.)

Judge Danser dismissed the Mayo ticket on March 23, 2000, the same day as he dismissed the Pavicich ticket (§ b, ante, p. 6). The minute order states the dismissal was in the "interests of justice." The case was not calendared and there was no appearance by the defendant or retained counsel. (M.Rpt., p. 25.) Nonetheless, the minutes state that attorney "Daily" appeared. The judge admitted he directed this minute entry, again, because it "was kind of a funny thing." (Ibid.) Attorney Terrence Daily was in Judge Danser's court that day, but he testified he did not represent Mayo and did not authorize the use of his name in the minutes.

d. Robert Davis (see M.Rpt., pp. 26-27)

Davis was cited by an officer from the San Jose Police Department (SJPD) on September 26, 2000 for failing to stop at a stop sign. Davis testified that he did fail to stop. He was the telecommunications manager for the San Jose arena operated by the Sharks. Davis knew Randy Bishop, and although Davis denied speaking with Bishop about the ticket, Bishop told Judge Danser about it. The file was sent to Judge Danser's court on January 17, 2001, and the judge dismissed the case the following day. The minute order states the dismissal was in the "interests of justice." Judge Danser admits, however, the actual reason for the dismissal was as a favor to Bishop. Judge Danser testified he dismissed the ticket after Bishop told him "someone" had indicated it was "okay" to do so. (M.Rpt., p. 27.)

e. Joseph Will (see M.Rpt., pp. 28-29)

Will was cited by the SJPD on August 18, 2000 for speeding, and subsequently was charged with a misdemeanor failure to appear. Will had worked for the Sharks for many years and was the assistant to the Sharks' general manager. Will gave his ticket to Randy Bishop, who said he would see what could be done about it. Will assumed Bishop would "take care of" the ticket. (M.Rpt., p. 28.) Bishop told Judge Danser about the ticket and of Will's connection to the Sharks. The judge dismissed the ticket on February 6, 2001 "in the interests of justice," according to the minute order. The judge admitted the dismissal was in fact a favor to Bishop.

The ticketing officer testified he did not talk to Bishop about the ticket and that he never recommended to anyone that it be dismissed and knew of no reason it should be dismissed. The judge admitted Bishop provided no basis for a dismissal. Furthermore, even if there had been a request by the officer to dismiss the speeding ticket, such request would not provide a basis for dismissal of the failure to appear charge without any appearance by or on behalf of the defendant.

f. Evgeni Nabokov (see M.Rpt., pp. 29-31)

Nabokov was cited by the Santa Clara County sheriff on December 29, 2000 for driving without a license and unsafe passing. Nabokov was the Sharks' goalie and asked Bishop for advice concerning the ticket. Bishop talked to Judge Danser about the ticket and may have described the circumstances surrounding it. The judge knew Nabokov was a goalie for the Sharks. Judge Danser had his clerk obtain the file and on March 12, 2001, he dismissed the ticket. According to the minute order, the dismissal was in the "interests of justice," but the judge admitted in his testimony that the real reason was as a favor to Bishop.

The ticketing officer testified he never was contacted by anyone about the ticket and knew of no reason it should have been dismissed. The judge claimed Bishop told him that someone "at the police" had no objection to the dismissal, although admittedly, Bishop offered no basis for the dismissal. (M.Rpt., pp. 30-31.) The judge admitted that since Bishop brought the ticket to him initially, Bishop had an interest in the matter and could not be considered impartial.

g. Rhonda Sulpizio (see M.Rpt., pp. 31-32)

Sulpizio was cited by the CHP on January 15, 2001 for driving with an expired registration and without proof of financial responsibility. She subsequently was charged with a misdemeanor for failing to appear. At the time, Sulpizio was the girlfriend of former Sharks player Jeff Friesen. After Bishop learned of the ticket, he told Judge Danser that Sulpizio was the girlfriend of "one of the Sharks guys." (M.Rpt., p. 32.) The file was sent to Judge Danser's department at his request, and the following day, May 24, 2001, he dismissed all charges in the "interests of justice," according to the minute order.

Judge Danser testified he dismissed all charges after Bishop said he had seen either the registration or proof of insurance and that "everything was in order." (M.Rpt., p. 32.) The file does not indicate a dismissal based on correction of the registration or insurance violations, and there is no evidence of either. There also is no indication of payment of the $10 statutory fee assessed in connection with dismissal of a correctible offense. Furthermore, there is no apparent basis for the dismissal of the failure to appear charge without an appearance by or on behalf of the defendant.

h. Debra Mayo (see M.Rpt., pp. 33-34)

Mayo was cited by the SJPD on September 18, 2001 for speeding. She is the wife of Todd Mayo, whose ticket Judge Danser previously dismissed (§ c, ante, p. 7). She knew the judge through her husband's Little League activities, and the Mayos had been to dinner with the judge and his wife. Debra Mayo told her husband about the ticket and he told Judge Danser about it. The judge asked Todd Mayo for the ticket and "agreed to help with the ticket or take care of it." (M.Rpt., p. 33.) After the file was sent to Judge Danser's department at the judge's request, he dismissed the ticket the following day, October 24, 2001. The minute order states the dismissal was in the "interests of justice," but the judge admitted he intervened as a favor for a friend. The judge claimed Bishop told him the issuing officer or agency did not object to the dismissal, but the issuing officer did not corroborate this claim during his testimony.

i. Gregory Jamison (see M.Rpt., pp. 34-38)

Jamison is the president and CEO of the Sharks and of Silicon Valley Sports and Entertainment, the marketing arm of the Sharks. He has known Randy Bishop since 1998 or 1999. Judge Danser dismissed three tickets issued to Jamison:

Citation 1: Jamison was cited by the Santa Clara County sheriff on January 20, 2000 for speeding. Shortly after the ticket was issued, Randy Bishop attempted to get the sheriff's office to dismiss the ticket, but the ticketing officer declined to consent to the dismissal. Jamison testified he paid this ticket in 2000, but there was no evidence of that fact. The check that Jamison thought was for this ticket was in fact in payment of a speeding ticket received by his son.

Citation 2: Jamison was cited by the CHP on January 20, 2001 for having unlawfully tinted windows in his vehicle. He was charged later with a misdemeanor failure to appear. Jamison has a cancelled check showing payment of this ticket in June 2001, but there is no record of payment in the court file.

By letter dated June 28, 2001, the Department of Motor Vehicles (DMV) notified Jamison that the two citations had not been paid and that his driver's license could not be issued until proof of payment or correction had been received by DMV. Jamison asked Bishop to investigate, and Bishop subsequently told Judge Danser that Jamison's license was going to be suspended over some tickets Jamison claimed he had paid.

Citation 3: On August 5, 2001, an LGPD officer left a ticket on a vehicle registered to Jamison, for failure to display a front license plate and for unlawfully tinted windows. Jamison's son was driving the car at the time, but the father remembered receiving a copy of the ticket. Neither father nor son could remember showing proof of correction concerning either violation to anyone, and there is no proof of correction in the court file for Citation 3, nor is there evidence of payment of a statutory $10 correction fee. Nonetheless, on October 25, 2001, the day after the Citation 3 file was sent to Judge Danser's department, the judge dismissed the case, in the "interests of justice" according to the minute order.

At Judge Danser's request, the files for Citations 1 and 2 were sent to his department on November 7, 2001. On that day, the judge dismissed the underlying charge and the failure to appear charge in connection with Citation 1, even though he admits he knew of nothing to suggest Jamison had not been speeding. The judge was handling a preliminary hearing calendar that day. On November 7, Judge Danser also dismissed the tinted window violation charge in Citation 2, although again he admitted knowing of no basis for doing so.

Two months later, on January 2, 2002, the minutes for Citation 2 were "corrected" to add a dismissal of the failure to appear charge, in the "interests of justice" according to the minute order. The judge was handling a preliminary hearing calendar that day. The judge also exonerated bail and set aside the forfeiture, thereby entitling Jamison to a refund of the $310 fine he had paid. The judge's clerk prepared an abstract of judgment indicating Citation 1 had been dismissed; such an abstract was a prerequisite for the DMV to update its system. The judge called Bishop to notify him that the abstract had been prepared because of a concern that Jamison's license otherwise would be suspended.

Judge Danser concedes he had no evidence that Jamison had paid any of the tickets, and there is no evidence in any of the files suggesting payment or correction. The judge testified he dismissed a number of tickets for Jamison because he knew him to be "an important man with the Sharks" and "had no reason to disbelieve" the tickets had been paid. (M.Rpt., pp. 37-38.) Even if they had been paid, that would not have been a basis for dismissal of the tickets or of the failure to appear charges.

j. Shelby Holcomb (see M.Rpt., pp. 38-39)

Holcomb was cited by the CHP on August 1, 2001 for following too closely and driving with an expired registration. He admitted the latter violation. Holcomb was a personal trainer at the Fitness Clinic in Los Gatos during the period 2000 to 2002 and provided fitness training to the judge and the judge's sons. Holcomb discussed the ticket with the judge shortly after receiving it, and on October 31, 2001, Judge Danser dismissed the charges. According to the minute order, the dismissals were in the "interests of justice." Judge Danser testified that the real reason was that he wanted to help Holcomb.

According to Judge Danser, Bishop had told him that he, Bishop, had talked to somebody and "they had no objection" to a dismissal because the matter was not serious. (M.Rpt., p. 39.) The citing officer did not corroborate this claim. The judge admitted he knew of no reason why the officer allegedly was willing to have the ticket dismissed.

k. Kenneth Holbach (see M.Rpt., pp. 39-41)

Holbach received two tickets within a 5-hour period on October 18, 2001 from the same SJPD officer for speeding at the same intersection, violations which Holbach admitted. The defendant's brother, Ben Holbach, was a CHP officer and a friend of Bishop; the two regularly ate lunch together.

Shortly after the tickets were issued, Officer Holbach's father told him about the tickets. Officer Holbach had lunch with Randy Bishop a couple of days later and inquired if Bishop knew anyone the officer could talk to about getting the tickets "consolidated" so his brother could go to traffic school. The officer later gave Bishop copies of the tickets, which Bishop gave to Judge Danser.

On November 9, 2001, the day after the files were sent to Judge Danser's department, he dismissed both charges. The minute order states the dismissals were in the "interests of justice." Bishop relayed information of the dismissals to Officer Holbach.

Judge Danser testified that prior to dismissing these tickets Bishop had advised him that Bishop had ascertained that some police official had no objection to the dismissal. The arresting officer testified, however, that he had never told Bishop he approved of dismissal, nor had he recommended dismissal and he knew of no facts justifying dismissal.

l. Michael Ensley (see M.Rpt., pp. 41-44)

Ensley was cited by the SJPD on October 3, 2001 for speeding. Ensley testified that he was speeding. Nonetheless, the day after being cited, Ensley complained about the ticket to a waitress at the Southern Kitchen, a Los Gatos restaurant. A man sitting at the counter overheard Ensley's complaint and told him he could get the ticket fixed if Ensley made out a check to the Los Gatos Little League. Although Ensley claimed not to know this man, he gave him the ticket. On November 6, 2001, Ensley wrote a check for $200 to the Los Gatos Little League and gave it to another man he claimed not to know, but who allegedly had been sitting next to the first man to whom he had given the ticket previously. The check was deposited into the league's checking account in April 2002, with a hand-written note on it, "Major's Tigers." Judge Danser managed the league's "major league" team called the "Tigers."

Judge Danser was told of Ensley's ticket by Brad Tomy, a friend of the judge who served with him on the Little League board of directors. Ensley admitted he knew Tomy, but as the result of various testimonial denials by Ensley and Tomy, it is unclear how the check got from Ensley into the Little League account. The judge denied knowledge of Ensley's check to the Little League.

Judge Danser spoke with Tomy about the ticket and obtained the actual ticket from him. After directing his clerk to have the file sent to his department, the judge dismissed the ticket on December 4, 2001. The minute order states the dismissal was in the "interests of justice." Judge Danser hand-delivered a copy of the dismissal order to Tomy at the Little League field, and Ensley picked up a copy of the order at either the Southern Kitchen or the Los Gatos Roasting Company.

Judge Danser claimed he asked Bishop to look into the matter concerning Ensley's ticket and that he dismissed the ticket after Bishop told him that the officers involved had no objection to a dismissal. The ticketing officer testified he had no conversation with Bishop, never recommended dismissal and did not believe dismissal was warranted. Judge Danser admitted he never heard any reason why the ticket should be dismissed.

m. Stephanie Lynott (see M.Rpt., pp. 44-46)

Lynott was cited by the LGPD on June 12, 2001 for driving without a seat belt. She subsequently was charged with a misdemeanor failure to appear in connection with the original ticket. The judge knew Lynott as his three sons' second grade teacher at St. Mary's School in Los Gatos. In about November 2001, Lynott phoned the Danser residence and spoke with either Judge Danser or his wife (who is a Santa Clara County Superior Court judge). Following that call, the ticket was delivered to Judge Danser, and on November 30, 2001, the file was sent to Judge Danser's department. On December 4, 2001, he dismissed both charges.

The judge admitted he had no reason to believe the ticket was unjustified. He dismissed it based on a conversation with Lynott and because of the "minor nature of the matter." (M.Rpt., p. 46.) He testified, "I knew what kind of person she was. I believed the story she was telling me, and the cost and effort of sort of putting this back into the system to me just did not seem worth it." (Ibid.) The judge's own improper diversion of the case to his department was the reason the ticket was "out of the system." Moreover, it was a simple matter to return the file to traffic court, where it belonged and where it should have been handled in the ordinary course of judicial business.

n. Peter Stemkowski (see M.Rpt., pp. 46-48)

Stemkowski was cited on January 7, 2002 by the CHP for speeding in a school zone. He was a radio analyst for the Sharks and a broadcast partner of Anthony Granato; it was Granato's ticket about which the judge spoke with the court commissioner in the San Martin branch court (§ a, ante, pp. 5-6). Stemkowski talked to Bishop about the ticket and Bishop spoke to Judge Danser about it. The judge knew Stemkowski was a Sharks broadcaster and Granato was coaching Little League with Judge Danser at the time.

On April 5, 2002, Judge Danser dismissed the ticket in the "interests of justice," according to the minute order. The judge claimed Bishop told him there was no objection to the dismissal, although concededly, Bishop did not tell the judge of any justification for the dismissal. The issuing officer, however, testified he was not contacted. According to the officer, he would have recommended against dismissal because Stemkowski was rude and went on a "verbal tirade" when the officer cited him. (M.Rpt., p. 48.)

o. Cataldo Maresco (see M.Rpt., pp. 48-49)

Maresco was given a speeding ticket by the CHP on February 14, 2002, and Maresco testified he was speeding. He is the owner of Aldo's Restaurant in Los Gatos and considers Randy Bishop a friend. Bishop ate at Aldo's on occasion with Sharks players. Shortly after receiving the ticket, Maresco talked to Bishop about it and gave him the actual ticket. Bishop told Judge Danser about the ticket and told him Maresco was a strong supporter of the police department. On April 15, 2002, Judge Danser dismissed the ticket; the minute order states the dismissal was in the "interests of justice." The judge testified Bishop said there was no objection to a dismissal. The issuing officer testified he never recommended a dismissal and knew of no facts justifying such action.

p. Evgeni Nabokov (see M.Rpt., pp. 49-50)

Nabokov was cited by the CHP on April 4, 2002 for speeding and admitted in his testimony he was speeding. [2] Nabokov talked to Bishop about the ticket and left it in his locker, as requested by Bishop. Bishop then told Judge Danser about the ticket and gave it to him. The judge in turn gave the ticket to his clerk who had the file sent to Judge Danser's courtroom. On June 14, 2002, while Judge Danser was on vacation, he ordered the ticket dismissed. Judge Danser testified that Bishop told him the "people responsible" for issuing the ticket did not object to it being dismissed. The issuing officer testified he had no such conversation.

q. Phyllis Cruse (see M.Rpt., pp. 50-52)

Cruse was cited by the SJPD on May 9, 2002 for speeding. Cruse told her husband, Scott, about the ticket. At the time, Scott Cruse knew that Judge Danser had dismissed a ticket for their mutual friend, Todd Mayo (§ c, ante, p. 7). Both Scott and Phyllis Cruse were good friends with Judge Danser through a variety of social, sports and school connections. Scott asked Judge Danser at the Little League field "if he [the judge] could take care" of the ticket. (M.Rpt., p. 51.) On June 12, 2002, the case file was sent to the Hall of Justice "per Judge Danser." (Ibid.) Again while Judge Danser was on vacation on June 14, 2002 (see § p, ante), he ordered the ticket dismissed. The judge claimed Bishop reported "the officers" had no problem if the judge wanted to dismiss. (Id. at p. 52.) The issuing officer testified he was never notified the ticket was contested and knew no reason it should be dismissed.

r. Tadd Whitmire (see M.Rpt., pp. 52-53)

Whitmire was cited in Gilroy during or about June 2002 for a non-functioning taillight and for lacking proof of insurance. He was stopped two blocks from the home of Kathi Bringuel, Judge Danser's clerk, where he had just picked up Victoria Enos from a party. Enos is Whitmire's former wife and she recently had begun working as a courtroom clerk in Judge

[2] Nabokov was the defendant in another case handled by Judge Danser and his brief biographical description and connections to the judge and Bishop are set forth in section f, ante, page 8.

Danser's department. Enos contacted Bringuel and asked what they needed to do to take care of the ticket. Enos testified that Bringuel responded she "would look into it and take care of it." (R.T. 1062:20-24.) In contrast, Bringuel asserted she told Enos that since the ticket involved only a "fix-it" violation, Enos should just get the taillight fixed. (R.T. 2254:2-6.) There is no evidence concerning the disposition of the ticket. Although Bringuel testified the case was "heard in Judge Danser's department" (R.T. 2254:18-28), there is no evidence of a court record showing that to be a fact or of any involvement by Judge Danser with the ticket.

s. Erasmo Galvan (see M.Rpt., pp. 53-54)

Galvan was cited by the CHP on July 23, 2002 for making an improper U-turn. He is the father of Georgina Galvan-Colin who worked as a court reporter in Judge Danser's department from 2001 to 2003. The court reporter had heard that another staff person, Victoria Enos, had been able to get Tadd Whitmire's ticket (see § r, ante, p. 14) transferred to Judge Danser's department. After Galvan-Colin told the judge about the ticket, he told her to give the details to Bringuel; Galvan-Colin gave the actual ticket to Bringuel. Judge Danser directed Bringuel to get the file from traffic court, and on September 16, 2002, the judge dismissed the ticket. Judge Danser had Bringuel call the defendant's home to let him know the ticket had been dismissed. Bringuel also filled out an abstract of judgment showing the dismissal.

According to the judge, he was advised by Bishop prior to dismissing the ticket that the issuing officer/agency "had no problem" with the dismissal. (M.Rpt., p. 54.) The issuing officer testified he never received notice the ticket was being contested and knew of no reason it should be dismissed.

t. Mark Smith (see M.Rpt., pp. 54-56)

Smith was cited on September 21, 2001 by the LGPD for a non-functioning brake light. He subsequently was charged with a misdemeanor failure to appear in connection with the original ticket. Smith played for the Sharks at the time. Although he did not recall discussing the ticket with Bishop, Bishop nonetheless discussed it with Judge Danser. The judge knew Smith played for the Sharks. On September 17, 2002, the file was sent to Judge Danser's department and the judge dismissed both charges that day. The minute order states the dismissal was in the "interests of justice." At the judge's request, his clerk, Kathi Bringuel, phoned Smith to advise him of the dismissal and prepared an abstract of judgment for the DMV so that Smith's record of his non-appearance could be cleared more quickly.

The judge testified that Bishop told him Smith's ticket was a "fix-it" violation and that the brake light had been fixed. There is no proof of correction in the file. Bishop did not show the judge any proof of correction, and Smith testified he had no recollection of showing proof of correction to a law enforcement official. There is no evidence in the file of payment of the statutory $10 fee in connection with the dismissal upon correction of the violation. There also is no explanation for the dismissal of the failure to appear charge.

u. Dwayne DeRosario (see M.Rpt., pp. 56-58)

DeRosario was cited on June 25, 2002 by the SJPD for speeding. He subsequently was charged with a misdemeanor failure to appear. While he was a player with the San Jose Earthquakes soccer team, he heard Bishop tell the players at a meeting they should come to him with any legal issues. DeRosario told Bishop about the ticket. Bishop told the judge about it, adding the information that DeRosario was with the Earthquakes. On October 18, 2002, the judge dismissed both charges. The minute order states the dismissal was in the "interests of justice."

The judge admitted he involved himself with the matter solely because Bishop asked him to do so. He claims he dismissed it only after Bishop told him there was no objection, although concededly no basis was given for the dismissal. The citing officer testified he had not recommended a dismissal and did not know of any basis for dismissal. There is no explanation for the dismissal of the failure to appear charge.

v. Rebecca Linton (see M.Rpt., pp. 58-60)

On June 13, 2002, Linton was cited by the SJPD for a carpool lane violation. She admitted the violation in her testimony. She subsequently was charged with a misdemeanor failure to appear. At the time of the criminal trial, Linton was the fiancée of Malcolm Phillips, the Earthquakes' equipment manager. She talked to him about the ticket. Phillips had heard Bishop suggest at an Earthquakes' players meeting that the players should contact him with any "issues" because he was involved with law enforcement. Phillips talked to Bishop about Linton's ticket and gave him the paperwork. Bishop asked the judge to handle the ticket. The judge testified Bishop told him Linton had paid the ticket but that the check had been returned and that she just wanted to contest the failure to appear charge. Nonetheless, the judge dismissed both charges on December 16, 2002. He admitted he became involved because of Bishop's request.

The judge gave conflicting explanations for his actions. Initially he claimed Bishop told him Linton had come to court and been turned away. He also testified Bishop said there was no objection to a dismissal, although he later retracted this assertion. The judge also changed his testimony to state that Bishop had told him Linton had come to Judge Danser's department and had been sent away, causing the judge to "feel bad about her coming down there, having to make a second trip" to his court. (M.Rpt., p. 60.)

The citing officer testified he never was contacted concerning a possible dismissal. He had not recommended and did not know of any reason for a dismissal.

w. Bruce Morgan (see M.Rpt., pp. 60-62)

Morgan was cited on May 23, 2002 by the SJPD for an illegal left turn. He was charged later with a misdemeanor failure to appear. Morgan was the head athletic trainer for the Earthquakes. He testified Bishop stated at a player presentation that he, Bishop, was an officer with the LGPD and employed by the Sharks as part of the security staff, and that he might be able to help players with legal difficulties. Morgan had the resulting impression that Bishop could take care of traffic tickets. Morgan gave Bishop the ticket at Bishop's request and understood the ticket would be "expunged." (M.Rpt., p.61.)

Bishop told Judge Danser about Morgan's ticket, and on December 16, 2002, the judge dismissed the charges. The judge admitted he handled the case because Bishop asked him to do so. He claimed that he dismissed the charges only after Bishop told him there was no objection. The citing officer, however, testified he never received notice the ticket was being contested. He had not been contacted by Bishop and knew no reason to recommend dismissal. There is no evidence to justify the dismissal of the failure to appear charge.

B. The DUI's – Findings of Fact

Judge Danser also is alleged to have committed misconduct in connection with his handling of four cases in which the defendants were charged with driving under the influence of alcohol (DUI). The misconduct charges concerning the DUI's are set forth in counts two, three, eight and nine. We adopt the following findings of the masters:

1. Paul Dellanini (Count Two) (see M.Rpt., pp. 76, 77-80)

Dellanini was arrested in Gilroy on January 27, 2002; his blood alcohol level was .12 percent. He was a firefighter with the state Department of Forestry and wanted to avoid going to jail for the DUI.

Dellanini's sister, Patricia Corona, was a friend of Judge Danser's clerk, Kathi Bringuel, and the two had worked together at the court in San Jose. Corona was aware that Judge Danser typically would not impose jail or weekend work time as part of a sentence for a first-time DUI offense. Corona told Bringuel about Dellanini's arrest. Corona later told her mother they should have the case transferred to Judge Danser because he did not give jail sentences. Bringuel told the judge about the arrest and added that the defendant's mother had worked at the South County facility for many years and was embarrassed about her son's case and did not want it heard in South County. Judge Danser agreed to hear the case if Dellanini was prepared to plead guilty. The judge told Bringuel to calendar the case for plea and sentencing.

On March 15, 2002, Dellanini's case was transferred to San Jose. Judge Ray Cunningham, who was assigned to South County, testified he did not object to the transfer because he knew the defendant's mother quite well and he thought it was appropriate for the case to be transferred. Judge Cunningham and Judge Danser had been friends for nearly 25 years, shared season tickets to the Sharks, and socialized together at sports events.

Judge Danser was the only pretrial judge at the time that did not impose jail or weekend work for a first-time offense and blood alcohol level below .20 percent. At the South County facility, where a DUI case with a Gilroy arrest normally would be heard, the typical sentence in such a case would have included 48 hours in jail or 6 days of weekend work, with credit for 8 hours time-served.

On March 26, 2002, Dellanini appeared before Judge Danser without counsel and pled guilty to the offense of driving with a blood alcohol level of .08 percent or higher. The judge dismissed the DUI charge and imposed a sentence that was close to the minimum allowed by law. The sentence was more lenient than the defendant was otherwise likely to have received. Judge Danser did not sentence the defendant to any jail time or the weekend work program. There was no court reporter present and the judge did not disclose on the record his ex parte conversation with Bringuel or explain why the case was in his department.

2. Anna-Marie Keane (Count Three) (see M.Rpt., pp. 76, 80-87)

Keane was arrested by the Los Altos police on August 2, 2002 for a DUI. Her biggest concern was about going to jail. Keane knew Randy Bishop from Los Altos Police Officers Association (POA) golf tournaments and she told him about her arrest later in August 2002. About September 2002, Bishop told Judge Danser that someone who had participated in a POA golf tournament had been arrested for DUI and that the case was pending in the Palo Alto branch court (where a case involving a Los Altos arrest would be assigned pursuant to local court rules).

Bishop asked Judge Danser if he would hear the case. The judge agreed, provided the defendant was willing to plead guilty. When Bishop asked what the likely sentence would be, the judge described terms that did not include jail time or weekend work. Bishop then reported to Keane that Judge Danser had agreed to hear her case if she would plead guilty, and that if she did so, she would not be going to jail. Bishop later gave the judge Keane's name and date of birth so the judge could get the case file.

Keane retained attorney Horner to represent her. Horner told her the case would be heard in Palo Alto and that a normal sentence would include weekend work. Keane told Horner that Judge Danser was going to bring the case to San Jose. On September 24, 2002, an attorney from Horner's office appeared before Judge Southard in Palo Alto for arraignment. A pretrial conference was set on that date for October 10. Normally at a pretrial conference, a representative from the district attorney's office would be present and the attorneys and the judge would discuss possible settlement; typically, a possible plea and sentence might be discussed.

Judge Danser's clerk, Kathi Bringuel, advised the judge that the Keane case was pending in Palo Alto. Judge Danser phoned Judge Southard's clerk on October 9, 2002 and asked that the file be sent to him for a pretrial conference on October 15, 2002. Judge Southard's clerk gave a note to Judge Southard, but he forgot about the matter until he discovered the note several days later under some papers on his bench. In the interim, the previously scheduled pretrial occurred before Judge Southard on October 10. He indicated a likely sentence, consistent with his normal practice for a "nonaggravated, nonmitigated" first-time DUI, which would include 10 days weekend work, minus one-day credit. (M.Rpt., p. 83.)

After the pretrial conference before Judge Southard, the case file was transferred to Judge Danser. Judge Southard testified that he transferred the file because he assumed Judge Danser had another case involving the same defendant and that the parties wanted to consolidate the matters for disposition. Judge Southard did not know Judge Danser's request for the transfer was at the behest of a friend of Judge Danser.

Without issuing a minute order, Judge Danser continued the case until October 29 and gave the new date to Bishop. Bishop told Keane to be present in court that date and Keane relayed the information to her lawyer. Because of the lack of a minute order, the district attorney had no notice of the transfer or hearing.

Bishop placed a three-minute telephone call to Judge Danser's chambers at 8:48 a.m. on October 29, 2002 and was present in Judge Danser's courtroom, sitting next to Keane, when the case was called shortly thereafter. Keane was present with her lawyer, Horner. The judge was hearing felony motions that morning, and Deputy District Attorney (DDA) Tracy Gilliam was present in Judge Danser's courtroom on a law and motion matter. Gilliam was not assigned to misdemeanor DUI cases. She did not have a copy of the Keane file and did not know the case was on calendar until she arrived in court that morning.

Before proceeding with the Keane matter, Judge Danser did not hold a pretrial conference and sought no involvement or input from anyone from the district attorney's office. The judge called the Keane case at the beginning of the calendar and asked for appearances; attorney Horner announced he was present with the defendant. Keane entered a no contest plea to the offense of driving with a blood alcohol level of .08 percent or higher.

As the judge began to question Keane about the waiver of rights form Horner had filed, DDA Gilliam interrupted and asked Judge Danser who from the DA's office was assigned to the case. He replied, falsely, "This came from Palo Alto. They wanted to have it here for some reason, I said we'd do it." (M.Rpt., p. 85.) The judge asked Gilliam if she wanted to handle the case. She responded she did not know a lot about the case. The judge replied that it was "just a typical DUI case." (Ibid.) That statement was not true in light of Keane's high blood-alcohol test results of .223 percent at the time of the arrest and breath test results two hours later of .18 and .19 percent. All of those results would be considered high. In addition, this was not Keane's first offense, contrary to what Judge Danser told DDA Gilliam. Keane had an alcohol-related reckless driving conviction from 12 to 17 years previously. Although Judge Danser testified he never considered "stale priors" in sentencing, a prosecutor who was aware of the prior conviction would have been entitled to argue its relevance at sentencing.

Judge Danser accepted Keane's guilty plea, dismissed the DUI charge, and gave her a sentence close to the minimum allowable. The sentence was less than she likely would have received from Judge Southard. When DDA Gilliam questioned Judge Danser's failure to impose jail time in light of the .18 percent blood alcohol level, he stated he did not impose jail or weekend work time unless the level was over .20 percent.

At trial, Judge Danser offered three different explanations for why he transferred the case to himself. Ultimately, he said he "forgot" why Bishop and Keane wanted the case transferred. The inescapable inference is that he made the transfer as a favor to Bishop so that Keane could receive a lighter sentence than she otherwise would have received.

On November 1, 2002, three days after the Keane plea and sentencing hearing, DDA Gilliam sought to get a transcript of the hearing. Judge Danser attempted to prevent her from doing so, and his misconduct in that connection is the subject of count six (discussed post, pp. 24-25, 34).

3. Niklas Sundstrom (Count Eight) (see M.Rpt., pp. 87-90)

Sundstrom was arrested by the Campbell police on May 9, 2000 for DUI. Breath tests showed blood alcohol levels of .22 and .23 percent. Sundstrom played for the Sharks at the time. Randy Bishop referred Sundstrom to the attorney who represented him in the case. The case was set for arraignment in a court other than Judge Danser's department.

Someone, likely Bishop, asked Judge Danser if he would hear the case. Judge Danser agreed, provided Sundstrom would plead guilty. The judge asked his clerk to have the matter transferred to his department.

During Judge Danser's handling of the case, he afforded substantively lenient treatment to Sundstrom in two respects. First, although neither the defendant nor his counsel appeared for a hearing on June 23, 2000, the judge did not issue a bench warrant for the defendant's arrest, contrary to his normal practice. Second, Sundstrom pled guilty, thereby admitting a blood alcohol level of .20 percent or more. There is evidence, including Judge Danser's own testimony, that he usually imposed jail time in cases with blood alcohol at that level. In contrast to his usual practice, the judge did not impose jail or weekend work time on Sundstrom when he plead guilty. There was no court reporter at the sentencing hearing and the judge made no disclosures on the record of any ex parte communications about the case.

4. Edward Meyers (Count Nine) (see M.Rpt., pp. 90-92)

Meyers was arrested for DUI on December 22, 2001. Breath tests indicated blood alcohol levels of .19 and .20 percent. He was a sergeant for the Santa Clara County Department of Correction and worked at the county jail with the husband of Judge Danser's courtroom deputy/bailiff, Susan Taylor. The Meyers and Taylor families were friends. Meyers told Susan Taylor about the arrest shortly after it happened. She said she could ask Judge Danser if he would take the case, explaining that he did not necessarily sentence first-time offenders to the weekend work program.

Susan Taylor told Judge Danser about Meyers's arrest, adding that Meyers was a friend who worked in the Department of Correction. She asked if the judge would hear her friend's case. The judge agreed, provided Sgt. Meyers was willing to plead guilty. Judge Danser had the case transferred to his department from Judge Erica Yew's department. Judge Yew normally sentenced DUI defendants to the weekend work program. Susan Taylor told Meyers his case would be heard in Judge Danser's department.

On February 5, 2002, Sgt. Meyers appeared with counsel before Judge Danser and pled guilty. The judge imposed a minimum sentence that did not include jail or weekend work time. He did not make any disclosures on the record that the defendant was a friend of his bailiff or concerning why the case was pending before him.

C. The Family Citations – Findings of Fact (Count Five) (see M.Rpt., pp. 94-97)

Judge Danser has stipulated to the truth of the allegations in count five concerning his attempts to dismiss three citations issued to one of his minor children. (Order of July 22, ¶ 2a.) A summary of the admitted facts is as follows:

1. On November 22, 2002, LGPD Officer Todd Fleming cited one of Judge Danser's minor children for failing to stop at a stop sign and for a violation in connection with his provisional driver's license. Upon learning of the citation, the judge phoned Bishop at home to complain about the ticket, threatening to file a formal complaint against Officer Fleming. The judge also phoned his friend, LGPD Captain Duino Giordano, and asked why Fleming had not given the child a break given the judge's position and his relationship with the LGPD. Judge Danser asked or suggested the ticket be dismissed. When Giordano called back to say the LGPD had no authority to dismiss the ticket, the judge expressed his unhappiness with that decision. The judge stated he would no longer make himself as readily available to the LGPD as he had in the past.

2. On November 12 and December 12, 2002, the LGPD issued citations to a vehicle registered to the judge and his wife. The vehicle was being driven on those dates by the same minor child referenced in the preceding section 1. Both citations were for parking without a permit and neither was timely paid. Although Vehicle Code section 40215, subdivision (a) provides that within 21 days after the issuance of a notice of parking violation, a person may request an initial review by the issuing agency, no such request was made concerning either ticket.

On January 7, 2003, the judge phoned the LGPD, spoke with a records person and told her he was going to order the tickets dismissed. He asserted on the telephone that the tickets had been issued erroneously. Two days later, the judge sent a letter to the LGPD on his official court stationery ordering that the two parking citations be dismissed.

3. LGPD Chief of Police Scott R. Seaman sent Judge Danser a letter refusing to dismiss the two citations referenced in the preceding section 2. Approximately January 22, 2003, the judge again phoned his friend LGPD Captain Giordano, expressed anger at Chief Seaman's letter, and reiterated that he no longer would make himself available to the LGPD. The next day, the judge faxed Giordano a letter apologizing for the phone call, admitting it was "totally inappropriate." In the judge's faxed letter, he added, "perhaps my interaction with your officers and other employees at the police department should be on a more professional level and I will stop my informal contact with them." The judge requested that Giordano advise LGPD personnel of the changed relationship. (M.Rpt., pp. 96-97.)

4. On January 23, 2003, Judge Danser sent a letter to LGPD Chief Seaman on official court stationery concerning the parking citations referred to in section 2, falsely stating "there was no violation and the citations should not have been issued." The judge also made the misleading statement in his letter that his child "has a permit from the high school that allows him to park." In fact, the permit did not allow parking in a faculty space. The judge included two additional sarcastic comments in his letter: "It is nice to know that the police department has the resources to pursue such important matters" and "I now understand why the kids at the high school complain about the Los Gatos police officers."

5. On January 24, 2003, Judge Danser called Chief Seaman and spoke to his secretary, Nancy McVay, who offered to take a message since the chief was busy. The judge raised his voice and told McVay in a very angry tone that she could give the following message to the chief: "Don't send your officers to my house; don't contact me; as far as I'm concerned, business between us is done!" The judge added an additional disparaging remark about the LGPD.

D. Unjudicial Demeanor and Abuse of Power in Denying Transcript – Findings of Fact (Count Six, ¶ G) (see M.Rpt., pp. 103-106)

Judge Danser is charged with misconduct in connection with his attempts to prevent DDA Tracy Gilliam from obtaining a transcript of the Keane plea and sentencing hearing (see § 2, ante, pp. 18-21). We adopt the following findings of the masters:

On November 1, 2002, which was three days after the Keane plea and sentencing hearing, DDA Tracy Gilliam left a voicemail message at 9:00 a.m. in Judge Danser's department requesting a copy of the transcript of that earlier hearing. When the clerk, Kathi Bringuel, advised the judge of the message, he told her "it wasn't her [Gilliam's] case" and that Gilliam could not have the transcript. (M.Rpt., p. 104.) At 10:30 a.m., Bringuel left a whispered return voicemail message for Gilliam that "you're not hearing this from me," but that Gilliam was not getting the transcript without coming to court and requesting it from Judge Danser. (Ibid.) When Gilliam and Bringuel spoke directly by phone shortly thereafter, Bringuel said she did not know why the judge had disallowed the transcript and that Gilliam would need to ask the judge directly. Bringuel warned Gilliam that the judge was angry.

DDA Gilliam went to Judge Danser's courtroom shortly before 11:00 a.m.; the judge was on the bench. During a recess, Gilliam approached the court reporter, asked for a copy of the transcript, and started to give the reporter the case number. The judge interrupted and asked "That DUI?" When Gilliam replied in the affirmative, indicating she wanted a copy of the Keane transcript, Judge Danser said "Denied. You can't have it." The judge asked Gilliam why she wanted the transcript. She replied that her boss, Karyn Sinunu, had asked her to get it and that Gilliam was uncertain as to Sinunu's reasons. Gilliam said she would have Sinunu call the judge. He said he would refuse the call and that Sinunu would need to come over. (M.Rpt., p. 105.)

In refusing Gilliam's transcript request, Judge Danser stated "It's really none of your business" and that "it just happened that we were sentencing somebody when they [the DA's] were in there." (M.Rpt., p. 105.) Judge Danser appeared angry. Speaking in a loud voice, he said, "Screw your office. Screw Karyn Sinunu. Screw you. I don't care about your damn cases. You can keep your damn cases. If you want to take me from the bench, go ahead. I can do something else. I am so hot about this. Screw your office. And you can tell Karyn Sinunu I said screw her." (Id. at p. 106.)

Deputy Public Defender Susan Shores was present in court when Gilliam came in just before 11:00 a.m. Shores did not see Gilliam do anything rude or inappropriate in connection with her request for the transcript. Shores confirmed that the judge told Gilliam her office could stay out of his courtroom and said words to the effect of "you guys can go screw yourself." (M.Rpt., p. 106.)

Judge Danser testified he denied Gilliam's transcript request because she had not completed appropriate paperwork. The explanation is not credible. An attorney may obtain a non-confidential transcript, such as this, directly from the reporter without court approval. The judge admitted he had never previously interfered with the preparation of a transcript.

II. Conclusions of Law

Judge Danser has stipulated that he committed at least prejudicial misconduct in connection with the combined charges against him. This concession concerns the judge's overall conduct, but it does limit the issue to be decided by us. The remaining question is whether any of Judge Danser's admittedly improper actions satisfies the standard of the more serious willful misconduct. The masters concluded that in each instance but the traffic case involving Tadd Whitmire (§ r, ante, pp. 14-15), the judge committed willful misconduct; the masters determined that the Whitmire case involved prejudicial misconduct. We agree with the masters and their analyses that all instances except the one involve willful misconduct. As to Whitmire, we conclude there is no evidence of any action taken by Judge Danser.[3]

The levels or types of judicial misconduct that may subject a judge to discipline by the commission are described in article VI, section 18, subpart (d), of the California Constitution. The most serious form of wrongdoing, willful misconduct, is defined by the California Supreme Court as consisting of (1) unjudicial conduct that is (2) committed in bad faith (3) by a judge acting in his or her judicial capacity. (Broadman v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1998) 18 Cal.4th 1079, 1091 (Broadman); Dodds v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1995) 12 Cal.4th 163, 172 (Dodds).)

[3] The evidence concerning Whitmire is summarized in section r, ante, pp. 14-15. The case appears to have been transferred to Judge Danser's department, although even that was not established. No evidence linked Judge Danser to the transfer. Similarly, the case apparently was dismissed, but there is no evidence that demonstrates either that fact or that the judge took any actions concerning the case. Simply stated, there is no evidence of any conduct, let alone any misconduct, by Judge Danser.

In order to determine whether a judge's conduct is "unjudicial" under the first prong of the foregoing standard, the conduct is measured with reference to the California Code of Judicial Ethics. (Dodds, supra, 12 Cal.4th at p. 172; accord, Oberholzer v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1999) 20 Cal.4th 371, 395 (Oberholzer).) "The failure of a judge to comply with the canons 'suggests performance below the minimum level necessary to maintain public confidence in the administration of justice.'" (Adams v. Commission on Judicial Performance (Adams II) (1995) 10 Cal.4th 866, 878, citing Adams v. Commission on Judicial Performance (Adams I) (1994) 8 Cal.4th 630, 662.)

The "bad faith" requirement for willful misconduct is satisfied when a judge is "(1) performing a judicial act for a corrupt purpose (which is any purpose other than the faithful discharge of judicial duties), or (2) performing a judicial act with knowledge that the act is beyond the judge's lawful judicial power, or (3) performing a judicial act that exceeds the judge's lawful power with a conscious disregard for the limits of the judge's authority." (Broadman, supra, 18 Cal.4th at p. 1092.)

The "judicial capacity" prong of the willfulness test has been defined as follows: "A judge is acting in a judicial capacity while performing one of the functions, whether adjudicative or administrative in nature, that are associated with the position of a judge or when the judge uses or attempts to use the authority of the judicial office for an improper purpose." (Broadman, supra, 18 Cal.4th at p. 1104, citing Dodds, supra, 12 Cal.4th at p. 172.)

It is an abuse of power, and willful misconduct, for a judge to engage in a patterned behavior of handling cases that are not pending before the judge as part of normal court business. (Inquiry Concerning Judge David E. Wasilenko, No. 170 (CJP 2005), p. 24 (Wasilenko).)

The use of the power of judicial office to benefit a friend is a "casebook example of wilful misconduct." (McCullough v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1989) 49 Cal.3d 186, 194 (McCullough), citing Spruance v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications (1975)13 Cal.3d 778,798 (Spruance).) In this case, we again confront the vice inherent in a two-track system of justice, where favored treatment is afforded friends and other favored few, and which is easily recognized as "corruption at the core of our system of impartial equal justice, and ... intolerable." (Wasilenko, supra, p. 24.) A judge who runs such a two-track system commits willful misconduct. (Ibid.)

Corruption is inherent in Judge Danser's pervasive scheme of dismissing tickets without any proper basis, under the guise of being in "interest of justice." In fact, "ticket fixing is a quintessential bad act of a judge" (Inquiry Concerning Judge Michael E. Platt, No. 162 (CJP 2002), p. 20 (Platt).) It is "among the most obvious forms of abuse of authority … [–] 'an abuse that citizens unquestionably understand and are suspicious about.'" (Id. at p. 20, quoting masters' report.)

In each of the counts in which Judge Danser is charged with wrongdoing, the masters applied the Supreme Court's test for willful misconduct and found it satisfied, except in the Whitmire case, as noted. We reach the same conclusion for the same and additional reasons. We now separately analyze the three parts of the test to show how each is satisfied. The following discussion applies to each of the traffic matters, excluding Whitmire, that Judge Danser transferred to himself.

A. The Traffic Cases – Conclusions of Law (see M.Rpt., pp. 62-70)

1. Unjudicial Conduct

The masters concluded, as do we, that by improperly transferring the traffic cases to himself and then affording family, friends, court staff and others with special connections access to a preferential justice system, Judge Danser violated canon 1 (requiring a judge to maintain high standards of conduct so as to uphold the integrity and independence of the judiciary), canon 2 (requiring a judge to avoid impropriety and the appearance of impropriety in the judge's activities), and canon 2A (requiring a judge to respect and comply with the law and act in a manner that promotes public confidence in the integrity and impartiality of the judiciary). [4]

Canon 2B(1) prohibits a judge from allowing family, social or other relationships to influence the judge's judicial conduct or judgment, and also prohibits a judge from conveying or permitting others to convey the impression that anyone is in a special position to influence the judge. Canon 2B(2) proscribes a judge from lending the prestige of judicial office to advance the pecuniary or other interests of the judge or others. Judge Danser violated both of these canons in each of the traffic cases by allowing his relationships with his friends, including Bishop and court staff and various defendants, to influence his judicial conduct and judgment. He also conveyed the impression that they were in a special position to influence him, and lent the prestige of his judicial office to advance the pecuniary and personal interests of his inner circle and of the defendants.

[4] In the Granato matter (§ a, ante, pp. 5-6), the judge sought to cause a dismissal through ex parte communications with the court commissioner before whom the case was pending and with a lawyer the judge contacted to act on the defendant's behalf. There is not an abuse of power in Granato related to an improper transfer, but instead, there is an equivalent abuse of judicial authority in the efforts to influence another bench officer. (Cf. Platt, supra, pp. 8-9, 13-14.) The conduct was in violation of canons 1, 2, 2A, 2B(1), and 2B(2); the provision of canon 3B(7) prohibiting ex parte contacts also was violated. The content of each implicated canon is discussed in the text. An additional provision of canon 2B(2) prohibits a judge from initiating communications with a sentencing judge, which Judge Danser also violated in his contacts and attempted influence over the commissioner.

Canon 3B(7) contains dual prohibitions applicable here. First, this canon requires a judge to afford all interested persons, or counsel, a "full right to be heard according to law." In all of the traffic cases (except Granato), Judge Danser dismissed the cases without affording the prosecution a right to participate. While it appears that the DA typically does not appear in traffic matters in Santa Clara County, the citing law enforcement officer or agency is to be notified of contested citations and has a right to be heard. That right was abridged by Judge Danser in violation of canon 3B(7). (M.Rpt., p.64.) Second, the canon prohibits ex parte communications, with certain exceptions not applicable here. In the traffic matters, including Granato, the judge had repeated ex parte contacts. The contacts were with Bishop, other members of the judge's inner circle, and the commissioner and counsel in Granato. These ex parte contacts violated canon 3B(7).

In all of the traffic matters except Granato, the judge also violated canon 3B(8), requiring a judge to dispose of all judicial matters "fairly, promptly, and efficiently." Judge Danser's summary dismissals of the contested traffic cases deprived law enforcement of the right to be heard and thus the judge failed to dispose of the cases "fairly" in compliance with this canon.

Canon 3E(1) requires recusal when "disqualification is required by law," which, as relevant here, is required under Code of Civil Procedure section 170.1, subdivision (a)(6). That section requires disqualification if "[f]or any reason (A) the judge believes his or her recusal would further the interests of justice, (B) the judge believes there is a substantial doubt as to his or her capacity to be impartial, or (C) a person aware of the facts might reasonably entertain a doubt that the judge would be able to be impartial." In all of the transferred traffic cases, the judge was disqualified, at a minimum under subdivision (C).

Under the related canon 3E(2), a judge is required to disclose on the record information the judge believes the parties or the lawyers might consider relevant to the question of disqualification, even if the judge believes there is no basis for disqualification. Having improperly transferred the cases to himself for an improper purpose, Judge Danser could not have had any legitimate subjective doubt that he was required to disqualify himself. Having failed to recuse, however, he certainly was required under canon 3E(2) to make requisite and proper disclosures. His failure to do so was in violation of this canon. Because Granato was not pending before Judge Danser, the dual disqualification/disclosure requirements of canon 3E are inapplicable.

Judge Danser claims he had judicial discretion to dismiss tickets based on Bishop's oral statements that the citing officer/agency had no objection to the dismissal. The masters concluded, as do we, that the entire attempted cover of reliance on Bishop was a subterfuge. Moreover, the section of the Vehicle Code the judge claimed empowered him to act in fact expressly disempowered him with the following language: "Under no circumstances shall a personal friendship with any officer, public official, or law enforcement agency be grounds for dismissal." (Veh. Code § 40500(d).) The point is also academic in that Judge Danser had no judicial authority over the transferred cases. A judge cannot confer judicial power or discretion on himself or herself by means of a wholesale pattern of illicit case transfers. (Wasilenko, supra, p. 21.)

To the extent Judge Danser did in fact seek the consent of any of the citing officers/agencies to dismiss any of the tickets issued to members of his inner circle, he thereby violated canons 2B(1) and 2B(2). Any such efforts, direct or indirect through Bishop, would demonstrate the judge was allowing his personal relationships to influence his judicial conduct and judgment. The actions also would have conveyed the impression that members of the inner circle were in a position to influence the judge, and would have lent the prestige of judicial office to advance their pecuniary or personal interests, in contravention of these two canons.

If such advance "approval" was sought from the citing officers, the communications were in violation of canon 3B(7), based on Judge Danser's own description of the conversations as having been out of the presence of the parties. Judge Danser also could not reasonably rely on Bishop as a messenger, given Bishop's own personal interest in the outcome of his friends' tickets. Moreover, if Judge Danser did in fact rely on Bishop as an intermediary in any regard, he thereby denied fundamental fairness and due process to law enforcement, which also would contravene the separate provision of canon 3B(7) requiring that matters be handled "fairly."

Judge Danser's conduct was "unjudicial" under the Broadman standard because of the foregoing violations of the canons.

2. Bad Faith

The "bad faith" component of willful misconduct is satisfied because Judge Danser acted in each of the traffic cases, including Granato, "for a corrupt purpose," that is, a "purpose other than the faithful discharge of judicial duties." (Broadman, supra, 18 Cal.4th at p. 1092.)

In Granato, Judge Danser contacted the court commissioner and discussed a dismissal of the ticket. When the commissioner had second thoughts about dismissing the case in the absence of the defendant, the judge requested a lawyer to appear. In the Platt case, we found that it was prejudicial misconduct for Judge Platt to call a court commissioner to say that the judge's godfather had received a ticket and that the man was active in the community. There was no evidence in Platt that the case would come before the commissioner or that the judge asked the commissioner for favorable consideration. The contact alone was misconduct. (Platt, supra, p. 13.) Here, Judge Danser discussed a dismissal in an actual case pending before the commissioner. He was overtly "using the power of the bench to benefit a friend," an act the Supreme Court has cited as "a casebook example of wilful misconduct." (McCullough, supra, 49 Cal.3d at p. 194.)

After Judge Danser was advised by his presiding judge to avoid a repeat of Granato by abstaining from contacting court commissioners, Judge Danser shifted strategies and compounded his wrongdoing. He transferred the subsequent cases to his own department through a wholesale abuse of power, and as a means to bypass the commissioners to whom such cases normally were assigned. The transfers were the first step of the corrupt scheme of affording preferential treatment to his inner circle. The process culminated in the wholesale dismissals without legal justification. The entire scheme was patently for a corrupt purpose and in bad faith under Broadman.

3. Judicial Capacity

In dismissing the transferred traffic cases, Judge Danser was acting in his judicial capacity within the meaning of Broadman. (Broadman, supra, 18 Cal.4th at p. 1104.) That conclusion pertains notwithstanding his corrupt purpose. "[I]f a judge uses, or attempts to use, his authority as a judge for improper ends, regardless of location, we consider the judge to be acting in his judicial capacity." (Dodds, supra, 12 Cal.4th at p. 172, italics added.) Judge Danser's assertion of influence over the court commissioner in the Granato matter also was an act taken in his judicial capacity. (See Platt, supra, p. 8-9, 13-14 [Judge Platt was acting in a judicial capacity and committed willful misconduct when he asked another judge to grant preferential treatment to a relative of a personal acquaintance of Judge Platt].)

B. The DUI Cases – Conclusions of Law (see M.Rpt., pp. 92-94)

Judge Danser also improperly transferred the four DUI cases to his courtroom following his improper ex parte communications. None of the cases was assigned to Judge Danser and none would have been assigned or transferred to him in the ordinary course of court business. Following each of the transfers, the judge afforded procedural preferences and imposed more lenient sentences than the defendants otherwise likely would have received. The judge's actions fulfill the three-fold test of Broadman for willful misconduct in that they were unjudicial, in bad faith and while he was acting in his judicial capacity.

As in the traffic cases, the judge's conduct in all four cases was unjudicial in that it violated canons 1, 2, 2A, 2B(1), 2B(2), as well as the ex parte prohibitions and the right to be heard provisions of 3B(7), the "fairness" standard of 3B(8), and canons 3E(1) and 3E(2). [5]

The judge's actions in the DUI cases constitute bad faith based on the same or similar considerations as in the traffic cases. The initial transfer of the cases to his department was an abuse of authority and for a corrupt purpose under Wasilenko, and thus in bad faith under Broadman. The fact that another bench officer may have facilitated one or more of the transfers does not exonerate Judge Danser. Judge Danser's corruption extended as well to affording preferential procedural treatment and lenient sentencing in order to benefit defendants with contacts in the judge's inner circle.

Finally, Judge Danser was acting in his judicial capacity in directing or causing the case transfers to his own department, accepting pleas and imposing sentences, notwithstanding the impropriety of all such acts. (Dodds, supra, 12 Cal.4th at p. 172.)

[5] The provisions of these several canons are summarized in the text, ante, at pages 27-29.

C. The Family Citations – Conclusions of Law (see M.Rpt., pp. 97-102)

1. Judge Danser's efforts to get the LGPD to dismiss the ticket issued to the judge's son by Officer Fleming constituted willful misconduct. His statements to Detective Bishop and Captain Giordano were unjudicial, in bad faith and in his judicial capacity.

The judge's statements were unjudicial in that they were in violation of canons 1, 2, 2A, 2B(1) and 2B(2). The content of the phone calls suggest the judge had been providing services to the police in exchange for an unspecified payback, and if the son's ticket were not dismissed, the judge would retaliate by withdrawing his special judicial services and by filing a complaint against Officer Fleming. His family relationship influenced his judicial conduct and judgment contrary to canon 2B(1). He lent the prestige of judicial office to advance his or his son's personal, familial and pecuniary interests in violation of canon 2B(2). In so doing, the judge did not observe the high standards of conduct required of a judge under canons 1 and 2. The conduct involved impropriety and the appearance thereof contrary to canon 2, and was inconsistent with promoting public confidence in the integrity and impartiality of the judiciary as required under canon 2A. The judge's purpose appears to be nothing other than to benefit himself or his son. The judge was using his power as a judge and therefore clearly was acting in his judicial authority. His actions, however, were not in the faithful discharge of judicial duties, and rather, were corrupt and in bad faith.

2. Vehicle Code section 40215, subdivision (a), provides that within 21 days after the issuance of a notice of parking violation, a person may request an initial review by the issuing agency. Rather than avail himself of that provision, Judge Danser adjudicated his son's tickets, determining for himself they had been improperly issued. Thereafter, in a flagrantly biased abuse of judicial power, he attempted to use his status as a judge to order them dismissed. The judge's oral and written dismissal orders constituted willful misconduct. (Cf. Spruance, supra, 13 Cal.3d at pp. 794, 799 [willful misconduct to solicit another judge to dismiss traffic ticket Judge Spruance had received].)

The judge's conduct was unjudicial in that it violated numerous canons. The conduct was incompatible with canon 2B(1) because the judge allowed his family relationship to influence his judicial conduct and judgment. He used the prestige of office to advance his or his son's personal, familial and pecuniary interests, contrary to canon 2B(2). The improper use of judicial stationery contravened canon 2B(4). The judge was disqualified from hearing his son's case under Code of Civil Procedure section 170.1, subdivision (a)(1) (requiring disqualification when a person within the third degree of relationship to the judge is known to the judge to be a likely material witness) and subdivision (a)(6) (requiring disqualification when a person aware of the facts might reasonably entertain a doubt the judge would be impartial). Accordingly, his failure to recuse therefore contravened canon 3E(1). Because of the foregoing, the judge also violated canons 1, 2 and 2A.

Judge Danser acted in bad faith because he acted for the corrupt purpose of benefiting his son. In identifying himself on the phone as a judge, and using his judicial stationery, the judge was acting in a judicial capacity, albeit improperly so.

3. Judge Danser's statements to Captain Giordano that he would cease making himself available to LGPD officers was in retaliation for Chief Seaman's refusal to dismiss the parking tickets, and constituted willful misconduct. The threatened withdrawal of services carries an inherent suggestion that previous services were offered as part of a bargained exchange and in violation of canons 1, 2 and 2A. The judge's conduct was unjudicial for the additional reasons that the judge allowed his family relationships to influence his judicial conduct and judgment, in violation of canon 2B(1). Because the judge used the prestige of office to advance his or his son's personal, familial and pecuniary interests, he acted contrary to canon 2B(2). The judge was acting in his judicial capacity, and his inappropriate anger during his telephone conversation with Captain Giordano violated canon 3B(4) (requiring a judge to be patient, dignified, and courteous to persons with whom the judge deals in an official capacity.)

The judge's phone call and follow-up fax were to obtain preferential treatment for himself or his son and were patently corrupt. By invoking his powers as a judge in an effort to obtain the favorable treatment, the judge was acting in a judicial capacity.

4. Judge Danser's letter to Chief Seaman constituted willful misconduct. The letter had an improper sarcastic and derogatory tone, contained false and misleading statements, and evidenced a lack of impartiality toward Los Gatos police officers who likely might appear before the judge. Accordingly, it was unjudicial in that it contravened canons 1, 2, 2A and 3B(4).

The judge's conduct was unjudicial for the further reasons that he allowed his family relationships to influence his judicial conduct and judgment, contrary to canon 2B(1). The judge used the prestige of office to advance his or his son's personal, familial and pecuniary interests, and thereby acted contrary to canon 2B(2).

The purpose of the judge's conduct, while acting in a judicial capacity using judicial stationery, was for the corrupt purpose of obtaining favorable treatment for himself or his son.

5. The judge's telephone statements to Nancy McVay were in retaliation for Chief Seaman's refusal to dismiss the parking tickets, and constituted willful misconduct. The threatened withdrawal of services again carries an inherent suggestion that previous services were offered as part of a bargained exchange that was in violation of canons 1, 2 and 2A. The judge's conduct also was unjudicial in that he allowed his family relationships to influence his judicial conduct and judgment, in violation of canon 2B(1). The judge used the prestige of office to advance his or his son's personal, familial and pecuniary interests, and thereby acted contrary to canon 2B(2). The judge was acting in his judicial capacity, and his anger and undignified language during his telephone conversation with McVay violated canon 3B(4).

The purpose of the judge's conduct again was corrupt in that it was to obtain favorable treatment for himself or his son. By referencing his powers as a judge in his threatened retaliation ("Don't send your officers to my house"), the judge was acting in his judicial capacity. "[I]f a judge uses, or attempts to use, his authority as a judge for improper ends, regardless of location, we consider the judge to be acting in his judicial capacity." (Dodds, supra, 12 Cal.4th at p. 172.)

D. Unjudicial Demeanor and Abuse of Power in Denying Transcript – Conclusions of Law (see M.Rpt., pp. 106-107)

Judge Danser's statement to DDA Gilliam that "if you want to take me from the bench, go ahead; I can do something else []" suggests the judge knew that his handling of the Keane case could lead to judicial discipline. Because of this, the judge interfered with Gilliam's routine request for a transcript and tried to intimidate her and her office from pursuing the matter. The judge's actions constituted willful misconduct.

The conduct was unjudicial because it was contrary to several canons. The order denying production of the transcript violated canons 1, 2 and 2A. The judge's crude comments were highly discourteous and injudicious and constituted an inappropriate display of temper in violation of canon 3B(4).

The judge's actions were in bad faith, for the corrupt purpose of inhibiting the gathering of evidence relating to his handling of the Keane case. The judge used the power of his position and was acting in a judicial capacity in denying the request for a transcript.

III. Discipline

Our determination of the appropriate sanction to impose against Judge Danser is guided by the Supreme Court's explanation of the purpose of judicial discipline, the responsibility for which is entrusted to this commission by the California Constitution. According to the court, the purpose "is not punishment, but rather the protection of the public, the enforcement of rigorous standards of judicial conduct, and the maintenance of public confidence in the integrity and independence of the judicial system." (Broadman, supra, 18 Cal.4th at pp. 1111-1112, citing Adams II, supra, 10 Cal. 4th at p. 912.) The combination of the shocking nature of this judge's behavior and the pervasive scope of his corruption clearly warrants the maximum discipline. Indeed, Judge Danser agrees that his conduct warrants a censure and bar. (Order of July 22, ¶ 3.)

In 2002, we removed Judge Michael E. Platt from office for misconduct that included ticket fixing on a scale that pales in significance compared to that of Judge Danser. In the following discussion, we highlight certain examples of Judge Danser's wrongdoing to demonstrate the egregiousness of his behavior. In doing so, we remain mindful of the overall magnitude of the corruption. There are, however, certain examples of behavior that stand out as shocking the conscience.

Near the outset of Judge Danser's ticket-fixing scheme, he dismissed two traffic tickets on March 23, 2000, following Bishop's intercession. The cases involved the judge's friends Paul Pavicich (§ b, ante, p. 6) and Todd Mayo (§ c, ante, p. 7). Neither defendant was present, and neither was represented by counsel when the tickets were dismissed. Consistent with his standard practice in the many fixed-ticket cases, the judge directed the falsification of the official court record to reflect a dismissal "in the interests of justice." In these two instances, he went further and falsified the record to reflect that attorney Terrence Daily had appeared on behalf of both defendants. Mr. Daily happened to be present in court that day, and the judge testified he thought it would be "funny" to put Daily's name in the minutes as counsel for the defendants. In the Pavicich case, according to the judge's testimony, the "fun" included using his judicial power to turn Mr. Daily into a "big hero of the Pavicich family," a prominent local family, by adding Daily's name to the minutes.

Two years later, on June 14, 2002, the judge again dismissed two tickets. One had been issued to Evgeni Nabokov, the Sharks' goalie (§ p, ante, p. 14), and other to the judge's friend, Phyllis Cruse (§ q, ante, p. 14). Neither case was on calendar and neither defendant present in court – and Judge Danser was on vacation that day.

Judge Danser dismissed three tickets given to Gregory Jamison, the CEO of the Sharks organization (§ i, ante, pp. 9-10), because, as the judge testified, he knew Jamison to be "an important man with the Sharks" and because he "had no reason to disbelieve" Jamison had paid the tickets.

Judge Danser displayed shockingly inappropriate behavior in adjudicating his own son's tickets and engaging in the related abuses of power and threats directed at staff and officers of the Los Gatos Police Department.

The judge lied and misrepresented the facts to DDA Tracy Gilliam when she legitimately questioned why the Keane DUI sentencing hearing was taking place without a representative of the prosecutor's office present. (§ 2, ante, pp. 18-21.) Honesty is a minimum qualification expected of every judge (Kloepfer v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1989) 49 Cal.3d 826, 865), and certainly is owed to litigants and counsel. Three days later when Ms. Gilliam sought to obtain a transcript of the proceedings she witnessed, the judge made comments indicating his awareness of the potential wrongdoing in connection with his earlier actions. He sought to prevent the DA's office from obtaining evidence of his conduct, as would be contained in a transcript. That alarming abuse of judicial power was compounded by Judge Danser's inappropriate anger and coarse language directed at Ms. Gilliam, her supervisor, and the prosecutor's office in general.

This opinion is issued as an unqualified denunciation of all of Judge Danser's misconduct in an effort to enforce rigorous standards of conduct. We thereby also seek to repair the damage Judge Danser has caused the reputation of the judiciary by his wholesale transgressions of those standards. We endeavor to rehabilitate and maintain ongoing public confidence in the integrity and independence of the judicial system by censuring Judge Danser in the strongest terms possible.

Judge Danser is seriously lacking in the requisite minimum qualities to be a judge. Our settlement agreement with him accomplished his early retirement. The final remedy available to us, a bar, is designed to protect the public going forward by ensuring Judge Danser does not wear a judicial robe again in this state. Judge Danser is hereby censured and barred from receiving an assignment, appointment, or reference of work from any California state court.

Commission members Mr. Marshall B. Grossman, Judge Frederick P. Horn, Mr. Michael A. Kahn, Mrs. Crystal Lui, Ms. Patricia Miller, Mr. Jose C. Miramontes, Mrs. Penny Perez and Ms. Barbara Schraeger voted to impose a censure and bar. Former commission member Justice Vance W. Raye abstained from the vote because he would complete his term as a member prior to the completion of this written decision. Commission member Justice Judith D. McConnell had not been appointed to the commission at the time of the vote and did not participate in this decision. Commission member Judge Risë Jones Pichon is recused and there is currently one public member vacancy on the commission.

c. Respondent stipulates that at a minimum he engaged in conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute within the meaning of article VI, section 18 of the California Constitution;

(1) A copy of the relevant transcripts and exhibits from the criminal case shall be delivered to each of the special masters as soon as practicable. Thirty days after receipt of such documents by the special masters, the examiner and respondent shall file proposed findings and conclusions pursuant to Commission Rule 129, subdivision (b), and sixty days after receipt of such documents, the special masters shall issue their final report. Pursuant to rule 129, subdivision (c), within the 60-day period, the masters may require such additional briefing and argument by the examiner and respondent as they may desire;

(2) In making their findings of fact and conclusions of law, including resolving conflicts in testimony or determining the credibility of a witness, the masters shall not rely on any verdict in the criminal case;

d. The following counts in the Notice are dismissed in the interest of justice: Count One, subpart (R) only; Count Four; Count Six except for subpart (G); Count Seven;

3. Following issuance of the special masters' final report, the matter shall be determined by the commission pursuant to its rules and the terms of the Stipulation, including but not limited to respondent's agreement that at a minimum he engaged in conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute within the meaning of article VI, section 18 of the California Constitution, that there is sufficient basis for the commission to issue a censure and bar against him pursuant to article VI, section 18 of the Constitution, and that he waives his right of review by the California Supreme Court under article VI, section 18, subdivision (d) of the California Constitution;

4. Nothing contained herein affects the rights and duties of the commission respecting respondent under article VI, section 18, subdivision (c) of the Constitution.

Commission members Justice Vance W. Raye, Marshall B. Grossman, Esq., Judge Frederick P. Horn, Michael A. Kahn, Esq., Ms. Patricia Miller, Mr. Jose C. Miramontes, Mrs. Penny Perez and Ms. Barbara Schraeger participated. Commission members Judge Risë Jones Pichon and Mrs. Crystal Lui did not participate. There is one vacancy on the commission.

| INQUIRY CONCERNING JUDGE ELAINE M. RUSHING,No. 177 | DECISION AND ORDER IMPOSING PUBLIC CENSURE PURSUANT TO STIPULATION (Commission Rule 127) |

I. INTRODUCTION AND SUMMARY

This disciplinary matter concerns Judge Elaine M. Rushing, a judge of the Sonoma County Superior Court since 1992. On February 16, 2006, the commission filed its Notice of Formal Proceedings (Notice) against Judge Rushing in which it charges her with misconduct as follows.

Count one charges that on the night of June 21, 2005, Judge Rushing committed the crimes of driving while under the influence of alcohol (DUI) in violation of Vehicle Code section 23152(a), and driving while having 0.08 percent or more, by weight, of alcohol in her blood in violation of section 23152(b) of that code. The first count also charges that following Judge Rushing's plea of no contest to criminal charges based on the drunk driving, she was convicted in Sonoma County Superior Court on August 8, 2005 of violating Vehicle Code section 23152(b) with an enhancement under section 23578 of that code (for a blood alcohol level of 0.20 percent or more).

Count two charges Judge Rushing with a course of dishonest conduct in connection with her efforts to avoid being arrested in connection with the DUI incident of June 21, 2005 after she drove her car into a ditch, following a hit-and-run property damage collision involving a wall. The dishonest conduct is discussed further in this decision (post, pp. 4-5).

Count three relates to the judge's conduct at the scene where she drove her car into the ditch, and later while she was being transported by California Highway Patrol (CHP) officers from that scene. The charges are that Judge Rushing repeatedly invoked her judicial office, and that of her husband (who is an appellate court justice), in an effort to avoid being arrested, and otherwise to receive preferential treatment. The details of the judge's invocation of judicial office also are discussed further in this decision (post, pp. 5-7).

The Supreme Court appointed three special masters to hold an evidentiary hearing and to report to the commission. The masters are Hon. Laurence D. Rubin, Associate Justice of the Court of Appeal, Second Appellate District, Division Eight; Hon. Raymond J. Ikola, Associate Justice of the Court of Appeal, Fourth Appellate District, Division Three; and Hon. Suzanne N. Kingsbury, Presiding Judge of the El Dorado County Superior Court. Prior to the masters holding an evidentiary hearing, however, Judge Rushing and her counsel, James A. Murphy, Esq., and the examiner for the commission, Jack Coyle, Esq., (the parties) proposed a stipulated resolution of this inquiry to the commission, as follows.

By an amended Stipulation for Discipline by Consent (Stipulation), executed by the various parties on May 10 and 11, 2006, the parties proposed pursuant to Commission Rule 127(b) that this inquiry concerning Judge Rushing be resolved with Judge Rushing agreeing to the truth of the charges set forth in the Notice, and the imposition of a public censure. According to the terms of the Stipulation, Judge Rushing also agreed that in its decision and order imposing a censure, the commission "may articulate the reasons for its decision" and that she will "accept any such explanatory language that the commission deems appropriate." (Stipulation, p. 1.) Pursuant to the Stipulation, Judge Rushing "waives hearing, review, and any further proceedings." (Ibid.)

In connection with the Stipulation, Judge Rushing also executed on May 10, 2006, the requisite Affidavit of Consent (Affidavit) under rule 127(d) in which she admitted the truth of the charges, consented to the imposition of a censure, and waived all further proceedings and review by the California Supreme Court.

The proposed agreement, consisting of the Stipulation and Affidavit, was presented to the commission on May 11, 2006, which accepted it that day by a vote of 7 to 2. (Further details concerning the commission vote are set forth at the conclusion of this decision, post, at page 10.) This Decision and Order, and the findings and conclusions set forth herein, are based on the Stipulation and Affidavit.

II. STIPULATED FACTS AND LEGAL CONCLUSIONS

Count One

On the night of June 21, 2005, in Sonoma County, California, Judge Rushing committed the crimes of driving while under the influence of alcohol in violation of Vehicle Code section 23152(a) and driving while having 0.08 percent or more, by weight, of alcohol in her blood in violation of Vehicle Code section 23152(b). Breath tests revealed blood alcohol levels of 0.19 and 0.21 percent.

On August 8, 2005, upon a plea of no contest in Sonoma County Superior Court case number SCR-469285, Judge Rushing was convicted of violating Vehicle Code section 23152(b) with an enhancement under Vehicle Code section 23578 (for a blood alcohol level of 0.20 percent or more). The charge under Vehicle Code section 23152(a) was dismissed. Judge Rushing was placed on three years of informal probation, ordered to perform 10 days of work release, attend a 45-hour alcohol program, pay a mandatory fine, and comply with other conditions of probation.

Judge Rushing's conduct violated the Code of Judicial Ethics, canons 1 (failing to observe high standards of conduct so that the integrity and independence of the judiciary will be preserved) and 2A (failing to comply with the law and failing to act in a manner that promotes public confidence in the integrity of the judiciary), and constituted prejudicial misconduct. (See In the Matter Concerning Alvarez (Dec. 27, 2005) Decision and Order, p. 2 [DUI found to be prejudicial misconduct].)

By letter dated June 24, 2005, Judge Rushing promptly reported her arrest to the commission as required by canon 3D(3). Upon her conviction, Judge Rushing issued a public apology to the people of Sonoma County in a local newspaper.

Count Two

In an effort to avoid being arrested for crimes related to her drinking and driving referenced in count one, Judge Rushing engaged in a course of dishonest conduct, as follows. While driving under the influence of alcohol on June 21, 2005, Judge Rushing collided with a wall at 5571 Crystal Drive in Santa Rosa, causing property damage. Judge Rushing sustained a minor head injury. She left that scene without notifying law enforcement or the property owners, and continued driving for approximately two miles until she drove her car into a ditch on Riebli Road in Sonoma County.

Judge Rushing remained under the influence of alcohol during the subsequent events of this count and the next. When a passerby stopped her car and asked Judge Rushing if she was all right, Judge Rushing told her to leave. When a second driver stopped and offered to call for help, Judge Rushing said, "we're fine" (even though she was alone) and told her not to call anyone. Judge Rushing also falsely told the second driver that her husband was with her.

Having been notified by someone other than Judge Rushing, California Highway Patrol (CHP) officers and other emergency personnel arrived at the scene at Riebli Road. When Firefighter Ramos found Judge Rushing sitting in the driver's seat, Judge Rushing falsely told him that she had not been the driver. She said that an unknown woman had been the driver, and then that an unknown man had been the driver. When Firefighter Ramos asked her where the keys to the car were, Judge Rushing said that the male driver had taken them when he fled the scene up a nearby hill.

When CHP Officer Holeman arrived on the scene as the investigating officer, he asked Judge Rushing what had happened. She falsely told him that she had not been the driver. Judge Rushing said that there had been two other people in the car with her, a man and a woman, and that the man had been driving. She said that she had met them at a friend's house, but did not know their names. She said that she had been sitting in the back seat (even though the car had no back seat). When Officer Holeman asked Judge Rushing where the keys to the car were, she first told him that she thought they were in the car, then said that the male driver had taken the keys with him when he and the woman left the scene on foot, walking back toward the friend's house. She said that she had let the man drive her car because he and the woman were going to give her a ride home and then drive her car back to the friend's house. When Officer Holeman asked Judge Rushing how much alcohol she had consumed, she first answered "two bottles," then said, "two glasses." When the officer asked Judge Rushing what she had been drinking, she asked him why he was asking and again asserted that she had not been driving the car.

Judge Rushing's conduct violated canons 1 and 2A (failing to act at all times in a manner that promotes public confidence in the integrity of the judiciary), and constituted prejudicial misconduct. (See Inquiry Concerning McGraw, No. 169 (Apr. 3, 2003) Decision and Order, p. 5 [false and misleading statements to media by judge not acting in judicial capacity found to be prejudicial misconduct].)

Count Three

At the scene on Riebli Road, referenced in count two, and while being transported from that scene, Judge Rushing repeatedly invoked her judicial office, and that of her husband, in an effort to avoid being arrested for crimes related to her drinking and driving and to otherwise receive preferential treatment, as follows.

Judge Rushing identified herself to Firefighter Ramos by showing him her Sonoma County Court Judge identification badge. When Judge Rushing was asserting her false story that she was not the driver to Officer Holeman, she repeatedly told him that she was a superior court judge in Sonoma County. She also repeatedly requested that Officer Holeman call her husband who, she informed the officer, was an appellate court justice.

When Officer Holeman told Judge Rushing that he had determined that she had in fact been the driver, and that he needed her to answer some questions and perform some field sobriety tests, she responded to the effect of, "but I'm a judge, and I told you I wasn't the driver." She then declined to answer any more questions and declined to perform any field sobriety tests.

When Officer Holeman placed Judge Rushing under arrest for driving under the influence, she persisted in telling him that she was a superior court judge. She told him that because she was a judge he should not be arresting her. She also repeatedly requested that he call her husband, the appellate court justice.

When Judge Rushing was handcuffed and placed in a patrol vehicle, she began complaining about the handcuffs and asked Officer Holeman if he had seen her superior court judge identification badge. She asked him if he knew she was a judge. She told him that he did not need to be doing what he was doing and that he could remove the handcuffs. Officer Holeman explained that they could not be removed, pursuant to CHP policy. Judge Rushing then said that the handcuffs were too tight. Officer Holeman helped her out of the car, checked the handcuffs himself and had another CHP officer check them to confirm that they were not too tight and had been placed on her in a manner consistent with CHP policy.

Judge Rushing was helped back into the car, and when Officer Holeman was transporting her to a CHP office, she repeatedly told him that he should remove the handcuffs. Officer Holeman again advised her that he could not do so, pursuant to CHP policy. Judge Rushing then told Officer Holeman that in her courtroom she goes against court policies for CHP and other officers, and that he should extend that courtesy to her. She persisted in telling Officer Holeman that she was a superior court judge and that her husband was an appellate court justice.

Judge Rushing's conduct violated canons 1, 2A (failing to act at all times in a manner that promotes public confidence in the integrity and impartiality of the judiciary) and 2B(2) (lending prestige of judicial office to advance personal interests); see commentary to canon 2B(2), stating that judge must not use position to gain preferential treatment when stopped by a police officer. Because Judge Rushing was not acting in a judicial capacity when she attempted to obtain preferential treatment, she committed prejudicial, rather than willful misconduct. (See Kennick v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1990) 50 Cal.3d 297, 317-319 (Kennick).)

Other Factors Relevant To Discipline

Judge Rushing has no prior discipline. Numerous people, primarily from the legal community, have submitted letters in support of Judge Rushing's remaining in judicial office.

III. DISCIPLINE

The starting point of our analysis concerning the appropriate level of discipline is the Supreme Court's admonition that the purpose of judicial discipline "is not punishment, but rather the protection of the public, the enforcement of rigorous standards of judicial conduct, and the maintenance of public confidence in the integrity and independence of the judicial system." (Broadman v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1998) 18 Cal.4th 1079, 1111-1112 (Broadman), citing Adams v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1995) 10 Cal.4th 866, 912.)

Based on Supreme Court decisions, the commission has identified several factors that are relevant to determining appropriate discipline in furtherance of the foregoing overall disciplinary objectives enunciated in Broadman. (Decision and Order Removing Judge Ross from Office, Inq. 174 (2005), p. 64.) As relevant here, the factors include the number and nature of the acts of misconduct; the existence of prior discipline; whether the judge appreciates that he or she committed misconduct; the judge's general integrity; the likelihood of future misconduct; the impact of the misconduct on the judicial system; and the judge's veracity. In many respects, the various considerations overlap one another. Applying these standards here, we are satisfied that the stipulated censure is the appropriate level of discipline.

The number of acts of misconduct is relevant to the question of discipline, but not according to any rigid formula. (Furey v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1987) 43 Cal.3d 1297, 1307.)

> The number of wrongful acts is relevant to determining whether they were merely isolated occurrences or, instead, part of a course of conduct establishing "lack of temperament and ability to perform judicial functions in an even-handed manner." [Citation.]

(Fletcher v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1998) 19 Cal.4th 865, 918, quoting from Wenger v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1981) 29 Cal.3d 615, 653.)

Judge Rushing admits she committed three instances of prejudicial misconduct. Prejudicial misconduct, committed outside of a judge's official capacity may be the basis for removal or censure (Cal. Const., art. VI, §18, subd. (d)), but is generally considered less serious than willful misconduct in office. (Geiler v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications (1973) 10 Cal.3d 270, 284.)

There is no indication of any pattern of behavior similar to that charged in the Notice, or of any lack of judicial temperament. Nonetheless, Judge Rushing's DUI, as well as the hit-and-run property damage incident involving the wall, and her resulting criminal conviction are utterly irreconcilable with minimum standards expected of a judge, and as stipulated (see ante, p. 5) with the requirements of canons 1 and 2A.

Judge Rushing's conduct following her attempts to drive while drunk is particularly egregious. Falsifying stories to persons seeking to offer early assistance, and to emergency personnel and the arresting CHP officers reflects poorly on Judge Rushing's integrity and without doubt seriously negatively impacts the public perception of her, and of the judiciary in general. Judge Rushing left the scene after colliding with a residential wall, lied to citizens offering her initial assistance, and provided a fabricated story to emergency personnel and the investigating officers that she was not the driver. None of this behavior can be reconciled with either canon 1 or 2A or with the standard set by the Supreme Court in Kloepfer v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1989) 49 Cal.3d 826, 865, that honesty is a "minimum qualification" expected of every judge.

Judge Rushing also repeatedly invoked her judicial office and that of her husband in an effort to avoid arrest and otherwise receive preferential treatment. She stipulates (see ante, pp. 6-7) that her conduct in this regard is inconsistent with canons 1, 2A, and 2B(2). In the Kennick case, the Supreme Court found Judge Kennick's attempts to invoke the prestige of office as a basis for receiving preferential treatment from the California Highway Patrol the day after his arrest for drunk driving to be "reprehensible." (Kennick, supra, 50 Cal.3d. at p. 340.) The commission views Judge Rushing's comparable behavior similarly.

Although Judge Rushing's overall conduct here is seriously at odds with the canons and expected judicial behavior, the commission recognizes that all three instances of wrongdoing arose out of one drunken lapse of judgment to get behind the wheel of her car. However, that lapse is no more excusable here than when anyone else makes a similar mistake while under the influence.

Judge Rushing's veracity and integrity have been seriously impugned. Her attempts to obtain preferential treatment, however, were unsuccessful. There was no on-bench misconduct and there was no direct adverse affect on the administration of justice per se. Several people, primarily from the legal community, have submitted letters in support of Judge Rushing remaining in judicial office.

In assessing the likelihood of whether Judge Rushing will commit future misconduct, the commission has taken into consideration the judge's assurance to the commission that she has modified her behavior to ensure she will not reoffend. She has no prior history of any alcohol-related offenses or misconduct, and she has no prior discipline by the commission during more than 14 years on the bench. The judge promptly acknowledged to the public and to the commission the serious nature of, and her expressions of remorse over, her wrongdoing. Finally, Judge Rushing has stipulated to the imposition of this serious discipline as the appropriate sanction that is commensurate with her admitted serious wrongdoing.

Based on the foregoing analysis and appraisal of Judge Rushing's wrongdoing, the commission concludes the misconduct here does not rise to the level of wrongdoing in which the Supreme Court has imposed the ultimate sanction of removal from office. The commission also concludes that the purposes of judicial discipline as enunciated in Broadman – protection of the public, enforcement of rigorous standards of judicial conduct, and the maintenance of public confidence in the integrity and independence of the judicial system – can be accomplished through a censure. Accordingly, the commission hereby imposes this public censure of Judge Rushing.

Commission members Mr. Marshall B. Grossman, Judge Frederick P. Horn, Ms. Patricia Miller, Mrs. Penny Perez, Judge Risë Jones Pichon, Ms. Barbara Schraeger and Mr. Lawrence Simi voted to accept the parties' settlement proposal and to issue this decision and order imposing a public censure pursuant to the stipulated agreement. Commission members Mr. Michael A. Kahn and Mr. Jose Miramontes voted to reject the proposed settlement, and dissent from this decision and order imposing the public censure, on the ground that the public interest would be better served if the matter were decided after the development of a full factual record following a hearing before the special masters. Commission member Justice Judith D. McConnell is recused, and commission member Mrs. Crystal Lui did not participate in this matter.

I. INTRODUCTION AND SUMMARY

This disciplinary matter concerns Judge Bernard J. Schwartz, a judge of the Riverside County Superior Court since 2003. On February 22, 2006, the commission filed its Notice of Formal Proceedings (Notice) against Judge Schwartz in which it charges him with misconduct as follows.

Count one charges that on the night of July 16, 2005, Judge Schwartz committed the crimes of driving while under the influence of alcohol (DUI) in violation of Vehicle Code section 23152(a), and driving while having 0.08 percent or more, by weight, of alcohol in his blood in violation of section 23152(b) of that code. The first count also charges that following Judge Schwartz's plea of no contest to criminal charges based on the drunk driving, he was convicted in San Luis Obispo County Superior Court on September 6, 2005 of violating Vehicle Code section 23152(b).

Count two charges that before and after Judge Schwartz's arrest related to the DUI on July 16, 2005, the judge repeatedly attempted to avoid being arrested and incarcerated and otherwise to receive preferential treatment because of his status as a judge.

Pursuant to a Stipulation for Discipline by Consent (Stipulation), Judge Schwartz, his counsel Edward P. George, Jr., Esq., and the examiner for the commission, Jack Coyle, Esq. (the parties), propose pursuant to Commission Rule 127(b) that this inquiry be resolved with Judge Schwartz agreeing to the truth of the charges set forth in the Notice, and the imposition of a public censure. The Stipulation was signed by the various parties on April 25, 27 and 28, 2006. According to the terms of the Stipulation, Judge Schwartz also agreed that in the decision and order imposing a censure, the commission "may articulate the reasons for its decision" and that he will "accept any such explanatory language that the commission deems appropriate." (Stipulation, p. 1.) Pursuant to the Stipulation, Judge Schwartz "waives hearing, review, and any further proceedings." (Ibid.)

In connection with the Stipulation, Judge Schwartz also executed on April 25, 2006, the requisite Affidavit of Consent (Affidavit) under rule 127(d) in which he admitted the truth of the charges, consented to the imposition of a censure, and waived all further proceedings and review by the California Supreme Court.

The proposed agreement, consisting of the Stipulation and Affidavit, was presented to the commission on May 10, 2006, which accepted it that day by a vote of 9 to 0. (Further details concerning the commission vote are set forth at the conclusion of this decision, post, at page 8.) This Decision and Order, and the findings and conclusions set forth herein, are based on the Stipulation and Affidavit.

II. STIPULATED FACTS AND LEGAL CONCLUSIONS

Count One

On the night of July 16, 2005, in Pismo Beach, California, Judge Schwartz committed the crimes of driving while under the influence of alcohol in violation of Vehicle Code section 23152(a) and driving while having a 0.08 percent or higher blood alcohol level in violation of Vehicle Code section 23152(b). Judge Schwartz had a blood alcohol level of 0.17 to 0.18 percent, as evidenced by his breath tests. On September 6, 2005, upon a plea of no contest in San Luis Obispo County Superior Court case number M376280, Judge Schwartz was convicted of violating Vehicle Code section 23152(b).

(The charge under Vehicle Code section 23152(a) was dismissed.) He was placed on probation for three years with standard conditions for a first DUI offense.

Judge Schwartz's conduct violated the Code of Judicial Ethics, canons 1 (failing to observe high standards of conduct so that the integrity and independence of the judiciary will be preserved) and 2A (failing to comply with the law and failing to act in a manner that promotes public confidence in the integrity of the judiciary), and constituted prejudicial misconduct. (See In the Matter Concerning Alvarez (Dec. 27, 2005) Decision and Order, p. 2 [DUI found to be prejudicial misconduct].)

Count Two

Before and after Judge Schwartz's arrest by the Pismo Beach Police Department for the crimes referenced in count one, he repeatedly attempted to avoid being arrested and incarcerated and otherwise to receive preferential treatment because he was a judge, as follows.

Pismo Beach Police Officer Trimble observed Judge Schwartz's vehicle "swerving all over the road" and pulled him over after he twice violated Vehicle Code section 21460(a) (driving to the left of double parallel solid lines). It appeared to the officer that Judge Schwartz had been drinking. When the officer requested that the judge take a preliminary alcohol screening (PAS) test, the judge responded, "Did you run my license yet?" When the officer said that he had not and again asked the judge to take the PAS test, the judge responded, "Why don't you run my license and then we can talk?" When the officer asked the judge if he was trying to say he was a police officer, Judge Schwartz responded, "No, I'm a judge."

Pismo Beach Police Sergeant Portz arrived on the scene and Judge Schwartz took a PAS test. (From this point on, the conversations were tape recorded.) Officer Trimble informed the judge that the test indicated that his blood alcohol level was 0.15, which was over the legal limit of 0.08 percent. The judge asked if he could just go back to the hotel (where he was staying for the weekend) and leave his car. The officer told the judge "my hands are tied" and there was "nothing I can do."

Officer Trimble then asked Judge Schwartz questions regarding his drinking and driving. The judge claimed to have had only "a couple of glasses of wine," denied being under the influence of alcohol, and asked, "Is this really necessary, all this stuff we have to go through?" Sergeant Portz responded that they had to do their job "unbiased."

After Judge Schwartz performed poorly on field sobriety tests, Officer Trimble asked if he would agree to another PAS test. The judge again asserted, "I'm really not under the influence. I've had a couple of drinks, but I'm really not under the influence." Sergeant Portz again told him, "we're just trying to do our job, unbiased and fairly to everybody."

When Judge Schwartz took a second PAS test, Officer Trimble informed him that it indicated a higher alcohol level (0.18) than the first test. When the officer told the judge that he was under arrest and asked that he place his hands behind his back, the judge responded, "Can you consider the circumstances of it, and I can just leave my car here, and take me back to the hotel; is that a possibility?" Sergeant Portz again told him, "we have to be fair and unbiased, sir." The judge responded, "But you know what this is going to do; this will substantially impair my career." Officer Trimble said, "If I let you go, it could impair my career." The judge then said, "You don't have to let me drive; you could just let me go home." Officer Trimble told him, "I can't do that."

Judge Schwartz persisted by asking, "can't you guys consider the circumstances?" Sergeant Portz responded, "Sir, I've already told you that we've made our decision. This is the way it's got to happen." The judge again asserted, "This really is going to affect my career, I don't know if you realize that." When Sergeant Portz suggested that the judge would still have a job, the judge responded, "No, no, I really won't." The judge informed the officers that he would have to "self-report" the DUI to the Commission on Judicial Performance.

After being placed in a patrol car, Judge Schwartz said, "You know what? Just leave my car there; just take me back to the hotel and I'll go to sleep. You can have my keys." After Sergeant Portz told the judge two more times that they had to be "fair" with everyone, the judge responded, "I know. But, I'm all of a mile away from the hotel….

I know you guys are doing your job, but this is not good for me. I'm running for election next year and this is not a good time."

After Judge Schwartz was taken to the police station, he asked to speak to a "lieutenant or captain." Sergeant Portz told the judge that he would first have to take the breath test (that the judge had chosen to take rather than a blood test) to determine his blood alcohol level. Later, but still before taking the breath test, the judge again asked, "Is there a lieutenant or captain or somebody that I can speak to?" The sergeant again told him that he would first have to take the test.

Judge Schwartz again talked about the Commission on Judicial Performance and being up for reelection and losing his judgeship. Sergeant Portz again told him that they had to be "fair and unbiased." The judge responded, "But, this is a substantial issue with my career. All you have to do is just take me back to the hotel and I'll go to sleep and wake up in the morning and get my car." He again asked the sergeant, "Is there someone I can talk to before I take the test?" The sergeant reiterated that the judge first had to take the test. When the sergeant informed the judge that the result of the breath test was ".17, .18," the judge recognized "that's not good" and again asked to speak to a lieutenant or captain.

After Sergeant Portz informed Judge Schwartz that he would be held in custody until the next morning or until his wife, who was several hours away, could pick him up, he asked the sergeant if the sergeant could telephone the "on-call judge." Despite the sergeant telling Judge Schwartz that he could not "because you are a citizen of the State of California and we're treating you like everybody else," Judge Schwartz persisted in asking him to call a judge that Judge Schwartz could talk to.

Judge Schwartz's efforts to obtain preferential treatment having failed, he told Sergeant Portz and Officer Trimble "there is no professional courtesy here anymore" and "this is bullshit." Judge Schwartz then stated, "You guys come in and appear before me" in court on certain matters. When the sergeant asked the judge why he brought that up, the judge said, "because I'm not being treated fairly." The sergeant responded, "We're treating you about as fair as we can, same as everybody else. What you are asking for is special treatment." Judge Schwartz acknowledged, "To some degree, I guess."

Judge Schwartz's conduct violated the Code of Judicial Ethics, canons 1, 2A (failing to act at all times in a manner that promotes public confidence in the integrity and impartiality of the judiciary) and 2B(2) (lending prestige of judicial office to advance personal interests); see commentary to canon 2B(2), stating that judge must not use position to gain preferential treatment when stopped by a police officer. Because Judge Schwartz was not acting in a judicial capacity when he attempted to obtain preferential treatment, he committed prejudicial, rather than willful misconduct. (See Kennick v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1990) 50 Cal.3d 297, 317-319 (Kennick).)

Other Facts Relevant to Discipline

By letter of July 18, 2005, Judge Schwartz promptly reported his arrest to the commission as required by canon 3D(3). Judge Schwartz has no prior discipline.

III. DISCIPLINE

The purpose of judicial discipline "is not punishment, but rather the protection of the public, the enforcement of rigorous standards of judicial conduct, and the maintenance of public confidence in the integrity and independence of the judicial system." (Broadman v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1998) 18 Cal.4th 1079, 1111-1112 (Broadman), citing Adams v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1995) 10 Cal.4th 866, 912.)

The commission has identified several overlapping factors that are relevant to determining appropriate discipline in furtherance of the disciplinary objectives enunciated in Broadman. (Decision and Order Removing Judge Ross from Office, Inq. 174 (2005), p. 64.) As relevant here, the factors include the number and nature of the acts of misconduct; the existence of prior discipline; whether the judge appreciates that he or she committed misconduct; the judge's general integrity; the likelihood of future misconduct; and the impact of the misconduct on the judicial system. Applying these standards here, we are satisfied that the stipulated censure is the appropriate level of discipline.

The number of acts of misconduct is pertinent to the question of discipline, not according to any rigid formula, Furey v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1987)

43 Cal.3d 1297, 1307, but rather, for determining whether the wrongdoing was isolated, or part of a course of conduct establishing "lack of temperament and ability to perform judicial functions in an even-handed manner." (Fletcher v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1998) 19 Cal.4th 865, 918, quoting from Wenger v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1981) 29 Cal.3d 615, 653.)

Judge Schwartz admits he committed two instances of prejudicial misconduct. Prejudicial misconduct, committed outside of a judge's official capacity may be the basis for removal or censure (Cal. Const., art. VI, §18, subd. (d)), but is generally considered less serious than willful misconduct in office. (Geiler v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications (1973) 10 Cal.3d 270, 284.)

There is no indication of any pattern of behavior similar to that charged in the Notice, or of any broader issue concerning lack of judicial temperament. Nonetheless, Judge Schwartz's DUI and his resulting criminal conviction are utterly irreconcilable with minimum standards expected of a judge, and as stipulated (see ante, p. 3) with the requirements of canons 1 and 2A.

Judge Schwartz's conduct when he was stopped by the police and in connection with his arrest is particularly offensive. He repeatedly invoked his judicial office in an effort to avoid arrest and otherwise to receive preferential treatment. The judge stipulates (see ante, p. 6) that his conduct in this regard is inconsistent with canons 1, 2A, and 2B(2). In the Kennick case, the Supreme Court found Judge Kennick's attempts to invoke the prestige of office as a basis for receiving preferential treatment from the California Highway Patrol the day after his arrest for drunk driving to be "reprehensible." (Kennick, supra, 50 Cal.3d. at p. 340.) The commission views Judge Schwartz's comparable behavior similarly.

Although Judge Schwartz's overall conduct here is seriously at odds with the canons and expected judicial behavior, the commission recognizes that all of the wrongdoing arose out of one drunken lapse of judgment to get behind the wheel of his car. However, that lapse is no more excusable here than when anyone else makes a similar mistake while under the influence.

In assessing the likelihood of whether Judge Schwartz will commit future misconduct, the commission has taken into consideration the judge's assurance to the commission that the behavior in question was aberrational; implicit in that assurance is the concept that the judge will not reoffend. The judge has no prior history of any alcohol-related offenses or misconduct, and he has no prior discipline by the commission. The judge promptly self-reported his arrest to the commission. He has acknowledged to the commission the serious nature of, and his expressions of remorse over, his wrongdoing. Finally, Judge Schwartz has stipulated to the imposition of this serious discipline as the appropriate sanction that is commensurate with his admitted serious wrongdoing.

Based on the foregoing analysis and appraisal of Judge Schwartz's wrongdoing, the commission concludes the misconduct here does not rise to the level of wrongdoing in which the Supreme Court has imposed the ultimate sanction of removal from office. The commission also concludes that the purposes of judicial discipline as enunciated in Broadman – protection of the public, enforcement of rigorous standards of judicial conduct, and the maintenance of public confidence in the integrity and independence of the judicial system – can be accomplished through a censure. Accordingly, the commission hereby imposes this public censure of Judge Schwartz.

Commission members Mr. Marshall B. Grossman, Judge Frederick P. Horn, Justice Judith D. McConnell, Ms. Patricia Miller, Mr. Jose C. Miramontes, Mrs. Penny Perez, Judge Risë Jones Pichon, Ms. Barbara Schraeger and Mr. Lawrence Simi voted to accept the parties' settlement proposal and to issue this decision and order imposing a public censure pursuant to the stipulated agreement. Commission members Mr. Michael A. Kahn and Mrs. Crystal Lui did not participate in this matter.

I. INTRODUCTION AND SUMMARY

This disciplinary matter concerns former Judge Ronald C. Kline (Judge Kline). Judge Kline was appointed to the Orange County Superior Court in 1995 and elected to a six-year term in 1996; he did not seek reelection and his final term of office expired at the end of 2002.

On December 12, 2005, Judge Kline pled guilty to four federal felony counts of possession of child pornography. Pursuant to article VI, section 18, subdivision (c) of the California Constitution, when an active judge is convicted of a felony under California or federal law and the conviction becomes final, the commission "shall remove a judge from office." Under subdivision (e) of section 18, a judge removed by the commission is "ineligible for judicial office, including receiving an assignment, appointment, or reference of work from any California state court, and pending further order of the [California Supreme Court] is suspended from practicing law in this State." As respects a former judge such as Judge Kline, the maximum sanction the commission may impose, based on a final felony conviction, is the imposition of a censure and a bar from receiving an assignment, appointment, or reference of work from any California state court (censure and bar). (Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (d).)

Judge Kline and his counsel, Edward P. George, Jr., Esq., and the examiner for the commission, Jack Coyle, Esq., (the parties) have entered into an agreement by which the commission was requested to commence these formal proceedings against Judge Kline and in which the judge agreed to the imposition of a censure and bar; the judge agreed further that the commission may refer the matter to the State Bar of California. The agreement was presented to the commission on May 10, 2006, which accepted it by a vote of 8 to 0. (Further details concerning the commission vote are set forth at the conclusion of this decision, post, at page 4.)

II. STIPULATION FOR DISCIPLINE

The Stipulation, signed by the various parties on April 27 and May 1, 2006, provides that upon acceptance of the agreement by the commission, a Notice of Formal Proceedings (Notice) will be issued by the commission simultaneously with the issuance of the commission's decision. The Notice is to include the charge that Judge Kline was in criminal possession of child pornography on November 5, 2001 in violation of title 18, United States Code, section 2252A(a)(5)(B). (Stipulation, p. 1.)

The parties further agree that pursuant to Commission Rule 127(b), the new inquiry, commenced with the filing of the Notice, be resolved with Judge Kline agreeing to the truth of the stipulated charge, and the imposition of a censure and bar, and further, that the commission may disclose information concerning this matter to the State Bar. (Stipulation, pp. 1, 2.)

According to the terms of the Stipulation, Judge Kline also agrees that in the decision and order imposing a censure and bar, the commission "may articulate the reasons for its decision" and that he will "accept any such explanatory language that the commission deems appropriate." (Stipulation, p. 2.) Pursuant to the Stipulation, Judge Kline "waives hearing, review, and any further proceedings." (Ibid.)

In connection with the Stipulation, Judge Kline also executed on April 27, 2006, the requisite Affidavit of Consent (Affidavit) under rule 127(d) in which he admitted the truth of the charge, consented to the imposition of a censure and bar, and waived all further proceedings and review by the California Supreme Court.

This Decision and Order, and the findings and conclusions set forth herein, are based on the Stipulation and Affidavit.

III. STIPULATED FACTS AND LEGAL CONCLUSIONS

On November 5, 2001, law enforcement authorities executed a search warrant on Judge Kline's residence. Images that constituted child pornography, as defined in title 18, United States Code, sections 2256(8)(A) and (C), were found on a computer and computer disks in the residence. As a result, Judge Kline was indicted in United States v. Ronald C. Kline, CR No. 02-40(A) – CBM, and on December 12, 2005, in the United States District Court, Judge Kline pleaded guilty to four felony counts of possession of child pornography in violation of title 18, United States Code, section 2252A(a)(5)(B). By pleading guilty, Judge Kline admitted that he is, in fact, guilty. He has not yet been sentenced [as of the date of the Stipulation].

Judge Kline's conduct violated the Code of Judicial Ethics, canons 1 (failing to observe high standards of conduct so that the integrity of the judiciary will be preserved) and 2A (failing to comply with the law and acting at all times in a manner that promotes public confidence in the integrity and impartiality of the judiciary), and constituted conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute. (As Judge Kline was not acting in a judicial capacity, the conduct cannot be considered "willful misconduct in office." Broadman v. Commission on Judicial Performance 18 Cal.4th 1079, 1091.)

Commission of a felony, regardless of the underlying facts of the crime, is a sufficient basis upon which to impose the maximum judicial discipline. In the case of a sitting judge, the constitution mandates removal from judicial office upon finality of a felony conviction. (Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (c).) However, Judge Kline has not been in judicial office since his last term of office expired at the end of 2002. The commission previously has interpreted the constitution as prohibiting discipline more severe than a censure and bar for a former judge. (See Inquiry Concerning Danser, No. 172 (June 23, 2005) Decision and Order, p. 3.)

IV. DISCIPLINE

As noted, if Judge Kline were a sitting judge, the commission would be compelled to remove him from office upon his felony conviction becoming final. The stipulated censure and bar is the maximum sanction the commission may impose upon a former judge, such as Judge Kline. (Cal. Const., art. VI, § 6, subd. (d).) Based upon the parties' stipulation, and good cause appearing, the commission hereby censures former Judge Ronald C. Kline and bars him from receiving an assignment, appointment, or reference of work from any California state court.

Commission members Mr. Marshall B. Grossman, Justice Judith D. McConnell, Ms. Patricia Miller, Mr. Jose C. Miramontes, Mrs. Penny Perez, Judge Risë Jones Pichon, Ms. Barbara Schraeger and Mr. Lawrence Simi voted to accept the parties' settlement proposal and to issue this decision and order imposing a censure and bar pursuant to the stipulated agreement. Commission member Judge Frederick P. Horn is recused, and commission members Mr. Michael A. Kahn and Mrs. Crystal Lui did not participate in this matter.

| INQUIRY CONCERNING FORMER JUDGE SUSANNE S. SHAW,No. 183 | DECISION AND ORDER IMPOSING PUBLIC CENSURE AND BAR PURSUANT TO STIPULATION (Commission Rule 127) |

I. INTRODUCTION AND SUMMARY

This disciplinary matter concerns former Judge Susanne S. Shaw (Judge Shaw). Judge Shaw was a judge of the Orange County Municipal Court from 1985 to 1998, and a judge of the Orange County Superior Court from 1998 to September 30, 2006, when she retired from judicial office. Judge Shaw and her counsel, Edith R. Matthai, Esq., and the examiner for the commission, Andrew Blum, Esq., (the parties) have entered into a stipulation (Stipulation) by which the commission was requested to approve the filing of a proposed Notice of Formal Proceedings (Notice) and in which the judge agreed to the imposition of a censure and bar from receiving assignments, appointments, or reference of work from any California state court. As respects a former judge, this appears to be the maximum sanction the commission may impose. (Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18 (d).) Pursuant to the Stipulation, Judge Shaw, by signed affidavit, admits the truth of the charges in the Notice and waives all further proceedings and review by the Supreme Court. (Rule 127 (d).) The Stipulation was presented to the commission on December 6, 2006, which accepted it by a vote of 9 to 0. Pursuant to the Stipulation, the commission also approved the Notice of Formal Proceedings which is filed concurrently with this decision.

Judge Shaw is charged in the Notice with five counts of prejudicial misconduct related to her handling of five different criminal cases in 2003 and 2004. In each case, Judge Shaw treated individuals who appeared before her in a rude and demeaning manner in violation of canon 1, 2A, and 3B(4). She berated, scolded, and belittled attorneys, litigants, witnesses, and a prospective juror. In two cases, she improperly suggested that the defendant's testimony was untruthful, reflecting prejudgment and a lack of impartiality. (Canon 3B(5).) Judge Shaw's abusive conduct drew harsh criticism from the Court of Appeal in appellate decisions arising out of three of the cases. (People v. Urias (July 31, 2006, G035179) [2006 WL 2128631] [nonpub.opn.]; People v. Matteotti (June 24, 2005, G033801) [nonpub. opn.]; People v. Quila (October 26, 2004, G032666) [nonpub. opn.].) In one appeal, the defendant's conviction was reversed partly as a result of "the atmosphere of unfairness" created by Judge Shaw's "caustic, condescending" remarks to the defendant and his counsel. (People v. Urias, supra, at pp. 3, 8.)

Judge Shaw has a record of discipline for similar misconduct. She has received two advisory letters and a public admonishment for conduct that is inconsistent with her duty to be patient, dignified, and courteous to persons with whom the judge deals in an official capacity. (Canon 3B(4).) The prior discipline is discussed at pages 25-26, post.

The following findings of fact and conclusions of law are based on the Stipulation.

COUNT ONE

In June 2003, Judge Shaw presided over the trial of People v. Ramon Quila, No. 02HF0567, in which the defendant was accused of stabbing and attempting to murder another attendee at a wedding reception. On October 26, 2004, the Court of Appeal affirmed the defendant's convictions, but severely criticized Judge Shaw's judicial demeanor during the trial. (See People v. Quila (Oct. 26, 2004, G032666) [nonpub. opn.].)

A. During the trial, Judge Shaw lacked patience, dignity and courtesy when dealing with witnesses and counsel, as follows:

1. When defense counsel asked the victim to draw a diagram during cross-examination, the following exchange occurred:

> Q. Could you please, with the court's permission, go down to that board and draw a diagram, if you could, of the inside area, the lobby area, of the parking lot or the outside?
>
> A. Like what do you mean?
>
> THE COURT: Well, is the hall rectangular? Is it square or rectangular or is it round?
>
> THE WITNESS: Square.
>
> THE COURT: So you have to do this because you are the guy under oath, and then you can put [the] hall here and whatever and if that's the lobby, like that. And then think big, okay? Hold on a second. Here you are. Try the black one or the green one. Make it beautiful.

(R.T. 50-51.)

2. When the victim was being cross-examined about being treated at the hospital after he had been stabbed, the following exchange occurred:

> Q. Were you in a bed or a chair?
>
> A. In a bed.
>
> Q. In a bed? And what point in time did you get an IV, if at all?
>
> THE COURT: Who cares? How's that relevant?

(R.T. 81.)

3. When a witness ("Mr. G.") was testifying through an interpreter about his location at a particular time, Judge Shaw said:

> But, Mr. [G.], you were just asked if you were outside after that and you said no. Outside is the same in English as it is in Spanish. Outside is under the – not under a ceiling. Outside means under the air and the front entrance. Outside a building means outside. So you are giving inconsistent statements. If you don't understand a question, ask us, okay?

(R.T. 100.)

4. When the prosecution was examining its expert witness, a trauma surgeon, on his qualifications, Judge Shaw said to the witness, "How many stab wounds do you think you can estimate you have seen in your wonderful tour of duty as a trauma surgeon?" (R.T. 120.)

5. During defense counsel's cross-examination of the same expert about the victim's wounds, the following exchange occurred:

> Q. How long will have death occurred absent antibiotic intake [sic]?
>
> THE COURT: That's a silly --
>
> [PROSECUTOR]: Objection, relevance.
>
> THE COURT: You know what, that's kind of a silly question because they go to the hospital not voluntarily, do you know what I mean?
>
> [DEFENSE COUNSEL]: Yes.
>
> THE COURT: Well, you would have had the greatest malpractice suit in the whole world if you didn't fix him, but how long would it have taken to watch him die?

(R.T. 127-128.)

6. The following exchange occurred during defense counsel's cross-examination of the security guard:

> Q. How do you know they were friends of Mr. Lemus? Did they look like him?
>
> THE COURT: Well, my friends don't look like me. What kind of question is that?
>
> THE WITNESS: I don't remember all the people that were there at the hall.
>
> Q. What makes you say that they were Mr. Lemus's friends?
>
> [PROSECUTOR]: That calls for speculation.
>
> [DEFENSE COUNSEL]: Your Honor –
>
> THE COURT: Overruled.
>
> [DEFENSE COUNSEL]: -- the witness testified –
>
> THE COURT: I know what he said. Excuse me, let me make the rulings. You do your part and I will do mine. Thanks.

(R.T. 164.)

7. The following exchange occurred later during defense counsel's cross-examination of the security guard:

> Q. Okay. My question was those three people, Mr. Cuevas Quila was not there yet, so listen to the question, please.

THE COURT: Well, you don't know that he wasn't there yet.

[DEFENSE COUNSEL]: Initially he was not --

THE COURT: You know what, you make so many conclusions and you presume so much in your questions, counsel, and you're misstating the evidence and I'm not going to be a part of that, and that is my objection to you.

(R.T. 174.)

8. At one point, the interpreter for the security guard (Mr. G.) requested a clarification about the pronunciation of the name of the victim, who weighed about 280 pounds, and the following exchange occurred:

THE INTERPRETER: Lemus?

THE COURT: Yes, whatever. Americans would say Lamus so, you know, let's let it go.

THE INTERPRETER: Just for the witness.

THE COURT: You know what, Mr. [G.], the big guy, okay? You couldn't miss him, right?

(R.T. 193.)

9. During the direct testimony of the victim's cousin, the following exchange occurred:

THE COURT: I thought that when he ran out to his car was after the stabbing?

[PROSECUTOR]: No.

THE COURT: Well, it would sure be nice to put it in context, wouldn't it?

[PROSECUTOR]: Okay. Because I think I asked him.

THE COURT: Well --

By [PROSECUTOR]:

Q. Before the stabbing, had you seen him before that?

[PROSECUTOR]: I could just clarify with the witness.

THE COURT: That would sure be nice.

(R.T. 230.)

10. After a witness testified that a woman had re-entered a building, the following exchange occurred:

> By [DEFENSE COUNSEL]:
>
> Q. Did you hear anything that lady said as she was entering?
>
> THE COURT: Did you hear anything from that lady? Like did she belch or did she say anything?

(R.T. 449.)

11. During the direct testimony of the defendant's teenage daughter ["A."], the following exchange occurred:

> Q. [by DEFENSE COUNSEL:] What did you see your dad do? Just tell me specifically what your dad did physically.
>
> THE WITNESS: He took something and he gave it to the guy so he would stop -- so he would stop hitting me.
>
> THE COURT: He gave it to the guy?
>
> THE WITNESS: Yeah.
>
> By [DEFENSE COUNSEL]:
>
> Q. You mean he hit somebody?
>
> THE COURT: No, don't.
>
> [PROSECUTOR]: Objection, leading.
>
> [DEFENSE COUNSEL]: I don't understand what --
>
> THE COURT: Counsel, I know, isn't it special, but you don't know what you are saying, but you are leading her. Isn't that special? Come on. You know exactly what you are doing. Don't get into it with me.

(R.T. 562.)

12. When Judge Shaw called upon the prosecutor to cross-examine A., the judge remarked, "Rise to the challenge." (R.T. 568.)

13. When the defendant testified on direct examination about his background, the following exchange occurred:

> THE COURT: ... May 4th, '03, what did you do for a living?
>
> [PROSECUTOR]: '02?
>
> THE COURT: '02, excuse me.

WITNESS: I hurt my waist and my arms in my job. I wasn't receiving any opinion [sic] kind of disability compensation.

THE COURT: Okay. That's all. Then nothing, he was doing nothing.

14. Later during the defendant's direct examination, when defense counsel told Judge Shaw that he wanted to find out what lobby the defendant was talking about, the judge stated in front of the jury: "I don't think there is any one of us that doesn't know except you." (R.T. 672.)

15. The following exchange occurred during cross-examination of the defendant:

THE COURT: The court reporter is having a real problem because he [the defendant] is not being responsive and he is being louder than the interpreter and she can't hear the interpreter. So you are going to have to ask shorter questions or, you know, and I'm going to have to stop him and yes, no and do whatever. Anyway ---

By [PROSECUTOR]:

Q. When you first see [A.] in the lobby, are you standing right where that stick figure is where it says RC1?

A. I walked –

Q. Well, it's –

THE COURT: It's yes or no, sir. I mean --

THE WITNESS: Yes, yes.

By [PROSECUTOR]:

Q. And [A.] is up here towards the left of the doors entering into the salon, yes or no?

A. Yes.

Q. Okay. You can have a seat.

[DEFENSE COUNSEL]: Your Honor, I'm sorry, if the interpretation could be done consecutively, maybe the reporter would not have such a hard time.

THE COURT: It's impossible. You know what, I would like you to trade places for a minute and see how wonderful you can be. It's not the court reporter that's having problems with his interpretation. She's having problems because your client is yelling and talking loudly and she can't hear at the same time the softness of the interpreter's voice.

[DEFENSE COUNSEL:] If the interpreter were to finish, the defendant --

THE COURT: You know what, when you become a judge, in the meantime, let me do it. Thanks.

(R.T. 713-714.)

Judge Shaw's conduct violated the Code of Judicial Ethics, canons 1 (duty to observe high standards of conduct), 2A (duty to act in manner that promotes public confidence in the judiciary), and 3B(4) (duty to be patient, dignified, and courteous to persons with whom judge deals in official capacity), and constituted prejudicial misconduct. (See Kloepfer v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1989) 49 Cal.3d 826, 839, 849; McCartney v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications (1974) 12 Cal.3d 512, 534.)

B. During the Quila trial, Judge Shaw also improperly commented on the credibility of witnesses, as follows:

1. After the defendant testified that when he went to leave his five-year-old son at the end of the reception hall, he told his son, "There is going to be a shoot-out outside," Judge Shaw remarked in front of the jury, "I'm sure to say to his five-year-old there is going to be a shoot-out, I will be back in a minute, really." (R.T. 666.)

2. On cross-examination, the prosecutor asked the defendant why he took a knife with him when he went to look for his children. (R.T. 703-704.) The defendant replied: "Because I could see there was a lot of danger. The person told me this is becoming very dangerous." When the prosecutor objected on hearsay grounds, Judge Shaw responded:

Well, you know what, ladies and gentlemen, it's not for the truth of the matter stated and so, you know, it's kind of hard to unring the bell, but it's total hearsay. Just that it was said, whether or not you believe that anyway.

(R.T. 704.)

Judge Shaw's conduct violated the Code of Judicial Ethics, canons 1, 2A, 3B(4), and 3B(5), and constituted prejudicial misconduct. (See Dodds v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1995) 12 Cal.4th 163, 176; Roberts v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1983) 33 Cal.3d 739, 744, 748.)

COUNT TWO

In January 2004, in People v. Angel Matteotti, No. 02CF0637, Judge Shaw presided over a trial involving charges of child molestation. During the trial, Judge Shaw lacked patience, dignity and courtesy when dealing with defense counsel as follows:

1. When the victim's mother was being asked about when the defendant and her daughter returned to California from Seattle, Judge Shaw interjected, "How's she going to know that when she was in the joint? Thank you very much." (R.T. 154.)

2. When defense counsel was examining the defendant's mother about a conversation she had with the victim ("R."), the following exchange occurred:

> Q. Did she say whether a man had touched her in her vaginal area?
>
> A. Yes.
>
> THE COURT: Well, is that leading or what?
>
> [DEFENSE COUNSEL]: Well, you objected as vague.
>
> THE COURT: Well, you know what, you don't get to testify for her. Thank you very much.
>
> [DEFENSE COUNSEL]: I don't want to.
>
> THE COURT: If that wasn't leading, what was?
>
> [DEFENSE COUNSEL]: I would like her to tell the story.
>
> THE COURT: I would like her to tell it without you leading.
>
> [DEFENSE COUNSEL]: Okay.
>
> By [DEFENSE COUNSEL]:
>
> Q. What did [R.] tell you?
>
> [PROSECUTOR]: Objection, hearsay.
>
> [DEFENSE COUNSEL]: It's prior inconsistent statement.
>
> THE COURT: As to what?
>
> [DEFENSE COUNSEL]: As to [R.] denying being sexually molested at the motel.
>
> THE COURT: Okay. Well, now that you have already told her the answer, now what?

(R.T. 305-306.)

3. After the prosecutor objected to a question posed to a witness by defense counsel, Judge Shaw said, "Sustained. Can we stay to the issues here because I would sure love to get -- I think you made your point, whatever that might be." (R.T. 444.)

On June 24, 2005, the Court of Appeal affirmed the defendant's convictions, but was critical of Judge Shaw's "style" and demeanor as evidenced by the above remarks. (People v. Matteotti (June 24, 2005, G033801) [nonpub. opn.].)

Judge Shaw's conduct violated the Code of Judicial Ethics, canons 1, 2A, and 3B(4), and constituted prejudicial misconduct. (See Kloepfer v. Commission, supra, 49 Cal.3d at pp. 839, 849; McCartney v. Commission, supra, 12 Cal.3d at p. 534.)

COUNT THREE

In 2004, Judge Shaw presided over the case of People v. Francisco Nunez, No. 03HF1159. The defendant was charged with first-degree burglary. During the proceedings in the case, Judge Shaw lacked patience, dignity and courtesy when dealing with the defendant and his attorney, as follows:

1. During an unscheduled pretrial appearance by the parties on August 31, 2004, the following colloquy took place:

> THE COURT: Well, [the prosecutor and county counsel] are here on a subpoena that you have evidently issued … and I don't know why I'm even here. This case isn't even on calendar. I'm happy to hear it. There is no affidavit from you why we are even here. There is no motion why we are even here, and I don't know what [sic] the substance of why we are even here.
>
> [DEFENSE COUNSEL]: Your Honor --
>
> THE COURT: No, not Your Honor. Your Honor would like you to say what it is, what the subject matter is here for that I'm not motioned on.

(R.T. 6-7.)

After defense counsel tried to explain, Judge Shaw stated: "I don't know of any law that allows you to go into chambers to say whatever you think any time you want any day you want just to appear in my court when I'm set for trial on another case this morning and to take up the court's time." (R.T. 7-8.) When defense counsel asked the judge to review the case of People v. Superior Court (Barrett) (2000) 80 Cal.App.4th 1305 before making a ruling, the following exchange took place:

> THE COURT: Isn't that nice of you? But why isn't that in your motion knowing that you were going to appear in front of me and take my time away from my jury trial? Now you are popping out all these little -- there's no motion before the court.
>
> [DEFENSE COUNSEL]: Well, Your Honor, I guess we have a disagreement as to the proper procedure.
>
> THE COURT: No, you have a problem with that procedure.

(R.T. 11.)

When defense counsel stated that he was following the procedures set forth in Barrett and another case, and had been told by the judge's courtroom clerk that it was not necessary to calendar the matter, Judge Shaw sarcastically stated: "Oh, yeah, my clerk makes rulings like that." (R.T. 12.)

2. On November 8, 2004, during direct examination, defense counsel asked the defendant to look at a photograph and point to the front door of the apartment that was allegedly burglarized. After the defendant pointed at the left side of the photograph, the following exchange took place:

>
> A. Yeah.
>
> [DEFENSE COUNSEL]: Okay. Let the record reflect --
>
> THE COURT: Thank you for identifying it for him.
>
> [DEFENSE COUNSEL]: May the record --
>
> THE COURT: You know, I'm tired of you doing that. If you want him to mark something, that's fine, but don't point to it and say oh, that window?
>
> [DEFENSE COUNSEL]: Excuse me, Your Honor.
>
> THE COURT: I do not --
>
> [DEFENSE COUNSEL]: Your Honor --
>
> THE COURT: I do not want you doing that.

(R.T. 141.)

Judge Shaw's comment "Thank you for identifying it for him []" was sarcastic and her other comments were made in a raised voice.

3. Judge Shaw also raised her voice at defense counsel during an ensuing discussion in chambers. After defense counsel pointed out to Judge Shaw that the defendant had pointed with his finger at one side of the photograph, the following exchange took place:

> THE COURT: Well, then good. Do you have a pen in your hand right now?
>
> [DEFENSE COUNSEL]: Yes.
>
> THE COURT: Good. Use it. Have him mark it.
>
> [DEFENSE COUNSEL]: That's fine. I will do that.
>
> THE COURT: Good.
>
> [DEFENSE COUNSEL]: I was merely asking him.
>
> THE COURT: Oh, that's what that is?
>
> [DEFENSE COUNSEL]: Yes, Your Honor, that's what it was.
>
> THE COURT: Sure.

(R.T. 144-145.)

Judge Shaw's comments "Oh, that's what that is []" and "Sure []" were made in a sarcastic tone of voice.

4. On November 9, 2004, during cross-examination of the defendant, Judge Shaw improperly conveyed to the jury her disbelief of the defendant's testimony by mocking his description of how he knocked on a window:

> Q. So you had to pull [the screen] enough where you can get your entire fist to knock?
>
> A. Not entire fist. I went like this (indicating).
>
> Q. Well, you had to pull it out enough for you to --
>
> [DEFENSE COUNSEL]: Excuse me, Your Honor, the record should reflect that the witness with his right hand reached under the top piece of paper of the pad, and in a knocking motion, touched the pad underneath it. And his hand –
>
> THE COURT: But it was – okay.

THE WITNESS: And his hand was with his knuckles curled at the second knuckle.

THE COURT: Yes, it wasn't a regular knock with his index finger. Did you see how he did that, ladies and gentlemen? Turn around and show them. Show them how you knocked.

THE WITNESS: How I knocked? Like this (indicating).

THE COURT: Oh, you knocked like that now? Like this or how did you do it? Show them how you did it.

THE WITNESS: All right.

THE COURT: No face them and show them.

(R.T. 194-195.)

Judge Shaw's conduct violated the Code of Judicial Ethics, canons 1, 2A, and 3B(4), and constituted prejudicial misconduct. (See Kloepfer v. Commission, supra, 49 Cal.3d at pp. 839, 849; McCartney v. Commission, supra, 12 Cal.3d at p. 534.)

COUNT FOUR

In December 2004, Judge Shaw presided over the trial in People v. Joseph Urias, No. 04HF1198. The defendant was charged with and convicted of aggravated assault. The Court of Appeal later reversed the conviction. (People v. Urias (July 31, 2006, G035179) [2006 WL 2128631] [nonpub. opn.] [hereafter Urias].) During the trial, Judge Shaw became embroiled and lacked patience, dignity and courtesy when dealing with the defendant and both attorneys, as follows:

1. When defense counsel ("Ms. F.") said at the beginning of trial that she had a doctor's appointment two days later, Judge Shaw told her to reschedule it. When defense counsel stated that she had scheduled the appointment three months previously and could not reschedule it, Judge Shaw said: "You know, I hear this all day long…. You guys aren't a bunch of babies." (R.T. 32.)

2. On the second page of testimony on the first day of trial, the prosecutor asked the alleged victim ("Mr. W."), "[D]id you say how long you [and the defendant] have been living together?" Mr. W. replied, "No, I --." Even though Mr. W. had not testified about that, Judge Shaw interrupted and stated: "You have though. Thank you." (R.T. 46.)

3. During the direct examination of Mr. W., after defense counsel asked to approach the bench on a matter relevant to a pending question, Judge Shaw made the following sarcastic remarks in front of the jury: "Well, you know, you can cover those things on cross-examination. I don't see any issues with it myself. Come on up here and tell me about all these great issues here. I mean, he is describing something." (R.T. 76.)

4. The Court of Appeal found that Judge Shaw also "occasionally lectured and scolded the prosecutor…." (Urias, supra, at p. *8.) When the prosecutor asked to play the tape of Mr. W.'s 911 call, but told Judge Shaw that she only had two copies of the transcript because she had made extra copies of the wrong transcript, Judge Shaw stated in front of the jury: "Unbelievable. Okay. So I need sixteen copies, seventeen copies." While court staff was making copies, Judge Shaw told the jury: "Well, I told them I was going to be their tax dollar at work. You guys are on your own." (R.T. 88.)

5. When the prosecutor asked Mr. W. to identify on a photograph where on his head he received an injury, Judge Shaw interrupted the answer and stated: "I mean, it speaks for itself, doesn't it? That red stuff isn't ketchup." When the prosecutor said, "Okay," Judge Shaw said: "Really, come on. These jurors are not that idiotic." (R.T. 93.)

6. The defense theory was that Mr. W. started the fight because he was angry at his roommate (the defendant), who had said that he was going to move out without paying any more rent. Prior to trial, Judge Shaw stated that on the rent dispute, the attorneys could only ask, "[D]id you guys have an argument about the payment of rent and moving out []" or "having to move out? End of case. What is [sic] the details of that, who cares." (R.T. 30-31.) When defense counsel stated that the fact that Mr. W. was having financial trouble "might be a motive for him to become frustrated []" with the defendant's decision not to pay any more rent, Judge Shaw responded: "Well, it might, might, might, should have, could have, would have. I'm not here for might. I'm here for what is. [¶] So anyways, I'm here for whether or not one person assaulted another." (R.T. 30-31.)

During the prosecutor's direct examination, Mr. W. testified that about two weeks before the alleged assault, he and the defendant had a verbal dispute about Mr. W. moving out, and the defendant yelled at him. (R.T. 47-48.) During cross-examination, Mr. W. was questioned about the "dispute" about the "apartment and rent...." (R.T. 107.) Mr. W. testified: "It wasn't about rent. It was more about when I was moving out." (R.T. 107.) Shortly thereafter, defense counsel asked Mr. W.: "[I]sn't it true Mr. Urias was planning to move out, as well?" After a relevance objection, Judge Shaw referred to her pretrial ruling and stated that "[t]hat's part of the 402 motion." Judge Shaw refused defense counsel's request to approach the bench and added:

> If you weren't listening to my 402 motions, and that's why we have them outside of the presence of the jury, that if they have -- I will make a comment then. Ladies and gentlemen --

When defense counsel tried to interrupt, Judge Shaw stated: "No, no, you know what, you are violating my rule and I'm going to tell the jury." (R.T. 109.) Addressing the jury, Judge Shaw stated:

> Ladies and gentlemen, I make rulings in this case long before the case and I made the rulings in this case and you decide what the facts are. And if there was some sort of a civil dispute over whatever it might have been, this is not the way to do it, okay? That's why we have civil courtrooms. And so you are not to -- any concern about what [sic] the underlying dispute is of no relevance to this case as to these present charges. Thank you.

When defense counsel again asked Mr. W., "Do you know whether or not Mr. Urias was planning to move out?," Judge Shaw told defense counsel to "stop it or I'm going to hold you in contempt." (R.T. 110.) When defense counsel asked if she could make a record, Judge Shaw replied, "Yes, I'm going to make a record myself." (R.T. 110-111.)

In chambers, Judge Shaw accused defense counsel of violating her 402 rulings. Judge Shaw stated: "When I make a ruling, I'm not just some fly by night here that's sitting here and I don't want you to take me on or me to take you on in front of the jury." When defense counsel pointed out that the judge had allowed the prosecutor to ask "certain questions on direct[,]" Judge Shaw responded that defense counsel "did not object to any of it." (R.T. 111.) The judge then accused defense counsel of failing to object so that she could circumvent her pretrial ruling. Addressing defense counsel, Judge Shaw stated: "[Y]ou know what, I might not be good looking, but I'm not stupid. You are always waiting for a little door so you can say oh, yeah." (R.T. 113.)

The Court of Appeal found that Judge Shaw's "'elementary school scolding of defense counsel' was unwarranted." (Urias, supra, at p. *5.)

7. In front of the jury, Judge Shaw was unnecessarily critical of how defense counsel tried to impeach Mr. W. with a prior inconsistent statement. After defense counsel asked Mr. W. whether he testified at the preliminary hearing that the defendant was "face forward on top of me[,]" the following colloquy took place:

> THE COURT: Wait a minute, wait a minute. Hold on.
>
> [DEFENSE COUNSEL]: I'm sorry.
>
> THE COURT: Since when -- what is that?
>
> [DEFENSE COUNSEL]: Impeachment.
>
> THE COURT: No, it's not. That is so improper. If you want to ask him and let him read supposably [sic] what the question was and then ask about it, you may.
>
> [DEFENSE COUNSEL]: I'm not --
>
> THE COURT: Excuse me, that's the way you do it.
>
> [DEFENSE COUNSEL]: I'm not refreshing his recollection. I'm impeaching --
>
> THE COURT: I'm refreshing yours.
>
> [DEFENSE COUNSEL]: -- with a prior statement.
>
> THE COURT: Get over here and let him read it.

(R.T. 143.)

The Court of Appeal found that Judge Shaw improperly stated her command ("Get over here and let him read it") in an "imperious, disrespectful way…." (Urias, supra, at p. *6.)

When defense counsel changed her mind about what testimony to impeach the witness with, the following colloquy took place:

> THE COURT: No, no, no, that was page ten that you were referring to, line 21 down to 25, weren't we? Did you change programs on me or what?
>
> [DEFENSE COUNSEL]: I did.
>
> THE COURT: Pardon?
>
> [DEFENSE COUNSEL]: I did.
>
> THE COURT: Well, then show him what was before.
>
> [DEFENSE COUNSEL]: I don't think I need to. I don't have to impeach him with that. I'm going to --
>
> THE COURT: Well, that assumes that you are impeaching him at all.

(R.T. 144.)

8. In front of the jury, Judge Shaw criticized defense counsel for trying to mark as an exhibit a diagram that had been introduced at the preliminary hearing, without first bringing up the matter outside the presence of the jury. Judge Shaw stated: "Well, you know what, I have a real problem with that because I have a problem with when a diagram is being made, there are questions with it and so I'm not allowing you to mark that as Defense E without the questions then going with it." (R.T. 177-178.) Judge Shaw added, in front of the jury: "And that should have been handled in a 402 motion, also." (R.T. 178.) The proceedings then continued in chambers. At the end of the chambers conference, for no apparent reason, Judge Shaw stated, "I have had it up to here with both of you." (R.T. 180.)

9. On redirect examination, Mr. W. testified that he mentioned to a doctor the night of the altercation that he had suffered an injury to his eye. (R.T. 188.) On recross, defense counsel asked Mr. W. whether the police report mentioned the alleged injury to his eye. Judge Shaw sustained an objection on the ground that the question called for speculation. (There was no hearsay objection.) So defense counsel asked the witness whether he had reviewed the police report. (R.T. 190.) The following colloquy then took place:

> THE COURT: You know what, that doesn't make it hearsay? I mean, come on. What part of my rulings don't you respect? You know what, we took the same evidence course. That's hearsay, isn't it?
>
> [DEFENSE COUNSEL]: Well --
>
> THE COURT: Would you agree to that?
>
> [DEFENSE COUNSEL]: Not --
>
> THE COURT: Even if he reads it, it's hearsay, Ms. [F.], so stop it.
>
> [DEFENSE COUNSEL]: I'm just looking for impeachment.
>
> THE COURT: Isn't that nice. But you know what, you know, I make rulings. You are to abide by them. You got it?

(R.T. 190-191.)

The Court of Appeal found that Judge Shaw's "demeaning lecture" was "wholly uncalled for. It was enough to sustain the objection. Making fun of a lawyer in front of the jury is unacceptable, particularly where, as here, the lawyer is doing her best to represent her client and, while perhaps making mistakes from time to time, is not demonstrating disrespect of the court." (Urias, supra, at p. *7.)

10. When defense counsel asked Officer Jason Scheafer on cross-examination whether he wrote his report on August 3, the following colloquy took place:

> THE COURT: Why are we even going into this? Is this -- could I see you at the bench for a minute?
>
> [DEFENSE COUNSEL]: I'm almost done.
>
> THE COURT: I don't care whether you're almost done or not. Come on up.

(R.T. 227.)

11. Mr. W. testified that while he was lying on the floor during the altercation, he grabbed a log and lifted it about "four or five inches off of the ground," but put it down when the defendant told him, "Don't make it worse than it is." (R.T. 85.) When defense counsel asked Officer Scheafer whether Mr. W. told him he picked up a log, thinking about hitting the defendant, and the prosecutor objected on hearsay grounds, Judge Shaw stated: "Sustained. Oh, hello, good. Amazing." (R.T. 229.)

12. When defense counsel asked Officer Scheafer, "When Mr. [W.] told you that he lifted a log --" and the prosecutor objected that it "misstates facts not in evidence[,]" Judge Shaw stated: "It's still hearsay. I mean, what is the matter?" (R.T. 230-231.)

13. After an in chambers conference, defense counsel asked Officer Scheafer whether he recalled testifying at the preliminary hearing that Mr. W. was vague about what happened during the log incident. (R.T. 233.) Judge Shaw interrupted and the following colloquy took place in front of the jury:

> THE COURT: Well, you know what, any time that you refer to a preliminary hearing -- you know, I hate to sound like I'm giving a lesson here when we have all been out of law school a long time, but if you tell me that that is the proper procedure to ask somebody about a preliminary hearing transcript without telling the district attorney and the court what page you are talking about and giving him an opportunity to read it then, you know, I mean, then I would like to see what the procedure is. Because if we are having an amendment to evidence class, I'm excited about it, but I would sure like to hear the basis for it.
>
> [DEFENSE COUNSEL]: If you --
>
> THE COURT: And out of courtesy, Rules of Court and so forth, I want to know what page you are referring to.
>
> [DEFENSE COUNSEL]: Okay. Thank you, Your Honor. I'm referring to page 59 of the preliminary hearing --
>
> THE COURT: Hold on. And that's improper the way you are doing it and you know it. So, you know, and if this was your first time that we are doing this throughout the trial, you know, I wouldn't be all upset about it. But hold on a minute.
>
> [DEFENSE COUNSEL]: Well --
>
> THE COURT: Wait a minute. What lines are you talking about?
>
> [DEFENSE COUNSEL]: Line nine.
>
> THE COURT: Through?
>
> [DEFENSE COUNSEL]: Sixteen.
>
> ...
>
> THE COURT: Have you read this?

[PROSECUTOR]: Yes.

[DEFENSE COUNSEL]: For clarification, I would also like to add lines three through five.

THE COURT: There's no such thing as clarification.

The Court of Appeal found that Judge Shaw's lecturing of defense counsel was demeaning. (Urias, supra, at p. *7.)

14. On direct examination, the defendant testified that after an exchange of words between him and Mr. W., the defendant "noticed that he [Mr. W.] put his food down and then the next thing I know, he was pursuing up here []" (referring to a diagram). When the prosecutor did not object, Judge Shaw stated: "Pursuing calls for a conclusion." (R.T. 321.) Judge Shaw continued:

> If you are not going to object, I mean, you know, ladies, I have to present evidence by way of the Evidence Code and it's amazing around here what's happening. Okay. And I'm not going to be trying your case for you, and it's not your first case. You all know that it's, you know, I need you to go by the Evidence Code. Thank you.

(R.T. 322.)

15. On cross-examination, the prosecutor asked the defendant if, prior to the altercation, Mr. W. gave him "a dirty look." Defense counsel objected that the question misstated the evidence. Judge Shaw then asked the defendant, "What kind of a look was it?" (R.T. 371.) The following exchange then occurred in front of the jury:

THE WITNESS: It was a look like he had something to say to me.

By [PROSECUTOR]:

Q. Something to say like Happy Birthday or something not nice?

[DEFENSE COUNSEL]: Objection, argumentative, misstate [sic] the evidence.

THE COURT: Overruled.

THE WITNESS: Like where is my rent money kind of look.

By [PROSECUTOR]: Your Honor, I would move to strike that as nonresponsive.

THE COURT: That was convenient, wasn't it, Mr. Urias?

THE WITNESS: She asked me, Your Honor.

THE COURT: Yes, that's nice.

THE WITNESS: He had nothing else to say.

THE COURT: Well, that's great. That's nice that you can interpret what somebody is going to say to you.

[DEFENSE COUNSEL]: Your Honor, I just --

THE COURT: You know what, don't start again today with me, ladies, because you know what, there are Evidence Code procedures and I have made rulings in this case. And if we were here on a landlord/tenant situation, we would be here on that.

So I would ask that both of you refrain from taking me on today because you know what, I'm tired of it. I have had it to here, so stop.

[DEFENSE COUNSEL]: Okay.

THE COURT: And I want you to conduct yourselves professionally by the Evidence Code.

And I want you not to slip in things that were -- I don't know how you could possibly tell that that was that kind of a look, so anyways --

(R.T. 371-373.)

The Court of Appeal found that Judge Shaw's "sarcastic comments were inappropriate and unjustified[,]" and expressing derision for the defendant's answers and implying that he was deceitful "was unfair and constituted misconduct." (Urias, supra, at p. *6.)

16. After the prosecutor asked the defendant on cross-examination about the glare that Mr. W. gave him before the altercation, Judge Shaw disparaged the defendant's testimony during the following exchange:

THE WITNESS: I wasn't exactly focusing on the glare per se. I was focused on --

THE COURT: You know what, I'm past the glare or whatever look he had on his face that made you say you look like a clown or you are a clown, Mr. Urias.

THE WITNESS: It wasn't the look, Your Honor. It was the whole demeanor of the -- of the evening.

THE COURT: Well, whatever that is.

(R.T. 385.)

17. Mr. W. testified that the altercation began when the defendant hit him over the head with a wineglass. (R.T. 63.) The defendant admitted that he had been drinking wine and that prior to the altercation, he walked toward the kitchen to get something to drink. (R.T. 319.) However, the defendant testified on cross-examination that he did not know whether he was going to the kitchen to refill his wineglass. (R.T. 465-466.) The defendant also testified that he did not have his wineglass in his hand when he walked toward the kitchen or to the point where he first had physical contact with Mr. W. (R.T. 465-466.)

There ensued the following exchange:

> Q. [by PROSECUTOR]: Okay. Because just a second ago when I asked you if you recalled if you had your wine glass in your hand, you said you didn't recall. Are you now telling me that you do recall that you did not have your wine glass?
>
> [DEFENSE COUNSEL]: Objection, misstates the evidence.
>
> THE COURT: Overruled.
>
> THE WITNESS: After the fact, when all the events took place, I know that I didn't have the wine glass in my hand.
>
> By [PROSECUTOR]:
>
> Q. I just asked you --
>
> THE COURT: She is just asking you whether or not when you went to the kitchen, whether you had your wine glass in your hand. How difficult is that?
>
> THE WITNESS: No, I said -- I already answered no.
>
> THE COURT: Okay.
>
> By [PROSECUTOR]:
>
> Q. Okay. You didn't say a second ago that you didn't recall whether you had it or not?
>
> THE COURT: Don't worry about it. It's argument[at]ive and we'll never get it.

(R.T. 466-467.)

Then, on redirect examination, defense counsel asked the defendant, "Did you tell the officer whether or not you had a wine glass in your hand?" (R.T. 472.) After sustaining an objection, Judge Shaw reversed herself and took over the examination, as follows:

> THE COURT: No, did you tell him you had a wine glass in your hand?
>
> THE WITNESS: No.
>
> THE COURT: Is that "yes" or "no"?
>
> THE WITNESS: No.
>
> THE COURT: Thank you.
>
> By [DEFENSE COUNSEL]:
>
> Q. When he asked you if you had a wine glass in your hand, did you give a response?
>
> A. I did.
>
> Q. What was that response?
>
> A. I said I could have.
>
> [PROSECUTOR]: Your Honor, I would object. It calls for hearsay.
>
> THE COURT: Okay. He said he could have. Okay. Now you said could have. I thought you said just now that you said no?
>
> THE WITNESS: You asked me what I told the officer and I didn't tell him that I had the wine glass. I said I could have had it.
>
> THE COURT: I asked you yes or no and you said no.

(R.T. 473.)

The Court of Appeal found that Judge Shaw's comments improperly suggested that Mr. Urias's testimony was "inconsistent and deliberately untruthful." (Urias, supra, at p. *8.)

On July 31, 2006, the Court of Appeal, partly due to Judge Shaw's "persistent and indefensible misconduct," reversed the conviction and held that the defendant was entitled to a retrial before a different judge. (Urias, supra, at pp. *2, 10.) The court found that Judge Shaw "belittled, scolded and punished" defense counsel in front of the jury, made "caustic, condescending remarks" to the defendant and his counsel, created an "atmosphere of unfairness," and "substantively undermined the defense theory of the case." (Id. at pp. *2, 3, 8.)

Judge Shaw's conduct violated the Code of Judicial Ethics, canons 1, 2A, 3B(4), and 3B(5), and constituted prejudicial misconduct. (See Kloepfer v. Commission, supra, 49 Cal.3d at pp. 839, 849; McCartney v. Commission, supra, 12 Cal.3d at p. 534.)

COUNT FIVE

On December 20, 2004, Judge Shaw presided over jury selection in People v. Troy Kercheval, No. 03HF1721, and mistreated a prospective juror ("A.H."). After the prospective juror told the judge, in response to her inquiry about whether she had a time problem, that she was studying to become a social worker and had to finish a paper, Judge Shaw said:

> Well, that's nice. I've got lots of things to do, too. My problems are of constitutional proportions, so you are going to have to do that at night.

Although Judge Shaw ordered the prospective jurors to return to court at 1:30 p.m., A.H. did not return to court until 1:57 p.m. Because A.H. had been in the jury box, Judge Shaw replaced her with a new prospective juror. When A.H. returned to the courtroom, the following exchange took place:

> THE COURT: It's now three minutes to 2:00. You were ordered back here at 1:30.
>
> PROSPECTIVE JUROR []: Yes.
>
> THE COURT: But I don't care what your excuse is. It's totally unacceptable unless there was some dire emergency that kept you from being here at 1:30 and I don't have time to talk to you. So I'm ordering you back here tomorrow morning at 8:30 to talk to me about it. I will see you tomorrow morning at 8:30.
>
> It's very upsetting to me. I couldn't go on. I can't wait for you. I have lots of things to do to try to get people out of here before Christmas.
>
> PROSPECTIVE JUROR []: I cannot comment? I'm just telling you Jamboree [Road], they are repairing and I was there for twenty minutes and I couldn't get in because nobody was here to help me to tell me which room to go.

THE COURT: Well, what room would you go to other than this one?

PROSPECTIVE JUROR []: I know, but I couldn't find it, you know. I was here. I went to another room and it was locked and so that's why I went to another lady and I'm here for thirty minutes to get in and nobody was there to help me.

THE COURT: Isn't it funny that all these people found their way back? I don't have time to talk to you right now. So leave your phone number and you are going to have to come back and talk to me about that. Very serious when you don't follow my orders. And I have a big job to do here and it's not on whim or passion or whatever. But you guys are on order to be here and so that's the thing.

Judge Shaw's treatment of the prospective juror violated the Code of Judicial Ethics, canons 1, 2A, and 3B(4), and constituted prejudicial misconduct. (See Kloepfer v. Commission, supra, 49 Cal.3d at pp. 839, 849; McCartney v. Commission, supra, 12 Cal.3d at p. 534.) The judge's order that the prospective juror return to court the following morning amounted to an abuse of authority. (See Kloepfer v. Commission, supra, 49 Cal.3d at p. 857; Cannon v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications (1975) 14 Cal.3d 678, 701-702, fn. 19.) To Judge Shaw's credit, she rescinded her order before it was enforced.

III. OTHER FACTS RELEVANT TO DISCIPLINE

Judge Shaw has a record of prior discipline for similar misconduct. In 1988, the commission issued an advisory letter to her for conduct that included making inappropriate remarks to defendants, and drawing a picture of a hanged man and having her bailiff deliver it to the investigating officer during a preliminary hearing. In 1989, in a second advisory letter, the commission reminded her of the provisions of then canon 3A(3) (the predecessor to canon 3B(4)) imposing the duty to be patient, dignified, and courteous to persons with whom judge deals in official capacity, and reminded her of the importance of adhering to contempt law.

In 2000, the commission publicly admonished Judge Shaw for conduct that included (1) making a statement to a slightly built white male she was incarcerating that suggested that skinny white males in prison are particularly vulnerable to sexual assault and (2) making demeaning, discourteous, and undignified comments to a prosecutor who refused to reduce a driving under the influence charge. In the public admonishment, the commission pointedly noted that "Judge Shaw must appreciate that unless she takes steps to control her admitted weakness for blurting out something that would have been better left unsaid, her comments will on occasion embarrass or demean a litigant or attorney."

IV. DISCIPLINE

The purpose of judicial discipline "is not punishment, but rather the protection of the public, the enforcement of rigorous standards of judicial conduct, and the maintenance of public confidence in the integrity and independence of the judicial system." (Broadman v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1998) 18 Cal.4th 1079, 1111-1112 (Broadman), citing Adams v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1995) 10 Cal.4th 866, 912.)

The commission has identified several factors that are relevant to determining appropriate discipline in furtherance of the disciplinary objectives enunciated in Broadman. (Inquiry Concerning Ross, No. 174, Decision and Order Removing Judge Ross from Office, (2005), p. 64.) As relevant here, the factors include the number and nature of the acts of misconduct; the existence of prior discipline; the likelihood of future misconduct; and the impact of the misconduct on the judicial system. Applying these standards here, it is clear that the stipulated censure and bar from assignment is the appropriate level of discipline.

The number of acts of misconduct is pertinent to the question of discipline, not according to any rigid formula, Furey v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1987) 43 Cal.3d 1297, 1307, but rather, for determining whether the wrongdoing was isolated, or part of a course of conduct establishing "lack of temperament and ability to perform judicial functions in an even-handed manner." (Fletcher v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1998) 19 Cal.4th 865, 918, quoting from Wenger v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1981) 29 Cal.3d 615, 653.)

In 2003, we removed Judge Bruce Van Voorhis from office based on four acts of willful misconduct and seven instances of prejudicial misconduct that were indicative of a lack of judicial temperament. (Inquiry Concerning Van Voorhis, No. 165, Decision and Order Removing Judge Bruce Van Voorhis from Office (2003).) Here, the stipulated facts include forty-two instances in which Judge Shaw made remarks reflecting a lack of patience, dignity, and courtesy, constituting prejudicial misconduct. Judge Shaw also admits to acts of prejudicial misconduct involving abuse of authority, embroilment, and prejudgment. The instances of misconduct occurred in five separate cases over a two year period. Under these circumstances, Judge Shaw's actions cannot be characterized as isolated occurrences. Rather, they establish a persistent pattern of abusive and demeaning conduct that is seriously at odds with the canons and expected judicial temperament. (See Kloepfer v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1989) 49 Cal.3d 826, 866.)

Judge Shaw continued to treat those who appeared before her in an abusive and demeaning manner after receiving two advisory letters and a public admonishment for similar conduct. As noted, the commission commented in its public admonishment of Judge Shaw in 2000 that she needed to cease blurting out inappropriate comments. Judge Shaw obviously failed to heed this warning. The "failure of past sanctions to effect a change in conduct also suggests a lack of ability to reform and unsuitability for judicial office." (Inquiry Concerning Platt, No. 162, Decision and Order Removing Judge Michael E. Platt from Office (2002), p. 15.)

Repeated admonishment from the Court of Appeal also has been unsuccessful in causing Judge Shaw to reform her intemperate judicial demeanor. The judge's abusive and demeaning treatment of defendants, attorneys, and a prospective juror continued even after the Court of Appeal harshly criticized her judicial demeanor in People v Quila (Oct. 26, 2004, G032666 [nonpub. opn.].) (See counts 3(2-4), 4, & 5.)

The adverse impact of the judge's misconduct on the judicial system has been substantial. Judge Shaw's misconduct jeopardized the parties' right to a fair trial and, in one case, contributed to the reversal of a criminal conviction. (People v. Urias (July 31, 2006, G035179) [2006 WL 2128631] [nonpub. opn.].) The Court of Appeal found that Judge Shaw "belittled, scolded and punished" defense counsel in front of the jury, made "caustic, condescending remarks" to the defendant and his counsel, created an "atmosphere of unfairness," and "substantively undermined the defense theory of the case." (Id. at pp. *2, 3, 8.) Such improper and indefensible behavior compromises public confidence in the judicial system.

Judge Shaw's persistent mistreatment of those who appear before her, and her inability to control her behavior despite repeated admonishments from the commission and the Court of Appeal convinces us of the high probability she will continue her unethical behavior if she were to sit in a judicial capacity in the future. Accordingly, the commission concludes that the maximum sanction that may be imposed upon a former judge, public censure and bar, is necessary for the protection of the public and the reputation of the judiciary. Based upon the parties' stipulation, and good cause appearing, the commission hereby censures former Judge Susanne S. Shaw and bars her from receiving an assignment, appointment, or reference of work from any California state court.

Commission members Mr. Marshall B. Grossman, Mr. Michael A. Kahn, Mrs. Crystal Lui, Justice Judith D. McConnell, Ms. Patricia Miller, Mr. Jose C. Miramontes, Mrs. Penny Perez, Judge Risë Jones Pichon and Ms. Barbara Schraeger voted to accept the parties settlement and to issue this decision and order imposing a censure and bar pursuant to the stipulated agreement. Commission member Judge Frederick P. Horn is recused and commission member Mr. Lawrence Simi did not participate in this matter.

INQUIRY CONCERNING JUDGE ROBERT B. FREEDMAN

SUMMARY

A disciplinary action was brought concerning a superior court judge. The Commission on Judicial Performance found that the judge had failed to timely rule in numerous matters; that he had regularly submitted false salary affidavits under Gov. Code, § 68210, and Cal. Const., art. VI, § 19, during times when his rulings were overdue; and that he had failed to timely act on many fee waiver applications.

The Commission on Judicial Performance issued a severe public censure. The commission adopted the masters' conclusion that the judge committed prejudicial misconduct and also concluded that his reckless submission of erroneous salary affidavits at times when he was aware he had overdue rulings was willful misconduct. The commission adopted the masters' conclusion that the judge violated Cal. Code Jud. Ethics, canons 3A, 3B(8), by his persistent delays and failure to act on fee waiver applications, and the commission also concluded that this conduct violated Cal. Code Jud. Ethics, canons 1, 2A. The commission determined that the judge was not likely to commit misconduct in the future because he understood the seriousness of his misconduct and had carried out his responsibilities without incident since the inception of commission proceedings. Many judges and attorneys testified to his good character, skills, and contributions to the judiciary. (Opinion by Frederick P. Horn, Chairperson.)

HEADNOTES

(1) Judges § 8—Duties—Timely Ruling on Submitted Matters.—The California Constitution provides that a judge may not receive a salary while any cause before the judge remains pending and undetermined for 90 days after it has been submitted for decision (Cal. Const., art. VI, § 19). However, the withheld salary is not forfeited; once the overdue matters are completed, the judge is again entitled to receive his or her salary, including those amounts that were not paid during the period of delay. To implement the constitutional provision, Gov. Code, § 68210, requires judges to execute an affidavit attesting to their compliance with the Constitution in order to receive their salaries. The provisions that deny judges their salaries if they fail to rule in the time allowed by law reflect the judgment of the Legislature and the electorate that this period of 90 days affords a reasonable time within which to expect a trial judge to carry out the basic responsibility of a judge to decide cases. Failure to decide a matter within the 90-day period is cause for judicial discipline.

(2) Judges § 6.2—Willful Misconduct—Elements.—The most serious form of wrongdoing is willful misconduct, which is (1) unjudicial conduct that is (2) committed in bad faith (3) by a judge acting in his or her judicial capacity. Conduct inconsistent with the provisions of the California Code of Judicial Ethics is generally considered unjudicial conduct, but that code is not the only standard by which a judge's conduct may be measured. The bad faith requirement for willful misconduct is satisfied when a judge is (1) performing a judicial act for a corrupt purpose (which is any purpose other than the faithful discharge of judicial duties), or (2) performing a judicial act with knowledge that the act is beyond the judge's lawful judicial power, or (3) performing a judicial act that exceeds the judge's lawful power with a conscious disregard for the limits of the judge's authority. "Conscious disregard" means that because transgressing the limits of a judge's lawful authority is not the faithful discharge of judicial duties, a judge who performs such acts with no regard at all for whether they are legally permitted cannot be said to be acting with a purpose to faithfully discharge judicial duties. Thus, a judge's reckless or utter indifference to whether judicial acts being performed exceed the bounds of the judge's prescribed power is a state of mind properly characterized as bad faith.

(3) Judges § 6.2—Judicial Misconduct—Willful Misconduct—Judicial Capacity.—For purposes of a determination of willful misconduct, a judge acts in a judicial capacity when the judge is performing one of the functions, whether adjudicative or administrative in nature, that are associated with the position of a judge, or when the judge uses or attempts to use the authority of the judicial office for an improper purpose.

(4) Judges § 6.2—Judicial Misconduct—Prejudicial Misconduct—Definition.—Prejudicial misconduct, the second most serious category of judicial misconduct, is distinguishable from willful misconduct in that a judge's acts may constitute prejudicial conduct even if not committed in a judicial capacity, or, if committed in a judicial capacity, not committed in bad faith. Prejudicial conduct is either conduct which a judge undertakes in good faith but which nevertheless would appear to an objective observer to be not only unjudicial conduct but conduct prejudicial to public esteem for the judicial office, or willful misconduct out of office, i.e., unjudicial conduct committed in bad faith by a judge not then acting in a judicial capacity. To constitute prejudicial conduct, a judge's actions must bring the judicial office into disrepute, that is, the conduct would appear to an objective observer to be prejudicial to public esteem for the judicial office.

(5) Judges § 6.2—Judicial Misconduct—Improper Action—Definition.—The least serious type of judicial misconduct is improper action. It is conduct that violates the California Code of Judicial Ethics, but that does not rise to the level of prejudicial misconduct. Improper action thus includes unjudicial conduct that an objective observer aware of the circumstances would not necessarily deem to have an adverse effect on the reputation of the judiciary.

(6) Judges § 6.4—Determining Appropriate Discipline—Mitigating Evidence.—Evidence in mitigation may be used in considering the totality of the circumstances that are pertinent to a determination of the appropriate discipline for judicial misconduct.

(7) Motions and Orders § 1—Motions—When Matter Submitted.—Under Cal. Rules of Court, rule 2.900, a matter is submitted when either of the following first occurs: (1) the court orders it submitted, or (2) the date a final paper is filed or argument is heard, whichever is later.

(8) Judges § 8—Duties—Precedence over Other Matters.—Cal. Code Jud. Ethics, canon 3A, provides that judicial duties prescribed by law are to take precedence over all other matters.

(9) Judges § 8—Duties—Hearing and Deciding Matters Assigned.—Cal. Code Jud. Ethics, canon 3B(1), requires judges to hear and decide all matters assigned to them.

(10) Judges § 6.2—Prejudicial Misconduct—Persistent Failure to Timely Decide Matters.—The judge's persistent and repeated failure over a four-year period to decide matters within 90 days of submission violates Cal. Code Jud. Ethics, canons 1, 2A, 3A, and 3B(8), and constitutes prejudicial misconduct.

(11) Judges § 6.2—Failure to Timely Rule on Submitted Matters.—Substantial and persistent failure to rule on submitted matters without substantial justification may well cause criticism and bring the judicial office into disrepute.

(12) Judges § 6.2—Willful Misconduct—Prejudicial Misconduct—False Salary Affidavits.—A judge who signed salary affidavits affirming that he had no matters under submission for over 90 days after being advised that he had matters under submission for over 90 days engaged in willful misconduct. The judge engaged in prejudicial misconduct where the evidence did not prove that the judge was made aware of the delayed matters before signing the salary affidavits. A judge who executes a salary affidavit affirming he or she has no overdue rulings should take care to ensure that the statement is true when it is made. It is unjudicial and damaging to the public esteem for judicial office for a judge to submit false statements to obtain salary to which the judge is not then entitled.

(13) Judges § 6.4—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Proceedings—Determining Appropriate Discipline—Factors.—The Commission on Judicial Performance has identified various factors that may be relevant when determining what discipline is appropriate in a given case. The factors are (1) the number of acts of misconduct; (2) the existence of prior discipline; (3) whether the judge appreciates the inappropriateness of his or her conduct; (4) the judge's integrity; (5) the likelihood of future misconduct; and (6) the impact of the misconduct on the judicial system.

(14) Judges § 6.4—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Proceedings—Determining Appropriate Discipline—Factors—Number of Acts of Misconduct.—The number of acts of misconduct is relevant to discipline to the extent it shows either isolated incidents or a pattern of misbehavior that demonstrates that the judge lacks judicial temperament and the ability to perform judicial functions in an even-handed manner.

(15) Judges § 6.4—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Proceedings—Determining Appropriate Discipline—Factors—Failure to Appreciate and Admit Misconduct.—A judge's lack of appreciation of misconduct and failure to recognize and admit impropriety are indications that a judge lacks the capacity to reform.

(16) Judges § 6.4—Discipline—Proportionality Review.—The commission's determination of the appropriate discipline is not predetermined by prior decisions involving similar misconduct, any more than it is appropriate for the commission to ignore all that has gone before.

(17) Judges § 6.2—Censure—Grounds—Failure to Timely Rule and False Salary Affidavits.—A judge who failed to timely rule in numerous matters and submitted false salary affidavits committed serious misconduct that taken alone might warrant removal from office. However, he was a respected and talented jurist who was strongly supported in the disciplinary proceeding by a significant number of attorneys and colleagues. Counsel for parties in a number of the delayed matters supported the judge in the disciplinary proceedings and testified that they would not hesitate to appear before him in future cases. Other than the subject misconduct, there was no evidence presented that called the judge's abilities as a jurist or his suitability for the bench into question. The judge had not been the subject of any relevant prior discipline, he acknowledged his wrongdoing and was contrite, and he was unlikely to offend again. For those reasons, a severe public censure was appropriate.

OPINION

HORN, Chairperson.—Under California law, judges are expected to decide matters submitted to them within 90 days of submission, and are prohibited from receiving their salaries during times when they have undecided matters under submission for more than 90 days. (Cal. Const., art. VI, § 19; Mardikian v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1985) 40 Cal.3d 473, 477, fn. 4 [220 Cal.Rptr. 833, 709 P.2d 852] (Mardikian).) To implement the latter provision, the Government Code requires judges to regularly execute affidavits declaring they are in compliance with the law and entitled to salary. (Gov. Code, § 68210.) In this disciplinary proceeding, Judge Robert B. Freedman of the Alameda County Superior Court is charged by an amended notice of formal proceedings (Notice) in three counts with (1) failing to decide causes submitted to him for decision within 90 days, (2) executing and submitting numerous salary affidavits falsely stating that he had no causes under submission to him for decision for more than 90 days when he did have such matters under submission, and (3) failing to act on over 200 fee waiver applications by litigants within the time allowed by law.

A panel of three special masters appointed by the California Supreme Court heard evidence in this disciplinary proceeding, made factual findings and issued their conclusions of law. The masters found that between 2000 and 2004 Judge Freedman failed to timely rule in 21 of the 23 specified causes charged in the Notice, that he regularly submitted false salary affidavits during times when his rulings were overdue, and that in 2003, he failed to timely dispose of over 200 applications for waiver of court fees by litigants in the Alameda County Superior Court. The masters concluded Judge Freedman's failure to complete his assigned duties on a timely basis and his submission of false affidavits were conduct "prejudicial to the administration of justice that [brought] the judicial office into disrepute." (Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (d).)

We have reviewed the evidence taken by the masters and have considered their findings and conclusions. In large part, we adopt or defer to the masters' findings and conclusions, including in part their conclusion that Judge Freedman committed prejudicial misconduct when he was aware that he had overdue rulings and submitted false salary affidavits anyway. In certain instances which we discuss, we conclude, based on the masters' findings, that Judge Freedman's reckless submission of erroneous salary affidavits at times when he was aware he had overdue rulings, with disregard for whether they were true or false, was willful misconduct. Misconduct of such gravity has warranted removal from office. However, in view of the unique circumstances of this case, including exceptional mitigating evidence, we have determined to issue this severe public censure.

PROCEDURAL HISTORY

Judge Freedman was appointed to the Municipal Court of Alameda County in January 1996, and became a judge of the Alameda County Superior Court in July 1998. On September 15, 2006, after a preliminary investigation and the issuance of an initial notice of formal proceedings, the commission issued its first amended notice of formal proceedings in this matter. The Notice charged Judge Freedman in three counts with the following misconduct:

Count 1: Delaying rulings on matters for more than 90 days after they were submitted to him in 23 instances in the period 2000 to 2004. The Notice charged that a number of the delays occurred after Judge Freedman had twice been warned by presiding judges about overdue rulings, once in April 2001, and again around the end of December 2002.

Count 2: Executing and submitting false state and county salary affidavits during the periods June 2000 to April 2001, August 2002 to February 2003, June 2003 to August 2004, and October 2004, all periods in which Judge Freedman allegedly had matters under submission upon which he had not ruled for more than 90 days.

Count 3: In the first half of 2004, failing to act "within applicable deadlines" on litigants' applications for waiver of the requirement they pay filing and other court fees. Under the law that applied, if the applications were not denied within five days of filing, they were automatically granted. The delays caused the Alameda County Superior Court to order refunds to some litigants whose applications were denied late, at a total cost to the court of $9,894.

The Supreme Court appointed three special masters at the commission's request. (Rules of Com. on Jud. Performance, rule 121.)[1] The special masters were the Hon. Eugene M. Premo, Associate Justice of the Court of Appeal, Sixth Appellate District, the Hon. Kathryn Doi Todd, Associate Justice of the Court of Appeal, Second Appellate District, Division Two, and the Hon. William A. Mayhew, Judge of the Superior Court of Stanislaus County. The masters held an evidentiary hearing, and their report was filed with the commission on February 14, 2007. Judge Freedman is represented in this proceeding by Joseph P. McMonigle and Kathleen M. Ewins of San Francisco. The examiners for the commission are Andrew Blum and Valerie Marchant.

The masters found virtually all the charges were proved by clear and convincing evidence. They found that Judge Freedman had delayed rulings in 21 of the 23 charged instances (count 1), that he had "regularly" executed false salary affidavits during periods when his rulings were delayed (count 2), and that he had delayed in ruling on "approximately 200" applications for fee waivers, with resulting refunds to litigants (count 3).

The masters found in mitigation that Judge Freedman is a hardworking, industrious, and highly competent judge who has not committed other misconduct and is unlikely to offend again. Their findings were based in large part on testimony by a number of judges and attorneys who described Judge Freedman's good character, skills, and contributions to the judiciary.

In their legal conclusions, the masters determined that Judge Freedman committed prejudicial misconduct in connection with all the charges. As explained in the following discussion, we adopt and summarize the masters' findings of fact, and adopt most of their conclusions of law.

DISCUSSION

I.

GENERAL PRINCIPLES

A. Judicial Salary Law

(1) The California Constitution provides that a judge may not receive a salary "while any cause before the judge remains pending and undetermined for 90 days after it has been submitted for decision." (Cal. Const., art. VI,

[1] All further references to rules are to the Rules of the Commission on Judicial Performance, unless otherwise specified.

§ 19; see also, e.g., Hassanally v. Firestone (1996) 51 Cal.App.4th 1241, 1244 [59 Cal.Rptr.2d 625].) However, the withheld salary is not forfeited; once the overdue matters are completed, the judge is again entitled to receive his or her salary, including those amounts that were not paid during the period of delay. (Hassanally, supra, at p. 1244.) To implement the constitutional provision, Government Code section 68210 requires judges to execute an "affidavit" attesting to their compliance with the Constitution in order to receive their salaries.[2] These provisions have been California law since 1879. (See Cal. Const., art. VI, former § 24, adopted in Cal. Const. of 1879 [requiring execution of affidavit affirming no cause pending for 90 days to receive salary].) The provisions that deny judges their salaries if they fail to rule in the time allowed by law "reflect the judgment of the Legislature and the electorate that this period [90 days] affords a reasonable time within which to expect a trial judge to carry out the basic responsibility of a judge to decide cases." (Mardikian, supra, 40 Cal.3d at p. 477, fn. 4.) Failure to decide a matter within the 90-day period is cause for judicial discipline. (Mardikian, supra, at p. 485; see also, e.g., Hassanally, supra, at p. 1244.)

B. Standards for Imposition of Discipline

In determining whether Judge Freedman has committed misconduct, we apply the law of judicial discipline as it has evolved in California. The levels or types of judicial misconduct that may subject a judge to discipline by the commission are described in article VI, section 18, subdivision (d), of the California Constitution. The commission must prove the charges against Judge Freedman by clear and convincing evidence. (Doan v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1995) 11 Cal.4th 294, 313 [45 Cal.Rptr.2d 254, 902 P.2d 272]; Geiler v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications (1973) 10 Cal.3d 270, 275 [110 Cal.Rptr. 201, 515 P.2d 1].) "Evidence of a charge is clear and convincing so long as there is a 'high probability' that the charge is true. [Citations.] The evidence need not establish the fact beyond a reasonable doubt." (Broadman v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1998) 18 Cal.4th 1079, 1090 [77 Cal.Rptr.2d 408, 959 P.2d 715] (Broadman).)

1. Willful Misconduct.

(2) The most serious form of wrongdoing is willful misconduct, which is (1) unjudicial conduct that is (2) committed in bad faith (3) by a judge acting in his or her judicial capacity. (Broadman, supra, 18 Cal.4th at p. 1091; Dodds v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1995) 12 Cal.4th 163, 172 [48

[2] Government Code section 68210 provides: "No judge of a court of record shall receive his salary unless he shall make and subscribe before an officer entitled to administer oaths, an affidavit stating that no cause before him remains pending and undetermined for 90 days after it has been submitted for decision."

Cal.Rptr.2d 106, 906 P.2d 1260].) Conduct inconsistent with the provisions of the California Code of Judicial Ethics is generally considered unjudicial conduct, but that code is not the only standard by which we may measure a judge's conduct. (Dodds, supra, at p. 173, fn. 2.) The "bad faith" requirement for willful misconduct is satisfied when a judge is "(1) performing a judicial act for a corrupt purpose (which is any purpose other than the faithful discharge of judicial duties), or (2) performing a judicial act with knowledge that the act is beyond the judge's lawful judicial power, or (3) performing a judicial act that exceeds the judge's lawful power with a conscious disregard for the limits of the judge's authority." (Broadman, supra, at p. 1092.) In Broadman, the Supreme Court described "conscious disregard" as follows: "Because transgressing the limits of a judge's lawful authority is not the faithful discharge of judicial duties, a judge who performs such acts with no regard at all for whether they are legally permitted cannot be said to be acting with a purpose to faithfully discharge judicial duties. Thus, a judge's reckless or utter indifference to whether judicial acts being performed exceed the bounds of the judge's prescribed power is a state of mind properly characterized as bad faith." (Ibid.)

(3) Finally, a judge acts in a "judicial capacity" when the "judge is . . . performing one of the functions, whether adjudicative or administrative in nature, that are associated with the position of a judge or when the judge uses or attempts to use the authority of the judicial office for an improper purpose." (Broadman, supra, 18 Cal.4th at p. 1104, citing Dodds v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 12 Cal.4th at p. 172.)

2. Prejudicial Misconduct.

(4) Our Supreme Court has defined prejudicial misconduct, the second most serious category of judicial misconduct, as follows: "Prejudicial conduct is distinguishable from willful misconduct in that a judge's acts may constitute prejudicial conduct even if not committed in a judicial capacity, or, if committed in a judicial capacity, not committed in bad faith. Prejudicial conduct is 'either "conduct which a judge undertakes in good faith but which nevertheless would appear to an objective observer to be not only unjudicial conduct but conduct prejudicial to public esteem for the judicial office" [citation] or "willful misconduct out of office, i.e., unjudicial conduct committed in bad faith by a judge not then acting in a judicial capacity" [citation].' [Citation.] In this context, bad faith means a culpable mental state beyond mere negligence and consisting of either knowing or not caring that the conduct being undertaken is unjudicial and prejudicial to public esteem. In sum, to constitute prejudicial conduct, a judge's actions must bring 'the judicial office into disrepute,' that is, the conduct would appear to an objective observer to be prejudicial to ' "public esteem for the judicial office." ' [Citation.]" (Broadman, supra, 18 Cal.4th at pp. 1092–1093, original italics.)

3. Improper Action.

(5) The least serious type of judicial misconduct is improper action. It is conduct that violates the California Code of Judicial Ethics, but that does not rise to the level of prejudicial misconduct. (Rothman, Cal. Jud. Conduct Handbook (2d ed. 1999) § 13.29, pp. 386–387.) Improper action thus includes unjudicial conduct that an objective observer aware of the circumstances would not necessarily deem to have an adverse effect on the reputation of the judiciary. (See Adams v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1995) 10 Cal.4th 866, 897–899 [42 Cal.Rptr.2d 606, 897 P.2d 544].)

4. Consideration of Mitigating Evidence.

(6) Evidence in mitigation may be used in considering the totality of the circumstances that are pertinent to our determination of the appropriate discipline. (Broadman, supra, 18 Cal.4th at p. 1112; see also Adams v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 10 Cal.4th at p. 912.)

II.

FINDINGS OF FACT AND CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

Our findings of fact are taken primarily from those of the special masters, whose factual findings we defer to or adopt in their entirety, supplemented with additional evidentiary detail and our own findings where additional findings are necessary to our decision and shown by clear and convincing evidence. (Geiler v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications, supra, 10 Cal.3d at p. 275 [commission has authority to make its own findings]; but see also, e.g., Broadman, supra, 18 Cal.4th at p. 1090 [factual findings of masters on issues of credibility may be given special weight because masters have "the advantage of observing the demeanor of the witnesses"].) Although we agree with most of the legal conclusions the masters reached, we also make our own legal conclusions based on our independent review of the record. (See Broadman, supra, at p. 1090 [commission's power to reach legal conclusions].)

A. Count 1—Findings of Fact

Count 1 of the Notice is subdivided into 23 lettered subcounts, each corresponding to one or more instances of delay in a case assigned to Judge

Freedman. The masters found by clear and convincing evidence that Judge Freedman had delayed rulings over 90 days in 21 of the 23 instances charged in the Notice. The parties do not object to these findings, and we adopt and summarize them below. The delayed rulings occurred in three distinct periods, during which Judge Freedman had at least one delayed matter[3] pending: June 16, 2000, to April 19, 2001, August 4, 2002, to February 7, 2003, and June 16, 2003, to November 3, 2004.

2000–2001

From 2000 until early 2002, Judge Freedman was assigned to preside over criminal cases in the Oakland courthouses of the Alameda County Superior Court. During that time, he occasionally sat as a substitute judge in the civil law and motion department. During those temporary assignments, among other matters, Judge Freedman heard motions in the Alameda, Paula, Bellamy, CSK, Contra Costa, and BART cases,[4] identified in the Notice as subcounts A through G. The following delays occurred in those matters:

1. Count 1A (Alameda). Alameda was submitted on March 23, 2000. The 90th day after submission was June 21, 2000. Judge Freedman did not decide the matter until April 16, 2001, 299 days after the matter had been under submission for 90 days.

2. Count 1B (Paula). Paula was submitted on November 20, 2000. Judge Freedman did not decide the matter until March 19, 2001, 29 days after the matter had been under submission for 90 days.

3. Count 1C (Bellamy). The Bellamy matter was submitted on November 29, 2000. Judge Freedman did not decide the matter until March 23, 2001, 24 days after the matter had been under submission for 90 days.

4. Count 1D (CSK). The CSK matter was submitted on January 5, 2001. Judge Freedman did not decide the matter until April 19, 2001, 14 days after the matter had been under submission for 90 days.

5. Count 1E. The masters found the delay charged in count 1E was not proved because no evidence was submitted in support of the charge. We adopt the finding, and dismiss count 1E.

6. Count 1F (Contra Costa). The Contra Costa matter was submitted on January 11, 2001. Judge Freedman decided the matter on April 16, 2001, five days late.

[3] We use the term "delayed matters" to refer to matters that were under submission to Judge Freedman but undecided for 90 days or more.

[4] We do not reproduce the full names and numbers of the cases in the text, because those details are not relevant to our discussion.

7. Count 1G (BART). The BART matter was submitted to Judge Freedman for decision on January 16, 2001, but he did not decide it until April 19, 2001, three days late.

During the period in which these delays occurred, Judge William McKinstry was the presiding judge of the Alameda County Superior Court. Presiding judges are required to monitor the status of submitted cases in their courts to ensure that "no cause under submission remains undecided and pending for longer than 90 days." (Cal. Rules of Court, rule 10.603(c)(3) [former rule 6.603].) In early March 2001, Judge McKinstry inquired about the status of submitted cases, and learned from the court's senior research attorney that Judge Freedman had delayed matters in the Alameda, Bellamy, and Paula cases, and that the Contra Costa case had been under submission to Judge Freedman for at least 60 days.

Judge McKinstry met with Judge Freedman a few days after learning of these decisional delays, and supplied him with a list of the overdue and soon-to-be overdue matters. Soon after the meeting, Judge Freedman decided the Paula matter (on Mar. 19, 2001) and the Bellamy matter (on Mar. 23, 2001), but the other overdue case, Alameda, at that point nearly a year past submission, remained undecided.

On April 11, 2001, Judge McKinstry sent Judge Freedman a memo urging him to decide his remaining overdue matters, and again identified the Alameda and Contra Costa matters by name. In the memo, Judge McKinstry reminded Judge Freedman that his duty to decide cases took priority over other matters, and that his "indecision" could result in discipline by this commission. Judge McKinstry also reminded Judge Freedman of a judge's obligation to submit accurate salary affidavits stating he or she has no overdue matters as a condition of receiving salary.

On April 16, 2001, Judge Freedman decided the Alameda and Contra Costa matters. On April 19, 2001, Judge McKinstry sent Judge Freedman another memo, again urging him to decide his remaining delayed matters, and listing specifically the by then overdue BART and CSK matters. Judge McKinstry informed Judge Freedman that he would be relieved of all committee matters effective April 23, 2001, if he had not cleared his backlog of delayed matters. In the April 19 memo, Judge McKinstry again reminded Judge Freedman that judges must execute an affidavit attesting that they have no delayed matters to be entitled to salary. On the same day, April 19, 2001, Judge Freedman decided the BART and CSK matters, clearing his backlog of overdue matters.

2002–2003

In early 2002, Judge Freedman was reassigned to a civil department of the Alameda County Superior Court in Oakland. Judge McKinstry had been succeeded by Presiding Judge Harry Sheppard. While in his civil assignment and during Judge Sheppard's tenure as presiding judge, Judge Freedman failed to timely decide the matters charged in counts 1H to 1J.

1. Count 1H (Slauson). On May 6, 2002, a matter in the Slauson case[5] was submitted to Judge Freedman. Judge Freedman did not decide the matter until January 31, 2003, 179 days overdue.

2. Count 1I (O'Toole). On July 2, 2002, a matter in the O'Toole case was submitted to Judge Freedman. The parties wrote to Judge Freedman on September 25, 2002, to inquire about the status of the matter, and wrote again to Judge Freedman in January 2003. Judge Freedman did not decide the matter until February 7, 2003, 130 days overdue.

3. Count 1J (Willard). On July 8, 2002, a matter in the Willard case[6] was submitted to Judge Freedman. Judge Freedman filed his decision in the Willard matter on January 15, 2003, 101 days overdue.

On or around December 27, 2002, while all three of the matters charged for the 2002–2003 period were pending and overdue for rulings, Presiding Judge Sheppard learned from the lead research attorney that Judge Freedman again had matters that had been pending and under submission for longer than 90 days. Judge Sheppard met with Judge Freedman within a week of December 27, 2002, discussed the overdue rulings with him, and showed or gave him a list of the overdue cases. In the month following that meeting, Judge Freedman filed his rulings in the three overdue matters, Slauson, O'Toole, and Willard.

After clearing his backlog in early 2003, Judge Freedman continued to hear civil cases, and he again fell behind on his rulings. At the end of November 2003, Judge Freedman was appointed to the position of assistant presiding judge, and was assigned to supervise the Hayward branch of the Alameda

[5] The Notice charged two delayed matters in the Slauson case in count 1H, one occurring in this 2002–2003 period, and the second in the 2003–2004 period. The discussion in the text relates to the first delay.

[6] There was a second matter in Willard in which Judge Freedman was alleged to have delayed a ruling, but the masters found it was not proven. The parties do not object to the finding. We adopt it, and dismiss that part of count 1J.

County Superior Court. The Hayward branch was larger than many other county superior courts. In addition to his duties as supervising judge, Judge Freedman also heard law and motion calendars, family law calendars, and court trials, among other things. The Notice charged and we find that Judge Freedman incurred delays of over 90 days before ruling in the following matters:

1. Count 1H (Slauson). On March 18, 2003, a second matter in the Slauson case was submitted to Judge Freedman. That matter was still undecided on June 16, 2003, 90 days after submission. Attorneys in the Slauson matter e-mailed Judge Freedman about the delay in ruling on October 16, 2003, and he responded on the following day, October 17, 2003. The attorneys wrote again to request a ruling on December 15, 2003, and again on February 11, 2004. Though the evidence is equivocal whether and when Judge Freedman received the letters sent in December and February, we find based on his testimony that he personally responded to the attorney's e-mail in October 2003, and responded again to an e-mail followup on April 7, 2004, promising a ruling in the matter as soon as possible. We find, as did the masters,[7] that at least in early October 2003, and again in April 2004, the evidence clearly and convincingly shows Judge Freedman had been reminded his ruling in the second Slauson matter was overdue. The matter remained undecided until October 13, 2004, 485 days overdue.

2. Count 1K (Nwokoro). On July 2, 2003, Judge Freedman took a matter in the Nwokoro case under submission. Judge Freedman did not decide the matter until September 7, 2004, 343 days overdue.

3. Count 1L (Morgan-Lincoln). On September 11, 2003, Judge Freedman took a matter in the Morgan-Lincoln case under submission. Judge Freedman decided the matter on August 22, 2004, 256 days overdue.

4. Count 1M (Levy). On November 25, 2003, Judge Freedman took a matter in the Levy case under submission. He did not decide it until November 3, 2004, 254 days overdue.

5. Count 1N (Mar/Dan). On December 16, 2003, Judge Freedman took a matter in the Mar/Dan case under submission. Judge Freedman did not decide the matter until August 26, 2004, 164 days overdue.

6. Count 1*O* (Bell). On December 22, 2003, following a court trial, the Bell case was submitted to Judge Freedman for decision. The matter was not decided by March 21, 2004, 90 days after submission. In April 2004, one of the parties, Beasley, wrote to Judge Freedman to request a ruling. Beasley wrote again about the ruling on May 3, 2004, and again on July 1, 2004. The evidence does not clearly and convincingly establish that Judge Freedman actually received or saw the letters sent before July 2004, but we find, based on Judge Freedman's admissions, that he received and reviewed Beasley's July 1, 2004 letter. Beasley also telephoned Judge Freedman's clerk several times to express frustration with the delay. Judge Freedman was aware from some of these communications that the case had been pending for a long period of time. Judge Freedman decided the matter on July 2, 2004, 194 days after submission, and one day after receiving Beasley's letter of July 1.

7. Count 1P (Kassoff). In the Kassoff case, Judge Freedman heard a matter and it was submitted to him for decision on January 8, 2004. He had not decided it by April 7, 2004, the 90th day after submission. The masters did not address the point in their report, but we find based on Judge Freedman's testimony and the documentary record that on June 6, 2004, one of the attorneys in the matter wrote to Judge Freedman about the status of the matter. The record does not establish when Judge Freedman saw the letter, but the evidence establishes he was aware of the matter by July 31, 2004, when he directed his clerk to set a hearing for August 2004, and to inform counsel that he expected to rule in August 2004. Judge Freedman decided the matter on August 31, 2004, 146 days overdue.

8. Count 1Q (Weaver). In the Weaver case, a matter was submitted to Judge Freedman for decision on March 16, 2004. Judge Freedman did not decide the matter until September 9, 2004, 87 days overdue.

9. Count 1R (Natnat). On March 17, 2004, a matter in the Natnat case was submitted to Judge Freedman. The 90th day after submission passed on June 15, 2004. At the hearing before the special masters, Judge Freedman testified he began work on the matter around August 11, 2004, when a second copy of briefing by one of the parties was filed at the court's request. Judge Freedman decided the matter on August 24, 2004, 70 days overdue.

10. Count 1S (Tibbs). On May 6, 2004, Judge Freedman heard a matter in the Tibbs case, and it was submitted to him for decision. He did not decide it until August 30, 2004, 26 days overdue.

11. Count 1T (Caswell). In the Caswell case, a matter was submitted to Judge Freedman for decision on May 18, 2004. He did not decide it until September 7, 2004, 20 days overdue.

12. Count 1U (Teixiera). On June 2, 2004, Judge Freedman heard a matter and it was submitted in the Teixiera case. He decided it on September 7, 2004, 7 days overdue.

In mid-to-late August 2004, then Presiding Judge Barbara Miller asked the lead research attorney to check the court's computerized docket and report to her on any cases that were under submission to the court's judges for more than 90 days. Judge Miller learned from the report she received that Judge Freedman had a number of overdue matters. On August 23, 2004, Judge Miller met with Judge Freedman and delivered a letter to him instructing him to decide the overdue matters and relieving him of his duties as supervising judge. The masters found Judge Freedman was contrite and apologetic at the meeting. Judge Miller also instructed Judge Freedman in the letter that if he did not self-report the delays to this commission, Judge Miller would make a report.

As we find, and the master's findings demonstrate, Judge Miller's warnings and instructions resulted in decisions in most of the delayed cases. Between the end of August 2004 and early November 2004, Judge Freedman decided all his overdue cases. On September 15, 2004, he self-reported to the commission, as requested by Judge Miller. Since then, Judge Freedman has not allowed any submitted matter to remain undecided for over 90 days.

Reasons for Delays

The reasons for Judge Freedman's decisional delays varied. The masters found that Judge Freedman simply failed to keep track of some of the charged matters, although the masters did not identify those matters. However, based on Judge Freedman's testimony, we find that he failed to keep track of the Alameda (count 1A), CSK (count 1D), Nwokoro (count 1K), Morgan-Lincoln (count 1L), Levy (count 1M), Mar/Dan (count 1N), Weaver (count 1Q), Natnat (count 1R), and Tibbs (count 1S) matters. We also find that before August 2004, despite the warnings by Judge McKinstry in 2001 and Judge Sheppard in late 2002, Judge Freedman failed to implement any meaningful tracking system to ensure he was aware of matters that he had under submission. He also failed to take advantage of the court's computerized case management system, DOMAIN,[8] a system with which he was very familiar and which was capable of generating a list of submitted matters that might have alerted him to his overdue matters. Apart from some testimony that the system was occasionally unreliable, no cogent explanation was offered why Judge Freedman did not effectively use this system to track his cases.

[8] DOMAIN is a computerized case management system that includes document imaging of all filed documents in Alameda County Superior Court cases. The system allowed judges (and others) to view images of filed documents from their computers. Court files can be accessed by party names or case numbers. At least by August 2004, and probably in 2002 and 2003, the DOMAIN system could be used by an individual Alameda County judge to access a list of all cases that judge had under submission awaiting rulings and the dates on which rulings were due. Judge Hernandez, the current presiding judge, testified that Judge Freedman "was unique in his ability to understand the DOMAIN technology component and the civil component and serve as the person to blend all of that together."

(7) In other instances of delay charged in count 1, the delays were fostered at least in part by Judge Freedman's erroneous belief that some matters were not submitted to him until certain tasks he alone had in mind were performed. Under the rules of court, a matter is submitted when either of the following first occurs: (1) the court orders it submitted, or (2) the date a final paper is filed or argument is heard, whichever is later. (Cal. Rules of Court, rule 2.900 [former rule 825].) The masters identify one such matter, Bellamy (count 1C), in which Judge Freedman ordered the matter taken under submission at the hearing on the matter, but which he believed would not be truly under submission until he had completed additional unspecified post-hearing tasks. Based on Judge Freedman's testimony, it appears in addition that Judge Freedman erroneously believed that the Contra Costa (count 1F), BART (count 1G), Slauson (count 1H), Willard (count 1J), and Natnat (count 1R) matters were not submitted to him on the submission dates found by the masters. The masters considered and rejected Judge Freedman's explanation of his understanding of the dates of submission, and we adopt their findings.

The masters also found that in some instances, Judge Freedman knew the delayed matters had been pending for long periods of time, but simply failed to act on them within 90 days of submission. The masters identified the Bell (count 1*O*) and Slauson (count 1H [second delay]) matters as instances in which Judge Freedman was reminded at some point by counsel or parties that the matters were pending, but still failed to act on them. We adopt those findings, and based on our own review of evidence, also include Kassoff (count 1P) in this category.

(8) Judge Freedman explained that in some instances his other commitments interfered with his ability to decide pending matters. It is undisputed in these proceedings that Judge Freedman was an active participant in numerous voluntary administrative activities with both the Alameda County Superior Court and the statewide Judicial Council. He was chair of the superior court's Information Technology Committee, a member of the Judicial Council's Civil and Small Claims Advisory Committee, the co-chair of a statewide group working on rules for temporary judges, and participated in other activities that took him away from his regularly assigned courtroom duties. While these activities may be laudable in the abstract, they do not excuse or mitigate his failure to attend to his first duty, to resolve the matters brought before him for judicial decision. (See Cal. Code Jud. Ethics, canon 3A [judicial duties prescribed by law to take precedence over all other matters]; id., canon 3B(1) (9) [judges to hear and decide all matters assigned to them].) To the extent

Judge Freedman was distracted from his duty by these activities after he had been chastised by Judge McKinstry, they tend to aggravate rather than mitigate his misconduct.

In sum, we find that Judge Freedman failed to timely decide matters pending before him in 21 of the 23 instances charged in count 1 of the Notice. We also find that after 2001, despite warnings and offers of assistance from Presiding Judge McKinstry in 2001, and further warnings from Presiding Judge Sheppard in 2003, Judge Freedman failed to take appropriate action to monitor and track his caseload to avoid additional delay, and failed to adjust his workload in ways that could have helped him timely resolve the matters he had under submission.

B. Count 1—Conclusions of Law

(10) We conclude, as the masters did, that Judge Freedman's persistent and repeated failure over a four-year period to decide the matters charged and proved in count 1 within 90 days of submission was prejudicial misconduct. We adopt the masters' conclusions that Judge Freedman's delays violated canons 3A and 3B(8) of the California Code of Judicial Ethics. Canon 3A provides the "judicial duties prescribed by law shall take precedence over all other activities of every judge." Canon 3B(8) requires that "[a] judge shall dispose of all judicial matters fairly, promptly, and efficiently."

In addition, we conclude independently that Judge Freedman's conduct violated canons 1 and 2A of the California Code of Judicial Ethics as well. Canon 1 requires judges to "participate in establishing, maintaining, and enforcing high standards of conduct," and requires they "personally observe those standards so that the integrity and independence of the judiciary will be preserved." Canon 1 is intended in part to preserve public confidence in the judiciary, and violations of the Code of Judicial Ethics "diminish public confidence in the judiciary and thereby do injury to the system of government under law." (Advisory Com. com., 23 pt. 4 West's Ann. Cal. Codes, Court Rules (2006) foll. canon 1, p. 341.) Canon 2A provides that a judge shall "respect and comply with the law and shall act at all times in a manner that promotes public confidence in the integrity and impartiality of the judiciary." Judge Freedman's persistent and unjustified failure to rule in numerous cases, sometimes for long periods of time and after he had been counseled about excessive delay by two presiding judges, fell well below the high standards of conduct expected of the judiciary, and injured public confidence in the judiciary.

(11) The evidence amply supports the masters' conclusion that Judge Freedman's persistent, unjustified, and repeated failure to decide the matters submitted to him as charged in count 1 constitutes prejudicial misconduct. It is established that substantial and persistent failure to rule on submitted matters without substantial justification "may well cause criticism and bring the judicial office into disrepute." (Mardikian, supra, 40 Cal.3d at pp. 482, 485; see also In re Creede (1986) 42 Cal.3d 1098, 1099 [233 Cal.Rptr. 1, 729 P.2d 79]; In re McCullough (1987) 43 Cal.3d 534, 535 [236 Cal.Rptr. 151, 734 P.2d 987].) In several of the delayed cases, litigants directly pointed out to Judge Freedman that the delays were actually or potentially harming their interests, and requested decisions. Judges are employed by the state to decide cases; when they fail to do so without substantial justification, their failure tends to cast the judicial office into disrepute and to lower public esteem for the judiciary. We adopt the masters' conclusion that the 21 decisional delays charged and proven in count 1 were prejudicial misconduct.

C. Count 2—Findings of Fact

In count 2, Judge Freedman was charged with submitting an unspecified number of false salary affidavits at unspecified times during the periods June 2000 to April 2001, August 2002 to February 2003, June 2003 to August 2004, and October 2004. The periods in which Judge Freedman is charged with submitting false affidavits correspond to the times the matters charged in count 1 were delayed. As noted, the findings on the two counts overlap.

The masters found, as do we, that Judge Freedman regularly signed and submitted false salary affidavits during the three periods of delay alleged and proven in count 1. This finding is based on Judge Freedman's testimony he regularly signed and submitted monthly state and biweekly county affidavits during the three periods of delay alleged and proven in count 1.

In view of the broad language of the Notice, it is arguable these findings are sufficient to sustain the charge and the master's conclusion that Judge Freedman committed prejudicial misconduct. However, because we believe these findings alone are insufficient to explain the result we reach in this case, we find the following facts were also established by clear and convincing evidence.

Alameda County judges receive salary payments in part from both the State of California and Alameda County (county). The county makes salary payments every two weeks, the state once a month. To get paid by the county, Judge Freedman had to submit salary affidavit forms to the county (the county affidavits). The county affidavit form stated that the signer had no "causes" then pending that had been under submission for more than 90 days. Judge Freedman typically received the county affidavit forms for signature a few days before the end of the pay period they covered, and signed them on the same day they were presented to him, near the end of the pay period. The county affidavit form provided blanks in which the signer was to enter the ending date of the subject pay period and the date of signature. The form stated that the form was required to be completed pursuant to the constitutional and statutory provisions requiring judges to decide submitted matters within 90 days or forgo their salaries. However, the county form did not include any statement that the declaration was made under penalty of perjury or other form of affirmation that the content of the document was true.

The state affidavit form required the judge to declare under penalty of perjury that "no cause remains pending and undetermined that has been submitted to me in said court for decision for the period of ninety days prior to the first day of ___, (year)." Judge Freedman typically postdated the form, that is, he filled in the blank for the ending date of the period with a date about 30 days after the affidavit was signed. For example, in a state salary affidavit he signed around August 1, 2004 (a time when he had numerous delayed cases), Judge Freedman attested under penalty of perjury that "no cause remains pending and undetermined that has been submitted to me in said court for decision for the period of ninety days prior to the first day of September 1, 2004."

We find there is clear and convincing evidence that at specific points, Judge Freedman was aware from contemporaneous reminders and requests that he had delayed matters pending, and during those times, continued to execute state and county salary affidavits. In connection with count one, we found that Judge Freedman knew he had delayed matters pending for periods of time in Bell, Slauson (second delay), and Kassoff, based on reminders from counsel or parties. We further find he continued to sign salary affidavits during those periods of time. In addition, we find Judge Freedman signed salary affidavits at times he was aware of overdue matters in Alameda, Slauson (first delay), O'Toole, and Willard. In each of those matters, he signed at least one salary affidavit after being informed of the overdue matter by the presiding judge and before deciding the matter.

There is clear and convincing evidence that Judge McKinstry told Judge Freedman in mid-March 2001 of the delay in the Alameda matter, and gave him a list of overdue matters that included the Alameda matter. That matter was not resolved until April 16, 2001. Based on this evidence, we find Judge Freedman knew the Alameda matter was delayed from mid-March 2001 until he decided it on April 16, 2001. Judge Freedman nonetheless submitted a state salary affidavit dated March 30, 2001, and county affidavits shortly before March 31, 2001, and again shortly before April 14, 2001.

There is also clear and convincing evidence Judge Freedman executed false salary affidavits when he was aware he had delayed matters in the Slauson

(first delay), O'Toole, and Willard cases. Presiding Judge Sheppard informed Judge Freedman no later than January 4, 2003, that these matters were delayed. Judge Freedman signed a state affidavit within a few days of January 7, 2003. Willard was decided on January 15, 2003. Shortly before January 17, 2003, Judge Freedman signed a county affidavit. The Slauson and O'Toole matters were not decided until January 31, 2003, and February 7, 2003, respectively.

Notwithstanding clear and convincing evidence that Judge Freedman executed salary affidavits when he was aware that he had delayed matters pending, a question remains whether Judge Freedman was consciously aware he was making false statements at the moment he signed the affidavit. The masters accepted Judge Freedman's testimony that he was not consciously aware of the delayed matters when he signed the affidavits. We are troubled by this finding, and based on the cold record of the transcript of the hearing, we probably would not agree with it. However, the special masters appointed by the Supreme Court are experienced jurists, who had the advantage of seeing and hearing Judge Freedman testify. While this commission retains the authority to override the factual findings of the special masters, even on matters of credibility of witness testimony, we are mindful that the credibility findings of the masters may be given "special weight" where they are based on the masters' observations of the witnesses' demeanor at a hearing. (See, e.g., Broadman, supra, 18 Cal.4th at p. 1090.) As we discuss next, though, Judge Freedman's testimony shows a disconnect in his thinking that impels our conclusion he committed willful misconduct in those instances when there is clear and convincing evidence he had been informed of delayed matters prior to signing salary affidavits.

D. Count 2—Conclusions of Law

The masters concluded Judge Freedman's falsification of salary affidavits during the subject time periods violated canons 1 and 2A of the California Code of Judicial Ethics, and was prejudicial misconduct. They reasoned that because Judge Freedman was not thinking about whether he had overdue cases when he signed salary affidavits, and signed in a "rote, unthinking way," the evidence did not show "actual malice or that he acted recklessly or with utter indifference to the accuracy of the statements. . . ." The masters concluded that, at worst, Judge Freedman "should have known that the statements he was signing were inaccurate"; accordingly, under Broadman, such "mere negligence" could not be willful misconduct. (See Broadman, supra, 18 Cal.4th at p. 1092 [willful misconduct connotes something more than that the judge "should have known" better; "mere negligence" can never be willful misconduct].) The masters concluded there was a pervasive pattern of repeated prejudicial misconduct, regardless of the judge's state of mind.

We agree with the masters' conclusions except as to those specific instances in which we find that Judge Freedman executed salary affidavits at times when he was aware he had delayed matters. In those instances, we conclude he committed willful, not prejudicial, misconduct by signing the affidavits. Judge Freedman acknowledged that in some instances he continued to sign salary affidavits after being informed that a matter was delayed. He testified he was not thinking about those matters at the time he signed the affidavits, which he executed "by rote," "without thinking," and without "connect[ing] the dots" between the "time status" of his matters and the "process of signing salary affidavits." The masters relied on this testimony for their finding that Judge Freedman was not "consciously aware" of his delayed matters when he was signing salary affidavits. We conclude that this testimony establishes that Judge Freedman acted with utter indifference to whether the affidavits he executed were true or false.

In Broadman, the Supreme Court established that willful misconduct occurs not only when a judge, acting in a judicial capacity, intentionally acts unjudicially with a "corrupt purpose," but also when a judge acts with "reckless or utter indifference to whether judicial acts being performed exceed the bounds of the judge's prescribed power." (Broadman, supra, 18 Cal.4th at p. 1092.) Though the discussion in Broadman occurred in the context of an abuse of judicial authority, the principle expressed (that a reckless disregard of the law is equivalent to an intentional disregard of the law) applies with equal force to this situation, in which a judge has recklessly submitted false salary affidavits. Applying that principle, we conclude that Judge Freedman's utter disregard for the truth or falsity of salary affidavits he signed when he knew he had delayed matters pending satisfies the "bad faith" element of willful misconduct.[9]

Judge Freedman does not disagree that the submission of a false salary affidavit is prejudicial misconduct. He nonetheless argues count 2 was not proven, because there is no evidence he submitted any false "state and county salary affidavits," as charged in the Notice. We agree with the masters that this contention is without merit.

As to the county affidavits, Judge Freedman argues the charge was not proven because he did not execute the county affidavits under penalty of perjury, and therefore the documents cannot be "affidavits," as that term is defined by law and charged in the Notice. It is true the county form requires the signer to "declare" he or she has no cases under submission and pending for more than 90 days, but does not require any oath of any kind that the declaration is true.[10] We nonetheless emphatically reject this technical objection to the language of the Notice. The term "salary affidavit" is used in the Notice, and is in common usage among judges. It refers to the statements judges sign to get their salaries. It is a statement made in a judge's official capacity for the express purpose, stated by the document itself, of complying with the judicial salary provisions of the Constitution and the Government Code. Whether or not the statement is made under penalty of perjury, it is clearly and obviously unjudicial to falsify it. Moreover, Judge Freedman admitted in his answer that he had "executed state and county salary affidavits."

We also reject Judge Freedman's argument that the state affidavits were not proven to be "false." The state form requires the judge to declare under penalty of perjury: "no cause remains pending and undetermined that has been submitted to me in said court for decision for the period of ninety days prior to the first day of ___, (year)." Judge Freedman typically postdated the document to a date about 30 days after the affidavit was signed. Based on his practice of postdating the affidavits, Judge Freedman argues the examiner failed to prove his state affidavits were "false" because it is technically impossible to swear to the truth of a future state of events. This argument is without merit.

The Constitution prohibits a judge from being paid when the judge has delayed matters. If accepted, Judge Freedman's claim would mean a judge who has matters that are actually overdue could truthfully execute a state affidavit and obtain salary based on an unenforceable promise that the judge would be in compliance with the law by the time the affidavit was effective. The argument also implies that by making that promise successively, the same judge could continue to execute similar affidavits (and receive salary) indefinitely, without ever clearing his or her backlog of delayed cases. That position is both patently specious and contrary to the clear intent of the Constitution that judges who have overdue matters are not to be paid their salaries until they have decided them. (See, e.g., Meyers v. Kenfield (1881) 62 Cal. 512, 513–514 [construing Cal. Const., art. VI, former § 24].) Moreover, it is contrary to the general understanding among judges of the salary affidavit procedure. (See Rothman, Cal. Jud. Conduct Handbook, supra, § 6.19, p. 168 [advising judges that if they discover they have a case over 90 days, they must have submitted at least one false affidavit, and must not submit another until the case is decided].)

[10] Under the Code of Civil Procedure, an "affidavit" must be made "under oath" and must be taken before an officer authorized to administer oaths. (Code Civ. Proc., § 2003; see also Black's Law Dict. (7th ed. 1999) p. 58 ["affidavit" is a statement "sworn to by the declarant before an officer authorized to administer oaths"].)

(12) A judge who executes a salary affidavit affirming he or she has no overdue rulings should take care to ensure that the statement is true when it is made. There is no question Judge Freedman knew the law, for he signed the state and county affidavits for the express purpose of receiving his salary. It is unjudicial and damaging to the public esteem for judicial office for a judge to submit false statements to obtain salary to which the judge is not then entitled. We therefore reject Judge Freedman's technical arguments based on the form of his affidavits.

E. Count 3—Findings of Fact

The Notice charged in count 3 that in early 2004, Judge Freedman failed to rule timely on "over 200" fee waiver applications submitted by litigants in civil and family law matters in the Hayward branch of the Alameda County Superior Court. The Notice charged that as a result, in February 2005, the court refunded $9,984 in fees to litigants whose applications had been denied too late. The conduct alleged in count 3 is charged as violating canons 1, 2A, 3A and 3B(8) of the California Code of Judicial Ethics.

"Fee waiver applications" are applications by litigants to proceed with their court cases without paying the filing and other fees that are ordinarily charged by the superior courts. The procedure for proceeding in superior court without paying filing or other fees is provided for by the Government Code and the California Rules of Court. (Gov. Code, § 68511.3; Cal. Rules of Court, rule 3.50 et seq. [former rule 985].) The rule that applied in 2003 was former rule 985. Under that rule, a litigant who wanted to proceed without paying court fees had to file a standard Judicial Council application form. (Former rule 985(a).) The rule allowed the superior court to delegate the function of reviewing and granting the applications to the "court clerk," but only a judge could deny them. (Former rule 985(d).) In either case, if the judge or the clerk failed to rule on the application within five days of filing, the application was granted automatically. (Former rule 985(e).)

The masters found that Judge Freedman had failed to act in a timely fashion on "approximately 200 fee waiver applications." The finding was based on undisputed evidence that Judge Freedman had personally taken over the handling of fee waiver applications when he was assigned to be the supervising judge in Hayward in November 2003. He fell behind, and a "substantial number" of applications were denied after the five days for a ruling had elapsed. There were complaints from litigants, and Presiding Judge Miller ordered a refund to the litigants whose applications were denied late. More than $9,000 was refunded pursuant to the order. These findings were supported by Judge Freedman's testimony before the masters. Finally, it was uncontradicted the late denials caused "irate" litigants to complain, and that the complaints caused Presiding Judge Miller to order fee refunds. We adopt the masters' findings.

F. Count 3—Conclusions of Law

Based on their findings of fact, the masters concluded Judge Freedman's conduct violated canons 3A (judicial duties to take precedence over other matters) and 3B(8) (judge to dispose of matters promptly) of the California Code of Judicial Ethics. We agree, and also find violations of canons 1 (independence and integrity of judiciary) and 2A (judges to respect and comply with the law so as to promote public confidence), for the same reasons we found violations of the same canons in connection with the delayed matters charged in count 1. (See pt. II.B. of the Discussion, ante, p. 240.) The number of applications that were improperly denied as the result of Judge Freedman's failure to act, combined with the adverse effect of the improper denials on the litigants and on the public's perception of the court, is enough to establish that Judge Freedman's actions were violations of his duty to follow the law and perform his judicial duties competently (canon 2A), and also would tend to adversely affect the public perception of the integrity of the judiciary (canon 1).

The masters also concluded Judge Freedman had committed prejudicial misconduct, because his conduct was "prejudicial to the public's esteem for the judicial office." We agree, and adopt the masters' conclusion. Judge Freedman's conduct was unjudicial because he (1) failed to rule timely on a substantial number of applications after taking responsibility to do so, and (2) even though the rules provided applications were to be automatically granted if they were not acted on within five days of filing, applications that Judge Freedman had not acted on timely were nonetheless denied. Superior court fees are a significant burden, especially to individual litigants of limited means. Such fees are also a significant source of revenue for the courts. An objective observer would tend to hold the judiciary in lower esteem if informed that a supervising judge of the superior court failed to act on over 200 applications for fee waivers, with the result those applications were automatically granted whether meritorious or not. Moreover, the same observer would have the same reaction upon learning the court had failed to follow the law, and had denied the applications even though the judge's inaction and the law required the court to grant them.[11]

[11] For the reasons stated in the text, we reject Judge Freedman's contention his conduct was at most improper action. Substantial and persistent failure to rule timely can be prejudicial misconduct, even though the delays do not cast doubt on the judge's independence or integrity. (Mardikian, supra, 40 Cal.3d at p. 485.)

III.

DISCIPLINE

A. Introduction

We turn now to the most difficult and individualized part of our decision, the determination of the discipline most appropriate to the facts and circumstances of the case before us. As we explain below, we find Judge Freedman has committed egregious and persistent misconduct which would warrant removal if considered alone. However, we have also considered Judge Freedman's otherwise exemplary performance as a jurist, the high esteem in which he is held by his peers and attorneys who appear before him, his acknowledgement of wrongdoing and acceptance of responsibility for his actions, and our perception that he is unlikely to offend again. Based on all the circumstances of this unusual case, we have determined to impose a severe public censure.

B. Analysis

(13) The commission has identified various factors that may be relevant when determining what discipline is appropriate in a given case. The factors are (1) the number of acts of misconduct; (2) the existence of prior discipline; (3) whether the judge appreciates the inappropriateness of his or her conduct; (4) the judge's integrity; (5) the likelihood of future misconduct; and (6) the impact of the misconduct on the judicial system. (Inquiry Concerning Ross (2005) No. 174, Decision and Order Removing Judge Ross from Office, pp. 63–64 [49 Cal.4th CJP Supp. 79, 137–138]; Inquiry Concerning Van Voorhis (2003) No. 165, Decision and Order Removing Judge Van Voorhis from Office, p. 31 [48 Cal.4th CJP Supp. 257, 295].) In the discussion that follows, we discuss each of the elements in turn, after which we review the decisions of the Supreme Court and this commission in cases that have involved allegations that judges unreasonably delayed their rulings and executed false salary affidavits.

1. Number of Acts of Misconduct.

(14) The number of acts of misconduct is relevant to discipline to the extent it shows isolated incidents, or a pattern of misbehavior that demonstrates that the judge lacks judicial temperament and the " ' "ability to perform judicial functions in an even-handed manner." ' " (Fletcher v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1998) 19 Cal.4th 865, 918 [81 Cal.Rptr.2d 58, 968 P.2d 958] [pervasiveness of misconduct over the judge's entire career demonstrated unfitness for office].) We have found numerous instances of prejudicial and willful misconduct. Judge Freedman delayed rulings in 21 instances between 2001 and 2004, even after warnings from successive presiding judges. During that time, Judge Freedman rarely if ever stopped regularly executing salary affidavits. The pattern of wrongdoing is further exacerbated by the judge's widespread failure to rule on fee waiver applications. This pattern of disturbing and pervasive misconduct warrants severe discipline.

2. Prior Discipline.

Judge Freedman was issued an advisory letter in 1998 for failing to timely substitute out of a matter as counsel before he was appointed to the bench. There is no other evidence of prior discipline by the commission. We attribute little significance to this prior discipline. It came early in Judge Freedman's career as a judge, the misconduct involved was not of the same kind or gravity as the misconduct presented here, and it does not have direct bearing on Judge Freedman's fitness to continue to serve on the bench. (Cf., e.g., Inquiry Concerning Velasquez (2007) No. 180, Decision and Order Removing Judge Velasquez from Office, p. 44 [49 Cal.4th CJP Supp. 175, 216] [finding public censure inadequate remedy for current misconduct in view of judge's record of prior serious discipline, including previous public censure].)

Despite Judge Freedman's lack of prior relevant discipline, it is significant that before this proceeding began, Judge Freedman had been counseled by presiding judges about delayed matters and nonetheless twice allowed the problem to recur. He was specifically warned in writing in 2001 by Judge McKinstry of his duty to submit truthful salary affidavits, but continued to execute affidavits "without thinking." (Cf. Inquiry Concerning Van Voorhis, supra, No. 165, at pp. 38–39 [48 Cal.4th CJP Supp. at pp. 303–304] [judge had been counseled by presiding judge regarding his demeanor, but then resumed the same or similar misconduct within several weeks].)

3. Whether the Judge Appreciates the Inappropriateness of His Conduct.

(15) A judge's lack of appreciation of misconduct and failure to recognize and admit impropriety are indications that a judge lacks the capacity to reform. (See, e.g., Inquiry Concerning Velasquez, supra, No. 180, at p. 45 [49 Cal.4th CJP Supp. at p. 218].) Judge Freedman's testimony indicates he understands the nature of his wrongdoing, and recognizes its impropriety. He testified he should have kept track of his cases and should have considered whether he had overdue cases when he signed salary affidavits, but did not do either. In addition, the evidence shows Judge Freedman worked to eliminate his delayed cases when they were brought to his attention in 2001, 2003 and 2004, and expressed regret for his conduct in his interview with Judge Miller in 2004. Judge Freedman admitted most but not all of the charges against him. We believe Judge Freedman appreciates the nature and extent of the misconduct, and has acknowledged the errors he has committed.

4. The Judge's Integrity.

The masters found, as do we, that "[i]t is clear Judge Freedman is respected as a thoughtful, intelligent, compassionate, and hard-working jurist." That finding is supported by the testimony of numerous judges and attorneys, including Judges Sheppard, Miller, and Hernandez, all of whom served as presiding judges over Judge Freedman and who testified to his good character, industry, and value to the bench.

The substance of the testimony of the two former presiding judges and the present presiding judge of the superior court in which Judge Freedman sits has significant persuasive value. Judge Hernandez, the current presiding judge, testified to his complete confidence in Judge Freedman. Judge Sheppard testified to Judge Freedman's contributions to the superior court bench, to his work ethic, and to his extraordinary competence as a judge. Judge Miller testified to his contributions to the court, her "enormous" respect for his judgment, and his productive work for the court. Numerous attorneys, including nine who were counsel in delayed matters, testified or submitted declarations in support of Judge Freedman. Attorneys described him as "intelligent and thoughtful," "respectful and fair," "hardworking," and "an excellent judge."

Apart from the misconduct charged in this matter, there is no evidence that Judge Freedman lacks integrity, and there is strong evidence of his good qualities as a trial court judge. The esteem of his peers and his overall competence, work ethic, and superior ability, suggest that he is capable of reform, and that his removal from office is not necessary to protect the public. (See Doan v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 11 Cal.4th at p. 314; Kennick v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1990) 50 Cal.3d 297, 341 [267 Cal.Rptr. 293, 787 P.2d 591].)

5. Likelihood of Future Misconduct.

The evidence supports the conclusion that Judge Freedman is not likely to commit misconduct in the future. His testimony before the special masters and his remarks to this commission in argument indicate that he now understands how serious his misconduct was. He admitted most of the charges almost entirely. When he explained his conduct, he acknowledged that his reasons for acting as he did were incorrect or based on an incorrect view of the law. Since 2004, Judge Freedman has been entrusted with significant new judicial responsibility, and no further misconduct has occurred. The evidence strongly establishes his value as a public servant. In our view Judge Freedman does not pose an ongoing threat to the public.

6. Impact on the Judicial System.

Judge Freedman's misconduct is grave, and has had an obvious and palpable adverse impact on the public's perception of the integrity of the judiciary and on the administration of justice. We believe an objective observer would be shocked and angered that Judge Freedman repeatedly signed salary affidavits without thinking, "by rote," and with reckless disregard for the truth of the statements he was making. Moreover, his numerous and sometimes lengthy decisional delays harmed individual litigants and had an adverse impact on the administration of justice in Alameda County.

History of Public and Private Discipline in Cases Involving Delay and False Salary Affidavits.

Judge Freedman urges that removal from office in this case would be a significant departure from the treatment of misconduct of similar character in prior discipline cases. As he points out, in these past cases, on the varying facts presented, neither the Supreme Court nor this commission has found the misconduct so egregious as to warrant removal from office.

For example, in In re McCullough, supra, 43 Cal.3d at page 535, the Supreme Court considered a recommendation by this commission for censure based on the judge's failure to timely decide cases. Judge McCullough failed to timely decide "a case submitted to his court for a period of three years, nine months," despite repeated reminders from the parties and three private admonishments from this commission. (Ibid.) He also "continued to execute salary affidavits and to receive his salary even though submitted cases remained pending and undecided in his court for periods in excess of 90 days." (Ibid.) The Supreme Court agreed with the commission's conclusion that Judge McCullough's "failure to promptly decide cases, despite private admonishments and inquiries from the commission and the parties, and his disregard of California law in executing salary affidavits and in receiving his salary, was 'conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute.' " (Ibid.) The Supreme Court adopted the commission's recommendation for censure without further comment on the facts.

Other Supreme Court cases have reached similar results on similar facts. (See Mardikian, supra, 40 Cal.3d at pp. 478–479 [hardworking and overworked judge had numerous significant and unjustified delays and submitted salary affidavits during periods of delay up to a year, despite repeated communications with this commission about delayed matters; censured for prejudicial misconduct]; In re Jensen (1978) 24 Cal.3d 72, 73 [154 Cal.Rptr. 503, 593 P.2d 200] [judge who unjustifiably delayed rulings and "nevertheless" submitted salary affidavits that inaccurately said he did not was censured]; In re Creede, supra, 42 Cal.3d at p. 1099 [judge censured for delays over a five-year period and execution of "erroneous" salary affidavits, with a finding that the judge did not knowingly falsify the affidavits].)

The commission's public disciplinary decisions are similar. For example, in 1998, we publicly admonished a judge for seven-month and 13-month delays in two civil matters.* (Public Admonishment of Judge Robert H. Oliver (1998).) The admonishment noted that Judge Oliver also had executed sworn salary declarations stating he had no delayed cases during the periods of the delayed matters, some after he received reminders that one of the cases was overdue. In 1995, a judge stipulated to a public reproval for delaying cases, and the commission noted in its public statement that the judge had continued to execute salary affidavits during a period of delay of over a year. (Public Reproval of Judge Thomas Breen (1995).)

(16) Judge Freedman contends we should not remove him from office because no other judge has yet been removed for the same or similar misconduct. We emphatically reject that proposition and will not limit the scope of discipline to be imposed in future cases involving similar misconduct. (See, e.g., Broadman, supra, 18 Cal.4th at p. 1112 [proportionality review is "neither required nor determinative"].)

Our determination of the appropriate sanction to impose on Judge Freedman is not predetermined by prior decisions in which judges were not removed from office for delay and falsification of salary affidavits, any more than it is appropriate for us to ignore all that has gone before. (See, e.g., Furey v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1987) 43 Cal.3d 1297, 1318 [240 Cal.Rptr. 859, 743 P.2d 919] [though each case turns on its facts, it is "worth comparing" other judicial discipline cases]; see also, e.g., Inquiry Concerning Hall (2006) No. 175, Decision and Order Removing Judge Hall from Office, pp. 26–28 [49 Cal.4th CJP Supp. 146, 170–172] [reviewing precedent in consideration of discipline].) We consider those prior decisions as a factor in our ultimate decision to censure Judge Freedman.

*Reporter's Note: The original decision incorrectly referred to the two delayed matters in the Public Admonishment of Judge Robert H. Oliver as civil cases. They were both criminal matters.

ORDER

(17) Judge Freedman has committed serious misconduct that taken alone might warrant removal from office. However, he is a respected and talented jurist who was strongly supported in this proceeding by a significant number of attorneys and colleagues, including two former presiding judges and the present presiding judge of the court in which he sits. Two of those former presiding judges were called as witnesses by the examiner, and testified not only to their high opinion of Judge Freedman and their confidence in him, but to facts that support this decision to censure him. Counsel for parties in a number of the delayed matters supported Judge Freedman in these proceedings and testified that they would not hesitate to appear before him in future cases. Other than the subject misconduct, there was no evidence presented that called Judge Freedman's abilities as a jurist or his suitability for the bench into question. Judge Freedman has not been the subject of any relevant prior discipline, he has acknowledged his wrongdoing and is contrite, and we are satisfied he is unlikely to offend again. For those reasons, and after careful consideration of the unique circumstances of this case, we have determined to issue this severe public censure of Judge Robert B. Freedman.

Commission members Hon. Frederick P. Horn, Hon. Judith D. McConnell, Hon. Katherine Feinstein, Ms. Patricia Miller, Ms. Barbara Schraeger, and Mr. Lawrence Simi voted in favor of all the findings and conclusions expressed herein and in the foregoing order of severe public censure of Judge Freedman. Mr. Jose C. Miramontes voted for removal. Mr. Marshall B. Grossman and Mr. Michael A. Kahn did not participate. There are two vacancies on the commission.

| INQUIRY CONCERNING JUDGE CHRISTOPHER J. SHELDON,No. 186 | DECISION AND ORDER IMPOSING PUBLIC CENSURE PURSUANT TO STIPULATION (Commission Rule 127) |

I. INTRODUCTION AND SUMMARY

This disciplinary matter concerns Judge Christopher J. Sheldon, a judge of the Riverside County Superior Court. On January 12, 2009, the commission filed its Notice of Formal Proceedings (Notice) against Judge Sheldon in which it charges him with misconduct in routinely leaving the courthouse for the day before noon and after the conclusion of his dependency calendar without receiving authorization for his half-day absences and without notifying his supervising judges.

The Supreme Court appointed three special masters to hold an evidentiary hearing and to report to the commission. The masters are Hon. Stuart R. Pollak, Associate Justice of the Court of Appeal, First Appellate District, Division Three; Hon. Bradley L. Boeckman; Judge of the Shasta County Superior Court, and Hon. Joyce M. Cram, Judge of the Contra Costa County Superior Court. Prior to the masters holding an evidentiary hearing, however, Judge Sheldon and his counsel, Reg A. Vitek, Esq., and Heather L. Rosing, Esq., and the examiner for the commission, Andrew Blum, Esq., (the parties) proposed a stipulated resolution of this inquiry to the commission, as follows.

By Stipulation for Discipline by Consent (Stipulation), executed by the parties on March 18, 2009, the parties proposed pursuant to Commission Rule 127(b) that this inquiry concerning Judge Sheldon be resolved with the imposition of a public censure based on the agreed stipulated facts and conclusions of law as set forth in this decision, and with Judge Sheldon's agreement to tender his irrevocable resignation from judicial office in writing to the Governor of California, said resignation to be effective October 23, 2009, and to not preside over any judicial proceedings as of May 12, 2009. From May 12, 2009 until October 23, 2009, Judge Sheldon will be on leave from the bench approved by his presiding judge. According to the terms of the Stipulation, Judge Sheldon has agreed that he shall not at any time seek or hold judicial office in California, whether by election or appointment, and shall not seek or accept judicial assignment, appointment or reference of work from any California state court. Judge Sheldon also agreed that in its decision and order imposing a censure, the commission may articulate the reasons for its decision.

In connection with the Stipulation, Judge Sheldon executed the requisite Affidavit of Consent (Affidavit) under rule 127(d) in which he admitted the truth of the stipulated facts, consented to the imposition of a censure, and waived review by the California Supreme Court.

The proposed agreement, consisting of the Stipulation and Affidavit, was approved by the commission on March 23, 2009. This Decision and Order, and the findings and conclusions set forth herein, are based on the Stipulation and Affidavit.

II. STIPULATED FACTS AND LEGAL CONCLUSIONS

Judge Sheldon served on the Riverside County Municipal Court from October 21, 1989 to January 21, 1992, and was appointed to the Riverside County Superior Court on January 23, 1992.

Judge Sheldon has been assigned to the juvenile dependency department in Indio since August 2005. The dependency calendar routinely concludes before noon. Since early 2007 through late 2008,[1] Judge Sheldon routinely left the courthouse for the day after the calendar concluded. Judge Sheldon did not inform his supervising judges of his routine absences during court hours, and did not seek or receive authorization for these half-day absences. On occasion, the juvenile delinquency judge in Indio handled ex parte dependency matters due to Judge Sheldon's afternoon absences. Judge Sheldon generally did not seek to make himself available for other judicial work during these absences.

Judge Sheldon's conduct violated the Code of Judicial Ethics, canons 1 (failing to observe high standards of conduct), 2A (failing to act at all times in a manner that promotes public confidence in the judiciary), and 3C(1) (failure to diligently discharge administrative responsibilities and to cooperate with other judges and court officials in the administration of court business) and constituted prejudicial misconduct. Judge Sheldon's failure to seek or to receive authorization for his half-day absences also violated California Rules of Court, rule 10.608(3).

Judge Sheldon received a public admonishment in 1998 for his conduct in handling his misdemeanor pretrial calendar from July 1995 to March 1996. Judge Sheldon frequently failed to take the bench or left the bench during portions of this calendar. He allowed the clerks to enter pleas and execute documents imposing sentence in his absence, and to stamp his signature on constitutional rights waiver forms. On occasion, Judge Sheldon left the courthouse or would jog on a courthouse staircase during his pretrial calendar. The commission found that

[1] Judge Sheldon disputes the allegation in the Notice of Formal Proceedings that he routinely left the courthouse "[s]ince approximately January 2006," but admits that he routinely left from early 2007 through late 2008. Since the precise dates would not affect the parties' recommendation as to discipline, the parties stipulated to the dates admitted by Judge Sheldon. The commission agrees that this change does not affect the determination of the appropriate level of discipline. In the commission's view, Judge Sheldon's practice of working short days warrants the discipline imposed in this decision, regardless of whether he started leaving the courthouse in early 2006 or 2007.

Judge Sheldon's handling of his pretrial calendar violated canons 1, 2A, 3A, 3B(1) and 4A(3).

III. DISCIPLINE

Article VI, section 18, subsection (d) of the California Constitution provides that the commission may "censure a judge . . . for action . . . that constitutes . . . conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute." Judge Sheldon concedes that he engaged in prejudicial misconduct.

The purpose of a commission disciplinary proceeding is not punishment, "but rather the protection of the public, the enforcement of rigorous standards of judicial conduct, and the maintenance of public confidence in the integrity . . . of the judicial system." (Broadman v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1998) 18 Cal.4th 1079, 1112, citing Adams v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1995) 10 Cal.4th 866, 912.) The commission believes that this purpose is best served by the discipline proposed in the Stipulation: a public censure with an agreement that Judge Sheldon will resign and will not at any time seek or hold judicial office or seek or accept judicial assignment.

By regularly absenting himself from the courtroom before noon without the approval of his supervising judges for a period of almost two years, Judge Sheldon has demonstrated a flagrant disregard for his obligations to his fellow judges, the public, and the reputation of the judiciary. A judge's responsibilities are not limited to the completion of the daily calendar. Judges who conclude their calendars early in the day may be assigned other duties, including presiding over cases other courts are unable to handle due to time limitations or disqualification and handling ex parte motions. Unapproved absences can have a significant impact on the operation of the court, especially in a county such as Riverside with a longstanding and well-publicized backlog of court cases.

California Rules of Court, rule 10.608(3) requires that a judge request "approval of the presiding judge for any intended absence of one-half day or more, within a reasonable time before the intended absence." Judge Sheldon concedes that he violated his administrative duty under this rule by failing to seek approval for his regular half-day absences. Canon 3C(1) requires a judge to diligently discharge administrative responsibilities and to cooperate with other judges and court officials in the administration of court business. As this canon makes clear, "administrative duties must be discharged with the same diligence as adjudicative duties." (Ryan v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1988) 45 Cal.3d 518, 546.) In Ryan v. Commission on Judicial Performance, the Supreme Court determined that Judge Ryan's practice of leaving the courthouse the moment his adjudicative duties were completed, usually in the early afternoon, violated the Code of Judicial Ethics and constituted prejudicial misconduct. (Id. at pp. 545-546.)

Public confidence in the integrity of the judiciary is seriously undermined when a judge routinely leaves the courthouse early without approval. Taxpayers of the State of California have a right to expect that judges are available to provide the services for which they are paid. As stated by Judge Rothman, "The public does not owe judges extra time off, or anything other than what the law allows, in gratitude for the hard work judges must expend." (Rothman, California Judicial Conduct Handbook, (3d ed. 2007) § 6.11, p. 265). Judge Sheldon's routine of working part-time while being paid a full-time salary is utterly unacceptable and casts disrepute upon the judicial office.

Judge Sheldon's misconduct is made even more egregious by the fact that he was publicly admonished in 1998 for conduct including abandonment of his judicial responsibilities. In that disciplinary matter, the commission found that Judge Sheldon abdicated certain adjudicatory responsibilities to his clerk, and left the courthouse or jogged on the courthouse stairs during his pretrial calendar.

Unfortunately, the issuance of a public admonishment did not deter Judge Sheldon from abandoning his judicial responsibilities in the future.

The commission concludes that acceptance of the Stipulation to a public censure, which includes Judge Sheldon's agreement to tender his irrevocable resignation from judicial office and to not thereafter seek or hold judicial office or seek or accept judicial assignment, is in the best interest of the public. The agreement in the Stipulation, which provides that the judge's resignation will be effective October 23, 2009, and that he will take approved leave from the bench as of May 12, 2009, affords protection to the public in the most expeditious manner by avoiding the delay of further proceedings. Accordingly, the commission hereby censures Judge Christopher J. Sheldon.

| IN THE MATTER CONCERNING FORMER COMMISSIONER ANN DOBBS | DECISION AND ORDER IMPOSING PUBLIC CENSURE AND BAR PURSUANT TO STIPULATION (Commission Rule 116.5) |

This disciplinary matter concerns Ann Dobbs, a former commissioner of the Los Angeles County Superior Court. Former Commissioner Dobbs retired from the court on October 31, 2007. Former Commissioner Dobbs and her counsel, Heather L. Rosing, Esq., have stipulated pursuant to commission rule 116.5 to the imposition of a public censure and bar prohibiting former Commissioner Dobbs from seeking or holding judicial office, or accepting a position or an assignment as a judicial officer, subordinate judicial officer or judge pro tem with any court in the state of California, or accepting a reference of work from any California state court, at any time in the future. The Stipulation for Imposition of Censure and Bar (Stipulation) was approved by the commission on June 24, 2009, pursuant to the following terms and conditions as set forth in the Stipulation.

TERMS AND CONDITIONS OF STIPULATION

1. The Stipulation resolves the preliminary investigation out of which the preliminary investigation letter of December 10, 2008, arose.

2. The commission has jurisdiction over the matter pursuant to article VI, section 18.1, of the California Constitution. The allegations before the commission are sufficiently serious to warrant the institution of formal proceedings pursuant to that section of the Constitution.

3. The settlement provided by this agreement is in the best interests of both the commission and Ms. Dobbs because, among other reasons, it adequately protects the public and will avoid the delay and costs of formal proceedings.

4. The commission shall issue a censure and bar based on the agreed Stipulated Facts and Legal Conclusions set forth herein.

5. Ms. Dobbs resigned from her position as a court commissioner with the Los Angeles County Superior Court on October 31, 2007.

6. Ms. Dobbs shall not seek or hold judicial office, or accept a position or assignment as a judicial officer, subordinate judicial officer or judge pro tem with any court in the State of California, or accept a reference of work from any California state court, at any time in the future.

7. If Ms. Dobbs fails to comply with any of the terms and conditions of this agreement, the commission may withdraw the censure and bar and resume its investigation. Failure to comply with the terms and conditions of this agreement will constitute additional and independent grounds for discipline.

8. The commission may disclose to the State Bar of California all or any part of the information provided to the commission by the Los Angeles County Superior Court, and all or any part of the additional information obtained through the commission's preliminary investigation in this matter.

9. Ms. Dobbs waives any further proceedings and review in this matter, including any further response to either preliminary investigation letter (commission rule 111(a)), formal proceedings (commission rule 118, et seq.), and review by the California Supreme Court (Cal. Rules of Court, rule 9.60).

10. The commission may articulate the reasons for its decision in its decision and order imposing censure and bar.

STIPULATED FACTS AND LEGAL CONCLUSIONS

Ann Dobbs was a commissioner in the Family Law Department of the Los Angeles County Superior Court from March 2001 until October 31, 2007, when she retired. Commissioner Dobbs failed to decide numerous cases in a timely manner. In California, judicial officers are expected to decide cases within 90 days of the date they are taken under submission. When Commissioner Dobbs retired in 2007, 15 cases over which she had presided had been under submission for over 90 days without her having decided them, and another 14 cases that she had under submission for less than 90 days had not been decided. Commissioner Dobbs never decided any of these cases.

Under California law, judges are expected to decide matters submitted to them within 90 days of submission and are prohibited from receiving a salary while any cause remains "pending and undetermined for 90 days after it has been submitted for decision." (Cal. Const., art. VI, § 19; Mardikian v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1985) 40 Cal.3d 473, 477, fn. 4.) While the 90-day period is not absolute, it has been used by the commission as a benchmark for determining delay in submitted cases. (See Decision and Order Imposing Public Censure on Judge Robert B. Freedman (2007) and Decision and Order Removing Judge Robert G. Spitzer From Office (2007).) Canon 3B(8) of the California Code of Judicial Ethics requires judges, including commissioners, to dispose of all judicial matters "fairly, promptly, and efficiently." The Advisory Committee commentary to canon 3B(8) states that a judge "should monitor and supervise cases so as to reduce or eliminate dilatory practices, avoidable delays, and unnecessary costs," and requires judges to be "expeditious in determining matters under submission." The commission has stated that inordinate delay in deciding cases is unacceptable in all cases, but a judge's failure to decide family law matters can be particularly egregious in light of the harm to the parties caused thereby. (Public Reproval of Judge Thomas P. Breen (1995).)

When Commissioner Dobbs was hired in 2001, the Los Angeles County Superior Court had a tracking system in place whereby reports were generated at the end of each month showing the cases each bench officer had under submission between 30 and 60 days, between 60 and 90 days, and for more than 90 days. These reports were, and still are, given to all bench officers of the Los Angeles County Superior Court each month.

Between 2003 and 2007, Commissioner Dobbs's cases appeared in the 30-60-day and 60-90-day categories of the Cases Under Submission reports. Some of her cases were under submission for more than 90 days during that period.

At various times in 2006 and 2007, Commissioner Dobbs prepared the case status information for the cases under submission list herself, rather than allowing her courtroom clerk to do so. At times, her reporting did not accurately reflect the status of all of the cases she had under submission. Some cases Commissioner Dobbs had taken under submission never appeared on the Cases Under Submission reports, including some cases that were undecided for more than 90 days.

Between 2006 and 2007, the court transferred some of Commissioner Dobbs's newly assigned matters each week to another judge. Over the course of that period, a total of 354 cases were transferred. Commissioner Dobbs still did not complete all of her submitted cases on time. On two occasions in 2007, Commissioner Dobbs was given one week off during which she was to complete her submitted cases. During that time off, she did not complete any submitted cases.

To implement the provision of the California Constitution prohibiting a judge from receiving a salary while any case remains undecided for 90 days after it has been submitted for decision, judges are required to execute an affidavit attesting that they have no case pending for more than 90 days in order to receive a salary. (Gov. Code § 68210.) Although Commissioner Dobbs was not a judge, salary affidavits were distributed to all Los Angeles County Superior Court commissioners with their paychecks or direct deposit notices for signature each month. Between 2002 and 2007, Commissioner Dobbs did not sign any salary affidavits. The court did not realize until after her retirement that she had not been signing salary affidavits.

In 2007, Commissioner Dobbs's supervising judge sent her three complaints from family law litigants about her delays. Tracy Harris complained to the court on June 11, 2007, about Commissioner Dobbs's delay of nearly five years in ruling on her case. Commissioner Dobbs's supervising judge sent the Harris complaint to Commissioner Dobbs for her response on June 28, 2007. Suzanne Lynch complained to the court on August 13, 2007, about Commissioner Dobbs's delay of eleven months in ruling on her case. Commissioner Dobbs's supervising judge sent the Lynch complaint to Commissioner Dobbs for her response on September 5, 2007. Julia (Bandrapalli) Stokes complained on September 28, 2007, about Commissioner Dobbs's delay of six months in entering judgment on her case. Commissioner Dobbs's supervising judge sent the Bandrapalli complaint to Commissioner Dobbs for her response on October 12, 2007. While Commissioner Dobbs acknowledged her receipt of the complaints to her supervising judge, she failed to respond to the allegations in the three complaints.

When Commissioner Dobbs retired in October 2007, she agreed to complete work on undecided cases at home. Commissioner Dobbs took approximately 30 undecided cases home with her. Of the cases Commissioner Dobbs took home with her, the following 15 had been under submission for over 90 days:

1. Allain (case no. BD 371793) submitted on March 1, 2006;
2. Bannan (case no. BD310701) submitted on June 26, 2005;
3. Beuerman (case no. BD055815) submitted on July 16, 2007;
4. Blackburn (case no. BD116967) submitted in February 2003 and September 2005;
5. Dvorin (case no. YD048141) submission date unclear; date vacated by minute order dated September 22, 2006 but no new submission date set;
6. Ellis (case no. BD319194) submitted on July 13, 2005;
7. Goldman (case no. BD407997) submitted on November 17, 2006;
8. Harris (case no. BD322099) submitted on March 23, 2005 and August 29, 2007;
9. Lynch (case no. BD364093) submitted on November 2, 2006;
10. Mullins (case no. BD383098) submitted on July 23, 2007;
11. Needleman (case no. BD393615) submitted on July 20, 2007;
12. Perez (case no. BD379993) submitted on March 27, 2007;
13. Polo (case no. BD391297) submitted on February 7, 2007;
14. Stott (case no. YD046723) date of submission unclear, probably soon after May 1, 2007;
15. Striff (case no. PD037298) submitted on January 22, 2007.

Of the cases Commissioner Dobbs took home with her, the following 14 had been under submission for less than 90 days:

1. Adger (case no. BD391595) submitted on October 17, 2007;
2. Allen (case no. BD448597) submitted on August 16, 2007;
3. Aronson (case no. BD420664) submitted on October 23, 2007;
4. Birdwell (case no. BF017596) submitted on September 14, 2007;
5. Cooper (case no. BF026368) submitted on August 2, 2007;
6. Di Paola (case no. BD377295) submitted on August 29, 2007;
7. Glassman (case no. BD240596) submitted on October 31, 2007;
8. Grifka (case no. BD413029) submitted on August 29, 2007;
9. Hamilton (case no. BD375899) submitted on October 2, 2007;
10. Kim (case no. D229695) submitted on October 12, 2007;
11. Locatell (case no. BD390299) submitted on October 5, 2007;
12. Moore (case no. BD385251) submitted on October 19, 2007;
13. Nielsen (case no. BD4007195) submitted on October 22, 2007;
14. Serrano (case no. YD032093) submitted on October 26, 2007.

During the three months following her retirement, Commissioner Dobbs did not complete any of these cases. On January 31, 2008, the court retrieved all of the files she had taken home. Several judicial officers were required to review and complete Commissioner Dobbs's undecided cases. Mistrials were declared in at least 15 cases.

Some cases were decided based upon the reporter's transcript of previous proceedings before Commissioner Dobbs; however, a number of cases had to be retried.

Former Commissioner Dobbs has expressed both embarrassment and remorse for her delays in completing some of the matters she took under submission.

Former Commissioner Dobbs's conduct violated the Code of Judicial ethics, canons 1 (failing to observe high standards of conduct), 2A (failing to act at all times in a manner that promotes public confidence in the judiciary), 3B(8) (failing to dispose of all judicial matters fairly, promptly and efficiently ), and 3C(1) (failing to cooperate with other judges and court officials in the administration of court business), and constituted prejudicial misconduct. Former Commissioner Dobbs's misconduct caused significant harm to family law litigants and to the court, and seriously undermined the integrity of the judiciary.

DISCIPLINE

Article VI, section 18, subsection (d) of the California Constitution provides that the commission may "censure a judge . . . for action . . . that constitutes . . . conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute." Former Commissioner Dobbs concedes that she engaged in prejudicial misconduct.

The purpose of a commission disciplinary proceeding is not punishment, "but rather the protection of the public, the enforcement of rigorous standards of judicial conduct, and the maintenance of public confidence in the integrity . . . of the judicial system." (Broadman v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1998) 18 Cal.4th 1079, 1112, citing Adams v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1995) 10 Cal.4th 866, 912.) The commission believes that this purpose is best served by the discipline proposed in the Stipulation.

Commissioner Dobbs's failure to timely complete so many of her cases over a substantial period of time convinces the commission that there is a strong likelihood that the same pattern of delayed rulings on submitted matters would continue if she were to serve as a judicial officer in the future. Through her misconduct, the commissioner demonstrated an unconscionable disregard for the rights of litigants and the reputation of the judiciary. "Litigants and the public have a right to expect judges to take action on matters assigned to them in an expeditious and efficient manner. A judge's failure to act deprives litigants of resolution of their disputes and grievances through the court system." (Inquiry Concerning Judge Robert G. Spitzer, No. 182, Decision and Order Removing Judge Spitzer from Office (2007) at p. 13.) Commissioner Dobbs's protracted delays have had a significant and palpable impact on the litigants, both financially and emotionally.

The judiciary has also been adversely impacted. Substantial and persistent failure to rule on submitted matters serves "to damage the esteem of the public for the judiciary." (In re Creede (1986) 42 Cal.3d 1098, 1099; see also Mardikian v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1985) 40 Cal.3d 473, 482.) Moreover, Commissioner Dobbs's delays required Los Angeles County Superior Court to expend its resources in investigating the delays and reassigning the commissioner's undecided cases after she retired. Other judicial officers were required to review and decide the commissioner's undecided matters and a number of cases had to be retried.

Accordingly, the commission concludes that the severe sanction of a public censure and bar is necessary for the protection of the public and the reputation of the judiciary. Good cause appearing, the commission hereby censures former Commissioner Ann Dobbs and bars her from receiving an assignment, appointment, or reference of work from any California state court.

Commission members Hon. Judith D. McConnell, Hon. Katherine Feinstein, Peter E. Flores, Esq., Marshall B. Grossman, Esq., Mr. Samuel A. Hardage, Hon. Frederick P. Horn, Ms. Barbara Schraeger, Ms. Maya Dillard Smith, Ms. Sandra Talcott, and Mr. Nathaniel Trives voted to issue this decision and order imposing a public censure and bar pursuant to the stipulated disposition. Commission member Mr. Lawrence Simi did not participate.

INQUIRY CONCERNING JUDGE PETER J. MCBRIEN

SUMMARY

A disciplinery action was brought concerning a superior court judge who, while presiding over a family law case, repeatedly threatened a mistrial if the proceedings were not concluded quickly enough. The judge demanded that the husband produce an irrelevant document, threatened his attorney with contempt, and informed his employer of a possible violation of law revealed by the document. The judge abruptly ended the trial because it had exceeded the anticipated time, before the husband had completed his case and without allowing additional evidence.

The Commission on Judicial Performance imposed a severe public censure on the judge. The commission found that the judge engaged in prejudicial misconduct and violated Cal. Code Jud. Ethics, canons 2A, 3B(7), by abruptly ending the trial and denying due process. He engaged in prejudicial misconduct and violated Cal. Code Jud. Ethics, canons 2, 3B(4), by improperly threatening contempt. He engaged in willful misconduct and violated Cal. Code Jud. Ethics, canons 2, 3E(2), by failing to disclose his contact with the husband's employer and to disqualify himself under Code Civ. Proc., § 170.1, subd. (a)(6)(a)(iii), and Cal. Code Jud. Ethics, canon 3E(1), for appearance of partiality. His long and respected tenure on the bench was a factor in mitigation. (Opinion by Judith D. McConnell, Chairperson.)

HEADNOTES

(1) Judges § 6.4—Discipline—Proceedings—Burden of Proof.—The California Commission on Judicial Performance, through its examiner, has the burden of proving the charges against a judge by clear and convincing evidence. Evidence of a charge is clear and convincing so long as there is a high probability that the charge is true. Factual findings of the masters are entitled to great weight because the masters have the advantage of observing the demeanor of the various witnesses.

(2) Judges § 8—Duties—Compliance with Law.—Cal. Code Jud. Ethics, canon 2A, provides that a judge shall respect and comply with the law and act in a manner that promotes public confidence in the integrity and impartiality of the judiciary. Cal. Code Jud. Ethics, canon 3B(7), provides that a judge shall accord a full right to be heard according to the law.

(3) Judges § 6.2—Discipline—Grounds—Prejudicial Misconduct.—Prejudicial misconduct is conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute (Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (d)). Prejudicial misconduct while acting in a judicial capacity does not require bad faith; rather, it is conduct which a judge undertakes in good faith but which nevertheless would appear to an objective observer to be not only unjudicial conduct but conduct prejudicial to public esteem for the judicial office.

(4) Judges § 6.2—Discipline—Grounds—Denying Due Process by Abruptly Terminating Trial.—The public has a right to expect that trials will be conducted in an evenhanded and procedurally regular manner that does not exalt efficiency over fairness. Abruptly terminating a trial in the middle of a witness's testimony is contrary to commonly held precepts of due process and the expectations of litigants, witnesses, and attorneys. The term "due process of law" asserts a fundamental principle of justice which is not subject to any precise definition but deals essentially with the denial of fundamental fairness, shocking to the universal sense of justice. A prime corollary of the foregoing rule is that a trial judge should not prejudge the issues but should keep an open mind until all the evidence is presented to the judge. Conducting a trial by a stopwatch can curtail the parties' right to present evidence on material disputed issues and lead to a denial of due process. Unexpected testimony and changing positions of the parties can alter the amount of time necessary to fairly present a case.

(5) Judges § 6.4—Discipline—Proceedings—Mitigating Factors in Determining Appropriate Discipline.—While a judge's years on the bench and limited record of discipline may be taken into account in determining the appropriate level of discipline, they do not mitigate or excuse willful or prejudicial conduct.

(6) Judges § 8—Duties—Impropriety—Relations with Parties.—Cal. Code Jud. Ethics, canon 2, requires a judge to avoid impropriety and the appearance of impropriety. Cal. Code Jud. Ethics, canon 3B(4), requires a judge to be patient, dignified, and courteous to all parties with whom the judge deals in an official capacity.

(7) Judges § 6.2—Discipline—Grounds—Threats of Contempt.—Threats of contempt without proper justification have been found to constitute prejudicial misconduct and willful misconduct.

(8) Judges § 8—Duties—Disclosing Information Relevant to Disqualification.—Cal. Code Jud. Ethics, canon 3E(2), imposes a duty upon a judge to disclose information that is reasonably relevant to a question of disqualification.

(9) Judges § 6.2—Discipline—Grounds—Willful Misconduct.—Willful misconduct is (1) unjudicial conduct that is (2) committed in bad faith (3) by a judge acting in his or her judicial capacity. Failure to comply with the canons of judicial ethics is generally considered to constitute unjudicial conduct. A judge acts in bad faith only by (1) performing a judicial act for a corrupt purpose (which is any purpose other than the faithful discharge of judicial duties), or (2) performing a judicial act with knowledge that the act is beyond the judge's lawful judicial power, or (3) performing a judicial act that exceeds the judge's lawful power with a conscious disregard for the limits of the judge's authority. A judge is acting in a judicial capacity while performing one of the functions, whether adjudicative or administrative in nature, that are associated with the position of a judge or when the judge uses or attempts to use the authority of the judicial office for an improper purpose.

(10) Judges § 8—Duties—When Reporting Crime.—Where there are others in the courtroom who have knowledge of potential criminal conduct revealed during the course of a proceeding, a judge is not obliged to report the crime but it is not necessarily improper for the judge to do so. In deciding whether to report a potential crime, a judge must be sensitive to the obligation to remain impartial. Given the enormous burden to remain impartial and be perceived as such throughout proceedings before the court, a judge could properly conclude that his or her impartiality, or the perception of same, would be impaired were he or she to initiate prosecution of those appearing before the court. Further, if the judge does report the crime, he or she must avoid becoming an advocate in the process of making the report. More importantly, a judge who reports a crime must inform the parties that such a report has been made.

(11) Judges § 11—Disqualification—Grounds—Appearance of Partiality.—Under circumstances where a person aware of the facts would reasonably entertain a doubt that a judge would be able to be impartial under Code Civ. Proc., § 170.1, subd. (a)(6)(A)(iii), and Cal. Code Jud. Ethics, canon 3E(1), the judge has an obligation to disqualify.

(12) Judges § 6.4—Discipline—Proceedings—Not Intended as Punishment.—The purpose of a Commission on Judicial Performance disciplinary proceeding is not punishment, but rather the protection of the public, the enforcement of rigorous standards of judicial conduct, and the maintenance of public confidence in the integrity and independence of the judicial system.

(13) Judges § 6.4—Discipline—Proceedings—Factors Relevant to Discipline—Number and Seriousness of Acts of Misconduct.—The number of acts of misconduct is relevant to discipline to the extent it shows isolated incidents, or a pattern which demonstrates that the judge lacks judicial temperament and the ability to perform judicial functions in an even-handed manner. In addition to the number of acts of misconduct, the nature and seriousness of the misconduct is an important factor in the Commission on Judicial Performance's consideration.

(14) Judges § 6.4—Discipline—Proceedings—Factors Relevant to Discipline—Failure to Appreciate or Admit Impropriety.—A judge's failure to appreciate or admit to the impropriety of his or her acts indicates a lack of capacity to reform.

(15) Judges § 6.4—Discipline—Proceedings—Factors Relevant to Discipline—Dishonest or Inconsistent Testimony.—Intentional dishonesty, particularly under oath, is considered to be antithetical to the role of a judge. A judge who gives sworn testimony must take care to ensure that the testimony is truthful and accurate. Even an unintentional inconsistency in testimony creates an appearance of impropriety.

(16) Judges § 6.2—Censure—Grounds—Abruptly Terminating Trial and Inappropriately Investigating Crime.—A judge's misconduct had a significant adverse impact on the judicial system. His decision in a family law matter was reversed on appeal as a result of his conduct in abandoning the trial, costing the parties substantial expense and delays. Moreover, a judge who abruptly and precipitously abandons a trial, improperly threatens contempt, inappropriately investigates potential criminal activity and sends evidence of a potential crime to a litigant's employer while continuing to preside over the case lowers public esteem for the judiciary. Although the judge's misconduct adversely impacted the judicial system, throughout his long tenure on the family law bench he worked to improve the family law system in the county as set forth in the masters' findings of factors in mitigation. The purpose of judicial discipline as enunciated by the California Supreme Court and the Commission on Judicial Performance could be accomplished through a severe censure pursuant to the provisions of Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18.

INTRODUCTION AND SUMMARY

This disciplinary matter concerns Judge Peter J. McBrien, a judge of the Sacramento County Superior Court. Judge McBrien was appointed to the municipal court in 1987 and became a superior court judge in 1989. While presiding over a family law matter over a period of months, Judge McBrien engaged in a course of serious misconduct which rendered the trial fundamentally unfair, denied a litigant his due process right to complete his presentation of evidence, and culminated in the judge's lengthy investigation of a litigant's possible violation of the law without disclosing his actions to the parties. We conclude that a severe public censure is warranted based on the gravity of this misconduct, coupled with Judge McBrien's pervasive lack of accountability and insight into the impropriety of his conduct.

The Commission on Judicial Performance commenced this inquiry with the filing of its notice of formal proceedings (Notice) on September 25, 2008. The Supreme Court appointed three special masters who held an evidentiary hearing and reported to the commission. The masters are Hon. Dennis A. Cornell, Justice of the Court of Appeal, Fifth Appellate District, Hon. Gail Andler, Judge of the Orange County Superior Court, and Hon. Denise de Bellefeuille, Judge of the Santa Barbara County Superior Court. Judge McBrien is represented by James A. Murphy of Murphy, Pearson, Bradley & Feeney in San Francisco, California. The examiners for the commission are Commission Trial Counsel Andrew Blum and commission assistant trial counsel Valerie Marchant.

A three-day evidentiary hearing was held in Sacramento April 1 to 3, 2009, followed by an oral argument in San Francisco on May 29, 2009. The masters' report to the commission containing their findings of fact and conclusions of law was filed on June 23, 2009. The report includes a concurrence and dissent by Judge Andler.

The Notice charges Judge McBrien in count IA[1] with the following four instances of misconduct in his handling of the dissolution matter of Carlsson v. Carlsson (Super. Ct. Sac. County, 2006, No. 04FL02489) over a period of months:

1. Terminating and abandoning the trial before Mr. Carlsson had completed his case and without offering the parties an opportunity to present additional evidence in violation of the parties' right to due process.

2. Threatening Mr. Carlsson's attorney, Sharon Huddle, with contempt if her client did not produce his statement of economic interests. The documents were requested by Judge McBrien even though they were not offered by either party or relevant to the proceedings.

3. Requesting a copy of the transcript of Mr. Carlsson's testimony concerning his real estate ownership and his disclosures on his statement of economic interests and sending the transcript to Mr. Carlsson's employer, California's Department of General Services (DGS). Mr. Carlsson was terminated from his employment as a result of information provided by Judge McBrien. Judge McBrien continued to preside over the case without disclosing to the parties his actions with regard to the transcript.

4. Being discourteous and impatient toward Mr. Carlsson's attorney and curtailing the parties' right to present evidence by repeatedly threatening a mistrial if the proceedings were not concluded quickly enough.

Each of these charges has been proven by clear and convincing evidence at the hearing before the special masters. Judge McBrien's actions constitute one instance of willful misconduct (count IA(3)), two instances of prejudicial misconduct (count IA(1) & (2)) and one instance of improper action (count IA(4)).

FINDINGS OF FACT AND CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

(1) The commission, through its examiner, has the burden of proving the charges against Judge McBrien by clear and convincing evidence. (Broadman v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1998) 18 Cal.4th 1079, 1090 [77 Cal.Rptr.2d 408, 959 P.2d 715] (Broadman).) "Evidence of a charge is clear and convincing so long as there is a 'high probability' that the charge is true." (Ibid.)

[1] On the first day of the evidentiary hearing, two other counts charged in the Notice were dismissed on the motion of the examiner (Rules Com. on Jud. Performance, rule 128(b)).

Factual findings of the masters are entitled to great weight because the masters have " 'the advantage of observing the demeanor of the various witnesses.' " (Fletcher v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1998) 19 Cal.4th 865, 878 [81 Cal.Rptr.2d 58, 968 P.2d 958] (Fletcher).) The findings of fact in this decision are adopted from the factual findings of the masters which we have determined are supported by clear and convincing evidence based on our own review of the record.[2] The facts as to each count have been summarized and paraphrased from the masters' findings.

We adopt the masters' conclusions of law, except for count IA(2) and (3) on which we reach our own conclusions of law based on our independent review of the record and the law. (See Fletcher, supra, 19 Cal.4th at p. 878 [commission has expertise with respect to legal conclusions].)

A. Count IA(1)—Abandoning Trial

1. Findings of Fact

The charges involve Judge McBrien's handling of a trial in the dissolution of the marriage of Ulf and Mona Carlsson. Mrs. Carlsson was represented by attorney Charlotte Keeley and Mr. Carlsson was represented by attorney Sharon Huddle.

Judge McBrien has been assigned to the family law division of the Sacramento County Superior Court since 1989. The family law division requires attorneys to provide a time estimate when they set a matter for trial. If the estimate is for two days or less, the trial is assigned to one of the judges in the family law division. If the attorneys estimate the trial will be more than two days, the trial is sent to the master calendar in another building to be assigned to another superior court judge. Most family law attorneys in Sacramento County prefer to have their cases tried by judges in the family law division, and thus try to avoid estimates of more than two days.

Judge McBrien believed he had the discretion to declare a mistrial if the attorneys did not complete their case within the time estimate. He testified that it is "part of the general family law culture in Sacramento County" that attorneys are expected to adhere to their time estimate or make a request for more time. The local rules in effect at the time of the trial in 2006 did not authorize a judge to declare a mistrial when a trial exceeded its time estimate.[3]

[2] All references to the masters' factual findings and legal conclusions are to those of the majority. The concurring and dissenting report found the examiner failed to prove count IA(4) and concluded that Judge McBrien engaged in one instance of prejudicial misconduct (count IA(1)) and two instances of improper action (count IA(2) & (3)).

The Carlsson trial was estimated at two days. The disputed trial issues were child and spousal support, division of property, including the family home and a fourplex rental unit, division of Mr. Carlsson's retirement account, and attorney fees. In the statement of issues filed before the trial, both parties requested the court to award the residence and rental property to Mr. Carlsson; however the value of the properties was a subject of dispute. On March 2, 2006, the first day of trial, Ms. Keeley filed a trial brief in which she modified her earlier appraisals of both the residence and the fourplex but still disagreed with Mr. Carlsson's valuation of the two properties. There was also a dispute concerning a possible third party interest in the fourplex. Mr. Carlsson maintained that he had entered into a partnership agreement with Joseph Mayo on the rental property. Mrs. Carlsson disputed the partnership claim in the fourplex.

Judge McBrien presided over the Carlsson trial a full day on March 2, the morning of March 3, and the afternoon of March 9, 2006. The trial commenced at 9:18 a.m. on Thursday, March 2, 2006. Ms. Huddle, who had not filed a trial brief, advised the judge that Mr. Carlsson no longer wanted the fourplex awarded to him and wanted it sold, which would eliminate the necessity of presenting evidence on the value of the fourplex. Ms. Keeley still insisted that the fourplex be awarded to Mr. Carlsson.

As it was approaching 1:00 p.m. on the first day of trial, Ms. Huddle stated "Your Honor, I am going to have to eat." Judge McBrien responded that he planned on "going forward" because he had another trial the next day that had "statutory preference." He stated that he wanted to ensure that the Carlsson trial was completed by noon the next day, "Otherwise, we may as well call a mistrial right now." (Italics added.) When Ms. Huddle informed the judge she had not had breakfast and assumed there would be a lunch break, Judge McBrien stated they could take a short break, but: "All I'm telling you is if it's not completed by noon, it's a mistrial. . . . I'm telling you exactly what my availability is and if you want a mistrial at this point, you're welcome to it." (Italics added.) When Ms. Huddle reminded the judge that the matter had been set for two full days, Judge McBrien replied that she had her

[3] The day after the Carlsson trial ended, the Court of Appeal issued a decision in another case which held that a superior court judge could not declare a mistrial because the parties exceeded their time estimate unless there is a local court rule that notified the parties of this possibility. (Blumenthal v. Superior Court (2006) 137 Cal.App.4th 672 [40 Cal.Rptr.3d 509].) The local rules for the family law division of the Sacramento County Superior Court were amended after the Blumenthal decision and after the Carlsson trial authorizing the court to declare a mistrial if the parties exceed their time estimate.

"choices" and he was not going to give her another afternoon. Judge McBrien testified that he did not actually intend to declare a mistrial if the trial was not completed by noon the next day but threatened the mistrial to encourage Ms. Huddle to move the case along because she "never completes her case within the time estimate."

When the trial reconvened after a short lunch recess, Judge McBrien agreed to grant Ms. Huddle's request for an "additional" half day to try the case. In fact, the "additional" half day only enabled the parties to have two full days consistent with their trial estimate. The first day of trial recessed at 4:00 p.m., after Ms. Keeley rested her case and Ms. Huddle had called her second witness.

The trial reconvened the next morning, March 3, 2006, at 8:47 a.m. and recessed at 12:07 p.m. Although the trial was still within the time estimate, Judge McBrien continued to express his frustration with the pace of the trial. When Ms. Huddle made a request to have the matter continued to accommodate a witness who was undergoing chemotherapy, Judge McBrien responded, "I don't know whether this is a slow Motion for a Mistrial or what?" (Italics added.) When Ms. Huddle paused and explained that she was checking to make sure several exhibits had signatures, Judge McBrien responded, "Your time is waning, but go ahead." (Italics added.) The trial recessed for the day at 12:07 p.m.

The trial resumed at 1:30 p.m. on March 9, 2006. At 2:18 p.m., Ms. Huddle called a real estate appraiser who testified extensively about the fair market value of the family residence and the fourplex. When Ms. Huddle requested a break to use the restroom after the appraiser's testimony, Judge McBrien warned her that she was "approaching a mistrial." He allowed a five-minute break, but guaranteed her that "if this is not completed by 4:30, there will be a mistrial." (Italics added.)

At 4:09 p.m., Ms. Keeley recalled her appraiser who testified that Mr. Carlsson's appraiser had made a miscalculation in his report which resulted in an error of $100,000 in the appraisal. At 4:27 p.m., Ms. Huddle recalled her appraiser to ask him to respond to Mrs. Carlsson's appraiser's criticisms. The appraiser admitted that he made a mistake in his calculations but insisted the mistake did not substantially change the property's fair market value. As he was explaining the reasons for this conclusion, Judge McBrien interrupted and stated: "Pardon me. I have an EPO. Court is in recess." An EPO refers to a call from law enforcement requesting an emergency protective order. Judge McBrien was on duty to receive EPO requests at the time.

Judge McBrien left the bench to take the call on a mobile phone used for EPO requests. Although he does not specifically recall what occurred in this case, his normal practice is to first talk to the operator who puts him through to the peace officer making the EPO request. The phone records show that the judge received a call at 4:28 p.m., which lasted one minute and another call at 4:29 p.m., which lasted one minute and 53 seconds.

Judge McBrien believes he was still on the phone with the operator when he briefly returned to the doorway of the courtroom and the following exchange occurred:

"THE COURT: We're going to have to adjourn this. The County operator is on the phone. This trial has ended.

"MS. HUDDLE: Your Honor, I don't even have my client's attorney fees costs put on.

"THE COURT: Then I'll reserve over that issue or you can get a mistrial, one or the other.

"MS. KEELEY: We don't want a mistrial. We'll reserve over that issue.

"MS. HUDDLE: But your Honor, the house that we're evaluating—

[Judge exits room]

"MS. KEELEY: We'll arrange another date. Don't panic.

"MS. HUDDLE: Is that what he said?

"MS. KEELEY: I'm going to ask for the him [sic] to reserve.

"THE WITNESS: May I go?

"MS. HUDDLE: Is he coming back? I'm in the middle of my examination.

"MS. KEELEY: Ms. Huddle, I'm not prepared for a mistrial." (Italics added.)

After Judge McBrien exited the courtroom for the second time, the attorneys and parties remained with the court reporter and the clerk for about 10 to 15 minutes waiting for the judge to return. The clerk went into chambers to check on the status of the case but does not recall if the judge was still there. Eventually the clerk told the attorneys and the parties that the proceedings were over. Judge McBrien never returned to the courtroom. Mr. Carlsson did not have an opportunity to rest his case.

The reporter's transcript states that the proceedings ended at 4:29 p.m. The EPO mobile phone records show an outgoing call to Judge McBrien's house at 4:35 p.m. that lasted one minute.

Judge McBrien testified the trial had to end by 4:30 p.m., although he conceded that the courthouse is open until 6:00 p.m. and he did not determine whether the attorneys and staff could stay beyond 4:30 p.m.

In his deposition testimony, Judge McBrien explained that he did not return to the courtroom after he completed the EPO call because there was nobody there. However, at the hearing before the masters, he acknowledged having no independent recollection of whether he looked into the courtroom to see if anyone was still there. The masters found, as do we, that Judge McBrien left the courthouse while the parties were waiting for him to return. According to the judge, he left because the parties were one minute short of receiving their two-day trial and the trial could not have concluded in one minute.

The next morning, March 10, 2006, Ms. Huddle was informed that the parties could file a three-page brief with closing arguments and a three-page brief addressing attorney fees. Mr. Carlsson's closing brief objected to the procedure of concluding the trial with briefs because Mr. Carlsson's redirect testimony was not concluded and rebuttal testimony was not allowed. By stipulation, the parties submitted several exhibits with their closing briefs. However, Mr. Carlsson stated in his brief that additional testimony concerning these exhibits would have supported his position concerning the division of property and his pension.

On March 30, 2006, Judge McBrien issued a decision in the Carlsson dissolution. Both properties were ordered to be sold. Mrs. Carlsson was awarded spousal support. Judge McBrien awarded each party half of the community interest in Mr. Carlsson's retirement, and did not order a segregated account as requested by Mr. Carlsson. Attorney fees of $35,000 were awarded to Mrs. Carlsson.

The Court of Appeal, Third Appellate District, reversed Judge McBrien's judgment and remanded the matter for a new trial in a published decision. (In re Marriage of Carlsson (2008) 163 Cal.App.4th 281, 295 [77 Cal.Rptr.3d 305] (Carlsson).) The appellate court concluded Judge McBrien rendered the trial fundamentally unfair and violated Mr. Carlsson's due process right to a fair hearing when he "abruptly ended the trial in the middle of a witness's testimony, prior to the completion of one side's case and without giving the parties the opportunity to introduce or even propose additional evidence." (Id. at p. 292.)

Despite this appellate decision, Judge McBrien still does not believe that he denied Mr. Carlsson's right to due process and a fair hearing. He points out that he provided the parties with more time in the courtroom than a normal two-day court calendar would have allowed. However, he acknowledges that he does not typically end a trial that is not completed within the time estimate without determining what additional evidence is to be presented and providing an opportunity to trail the trial to another day if he determines more time is needed. In this case, he believes it was the obligation of the attorneys to ask for additional time if needed.

2. Conclusions of Law

(2) The masters concluded Judge McBrien violated California Code of Judicial Ethics canons 2A (judge shall respect and comply with law and act in a manner that promotes public confidence in the integrity and impartiality of judiciary) and 3B(7) (judge shall accord full right to be heard according to law) "by abandoning and terminating the trial in the middle of Mr. Carlsson's case-in-chief, and in the middle of a witness's testimony." Further, the masters concluded that the judge violated Mr. Carlsson's constitutional right to due process and a fair trial, and his actions constituted prejudicial misconduct. We concur and reach the same conclusions of law.

(3) Prejudicial misconduct is "conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute." (Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (d).) Prejudicial misconduct while acting in a judicial capacity does not require bad faith; rather, it is "conduct which a judge undertakes in good faith but which nevertheless would appear to an objective observer to be not only unjudicial conduct but conduct prejudicial to public esteem for the judicial office." (Geiler v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications (1973) 10 Cal.3d 270, 284 [110 Cal.Rptr. 201, 515 P.2d 1].)

(4) The manner in which Judge McBrien suddenly and precipitously abandoned the Carlsson trial is manifestly unjudicial conduct prejudicial to public esteem for the judicial office. The public has a right to expect that trials will be conducted in an evenhanded and procedurally regular manner that does not "exalt efficiency over fairness." (Elkins v. Superior Court (2007) 41 Cal.4th 1337, 1368, 1367–1369 [63 Cal.Rptr.3d 483, 163 P.3d 160].) Abruptly terminating a trial in the middle of a witness's testimony is contrary to commonly held precepts of due process and the expectations of litigants, witnesses, and attorneys. " 'The term "due process of law" asserts a fundamental principle of justice which is not subject to any precise definition but deals essentially with the denial of fundamental fairness, shocking to the universal sense of justice.' [Citation.] . . . '. . . A prime corollary of the foregoing rule is that "A trial judge should not prejudge the issues but should keep an open mind until all the evidence is presented to him." ' [Citation.]" (Carlsson, supra, 163 Cal.App.4th at pp. 290–291.) The Court of Appeal held Judge McBrien "openly violated these precepts." (Id. at p. 291.) We concur.

In his testimony before the masters and in his briefs to the commission, Judge McBrien remained steadfast that he was entitled to terminate the trial the moment the parties reached their time estimate. We adamantly disagree. As the appellate court observed, conducting a trial by a stopwatch can curtail the parties' right to present evidence on material disputed issues and lead to a denial of due process. (Carlsson, supra, 163 Cal.App.4th at p. 292.) Unexpected testimony and changing positions of the parties can alter the amount of time necessary to fairly present a case. In the Carlsson case, the parties changed their appraisals of the value of the properties and positions on who should be awarded the properties after the time estimate was given. Furthermore, Mr. Carlsson's appraiser was shown to have made a miscalculation in his appraisal during the last hour of the last day of trial as estimated.

The question here is not a judge's authority to set reasonable time restrictions on the presentation of evidence or to exclude irrelevant or cumulative evidence. Judge McBrien cut off the presentation of evidence without determining what remaining evidence the parties intended to present or even taking the matter under submission. As the attorneys, parties, witness, and court staff waited in the courtroom uncertain how to proceed, Judge McBrien called his residence and left the courthouse without determining if the parties were waiting for him to return.

As the masters state: "Judge McBrien was obliged to return to the courtroom after he completed the extremely brief EPO call, explain if (and why) he was going to excuse the testifying witness, advise the parties as to whether they would have the opportunity to submit additional evidence and file closing briefs, and take the case under submission. Instead, he suddenly and precipitously declared the trial was over even before he determined the nature of the EPO request, and acted in a way that was contrary to his usual practice in such a situation. The entirety of the record demonstrates that Judge McBrien was preoccupied with efficiency at the expense of ensuring a party's constitutional right to be heard."

In Judge McBrien's view, it was Ms. Huddle's obligation to affirmatively request additional time to present evidence. We find this position to be patently unreasonable under the circumstances of this case. If Judge McBrien had announced at the end of the day that he was taking the matter under submission because the parties had exceeded their time estimate, Ms. Huddle would have had the opportunity to request additional time and make a record of the remaining evidence she proposed to offer. Had her request been denied, the court's ruling could have been reviewed by a higher court. Instead, after walking off the bench to take an EPO call, Judge McBrien briefly reentered the courtroom to announce, "This trial has ended," and walked out as Ms. Huddle was trying to explain that she had additional evidence to present. The next day Ms. Huddle was informed that she could submit closing briefs. Under these circumstances, we believe a reasonable attorney would assume that the judge had terminated the trial and would not take additional evidence. Moreover, Ms. Huddle objected to the summary termination of the trial in her closing brief and pointed out that she had additional evidence to present.

(5) In this and each of the counts, Judge McBrien urges the commission to consider his years on the bench and limited record of discipline in determining the level of misconduct. While these facts may be taken into account in determining the appropriate level of discipline, they "[do] not mitigate or excuse willful or prejudicial conduct." (Broadman, supra, 18 Cal.4th at p. 1112; see Kloepfer v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1989) 49 Cal.3d 826, 865 [264 Cal.Rptr. 100, 782 P.2d 239].) In our view, his years on the bench should have provided Judge McBrien with better judgment than he exercised in terminating the Carlsson trial.

B. Count IA(2)—Threat of Contempt

1. Findings of Fact

Mr. Carlsson and Scott Moore found the fourplex at issue in these proceedings and wanted to purchase and renovate it as an investment rental property, but neither had money to buy it. Their friend Don Minkoff agreed to purchase the property and fund the cost of the renovation. Although there was no written contract, the parties orally agreed that Mr. Carlsson and Mr. Moore would renovate the property and pay Mr. Minkoff back with interest after the reconstruction was complete and they were able to refinance. The title to the property was to be held jointly by all three according to the verbal agreement. Mr. Carlsson still owed about $16,000 to Mr. Minkoff at the time of the trial, the loan was due in 2005, and Mr. Minkoff had never attempted to collect it.[4]

Mr. Carlsson met Mr. Minkoff through his job at DGS. On March 3, 2006, Ms. Keeley cross-examined Mr. Carlsson concerning the potential conflict of interest in taking a loan from Mr. Minkoff who did business with the State of California. Mr. Minkoff was a real estate developer who had contractual

[4] Mr. Moore had to withdraw from the venture in July 2002, when he was recalled to active duty in the service. The Moores signed over their interests to the Carlssons and Minkoffs. Mr. Carlsson testified that he then entered into a partnership agreement with Joseph Mayo whereby Mr. Mayo invested time and money into the renovation in exchange for an interest in the fourplex. The existence and terms of this agreement were issues in dispute at the trial.

relationships with DGS, including a contract for the lease of a building owned by Mr. Minkoff. Mr. Carlsson testified that he did not believe he had listed the fourplex or his personal investment arrangement with Mr. Minkoff on the economic disclosure forms which he was required to file with the Fair Political Practices Commission (FPPC). When Ms. Keeley completed her cross-examination, the following exchange occurred between Judge McBrien and Mr. Carlsson:

"THE COURT: Ms. Huddle? [¶] First, let me, just for a point of clarification, when you said you filed this statement or document with the Fair Political Practices Board, is that a document commonly called a, 'Statement of Economic Interests'?

"[MR. CARLSSON]: I would have to look at it. It gets thrown in front of us, we sign it, turn it in.

"THE COURT: You don't have to complete any documents.

"[MR. CARLSSON]: There is a box where you like—whatever I have doesn't apply, and with so many other forms that we are given, it's just like a formality of paperwork. It just gets filed.

"THE COURT: This is filed with the Secretary of State?

"[MR. CARLSSON]: I have no idea. I give it to our Secretary and she takes care of it." (Italics added.)

On redirect, Mr. Carlsson testified that his job did not require him to make decisions concerning any property related to Mr. Minkoff. Judge McBrien interrupted as Mr. Carlsson was testifying and the following exchange occurred:

"THE COURT: I am going to have to adjourn this proceeding. They are awaiting me downtown. So we will resume on Thursday at 1:30. [¶] I would ask you to bring a copy of your 2004, whatever this document is, that you filed with the Fair Political Practices Commission with the Secretary of State.

"THE WITNESS: Okay.

"THE COURT: Thank you.

"MS. KEELEY: Your Honor, would we need copies of that document for 2002 and 2003?

"THE COURT: You should probably bring them for those years, but you also might want to talk to an attorney who specializes in that area because there are potential penalties far beyond what we're talking about today." (Italics added.)

Judge McBrien offered several explanations as to why he requested the statement of economic interests: Mr. Carlsson might have violated the Fair Political Practices Act (FPPA) if he failed to disclose Mr. Minkoff's interests in the fourplex; the FPPC might have the power to confiscate or place a lien on the fourplex if Mr. Carlsson failed to disclose the potential conflict which would prevent the division and disposition of property; and the documents could be relevant to the value of the fourplex if they contained valuation information.

As to the last explanation, Judge McBrien conceded that the form, which he is familiar with, could not have been relevant to determining the value of the property in the dissolution case. The form provides only check boxes with ranges for such value, such as $100,001 to $1 million. Judge McBrien also admitted that he had never heard that the FPPC had the power to place a lien or confiscate property as penalty for nondisclosure. As the masters observed, Judge McBrien ruled upon the case without the statement of economic interests (which Mr. Carlsson never provided) which refutes his assertion that the documents were relevant to the pending dissolution matter. We concur, and find that Judge McBrien wanted the documents to determine whether Mr. Carlsson might have violated the FPPA, an issue that was not relevant to the proceeding before him.

When the trial reconvened on March 9, 2006, Judge McBrien asked Ms. Huddle if her client got legal advice regarding the disclosure forms. Ms. Huddle replied that she had found him a lawyer. Then the following exchange took place:

"THE COURT: Did he bring the documents with him?

"MS. HUDDLE: He never went to work. He is on disability; he doesn't have them.

"THE COURT: So, he has violated my request to bring those documents?

"MS. HUDDLE: The way I heard you say it, it was a suggestion that he bring them.

"THE COURT: Do you want me to have the record read?

"MS. HUDDLE: He would have to go to work to see if he even has a copy.

"THE COURT: Ma'am, I would suggest that he send somebody to his workplace to get those documents before we conclude this trial.

"MS. HUDDLE: Your Honor, I would like to impose an objection. I know it's what the Court would like, but I would like to impose an objection to those records because they are irrelevant to the division of the community property—

"THE COURT: Overruled. I am not indicating that they are relevant. They are going to clarify his testimony. However, they may be relevant to other proceedings. That's why I advised him to go and talk to independent Counsel.

"MS. HUDDLE: The independent Counsel wanted $5,000. He doesn't have $5,000 to give him before they will talk to him. The firm is Sweeney and Greene—

"THE COURT: In any case, he can send somebody to go get those records.

"MS. HUDDLE: I am going to have to advise him to take the Fifth Amendment if there is some claim, some potential criminal action and he has been unable to discuss it with an attorney who actually knows the law. I can't have him testify and—

"THE COURT: I think you're too late for that.

"MS. HUDDLE: Too late?

"THE COURT: He has already testified regarding the sum and substance of that and his employer will have a copy of the documents.

"MS. HUDDLE: Are you indicating that he can't take the Fifth Amendment now?

"THE COURT: I'm not indicating anything. I'm indicating that you need to send somebody to his employment to pick up those documents.

"MS. HUDDLE: If he is taking the Fifth Amendment, then those documents would be part of it.

"THE COURT: Those documents are on file with the Secretary of State. I could go to the Secretary of State's Office and get a copy of them.

"MS. HUDDLE: Ms. Keeley never raised this issue. If she believed it was really an issue, why didn't Ms. Keeley get those documents? We're here at trial now and—

"THE COURT: Ms. Huddle, you are out of the [sic] order. It was my request, not Ms. Keeley's request.

"MS. HUDDLE: I think you would potentially, although I don't know—

"THE COURT: Ms. Huddle, do you wish to ask your client to send somebody to get the records?

"MS. HUDDLE: If he provides those and he gets charged with something for having provided them—

"THE COURT: Yes or no?

"MS. HUDDLE: Is the Court indicating that he cannot assert his Fifth Amendment?

"THE COURT: I'm not indicating any such thing. The documents are not a part of the Fifth Amendment. It's what he states out of his mouth that is a part of the Fifth Amendment. [¶] Those are public documents at this point. They are on file—assuming they are the ones that he described—on file at the Secretary of State's Office. As a convenience to the Court, I have asked him to bring us a copy.

"MS. HUDDLE: I suppose—this is all on the record. I don't know what to do in a situation like this when you're actually asking him to produce evidence which might incriminate him and it's not even the opposing side presenting it.

"THE COURT: Ms. Huddle, am I to take that as a 'no' placing you in the possibility of contempt*?

"MS. HUDDLE: No. I will tell him to go get the records—

"THE COURT: I'm not suggesting that he needs to—

"MS. HUDDLE:—if the Court is ordering him to produce [them].

"THE COURT:—absent himself. I'm suggesting he needs to send somebody, given the fact that he hasn't done it in the week that's transpired to go get it so he can also attend this trial.

"MS. HUDDLE: We will have to find if somebody here will go and do it and if it's there—

"THE COURT: Ms. Huddle.

"MS. HUDDLE: I don't know who—

"THE COURT: Ms. Huddle, you don't need to think out loud." (Italics & boldface added.)

At the hearing before the special masters, Judge McBrien testified that he never ordered Mr. Carlsson to provide the forms, but simply made a request or a suggestion. Judge McBrien acknowledged he did not have the authority to hold Ms. Huddle in contempt because there had not been an order. Instead, he was "explaining the landscape." According to Judge McBrien: "That means that she's resisting. I'm getting, for the most part, stronger and stronger in my wording. And eventually it's going to become an ever-so-clear order, if need be, at which point if she continues her course of resistance, the possibility of contempt becomes an option."

Judge McBrien testified that he was frustrated with Ms. Huddle's failure to understand that she could not assert a Fifth Amendment privilege to prevent disclosure of a document that must be made available to the public. The masters concluded that while Judge McBrien may have been frustrated with Ms. Huddle's attempted assertion of a Fifth Amendment right, this was not the reason he threatened her with contempt. We concur and find Judge McBrien threatened Ms. Huddle with contempt to compel her to produce the documents he had requested.

Ms. Huddle testified to being "extremely concerned" when Judge McBrien mentioned the possibility of contempt. She perceived his comments as a threat "that I could potentially be put in jail if I didn't comply with what he wanted."

2. Conclusions of Law

(6) The masters concluded that Judge McBrien's threat of contempt violates California Code of Judicial Ethics canon 2 which requires a judge to avoid impropriety and the appearance of impropriety and canon 3B(4) which requires a judge to be patient, dignified and courteous to all parties with whom the judge deals in an official capacity. The masters reasoned, "While the threats of contempt may have been empty, Judge McBrien violated these canons because his statements during this exchange would have been perceived as threatening contempt." The masters determined that the conduct constitutes improper action. We concur in all of the foregoing, except we determine that the wrongdoing constitutes prejudicial misconduct.

Once again Judge McBrien claims that his conduct was not inappropriate. He maintains that his words to Ms. Huddle do not constitute misconduct because a reasonable lawyer would not perceive his comments as an actual threat of contempt. The masters disagreed and so do we. In our view, an objective person would interpret the comment "am I to take that as a 'no' placing you in the possibility of contempt?" as a threat of contempt.

Judge McBrien concedes that he did not have authority to threaten contempt because he had not made an order. Nevertheless, he raised the possibility of contempt if Ms. Huddle failed to produce a document he had no right to order her to produce in the first place.

(7) Threats of contempt without proper justification have been found to constitute prejudicial misconduct and willful misconduct. (Kloepfer v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 49 Cal.3d at pp. 846–847, 848–849 [prejudicial misconduct found where judge threatened witness with contempt for continuing to answer a question after an objection was raised, and threatened a defendant with contempt for whispering to his lawyer]; Inquiry Concerning Ross (1998) No. 141, Decision and Order Imposing Censure and Bar, pp. 5–7 [48 Cal.4th CJP Supp. 19, 26] [willful misconduct when judge threatened attorney with contempt if he said " 'one more word' " to embarrass the attorney because the judge was angry with him based on previous disputes].) The masters did not find that Judge McBrien's statement was made in bad faith or that he actually intended to hold Ms. Huddle in contempt. Rather, they found that his words could reasonably be interpreted as a threat of contempt. Having deferred to this finding, we do not believe Judge McBrien's conduct amounts to willful misconduct. However, raising the possibility of contempt for failure to comply with a request to produce documents that were not relevant to the proceeding reflects adversely on the judiciary and is prejudicial to public esteem for the judiciary. We conclude that Judge McBrien's conduct constitutes prejudicial misconduct.

C. Count IA(3)—Ordering the Transcript and Sending It to Mr. Carlsson's Employer

1. Findings of Fact

At some point after Mr. Carlsson was cross-examined concerning whether he had disclosed his loan from Mr. Minkoff on his statement of economic interests, Judge McBrien asked his clerk to have the court reporter prepare a partial transcript of that cross-examination. Judge McBrien testified that he asked for the partial transcript to "ensure that what [he] thought he had heard, [he] had actually heard." The court reporter, Robbi Joy, testified that the clerk approached her during a break in the trial and said Judge McBrien wanted the part of the transcript that dealt with Mr. Carlsson's employment, and "he instructs you not to tell anyone." When asked at his deposition if he instructed his clerk to tell the court reporter not to tell anyone, Judge McBrien responded, "Not to my recollection." The clerk did not recall the judge instructing her not to tell the attorneys and could not imagine that he would make such a request. The masters found that the allegation concerning the instruction was not proven. We defer to that finding.

Although Judge McBrien requested the transcript sometime between March 3 and 10, 2006, he did not receive the transcript at that time. In May 2006, after having issued a decision in the trial, Judge McBrien made a second request for the transcript. In September 2006, Judge McBrien's clerk called Ms. Joy and made a third request for the transcript. Ms. Joy e-mailed the transcript to the clerk's e-mail address.

According to Judge McBrien, when he read the transcript, he was concerned that Mr. Carlsson may have violated the FPPA by not disclosing his business relationship with Mr. Minkoff. He had been thinking about the issue for some time before he received the transcript. He discussed the matter with two other judges and concluded that he had an obligation to report a possible crime and that he should send the transcript to Mr. Carlsson's employer, DGS, rather than the FPPC. One of the judges with whom he consulted knew Linda Cabatic, the general counsel at DGS, whom Judge McBrien had had some professional contact with in the late 1970's. Judge McBrien called Ms. Cabatic and said "words to the effect that a DGS employee had testified in court and that he was concerned about the testimony in connection with disclosure of a reporting issue." On September 11, 2006, Judge McBrien faxed the transcript to Ms. Cabatic. This was the first time Judge McBrien had reported a litigant or attorney for possible criminal activity in any case.

Judge McBrien continued to preside over posttrial contested matters in the Carlsson dissolution case without disclosing his actions, including conducting a hearing on a posttrial motion nine days after he faxed the transcript to Mr. Carlsson's employer. He disqualified himself on November 7, 2006, after learning DGS took disciplinary action against Mr. Carlsson.

After receiving the transcript from Judge McBrien, DGS dismissed Mr. Carlsson from his employment based on his willful failure to disclose his joint ownership of the fourplex with Mr. Minkoff.

2. Conclusions of Law

(8) The masters concluded that Judge McBrien violated California Code of Judicial Ethics canons 2 (appearance of impropriety) and 3E(2) (duty to disclose information that is reasonably relevant to question of disqualification). We concur. Further, the masters concluded that his actions in making three requests for the transcript, sending the transcript to Mr. Carlsson's employer while telling the employer that the transcript involved a reporting matter, failing to notify the parties about his action, and continuing to preside over posttrial motions constituted prejudicial misconduct. We conclude that these actions constitute willful misconduct.

(9) Willful misconduct is (1) unjudicial conduct that is (2) committed in bad faith (3) by a judge acting in his judicial capacity. (Broadman, supra, 18 Cal.4th at p. 1091.)

Failure to comply with the canons of the California Code of Judicial Ethics is generally considered to constitute unjudicial conduct. (Adams v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1994) 8 Cal.4th 630, 662 [34 Cal.Rptr.2d 641, 882 P.2d 358].)

A judge acts in bad faith "only by (1) performing a judicial act for a corrupt purpose (which is any purpose other than the faithful discharge of judicial duties), or (2) performing a judicial act with knowledge that the act is beyond the judge's lawful judicial power, or (3) performing a judicial act that exceeds the judge's lawful power with a conscious disregard for the limits of the judge's authority." (Broadman, supra, 18 Cal.4th at p. 1092.)

"A judge is acting in a judicial capacity while performing one of the functions, whether adjudicative or administrative in nature, that are associated with the position of a judge or when the judge uses or attempts to use the authority of the judicial office for an improper purpose." (Broadman, supra, 18 Cal.4th at p. 1104.) Judge McBrien was acting in his judicial capacity when he requested the transcript, sent it to Mr. Carlsson's employer, and continued to preside over posttrial matters.

Having determined that Judge McBrien engaged in unjudicial conduct in a judicial capacity, the remaining question is whether he acted in bad faith. We conclude that he did. Through his embroilment, Judge McBrien abandoned his role as a neutral arbitrator and acted for a purpose other than the faithful discharge of his duties. (See Inquiry Concerning Spitzer (2007) No. 182, Decision and Order Removing Judge from Office, pp. 19–26 [49 Cal.4th CJP Supp. 254, 275–280]; Ryan v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1988) 45 Cal.3d 518, 535–536 [247 Cal.Rptr. 378, 754 P.2d 724].)

The masters determined that Judge McBrien did not act in bad faith because he believed he had a duty as a judicial officer to report a possible violation of law. Even if we accept that this was the judge's motivation in faxing the transcript to Mr. Carlsson's employer, the masters concluded that "Judge McBrien's conduct went far beyond the consideration of whether he had such a duty in this case, and that Judge McBrien engaged in an investigation during the course of the trial and post-trial period, as to whether Mr. Carlsson's conduct violated the FPPA."

After Mr. Carlsson was cross-examined about whether he disclosed his joint ownership with Mr. Minkoff in documents he was required to file pursuant to the FPPA, Judge McBrien independently questioned Mr. Carlsson about his statements of economic interests. The judge made a sua sponte request of Mr. Carlsson to produce the documents by the next day, and suggested that Mr. Carlsson consult with an attorney because of "potential penalties far beyond what we're talking about today." Before the trial ended, Judge McBrien requested a copy of Mr. Carlsson's testimony concerning his disclosures on the statement of economic interests without notifying the attorneys. Even after the termination of the trial, Judge McBrien persisted in his efforts to obtain the transcript.

It is evident that Judge McBrien repeatedly requested the transcript and reported Mr. Carlsson to his employer for a purpose wholly unrelated to the dissolution action before him. As the masters observed, "Judge McBrien did not simply learn of a possible violation of the law by presiding over the Carlsson trial, he 'join[ed] the fray' through his investigation and lengthy pursuit of the issue." (Quoting from Rothman, Cal. Judicial Conduct Handbook (3d ed. 2007) § 2.01, p. 37.) Moreover, Judge McBrien did not report Mr. Carlsson's testimony to the FPPC, the Attorney General or the district attorney, agencies with authority to investigate a criminal violation, but instead sent the transcript to Mr. Carlsson's employer.

We understand that Judge McBrien conferred with two other judges before making this decision. However, there is no evidence that these judges knew the extent to which Judge McBrien had become involved in investigating whether Mr. Carlsson had violated the law or knew that the judge continued to preside over contested matters in the case without disclosing his actions to the parties.

(10) We have not ignored that Mr. Carlsson's testimony implicated a possible violation of law. Where, as here, there are others in the courtroom who have knowledge of the potential criminal conduct revealed during the course of the proceeding, a judge is not obliged to report the crime but it is not necessarily improper for the judge to do so. (See Rothman, Cal. Judicial Conduct Handbook, supra, § 5.68 at pp. 253–255.) In deciding whether to report a potential crime, a judge must be sensitive to the obligation to remain impartial. "[G]iven the enormous burden to remain impartial and be perceived as such throughout proceedings before the court, a judge could properly conclude that his or her impartiality, or the perception of same, would be impaired were he or she to initiate prosecution of those appearing before the court." (Id. at p. 253.) Further, if the judge does report the crime, he or she must avoid "becoming an advocate" in the process of making the report. (Id. at p. 254, boldface omitted.) More importantly, a judge who reports a crime must inform the parties that such a report has been made. (Rothman, Cal. Judicial Conduct Handbook (Apr. 2008 supp.) 2006/2007 Judicial Ethics Update, § I.C.2., p. 2.)

(11) The masters concluded that Judge McBrien became so personally embroiled as to make him unfit to conduct further proceedings. We concur. Judge McBrien has given various explanations for his failure to disclose or disqualify: he did not know whether DGS already had the information he faxed to Ms. Cabatic; he did not know for sure whether Mr. Carlsson had failed to make the necessary disclosure on his statement of economic interests; and he believed Mr. Carlsson may not have been aware of what was included on the form when he signed it because his secretary filled it out. These explanations do not excuse the judge's failure to disclose or disqualify. Judge McBrien knew the transcript might contain evidence of improper activity by Mr. Carlsson—that is why he provided the transcript to DGS. Under these circumstances, a person aware of the facts would reasonably entertain a doubt that the judge would be able to be impartial. (Code Civ. Proc., § 170.1(a)(6)(A)(iii); Cal. Code Jud. Ethics, canon 3E(1).) As such, Judge McBrien had an obligation to disqualify regardless of whether he knew for certain whether Mr. Carlsson had violated the law or whether the agency would take action.

We conclude that Judge McBrien's course of conduct as charged and proven in this count constitutes willful misconduct.

D. Count IA(4)—Demeanor

1. Findings of Fact

From the beginning of the trial, Judge McBrien manifested his impatience with Ms. Huddle. As reflected in the factual findings on count IA(1), the judge repeatedly threatened to declare a mistrial if the trial was not completed within the two-day estimate, even threatening a mistrial if the trial was not completed by the end of a day and a half. The masters found the mistrial threats were exclusively directed at Ms. Huddle, and were not provoked by disrespectful or inappropriate conduct but "triggered by such conduct as questioning witnesses, asking for breaks when the trial went through the lunch hour, making objections, or discussing evidentiary issues."

Judge McBrien made derogatory and discourteous remarks to Ms. Huddle independent of his mistrial threats. He admonished her not to "think out loud" as she attempted to voice an objection. When Ms. Huddle attempted to make a record of the seriousness of her witness's illness to explain why she had requested a continuance of his testimony, Judge McBrien admonished her that "[t]his is not a law school class," and she did not have to explain her motives. Ms. Huddle testified that the judge used a demeaning voice when he made this comment, as if she were being scolded. Judge McBrien testified he made the law school comment to point out that she did not have to give detailed explanations as required in law school, but admitted that someone could have perceived his comment as demeaning. All of Judge McBrien's discourteous remarks were made in open court in the presence of Ms. Huddle's client and the public.[5]

2. Conclusions of Law

The masters concluded that Judge McBrien violated California Code of Judicial Ethics canons 2 (appearance of impropriety) and 3B(4) (judge shall be patient, dignified, and courteous) by being discourteous to Ms. Huddle, repeatedly threatening a mistrial to pressure her to finish her case, and addressing her in a derogatory manner. They further concluded that his misconduct constitutes improper action. We concur and reach the same conclusions of law.

Although Judge McBrien may have been frustrated by the slow pace of the trial and Ms. Huddle's lack of preparation, we agree with the masters that the "conduct of trial judges is governed by the canons, not the actions of attorneys."

E. Mitigating Evidence

At the hearing before the special masters, Judge McBrien called numerous judges and attorneys and a licensed clinical social worker who works with the Sacramento County Superior Court family law division as character witnesses. Based on this testimony, the masters found in mitigation that Judge McBrien is extremely hard working, has played an active role in improving the family law system in Sacramento County, is respected by attorneys who frequently appear in front of him and judges who serve with him, and has served as a mentor to new judges in the family law division. We adopt these findings.

[5] Ms. Joy testified that during a break she overheard an ex parte conversation between Judge McBrien and Ms. Keeley questioning Ms. Huddle's competence. We defer to the masters' finding that this allegation was not proven.

F. Prior Discipline

Judge McBrien received a public admonishment in 2002 based on his misdemeanor conviction which "arose out of the 1999 cutting of trees, and removal of limbs from trees, on public land adjacent to his residence." The admonishment states: "The trees were growing in a nature center located in a public park owned by the County of Sacramento. The trees included mature oaks, and were cut for the purpose of improving the view of a nearby river from the McBrien residence." Judge McBrien agreed to the public admonishment pursuant to a stipulation.

As the masters state, "For reasons that are not clear, Judge McBrien felt compelled to testify extensively about the matter." Judge McBrien testified he wanted to explain what happened in the tree incident because he had been "vilified" by the Sacramento News and Review, which called him "Chainsaw McBrien" and still portrayed him "as the Paul Bunyan of Sacramento." He testified: "In fact, it involved one limb on one tree. And at the time that the tree was cut—by an arborist, not me personally—I did not know that it was against the law." Further, he testified that he had the tree removed "to enhance the fire safety of our residence and the residence next to us." When cross-examined about the language in the admonishment which stated that "trees" were cut for the purpose of improving his view, Judge McBrien testified he did not dispute the language in the public admonishment and agreed to the public admonishment "[p]robably to avoid a hearing." (Italics added.)

After the evidentiary hearing before the masters, the parties stipulated to the examiner's admission of additional exhibits regarding the underlying facts of the prior disciplinary matter and Judge McBrien's admission of a written statement to clarify his hearing testimony.

The examiner introduced Judge McBrien's sworn statement taken at a deposition in August 2001 during the investigation in the prior proceeding. The masters found that Judge McBrien's testimony at the hearing regarding the facts underlying his prior public admonishment were inconsistent with his testimony at the 2001 deposition. We concur. At the deposition, the judge testified he observed a tree trimmer cut a limb from a tree in his backyard and later saw a limb fall from another tree after the tree trimmer got out of the tree. He also testified that he subsequently learned the trimmer had worked on five mature trees and three small trees.

Judge McBrien submitted the following statement to the special masters after the hearing: "Judge McBrien's [hearing] testimony regarding the arborist's trimming of oak trees related to his own personal observation and not to the extent of the tree trimming activity that was the subject of the misdemeanor charge. Judge McBrien observed only one large limb cut from the oak tree in question and apologizes if there was any confusion regarding this testimony. Judge McBrien acknowledges that the limb he observed being removed was not the only cutting done by the arborist. The point Judge McBrien was attempting to make by way of his testimony was that it did not make any difference whether the oak tree was on private or public land; the prohibitory ordinance made any cutting without a permit a misdemeanor. While view enhancement was an intended effect of the trimming, the testimony of Judge McBrien on April 3, 2009 was true and correct to his best recollection."

The masters found in aggravation that Judge McBrien gave testimony inconsistent with his prior sworn testimony regarding the underlying matter of his prior public admonishment and improperly tried to use the special masters' hearing as a public forum to address a grievance with the media on a prior disciplinary matter. We concur.

III

DISCIPLINE

A. Introduction

(12) We now turn to the most difficult part of our decision, the determination of the appropriate discipline. The purpose of a commission disciplinary proceeding " 'is not punishment, but rather the protection of the public, the enforcement of rigorous standards of judicial conduct, and the maintenance of public confidence in the integrity and independence of the judicial system.' " (Broadman, supra, 18 Cal.4th at pp. 1111–1112, quoting Adams v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1995) 10 Cal.4th 866, 912 [42 Cal.Rptr.2d 606, 897 P.2d 544].) Based on the record before us and after careful consideration, we have come to the conclusion that this purpose is best served by a public censure, the second most serious level of discipline that can be imposed.

Judge McBrien's conduct in the Carlsson case is unbefitting a judge and casts disrepute upon the judiciary. Particularly troubling is his inability to understand and accept the impropriety of his conduct as exemplified by the shifting and disingenuous explanations he has offered during the course of these proceedings. While these factors alone might warrant removal from office, other considerations have persuaded us that a severe public censure is the appropriate discipline. Those considerations include mitigating factors found by the masters concerning the judge's reputation in the legal community and contributions to the family law system in Sacramento County, a lengthy tenure on the bench without previous discipline for on-bench misconduct, and the fact that the misconduct, although serious, occurred within the context of one case.[6] We now turn to a discussion of the factors we have considered in reaching our decision.

B. Analysis of Disciplinary Factors

In reaching our decision, we have considered those factors previously identified by the commission as relevant to determining the appropriate discipline as pertinent to this case. (Inquiry Concerning Ross (2005) No. 174, Decision and Order Removing Judge from Office, pp. 63–64 [49 Cal.4th CJP Supp. 79, 138–139]; Inquiry Concerning Van Voorhis (2003) No. 165, Decision and Order Removing Judge from Office, p. 31 [48 Cal.4th CJP Supp. 257, 275–276]; see also Policy Declarations of the Com. on Jud. Performance, policy 7.1 [nonexclusive factors relevant to sanctions].)

1. Number of Acts and Seriousness of Misconduct.

(13) The number of acts of misconduct is relevant to discipline to the extent it shows isolated incidents, or a pattern which demonstrates that the judge lacks judicial temperament and the " ' "ability to perform judicial functions in an even-handed manner." ' " (Fletcher, supra, 19 Cal.4th at p. 918.) In addition to the number of acts of misconduct, the nature and seriousness of the misconduct is an important factor in the commission's consideration. (Broadman, supra, 18 Cal.4th at pp. 1112–1113; Policy Declarations of the Com. on Jud. Performance, policy 7.1(1)(b).) Judge McBrien has engaged in one instance of willful misconduct, two incidents of prejudicial misconduct, and one incident of improper action. Under the California Constitution, improper action is not a basis for censure or removal. (Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (d).) Accordingly, we do not consider the judge's improper action in reaching our determination to censure Judge McBrien. The remaining three instances of misconduct demonstrate a pattern of serious wrongdoing throughout the course of presiding over the Carlsson case warranting severe discipline.

[6] This should not be construed as suggesting that removal may never be warranted based on multiple incidents of misconduct within the context of one case. In fact, removal may be based on a single act of serious misconduct. (Inquiry Concerning MacEachern (2008) No. 184, Decision and Order Removing Judge from Office, p. 19 [49 Cal.4th CJP Supp. 289, 307].)

2. Prior Discipline.

As previously indicated, Judge McBrien was publicly admonished in 2002. The fact that Judge McBrien has engaged in subsequent serious misconduct is an aggravating factor. However, we also take into consideration that the previous discipline was for off-bench misconduct that was not similar to the misconduct in this case.

3. Appreciation of Misconduct.

(14) "A judge's failure to appreciate or admit to the impropriety of his or her acts indicates a lack of capacity to reform." (Inquiry Concerning Platt (2002) No. 162, Decision and Order Removing Judge from Office, p. 15 [48 Cal.4th CJP Supp. 227, 248].) Consideration of this factor weighs strongly in favor of severe discipline.

Prior to his final appearance before the commission, Judge McBrien repeatedly denied any wrongdoing or impropriety in his conduct. In his testimony before the masters, the judge expressed his view that walking out of the trial while a witness was testifying and never returning was an appropriate response to Ms. Huddle's failure to complete her case within her time estimate. Despite an appellate decision holding to the contrary, Judge McBrien remained steadfast that he did not violate the parties' due process rights. He views his statement to Ms. Huddle raising the possibility of contempt as "a poor choice of words" but fails to recognize that a reasonable observer could perceive his words and tone as a threat of contempt. Contrary to the masters' conclusion, he denies becoming embroiled. He contends that he did not "join the fray" because he did not take a position on whether Mr. Carlsson violated the law, while ignoring that he testified to having "an overlying concern as to whether or not Mr. Carlsson had violated the FPPC rules," and reported Mr. Carlsson to DGS for that reason. Finally, Judge McBrien denies being impatient with or discourteous to Ms. Huddle, despite a transcript that reflects unrelenting threats of a mistrial and multiple disparaging remarks directed exclusively at Ms. Huddle in the presence of her client.

At the hearing before the masters, Judge McBrien was asked about his statement in a letter to the commission acknowledging that he "had acted badly . . . for which I deserve to be rebuked." What he meant, he explained, is that he "acted badly" by failing to leave a complete record so that the Court of Appeal and the public would understand the reasons for his actions. When asked if he did anything else wrong in the case, he responded, "I don't believe that I did."

In his oral argument before the commission, Judge McBrien belatedly showed some recognition of his wrongdoing. He acknowledged that he had engaged in misconduct by failing to return to the bench after taking the EPO call to determine if the parties had additional relevant evidence to present and by failing to disclose that he sent the partial transcript to Mr. Carlsson's employer. Acceptance of responsibility at the last opportunity has limited impact after well over a year of recalcitrant excuses and denials to the masters and the commission. (Inquiry Concerning MacEachern, supra, No. 184 at p. 23 [49 Cal.4th CJP Supp. at pp. 310–311].)

4. Likelihood of Future Misconduct.

Judge McBrien's failure to appreciate the full extent and gravamen of his misconduct indicates an inability to reform which in turn suggests a likelihood of future misconduct. However, we also recognize that a lengthy tenure on the bench with no previous discipline for on-bench misconduct and the fact that the misconduct occurred within the context of one case could suggest that the misconduct is isolated to this case rather than representing a pattern which is likely to reoccur. As such, we are not convinced that removal is necessary to protect the public from future misconduct.

5. The Judge's Integrity and Honesty.

(15) The misconduct itself does not involve dishonesty. However, the fact that Judge McBrien gave testimony inconsistent with his prior sworn statement concerning his prior public admonishment and provided inconsistent statements and testimony on other subjects relevant to this proceeding is a matter of concern in terms of the judge's honesty and integrity. We have previously considered intentional dishonesty, particularly under oath, to be antithetical to the role of a judge. (Inquiry Concerning MacEachern, supra, No. 184 at pp. 19–22 [49 Cal.4th CJP Supp. at pp. 307–310]; Inquiry Concerning Ross, supra, No. 174 at pp. 68–69 [49 Cal.4th CJP Supp. at pp. 141–142].)

The masters did not make a finding that Judge McBrien gave intentionally false testimony on the subject of his prior admonishment. Although we are deeply troubled by Judge McBrien's testimony on this subject, the question of whether it was intentionally false was not litigated to the extent that we can make this determination on our own accord in this proceeding. However, as did the masters, we consider Judge McBrien's inconsistent testimony concerning his prior admonishment to be an aggravating factor. A judge who gives sworn testimony must take care to ensure that the testimony is truthful and accurate. Even an unintentional inconsistency in testimony creates an appearance of impropriety. This was not an area of examination that took Judge McBrien by surprise; he broached the subject on his own accord. Further, we concur with the masters' conclusion that Judge McBrien's use of the hearing before the special masters as a public forum to address a grievance with the media on a prior disciplinary matter was highly inappropriate and constitutes an aggravating factor.

Also disturbing are Judge McBrien's disingenuous attempts to explain why he requested Mr. Carlsson's statements of economic interests and the transcript of Mr. Carlsson's testimony. Even at his oral argument before the commission, he persisted in his attempt to persuade us that he thought the documents could have an impact on the valuation of the fourplex. The masters were not persuaded and neither are we. Rather, we consider the judge's strained attempts to relate these documents to the issues before him in the trial to be another example of his refusal to accept responsibility for his wrongdoing.

Judge McBrien has provided other self-serving statements and testimony during these proceedings which have subsequently been shown to be inaccurate based on the transcripts of the Carlsson trial and other documentary evidence admitted at the hearing before the special masters. He explains these inaccuracies as being the result of his bad memory. Even if this were the case, his failure to check the record before making representations to the commission and the masters on material issues reflects an arrogant indifference toward these proceedings.

6. Impact on the Judicial System.

(16) Judge McBrien's misconduct has had a significant adverse impact on the judicial system. His decision in Carlsson was reversed on appeal as a result of his conduct in abandoning the trial, costing the parties substantial expense and delays. Moreover, a judge who abruptly and precipitously abandons a trial, improperly threatens contempt, inappropriately investigates potential criminal activity and sends evidence of a potential crime to a litigant's employer while continuing to preside over the case lowers public esteem for the judiciary.

Although Judge McBrien's misconduct in this case has adversely impacted the judicial system, we appreciate that throughout his long tenure on the family law bench he has worked to improve the family law system in Sacramento County as set forth in the masters' findings of factors in mitigation.

ORDER

Having carefully considered and balanced the various factors that contribute to our decision, we have determined that the purpose of judicial discipline as enunciated by the Supreme Court and this commission can be accomplished through a severe censure. Pursuant to the provisions of article VI, section 18 of the California Constitution, we hereby impose a severe public censure on Judge Peter J. McBrien.

Commission members Hon. Judith D. McConnell, Hon. Katherine Feinstein, Mr. Peter E. Flores, Jr., Hon. Frederick P. Horn, Mr. Lawrence Simi, Ms. Sandra Talcott, and Mr. Nathaniel Trives voted in favor of all of the findings and conclusions expressed herein and in the foregoing order of a severe public censure. Commission members Ms. Maya Dillard Smith and Ms. Barbara Schraeger concur as to the factual findings and legal conclusions expressed herein, but dissent as to the order of severe public censure and would have removed Judge McBrien from office. Commission members Mr. Marshall Grossman and Mr. Samuel Hardage did not participate in this matter.

I. INTRODUCTION AND PROCEDURAL SUMMARY

This disciplinary matter concerns former Judge Brett C. Klein (Judge Klein), a judge of the Los Angeles County Superior Court from January 23, 1990 to November 30, 2009, when he irrevocably retired from judicial office.

The commission filed a Notice of Formal Proceedings (Notice) on January 14, 2010, charging Judge Klein with misconduct constituting an abuse of authority and reflecting embroilment, bias and a failure to be patient, dignified and courteous in his handling of a hearing in a class action lawsuit. Judge Klein and his counsel, Reginald A. Vitek, Esq., and the examiner for the commission, Andrew Blum, Esq., (the parties) submitted a Stipulation for Discipline by Consent (Stipulation) to the commission pursuant to Commission rule 127. Pursuant to the Stipulation, the judge agreed to the imposition of a censure and bar from holding judicial office in California or receiving assignments, appointments, or references of work from any California state court. If Judge Klein fails to comply with any of the terms and conditions of the agreement, the commission may withdraw the censure and proceed with formal proceedings. In an affidavit of consent for discipline filed with the Stipulation pursuant to rule 127 (d), Judge Klein admits the truth of the charges in the Notice and waives all further proceedings and review by the Supreme Court. According to the terms of the Stipulation, Judge Klein also agrees that in the decision and order imposing a censure and bar, the commission may articulate the reasons for its decision. The Stipulation was accepted by the commission on January 27, 2010.

II. STIPULATED FACTS AND LEGAL CONCLUSIONS

Jacqueline Cohen, et al. v. Windsor Fashions, Inc. (Los Angeles Superior Court No. BC381468) was a class action lawsuit against a women's clothing store chain. The suit alleged that Windsor Fashions violated the Song-Beverly Credit Card Act (Civ. Code, §§ 1747-1748.95) by asking customers who made purchases by credit card for personal identification information. Plaintiffs were represented by Neil Fineman. Defendant was represented by Dennis Kass.

The case was assigned to Judge Susan Bryant-Deason. In November 2008, Judge Bryant-Deason certified the class and granted preliminary approval of a settlement reached by the parties after mediation. The terms of the settlement included a permanent injunction prohibiting Windsor Fashions from requesting and recording personal identification information from credit card purchasers, its agreement to purge information already obtained, and the issuance to class members of a $10 voucher that could be used at any California Windsor Fashions store. The settlement agreement also provided for the payment by Windsor Fashions of a $2,500 award to plaintiff Jacqueline Cohen for her services as the class representative, and for payment of $125,000 in attorney's fees and costs to Attorney Fineman.

After giving notice of the settlement to the class members and receiving no objections, the parties filed a joint application for final approval of the settlement, which included a proposed final approval order. The final approval hearing, referred to as a fairness hearing, was set for the morning of January 16, 2009, a Friday. Because Judge Bryant-Deason was ill that day, Judge Klein presided over the fairness hearing. Judge Klein had reviewed the court file on January 15, 2009.

During the January 16 hearing, Judge Klein engaged in a pattern of sarcasm and improper remarks toward the attorneys, as exemplified by the following:

THE COURT: How did [class plaintiff] come to learn that this was a violation of law to ask for her phone number? Did she already know it that day?

MR. FINEMAN: That day, she did not know it.

THE COURT: Someone mentioned it to her at a cocktail party?

[¶] ... [¶]

THE COURT: There's nothing in the court records to identify her other than this name, which is probably more common than the most common legal fictitious name for a woman, which would be Jane Doe. There are probably more Jacqueline Cohens than there are Jane Does in the world; right?
(R.T. 6:15-20.)

[¶] ... [¶]

THE COURT: Surely [Windsor Fashions] know[s] what the average customer purchase is.

MR. KASS: I'm not qualified to discuss that. I have not had that conversation with them.

THE COURT: This is the lawyer's way of saying I don't know?

[¶] ... [¶]

THE COURT: ... So you reduced your charges for the typing time?

MR. FINEMAN: Yes, Your Honor.

THE COURT: To what level?

MR. FINEMAN: That's a good question, Your Honor. I'd have to go back.

> THE COURT: Thank you. I appreciate the praise.
>
> [¶] ... [¶]
>
> THE COURT: Would your [$]395 rate have been higher or would you have used the higher rate if you had decided to sign your declaration rather than to file it unsigned or would it have been the same?
> (R.T. 27:13-16.)

At the end of the hearing, Judge Klein said that he was taking the matter under submission. That afternoon, Judge Klein revised paragraphs 8 and 9 in the proposed final approval order, which concerned payment of attorney's fees and costs and payment of the incentive award to class representative Cohen. Judge Klein did so by typing new paragraphs 8 and 9 and pasting them over the corresponding paragraphs in the proposed final approval order. Instead of receiving payment in cash, the new paragraphs 8 and 9 provided that Mr. Fineman and Ms. Cohen would be paid in the form of $10 gift cards for Windsor Fashions. Paragraph 8 provided that Mr. Fineman was to receive 12,500 gift cards, with 3,500 cards due in January 2009 and 750 due every month for the following twelve months. Paragraph 9 provided that Ms. Cohen would receive 250 gift cards in January 2009. Judge Klein signed and dated the order, and crossed off the word "Proposed" on the caption.

Judge Klein had not mentioned during the January 16 hearing that he was considering making such changes to the proposed settlement. On the afternoon of January 16, Judge Klein instructed his clerk to email the order to the attorneys. The email message to the attorneys, which Judge Klein dictated to his clerk, was: "The Final Approval Order was signed and filed this afternoon. A scan is attached. (Five pages, pdf format.)"

On January 16, 2009, Judge Klein transmitted the order to the Metropolitan News-Enterprise, a local daily legal newspaper. On January 21, 2009, the Metropolitan News-Enterprise published a disparaging article about the Cohen case settlement that described Judge Klein's January 16 order with approval. The article resulted in further publicity and Internet postings critical of the case and Mr. Fineman.

On January 29, 2009, Judge Klein sent an email message to Judge Bryant-Deason in which he stated that his January 16 ruling in Cohen "troubles me," and referred to the provisions in paragraphs 8 and 9 of his order as "unusual." He suggested that he could order sua sponte reconsideration of the joint motion for final approval and then recuse himself so that Judge Bryant-Deason could decide the matter. On February 2, 2009, on Judge Klein's own motion, he ordered reconsideration of the ruling, and set the matter for February 13 in Judge Bryant-Deason's department. On February 9, Judge Bryant-Deason advanced the date to February 9, vacated Judge Klein's January 16 ruling and entered a new final order providing for a plaintiff's award of $2,500 and attorney's fees of $125,000, to be paid as originally approved.

Judge Klein's conduct displays bias and embroilment, and constitutes an abuse of authority. His conduct also reflects a failure to be patient, dignified and courteous to those appearing before him. Judge Klein's conduct violates the Code of Judicial Ethics, canons 1 (judge shall observe high standards of conduct), 2A (judge shall act at all times in a manner that promotes public confidence in the judiciary), 3B(4) (judge shall be patient, dignified, and courteous to persons with whom the judge deals in an official capacity), and 3B(5) (judge shall not perform judicial duties with bias or prejudice, or engage in conduct that would reasonably be perceived as bias or prejudice). Judge Klein's conduct constitutes, at a minimum, conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute pursuant to article VI, section 18(d)(2) of the California Constitution.

OTHER FACTS RELEVANT TO DISCIPLINE

In 2002, Judge Klein received an advisory letter for improper and unprofessional remarks at a hearing about an attorney who was not present. The remarks suggested bias and embroilment. In 2004, Judge Klein was publicly admonished for abusing his authority and displaying bias and embroilment through actions he took after a judgment he had entered was reversed by the Court of Appeal. The Court of Appeal had found that Judge Klein acted "arbitrarily and capriciously" in reducing a damages award to plaintiffs in a personal injury case and remanded the case to him with instructions to enter judgment in accordance with the evidence. Judge Klein failed to follow the remand instructions. (Pub. Adm. No. 33.)

III. DISCIPLINE

Article VI, section 18, subsection (d) of the California Constitution provides that the commission may "censure a judge... for action... that constitutes... conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute." By the terms of the Stipulation, Judge Klein concedes that his conduct was, at a minimum, prejudicial misconduct.

The stipulated censure and bar is the maximum sanction the commission may impose upon a former judge. (Cal. Const., art. VI, § 8, subd. (d).) We have determined that this is the appropriate discipline based on the serious nature of the misconduct and Judge Klein's history of discipline for similar misconduct.

As noted in the stipulated facts, Judge Klein has previously been disciplined for misconduct reflecting bias and embroilment, for making improper remarks about an attorney, and for abusing his authority. Despite this disciplinary history, Judge Klein continued to engage in the same type of misconduct in his handling of the case of Jacqueline Cohen, et al. v. Windsor Fashions, Inc. His embroilment and bias are manifested through the highly unorthodox manner in which he modified the proposed final order to provide for the payment of $125,000 in attorney's fees in $10 gift cards rather than cash and by his action in transmitting the order to the press. Judge Klein abandoned his role as a neutral arbitrator and gave the appearance of being punitive toward the plaintiffs' attorney and grandstanding to the press. Further, his conduct in the case demonstrates a continued pattern of making improper comments toward those with whom he deals in his judicial capacity.

With Judge Klein's prior discipline in mind, we conclude that the misconduct in the present matter demonstrates a continuing "course of conduct establishing a 'lack of temperament and ability to perform judicial functions in an even-handed manner.' [Citation.]" (Fletcher v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1998) 19 Cal.App.4th 865, 918, quoting from Wenger v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1981) 29 Cal.3d 615, 653.) As such, the commission determines that the discipline proposed in the Stipulation is necessary for the protection of the public and maintenance of public confidence in the integrity of the judiciary.

Based upon the parties' stipulation, and good cause appearing, the commission hereby censures former Judge Brett C. Klein and bars him from holding judicial office in the state of California and from receiving an assignment, appointment, or reference of work from any California state court.

Commission members Hon. Judith D. McConnell, Hon. Katherine Feinstein, Peter Flores, Esq., Marshall B. Grossman, Esq., Mr. Samuel A. Hardage, Ms. Barbara Schraeger, Mr. Lawrence Simi, Ms. Maya Dillard Smith, Ms. Sandra Talcott, and Mr. Nathaniel Trives voted to issue this decision and order imposing a public censure and bar pursuant to the Stipulation. Commission member Hon. Frederick P. Horn did not participate in the vote.

INQUIRY CONCERNING JUDGE JOSEPH W. O'FLAHERTY

SUMMARY

A disciplinary matter was brought concerning a superior court judge.

The Commission on Judicial Performance publicly censured the judge. The Commission concluded that the judge violated Cal. Code Jud. Ethics, canons 1, 2A, 3B(2) and 3B(7). The judge engaged in willful misconduct through his intentional disregard of the law, abuse of authority, embroilment, and failure to afford a litigant his right to be heard. The judge ordered a small claims plaintiff to have no contact with three women and to stay away from a credit union without complying with any of the procedural requirements for the issuance of a restraining order and without affording the plaintiff notice or an opportunity to be heard. The evidence did not support the assertion that the plaintiff, directly or indirectly, abused, threatened or intimidated the women during the court proceeding or at any previous time. The judge was familiar with the requirements for issuance of a restraining order and knew that he was not complying with those requirements when he issued the no-contact order. The judge had previously been publicly admonished for misconduct that involved disregard of the law and abuse of authority. The judge's failure to acknowledge his wrongdoing was particularly troubling given his prior discipline. (Opinion by Judith D. McConnell, Chairperson.)

HEADNOTES

(1) Judges § 6—Discipline—Willful Misconduct—Intentional Disregard of Law—Abuse of Authority—Embroilment—Failure to Afford Litigant Right to Be Heard.—A superior court judge violated Cal. Code Jud. Ethics, canons 1, 2A, 3B(2) and 3B(7), and was publicly censured, where the judge ordered a small claims plaintiff to have no contact with three women and to stay away from a credit union without complying with any of the procedural requirements for the issuance of a restraining order and without affording the plaintiff notice or an opportunity to be heard. The judge engaged in willful misconduct through his intentional disregard of the law, abuse of authority, embroilment, and failure to afford a litigant the right to be heard.

[Cal. Forms of Pleading and Practice (2010) ch. 317, Judges, § 317.85.]

(2) Judges § 6—Discipline—Public Confidence.—The public expects and embraces the concept that a judge shall be faithful to the law. This is so fundamental to a system of justice that it serves as a basic cornerstone of public confidence.

(3) Judges § 6—Discipline—Proceedings—Burden of Proof—Clear and Convincing Evidence.—In a judicial disciplinary proceeding, the examiner has the burden of proving the charges by clear and convincing evidence. Evidence of a charge is clear and convincing so long as there is a high probability that the charge is true. Factual findings of the masters are entitled to great weight because the masters have the advantage of observing the demeanor of the witnesses.

(4) Injunctions § 9—Temporary Restraining Orders—Issuance—Proof of Harassment—Great or Irreparable Harm.—The issuance of a temporary restraining order requires the filing of an affidavit by the person requesting the order showing reasonable proof of harassment as defined by statute, and that great or irreparable harm would result to the person being harassed.

(5) Judges § 6—Discipline—Embroilment.—Embroilment is the process by which the judge surrenders the role of impartial fact finder/decision maker, and joins the fray.

(6) Judges § 6—Discipline—Willful Misconduct.—Willful misconduct by a judge is (1) unjudicial conduct that is (2) committed in bad faith (3) by a judge acting in his or her judicial capacity.

(7) Judges § 6—Discipline—Unjudicial Conduct.—Failure to comply with the Cal. Code, Jud. Ethics is generally considered to constitute unjudicial conduct.

(8) Judges § 6—Discipline—Bad Faith.—A judge acts in bad faith only by (1) performing a judicial act for a corrupt purpose (which is any purpose other than the faithful discharge of judicial duties), or (2) performing a judicial act with knowledge that the act is beyond the judge's lawful judicial power, or (3) performing a judicial act that exceeds the judge's lawful power with a conscious disregard for the limits of the judge's authority.

(9) Injunctions § 1—Exercise of Power—Caution—Strict Compliance with Law.—The power to restrict a person's freedom of movement and contact with other individuals is a weighty responsibility which should be exercised with caution and in strict compliance with the law.

(10) Judges § 6—Discipline—Capacity to Reform.—A judge's failure to appreciate or admit to the impropriety of his or her acts indicates a lack of capacity to reform.

(11) Judges § 6—Discipline—Impact of Judge's Misconduct.—With respect to the appropriate discipline to be imposed in a judicial disciplinary proceeding, the impact of a judge's misconduct on the litigants and judicial system is an important factor to consider. Abuse of judicial authority and conscious disregard of the law are the antithesis of what the public expects of a judge. The integrity of the judiciary depends on public confidence that judges will faithfully comply with the law and act within the bounds of their authority. Intentionally bluffing a litigant manifestly diminishes public esteem for the judiciary.

(12) Judges § 6—Discipline—Purpose.—The purpose of judicial discipline is the protection of the public, the enforcement of rigorous standards of judicial conduct, and the maintenance of public confidence in the integrity of the judiciary.

McCONNELL, Chairperson.—

I

INTRODUCTION AND SUMMARY

This disciplinary matter concerns Judge Joseph W. O'Flaherty, a judge of the Placer County Superior Court. The Commission on Judicial Performance commenced this inquiry with the filing of its notice of formal proceedings (Notice) on February 3, 2010. The Notice charges Judge O'Flaherty with disregard of the law, abuse of authority, embroilment and denial of due process. It alleges that the misconduct occurred during a court proceeding in which the judge issued a no-contact order without following any of the applicable procedural requirements and without affording plaintiff notice or an opportunity to be heard.

The Supreme Court appointed three special masters who held an evidentiary hearing and reported to the commission. The masters are Hon. Stephen J. Kane, Associate Justice of the Court of Appeal, Fifth Appellate District, Hon. Larry W. Allen, Judge of the San Bernardino County Superior Court, and Hon. Allan D. Hardcastle, Judge of the Sonoma County Superior Court. Judge O'Flaherty is represented by James A. Murphy of Murphy, Pearson, Bradley & Feeney in San Francisco, California. The examiners for the commission at the hearing before the special masters were Commission Trial Counsel Andrew Blum and Assistant Trial Counsel Valerie Marchant.[1] At the oral argument before the commission, commission attorney Charlene Drummer served as the examiner.

A two-day evidentiary hearing was held in Sacramento on April 27 to 28, 2010. The masters' report to the commission containing their findings of fact and conclusions of law was filed on June 30, 2010. An oral argument before the commission was heard in San Francisco on August 25, 2010.

(1) The masters concluded that Judge O'Flaherty engaged in willful misconduct, the most serious form of judicial misconduct, through his intentional disregard of the law, abuse of authority, embroilment, and failure to afford a litigant his right to be heard. Based on our independent review of the record we agree. Judge O'Flaherty ordered a small claims plaintiff to have no contact with three women and to stay away from a credit union without complying with any of the procedural requirements for the issuance of a restraining order and without affording the person who was the subject of the order notice or an opportunity to be heard. As did the masters, we reject Judge O'Flaherty's contention that his actions were justified and necessary to address an emergency situation brought on by the plaintiff's harassing and intimidating conduct toward the women. Having observed the videotape of the subject proceedings and reviewed the entire record of the hearing before the special masters, we unequivocally concur with the masters' finding that the evidence does not support the assertion that the plaintiff, directly or indirectly, abused, threatened or intimidated the women during the court proceeding or at any previous time. Judge O'Flaherty issued the no-contact order based on the comments and reaction of the women after plaintiff left the courtroom. The women had not filed a petition for a restraining order or described any conduct by plaintiff which would constitute proof of threats or harassment justifying the issuance of a restraining order. Judge O'Flaherty was familiar with the procedural requirements for issuance of a restraining order and knew that he was not complying with those requirements when he issued the no-contact order.

(2) This is not the first time Judge O'Flaherty has abused his authority and failed to be faithful to the law. In 2004, he was publicly admonished for misconduct that involved disregard of the law and abuse of authority. Despite his prior discipline and the unanimous conclusion of three special masters that he committed willful misconduct in the present case, Judge O'Flaherty insists that his actions do not amount to misconduct. Judge O'Flaherty's continued failure to accept the inherent obligation of a judge to adhere to the law and the limits of judicial authority convinces us that he should be publicly censured. As we stated in Judge O'Flaherty's 2004 public admonishment, " 'The public expects and embraces the concept that a judge shall be faithful to the law. This is so fundamental to a system of justice that it serves as a basic cornerstone of public confidence.' " (Inquiry Concerning O'Flaherty (2004) 49 Cal.4th CJP Supp. 1, 25, quoting from the special masters' report.)

II

FINDINGS OF FACT AND CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

A. Findings of Fact

(3) The examiner has the burden of proving the charges by clear and convincing evidence. (Broadman v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1998) 18 Cal.4th 1079, 1090 [77 Cal.Rptr.2d 408, 959 P.2d 715] (Broadman).) "Evidence of a charge is clear and convincing so long as there is a 'high probability' that the charge is true." (Ibid.) Factual findings of the masters are entitled to great weight because the masters have "the advantage of observing the demeanor of the witnesses." (Ibid.; see Inquiry Concerning Freedman (2007) 49 Cal.4th CJP Supp. 223, 230–232.)

We adopt the masters' factual findings in their entirety, with one minor exception as discussed below. Based on our own independent review of the record, we have determined that the following factual findings are supported by clear and convincing evidence.

1. Findings Concerning the Hearing Before Judge O'Flaherty

Judge O'Flaherty has been a trial judge in Placer County for approximately 20 years.

On December 8, 2008, Judge O'Flaherty presided over the small claims matter of Herold v. Golden 1 Credit Union (Super. Ct. Placer County, No. RSC13621). Herold, an independent car dealer, alleged that an employee of Golden 1, Cynthia Rapozo, made derogatory remarks about independent car dealers which caused Bonnie Davis to break a contract with him for the sale of a car. The comments were allegedly made on May 6, 2008, when Herold and Davis went to the credit union together to obtain financing for Davis. In attendance at the small claims hearing were Herold, Davis, Rapozo, and Melissa Burgess, a supervisor at Golden 1.

Herold commenced his presentation by reading from a prepared statement. Before he finished his first sentence, Judge O'Flaherty interrupted him and told him that he should tell it in his own words. As Herold attempted to explain what happened without the use of his notes, Judge O'Flaherty interrupted him numerous times with questions and comments generally critical of Herold's defamation claim. In contrast to Herold, Davis was allowed to give a lengthy narrative without interruption. After hearing from both Rapozo and Burgess, the judge told Herold that his defamation case against the credit union "isn't even close to a libel." Herold responded that the witnesses were not telling the truth and would have to "sleep with it at night." Judge O'Flaherty responded, "See . . . how you're getting emotional? You were getting emotional—." Herold denied being emotional. He said he knew he was 100 percent right regardless of what the judge decided, so "whatever decision you make, great . . . I mean life goes on. Tomorrow's another day." Judge O'Flaherty responded, "If that's the way you want it." Herold stated: "You tell me I can't prove my case, but you won't even let me. Three months. I can't even tell you my whole story and, you know, . . . so it's fine. I got my $100 satisfaction and lost business. I'm satisfied now. Okay? You can dismiss the case. I mean that's—I just feel . . . ." Judge O'Flaherty then dismissed the case and Herold walked out of the courtroom.

Immediately after Herold left the courtroom, Davis, Rapozo and Burgess conversed among themselves. Davis said, "He's got my address." Rapozo started crying and expressed concern that Herold would "come after" her. She said, "This guy's a lunatic" and "I'm scared of that man . . . ." Rapozo said, "He's come back in and tried to confront me before." Davis stated that she received a "demand letter from him." Burgess and Davis attempted to console Rapozo. Although none of these comments was made directly to Judge O'Flaherty, he overheard them. He ordered the bailiff to return Herold to the courtroom.

When Herold returned, the following exchange took place:

"COURT: All right. Now, I'm a little bit concerned about you. I think frankly, I'm going to put it bluntly. I think you've been abusing these people, and I don't like it. And these women are all three of you [sic] afraid of you. Now I'm going to tell you this. I'm not going to issue a formal restraining order which I have the right to do. If there's any contact between you and these three people in the next few months, then I will issue a formal restraining order on the spot and you will have to pay the fees and then if you violate that restraining order, then it's a criminal case. Do you understand that?

"HEROLD: I do, Your Honor.

"COURT: There is to be no contact with them.

"HEROLD: I understand.

"COURT: I really—after you left I did not like their reaction at all. For whatever reason, they've made—you've made them afraid of you and I'm not going to have that. You understand?

"HEROLD: I understand. I'm not a violent person. It's just—

"COURT: You are to have no contact with them whatsoever. Whatever you've done and I've listened to this and bluntly, frankly, you're light years away from having a case against anybody. To put it—and I really didn't like—because I can gather from these three people, these two people are business people. Their job is to satisfy people. And you've gotten to the point that they're afraid of you. And frankly, that's not going to happen when I'm concerned. Do you understand that?

"HEROLD: I understand it, Your Honor.

"COURT: Well, I hope you're right.

"HEROLD: I'm also a customer of Golden 1 Credit Union too, so what does that mean, I can't do—

"COURT: You will have no contact with any of these three people. [Addressing Golden 1] What do you want to do about that?

"HEROLD: Does that mean I got to pull my accounts out of Golden 1—

"COURT: What do you want to do about that? You don't want to do that, right?

"BURGESS: Right. I think that if he just stays away from our branch—

"COURT: Stay away from their branch. You can have contact with other branches. Do you know—which branch is it?

"BURGESS: Roseville on Douglas Boulevard.

"COURT: Are there other branches in the area?

"BURGESS: Not in this area—

"COURT: How about Sacramento?

"BURGESS: There are branches in Sacramento and on the west side of Roseville.

"COURT: Oh, okay. You will not have—what street are you on?

"BURGESS: Santa Clara Drive.

"COURT: You will not have any contact in the Santa Clara branch for at least the next 90 days. Do you understand that?

"HEROLD: I understand that 100%.

"COURT: All right. Good luck, sir.

"HEROLD: Thank you very much."

When Herold went to the clerk's office the next day, December 9, 2008, to inquire about the restraining order, the clerk was unable to provide any information because the file had not been returned to the main courthouse. Approximately 20 days later, Herold learned there was no restraining order against him.

The minutes of the small claims proceeding include the following handwritten note under a heading that reads "THE COURT MAKES THE FOLLOWING ORDERS": "Golden One is dismissed from action . . . plaintiff to have no contact with defendants or restraining order will be issued. Plaintiff is to stay away from Santa Clara Drive branch for 90 days."

In his answer to the Notice, Judge O'Flaherty asserted that he did not review these minutes until after he was contacted by the commission. The masters found Judge O'Flaherty reviewed the minutes on the day of the small claims hearing. This finding is based on the judge's testimony that he initialed the second page of the document that was admitted as the minutes/judgment of the proceedings on the day of the hearing. We do not adopt this finding. In the commission's view, there is not substantial evidence to establish that Judge O'Flaherty reviewed the first page of the minute order with the aforementioned no-contact order at the time he initialed the second page of the document.

2. Findings Concerning Evidence of Threats or Intimidation

The masters found that "Herold did not, directly or indirectly, abuse, threaten or intimidate these women on December 8 or at any previous time." Judge O'Flaherty contends that there was substantial evidence presented from multiple witnesses that Herold engaged in intimidating and threatening behavior both before and during the small claims hearing. However, the masters, who were in a position to observe the demeanor of the witnesses, view the actual proceeding on videotape and consider the totality of the evidence, rejected those witnesses' characterization of Herold's demeanor. The masters state: "The aggregate testimony of O'Flaherty, Davis, Hanson (court clerk), and Gutierrez (courtroom deputy) describes Herold as emotional, acrimonious, angry, intimidating and threatening. Those characterizations of his demeanor and language are not supported by the evidence. Nor does the evidence support the assertion that Herold 'stormed out of the courtroom' to the extent that it is meant to say that he walked out loudly or angrily. He was displeased and frustrated, but he never raised his voice, displayed anger or made any threats, directly or indirectly. He did display his frustration to the extent he tossed or dropped what appeared to be a day planner on the table in front of him, but it was not done in an angry manner. O'Flaherty testified that up until Herold left the first time, the level of acrimony at the hearing was within the normal range of small claims hearings."

Based on our own viewing of the videotape and consideration of all the evidence presented at the hearing before the special masters, we concur with these findings. Herold displayed restraint and composure in the face of the judge's frequent interruptions of his presentation and repeated comments disparaging his case. We observe, as did the masters, that "at no time during the court proceedings did Herold by words, expression, conduct or body language, demonstrate an intimidating or threatening manner to anyone." Contrary to the judge's testimony that Herold sat close to Davis as an intimidating tactic, the videotape shows Herold separating his chair from the others at the outset of the hearing. Herold remained calm even after being unexpectedly returned to the courtroom and greeted with the judge's stern rebuke, "I think you've been abusing these people, and I don't like it."

Judge O'Flaherty contends that Herold had engaged in intimidating and threatening behavior towards the women prior to the small claims hearing. As did the masters, we find that the evidence does not substantiate this claim. We concur with the masters' finding that while Rapozo appeared upset when Herold left the courtroom the first time, neither Davis nor Burgess displayed any signs of personal distress or fear. Rapozo made statements to the other women that she was afraid that Herold would "come after" her because he had "tried to confront" her before. However, Judge O'Flaherty made no inquiries to determine the circumstances of Herold's return to the credit union or whether Rapozo's fear was objectively reasonable and justified.[2] The masters found that none of the comments made by defendants "describe[s] any conduct by Herold that would constitute a harassing course of conduct." We agree.

Judge O'Flaherty's reliance on Davis's statement that she received a letter from Herold demanding payment of $2,000 for breach of contract as evidence of intimidation is misplaced. Far from being a tactic of intimidation, a plaintiff is required, where possible, to demand payment from the defendant prior to filing a small claims action. (Code Civ. Proc., § 116.320, subd. (b).)[3] Moreover, at the hearing before the masters, Davis testified that Herold had not threatened her verbally or in writing, and that she did not feel intimidated by Herold at the small claims hearing.

[2] During the small claims hearing, Herold mentioned that he had received a letter from the vice-president of Golden 1 and talked to managers at the branch. Whether these conversations took place in person or by phone and the subject of the conversations was not pursued. At the hearing before the special masters, Herold testified that he only returned to Golden 1 once after the incident and Rapozo was not present. He had a few conversations with the vice-president at Golden 1 and encouraged him to discipline Rapozo for making disparaging comments about independent car dealers. This was the only evidence presented concerning Herold's contacts with employees at Golden 1, including Rapozo, after the incident that was the subject of the small claims proceeding.

[3] Judicial Council of California mandatory form SC-100 (Plaintiff's Claim and ORDER to Go to Small Claims Court) states: "You must ask the Defendant (in person, in writing, or by phone) to pay you before you sue." (Boldface omitted.)

Judge O'Flaherty's reliance on Herold's statement that he sued Davis "to get her to come in" as evidence that Herold was intimidating Davis is also misguided. Herold testified that his attorney recommended that he "sue both of them [Golden 1 and Davis]" to get Davis into court "instead of approaching her." He also testified that he sued her because she broke the contract to purchase the car. Herold exercised his right to sue a party who he believed had breached a contract—this does not constitute evidence of intimidation.

3. Findings Concerning Issuance of an Order

The masters found that Judge O'Flaherty's statements and conduct after Herold was returned to the courtroom "establish beyond a doubt" that he ordered Herold not to have contact with the three women for 90 days. We are in complete agreement. Judge O'Flaherty told Herold in no uncertain terms at least six times that he was to stay away from the women, specified the amount of time the order was in effect, and repeatedly asked Herold if he understood what he was being told.

Judge O'Flaherty is adamant that he did not issue and did not intend to issue a no-contact order against Herold. Relying heavily on his initial comment to Herold that he was not going to issue a "formal restraining order," the judge maintains that he was simply issuing a warning and attempting to obtain Herold's "agreement" to stay away from the women rather than issuing a court order. The precise words he refers to are, "I'm not going to issue a formal restraining order which I have the right to do. If there's any contact between you and these three people in the next few months, then I will issue a formal restraining order on the spot and you will have to pay the fees and then if you violate that restraining order, then it's a criminal case." Judge O'Flaherty acknowledges that the law does not authorize the issuance of "informal" restraining orders and that a restraining order could not be issued "on the spot" if Herold had contact with the women.

More importantly, Judge O'Flaherty's subsequent statements establish that he was ordering Herold to have no contact with the women rather than seeking an agreement: "There is to be no contact with them"; "You are to have no contact with them whatsoever"; "You will have no contact with any of these three people"; "Stay away from their branch"; "You will not have any contact [with] the Santa Clara [Drive] branch for at least the next 90 days." The judge asked Herold several times if he understood what he was being told. After the last command, Herold indicated that he "underst[oo]d that 100%" and left the courtroom. Judge O'Flaherty then told the women to let him know immediately if Herold had any contact with them.

There is no reasonable way to interpret the judge's words other than as an order. At no time was Herold asked if he would agree to stay away from the women, nor told that he was just being given a warning. As Special Master Hardcastle said during closing argument before the special masters, "It doesn't sound to me like there's a negotiation going on. It sounds to me like this is a command."

The masters found that Herold subjectively believed that the judge's words and tone meant that he was under a court order not to have any contact with the women, and that Herold's belief was objectively reasonable. We agree.

Judge O'Flaherty concedes that his words may have given the appearance that he was issuing an order, but insists this was not his intent. We find that Judge O'Flaherty's unequivocal choice of words and emphatic tone of voice while speaking to Herold manifest his intent to issue a no-contact order, or at least to "bluff" Herold into believing he was under such an order. Significantly, Judge O'Flaherty testified that he was essentially bluffing Herold into believing that a restraining order with resulting fees and possible criminal proceeding would issue "on the spot" if he had any contact with defendants. We have no doubt that Judge O'Flaherty wanted Herold to believe he was subject to a restraining order, an order the judge knew he did not have authority to issue.

(4) The issuance of a temporary restraining order requires the filing of an affidavit by the person requesting the order showing reasonable proof of harassment as defined by statute,[4] and that great or irreparable harm would result to the person being harassed. Judge O'Flaherty was aware of the statutory requirements for issuance of a restraining order based on his extensive experience handling harassment petitions. Thus, he knew that he did not have authority to issue a no-contact order based only on the women's

[4] Harassment is defined as unlawful violence, a credible threat of violence, or a willful course of conduct that seriously alarms, annoys or harasses the person, and that serves no legitimate purpose. The course of conduct must be such as would cause a reasonable person to suffer substantial emotional distress, and must actually cause substantial emotional distress to the plaintiff. (Code Civ. Proc., § 527.6, subd. (b).)

Within 15 days, or, if good cause appears to the court, 22 days from the date the temporary restraining order is issued, a hearing must be held on the petition for injunction with notice to the defendant. (Code Civ. Proc., § 527.6.)

statements after Herold left the courtroom, or "on the spot" if Herold had contact with the women during the next 90 days.

4. Findings Concerning Embroilment and Due Process Violation

(5) The masters found that while it was not inappropriate under these circumstances for Judge O'Flaherty to have Herold brought back to the courtroom to address Rapozo's fear, his subsequent conduct demonstrated a lack of impartiality and embroilment. We concur. "Embroilment is the process by which the judge surrenders the role of impartial factfinder/decisionmaker, and joins the fray." (Rothman, Cal. Judicial Conduct Handbook (3d ed. 2007) § 2.01, p. 37.) As the masters found, "[O]nce Herold was returned to the courtroom, O'Flaherty's conduct and statements demonstrated that, rather than acting as an impartial jurist, he became a forceful advocate for the women and became embroiled in the matter to the extent that he issued orders that were neither requested nor legally proper."

The masters also found that "Herold was denied basic due process rights during the second hearing [after his return to the courtroom]." We agree. Herold was not present when the women made comments that caused Judge O'Flaherty to order his return to the courtroom. When Herold returned, the judge did not inform him of the factual basis for the no-contact order except to say that the women were fearful of him ["For whatever reason, they've made—you've made them afraid of you and I'm not going to have that."]. Herold was not afforded an opportunity to ask questions or to respond to the accusation that he had harassed the women. As Herold attempted to explain that he is not a violent person, he was interrupted by Judge O'Flaherty, who told him he was to have "no contact with them whatsoever . . . you're light years away from having a case against anybody . . . they're afraid of you. . . ."

5. Prior Discipline

Judge O'Flaherty was publicly admonished in 2004 for telling prospective jurors in two criminal trials that they could lie to get out of jury duty if they thought they might be racially biased.

B. Conclusions of Law

The masters concluded that Judge O'Flaherty engaged in willful misconduct. We reach the same conclusion.

(7) Failure to comply with the California Code of Judicial Ethics canons of judicial ethics is generally considered to constitute unjudicial conduct. (Adams v. Commission on Judicial Performance (Adams) (1994) 8 Cal.4th 630, 662 [34 Cal.Rptr.2d 641, 882 P.2d 358].) We conclude, as did the masters, that Judge O'Flaherty violated canons 1 (a judge shall uphold the integrity of the judiciary), 2A (a judge shall respect and comply with the law), 3B(2) (a judge shall be faithful to the law), and 3B(7) (a judge shall accord every person who has a legal interest in the proceeding the right to be heard) of the California Code of Judicial Ethics in that he abused his authority, disregarded the law and denied a person who had a legal interest in proceedings before him the right to be heard. As such, his conduct was unjudicial.

(8) A judge acts in bad faith "only by (1) performing a judicial act for a corrupt purpose (which is any purpose other than the faithful discharge of judicial duties), or (2) performing a judicial act with knowledge that the act is beyond the judge's lawful judicial power, or (3) performing a judicial act that exceeds the judge's lawful power with a conscious disregard for the limits of the judge's authority." (Broadman, supra, 18 Cal.4th at p. 1092.) Judge O'Flaherty acted in bad faith because he issued a no-contact order with knowledge that it was beyond his judicial authority to do so and because he acted with a conscious disregard for the limits of his authority.

Judge O'Flaherty contends that he did not act in bad faith because he did not intend to issue a no-contact order. As previously discussed, we reject the judge's characterization of his comments as a "good-faith misstatement" during an emergency situation and find that his intent was to order rather than warn Herold to stay away from the three women. While we defer to the masters' finding that the judge did not act for a corrupt purpose, this does not mean he did not act in bad faith. Bad faith in this context does not require a corrupt purpose. (Broadman, supra, 18 Cal.4th at p. 1092.) Judge O'Flaherty acted in bad faith by consciously disregarding the limits of his judicial authority regardless of his motivation.

Judge O'Flaherty's contention that he acted in good faith because he believed his actions were a necessary response to an emergency situation is misguided. The law provides an expedited process for the issuance of temporary restraining orders, a process Judge O'Flaherty failed to follow. (Code Civ. Proc., § 527.6, subd. (c).) Judge O'Flaherty acknowledged that a temporary restraining order can be issued "very fast." Had there actually been an emergency situation, the judge's unenforceable no-contact order would have provided no protection to the women.

(9) We do not suggest that Judge O'Flaherty was required to ignore the women's comments after Herold left the courtroom. He could have told them, for instance, where to obtain forms for filing a petition for a restraining order without commenting on the merits of such a petition. What he could not do was issue a no-contact order without complying with applicable statutory requirements and constitutional due process guarantees. The power to restrict a person's freedom of movement and contact with other individuals is a weighty responsibility which should be exercised with caution and in strict compliance with the law.

III

DISCIPLINE

We now reach the ultimate question of the appropriate discipline to be imposed. After careful consideration, we have determined to publicly censure Judge O'Flaherty.

(10) Crucial to our determination is the fact that Judge O'Flaherty was previously publicly admonished for abusing his authority and disregarding the law and yet continues to show no acceptance or understanding of the limits of his authority. "A judge's failure to appreciate or admit to the impropriety of his or her acts indicates a lack of capacity to reform." (Inquiry Concerning Platt (2002) 48 Cal.4th CJP Supp. 227, 248; see also Fletcher v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1998) 19 Cal.4th 865, 920–921 [81 Cal.Rptr.2d 58, 968 P.2d 958]; Kloepfer v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1989) 49 Cal.3d 826, 866 [264 Cal.Rptr. 100, 782 P.2d 239].) Judge O'Flaherty insists that he did not engage in misconduct despite a unanimous report from three special masters which concludes that he engaged in willful misconduct and clearly and unequivocally explains the basis for that conclusion. When asked at oral argument before the commission whether he recognized any impropriety in his conduct, Judge O'Flaherty responded that he "misspoke to Herold" which he described as a mistake rather than misconduct. In order to justify his own conduct, he continues to characterize Herold's conduct and demeanor during the court proceeding in a manner that is inconsistent with the findings of the masters and the video recording of the proceedings. Our determination of the appropriate level of discipline might have been different if we were confident that Judge O'Flaherty understood and accepted the impropriety of his actions. (Inquiry Concerning Platt, at p. 248; see also Fletcher, at pp. 920–921; Kloepfer, at p. 866.) Unfortunately, he has made it clear that he does not.

Judge O'Flaherty's failure to acknowledge his wrongdoing is particularly troubling given his prior discipline. (See Inquiry Concerning Van Voorhis (2003) 48 Cal.4th CJP Supp. 257, 301–302; Doan v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1995) 11 Cal.4th 294, 339–340 [45 Cal.Rptr.2d 254, 902 P.2d 272]; McCullough v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1989) 49 Cal.3d 186, 199 [260 Cal.Rptr. 557, 776 P.2d 259] [failure to respond to prior discipline "evidences a lack of regard for the Commission, this court and his obligations as a judge."].) We see a disturbing similarity between the misconduct that resulted in his 2004 public admonishment and his misconduct in the present case. In both cases, Judge O'Flaherty has demonstrated a willingness to circumvent the law in favor of procedures he considers more effective. In the case leading to his prior discipline, he believed he could tell jurors to lie under oath to get off the jury because he was concerned they would not be honest about their racial bias. (Inquiry Concerning O'Flaherty, supra, 49 Cal.4th CJP Supp. 1.) In the present case, he thought he was justified in issuing an unlawful no-contact order because the issuance of a lawful restraining order might trigger an investigation of Rapozo by the credit union and would have "onerous" collateral consequences to Herold. Judge O'Flaherty testified that he has given essentially the same "warning" he gave Herold in many other cases where there was no petition for a restraining order pending before him and "it usually works." We note that in the case that led to his prior discipline, Judge O'Flaherty also maintained that his conduct should not be subject to discipline because his intentions were good. (Id. at p. 24.) It appears that Judge O'Flaherty believes he is entitled to disregard the law without consequence as long as, in his mind, the ends justify the means.

(11) The impact of a judge's misconduct on the litigants and judicial system is another important factor we consider. (Inquiry Concerning Van Voorhis, supra, 48 Cal.4th CJP Supp. at pp. 299–300.) Herold's due process rights were violated and his freedom of association and movement unlawfully restricted. Further, Judge O'Flaherty's misconduct adversely impacts the reputation of the judiciary. Abuse of judicial authority and conscious disregard of the law are the antithesis of what the public expects of a judge. The integrity of the judiciary depends on public confidence that judges will faithfully comply with the law and act within the bounds of their authority. Finally, intentionally bluffing a litigant manifestly diminishes public esteem for the judiciary.

(12) The purpose of judicial discipline is the protection of the public, the enforcement of rigorous standards of judicial conduct, and the maintenance of public confidence in the integrity of the judiciary. (Broadman, supra, 18 Cal.4th at pp. 1111–1112.) For the foregoing reasons, we have determined that this purpose is best served through the imposition of a public censure.

ORDER

Pursuant to the provisions of article VI, section 18 of the California Constitution, we hereby impose a public censure on Judge Joseph W. O'Flaherty.

Commission members, Hon. Judith D. McConnell, Hon. Katherine Feinstein, Mr. Anthony Capozzi, Mr. Peter E. Flores, Jr., Mr. Samuel Hardage, Hon. Frederick P. Horn, Ms. Barbara Schraeger, Mr. Lawrence Simi, Ms. Maya Dillard Smith, Ms. Sandra Talcott, and Mr. Nathaniel Trives voted in favor of all of the findings and conclusions expressed herein and in the foregoing order of a public censure.

| INQUIRY CONCERNING JUDGE DEANN M. SALCIDO,No. 189 | DECISION AND ORDER IMPOSING PUBLIC CENSURE PURSUANT TO STIPULATION (Commission Rule 127) |

I

INTRODUCTION AND SUMMARY

This disciplinary matter concerns Judge DeAnn M. Salcido, a judge of the San Diego Superior Court since 2002. The commission filed a Notice of Formal Proceedings on September 20, 2010, charging Judge Salcido with allowing herself to be videotaped while conducting proceedings in her courtroom for the purpose of promoting herself for a role in a potential television entertainment program and telling an entertainment attorney representing the producer that she would set her more interesting cases on the day of the filming; making numerous improper remarks and engaging in improper conduct while court proceedings were being filmed; engaging in a pattern of improper conduct on other occasions, including making demeaning and discourteous remarks regarding litigants, court staff, attorneys and others; and placing a defendant into custody for contempt without affording her due process or complying with the legal requirements for contempt.

By Stipulation for Discipline by Consent (Stipulation), executed October 18, 2010, Judge Salcido and her counsel, Heather Rosing, Esq., and the examiner for the commission, Gary Schons, Esq., have requested that the commission resolve this matter by imposition of a public censure provided that Judge Salcido resign from the bench and not seek or hold judicial office and not seek or accept judicial assignment, appointment, or reference of work from any California state court. Pursuant to the Stipulation, Judge Salcido has agreed to tender her irrevocable resignation from judicial office within five days of the issuance of this decision, said resignation to be effective immediately. By signed affidavit, Judge Salcido renders her free and voluntary consent to the Stipulation, admits the truth of the stipulated facts and waives all further proceedings and review by the Supreme Court. (Rule 127(d).) The Stipulation provides that if Judge Salcido fails to comply with any of its terms and conditions, the commission may withdraw the censure and proceed with formal proceedings, and her failure to comply with the terms and conditions of the Stipulation may constitute additional and independent grounds for discipline.

II

STIPULATED FACTS AND LEGAL CONCLUSIONS

The following findings of fact and conclusions of law are based on the Stipulation. In the signed Stipulation, Judge Salcido "expressly admits that the foregoing facts are true and that she agrees with the stated legal conclusions."

COUNT ONE

On January 26, 2009, Judge Salcido had the husband of her courtroom bailiff videotape her on the bench presiding over a variety of matters for approximately one hour. She did so to promote herself for a role in a potential television entertainment program featuring a judge. She provided the January 26 tape to an entertainment lawyer, who showed it to a production coordinator for existing television shows featuring judges (hereafter "the producer").

Judge Salcido thereafter was informed by the entertainment attorney that the producer would be interested in filming her conducting proceedings in the courtroom. On May 1, 2009, she allowed the producer to film proceedings in her courtroom for the entire day. The purpose of the filming was to promote herself for a role in a potential television entertainment program featuring a judge.

No request was made pursuant to California Rules of Court, rule 1.150, to record any portion of proceedings on January 26, 2009, or on May 1, 2009, nor would an order granting such a request have been properly issued as the filming was for the judge's personal purposes. The judge did not provide advance notice of the filming to the litigants or counsel whose cases were heard during filming on January 26, 2009; advance notice of the filming was provided to some of the litigants or counsel whose cases were heard on May 1, 2009.

In an email message dated March 5, 2009, sent by the judge to the entertainment lawyer, the judge suggested that filming in her courtroom be scheduled for April 24. She told him that she has "been setting my more interesting defendants and those with substance abuse issues for Friday April 24th." On March 9, 2009, following his suggestion that filming occur on May 1, Judge Salcido sent an email message in which she told him that "I will line up my most interesting cases for the afternoon of [Friday] May 1st." These statements give the appearance that the judge was scheduling cases based on their possible appeal in a videotape to be used to promote herself for a television program. It also creates an appearance of impropriety for the judge to represent that she would manipulate her calendar for non-judicial purposes.

The conduct described above violated canons 1 (a judge shall uphold the integrity of the judiciary), 2 (a judge shall avoid impropriety and the appearance of impropriety), 2A (a judge shall respect and comply with the law and shall act at all times in a manner that promotes public confidence in the integrity and impartiality of the judiciary), 2B(2) (improper use of the prestige of judicial office) and 3A (a judge's duties shall take precedence over all other activities). The conduct constitutes prejudicial misconduct within the meaning of the California Constitution, article VI, section 18, subsection (d), which provides that a judge may be disciplined for "conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute." Prejudicial misconduct includes "'conduct which a judge undertakes in good faith but which nevertheless would appear to an objective observer to be not only unjudicial conduct but conduct prejudicial to the public esteem for the judicial office....'" (Broadman v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1998) 18 Cal.4th 1079, 1104, citing Doan v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1995) 11 Cal.4th 294, 312.)

COUNT TWO

A. Count Two A

On May 1, 2009, while proceedings in her courtroom were being filmed, Judge Salcido made the following improper remarks:

1. Around 10:43 a.m., she asked defendant Faustino Valdez, who was entering a change of plea to a charge involving marijuana, "You were born in 1980?" After he responded "yes," she remarked, "You look older than me. That's what smoking will do to you."

2. Around 10:53 a.m., defendant Juan Molina pled guilty to engaging in lewd conduct in public. The judge asked counsel for information about the case and was informed that the defendant had urinated in public and then turned around, exposing himself. After noting the number of days the defendant spent in custody, she joked, "Wow. Seventy-two days in custody giving new meaning to the term zip it." After ordering the defendant to stay away from a certain location, she joked, "Because I think they'll recognize you in more ways than one." She later joked, "again, new meaning to the term zip it."

3. Around 11:07 a.m., after placing Rodolf Rodriguez on probation, Judge Salcido made the following remark: "What that means is don't come before the court on another case ... 'cause you will definitely be screwed and we don't offer Vaseline for that."

The judge used the term "screwed" on other instances on May 1. Around 10:22 a.m., after defense counsel stated that defendant John Hedley had not been given written proof of attendance at AA meetings, she stated, "Then he would be screwed." Around 2:48 p.m., she remarked to defendant Shell, who had not appeared in court as ordered, "you basically screwed yourself by not coming in." She also used the word "screwed" in the Jason Chavez matter, as set forth below.

4. Around 11:13 a.m., after being informed that Deputy Public Defender Longman wanted a chambers conference in Sparks, she stated, "Sidebar please," then asked, "Did I roll my eyes at the camera?" and laughed. The statement about rolling her eyes at the camera was made in a low voice to court staff, off the record.

5. Defendant Dustin Coombs appeared to request early termination of probation so that he could enlist in the military. His stepfather appeared with him. When the judge asked defendant Coombs why he had needed a reassignment for public service work, he explained that his mother had lost her home and that he had moved to North Carolina with her. Around 11:24 a.m., Judge Salcido remarked, "I'm supposed to put my national defense in your hands, but you can't come up here without your stepdad and you're [¶] ... [¶] tied to the hip with your mom? And I'm supposed to put my national security in your hands."

6. Around 2:34 p.m., while presiding over the Dupre family law matter in which an order modifying child visitation had been requested, the judge remarked to the parents, "I don't mean any disrespect to either one of you, but thankfully I don't live with either one of you. So I don't know where the daughter has been."

7. Around 2:44 p.m., after defendant Stephen Stoflitt admitted a probation violation and requested reinstatement in a domestic violence program, the judge told him that she could sentence him to 60 days in jail instead. When he said that he would prefer to do the program, she warned him twice that if he returned with another excuse she would slam him "like a tidal wave." The judge asked him if he understood that he was "going to do double or nothing" and whether he was "a gambling man." When the defendant replied that he was not a gambling man, she said, "Well, you're gambling, you're gambling right now." When the defendant said that he was "trying to show that I can do what I'm supposed to," Judge Salcido had the audience read aloud a slogan posted in the courtroom, "Do or do not, there is no try." Before reinstating the defendant into the program, she said, "I will put you in jail and we're doing double or nothing now. [¶] ... [¶] You're prepared to double down? [¶] ... [¶] Sixty days now or 120 minimum later. You want to take 120 later?"

8. Around 3:21 p.m., defendant Daniel Lopez appeared in custody and admitted a probation violation. Judge Salcido gave him the option of an immediate 60-day jail sentence or reenrolling in a program, but facing a longer jail sentence if he failed to complete that program. After the defendant said that he wanted to reenroll in the program and his counsel requested a moment to confer with his client, the judge remarked to the courtroom audience, "You guys know he doesn't want to do that don't you? Yeah. Does he need to call the lifeline? Try to tell him. Let's make a deal. I think he needs to call the lifeline. Yeah. Want to poll the audience? What should he do? Take the deal, take the deal, take the deal. The audience says, of course, the audience isn't going into custody. Really easy for you to tell him to take the deal because you're going to go home tonight and sleep on your pillows." The judge and the courtroom audience repeatedly laughed at these comments. Counsel then said that defendant Lopez was not choosing the custody option because he was the only person available to take care of his 75-year-old mother, who was in poor health. The judge remarked, "Then God help her." She later said to the defendant, whom she appeared to think had called her "sir," "did you say sir? [¶] ... [¶] I was like, I know I shaved this morning," to laughter from the audience.

9. Around 3:29 p.m., the judge was told that defendant Jason Chavez, who had appeared before her earlier in the day, had tested positive for marijuana. The judge remarked to the courtroom, "He's not too clean?" to which the audience responded with a loud "woo." She said "THC," and the audience again said "woo." The judge then asked the audience, "Can I get a woo, woo, woo?" The audience responded as requested, and the judge and others in the courtroom laughed. The judge remarked, "See why my sons are screwed? I can just look at someone and I can tell." As she recalled the matter she remarked, in reference to the defendant and quoting him, "'It's been years, Your Honor.'" The judge then told the defendant that it was her job to judge credibility, and remarked, "Did you take me for a fool?" After the defendant responded, "No, Your Honor," she asked, "Did you think I don't know what I'm doing?" After the defendant said he was going to try to do what is right, Judge Salcido said to the audience, "Here's that word again, it's pretty famous," and over the defendant's attempts to explain, had the courtroom audience repeat the slogan "Do or do not, there is no try." When calling the next case, she said, in apparent reference to this case, "If I had a dollar for everybody who told me they were clean I wouldn't need to work anymore."

10. Around 3:37 p.m., Judge Salcido remarked to defendant Gregory Armstrong, who had failed to appear in court the day before, "Do you want tissue now or later because you're going into custody right now." Before remanding him, she stated, "Did you think by coming in the next day, they wouldn't let you see me? You thought by coming in the next day, oh, I won't see Judge Salcido, they'll send me next door. How do you like me now? Things don't work that way."

11. Around 3:45 p.m., defendant Ana Earls appeared and admitted to having an alcohol and drug abuse problem. Judge Salcido asked her what type of alcohol and she said it was vodka. The judge then asked, "Any type of vodka?" After Earls said, "Any type," the judge said, "Blame it on the a-a-a-a-alcohol," to laughter from the court audience.

12. Around 3:51 p.m., a defendant appeared who had mental health issues. After ascertaining that he had been hearing voices, the judge asked, "Okay. And we talked, right? You're going to tell me if they say 'hurt the judge, hurt the judge.'"

13. Around 4:06 p.m., the judge asked defendant Jay Anderson, "Do you smoke a little chronic every now and then?" The audience laughed. After adding as a term of his probation that he not consume alcohol and that he be subject to random testing, she said, "So that means if you come here and you test at your DV classes and they find that you had some Budweisers, not only will I put you in jail because it was Budweiser instead of Heineken, you will be in jail because it's a violation of your probation."

14. Around 4:10 p.m., Judge Salcido commented that defendant Tyrone McCoy was smiling, and then remarked to him that "they might like your smile in jail," to which the audience responded with a loud "oooo" and then laughter.

15. Around 4:10 p.m., defendant Jemeelah Coleman appeared unrepresented; she apparently had failed to comply with a condition of probation. Judge Salcido advised her that she would allow her to serve 24 hours in custody, instead of the customary 48 hours, for the violation of probation. The judge advised Coleman that she had a right to be counseled by an attorney before admitting the violation and being sentenced, and informed her that she would have to come back on Monday if she wanted to speak with an attorney. At one point the judge told her, "But I might not be so gracious on Monday." After further discussion, the defendant said that she wanted to "do the 24 hours." When the defendant paused after the judge said that this meant she would waive her right to speak with an attorney, the judge asked, "You want to ask the lifeline? You need a lifeline?" The audience laughed at these remarks.

16. Around 4:27 p.m., defendant Ladonte Wilson appeared without proof of volunteer work, and blamed his mother for not following through. Judge Salcido asked if his mother was at court, and Wilson said she was at work. The judge responded, "I'm surprised, she hasn't cut the cord obviously. Cut the cord, Mom. Cut the cord." After Wilson was remanded, the judge concluded proceedings by stating, "I suggest you don't call your mama."

17. Around 4:29 p.m., defendant Leo Clemens appeared and responded to the judge's earlier request (3:57 p.m.) that he identify a "tool" that he had learned to use to control his anger. He had previously been unable to do so. Judge Salcido said, "Hallelujah, amen, praise the Lord, thank you very much," and the audience applauded. She then said to the audience, "can I get a woo woo?" and the audience responded as asked.

B. Count Two B

Between April 2009 and April 2010, Judge Salcido engaged in improper conduct and made improper remarks regarding litigants, court staff, attorneys and others, as follows:

1. On April 21, 2009, around 3:09 p.m., in-custody defendant John Love appeared and entered a guilty plea to battery. During the sentencing discussion that followed, the case was passed because of Love's attitude. When Judge Salcido recalled the case about 20 minutes later, she ascertained that a woman sitting in the audience was with Love, then told her that she had to leave the courtroom, saying, "You need to wait outside because he's agitated ... he's not behaving well." After taking a guilty plea from Love again, the judge elicited during sentencing that he was from St. Louis and said, "I like the accent, it's working for me."

2. On June 9, 2009, around 10:27 a.m., Judge Salcido raised concerns regarding an August 7, 2008 order entered by Judge Peter Gallagher in a criminal case involving defendant Sean Strange. After checking the court file, the judge commented, "Ah, Judge Gallagher, aka assistant public defender." At 10:34 a.m., the Strange case was trailed, and several other matters were heard. At 10:39 a.m., during a pause in proceedings in one of those other matters, the judge commented to court staff in a low voice, "Is that ridiculous that Judge Gallagher did that. I mean it's a sex offender case. Yeah, whatever, you know. A DV statute says it's mandatory but, you know, we're the judge, we can do what we want. Quote. Justice be damned."

3. On June 9, 2009, around noon, defendant Andrew Davis entered a guilty plea to a charge of violating Penal Code section 148. The judge asked the defense counsel to describe the facts of the case before imposing sentence; after he did so, she said, in reference to Deputy District Attorney Richard Huffman, who was not present, "and you couldn't get a 415 out of Mr. Huffman? [¶] ... [¶] Did you tell him he was going into the military? [¶] ... [¶] Mr. Huffman, if you're going into the military, he practically drives you there." (Defendant Davis was not going into the military.)

4. On June 9, 2009, around 3:28 p.m., the defense attorney in Nicolazzo argued that there was no dating relationship for purposes of the domestic violence statutes. In summarizing the cases the attorney had cited, Judge Salcido said that certain authorities would "tell me that booty calls are exempt from domestic violence statutes," and continued to use the phrase "booty call." She later remarked, "Yeah well, he got a taste of it though right? [¶] ... [¶] That's what I'm saying. If he's stalking her, he got a taste of it. They don't stalk unless they've got something."

5. On June 30, 2009, around 3:11 p.m., attorney Alan Spears appeared regarding his pregnant client Justine Means, who was in Maine. Attorney Spears, who was seeking a continuance, said that his client felt unable to travel because of the pregnancy, and gave the judge a physician's letter that noted her due date. Judge Salcido stated that pregnant people traveled all the time, and noted that the physician's letter did not say that the defendant was at high risk or subject to bed rest. After the prosecutor said that she did not object to a continuance, the judge said that she would grant it. As the judge explained that she was granting the continuance for discovery reasons, not because Means was pregnant, she ripped up the physician's letter, and either threw the pieces in the trash herself or handed the pieces to her clerk to put into the trash.

6. On July 6, 2009, around 2:08 p.m., when defendant Steve Moore appeared in court wearing an Oakland Raiders jersey, Judge Salcido remarked, "You did not come in here with that shirt," and asked, "Which doors you want to walk out with, that's the Charger door [the public exit], that's the Raider door [the door for defendants going into custody]?" She then said, "Chargers door? Raiders door? Chargers door? Raiders door?" and repeatedly asked the defendant which door he wanted to go through when he left. She remarked, "365 days of the year I'm a Chargers fan. Hello, we don't take a break." The judge asked a woman present in the courtroom who was connected with the case, "Would you say he's smart, coming here in a Raiders shirt? No? What does that say about you, Dena, and the kind of men you pick?"

7. On July 6, 2009, around 2:38 p.m., while reviewing a request for modification of the terms of a protective order in the Houmi case, the judge remarked, "I can't do this because it's not consistent with the statute. [¶] ... [¶] I mean I can send it up to Judge Deddeh since he's the one who doesn't want to follow the statute."

8. On July 8, 2009, around 2:08 p.m., defendant Dawn Elliott appeared on an adjudicated driving under the influence case. Judge Salcido questioned her as to whether she had brought proof of attendance at AA meetings. When Elliott began to explain, the judge remarked, "I really feel like I need some popcorn to listen to this." She later stated that if Elliott failed to bring proof of the AA meetings to the next court appearance, "you will go to jail," and also said, "then you're going to go to jail."

9. On July 8, 2009, Judge Salcido made several remarks criticizing DPD Longman, some of which also created the appearance of discouraging the exercise of the right to counsel. Around 2:12 p.m. on July 8, 2009, defendant Marilyn Hanbury appeared without counsel. Her father was present in court. After the defendant appeared to look to her father for guidance before responding to a question from the judge, the judge remarked, "Proud moment there Dad, huh," in a joking manner. She then asked the defendant if she wanted to wait for the "luxurious opportunity" to speak to an attorney that day or whether she wished to continue the case so she would not have to wait all day.

The judge passed the Hanbury case until about 2:21 p.m., at which time she was told that the defendant had gone to talk to an attorney. The judge remarked to the defendant's father, "You're going to be stuck here for two more hours, Dad. He's named Mr. Longman for a reason." She also said, "All she had to do was say 'not guilty' and you can come back and be real quick. But now you got Mr. Longman, also known as Mr. Federal Case." The judge and others in the courtroom laughed after these remarks.

Next, around 2:22 p.m., Judge Salcido told defendant Uriel Rivera that there was an infraction offer on his case. She said that if he wanted to consult "the public defender, Mr. Longman, it might take you a few hours, you see how long it takes for him to get to you"; she also told Rivera he could enter a not guilty plea and return on another date.

Around 2:25 p.m., the judge remarked to defendant Rodney Rouse that if he wanted to resolve the matter that day he had "to wait for Mr. Longman and he's the slowest public defender we have in the courthouse." When the defendant said that he wanted to resolve it that day, she said, "Oh Lordy. FYI, if he takes too long, I get grumpy." After the judge conveyed the offer to defendant Rouse, he said that he would "take it right now." She commented shortly thereafter, "Then you don't need to wait for Mr. Longman, who takes years off your life." The judge and others in the courtroom laughed after these remarks about DPD Longman.

Similarly, on July 28, 2009, near the end of the court day, during a discussion in open court not connected to a particular case, Judge Salcido repeatedly referred to DPD Longman as "Mr. Federal Case" and complained that she never got out of court early when he was in her department. And, on May 1, 2009, while waiting for DPD Longman, the bailiff jokingly asked the judge if she wanted her to Taser him; after the judge responded in a bantering manner that she did not want her to Taser him, the judge asked either the bailiff or someone else present in the courtroom, "Do you want to Taser him?"

10. On July 28, 2009, at about 10:06 a.m., during a case discussion with a privately retained attorney, Judge Salcido remarked regarding football player Shawne Merriman, "Although I do have it on a reliable source he likes to play with Ecstasy pills." She further remarked, "A friend of mine personally observed it, it was at his house."

11. On October 26, 2009, around 9:38 a.m., the judge called the Paul Cody matter. Cody claimed that the East County Court was not allowing him to complete his program. Judge Salcido stated that "East County Court is being immature. Being sore losers." There was laughter in the court. She then stated that "You don't want to give them your money anyway. [¶] ... [¶] Okay. Sorry, sir. You know we can't force people to be mature."

12. On October 26, 2009, around 9:48 a.m., defendant Raul Castaneda had difficulty answering Judge Salcido's inquiry as to whether he had discussed the case with his attorney. The judge stated, "I need some aromatherapy spray right now." She sprayed a substance from a bottle and said, "This is my stress relief spray"; she then sighed heavily and laughed. During her subsequent questioning of Castaneda, after he said that he had not talked to anyone that day about his case, she stated, in reference to his attorney, "What do you think she was, your secretary?"

13. On October 27, 2009, around 8:36 a.m., before calling the calendar, Judge Salcido stated to the audience, "You guys have no sense of humor. Did we steal it when you came through the electronic metal detectors or something? Yeah. Get back your sense of humor, you're allowed to have one in court, even though they try to suck the life out of you here in the courthouse. God, you guys are dead, you guys are like, dead. I'm like, God, I need a warm up, I need a warm up comedian before I come out. Okay. Yes, sir. Are you ready? You're volunteering? All right. See? Okay. We're getting the fun back in the courthouse. Fun, courthouse, they don't have to be separate."

14. On October 27, 2009, around 8:59 a.m., Judge Salcido called the case of Emilia Bryant. When Bryant said that she was attempting to get a job in a restaurant, the judge stated, "And this is a restaurant to be a waitress where you actually get to wear clothes?" After correcting the spelling and grammar of her resume in front of the courtroom audience, the judge told Bryant that she could "take my suggestions or you can leave it," but added, "You can see where my effort has gotten me. So maybe you might want to take my suggestions." When she asked defendant Bryant what she had been doing and she started to answer "School and --," the judge interrupted, "No, you've been hanging out with dogs and wondering why you get fleas." The judge commented several times that the shoes Bryant was wearing were "hoochie shoes."

15. In approximately early 2010, the judge made remarks in court disparaging the general clerical staff as follows. On a number of occasions, she referred to the business office staff as "cucumbers." For example, on one occasion around March or April 2010, when it was suggested that a case be postponed to the afternoon, she said words to the effect that "no, because the cucumbers might lose the file." On another occasion around March or April 2010, after referring to the clerical staff as "cucumbers," the judge then added that "they aren't even potatoes because potatoes have eyes." On more than one occasion around March or April 2010, she made the "potatoes" comment to the courtroom audience and added that "they aren't corn because corn has ears." On January 7, 2010, around 10:32 a.m., after a defendant appearing on a warrant referred to information he had received from a clerk, Judge Salcido stated, "Sir, most of those clerks, I wouldn't trust a guinea pig to. Let alone my freedom."

On May 20, 2010, around 2:30 p.m., during a discussion about a paperwork mix-up in a certain case, Judge Salcido sarcastically said, "however, I was going to say another word, the brilliant people in the back office decided not to file your paperwork in the court's file ... ." Judge Salcido later commented "Aye, aye, aye, aye, aye. This is what I have to work with, all right, every day."

16. On February 22, 2010, around 10:11 a.m., Judge Salcido engaged in banter with the courtroom audience regarding Tiger Woods, during which she stated, "I'm sure he's nice. Ask all the hookers in the nation, he's very nice to them."

17. On February 22, 2010, court operations supervisor Beverly Harris had assigned a backup clerk to Judge Salcido's department who had to leave at 3:30 p.m. Around 3:50 p.m., while waiting for a replacement clerk, the judge made disparaging comments about Harris in open court, some of which referred to an email she had sent to the courtroom clerk earlier that day. The judge's remarks included, "the supervisor decided to send us a clerk that had to leave at 3:30," "That was what they taught them at Management 101 seminars that they go to," and "How to get the most of your employees. Let them know they could be fired." Harris then entered the courtroom; the judge asked her, "Did you know we finish at 5:00?"

18. On February 24, 2010, the defendant in People v. Henson appeared without counsel for arraignment on an alleged probation violation. After asking defendant Henson about his relationship with the subject of a protective order issued in the case, Judge Salcido made the following comments:

> Court: Are you guys together or not together?
>
> Defendant: Nope. We haven't been together for like over a year now. But she's the whole reason why I have to keep coming back to court.
>
> Court: She is, or the fact that you broke the law?
>
> Defendant: No, she is. She's –
>
> Court: Oh, you didn't break the law? You're an innocent man on probation?
>
> Defendant: -- All's I've been doing is trying to influence –
>
> Court: You're an innocent man on probation?
>
> Defendant: Yes.
>
> Court: Is that what you're trying to tell me, you're an innocent man? I've met my first innocent man on probation. He's completely innocent, he's on probation?

Defendant: Have, have you went over the case?

Court: Oh my gosh, you're innocent.

19. Between October 2009 and March 2010, when a defendant appearing in department 3 accidentally called Judge Salcido "sir," the judge pushed herself away from the bench while seated in her chair and stated, "Do these look like the clothes of a sir?" She then raised her leg above the bench, holding her leg by the ankle, and stated, "Do these look like the boots of a sir?"

20. On April 27, 2010, around 9:58 a.m., the defendant in case number C267890 appeared without counsel, seeking to modify a term of his probation to allow him to travel out of state. After explaining to him that he was required to "formally notice" a motion to modify the terms of probation, Judge Salcido reappointed the public defender and continued the matter to May 4. After the defendant left the courtroom, the judge handled four other matters, and the recording was stopped at approximately 10:13 a.m. Shortly thereafter, before the recording was restarted, the judge stated to the audience of approximately 30 people, from the bench, words to the effect of: "Do you remember that guy on formal probation?" After someone in the audience said "yes," she said words to the effect of: "You know why I wouldn't modify his probation without going through required procedures?" then said words to the effect that "Because he's a sex offender."

The conduct described above under Count Two demonstrated a pattern of misconduct and violated canons 1 (a judge shall uphold the integrity of the judiciary), 2 (a judge shall avoid impropriety and the appearance of impropriety), 2A (a judge shall promote public confidence in the integrity and impartiality of the judiciary), 3B(3) (a judge shall require order and decorum in proceedings), and 3B(4) (a judge shall be patient, dignified, and courteous). It constitutes prejudicial misconduct.

COUNT THREE

On January 7, 2010, around 10:03 a.m., defendant Chadira Gipson appeared in case number C287545 for a change of plea. As set forth below, Judge Salcido took

Gipson into custody for direct contempt without affording her due process or complying with the legal requirements for direct contempt, and without sentencing her; she also directed comments to the courtroom audience that failed to uphold a high standard of conduct:

> Court: Oh, Chadira Gipson.
>
> Counsel: Good morning, Your Honor, Michael Kern appearing on behalf of Ms. Gipson, who's present for the court, before the court out of custody for change of plea to a 415(2) as a misdemeanor.
>
> [¶] ... [¶]
>
> Court: So, the Chadira Gipson matter. All right. And it's going to be an added -- what count five?
>
> Counsel: I think that's correct, Your Honor.
>
> Court: A 415(2)?
>
> Counsel: Yes.
>
> [¶] ... [¶]
>
> Court: All right. So, Ms. Gipson, is that how I pronounce your last name?
>
> Defendant: Yes.
>
> Court: Why don't you have her speak next to the microphone. Ms. Gipson, have you had a chance to talk about the facts of this case with your court-appointed attorney?
>
> Defendant: Yes.
>
> Court: Did you get all of your legal questions answered?
>
> Defendant: Yes.

Court: I can't hear you. You need to speak up or use the microphone.

Defendant: Yes.

Court: Thank you. Were the consequences of pleading guilty explained to you?

Defendant: Yes.

Court: Oh, no, no, no, no. Counsel?

Counsel: Yes.

Court: You know how I am with the defendants who don't show the proper respect to the judge. I don't deal well with eye-rolling attitudes. And I am about to sentence her. So maybe you want to take her outside and let her know whose courtroom this is.

Counsel: Sure. We've discussed the case, Your Honor, I just need to -- Court: I just directed you to take her outside -- Counsel: Sure.

Court: And let her know whose house she's in.

Counsel: Thank you.

Court: Mm-hmm. I'm about to sentence her.

Defendant: For what? [or So what?]

Court: Excuse me, go grab her. Yeah, go grab her for direct contempt of court.

Bailiff: Come back in.

Court: I don't play in here. I don't know who you think you're playing with.

Bailiff: Come back in, take a seat.

Court: Put her in, in the tank.

Bailiff: Okay. Come on over here actually.

Court: She's in direct contempt of court.

Bailiff: Come on over here.

Court: For saying "so what" when I said I was about to sentence her.

Defendant: I didn't say it, I said "do what."

Court: Be quiet. Anybody else feel like they're lucky today? [Laughter] I guarantee you we're not in Las Vegas people.

The judge then called a few other matters. Around 10:12 a.m., outside the presence of the defendant, she told defense counsel, "I'm not trying to punish you, counsel, but I'm not ready to deal with her yet." After further discussion, counsel asked Judge Salcido if she would recall the case. The judge said, "Not right now," and then called two other matters.

At 10:22 a.m., Judge Salcido asked defense counsel if he needed "to go somewhere else because I'm not intending to call her case for a while. [¶] ... [¶] I think she needs some time to reflect. [¶] ... [¶] She has a lot of reflection to do. So, um, do you have to go to any other courtrooms?" When defense counsel responded that he did not, the judge said, "All right. Well, unfortunately, she don't know how to act." Shortly thereafter, Judge Salcido told court staff that she was recusing herself and the case was sent to department 11, where Gipson was released and entered her change of plea. The contempt proceeding was not pursued.

Judge Salcido's conduct in Gipson constituted an abuse of authority and demonstrated embroilment. It violated canons 1 (a judge shall uphold the integrity of the judiciary), 2 (a judge shall avoid impropriety and the appearance of impropriety), 2A (a judge shall promote public confidence in the integrity and impartiality of the judiciary), 3B(2) (a judge shall be faithful to the law), 3B(4) (a judge shall be patient, dignified, and courteous) and 3B(7) (a judge shall accord to every person who has a legal interest in a proceeding the right to be heard). The judge's conduct, at a minimum, constitutes prejudicial misconduct.

III

DISCIPLINE

Article VI, section 18, subsection (d) of the California Constitution provides that the commission may "censure a judge ... for action ... that constitutes willful misconduct in office, ... or conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute." Judge Salcido concedes that her conduct as stipulated in the first two counts was prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute (prejudicial misconduct) and that her conduct as stipulated in the third count constitutes, at minimum, prejudicial misconduct. The purpose of a commission disciplinary proceeding is "the protection of the public, the enforcement of rigorous standards of judicial conduct, and the maintenance of public confidence in the integrity ... of the judicial system." (Broadman v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1998) 18 Cal.4th 1079, 1112, citing Adams v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1995) 10 Cal.4th 866, 912.) The commission concludes that this purpose is best served by the discipline proposed in the Stipulation: a public censure with an agreement that Judge Salcido will resign and will not at any time seek or hold judicial office in California or seek or accept judicial assignment from any California state court.

Judge Salcido admits that she engaged in thirty-nine separate instances of prejudicial misconduct. "The number of wrongful acts is relevant to determining whether they were merely isolated occurrences or, instead, part of a course of conduct establishing 'lack of temperament and ability to perform judicial functions in an even-handed manner.'[Citation.]" (Wenger v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1981) 29 Cal.3d 615, 653; Inquiry Concerning Judge Bruce Van Voorhis (2003) 48 Cal.4th CJP Supp. 257, 296.) The numerous incidents of misconduct as described in the stipulated facts cannot be characterized as isolated occurrences. Rather, they establish a pattern of misconduct which demonstrates a temperament ill-suited for judicial office.

In many instances, Judge Salcido's misconduct made a mockery of the judicial system. She used her court proceedings as an audition for her own television entertainment program, giving the unseemly appearance of playing to the cameras and the audience. While the cameras were rolling, the proceedings took on the atmosphere of a game show. Defendants were asked if they wanted to use "a life line," and "which door" they wanted to walk out. Another defendant was told "we're doing double or nothing now," and asked if he was prepared to "double down." The judge repeatedly solicited audience participation and even polled the audience: "Can I get a woo, woo?"; "Does he need to call the lifeline?"; asking the audience to repeat the slogan, "Do or do not, there is no try."; "What should he do? Take the deal, take the deal, take the deal." In response, the audience laughed and "wooed" without admonishment from the court. Judge Salcido failed to appreciate that "a courtroom is not the Improv and the presider's role model is not Judge Judy." (Haluck v. Ricoh Electronics, Inc. (2007) 151 Cal.App.4th 994, 1008.) The judge's showmanship behavior together with her statement to the producer that she would line up her more interesting cases for the day of the filming created the appearance that she was more interested in promoting herself for a role in a television show than in delivering justice to those who appeared before her.

It is self-evident that crude comments and sexually suggestive jokes from a judge have no place in a courtroom. Yet, Judge Salcido made manifestly inappropriate remarks of a lewd nature in an open courtroom as the proceedings were being filmed. For instance, she ordered a defendant charged with exposing himself in public to stay away from a certain location because "they'll recognize you in more ways than one." When a defendant smiled, she remarked to him that "they might like your smile in jail." In a particularly offensive instance, she told a defendant that he would be "screwed" if he violated his probation and "we don't offer Vaseline for that." We have previously condemned joking or making a casual comment about the possibility of an inmate having to endure same gender rape while incarcerated, which "may be perceived as not only an indifference to and acceptance of a tragic reality in our criminal justice system, but as a perhaps unintended admission of its inevitability under present conditions." (Public Admonishment of Judge Susanne S. Shaw (2000), p. 15.)

Even when not auditioning for her own television show, Judge Salcido engaged in conduct that was seriously at odds with her duty under the canons to be patient, dignified and courteous to litigants, attorneys, and those with whom she deals in an official capacity and to maintain decorum in the proceedings. (Code of Judicial Ethics, canons 3B(3), (4).) In open court, the judge ridiculed and belittled litigants, referred to court clerical staff as "cucumbers" who "aren't even potatoes because potatoes have eyes" or "corn because corn have ears," ridiculed a deputy district attorney, and made several disparaging remarks about an assistant public defender, often in the presence of his potential client. When a defendant accidentally called her "sir," Judge Salcido demonstrated a disturbing lack of decorum by raising her leg above the bench, holding her leg by the ankle, and stating, "Do these look like the boots of a sir?"

We appreciate that each judge has his or her own style, and that "a modest injection of humor at the appropriate time" can have a place in the courtroom. (Rothman, Cal. Judicial Conduct Handbook, (3d ed. 2007) § 3.42, p. 140.) "However, the cultivation of a particular judicial personality may not be used as an excuse for unethical conduct. ... regardless of the judge's style, she or he must respect the litigants and attorneys who appear in her or his court." (Public Admonishment of Judge Susanne S. Shaw (2000), p. 14.) Judicial humor should never be used in a courtroom, as it was by Judge Salcido, to ridicule, embarrass or disparage others, or in a manner that diminishes the dignity of the judicial process. Judge Salcido's brand of "humor," as exemplified by the stipulated facts is, without question, unbefitting a judge.

The utter lack of decorum and inappropriate judicial demeanor exhibited in the stipulated misconduct reflects poorly, not only on Judge Salcido, but on the reputation of the entire judiciary. "The public looks to judges to set the tone of judicial proceedings." (Inquiry Concerning Judge Bruce Van Voorhis (2003) 48 Cal.4th CJP Supp. 257, 312.) Unfortunately, the tone set by Judge Salcido was undignified, unprofessional, and degrading to litigants, attorneys and court staff. Members of the public observing the proceedings on the day the producer was filming could not help but wonder if they were in a courtroom or on the set of a reality television program. On other occasions, her courtroom took on a comedy show atmosphere. She told the courtroom audience that they had no sense of humor, stating: "God, you guys are dead, you guys are like, dead. I'm like, God, I need a warm up, I need a warm up comedian before I come out. Okay, Yes, sir. Are you ready? You're volunteering? ... We're getting fun back in the courthouse. Fun, courthouse, they don't have to be separate." Judges are expected to administer justice and resolve serious issues, not to provide entertainment. Judge Salcido's misconduct cheapens the dignity of the court and undermines public confidence in and respect for the judicial system.

Judge Salcido's misconduct also includes abuse of authority and embroilment through her incarceration of a defendant for direct contempt without affording the defendant due process or complying with the requisite legal procedures. The importance of strict adherence to statutory and constitutional procedural requirements before exercising the "ultimate weapon" of contempt has been repeatedly emphasized by the Supreme Court and this commission. (Ryan v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1988) 45 Cal.3d 518, 533; Furey v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1987) 43 Cal.3d 1297, 1314; Cannon v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications (1975) 14 Cal.3d 678, 694; Public Admonishment of Judge Lisa Guy-Schall (1999), p. 1; see also Koehler v. Superior Court of San Mateo County (2010) 181 Cal.App.4th 1153, 1171.) It should have been apparent to Judge Salcido that she could not summarily remand a defendant to custody for what she perceived to be contemptuous conduct without affording the defendant any due process.

Based on the totality of the judge's misconduct, we conclude that the stipulated disposition, including the judge's agreement to resign and not thereafter hold judicial office or accept judicial assignment, is in the best interest of the public and the reputation of the judiciary. In accordance with the terms of the Stipulation, and good cause appearing, we hereby censure Judge DeAnn Salcido.

Commission members Hon. Katherine Feinstein, Mr. Anthony P. Capozzi, Esq., Hon. Frederick P. Horn, Ms. Barbara Schraeger, Mr. Lawrence Simi, Ms. Maya Dillard Smith, Ms. Sandra Talcott, and Mr. Nathaniel Trives voted to accept the Stipulation and to issue this decision and order. Commission members Hon. Judith D. McConnell and Mr. Peter E. Flores, Jr., Esq. were recused and commission member Mr. Samuel A. Hardage did not participate in this matter.

I

INTRODUCTION AND SUMMARY

This disciplinary matter concerns Judge Salvador Sarmiento, a judge of the Orange County Superior Court since 2003. On February 21, 2012, the commission filed its Notice of Formal Proceedings (Notice) against Judge Sarmiento charging him with attempting to influence an Orange County Superior Court commissioner to waive a $300 civil assessment on his wife's traffic citation and to bypass standard procedures in the setting of a trial date.

The Supreme Court appointed three special masters to hold an evidentiary hearing and to report to the commission. The masters are Hon. Vance W. Raye, Presiding Justice of the Court of Appeal, Third Appellate District, Hon. Suzanne N. Kingsbury, Judge of the El Dorado County Superior Court, and Hon. Ronni B. MacLaren, Judge of the Alameda County Superior Court. Prior to the masters holding an evidentiary hearing, however, Judge Sarmiento and his counsel, Randall A. Miller, Esq., and the examiner for the commission, Gary W. Schons, Esq., (the parties) proposed a stipulated resolution of this inquiry to the commission, as follows.

By a Stipulation for Discipline by Consent (Stipulation), the parties propose, pursuant to Commission Rule 127(b), that this inquiry concerning Judge Sarmiento be resolved with the imposition of a public censure based upon the stipulated facts and legal conclusions. In addition to consenting to the proposed discipline, Judge Sarmiento expressly admits the truth of the stipulated facts and agrees with the stipulated legal conclusions, including that he engaged in prejudicial misconduct. According to the terms of the Stipulation, Judge Sarmiento also agrees that in its decision and order imposing a public censure, the commission may articulate the reasons for its decision and include explanatory language the commission deems appropriate. Pursuant to the Stipulation, Judge Sarmiento waives hearing, review and any further proceedings.

Judge Sarmiento also executed on June 9, 2012, the requisite Affidavit of Consent (Affidavit) under rule 127(d) in which he admits the truth of the charges as modified by the Stipulation, consents to the imposition of a public censure, and waives review by the California Supreme Court.

This Decision and Order imposing a public censure is issued following the commission's vote (as indicated at the conclusion of this decision) to accept the stipulated agreement. The findings and conclusions, set forth herein, are based on the Stipulation and Affidavit.

STIPULATED FACTS AND LEGAL CONCLUSIONS

On November 18, 2010, Judge Sarmiento's wife received a traffic citation from the Santa Ana Police Department for violating Vehicle Code section 21950(a) (failing to yield to pedestrian in crosswalk). She intended to challenge the ticket on the basis that the crosswalk was unmarked. The ticket was filed with the court on December 21, 2010. On December 22, a "courtesy notice" was sent by the court to the judge's wife. A courtesy notice lists the cost to pay the ticket (bail), methods for making payment, and the amount due to the court to attend traffic school (bail plus a fee of about $50). The bail amount was $234. The pay-or-appear-by date was January 19, 2011.

No action was taken on the ticket by the January 19 deadline. The matter was referred to the court's collection unit. On January 24, a delinquency notice was sent to the judge's wife. It provided a 10-day grace period to either pay or appear, and stated that failure to do so would result in additional fees that may include a $300 civil assessment and other fees.

No action was taken on the ticket within the grace period, and on Monday, February 7, 2011, a final notice was sent to the judge's wife. The final notice stated that an additional $300 civil assessment (and $25 in other fees) was now owed. The notice stated that if the judge's wife appeared within 10 days of the notice and showed good cause for failure to appear or pay the fine, the court may vacate the civil assessment (referred to as a CIVA). The notice explained that "Good cause may be defined as failure to pay or appear because you were serving military duty overseas, hospitalized, or incarcerated, or for other extraordinary reasons." The final notice also stated that if the judge's wife did not pay in full or show good cause, the court may take certain other action.

A traffic ticket that is not delinquent may be set for trial by a traffic clerk upon posting of bail; it may be set for arraignment without any payment. After a CIVA is added, a collections clerk may set the ticket for trial only upon posting of the original bail plus the CIVA; it may be set for arraignment without any payment. For both delinquent tickets and tickets that are not delinquent, it is the court's policy that staff may set a court date at the counter window only upon the appearance of either the ticket recipient or an attorney for the recipient. A trial date for a non-delinquent ticket or a ticket in CIVA status also may be set by a judicial officer, upon the appearance in court of either the ticket recipient or an attorney appearing on his or her behalf. The collections staff does not have the authority to vacate a CIVA unless it can be demonstrated that it was added in error, e.g., that ticket payment in fact was timely made.

Judge Sarmiento has been a judicial officer in the Orange County Superior Court since July 1997. From July 1997 through late August 2003, he served as a commissioner. Since then he has been a judge. Judge Sarmiento has been assigned to department 50 of the Central Justice Center in Santa Ana since approximately February 2010.

In February 2011, traffic matters were being heard in Central in department 54 by Commissioner Carmen Luege, who was hired by the court in June 2009. Departments 50 and 54 are on the second floor, and share a common hallway between the courtrooms and chambers.

On February 9, 2011 around 3:30 p.m., Judge Sarmiento spoke with a traffic clerk about the ticket, in the traffic staff area behind the counter windows. The judge told her that he needed to take care of his wife's ticket, or words to that effect. The clerk accessed the ticket on the court's case management system (called Vision) and told the judge that she could not act on the ticket because it was in collections. She printed out minutes for the ticket and wrote "$609.00" at the top, which is the amount that would have been due to the court for traffic school (original bail of $234, plus the $300 CIVA and $25 in related fees, plus a $50 traffic school fee). The traffic clerk gave the minutes to the judge and referred him to a collections staff member. (At this time traffic staff and collections staff were located in the same area, on the first floor.) The judge spoke briefly with collections staff.

On the morning of Thursday, February 10, 2011, the judge approached Commissioner Luege about his wife's ticket, during a brief break in her traffic calendar. Judge Sarmiento initially greeted the commissioner in the hallway in back of the courtrooms. He then walked with her into the entryway area of her chambers, where they stood and talked.

Judge Sarmiento told Commissioner Luege that his wife got a ticket, that it had been sitting on his desk but he had forgotten about it, and that there was now a civil assessment. Commissioner Luege does not recall the judge's exact words. Judge Sarmiento admits that he asked Commissioner Luege to address the CIVA. He admits that in doing so, he was seeking to have her vacate the CIVA.

Commissioner Luege responded by saying that she had to get back to court, and would get back to him. The commissioner did not intend to remove the CIVA, but wanted time to think about how to tell Judge Sarmiento "no" in a way that would not be offensive to him.

Judge Sarmiento then left a folded piece of paper on the commissioner's desk without saying what it was. Commissioner Luege returned to her courtroom without looking at the paper left by the judge. When she returned to chambers after the morning traffic calendar had concluded, she discovered that it was the minutes for his wife's ticket containing the clerk's original "$609.00" notation at the top.

Judge Sarmiento's regular courtroom clerk was absent on February 10, and a substitute clerk was filling in. After Judge Sarmiento concluded his afternoon calendar on February 10, he gave the substitute clerk a copy of the courtesy notice for his wife's ticket and asked him to check the status of the ticket. The substitute clerk accessed the ticket on Vision and told Judge Sarmiento that the last action taken was the addition of the CIVA. The judge responded that he was going to talk to "Carmen," and left.

Around 4:00 p.m., Judge Sarmiento returned to Commissioner Luege's chambers, where she was sitting at her desk reviewing correspondence. He told her that he had checked and that she had not done anything on the ticket, or words to that effect. He asked whether he could "at least get a trial date." When the commissioner said that she was not sure that she could give him a trial date, the judge did not respond. The commissioner then told Judge Sarmiento that she would give him a trial date.

She walked into the traffic courtroom with the judge. The regular courtroom clerk had temporarily stepped out. The commissioner instructed the backup clerk (who had only a few weeks of experience with traffic matters) to set a trial date for the ticket; the commissioner said nothing regarding the CIVA. The backup clerk provided a trial date of March 16, 2011. The commissioner and the judge left the courtroom. Judge Sarmiento admits that in approaching Commissioner Luege in the afternoon, he bypassed normal procedures for obtaining a trial date, and sought and obtained favorable treatment on behalf of his wife.

Thereafter, without consulting Commissioner Luege (and not at the instruction of Judge Sarmiento), the backup clerk accessed the ticket on Vision and made various entries, including entries vacating the CIVA and related fees. Shortly thereafter, the regular clerk returned to the courtroom and learned what the backup clerk had done; this was then brought to the attention of Commissioner Luege. At the commissioner's direction, later that afternoon, the backup clerk corrected the erroneous entries vacating the CIVA and related fees.

During the period after the backup clerk had vacated the CIVA and related fees, but before those erroneous entries were corrected, Judge Sarmiento went downstairs to the collections staff area to post bail. When the collections clerk accessed the ticket, bail was listed at $234 (the original bail) because the entries vacating the CIVA had not yet been corrected. The judge paid $234.

On March 16, 2011, the judge's wife entered a guilty plea and the CIVA and related fees were paid.

Judge Sarmiento's conduct violated the Code of Judicial Ethics, canons 1 (a judge shall uphold the integrity of the judiciary), 2 (a judge shall avoid impropriety and the appearance of impropriety), 2A (a judge shall act at all times in a manner that promotes public confidence in the integrity and impartiality of the judiciary), 2B(1) (a judge shall not allow family, social or other relationships to influence the judge's judicial conduct or judgment), 2B(2) (judge shall not lend the prestige of judicial office to advance pecuniary or personal interest of judge or others), and and 3B(7) (improper ex parte communications prohibited). The judge's conduct constitutes prejudicial misconduct.

III

DISCIPLINE

By attempting to influence another judicial officer on behalf of his wife, Judge Sarmiento engaged in serious judicial misconduct which severely damages the reputation of the judiciary. The public has a right to expect that justice will be dispensed with an even hand and without favoritism. Judge Sarmiento's conduct makes it more difficult for judges throughout the state to maintain the trust and respect of the public. The commission recently emphasized that the use of the judicial office to provide procedural shortcuts or lenient dispositions to family and friends in traffic matters "subverts the impartiality of the judicial system and undermines respect for the judiciary as a whole." (Inquiry Concerning Stanford (2012) 53 Cal.4th CJP Supp. 1, 25.) We issue this public censure in an effort to restore public confidence in the integrity and impartiality of the judiciary.

Judge Sarmiento's misconduct is aggravated by the fact that he requested preferential treatment from his subordinate, a commissioner, who is employed by the court. This placed the commissioner in the uncomfortable position of having to find a way to say "no" to the judge without offending her superior.

While Judge Sarmiento's misconduct is seriously at odds with a judge's duty to uphold the impartiality and integrity of the judiciary, we have determined that censure rather than removal is the appropriate discipline because we are not convinced, based on this single incident of misconduct, that Judge Sarmiento lacks "the temperament and ability to perform judicial functions in an even-handed manner." (Fletcher v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1998) 19 Cal.4th 865, 918 [The number of wrongful acts is relevant to determining whether they were merely isolated occurrences or, instead, part of a course of conduct establishing "lack of temperament and ability to perform judicial functions in an even-handed manner."].) The judge's lack of prior discipline for similar misconduct during his lengthy tenure as a judicial officer contributes to this conclusion.

In assessing whether removal is necessary to fulfill our mandate to protect the public, we consider the likelihood of future misconduct. An appreciation for the impropriety of one's actions is essential to a willingness and capacity to reform. (Inquiry Concerning Platt (2002) 48 Cal.4th CJP Supp 227, 248 ["A judges failure to appreciate or admit to the impropriety of his or her acts indicates a lack of capacity to reform."].) By the terms of the Stipulation, Judge Sarmiento acknowledges engaging in serious misconduct that warrants the imposition of this severe sanction.

We conclude that the purpose of judicial discipline – protection of the public, enforcement of rigorous standards of judicial conduct and the maintenance of public confidence in the integrity and independence of the judicial system – can be accomplished through a censure. (See Broadman v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1998) 18 Cal.4th 1079, 1111-1112.) Accordingly, the commission hereby imposes this public censure of Judge Sarmiento. (Cal. Const. art. VI, §18 (d).)

Commission members Mr. Lawrence J. Simi, Hon. Erica R. Yew, Anthony P. Capozzi, Esq., Hon. Judith D. McConnell, Nanci E. Nishimura, Esq., Ms. Maya Dillard Smith, Ms. Sandra Talcott, Mr. Adam N. Torres, and Mr. Nathaniel Trives voted to accept the parties' settlement proposal and to issue this decision and order imposing a public censure pursuant to the stipulated agreement. Commission member Hon. Frederick P. Horn was recused. Commission member Ms. Mary Lou Aranguren did not participate.

| IN THE MATTER CONCERNINGFORMER JUDGE PAUL D. SEEMAN | DECISION AND ORDER IMPOSING PUBLIC CENSURE AND BAR PURSUANT TO STIPULATION(Commission Rule 116.5) |

This disciplinary matter concerns Paul D. Seeman, a former judge of the Alameda County Superior Court. Mr. Seeman served as a court commissioner from August 2, 2004, until he was appointed to the bench on March 27, 2009. The commission authorized a preliminary investigation in this matter on June 29, 2011, pursuant to which the commission sent its preliminary investigation letter to Mr. Seeman on February 1, 2013.

Mr. Seeman resigned from the bench on March 19, 2013. On August 1, 2013, Mr. Seeman pled no contest to one felony charge of elder abuse (Pen. Code, § 368(d)) and one felony charge of perjury (Pen. Code, § 118(a)). Mr. Seeman was sentenced on October 22, 2013.

After settlement negotiations with commission staff counsel, Mr. Seeman and his counsel agreed to propose that the pending preliminary investigation be resolved by the imposition of a censure and bar. Mr. Seeman and his counsel have stipulated, pursuant to commission rule 116.5, to the imposition of a public censure and bar prohibiting Mr. Seeman from seeking or holding judicial office, or accepting a position or an assignment as a judicial officer, subordinate judicial officer or judge pro tem with any court in the State of California, or accepting a reference of work from any California state court, at any time in the future.

The Stipulation for Imposition of Censure and Bar ("Stipulation") was approved by the commission on December 5, 2013, pursuant to the following terms and conditions as set forth in the Stipulation.

TERMS AND CONDITIONS OF STIPULATION

1. This agreement resolves the preliminary investigation out of which the preliminary investigation letter of February 1, 2013, arose.

2. The commission has jurisdiction over the matter pursuant to article VI, section 18, of the California Constitution. The allegations before the commission are sufficiently serious to warrant the institution of formal proceedings pursuant to that section of the Constitution.

3. The settlement provided by this agreement is in the best interests of both the commission and Mr. Seeman because, among other reasons, it adequately protects the public and will avoid the delay and costs of formal proceedings.

4. The commission shall issue a censure and bar based on the agreed Stipulated Facts and Legal Conclusions set forth herein. Mr. Seeman has agreed to accept a censure and bar, which is the maximum discipline the commission can impose on a former judge.

5. Mr. Seeman resigned from his position as a judge with the Alameda County Superior Court on March 19, 2013.

6. Mr. Seeman has agreed not to seek or hold judicial office, or accept a position or assignment as a judicial officer, subordinate judicial officer or judge pro tem with any court in the State of California, or accept a reference of work from any California state court, at any time in the future.

7. Mr. Seeman has agreed to be disbarred by the State Bar of California.

8. If Mr. Seeman fails to comply with any of the terms and conditions of this agreement, the commission may withdraw the censure and bar and resume its investigation. Failure to comply with the terms and conditions of this agreement will constitute additional and independent grounds for discipline.

9. Mr. Seeman waives any further proceedings and review in this matter, including any further response to the preliminary investigation letter (commission rule 111(a)), formal proceedings (commission rule 118, et seq.), and review by the California Supreme Court (Cal. Rules of Court, rule 9.60).

STIPULATED FACTS AND LEGAL CONCLUSIONS

I. Misconduct Relating to Mr. Seeman's Handling of Anne Nutting's Financial Affairs

In 1998, Paul Seeman was an attorney living across the street from Lee and Anne Nutting. Lee Nutting was 89 years old. Anne Nutting was 85 years old. They had no children and no family or friends living nearby. Mr. Seeman did not know the Nuttings well.

In December 1998, the Nuttings' home was deemed unsuitable for habitation due to an accumulation of possessions and lack of upkeep, so they moved to a hotel. Mr. Seeman offered to help them obtain permission to return to their home. They agreed.

In January 1999, Mr. Seeman entered into a written retainer agreement for legal services with the Nuttings regarding their home, estate planning, and other miscellaneous matters. At that time, Mr. Seeman had almost no experience with estate planning. Mr. Seeman began billing the Nuttings for professional services and continued to do so monthly until at least the end of July 2004.

Also in January 1999, Mr. Seeman had the Nuttings each execute a Durable Power of Attorney ("DPOA"), which Mr. Seeman had prepared. Mr. Seeman was named as the agent for the principal in each DPOA. Mr. Seeman did not advise the Nuttings in writing that they should seek independent counsel before signing the documents.

Mr. Seeman discovered that the Nuttings' financial affairs were in a state of disarray. The Nuttings gave Mr. Seeman access to their home, where he found numerous stock certificates, which he collected and took to a broker who set up a brokerage account for the Nuttings that had a beginning value in excess of $1,000,000.

Mr. Seeman also helped the Nuttings with their taxes. He retained a tax accountant for them and began paying their taxes. At times, he had Mrs. Nutting make out checks for "taxes" that were payable to him personally, rather than to the Internal Revenue Service or the Franchise Tax Board.

In December 1999, Mr. Nutting passed away.

In January 2000, Mr. Seeman opened a client trust account with funds belonging to Mrs. Nutting (the "Trust Account"). Mrs. Nutting periodically gave Mr. Seeman checks to deposit into the Trust Account. From 2000 until 2010, Mr. Seeman maintained a Quicken ledger to record the debits and credits for the Trust Account.

In early 2004, Mr. Seeman applied for the position of commissioner with the Alameda County Superior Court.

In June 2004, when Mrs. Nutting was 91 years old, Mrs. Nutting's stock brokerage account was changed from an account for which Mr. Seeman had a power of attorney to an account naming him as the pay-upon-death beneficiary. As long as Mr. Seeman was the pay-upon-death beneficiary of the account, if Mrs. Nutting predeceased him, he would have obtained sole ownership of the account, which was worth approximately $2,000,000.

Around the same time, Mr. Seeman's name was added to two of Mrs. Nutting's bank accounts. One account contained approximately $200,000 and the other account contained approximately $250,000. If Mrs. Nutting had predeceased Mr. Seeman, he would have obtained sole ownership of each account.

In July 2004, Mr. Seeman prepared a will for Mrs. Nutting that named 13 different charitable organizations as the beneficiaries of her estate and named his wife as the executor of her estate. He also prepared a declaration of trust in which he was designated as the successor trustee and sole beneficiary, and a second declaration of trust in which his wife was the successor trustee and he was the sole beneficiary. The sole asset of each trust was Mrs. Nutting's residence. Mrs. Nutting decided not to sign these draft trust documents.

On August 2, 2004, Mr. Seeman became a court commissioner.

After Mr. Seeman became a commissioner, he continued to handle some of Mrs. Nutting's financial affairs, including her taxes and payment of utilities and other expenses via the Trust Account, in the same manner as he had before he became a commissioner, and he continued to act as her fiduciary.

In August 2004, Mr. Seeman changed the Trust Account from a client trust account to a joint account between himself and Mrs. Nutting. If Mrs. Nutting predeceased him, Mr. Seeman would have obtained sole ownership of the funds in the Trust Account.

Between 2004 and 2010, Mr. Seeman on a number of occasions commingled his personal funds with Mrs. Nutting's funds in the Trust Account and failed to keep a proper accounting of the Trust Account.

Between 2004 and 2006, Mr. Seeman used money in the Trust Account to pay some of his personal American Express bills. These transactions totaled over $5,000.

On September 10, 2004, Mr. Seeman borrowed approximately $250,000 from Mrs. Nutting. He signed an unsecured "Simple Promissory Note" for $250,000 at 3 percent interest, with monthly interest payments to be made on the first of every month, starting in November 2004. Mr. Seeman made interest-only payments for eight months and then stopped making any payments after July 2005.

In May 2007, Mrs. Nutting contacted an attorney who directed Mr. Seeman to remove his name from all of her accounts and to take no further action with respect to her affairs. Mr. Seeman did not comply with this directive, and he continued to use and control the Trust Account, and could have accessed the other accounts from which he did not remove his name.

On March 27, 2009, Mr. Seeman became a judge. He continued to handle Mrs. Nutting's financial affairs, including her taxes and payment of utilities and other expenses via the Trust Account, and he continued to act as her fiduciary.

From 2000 until 2010, Mr. Seeman had exclusive access to and use of the Trust Account. The bank statements for the Trust Account were sent to Mr. Seeman and not to Mrs. Nutting.

In February 2010, Mr. Seeman was asked by an individual acting on Mrs. Nutting's behalf to repay the $250,000 loan he took from Mrs. Nutting. He told Mrs. Nutting that he was still paying the monthly interest payments into the Trust Account. Mr. Seeman's representation was false, and he knew it was false.

Mrs. Nutting died on April 17, 2010.

Mr. Seeman repaid the loan plus interest in November 2010.

On August 1, 2013, Mr. Seeman pled no contest to one charge of felony elder abuse (Pen. Code, § 368(d)) in connection with his handling of Mrs. Nutting's financial affairs.

Mr. Seeman's conduct while he was an attorney constituted a breach of fiduciary duty and violated Probate Code sections 4232 (duty of holder of power of attorney to act solely in the interest of the principal and to avoid conflicts of interest), 4233 (duty of holder of power of attorney to keep property separate and distinct from other property in a manner adequate to identify the property clearly as belonging to the principal), 4236 (duty of holder of power of attorney to keep records of all transactions entered into on behalf of the principal), 21350 (no provision of any instrument shall be valid to make a donative transfer to the person who drafted the instrument), and 21351(b) (draft instrument making donative transfer to person who drafted it must be reviewed by independent attorney); Rules of Professional Conduct, rule 3-300 (attorney shall not enter into a business transaction with a client, or acquire a pecuniary interest adverse to a client, unless the transaction is fair and reasonable to the client and is fully disclosed in writing to the client, the client is advised in writing that the client may seek the advice of independent counsel and is given the opportunity to do so, and the client consents in writing to the terms of the transaction), rule 4-100 (attorney may not commingle client funds with personal funds), and rule 4-400 (attorney cannot induce a client to make a substantial gift to the attorney); and Penal Code section 368(d) (theft from an elder).

Mr. Seeman's conduct when he was a bench officer violated Penal Code section 368(d) (theft from an elder) and Government Code section 89503 (annual gift limit), and violated the following canons of the Code of Judicial Ethics: canon 1 (a judge shall personally maintain high standards of conduct so the integrity of the judiciary can be preserved), canon 2 (a judge shall avoid impropriety and the appearance of impropriety in all of the judge's activities), canon 2A (a judge shall respect and comply with the law and shall act at all times in a manner that promotes public confidence in the integrity of the judiciary), canon 4D(6) (a judge shall not accept a loan from anyone, with certain exceptions that do not apply here), and canon 4E(1) (a judge shall not serve as executor, . . . attorney in fact, or other fiduciary, except for the estate, trust, or person of a member of the judge's family, and then only if such service will not interfere with the proper performance of judicial duties).

II. Failure to Disclose in Statements of Economic Interests (Form 700's)

Mr. Seeman signed Statements of Economic Interests (Form 700's) under penalty of perjury on the following dates: February 22, 2005; January 12, 2006; February 14, 2007; January 16, 2008; January 12, 2009; March 27, 2009; April 2, 2009; January 12, 2010; and January 5, 2011. The Form 700's were filed with the Alameda County Superior Court and the Fair Political Practices Commission.

On each of the dates set forth above, Mr. Seeman failed to disclose the $250,000 personal loan he received from Mrs. Nutting. He also failed to disclose investments he made in different properties through Trust Deed Investments, Inc. and the income he received from those investments. Mr. Seeman did disclose income from Trust Deed Investments, Inc. on the January 2011 Form 700. Mr. Seeman also filed an Amended Form 700 in October of 2011, declaring the loan retroactively for 2004.

On August 1, 2013, Mr. Seeman pled no contest to one charge of felony perjury (Pen. Code, § 118(a)) in connection with his failure to disclose on his Form 700's.

Mr. Seeman's conduct violated Penal Code section 118(a) and Government Code section 87200 et seq. His conduct also violated canons 1, 2, and 2A.

III. False Statement in DMV Application for Title or Registration

On August 26, 2004, Mr. Seeman filled out a California Department of Motor Vehicles Application for Title or Registration for a car, handwrote that the purchase price of the car was $10,000, and signed the application under penalty of perjury under the laws of the State of California. In fact, the purchase price of the car was $28,045. Mr. Seeman's statement on the application regarding the purchase price of the car was false.

Mr. Seeman's conduct violated Penal Code sections 115 and 118(a), and Vehicle Code section 20. His conduct also violated canons 1, 2, and 2A.

IV. Improperly Accessing DMV records

On four occasions, while he was a judge, Mr. Seeman caused court personnel to access Department of Motor Vehicles registration records to obtain information regarding the license plates of vehicles belonging to certain individuals for a purpose unrelated to the faithful discharge of his judicial duties.

Mr. Seeman's conduct violated Vehicle Code section 1808.45. His conduct also violated canons 1, 2, 2A, and 3B(11) (a judge shall not use for any purpose unrelated to judicial duties nonpublic information acquired in a judicial capacity).

DISCIPLINE

Article VI, section 18, subdivision (d) of the California Constitution provides that the commission may "censure a judge or former judge . . . for action . . . that constitutes . . . conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute." Mr. Seeman has stipulated that his conduct constituted prejudicial misconduct and willful misconduct and seriously undermined the integrity of the judiciary.

The purpose of a commission disciplinary proceeding is not punishment, "but rather the protection of the public, the enforcement of rigorous standards of judicial conduct, and the maintenance of public confidence in the integrity . . . of the judicial system." (Broadman v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1998) 18 Cal.4th 1079, 1112, citing Adams v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1995) 10 Cal.4th 866, 912.) The commission believes that this purpose is best served by the discipline proposed in the Stipulation, which constitutes the maximum discipline that may be imposed by the commission on a former judge.

Accordingly, the commission concludes that the severe sanction of a public censure and bar is necessary for the protection of the public and the reputation of the judiciary. Good cause appearing, the commission hereby censures former judge Paul D. Seeman and bars him from receiving an assignment, appointment, or reference of work from any California state court.

Commission members Hon. Erica R. Yew; Anthony P. Capozzi, Esq.; Hon. Thomas M. Maddock; Nanci E. Nishimura, Esq.; Hon. Ignazio J. Ruvolo; Mr. Lawrence J. Simi; Mr. Richard Simpson; Ms. Maya Dillard Smith; Ms. Sandra Talcott; and Mr. Adam N. Torres voted to issue this decision and order imposing a public censure and bar pursuant to the stipulated disposition. Commission member Ms. Mary Lou Aranguren did not participate.

| IN THE MATTER CONCERNING JUDGE SCOTT STEINER | DECISION AND ORDER IMPOSING CENSURE PURSUANT TO STIPULATION (Rule 116.5) |

INTRODUCTION AND SUMMARY

This disciplinary matter concerns Judge Scott Steiner, a judge at the Orange County Superior Court.

Judge Steiner, acting through his counsel, Paul S. Meyer, Esq., and commission staff counsel proposed to settle the preliminary investigation instituted by the commission in this matter through the issuance of a public censure under the terms and conditions stated below, and upon the stipulated statement of facts and conclusions of law. A Stipulation for Discipline by Consent (Stipulation) signed and executed by Judge Steiner, Mr. Meyer, and Victoria B. Henley, Director-Chief Counsel of the Commission on Judicial Performance is attached to this decision and order. Pursuant to rule 116.5 of the Rules of the Commission on Judicial Performance, the proposed Stipulation was approved by the commission on August 20, 2014.

The terms and conditions of the Stipulation provide that, upon approval of the Stipulation, the commission shall resolve the matters alleged in the pending preliminary investigation with the issuance of a censure based upon the agreed stipulated facts and legal conclusions. Further, the parties agree that the commission's decision and order imposing a censure will be made public and the commission may articulate the reasons for its decision and include explanatory language that the commission deems appropriate.

In signing the Stipulation, Judge Steiner expressly admits that the stipulated facts are true and that he agrees with the stated legal conclusions, and waives any further proceedings and review in this matter including formal proceedings and review by the Supreme Court. Accordingly, pursuant to article VI, section 18(d) of the California Constitution, the commission issues this public censure based on the following stipulated statement of facts and conclusions of law:

STIPULATED FACTS AND LEGAL CONCLUSIONS

Judge Steiner has been a judge of the Orange County Superior Court since January 2011.

I. Engaging in Sexual Activity in Chambers

Judge Steiner engaged in sexual activity in his chambers on multiple occasions, with two women with whom he was engaged in personal relationships. This included engaging in sexual intercourse with Ms. A. in his chambers on one occasion in the evening in early 2012 and engaging in sexual intercourse with Ms. B. in his chambers on two occasions during the work day, although not while court was in session, in May 2012. Both women were former students in law school classes taught by the judge; Ms. A. had been an intern working for the judge, and Ms. B. was an attorney practicing before the Orange County Superior Court.

Judge Steiner's conduct constituted failure to observe high standards of conduct, failure to conduct himself at all times in a manner that promotes public confidence in the integrity and impartiality of the judiciary, failure to conduct himself in a manner that does not demean the judicial office, and misuse of court facilities. Judge Steiner's conduct was contrary to the California Code of Judicial Ethics, canon 1, which requires judges to personally observe high standards of conduct so that the integrity and independence of the judiciary will be preserved; canon 2A, which requires judges to act at all times in a manner that promotes public confidence in the integrity and impartiality of the judiciary; and canon 4A(2), which requires judges to conduct all of their extrajudicial activities so that they do not demean the judicial office. Judge Steiner's conduct constituted, at a minimum, conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judiciary into disrepute.

While certain media reports raised concerns that the judge's relationship with Ms. B. may have involved a "quid pro quo" arrangement in which the judge assisted Ms. B., an attorney, in obtaining employment in exchange for sex, there was a lack of evidence of any such "quid pro quo" arrangement and an insufficient basis for further proceedings regarding the nature of the relationship.

II. Contacting Attorneys in District Attorney's Office Regarding Ms. A.'s Employment Application

When Ms. A. applied for a position with the Orange County District Attorney's Office, Judge Steiner wrote her a letter of recommendation. Ms. A. was interviewed for the position on or about February 14, 2012. She was not called back for a further interview.

Thereafter, Judge Steiner called the district attorney's office and asked about the interview process of Ms. A. When informed by an attorney who at one time had been his supervisor that Ms. A. had not passed the initial interview, Judge Steiner made a statement to the effect of, "Well, I guess writing a letter of recommendation means nothing." He sounded perplexed and irritated. Judge Steiner had also contacted another attorney in the office after sending a letter of recommendation for Ms. A. The judge asked whether his letter of recommendation had been received. He later asked the same attorney about the interview process and why Ms. A. had not been hired, and asked whether there was anything specific about Ms. A. that could use improvement.

In his contacts, Judge Steiner did not ask that any particular action be taken with respect to Ms. A.'s application, such as requesting that it be reconsidered. Judge Steiner had worked in the Orange County District Attorney's Office before he became a judge, and the persons to whom he spoke were a former colleague and an attorney who at one time had been his supervisor. Although Judge Steiner's contacts were with a former colleague and supervisor, attorneys in the district attorney's office regularly appeared before Judge Steiner.

Canon 2B(2) prohibits judges from lending the prestige of judicial office to advance the pecuniary or personal interests of the judges or others. One exception to canon 2B(2) permits judges to serve as a reference or provide a letter of recommendation based on their personal knowledge (canon 2B(2)(e)). Judge Steiner's conduct in initiating contact with the district attorney's office about the employment application of Ms. A., at or around the time he was engaged in a sexual relationship with Ms. A., in order to follow up on a letter of recommendation he had sent on Ms. A.'s behalf, asking questions about the interview and hiring processes, and expressing irritation that his recommendation had not resulted in her hiring, exceeded the scope of conduct permitted by canon 2B(2)(e). This conduct also was contrary to canon 2B(1), which provides that a judge shall not allow family, social, political or other relationships to influence the judge's judicial conduct or judgment, and shall not convey the impression that any individual is in a special position to influence the judge. In addition, the conduct violated canon 2A, which provides that judges shall act at all times in a manner that promotes public confidence in the integrity and impartiality of the judiciary. The conduct was, at a minimum, conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judiciary into disrepute.

III. Assigning Ms. B's Cases to Other Judges After Disqualifying

After Judge Steiner became involved in a sexual relationship with Ms. B., he began disqualifying himself from cases in which she appeared before him. However, in several instances, Judge Steiner disqualified himself from her cases, which had previously been set for trial or hearing, and then assigned those cases to other judges.

Code of Civil Procedure section 170.3 provides that if a judge determines himself or herself to be disqualified, the judge "shall notify the presiding judge of the court of his or her recusal and shall not further participate in the proceeding, except as provided in Section 170.4, unless his or her disqualification is waived by the parties . . . ."

Code of Civil Procedure section 170.4 provides, in pertinent part:

> (a) A disqualified judge, notwithstanding his or her disqualification may do any of the following:
> (1) Take any action or issue any order necessary to maintain the jurisdiction of the court pending the assignment of a judge not disqualified.
> (2) Request any other judge agreed upon by the parties to sit and act in his or her place.
> (3) Hear and determine purely default matters.
> (4) Issue an order for possession prior to judgment in eminent domain proceedings.
> (5) Set proceedings for trial or hearing.
> (6) Conduct settlement conferences.

(Italics added.)

Judge Steiner has expressed the belief that assigning the cases was within the spirit of the limited acts he was permitted to perform once disqualified. However, assigning a case to another judge is not among the actions the Code of Civil Procedure allows a disqualified judge to take. While a disqualified judge may set proceedings for trial or hearing, this does not mean that a disqualified judge may assign the trial or hearing to a specific judge at that time, particularly in view of the italicized provisions above.

Judge Steiner's conduct in assigning cases in which he was disqualified to other judges was contrary to canon 2A, which requires judges to respect and comply with the law and act at all times in a manner that promotes public confidence in the integrity and impartiality of the judiciary; canon 3B(2), which requires judges to be faithful to the law; and canon 3E(1), which requires judges to disqualify themselves in any proceeding in which disqualification is required by law. The conduct constituted conduct prejudicial to the administration that brings the judiciary into disrepute.

IV. Failure to Disqualify as to Attorney Steven Baric

Judge Steiner and attorney Steven Baric are longstanding and very close friends, but did not have any common financial interests. Despite their very close friendship, Judge Steiner failed to disqualify when Mr. Baric appeared before him. In the case of People v. Patten, 11CM15072, Mr. Baric and the prosecution made multiple appearances before the judge for the purpose of seeking continuances; Judge Steiner did not disqualify himself, although the judge believes that he made an oral disclosure, and the record reflects no disclosure of their relationship.

Canon 3E(1) requires a judge to disqualify in any proceeding in which disqualification is required by law. Canon 3E(2) requires a judge to disclose on the record information that is reasonably relevant to the question of disqualification under Code of Civil Procedure section 170.1, even if the judge believes there is no actual basis for disqualification.

Judge Steiner has expressed the view that disclosure, rather than disqualification, may be sufficient, despite the existence of a close, longstanding friendship, where an attorney's appearance is for an uncontested motion or does not involve an issue of substance. However, unless the proceedings are among those listed in Code of Civil Procedure section 170.4, supra, or disqualification is waived, a judge who has a disqualifying relationship, such as a very close longtime friendship, may not preside. Disclosure is not sufficient when disqualification is required.

Judge Steiner's conduct in failing to disqualify himself as to Mr. Baric was contrary to canon 3E(1), and constituted prejudicial misconduct.

V. Mitigation

In mitigation, the commission noted that Judge Steiner has expressed great remorse and contrition regarding his conduct in engaging in sexual activity in chambers with two women with whom he was involved in personal relationships. The judge acknowledges wrongdoing and apologizes.

DISCIPLINE

Under the California Constitution, imposition of a public censure is the most severe sanction that can be imposed on an active California judge short of removal. (Cal. Const. Art. I, § 18(d).) In accepting this Stipulation, the commission has determined that imposition of a censure is appropriate and necessary to fulfill the commission's mandate to protect the public, enforce rigorous standards of judicial conduct, and maintain public confidence in the integrity and independence of the judiciary.

Judges are expected to maintain and personally observe "high standards of conduct" and "shall act at all times in a manner that promotes public confidence in the integrity and impartiality of the judiciary." (Canons 1, 2A.) "Public confidence in the judiciary is eroded by irresponsible or improper conduct by judges." (Canon 2A advisory committee commentary.) In the commission's view, engaging in sexual intercourse in the courthouse is the height of irresponsible and improper behavior by a judge. It reflects an utter disrespect for the dignity and decorum of the court and is seriously at odds with a judge's duty to avoid conduct that tarnishes the esteem of the judicial office in the public's eye. In addition, by engaging in sexual activity in chambers during court hours, Judge Steiner risked exposing court employees who might overhear or otherwise become aware of the libidinous conduct to a hostile work environment. As Judge David M. Rothman states in his California Judicial Conduct Handbook, when a judge's sexual conduct is not conducted in private or "takes place on public property or by use of public resources, the conduct moves from private to public concern and demeans the judicial office under canon 4A(2)." (Rothman, Cal. Judicial Conduct Handbook (3d ed. 2007) § 8.71, p. 439.)

In determining that censure is the appropriate sanction in this matter, the commission has taken into consideration that Judge Steiner has acknowledged wrongdoing and expressed remorse and contrition. An appreciation for the impropriety of one's actions indicates a capacity to reform. (Censure of Judge Salvador Sarmiento (2012) p. 7.) As such, the commission believes this censure adequately protects the public.

Judge Steiner's other misconduct involving his contacts with the district attorney's office on Ms. A.'s behalf and failure to disqualify would alone not warrant a censure in the commission's view. However, consideration of these incidents of misconduct in aggregate with the misconduct related to the judge's sexual activities bolsters the commission's conclusion that censure is the appropriate sanction. (Fletcher v.

Commission on Judicial Performance (1998) 19 Cal.4th 865, 918 [the number of incidents of misconduct is relevant in determining the appropriate level of discipline].)

Accordingly, the commission hereby imposes this public censure on Judge Steiner.

Commission members Hon. Erica R. Yew; Ms. Mary Lou Aranguren; Hon. Thomas M. Maddock; Nanci E. Nishimura, Esq.; Hon. Ignazio J. Ruvolo; Mr. Lawrence J. Simi; Mr. Richard Simpson and Mr. Adam N. Torres voted to accept the parties' settlement proposal and to issue this decision and order imposing public censure pursuant to the stipulated agreement. Commission members Anthony P. Capozzi, Esq.; Ms. Maya Dillard Smith and Ms. Sandra Talcott voted to reject the proposed settlement, dissent from this decision and order imposing public censure, and would have instituted formal proceedings.

STIPULATION

STATE OF CALIFORNIA

| | |
| IN THE MATTER CONCERNING JUDGE SCOTT STEINER | STIPULATION FOR DISCIPLINE BY CONSENT (Rule 116.5) |

Pursuant to Rules of the Commission on Judicial Performance, rule 116.5, Judge Scott Steiner, of the Orange County Superior Court, represented by counsel, and counsel for the commission ("the parties") submit this proposed disposition of the matters set forth in the commission's preliminary investigation letter dated February 18, 2014. The parties request that the commission resolve this matter by imposition of a censure. The settlement provided by this agreement is in the best interests of both the commission and Judge Steiner because, among other reasons, it adequately protects the public and will avoid the delay and the expense of further proceedings.

TERMS AND CONDITIONS OF AGREEMENT

1. This agreement resolves the matters alleged in the commission's pending preliminary investigation involving Judge Scott Steiner.

2. The commission shall issue a censure based on the agreed Stipulated Facts and Legal Conclusions set forth therein.

3. If the commission accepts this proposed disposition, the commission's decision and order imposing a censure may articulate the reasons for its decision and include explanatory language that the commission deems appropriate.

4. Upon acceptance by the commission, this stipulation and the commission's decision and order shall be made public.

5. Judge Steiner waives any further proceedings and review in this matter, including formal proceedings (commission rules 118, et seq.) and review by the Supreme Court (Cal. Rules of Court, rule 9.60).

6. The commission may reject this proposed disposition and resume its preliminary investigation. If the commission does so, nothing in this proposed disposition will be deemed to be admitted by Judge Steiner.

Accordingly, it is hereby stipulated and agreed that the commission shall issue a censure on the above Terms and Conditions of Agreement, and based on the following Stipulated Facts and Legal Conclusions:

STIPULATED FACTS AND LEGAL CONCLUSIONS

Judge Steiner has been a judge of the Orange County Superior Court since January 2011.

I. Engaging in sexual activity in chambers

Judge Steiner engaged in sexual activity in his chambers on multiple occasions, with two women with whom he was engaged in personal relationships. This included engaging in sexual intercourse with Ms. A. in his chambers on one occasion in the evening in early 2012 and engaging in sexual intercourse with Ms. B. in his chambers on two occasions during the work day, although not while court was in session, in May 2012. Both women were former students in law school classes taught by the judge; Ms. A. had been an intern working for the judge, and Ms. B. was an attorney practicing before the Orange County Superior Court.

Judge Steiner's conduct constituted failure to observe high standards of conduct, failure to conduct himself at all times in a manner that promotes public confidence in the integrity and impartiality of the judiciary, failure to conduct himself in a manner that does not demean the judicial office, and misuse of court facilities. Judge Steiner's conduct was contrary to the California Code of Judicial Ethics, canon 1, which requires judges to personally observe high standards of conduct so that the integrity and independence of the judiciary will be preserved; canon 2A, which requires judges to act at all times in a manner that promotes public confidence in the integrity and impartiality of the judiciary; and canon 4A(2), which requires judges to conduct all of their extrajudicial activities so that they do not demean the judicial office. Judge Steiner's conduct constituted, at a minimum, conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judiciary into disrepute.

While certain media reports raised concerns that the judge's relationship with Ms. B. may have involved a "quid pro quo" arrangement in which the judge assisted Ms. B., an attorney, in obtaining employment in exchange for sex, there was a lack of evidence of any such "quid pro quo" arrangement, and an insufficient basis for further proceedings regarding the nature of the relationship.

II. Contacting attorneys in District Attorney's Office regarding Ms. A.'s employment application

When Ms. A. applied for a position with the Orange County District Attorney's Office, Judge Steiner wrote her a letter of recommendation. Ms. A. was interviewed for the position on or about February 14, 2012. She was not called back for a further interview.

Thereafter, Judge Steiner called the District Attorney's Office and asked about the interview process of Ms. A. When informed by an attorney who at one time had been his supervisor that Ms. A. had not passed the initial interview, Judge Steiner made a statement to the effect of, "Well, I guess writing a letter of recommendation means nothing." He sounded perplexed and irritated. Judge Steiner had also contacted another attorney in the office after sending a letter of recommendation for Ms. A. The judge asked whether his letter of recommendation had been received. He later asked the same attorney about the interview process and why Ms. A. had not been hired, and asked whether there was anything specific about Ms. A. that could use improvement.

In his contacts, Judge Steiner did not ask that any particular action be taken with respect to Ms. A.'s application, such as requesting that it be reconsidered. Judge Steiner had worked in the Orange County District Attorney's Office before he became a judge, and the persons to whom he spoke were a former colleague and an attorney who at one time had been his supervisor. Although Judge Steiner's contacts were with a former colleague and supervisor, attorneys in the District Attorney's Office regularly appeared before Judge Steiner.

Canon 2B(2) prohibits judges from lending the prestige of judicial office to advance the pecuniary or personal interests of the judges or others. One exception to canon 2B(2) permits judges to serve as a reference or provide a letter of recommendation based on their personal knowledge (canon 2B(2)(e)). Judge Steiner's conduct in initiating contact with the District Attorney's Office, at or around the time he was engaged in a sexual relationship with Ms. A., about the employment application of Ms. A., to follow up on a letter of recommendation he had sent on Ms. A.'s behalf, ask questions about the interview and hiring processes, and express irritation that his recommendation had not resulted in her hiring, exceeded the scope of conduct permitted by canon 2B(2)(e), and also was contrary to canon 2B(1), which provides that a judge shall not allow family, social political or other relationships to influence the judge's judicial conduct or judgment, and shall not convey the impression that any individual is in a special position to influence the judge. In addition, the conduct violated canon 2A, which provides that judges shall act at all times in a manner that promotes public confidence in the integrity and impartiality of the judiciary. The conduct was, at a minimum, conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judiciary into disrepute.

III. Assigning Ms. B's cases to other judges after disqualifying

After Judge Steiner became involved in a sexual relationship with Ms. B., he began disqualifying from her cases when she appeared before him. However, in several instances, Judge Steiner disqualified from her cases, which had previously been set for trial or hearing, and then assigned those cases to other judges.

Code of Civil Procedure section 170.3 provides that if a judge determines himself or herself to be disqualified, the judge "shall notify the presiding judge of the court of his or her recusal and shall not further participate in the proceeding, except as provided in Section 170.4, unless his or her disqualification is waived by the parties...."

Code of Civil Procedure section 170.4 provides, in pertinent part:

> (a) A disqualified judge, notwithstanding his or her disqualification may do any of the following:
>
> (1) Take any action or issue any order necessary to maintain the jurisdiction of the court pending the assignment of a judge not disqualified.
>
> (2) Request any other judge agreed upon by the parties to sit and act in his or her place.
>
> (3) Hear and determine purely default matters.
>
> (4) Issue an order for possession prior to judgment in eminent domain proceedings.
>
> (5) Set proceedings for trial or hearing.
>
> (6) Conduct settlement conferences.

(Italics added.)

Judge Steiner has expressed the belief that assigning the cases was within the spirit of the limited acts he was permitted to perform once disqualified. However, assigning a case to another judge is not among the actions the Code of Civil Procedure allows a disqualified judge to take. While a disqualified judge may set proceedings for trial or hearing, this does not mean that a disqualified judge may assign the trial or hearing to a specific judge at that time, particularly in view of the italicized provisions above.

Judge Steiner's conduct in assigning cases in which he was disqualified to other judges was contrary to canons 2A, which requires judges to respect and comply with the law and act at all times in a manner that promotes public confidence in the integrity and impartiality of the judiciary; canon 3B(2), which requires judges to be faithful to the law; and canon 3E(1), which requires judges to disqualify themselves in any proceeding in which disqualification is required by law. The conduct constituted conduct prejudicial to the administration that brings the judiciary into disrepute.

IV. Failure to disqualify as to attorney Steven Baric

Judge Steiner and attorney Steven Baric are longstanding and very close friends, but did not have any common financial interests. Despite their very close friendship, Judge Steiner has failed to disqualify when Mr. Baric has appeared before him. In the case of People v. Patten, 11CM15072, Mr. Baric and the prosecution made multiple appearances before the judge for the purpose of seeking continuances; Judge Steiner did not disqualify, and the record reflects no disclosure of their relationship, although the judge believes that he made an oral disclosure.

Canon 3E(1) requires a judge to disqualify in any proceeding in which disqualification is required by law. Canon 3E(2) requires a judge to disclose on the record information that is reasonably relevant to the question of disqualification under Code of Civil Procedure section 170.1, even if the judge believes there is no actual basis for disqualification.

Judge Steiner has expressed the view that disclosure, rather than disqualification, may be sufficient, despite the existence of a close, longstanding friendship, where an attorney's appearance is for an uncontested motion or does not involve an issue of substance. However, unless the proceedings are among those listed in Code of Civil Procedure section 170.4, supra, or disqualification is waived, a judge who has a disqualifying relationship, such as a very close longtime friendship, may not preside. Disclosure is not sufficient when disqualification is required.

Judge Steiner's conduct in failing to disqualify as to Mr. Baric was contrary to canon 3E(1), and constituted prejudicial misconduct.

V. Mitigation

In mitigation, the commission noted that Judge Steiner has expressed great remorse and contrition regarding his conduct in engaging in sexual activity in chambers with two women with whom he was involved in personal relationships. The judge acknowledges wrongdoing and apologizes.

By signing this stipulation, in addition to consenting to discipline on the terms set forth, Judge Steiner expressly admits that the foregoing facts are true and that he agrees with the stated legal conclusions.

| IN THE MATTER CONCERNING JUDGE CORY WOODWARD | DECISION AND ORDER IMPOSING CENSURE PURSUANT TO STIPULATION (Rule 116.5) |

INTRODUCTION AND SUMMARY

This disciplinary matter concerns Judge Cory Woodward, a judge at the Kern County Superior Court.

Judge Woodward, acting through his counsel, Paul S. Meyer, Esq., and commission staff counsel proposed to settle the preliminary investigation instituted by the commission in this matter through the issuance of a public censure under the terms and conditions stated below, and upon the stipulated statement of facts and conclusions of law. A Stipulation for Discipline by Consent (Stipulation) signed and executed by Judge Woodward, Mr. Meyer, and Victoria B. Henley, Director-Chief Counsel of the Commission on Judicial Performance is attached to this decision and order. Pursuant to rule 116.5 of the Rules of the Commission on Judicial Performance, the proposed Stipulation was approved by the commission on August 20, 2014.

The terms and conditions of the Stipulation provide that, upon approval of the Stipulation, the commission shall resolve the matters alleged in the pending preliminary investigation with the issuance of a censure based upon the agreed stipulated facts and legal conclusions. Further, the parties agree that the commission's decision and order imposing a censure will be made public and the commission may articulate the reasons for its decision and include explanatory language that the commission deems appropriate.

In signing the Stipulation, Judge Woodward expressly admits that the stipulated facts are true and that he agrees with the stated legal conclusions, and waives any further proceedings and review in this matter including formal proceedings and review by the Supreme Court. Accordingly, pursuant to article VI, section 18(d) of the California Constitution, the commission issues this public censure based on the following stipulated statement of facts and conclusions of law:

STIPULATED FACTS AND LEGAL CONCLUSIONS

Judge Woodward has been a judge of the Kern County Superior Court from January 2007 to the present. He served as a commissioner for the Kern County Superior Court from approximately March 2003 to January 2007.

I. Misconduct Related to Relationship with Courtroom Clerk

Judge Woodward was assigned to a civil department from January through June 2012. The judge was assigned to a criminal department from July through December 2012. He was assigned to a family law department from January through approximately July 2013.

An experienced courtroom clerk was assigned to Judge Woodward in January 2012. She served as his clerk in the civil department through June 2012. From approximately July 2, 2012 through August 10, 2012, she was the judge's assigned courtroom clerk in the criminal department; however, during that period, she was receiving training in criminal trials in other departments. From approximately August 10, 2012 through October 26, 2012, the clerk was assigned to a probate department presided over by another judicial officer. The clerk was absent on leave for the remainder of the year.

From January 2, 2013 through April 2, 2013, the clerk served as Judge Woodward's courtroom clerk in the family law department. On April 2, 2013, she was reassigned to the department of another judicial officer, effective April 3, 2013.

From approximately July 2012 through mid-May 2013, Judge Woodward was involved in an intimate relationship with the clerk. From the start of the intimate relationship through the date on which the court reassigned the clerk in April 2013, Judge

Woodward did not attempt to ensure that he would not be working in the same courtroom with a clerk with whom he had an intimate relationship, and instead opposed and resisted any efforts to reassign the clerk. When Judge Woodward was reassigned from a civil department to a criminal department in July 2012, and when he was reassigned to a family law department in January 2013, he informed court administration that he wanted the clerk to continue serving as his courtroom clerk, rather than seeking to have her reassigned. As set forth in section II below, on two occasions thereafter, when court administration and the presiding judge recommended or proposed that the clerk be reassigned, Judge Woodward resisted rather than allowing the clerk to be reassigned; he also resisted upon being informed in April 2013 that the clerk was being reassigned.

During Judge Woodward's intimate relationship with the clerk, he engaged in sexual activity with her in chambers. He also engaged in sexual activity with her in public places.

On one occasion between January and March 2013, while Judge Woodward was in the courtroom and off the bench during a break in proceedings, he made an inappropriate sexual gesture toward the clerk while a member of the public was present in the audience (unbeknownst to the judge).

Between approximately May 2012 and April 2013, Judge Woodward used the court's computers to regularly exchange personal emails or texts with the clerk, not of an overtly sexual nature, that were unrelated to court business. During the intimate relationship with the clerk, Judge Woodward occasionally passed notes of a sexual nature to her during court proceedings. He allowed her to address him in an overly familiar manner in the courthouse in the presence of other court staff, or within the hearing of other court staff or others (by allowing her to use a longstanding nickname used by the judge's friends and colleagues). When Judge Woodward accompanied the clerk on her lunch break, he sometimes allowed her to return to court slightly late.

Judge Woodward's conduct violated the California Code of Judicial Ethics, canons 1 (a judge shall personally observe high standards of conduct so that the integrity of the judiciary will be preserved), 2 (a judge shall avoid impropriety and the appearance of impropriety), 2A (a judge shall respect and comply with the law and shall act at all times in a manner that promotes public confidence in the integrity and impartiality of the judiciary), 2B(1) (a judge shall not allow family, social or other relationships to influence the judge's judicial conduct), 3C(1) (a judge shall diligently discharge the judge's administrative responsibilities impartially, on the basis of merit, and in a manner that promotes public confidence in the integrity of the judiciary), 3C(2) (a judge shall cooperate with other judges and court officials in the administration of court business), 3C(5) and its predecessor canon 3C(4) (a judge shall avoid nepotism and favoritism) and 4A(2) (a judge shall conduct all of the judge's extrajudicial activities so that they do not demean the judicial office). The judge's conduct constitutes prejudicial misconduct.

II. Misleading the Court

On February 7, 2013, the court executive officer (CEO) spoke with Judge Woodward in chambers and advised him that the clerk's husband had reportedly expressed concern to the clerk about the judge's "relationship" with her. The CEO recommended that the clerk be reassigned and asked Judge Woodward what he wanted to do. Judge Woodward said he would speak with the clerk and get back to the CEO. Shortly thereafter, Judge Woodward called the CEO and said that he (the judge) would not be making any change to the clerk's assignment, or words to that effect. Judge Woodward said something to the effect that the clerk had talked to her husband, that they may be separating, and that her husband was angry with her. (The CEO did not specifically ask the judge about the nature of his relationship with the clerk. Judge Woodward did not indicate to the CEO, either directly or indirectly, that his relationship with the clerk was other than a professional one.) Judge Woodward thereby misled the CEO into believing that there was no need to reassign his courtroom clerk, with whom the judge was then involved in an intimate relationship.

In March 2013, Judge Woodward and Family Law Supervising Judge John Fielder met with Presiding Judge Colette Humphrey in her chambers. There was a discussion concerning a complaint that had been made about the behavior of Judge Woodward's clerk. The presiding judge was told that another clerk had complained that Judge Woodward's clerk addressed him by a nickname and engaged in flirtatious behavior toward him. Presiding Judge Humphrey suggested reassigning Judge Woodward's clerk. Judge Woodward declined. He stated that she was a good clerk. (Judge Fielder expressed the view that a family law department was very demanding, that Judge Woodward's clerk was a good clerk, and that the court could not reassign a clerk every time another clerk complained.) During this meeting, Judge Woodward misled his supervising and presiding judges into believing that there was no need to reassign his courtroom clerk, with whom he was then involved in an intimate relationship.

The court subsequently received another complaint about the clerk's conduct toward Judge Woodward. On April 2, 2013, a deputy court executive officer (DCEO) met with Judge Woodward to inform him that the clerk was being reassigned, effective April 3, 2013. During the meeting with the DCEO, Judge Woodward made statements indicating that his relationship with the clerk was professional. He objected to the reassignment and said that he wanted to address the matter with Supervising Judge Fielder. During the April 2 meeting, Judge Woodward misled the DCEO into believing that there was no need to reassign his courtroom clerk, with whom he was then involved in an intimate relationship.

On April 3, 2013, Judge Woodward met with the DCEO and Supervising Judge Fielder to protest the reassignment of the clerk. The DCEO explained that the court was reassigning the clerk in response to reports of inappropriate behavior toward Judge Woodward, including the use of a nickname. Judge Fielder expressed dismay that the court was making a decision to move a judge's assigned courtroom clerk and expressed the view that there was no valid reason for the reassignment and that the clerk was being treated unfairly.

Judge Woodward said that if he had been told the use of a nickname was a problem, he would have told the clerk to stop, and also said he did not "understand what's going on." Judge Fielder said to Judge Woodward that the "problem is people think something is going on between the two of you." Judge Woodward did not respond. Judge Fielder also stated words to the effect that the court "can't be reacting to something when someone thinks this is a Peyton Place when this isn't." Judge Woodward did not respond. During the April 3 meeting, Judge Woodward misled his supervising judge and the DCEO into believing that there was no need to reassign his courtroom clerk, with whom Judge Woodward was then involved in an intimate relationship. (A day or two after April 3, Judge Woodward told Judge Fielder that he would not contest the clerk's reassignment.)

In early May 2013, Judge Woodward met with the presiding judge and assistant presiding judge to address possible security concerns raised by the fact that the husband of Judge Woodward's clerk had contacted the court. During that meeting, Judge Woodward misled his court's presiding judge and assistant presiding judge about the nature of his relationship with the clerk. (Later in May 2013, Judge Woodward contacted the presiding judge and disclosed the intimate relationship with the clerk.)

Judge Woodward's conduct violated the Code of Judicial Ethics, canons 1 (a judge shall personally observe high standards of conduct so that the integrity of the judiciary will be preserved), 2 (a judge shall avoid impropriety and the appearance of impropriety), 2A (a judge shall act at all times in a manner that promotes public confidence in the integrity and impartiality of the judiciary), 2B(1) (a judge shall not allow family, social or other relationships to influence the judge's judicial conduct), 3C(1) (a judge shall diligently discharge the judge's administrative responsibilities impartially, on the basis of merit, and in a manner that promotes public confidence in the integrity of the judiciary) and 3C(2) (a judge shall cooperate with other judges and court officials in the administration of court business). The judge's conduct constitutes willful misconduct.

III. Prior Discipline

Judge Woodward received a private admonishment in 2010 for improper handling of a contempt.

IV. Mitigation

Judge Woodward has expressed great remorse and contrition. He acknowledges wrongdoing and apologizes.

Presiding Judge Humphrey believes that Judge Woodward is very well regarded as a judge, is considered to be hardworking, intelligent and punctual, and displays appropriate demeanor. Supervising Judge Fielder believes that Judge Woodward is known and respected as a very hardworking and conscientious judicial officer.

DISCIPLINE

Under the California Constitution, imposition of a public censure is the most severe sanction that can be imposed on an active California judge short of removal. (Cal. Const. Art. I, § 18(d).) In accepting this Stipulation, the commission has determined that imposition of a censure is appropriate and necessary to fulfill the commission's mandate to protect the public, enforce rigorous standards of judicial conduct, and maintain public confidence in the integrity and independence of the judiciary.

Judges are expected to maintain and personally observe "high standards of conduct" and "shall act at all times in a manner that promotes public confidence in the integrity and impartiality of the judiciary." (Canons 1, 2A.) "Public confidence in the judiciary is eroded by irresponsible or improper conduct by judges." (Canon 2A advisory committee commentary.) In the commission's view, engaging in sexual intercourse in the courthouse and exchanging communications of a sexual nature during court proceedings is the height of irresponsible and improper behavior by a judge. It reflects an utter disrespect for the dignity and decorum of the court and is seriously at odds with a judge's duty to avoid conduct that tarnishes the esteem of the judicial office in the public's eye. As Judge David M. Rothman states in his California Judicial Conduct Handbook, when a judge's sexual conduct is not conducted in private or "takes place on public property or by use of public resources, the conduct moves from private to public concern and demeans the judicial office under canon 4A(2)." (Rothman, Cal. Judicial Conduct Handbook (3d ed. 2007) § 8.71, p. 439.)

Judge Woodward's misconduct related to sexual activity in the courthouse is aggravated by the fact that the conduct took place with a member of his court staff. Judge Rothman states that "it is fundamental that a judge not be placed in a supervisory role over someone with whom the judge has a close personal relationship." (Rothman, supra, § 6.27, p. 281.) Moreover, Judge Woodward potentially exposed other court staff to a hostile work environment through his intimate communications and sexual activities with the clerk in the courthouse. In fact, the intimacy of the relationship was sufficiently overt that the court received more than one complaint concerning the clerk's overly familiar and flirtatious behavior towards Judge Woodward, and rumors circulated that "something [was] going on between" the judge and his clerk. Judge Woodward's conduct placed the court administration and his presiding judges in the uncomfortable position of having to bring these concerns to his attention. However, rather than taking the concerns, which he knew to be legitimate, seriously and agreeing to the clerk's transfer, the judge misled the court as to the nature of the relationship and opposed the transfer.

In the commission's view, Judge Woodward's misconduct in misleading court administration and his superior judicial officers in an effort to prevent the clerk's reassignment is as egregious as his misconduct related to his libidinous activities with his clerk. Court officials and supervising and presiding judges must be able to rely on the integrity and honesty of judicial officers in the performance of their duties. (See Inquiry Concerning Judge Kelly A. MacEachern (2008) 49 Cal.4th CJP Supp. 289, 305.) This requires more than the avoidance of outright untruths; it demands that judges avoid material omissions in fulfilling their duty to cooperate fully with court officials and other judges in the administration of court business. By misleading the court as to the nature of his relationship with his clerk and opposing her reassignment, Judge Woodward impeded administrative efforts to appropriately respond to complaints and concerns about the clerk's inappropriate personal interactions with the judge. Not only should Judge Woodward have acceded to the recommended reassignment of the clerk, he should himself have requested her transfer as soon as the intimate relationship began.

Judge Woodward has engaged in a course of misconduct that the commission considers sufficiently serious to warrant removal from office if it were not for the presence of a number of mitigating factors. In determining that censure rather than removal is the appropriate sanction in this matter, the commission has taken into consideration that Judge Woodward has acknowledged wrongdoing and expressed great remorse and contrition. An appreciation for the impropriety of one's actions indicates a capacity to reform. (Censure of Judge Salvador Sarmiento (2012) p. 7.) As such, the commission is satisfied that Judge Woodward is unlikely to engage in misconduct of a similar nature in the future. Moreover, the judge's full and forthright cooperation with the commission's investigation has assisted the commission in reaching a prompt disposition of this matter. Finally, according to his presiding and supervising judges, he is a respected, hardworking, intelligent and conscientious judge.

Accordingly, the commission hereby imposes this public censure on Judge Woodward.

Commission members Hon. Erica R. Yew; Hon. Thomas M. Maddock; Nanci E. Nishimura, Esq.; Hon. Ignazio J. Ruvolo; Mr. Lawrence J. Simi; Mr. Richard Simpson and Mr. Adam N. Torres voted to accept the parties' settlement proposal and to issue this decision and order imposing public censure pursuant to the stipulated agreement. Commission members Ms. Mary Lou Aranguren; Anthony P. Capozzi, Esq.; Ms. Maya Dillard Smith and Ms. Sandra Talcott voted to reject the proposed settlement, dissent from this decision and order imposing public censure, and would have instituted formal proceedings.

STIPULATION

| | |
|---|---|
| IN THE MATTER CONCERNING JUDGE CORY WOODWARD | STIPULATION FOR DISCIPLINE BY CONSENT (Rule 116.5) |

Pursuant to Rules of the Commission on Judicial Performance, rule 116.5, Judge Cory Woodward of the Kern County Superior Court, represented by counsel, and commission staff counsel ("the parties") submit this proposed disposition of the matters set forth in the commission's preliminary investigation letters dated October 31, 2013 and March 28, 2014. The parties request that the commission resolve this matter by imposition of a censure. The parties believe that the settlement provided by this agreement is in the best interests of the commission and Judge Woodward because, among other reasons, in light of the stipulated facts and legal conclusions, a censure adequately protects the public and will avoid the delay and the expense of further proceedings.

TERMS AND CONDITIONS OF AGREEMENT

1. This agreement resolves the matters alleged in the commission's pending preliminary investigation involving Judge Cory Woodward.

2. The commission shall issue a censure based on the agreed Stipulated Facts and Legal Conclusions set forth therein.

3. If the commission accepts this proposed disposition, the commission's decision and order imposing a censure may articulate the reasons for its decision and include explanatory language that the commission deems appropriate.

4. Upon acceptance by the commission, this stipulation and the commission's decision and order shall be made public.

5. Judge Woodward waives any further proceedings and review in this matter, including formal proceedings (rules 118, et seq.) and review by the Supreme Court (Cal. Rules of Court, rule 9.60).

6. The commission may reject this proposed disposition and resume its preliminary investigation. If the commission does so, nothing in this proposed disposition will be deemed to be admitted by Judge Woodward.

Accordingly, it is hereby stipulated and agreed that the commission shall issue a censure on the above Terms and Conditions of Agreement, and based on the following Stipulated Facts and Legal Conclusions:

STIPULATED FACTS AND LEGAL CONCLUSIONS

Judge Woodward has been a judge of the Kern County Superior Court from January 2007 to the present. He served as a commissioner for the Kern County Superior Court from approximately March 2003 to January 2007.

I. Misconduct related to relationship with courtroom clerk

Judge Woodward was assigned to a civil department from January through June 2012. The judge was assigned to a criminal department from July through December 2012. He was assigned to a family law department from January through approximately July 2013.

An experienced courtroom clerk was assigned to Judge Woodward in January 2012. She served as his clerk in the civil department through June 2012. From approximately July 2, 2012 through August 10, 2012, she was the judge's assigned courtroom clerk in the criminal department; however, during that period, she was receiving training in criminal trials in other departments. From approximately August 10, 2012 through October 26, 2012, the clerk was assigned to a probate department presided over by another judicial officer. The clerk was absent on leave for the remainder of the year.

From January 2, 2013 through April 2, 2013, the clerk served as Judge Woodward's courtroom clerk in the family law department. On April 2, 2013, she was reassigned to the department of another judicial officer, effective April 3, 2013.

From approximately July 2012 through mid-May 2013, Judge Woodward was involved in an intimate relationship with the clerk. From the start of the intimate relationship through the date on which the court reassigned the clerk in April 2013, Judge Woodward did not attempt to ensure that he would not be working in the same courtroom with a clerk with whom he had an intimate relationship, and instead opposed and resisted any efforts to reassign the clerk. When Judge Woodward was reassigned from a civil department to a criminal department in July 2012, and when he was reassigned to a family law department in January 2013, he informed court administration that he wanted the clerk to continue serving as his courtroom clerk, rather than seeking to have her reassigned. As set forth in section II below, on two occasions thereafter when court administration and the presiding judge recommended or proposed that the clerk be reassigned, Judge Woodward resisted rather than allowing the clerk to be reassigned; he also resisted upon being informed in April 2013 that the clerk was being reassigned.

During Judge Woodward's intimate relationship with the clerk, he engaged in sexual activity with her in chambers. He also engaged in sexual activity with her in public places.

On one occasion between January and March 2013, while Judge Woodward was in the courtroom and off the bench during a break in proceedings, he made an inappropriate sexual gesture toward the clerk while a member of the public was present in the audience (unbeknownst to the judge).

Between approximately May 2012 and April 2013, Judge Woodward used the court's computers to regularly exchange personal emails or texts with the clerk, not of an overtly sexual nature, that were unrelated to court business. During the intimate relationship with the clerk, Judge Woodward occasionally passed notes of a sexual nature to her during court proceedings. He allowed her to address him in an overfamiliar manner in the courthouse in the presence of other court staff, or within the hearing of other court staff or others (by allowing her to use a longstanding nickname used by the judge's friends and colleagues). When Judge Woodward accompanied the clerk on her lunch break, he sometimes allowed her to return to court slightly late.

Judge Woodward's conduct violated the Code of Judicial Ethics, canons 1 (a judge shall personally observe high standards of conduct so that the integrity of the judiciary will be preserved), 2 (a judge shall avoid impropriety and the appearance of impropriety), 2A (a judge shall respect and comply with the law and shall act at all times in a manner that promotes public confidence in the integrity and impartiality of the judiciary), 2B(1) (a judge shall not allow family, social or other relationships to influence the judge's judicial conduct), 3C(1) (a judge shall diligently discharge the judge's administrative responsibilities impartially, on the basis of merit, and in a manner that promotes public confidence in the integrity of the judiciary), 3C(2) (a judge shall cooperate with other judges and court officials in the administration of court business), 3C(5) and its predecessor canon 3C(4) (a judge shall avoid nepotism and favoritism) and 4A(2) (a judge shall conduct all of the judge's extrajudicial activities so that they do not demean the judicial office). The judge's conduct constitutes prejudicial misconduct.

II. Misleading court

On February 7, 2013, the court executive officer (CEO) spoke with Judge Woodward in chambers, and advised him that the clerk's husband had reportedly expressed concern to the clerk about the judge's "relationship" with her. The CEO recommended that the clerk be reassigned, and asked Judge Woodward what he wanted to do. Judge Woodward said he would speak with the clerk and get back to the CEO. Shortly thereafter, Judge Woodward called the CEO and said that he (the judge) would not be making any change to the clerk's assignment, or words to that effect. Judge Woodward said something to the effect that the clerk had talked to her husband, that they may be separating, and that her husband was angry with her. (The CEO did not specifically ask the judge about the nature of his relationship with the clerk. Judge Woodward did not indicate to the CEO, either directly or indirectly, that his relationship with the clerk was other than a professional one.) Judge Woodward thereby misled the CEO into believing that there was no need to reassign his courtroom clerk, with whom the judge was then involved in an intimate relationship.

In March 2013, Judge Woodward and Family Law Supervising Judge John Fielder met with Presiding Judge Colette Humphrey in her chambers. There was a discussion concerning a complaint that had been made about the behavior of Judge Woodward's clerk. The presiding judge was told that another clerk had complained that Judge Woodward's clerk addressed him by a nickname and engaged in flirtatious behavior toward him. Presiding Judge Humphrey suggested reassigning Judge Woodward's clerk. Judge Woodward declined. He stated that she was a good clerk. (Judge Fielder expressed the view that a family law department was very demanding, that Judge Woodward's clerk was a good clerk, and that the court could not reassign a clerk every time another clerk complained.) During this meeting, Judge Woodward misled his supervising and presiding judges into believing that there was no need to reassign his courtroom clerk, with whom he was then involved in an intimate relationship.

The court subsequently received another complaint about the clerk's conduct toward Judge Woodward. On April 2, 2013, a deputy court executive officer (DCEO) met with Judge Woodward to inform him that the clerk was being reassigned, effective April 3, 2013. During the meeting with the DCEO, Judge Woodward made statements indicating that his relationship with the clerk was professional. He objected to the reassignment, and said that he wanted to address the matter with Supervising Judge Fielder. During the April 2 meeting, Judge Woodward misled the DCEO into believing that there was no need to reassign his courtroom clerk, with whom he was then involved in an intimate relationship.

On April 3, 2013, Judge Woodward met with the DCEO and Supervising Judge Fielder to protest the reassignment of the clerk. The DCEO explained that the court was reassigning the clerk in response to reports of inappropriate behavior toward Judge Woodward, including the use of a nickname. Judge Fielder expressed dismay that the court was making a decision to move a judge's assigned courtroom clerk, and expressed the view that there was no valid reason for the reassignment and that the clerk was being treated unfairly.

Judge Woodward said that if he had been told the use of a nickname was a problem, he would have told the clerk to stop, and also said he did not "understand what's going on." Judge Fielder said to Judge Woodward that the "problem is people think something is going on between the two of you." Judge Woodward did not respond. Judge Fielder also stated words to the effect that the court "can't be reacting to something when someone thinks this is a Peyton Place when this isn't." Judge Woodward did not respond. During the April 3 meeting, Judge Woodward misled his supervising judge and the DCEO into believing that there was no need to reassign his courtroom clerk, with whom Judge Woodward was then involved in an intimate relationship. (A day or two after April 3, Judge Woodward told Judge Fielder that he would not contest the clerk's reassignment.)

In early May 2013, Judge Woodward met with the presiding judge and assistant presiding judge to address possible security concerns raised by the fact that the husband of Judge Woodward's clerk had contacted the court. During that meeting, Judge Woodward misled his court's presiding judge and assistant presiding judge about the nature of his relationship with the clerk. (Later in May 2013, Judge Woodward contacted the presiding judge, and disclosed the intimate relationship with the clerk.)

Judge Woodward's conduct violated the Code of Judicial Ethics, canons 1 (a judge shall personally observe high standards of conduct so that the integrity of the judiciary will be preserved), 2 (a judge shall avóid impropriety and the appearance of impropriety), 2A (a judge shall act at all times in a manner that promotes public confidence in the integrity and impartiality of the judiciary), 2B(1) (a judge shall not allow family, social or other relationships to influence the judge's judicial conduct), 3C(1) (a judge shall diligently discharge the judge's administrative responsibilities impartially, on the basis of merit, and in a manner that promotes public confidence in the integrity of the judiciary) and 3C(2) (a judge shall cooperate with other judges and court officials in the administration of court business). The judge's conduct constitutes willful misconduct.

III. Prior discipline

Judge Woodward received a private admonishment in 2010 for improper handling of a contempt. (Priv. Adm. 232.)

IV. Mitigation

Judge Woodward has expressed great remorse and contrition. He acknowledges wrongdoing and apologizes.

Presiding Judge Humphrey believes that Judge Woodward is very well regarded as a judge, and is considered to be hard working, intelligent and punctual, and to display appropriate demeanor. Supervising Judge Fielder believes that Judge Woodward is known and respected as a very hard working and conscientious judicial officer.

By signing this stipulation, in addition to consenting to discipline on the terms set forth, Judge Woodward expressly admits that the foregoing facts are true and that he agrees with the stated legal conclusions.

| INQUIRY CONCERNING FORMER JUDGE MARC A. GARCIA,No. 195 | DECISION AND ORDER IMPOSING PUBLIC CENSURE AND BAR PURSUANT TO STIPULATION (Commission Rule 127) |

INTRODUCTION AND PROCEDURAL SUMMARY

This disciplinary matter concerns former judge Marc A. Garcia, who was a judge of the Merced County Superior Court from 2007 until his resignation on May 15, 2015. The commission filed a Notice of Formal Proceedings on March 5, 2015, charging Judge Garcia[1] with misconduct in failing to disclose on his Statements of Economic Interests for the years 2008 through 2012, executed under penalty of perjury, the $250,000 in income he received from the Terms of Dissolution agreement of a joint venture formed to provide indigent defense services through a contract with the county, and failing to disqualify in matters in which the attorney from whom he received the payments appeared before him.[2]

By Stipulation for Discipline by Consent (Stipulation), Judge Garcia and his counsel, Edith R. Matthai, Esq., and the examiner for the commission, Gary W. Schons, Esq., proposed that the commission resolve this matter by imposition of a censure and bar prohibiting Judge Garcia from seeking or holding judicial office, or accepting a position

[1] Former judge Garcia is referred to as Judge Garcia with reference to conduct and events that took place while he was an active judge.

[2] The Notice of Formal Proceedings also charged the judge with creating an appearance of impropriety by entering into an agreement that provided that he had an interest in future payments to be made under a government contract for which he would not be providing services, after he took the bench. Pursuant to stipulation, the parties agreed that it was not necessary to resolve this disputed issue as it would not affect the disposition of the case.

or an assignment as a judicial officer, subordinate judicial officer or judge pro tem with any court in the State of California, or accepting reference of work from any California state court, at any time in the future. (The Stipulation is attached to this decision.) The Stipulation includes the following terms and conditions:

1. The agreement resolves the matters alleged in the commission's pending preliminary investigation involving Judge Garcia.

2. The commission shall issue a censure and bar based on the agreed Stipulated Facts and Legal Conclusions set forth therein.

3. Upon acceptance by the commission, the Stipulation, the judge's affidavit of consent and the commission's decision and order shall be made public.

4. Judge Garcia waives any further proceedings and review in this matter, including formal proceedings (Commission rule 118 et seq.) and review by the Supreme Court (Cal. Rules of Court, rule 9.60).

5. Pursuant to the agreement, Judge Garcia agrees to irrevocably resign from his position as judge effective May 15, 2015.

Pursuant to rule 127, the Stipulation was approved by the commission on May 13, 2015. Former judge Garcia resigned from the bench, effective May 15, 2015. Accordingly, the commission issues this censure and bar based on the terms and conditions of the Stipulation and based on the following Stipulated Facts and Legal Conclusions.

STIPULATED FACTS AND LEGAL CONCLUSIONS

Pursuant to the Stipulation, Judge Garcia expressly admitted the truth of the following facts and agreed to the following stated legal conclusions.

In 1999, then attorney Marc Garcia was hired as an associate by the Merced law firm of Morse & Pfeiff. In 2001, he was made a partner and the firm name was changed to Morse, Pfeiff & Garcia. At the time, Merced County had separate contracts with about a dozen attorneys to provide indigent defense services when the public defender declared a conflict. That group included attorneys Garcia and Thomas Pfeiff, who was one of several attorneys with contracts for juvenile representation.

In January 2003, a request for proposal was issued by Merced County for a contract to provide alternate indigent defense services for a flat fee. The law firm of Morse, Pfeiff & Garcia submitted a proposal, and was awarded the indigent defense services contract for a five-year term starting in fiscal year 2003/2004 and ending with fiscal year 2007/2008 (contract number 2003093). The contract specified a fixed amount per year, increasing from $1 million to $1.15 million, for a total contract price of approximately $5.6 million. Payments were made by the county monthly.

The Morse, Pfeiff & Garcia law firm acted as both administrator of the contract and a provider of legal services. The contract provided for subcontracts with 8 to 10 attorneys, and Garcia and Pfeiff also handled cases under the contract.

The party contracting with the county, referred to as "Attorney," was identified as the law firm Morse, Pfeiff & Garcia. Attorney Pfeiff signed the contract and all later amendments. The contract and amendments were signed on behalf of the county by the chair of the county Board of Supervisors, and approved as to form by county counsel.

Shortly before January 2004, the firm of Morse, Pfeiff & Garcia dissolved and attorney Garcia opened his own law office in Merced, known as The Garcia Law Firm. On January 1, 2004, concurrent with the dissolution of the Morse, Pfeiff & Garcia general partnership, the Garcia Law Firm and the Law Offices of Morse & Pfeiff entered into a Joint Venture Agreement, which was signed by attorneys Garcia, Pfeiff and Cindy Morse.

The Joint Venture Agreement formed a "new general partnership" between the two firms. The joint venture was limited to the indigent defense contract: "This agreement forms a Joint Venture between the general partnership of Morse & Pfeiff and Garcia Law Firm to administer Merced County Contract 2003[0]93." The name of the joint venture was "Morse, Pfeiff & Garcia." Its location was the office address of Morse & Pfeiff. The Joint Venture Agreement provided that attorney Garcia was to receive 45.662 percent of the net profits annually under the indigent defense contract, payable monthly, and Morse & Pfeiff was to receive 54.33 percent.

On March 30, 2004, the Joint Venture Agreement was amended to provide that the County of Merced was to receive 90 days written notice prior to the withdrawal or suspension of a joint venturer and that it would be the duty of the non-withdrawing or non-expelled joint venturer to provide written notice to the county.

In April 2004, an "Assignment of Merced County Contract No. 2003093 and Consent of County of Merced" was executed to reflect the change in structure of the contracting "Attorney." Amendment No. 1 to the contract also was executed, to change the name of the contracting Attorney to the "Morse and Pfeiff and Garcia Joint Venture."

In May 2006, an amendment to the Joint Venture Agreement was executed by attorneys Garcia, Pfeiff and Morse, renaming the joint venture "Merced Defense Associates (M.D.A.)," which became known as MDA.

In July 2007, a two-year extension to the indigent defense contract was approved by the county, for fiscal year 2008/2009 through fiscal year 2009/2010 (Amendment No. 2). The number of subcontracting attorneys was increased and the fixed amount for fiscal year 2007/2008 was increased to $1.5 million. The fixed amount was set at approximately $1.6 million for 2008/2009 and $1.7 million for 2009/2010.
