INQUIRY CONCERNING JUDGE PATRICK COUWENBERG

SUMMARY

A disciplinary matter was brought concerning a superior court judge.

The Commission on Judicial Performance concluded that the judge should be removed from the bench for (1) misrepresenting his educational background on his personal data questionnaires in 1993 and 1996 when seeking judicial appointment; (2) falsely representing, in the course of seeking a judicial appointment, that he was a Vietnam veteran; (3) misrepresenting his educational background, legal experience and affiliations on his 1997 judicial data questionnaire; (4) falsely representing to the judge who was to introduce him at his enrobing ceremony that he was a Vietnam veteran who had received a Purple Heart; (5) falsely representing to attorneys that he served in Vietnam, had a master's degree in psychology and had shrapnel in his groin received in military combat; and (6) making false statements about his education and military experience in letters and in testimony to the commission during its investigation of his conduct. The record indicated that the judge committed four counts of willful misconduct and four counts of prejudicial conduct in what appeared to be a deliberate course of misrepresentation. A public censure would not have adequately conveyed the commission's reproval of the judge's course of misconduct. The commission was convinced that protection of the public and the judiciary's reputation required the judge's removal from the bench. (Opinion by Michael A. Kahn, Chairperson.)

HEADNOTES

(1) Judges § 6—Discipline—Commission Jurisdiction—Prebench Conduct.—The Commission on Judicial Performance has jurisdiction to sanction a judge for conduct occurring within six years prior to the start of the judge's current term of office (Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (d)).

(2) Judges § 6—Discipline—Conduct Prejudicial—Prebench Conduct.—The judge's prebench submission of personal data questionnaires to the Governor, which included misrepresentations as to his educational background, constituted conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute. The judge's false affirmation to two judges that he was a Vietnam veteran was also made in an effort to further the likelihood of a judicial appointment and was also conduct prejudicial.

(3) Judges § 6—Discipline—Willful Misconduct—Providing False Information.—Providing material false information about one's qualifications and experience is conduct done in bad faith, i.e., for a purpose other than the faithful discharge of judicial duties. Also, providing such false information about one's experience and qualifications violates the basic precepts of Cal. Code Jud. Ethics, canons 1 & 2. Because he had assumed judicial office, the judge was acting in a judicial capacity when he filled out a judicial data questionnaire (JDQ) and his false statements on the JDQ constituted willful misconduct. The judge's giving false information to another judge for use in the public enrobing ceremony also constituted willful misconduct.

(4) Judges § 6—Discipline—Conduct Prejudicial—False Statements to Attorneys.—The judge's false statements in the courthouse to attorneys regarding his background and education constituted conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute.

(5) Judges § 6—Discipline—Improper Action—Misrepresentations to Newspaper Reporter.—The judge's false statement to a newspaper reporter about seeing combat in Vietnam constituted improper action.

(6) Judges § 6—Discipline—Willful Misconduct—Misrepresentations During Commission Investigation.—The judge's conduct in providing false information to the Commission on Judicial Performance, both in written responses to commission investigation letters and in his oral testimony, constituted willful misconduct, since the judge was acting in a judicial capacity and gave his responses and testimony in bad faith.

(7) Judges § 6—Disciplinary Proceeding—Purpose.—The purpose of a judicial disciplinary proceeding is not punishment, but rather the protection of the public, the enforcement of rigorous standards of judicial conduct, and the maintenance of public confidence in the integrity and independence of the judicial system.

(8) Judges § 6—Discipline—Removal from Office—Deliberately Providing False Information—Course of Investigation.—There are few judicial actions that provide greater justification for removal from office than the action of a judge in deliberately providing false information to the Commission on Judicial Performance in the course of its investigation.

(9) Judges § 1—Mininium Qualification—Honesty.—Honesty is a minimum qualification expected of every judge. The public will not, and should not, respect a judicial officer who has been shown to have repeatedly lied for his or her own benefit.

(10) Judges § 6—Discipline—Mitigation—Legal Knowledge and Administrative Skills.—A good reputation for legal knowledge and administrative skills, although relevant to the degree of discipline, does not mitigate either willful misconduct or conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute.

(11) Judges § 6—Discipline—Removal from Office—Misrepresenting Education and Experience.—The judge was removed from the bench for (1) misrepresenting his educational background on his personal data questionnaires when seeking judicial appointment; (2) falsely representing, in the course of seeking a judicial appointment in 1996, that he was a Vietnam veteran; (3) misrepresenting his educational background, legal experience and affiliations on his 1997 judicial data questionnaire; (4) falsely representing to the judge who was to introduce him at his enrobing ceremony that he was a Vietnam veteran who had received a Purple Heart; (5) falsely representing to attorneys that he served in Vietnam, had a master's degree in psychology, and had shrapnel in his groin received in military combat; and (6) making false statements about his education and military experience in letters and in testimony to the Commission on Judicial Performance during its investigation of his conduct.

OPINION

KAHN, Chairperson.—This disciplinary matter concerns Judge Patrick Couwenberg, a judge of the Los Angeles County Superior Court. Judge Couwenberg was charged with (1) misrepresenting his educational background on his personal data questionnaires when seeking judicial appointment; (2) falsely representing, in the course of seeking a judicial appointment in 1996, that he was a Vietnam veteran; (3) misrepresenting his educational background, legal experience and affiliations on his 1997 judicial data questionnaire; (4) falsely representing to the judge who was to introduce him at the public enrobing ceremony that he was a Vietnam veteran who had received a Purple Heart; (5) falsely representing to attorneys that he went to Vietnam, had a master's degree in psychology and had shrapnel in his groin received in military combat; (6) falsely telling a newspaper reporter that he was in Vietnam in 1968 and 1969; and (7) making false statements about his education and military experience in letters and in testimony to the commission during its investigation of his conduct.

A panel of three judges, sitting as special masters, found that virtually all of the factual allegations were supported by clear and convincing evidence. For the reasons set forth in this decision, the commission adopts the masters' findings of fact. The commission finds that Judge Couwenberg made misrepresentations in order to become a judge, continued to make misrepresentations while a judge, and deliberately provided false information to the commission in the course of its investigation. For this misconduct, the commission hereby removes Judge Patrick Couwenberg from the bench.

PROCEDURAL HISTORY

Judge Couwenberg first sought a judicial appointment in 1993 in Los Angeles or Orange County and filled out a personal data questionnaire (PDQ) dated October 18, 1993. He was not successful. He applied again in 1996, this time limiting his application to Los Angeles County. His second PDQ is dated July 10, 1996.

Governor Wilson appointed Judge Couwenberg to the Superior Court of Los Angeles County on April 24, 1997. On July 31, 1997, Judge Couwenberg signed a completed judicial data questionnaire (JDQ) that was provided by, and returned to, the presiding judge. A public enrobing ceremony was held on August 25, 1997, for Judge Couwenberg and 11 other new judges. Retired Judge Frisco introduced Judge Couwenberg and the other new judges. He based his introduction of Judge Couwenberg on Judge Couwenberg's JDQ and discussions with Judge Couwenberg.

On February 19, 1998, the Los Angeles Daily Journal published a profile of Judge Couwenberg noting his inconsistent statements about serving in Vietnam. This profile prompted the filing of a complaint with the commission (the complainant sent a copy to Judge Couwenberg) alleging that Judge Couwenberg had lied about having a degree from the California Institute of Technology (Cal Tech), being a Vietnam veteran, and receiving a Purple Heart.

On March 13, 1998, the commission received an unsolicited letter from Judge Couwenberg in response to the complaint, which included the statement, "At no time did I lie to the Governor nor did I attempt to mislead anyone."

On August 25, 1998, the commission sent a preliminary investigation letter to Judge Couwenberg. The investigation continued over the next year with responses from the judge and a second letter from the commission. In December 1999, the commission wrote Judge Couwenberg indicating that it was concerned that he had provided false and misleading information in response to the commission's inquiries concerning his military service and requested that he come to the commission's office for the taking of a statement. On January 21, 2000, Judge Couwenberg, accompanied by counsel, came to the commission's office and gave a statement under oath.

On June 30, 2000, the commission filed a six-count notice of formal proceedings. Another investigation letter was sent to Judge Couwenberg on July 25, 2000, a response was received in September, and on October 20, 2000, the commission filed a nine-count first amended notice of formal proceedings.

In the meantime, on August 17, 2000, the Supreme Court appointed three judges as special masters in this case. The evidentiary hearing before the masters[1] commenced on February 21, 2001, and concluded February 28, 2001. Mr. Jack Coyle and Mr. Sei Shimoguchi of the commission's office of trial counsel presented the case in support of the charges. Judge Couwenberg was represented by Mr. Edward P. George, Jr., Mr. Thomas M. Goethals, and Mr. Timothy L. O'Reilly. The masters submitted their 47-page report to the commission on May 16, 2001.

Following receipt of objections and briefs from Judge Couwenberg and the office of trial counsel, the matter was orally argued before the commission on July 19, 2001. Mr. Coyle presented argument on behalf of trial counsel and Mr. George and Mr. Goethals presented argument on behalf of Judge Couwenberg.

FINDINGS OF FACT

A. Counts One and Two—Misrepresentations on the Personal Data Questionnaires

An applicant for judicial appointment submits a completed PDQ to the Governor. In addition to being reviewed by the Governor, when Judge Couwenberg submitted his PDQ's in 1993 and 1996, they were sent to the Commission on Judicial Nominees Evaluation of the State Bar of California and the judicial selection advisory board, to facilitate those entities' review of the applicant. Representatives for both entities testified that the entities generally assumed that the factual information on a PDQ was true and that discovery of an applicant's material misrepresentation on the PDQ would end the applicant's chance of a favorable report.

[1] Judge Ina Levin Gyemant of the San Francisco County Superior Court was appointed as the presiding special master. Judge Thomas P. Hansen of the Santa Clara County Superior Court and Judge K. Peter Saiers of the San Joaquin County Superior Court were the associate masters.

The masters found that on both of his PDQ's, Judge Couwenberg provided the following false information: (1) he had attended California State Polytechnic University, Pomona (Cal Poly Pomona) from 1964 to 1968 when he had actually attended from 1966 to 1968 only, and had attended Chaffey Junior College from 1963 to 1966, which information was omitted from the PDQ's; (2) he went to California State University, Los Angeles (Cal State L.A.), from 1970 to 1972 and received a master's degree, when he was never enrolled there and did not have a master's degree from any school; (3) there was no mention that he attended Western State University College of Law from 1969 to 1970; (4) he attended Loyola Law School in 1972 and 1973, when he never went to Loyola; (5) he attended University of La Verne College of Law from 1973 to 1976 when he actually attended La Verne from 1970 to 1973.

Judge Couwenberg admitted that the information was false, but denied that he provided "intentionally false" information. The masters rejected Judge Couwenberg's attempts to distance himself from the misrepresentations. They found that it "is simply not believable that the judge would be uncertain who filled out his judicial application," and that "even assuming that his wife did type the applications, it is not believable that she remembered the specifics of his educational background for 20 years." In response to Judge Couwenberg's claim that he did not review the educational information on the PDQ's because he did not believe it was important, the masters stated that a "judicial candidate must assume that everything on the application form to the Governor is of some importance or it would not be on the form," and found that "Judge Couwenberg's professed view that education is essentially irrelevant to a judicial application is manufactured, in an effort to minimize his lies to the Governor." They further noted that even "according to the judge's version of the facts, he knowingly provided false information to the Governor—he assumed that his wife would provide the false information he had given her, but did nothing about it."

The masters had little trouble understanding why Judge Couwenberg lied. They noted: "The reason for these lies is self-evident. Seeking appointment to the bench is a competitive situation. Judge Couwenberg would have been competing with 20 to 30 applicants. The school the judge lied about attending (Loyola) is more prestigious (as he acknowledged) than the ones he actually attended (La Verne and Western). It was also the only school of the three that was accredited. As he admitted, he told his wife he went to a large accredited law school 'to make himself look better.' His testimony that he didn't want to make a similar impression on the Governor because he'd already told his wife that is not credible." They also noted: "It is also more impressive to have passed the bar exam on the first try than after multiple attempts. Regardless of the Judge's attempt to portray failing the bar five times as something positive, this is the only logical reason for listing the date of graduation from La Verne as 1976, rather than the true date of 1973." The masters concluded that Judge Couwenberg "knowingly and intentionally provided the Governor with false information material to his applications for judicial appointment," and noted that had the lies been discovered at the time, he would not have been appointed to the bench.

The masters' findings concerning the allegations in counts one and two of the first amended notice of formal proceedings are supported by clear and convincing evidence and the commission adopts the masters' findings.

B. Count Three—Statements to Judges About Serving in Vietnam

The masters found that in late 1995 or early 1996, Judge Cowell of the Los Angeles County Superior Court, in order to further Judge Couwenberg's efforts to obtain a judicial appointment, arranged a luncheon with Judge Couwenberg, Judge DiLoreto, and himself. Judge DiLoreto had been helpful to Judge Cowell in obtaining a judgeship, and Judge Couwenberg wanted to meet Judge DiLoreto.

At the lunch, Judge Cowell made a reference to Judge Couwenberg's being a veteran. The masters explain: "Judge DiLoreto then asked Judge Couwenberg, 'you were in Vietnam and you were in combat?' As Judge DiLoreto recalls, the judge said 'yes.' Judge Cowell was not sure if Judge Couwenberg nodded or said yes, but testified that Judge Couwenberg affirmed Judge Cowell's statement that he was in Vietnam in some manner, and 'certainly did not disabuse us [of] the idea that he was a veteran.' " Judge DiLoreto told Judge Couwenberg that it was critical that Governor Wilson know this because both he and his judicial appointments secretary, Mr. John Davies, were ex-Marines. Judge Couwenberg indicated that he thought it was important too.

The masters noted that Mr. Davies testified that a war record was a plus with Governor Wilson and that he recalled his interview with Judge Couwenberg because of his "unusual war experiences." He did not recall the details, but remembered that it involved "undercover work" and that there was some "sort of heroism involved."

After the lunch meeting, Judge DiLoreto took several steps to help Judge Couwenberg. He called another judge to try and find out what had happened to Judge Couwenberg's 1993 application, he called Judge Couwenberg a couple of times, and he called Mr. Davies to check on the status of Judge Couwenberg's application.

The masters noted that Judge Couwenberg claimed that he did not think that he discussed his military career when he met with Mr. Davies and that he remembers having lunch with Judge DiLoreto only (not with both Judges Cowell and DiLoreto), and denies any recollection of discussing Vietnam or his military career. The masters, however, credited the testimony of Mr. Davies as well as the testimony of Judges Cowell and DiLoreto that the luncheon conversation took place as alleged in count three.

The masters' findings, that Judge Couwenberg met with Judges Cowell and DiLoreto and in furtherance of his efforts to obtain a judicial appointment affirmed that he was a veteran of the Vietnam War, are supported by clear and convincing evidence and the commission adopts those findings as its own.

Count three also alleged that Judge Cowell submitted a letter to Governor Wilson on Judge Couwenberg's behalf, which included the false statement that Judge Couwenberg was a veteran of the Vietnam War. The masters found that such a letter was written by Judge Cowell and given to Mrs. Couwenberg (Judge Cowell's court reporter) to prepare the envelope and mail. The Governor's office, however, could not locate the letter. The masters found that the evidence was insufficient to establish that the letter was in fact sent. The commission accepts the masters' findings concerning the letter and dismisses the allegations in count three concerning the letter.

C. Count Four—Misrepresentations on the Judicial Data Questionnaire

Judge Couwenberg received a JDQ from the presiding judge's office, filled it out, signed it on July 31, 1997, and returned it to the presiding judge. The presiding judge provided Judge Frisco with a copy of the JDQ for the enrobing ceremony. The JDQ is used as a record of a judge's background information and for public announcements.

Judge Couwenberg's JDQ had the following misrepresentations: (1) his attendance at Chaffey Junior College and Western State University College of Law are omitted; (2) he falsely claims to have attended Loyola Law School (listed here as 9/73 through 9/74, as opposed to 9/72 through 6/73 on the PDQ's); (3) the dates of attendance at University of La Verne College of Law are 9/74 through 6/76, when his actual attendance dates were 1970 to 1973; (4) the attendance dates for Cal Poly Pomona are 9/64 through 6/66, when he actually attended that school from 1966 to 1968; (5) he attended "Cal Inst of Techn. Pasadena" (Cal Tech) from 9/66 to 6/68 and received a Bachelor of Science degree from that school, when he never attended Cal Tech; (7) the box next to "Veterans of Foreign Wars" was checked although Judge Couwenberg was never a member; (8) under "Armed Services Record," he entered "US Navy," instead of "US Navy Reserve"; and (9) under "Private Practice Experience," the application noted, "1976 Gibson, Dunn," although Judge Couwenberg never worked for the law firm of Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher.

There is no dispute as to the falsity of these statements. Judge Couwenberg attempted to sidestep responsibility by denying that he filled out the form himself. The masters found Judge Couwenberg's testimony "inconsistent and vague." They noted that Judge Couwenberg's claim that he did not review the JDQ before he signed it was inconsistent with his response letter to the commission, that he had no explanation for some of the false entries, and that his claim that the Cal Tech entry was a joke was contradicted by his statement under oath in January 2000 and by Judge Frisco. The masters concluded that Judge Couwenberg provided false information on the JDQ about his education, military service, and past employment. The masters' findings are supported by clear and convincing evidence and the commission adopts those findings as its own.

D. Count Five—Misrepresentations to Judge Frisco

The masters found that Judge Couwenberg gave or affirmed to Judge Frisco the following false information (as alleged in count five): (1) he was recruited from the Navy to the Army, when he was in the Navy Reserve and never in the Army; (2) he attained the rank of corporal in the Army; (3) he served in the Army for two years and was in Vietnam for 16 months, when he was never in the Army in Vietnam or elsewhere; and (4) he had received a Purple Heart, when he had never received or been eligible to receive a Purple Heart.

With the exception of the statement that he was recruited from the Navy to the Army, this false information was included in Judge Frisco's introductory remarks at the enrobing ceremony, along with false information that Judge Couwenberg attended Cal Tech for two years, earned a B.S. in physics from Cal Tech, and attended Loyola Law School for a year.

Judge Couwenberg admits that Judge Frisco's introductory remarks regarding his military service were false, but claims that he "does not recall" giving the alleged information or affirming it to be true. The masters rejected Judge Couwenberg's testimony noting that (1) in his prehearing statement under oath, Judge Couwenberg admitted making certain misrepresentations to Judge

Frisco; (2) Judge Frisco's handwritten notes of his conversations with Judge Couwenberg reflect that Judge Couwenberg was the source of the false information; (3) his claim that he discussed Cal Tech with Judge Frisco because Cal Tech was listed on the JDQ, is inconsistent with his testimony that he told his wife to list Cal Tech on the JDQ after he had joked with Judge Frisco about the difference between Cal Poly Pomona and Cal Tech; and (4) Judge Couwenberg's testimony that he thought the enrobing ceremony would be in the nature of a humorous roast is not believable as he admits that he had never been to an enrobing ceremony, which by its nature is a serious event, and he could not think of how receiving a Purple Heart could be mentioned as a joke. The masters also noted that Judge Couwenberg had the opportunity to correct Judge Frisco both before and after the enrobing ceremony, but did not do so.

The masters' findings that Judge Couwenberg gave or affirmed to Judge Frisco false information concerning his military service are supported by clear and convincing evidence and the commission adopts those findings.

E. Count Six—False Statements to Attorneys

An experienced attorney, who appeared frequently before Judge Couwenberg, testified that Judge Couwenberg told a group of attorneys in the courthouse that (1) he moved to the United States when he was 18 and shortly after that served in the armed forces; (2) he went to college on the GI Bill; (3) he received his undergraduate degree in physics from Cal Tech; (4) he had a master's degree in psychology; and (5) he had a medical appointment for shrapnel in his groin.[2]

Judge Couwenberg in his answer denied making such statements but acknowledged that they would have been false if made. He claimed that he sometimes made statements about his background that were humorous or made in jest.

The masters found that Judge Couwenberg made the statements recalled by the attorney and that the statements were false. They noted that there is no reason to doubt the attorney's testimony and that it is documented that Judge Couwenberg made the same or similar false statements elsewhere.

The masters' findings are supported by clear and convincing evidence and the commission adopts those findings.

[2] The masters noted that the attorney also testified that Judge Couwenberg stated that he worked for Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher, but that this false statement was not charged in count six.

F. Count Seven—The Daily Journal Profile

On February 19, 1998, the Los Angeles Daily Journal published a profile of Judge Couwenberg written by reporter Cheryl Romo, which was based on her two interviews with the judge. Ms. Romo had worked for the Daily Journal for over six years and testified that Judge Couwenberg made the statements to her that were quoted in the article. Specifically, he falsely stated in the initial interview that he was in Vietnam in 1968 and 1969 and saw combat. In the subsequent interview he told her that he was in the United States Navy Reserve from 1965 to 1969, that he was not in Vietnam and that she should "just leave that part out."

The masters stated that they "are convinced that Judge Couwenberg initially made the false statements about his military service," but "are likewise convinced that he effectively retracted these misrepresentations in his later conversations with Romo and his direction to 'leave that part out.' "

The masters' findings that Judge Couwenberg initially made false statements and subsequently sought to retract those misrepresentations are supported by clear and convincing evidence and are adopted by the commission.

G. Counts Eight and Nine—Misrepresentations During the Commission's Investigation Concerning Covert Operations and Educational Background

1. Misrepresentations About Covert Operations

The masters noted that count eight alleges that in January 2000, Judge Couwenberg under oath "testified falsely that he had been involved in covert Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) operations in Southeast Asia between June 1968 and December 1969, and had made a delivery of funds or documents to Africa for the CIA around 1984. Count nine alleges that in three response letters to the commission (two before and one after his statement under oath), the judge both implied and stated the same false claim about participating in covert CIA operations in 1968–1969."

The masters found these allegations to be true. They found that Judge Couwenberg "was never affiliated with the CIA or any other agency involved in covert operations during the Vietnam War, and was not involved in any CIA covert operations at any time." The masters rejected Judge Couwenberg's testimony at the hearing where he maintained his story was true. They found that his testimony "was vague and unpersuasive in and of itself, is contradicted in part by circumstantial evidence, and was not corroborated. Most significantly, it was flatly refuted in its entirety by compelling testimony from a representative of the CIA."

The masters noted that in his January 2000 statement under oath Judge Couwenberg "testified at length that he had participated in a covert CIA operation in Southeast Asia . . . where, among other adventures, he was wounded in a firefight resulting in his purported shrapnel wound." Also, in a subsequent letter to the commission, dated May 26, 2000, "the judge again stated that he participated in a classified, covert CIA operation in the Far East in 1968 and 1969 on two separate operations."

Military records establish that Judge Couwenberg received an honorable early discharge from the Navy Reserve in 1967 because of a liver problem. Judge Couwenberg testified that in 1966 he met a man named Jack Smith (or it could have been Jones), who told him that he could get a discharge without fulfilling his six-year commitment with the Navy Reserve if he said there was something medically wrong with him. The masters noted that Judge Couwenberg "claims he told Smith he didn't want a medical discharge, and testified that he did not know until receiving discovery in this case that he had been discharged for these reasons. However, it is apparent that he knew of the medical discharge at the time. In a letter dated September 5, 1966, from the judge to his commander, the judge discusses his prospective medical discharge."

Judge Couwenberg testified that he went to Laos for a month in December 1968 and then went again for three or four weeks around June 1969. During this time he was working full time with the Los Angeles County Department of Social Services. Judge Couwenberg claimed he was able to be absent from work without a problem, despite the fact that he had started work there in June 1968. He could not recall whether he took vacation or leave without pay and he produced no employment records to verify that he was off work during these periods.

Mr. William McNair has been designated by the head of the CIA as the records validation officer. Although the CIA is not subject to a commission subpoena, the CIA voluntarily agreed to allow Mr. McNair to testify. Mr. McNair stated that the CIA has records of everyone who has ever been engaged in a clandestine or covert relationship with the CIA in an operational capacity. These records have been maintained since the mid-1940's and include anyone an operations officer has talked to and considered using. McNair testified that a thorough search was made of the CIA records to determine whether Judge Couwenberg, by any name, appears in the CIA records. He does not. Accordingly, he was never under consideration for, or employed by or utilized for, clandestine operations by the CIA. Mr. McNair testified, "if someone were picked out, recruited in the U.S., and transported to Laos under our sponsorship, we would have a record of it."

Mr. McNair further testified that at the time in question there were no other United States agencies operating in Laos. The only speculative possibility would have been an agency operating illegally. Mr. McNair testified that he was well versed in what was going on in Laos at the time and would be "stunned" to find out any agency other than the CIA was conducting an operation in Laos, such as described by Judge Couwenberg.

Judge Couwenberg also testified that the same agency that sent him to Laos used him to make a delivery in Africa in the 1980's. Mr. McNair testified that if the CIA had so employed Judge Couwenberg, the CIA would have a record of the event and that the CIA does not have any record of the alleged event.

The masters noted that Judge Couwenberg now suggests that he never said he was with the CIA, but only guessed or assumed that the agency was the CIA. They find, however, that "the evidence is clear that Judge Couwenberg wanted the commission to believe that he was with the CIA, and ultimately flatly asserted as the truth that he was with the CIA." They noted his January 2000 testimony under oath and his letters to the commission, particularly Judge Couwenberg's May 26, 2000, response through counsel which states that the "August 3, 1999 letter correctly states that Judge Couwenberg participated in a classified, covert CIA operation in the Far East."[3]

The masters' findings that Judge Couwenberg testified falsely that he had been involved in covert CIA operations in Southeast Asia in December 1968 and June 1969 and had made a delivery of funds or documents to Africa for the CIA around 1984 are supported by clear and convincing evidence and the commission adopts those findings.

2. False Testimony Concerning a Master's Degree

Judge Couwenberg admits that he was never enrolled at Cal State L.A. and has no master's degree. Nonetheless, on January 21, 2000, Judge Couwenberg came to the commission and gave a statement under oath which included the following:

"Q. And after Cal State Pomona your education after that?

[3] Commission on Judicial Performance rule 106 reads, in relevant part: "The written communication of counsel shall be deemed to be the written communication of the judge. Counsel has the authority to bind the judge as to all matters except a stipulation as to discipline."

"A. After that I went part time to Cal State. Then went to law school, graduated from the University of La Verne.

"Q. Okay. When you say you went to Cal State part-time, Cal State Pomona?

"A. L.A.

"Q. And did you get a degree from Cal State L.A.?

"A. Yes.

"Q. What was the degree in?

"A. Psychology.

"Q. Master's degree?

"A. (Witness nods head).

"MS. DOI: I am sorry, I don't think that was verbal.

"THE WITNESS: Yes.

"MR. COYLE: Q. Do you know why it is that your master's degree from Cal State L.A. would not be on the Judge's Data Questionnaire?

"A. I have no idea."

When this misrepresentation was first brought to Judge Couwenberg's attention, he suggested that he failed to focus on the question. At the hearing before the masters, Judge Couwenberg stated that he was focused on the question, that his response was not true, and that he volunteered the information. When asked why this was not perjury, he responded, "I suppose in the true sense it is. I just don't know why I did it."[4]

The masters concluded that as a matter of fact and law that when Judge Couwenberg testified under oath on January 21, 2000, that he had a master's degree in psychology from Cal State L.A., he knowingly gave material false

[4] The record suggests at least one possible explanation. Judge Couwenberg had indicated on his PDQ's that he had a master's degree. In January 2000, Judge Couwenberg may not have known whether the commission was aware of this misrepresentation. He may have feared that if he failed to repeat this misrepresentation, the commission would investigate the inconsistency between his testimony and his PDQ's.

testimony under oath. The masters' findings are supported by clear and convincing evidence and the commission adopts those findings.

JUDGE COUWENBERG'S MENTAL DEFENSE

Judge Couwenberg offered as a psychological defense that he had a mental condition known as "pseudologia fantastica." This defense was presented by Judge Couwenberg's expert witness, psychiatrist Dr. Charles V. Ford. He described pseudologia fantastica as "story telling that often has sort of a matrix of fantasy interwoven with some facts."[5] Dr. Ford, as well as Judge Couwenberg's two other medical experts, however, agreed that the objective medical tests that were administered to Judge Couwenberg did not reveal any suggestion of cognitive or psychological disorder. Dr. Ford conceded that pseudologia fantastica is a description rather than a diagnosis.

The masters recognized that there was evidence that Judge Couwenberg was in a detention camp as a very young child in Indonesia and suffered racial discrimination in Holland in his youth. Judge Couwenberg's doctors said that these experiences caused him to have low self-esteem which, according to Dr. Ford, led to pseudologia fantastica. The masters found little evidence of this connection. They noted that none of the psychological tests revealed any evidence of a traumatic stress disorder, Judge Couwenberg had never been treated for any psychological disorder, and the subscales for posttraumatic stress disorder in the Minnesota Multiphasic Personality Inventory test were all normal. They further noted that the many letters of recommendation on behalf of Judge Couwenberg suggest that he never exhibited any self-image problems either as an attorney or as a judge.

The masters properly questioned whether a judge may avail himself or herself of a psychological defense in a disciplinary hearing. They also noted that there was no evidence that Dr. Ford's contentions regarding pseudologia fantastica are accepted in the psychiatric community. They further opined that unless low self-esteem is a recognized mental disorder, it makes no difference whether or not the judge had the symptom of pseudologia fantastica, because a symptom without some mental disorder is of no legal consequence to the allegations of misconduct. The masters concluded as a matter of fact and law that Judge Couwenberg did not have any mental condition that excuses or mitigates his misconduct in this case.

[5] Dr. Ford explained: "When we use the word 'lying,' we generally mean that the person knows what he's saying is not true and is deliberately attempting to mislead another person. There's a two-part definition to lying. With the pseudologia [f]antastica it is really kind of an admixture of self-deception and trying to present oneself to other people in a certain way and not really related to a conscious intent to defraud or to lie, such as we might see in a person with antisocial personality."

The commission agrees that Judge Couwenberg does not have any mental condition that excuses or mitigates his misconduct. As noted by the masters, the possession of a "symptom" without any mental disorder is of little legal consequence. Also, it appears that pseudologia fantastica is an attempt to explain why a person lies in a way that does not directly promote his or her self-interests. The reasons for Judge Couwenberg's misrepresentations, however, are self-evident. He misrepresented his qualifications in order to become a judge, to maintain the false premise which appears to have been critical to his judicial appointment, and to frustrate the commission's investigation. As Judge Couwenberg's misrepresentations were clearly calculated to advance his self-interests, a theory aimed at explaining why a person lies in a way that does not obviously advance the person's self-interests has no application. Furthermore, as put forward by Dr. Ford, pseudologia fantastica attempts to explain why a person knowingly lies. Judge Couwenberg has not admitted to many of his lies, such as making misrepresentations to Judge Frisco and his alleged presence in Laos in 1968 and 1969. The application of Dr. Ford's contentions to these misrepresentations would suggest that Judge Couwenberg is continuing to knowingly lie to the commission.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

A. Counts One and Two (the Personal Data Questionnaires)

(1) The masters noted that although the PDQ's were submitted before Judge Couwenberg became a judge, a judge's prebench conduct is subject to general ethical standards.[6] The commission has jurisdiction to sanction a judge for conduct occurring within six years prior to the start of the judge's current term of office (Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (d)). The masters observed that judges have been disciplined for prebench conduct that was determined to constitute "conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute."[7]

(2) The masters concluded: "Submitting false PDQs to the Governor constitutes an obvious violation of general ethical standards, and constitutes

[6] The fact that Judge Couwenberg was not yet a judge when he submitted his PDQ's precluded the masters from reaching a conclusion of willful misconduct in office.

[7] The masters cited In re Stevens (1981) 28 Cal.3d 873 [172 Cal.Rptr. 676, 625 P.2d 219] (judge censured for discussing his sexual experiences and fantasies with a married couple employed by the Legislature; discussions began while judge was member of the Legislature and continued after he took the bench); In re Blackwell (1999) Public Admonishment No. 18 (judge's prebench conduct involved his failure to disclose acceptance of overpayment from his former employer, a bank, while seeking a general release of claims against him from the bank); and In re Van Voorhis (1992) Public Reproval No. 8 (public reproval for conduct that included one instance of prebench misconduct, misinforming the public of judge's marital status during his judicial campaign).

prejudicial misconduct. Honesty is a 'minimum qualification' expected of every judge (Kloepfer v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1989) 49 Cal.3d 826, 865 [264 Cal.Rptr. 100, 782 P.2d 239]) and presumably of every applicant for judicial position. Judge Couwenberg's falsehoods create the appearance that he obtained his judicial office by deceit. The 1996 PDQ also violates canon 5's specific prohibition against a knowing misrepresentation of qualifications. A judicial applicant who gets appointed after submitting falsified qualifications brings the judiciary into disrepute and damages public confidence in the integrity of the judiciary."[8]

For the reasons set forth by the masters, the commission concludes that Judge Couwenberg's submissions of PDQ's to the Governor, which included misrepresentations as to his educational background, constitute conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute.

B. Count Three—Statements to Judges About Serving in Vietnam

The commission has found that in an effort to further the likelihood of a judicial appointment, Judge Couwenberg had lunch with Judges DiLoreto and Cowell and falsely affirmed to them that he was a veteran of the Vietnam War. Judge Couwenberg's conduct violated California Code of Judicial Ethics canon 5B and constitutes conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute.

C. Count Four—Misrepresentations on the Judicial Data Questionnaire

(3) The commission agrees with the masters that Judge Couwenberg's false statements on the JDQ constitute willful misconduct in office. Judge Couwenberg was acting in his judicial capacity when he filled out the JDQ. He had already assumed judicial office. The form was used exclusively for judges in connection with public enrobing ceremonies and other administrative purposes concerning the judges. Judge Couwenberg received the JDQ from the presiding judge's office and returned it to that office. As noted by the masters, by definition, providing material false information about one's qualifications and experience is done in bad faith, i.e., for a purpose other than the faithful discharge of judicial duties. Also, providing such false information about one's experience and qualifications violates the basic

[8] The masters noted that effective January 15, 1996, the California Supreme Court adopted a revised California Code of Judicial Ethics that includes canon 5B, which provides that a "candidate for election or appointment to judicial office shall not . . . (2) knowingly misrepresent the identity, qualifications, present position, or any other fact concerning the candidate . . . ."

precepts of California Code of Judicial Ethics canon 1 (judge shall uphold the integrity of the judiciary) and canon 2 (judge shall avoid impropriety and the appearance of impropriety in all of the judge's activities, and act at all times in a manner that promotes public confidence in the integrity and impartiality of the judiciary).

D. Count Five—Giving False Information to Judge Frisco

The commission agrees with the masters that giving false biographical information to Judge Frisco for use in the public enrobing ceremony constitutes willful misconduct. The statements were made in Judge Couwenberg's judicial capacity, to another judge in connection with the public enrobing ceremony, and were not made for the faithful discharge of judicial duties, but to mislead Judge Frisco, other members of the legal community and the public.

E. Count Six—False Statements to Attorneys

(4) The commission has found that Judge Couwenberg made false statements in the courthouse to attorneys regarding his background and education. This conduct violated canons 1 and 2A of the Code of Judicial Ethics and constitutes conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into dispute.

F. Count Seven—Misrepresentations to the Newspaper Reporter

(5) The commission has found that Judge Couwenberg falsely stated to the newspaper reporter that he saw combat in Vietnam and then in a subsequent conversation told her that he was not in Vietnam and that she should "just leave that part out." The newspaper article accurately recounted the false statement, the subsequent withdrawal and the direction to leave the information out. Judge Couwenberg knew or should have known that a misrepresentation of this caliber, when made to a newspaper reporter who was preparing an article on the judge, would become public. The commission concludes that Judge Couwenberg's misrepresentation violated canon 2A of the Code of Judicial Ethics and constitutes improper action.

G. Counts Eight and Nine—Misrepresentations During the Commission's Investigation Concerning Covert Operations and Educational Background

(6) The commission agrees with the masters that Judge Couwenberg's conduct in providing false information to the commission, both in his written responses to commission investigation letters and in his testimony, constitutes willful misconduct. He was acting in his judicial capacity when he took these actions. (See Adams v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1995) 10 Cal.4th 866, 910 [42 Cal.Rptr.2d 606, 897 P.2d 544] [judge acts in judicial capacity when responding to investigation letters from commission].) Judge Couwenberg's responses and testimony were given in bad faith. (See Adams, supra, 10 Cal.4th at pp. 910–911 [judge acts in bad faith by providing false and misleading information in response to investigation letter from commission]; Fletcher v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1998) 19 Cal.4th 865, 887–891 [81 Cal.Rptr.2d 58, 968 P.2d 958] [judge committed willful misconduct in presenting commission with grossly incomplete and misleading responses and with continually shifting explanations].) Finally, as noted by the masters, providing false information to the commission, in writing and in sworn testimony, constitutes egregious violations of the fundamental precepts of canons 1 and 2 of the California Code of Judicial Ethics. (See Adams, supra, 10 Cal.4th at p. 914.)

DISCIPLINE

(7) The commission is guided by the Supreme Court's reiteration that the purpose of a judicial disciplinary proceeding is not punishment, "but rather the protection of the public, the enforcement of rigorous standards of judicial conduct, and the maintenance of public confidence in the integrity and independence of the judicial system."[9] The commission concludes that these purposes require the removal of Judge Couwenberg from the bench.

The facts establish that Judge Couwenberg's successful application for a judicial appointment was premised on material misrepresentations. First, through misrepresentations on his PDQ he made it appear that he was in school from 1964 through 1976, except for two years between his undergraduate degree and starting on a master's degree. In fact, Judge Couwenberg never entered any master's degree program. His misrepresentations also masked, and thereby avoided any questions concerning, the three-year period of time between his graduation from law school and admission to the California State Bar. Second, Judge Couwenberg encouraged Judges Cowell and DiLoreto, and the Governor's judicial appointments secretary (according to his testimony) to believe that Judge Couwenberg was a veteran of the Vietnam War. As noted by the masters, seeking appointment to the bench is a competitive situation. Although there is no evidence of the Governor's reasons for appointing Judge Couwenberg, it appears that Judge Couwenberg's misrepresentations were critical to his judicial appointment. Any discipline other than removal would leave the public paying Judge Couwenberg for a judgeship he apparently procured through misrepresentations.

(8) Second, Judge Couwenberg lied in writing and in testimony under oath to the commission during the course of its investigation. The Supreme Court has noted that there "are few judicial actions in our view that provide greater justification for removal from office than the action of a judge in deliberately providing false information to the Commission in the course of its investigation." (Adams v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 10 Cal.4th at p. 914.) When his misrepresentation that he was in the Army in Vietnam was exposed, Judge Couwenberg told the commission—in testimony and in writing—that he had been employed by the CIA in Laos. When the CIA refuted this lie, Judge Couwenberg testified that he was in Laos working for some other agency—a representation that the masters found to be a lie. In addition, Judge Couwenberg volunteered in a statement under oath that he had a master's degree. At the hearing before the masters, he basically admitted that this was perjury. Any discipline other than removal for such blatant misrepresentations might well encourage others who are investigated by the commission to prevaricate and develop faulty memories.

Although some of the false information concerning Judge Couwenberg's education on his PDQ's reflected misrepresentations that he first made years ago, his fanciful military career is of a more recent vintage. The record suggests that initially Judge Couwenberg simply failed to correct others when they misrepresented that he had been in the Vietnam War and that this developed into affirming the misrepresentation. By 1997 Judge Couwenberg was emboldened to tell Judge Frisco that he had received a Purple Heart as a result of being injured in Vietnam while in the Army. By 2000, however, Judge Couwenberg had admitted that these representations were lies, and was asserting that he had been employed by the CIA in Laos. At the hearing before the masters, Judge Couwenberg contended that he was not employed by the CIA, but by some other agency in Laos. The masters found clear and convincing evidence that this was not credible. Thus, the record shows that Judge Couwenberg's inability to testify forthrightly about himself is an ongoing, rather than past, problem.

(9) Third, Judge Couwenberg's persistent misrepresentations might well require his removal from the bench, even if the misrepresentations had not been critical to his bid for a judicial appointment and had not been made to the commission in the course of its investigation. The Supreme Court has noted that honesty is a "minimum qualification[]" expected of every judge (Kloepfer v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 49 Cal.3d at p. 865). The commission has in a prior decision observed that the "public will not, and should not, respect a judicial officer who has been shown to have repeatedly lied for his own benefit."[10]

(10) Judge Couwenberg complains that the masters failed to consider the numerous letters and witnesses testifying to his exemplary judicial performance and urges that on the basis of such "mitigating" evidence, the commission allow him to remain on the bench. Even assuming that his judicial performance was exemplary, it would not excuse his misconduct. In Kloepfer v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 49 Cal.3d at page 865, the Supreme Court noted that "a good reputation for legal knowledge and administrative skills," although relevant to the degree of discipline, does not mitigate either willful misconduct or conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute. Here, the record indicates that Judge Couwenberg committed four counts of willful misconduct and four counts of prejudicial conduct in what appears to be a deliberate course of misrepresentation. He lied to become a judge, elaborated on his misrepresentations for his enrobing ceremony, and subsequently lied to the commission in an apparent attempt to frustrate its investigation. A public censure would not adequately convey the commission's reproval of Judge Couwenberg's course of misconduct. (See Spruance v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications (1975) 13 Cal.3d 778, 802 [119 Cal.Rptr. 841, 532 P.2d 1209].) The commission is convinced that protection of the public and the judiciary's reputation requires Judge Couwenberg's removal from the bench. (See Fletcher v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 19 Cal.4th at p. 921.)

CONCLUSION

(11) The commission orders Judge Patrick Couwenberg of the Los Angeles County Superior Court removed from the bench for (1) misrepresenting his educational background on his Personal Data Questionnaires when seeking judicial appointment; (2) falsely representing, in the course of seeking a judicial appointment in 1996, that he was a Vietnam veteran; (3) misrepresenting his educational background, legal experience and affiliations on his 1997 Judicial Data Questionnaire; (4) falsely representing to the judge who was to introduce him at the public enrobing ceremony that he was a Vietnam veteran who had received a Purple Heart; (5) falsely representing to attorneys that he went to Vietnam, had a master's degree in psychology, and had shrapnel in his groin received in military combat; and (6) making false statements about his education and military experience in letters and in testimony to the commission during its investigation of his conduct. The commission concludes that its responsibility to protect the public, to enforce rigorous standards of judicial conduct, and to maintain public confidence in the integrity of the judiciary, require that Judge Couwenberg be removed from office.

This decision shall constitute the order of removal of Judge Patrick Couwenberg and pursuant to the provisions of Commission on Judicial Performance rule 120(a) and article VI, section 18, subdivision (b) of the California Constitution, Judge Patrick Couwenberg is hereby disqualified from acting as a judge.

Commission members Mr. Michael A. Kahn, Judge Risë Jones Pichon, Ms. Lara Bergthold, Judge Madeleine I. Flier, Mr. Marshall B. Grossman, Mrs. Crystal Lui, Justice Vance W. Raye, and Ms. Ramona Ripston voted in favor of all the findings and conclusions expressed herein and in the removal of Judge Patrick Couwenberg from judicial office. Commission member Ms. Gayle Gutierrez did not participate in this proceeding. There are currently two public member vacancies.

The judge's petition for review by the Supreme Court was denied on January 16, 2002.

INQUIRY CONCERNING JUDGE MICHAEL E. PLATT

SUMMARY

A disciplinary proceeding was brought against a superior court judge.

The Commission on Judicial Performance ordered the judge's removal from office. The commission found that the judge had engaged in willful misconduct under Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (d). After having been privately admonished, the judge dismissed three traffic tickets, and attempted to dismiss a fourth, in violation of Cal. Code Jud. Ethics, canons 1, 2A, 2B(1), 2B(2), and 3B(7), and twice attempted to improperly influence another judicial officer, in violation of Cal. Code Jud. Ethics, canons 1, 2A, 2B(1), 2B(2) and 3B(7). None of the tickets would have come before him in the ordinary course of judicial business. The judge's insensitivity to ethical restraints was further reflected in his two attempts to influence other judicial officers on behalf of a friend or an acquaintance. The enforcement of rigorous standards of judicial conduct favored removal, as anything less might appear to countenance the judge's multiple acts of willful misconduct. (Opinion by Risë Jones Pichon, Chairperson.)

HEADNOTES

(1) Judges § 6.2—Discipline—Grounds—Sanctions.—Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (d), provides that a judge may be censured or removed from office for an act that constitutes willful misconduct in office or conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute. It further provides that a judge may be publicly or privately admonished for engaging in improper action.

(2) Judges § 6.2—Discipline—Willful Misconduct—Definition.—To commit willful misconduct, a judge must (1) engage in conduct that is unjudicial and (2) committed in bad faith, (3) while acting in a judicial capacity. Whether a judge's conduct is unjudicial is measured by reference to the California Code of Judicial Ethics and its canons. A judge acts in bad faith only by (1) performing a judicial act for a corrupt purpose (which is any purpose other than the faithful discharge of judicial duties), or (2) performing a judicial act with knowledge that the act is beyond the judge's lawful judicial power, or (3) performing a judicial act that exceeds the judge's lawful power with a conscious disregard for the limits of the judge's authority. A judge is acting in a judicial capacity while performing one of the functions, whether adjudicative or administrative in nature, that are associated with the position of a judge or when the judge uses or attempts to use the authority of the judicial office for an improper purpose.

(3) Judges § 6.2—Discipline—Prejudicial Conduct—Improper Actions—Definitions.—Prejudicial conduct by a judge is either conduct that a judge undertakes in good faith but that nevertheless would appear to an objective observer to be not only unjudicial conduct but conduct prejudicial to public esteem for the judicial office or willful conduct out of office, i.e., unjudicial conduct committed in bad faith by a judge not then acting in a judicial capacity. In this context, bad faith means a culpable mental state beyond mere negligence and consisting of either knowing or not caring that the conduct being undertaken is unjudicial and prejudicial to public esteem. In sum, to constitute prejudicial conduct, a judge's actions must bring the judicial office into disrepute, that is, the conduct would appear to an objective observer to be prejudicial to public esteem for the judicial office. An improper action is conduct that violates the California Code of Judicial Ethics, but that, when viewed from the perspective of an objective observer, does not constitute prejudicial conduct.

(4) Judges § 6—Discipline—Willful Misconduct—Ticket Fixing.—The judge's attempts to dismiss four separate traffic tickets constituted willful misconduct. In each instance, the judge, acting in a judicial capacity, sought to dismiss a traffic ticket that was not before him based on ex parte communications. In each instance, the judge acted in bad faith because he acted for a purpose other than the faithful discharge of his judicial duties, i.e., to benefit a friend.

(5) Judges § 6—Discipline—Improper Action—Ex Parte Communication.—The judge's conduct in relaying information concerning a family in dependency proceedings to the judge presiding over the case violated the prohibition on ex parte communications contained in Cal. Code Jud. Ethics, canon 3B(7), and was an improper action under Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (d). In light of the judge's arguably laudable reason for becoming involved in the proceeding and the fact that the communication in no way benefited either the judge or the family, it was not clear to the Commission on Judicial Performance that the communication brings the judiciary into disrepute.

(6) Judges § 6—Discipline—Conduct Prejudicial—Ex Parte Communication.—The judge's conduct in conveying information to a commissioner about his godfather who had received a traffic citation constituted an improper ex parte communication and an attempt to influence the commissioner and was conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute.

(7) Judges § 6—Discipline—Willful Misconduct—Request for Own Recognizance Release.—The judge's conduct in visiting another judge and asking that judge to grant an own recognizance release of a family member of an acquaintance of the judge constituted willful misconduct. It was undertaken in a judicial capacity because the judge was using the authority of his office for an improper purpose, and was done in bad faith because it was an attempt to benefit the relative of an acquaintance.

(8) Judges § 6.4—Discipline—Proceedings—Determining Appropriate Sanction—Factors.—When determining the appropriate resolution of a disciplinary proceeding, the Commission on Judicial Performance is guided by the California Supreme Court's pronouncement that the purpose of the proceeding is not punishment, but rather the protection of the public, the enforcement of rigorous standards of judicial conduct, and the maintenance of public confidence in the integrity and independence of the judicial system. In determining the appropriate discipline, each case must be considered on its own facts. The commission is guided in its evaluation of the facts by opinions of the California Supreme Court. In decisions concerning the removal of judges, the California Supreme Court has referred to several factors. It has often emphasized the number of acts of misconduct. The disposition of a case depends in large measure on the nature and number of charges found to be true. The number of a judge's wrongful acts is relevant to determining whether they were merely isolated occurrences or, instead, part of a course of conduct establishing lack of temperament and ability to perform judicial functions in an even-handed manner.

(9) Judges § 6.4—Discipline—Proceedings—Determining Appropriate Sanction—Factors Supporting Removal from Office.—Notwithstanding the California Supreme Court's emphasis on the number of a judge's offenses, an overarching consideration remains whether removal is necessary to protect the public, enforce rigorous standards of judicial conduct and maintain public confidence in the integrity and independence of the judicial system. The court would hesitate to remove a judge who showed himself or herself ready, willing, and able to reform under a less severe sanction. The ability to reform or, conversely, the likelihood that the judge will reoffend if permitted to remain on the bench, thus emerges as a second important factor in deciding whether the removal sanction should be applied. An isolated instance of misconduct may arise from a momentary ethical lapse, but a continuing pattern reflects poor judgment and lack of judicial temperament. The California Supreme Court has identified two additional factors suggesting inability to reform and hence unsuitability for judicial office. A judge's failure to appreciate or admit to the impropriety of his or her acts indicates a lack of capacity to reform. The failure of past sanctions to effect a change in conduct also suggests a lack of ability to reform and unsuitability for judicial office. The court has made note of prior discipline in deciding whether removal is appropriate.

(10) Judges § 8—Standard of Conduct.—Since the advent of the Commission on Judicial Performance, judges have been held to a higher standard of conduct than attorneys. The California Supreme Court expects all judges to comply with the canons, and failure to do so suggests performance below the minimum level necessary to maintain public confidence in the administration of justice.

(11) Judges § 6.2—Discipline—Grounds—Ticket Fixing.—Judges are not insulated from society. Most, if not all, judges have friends and acquaintances who on occasion receive traffic tickets or have other difficulties that result in court appearances. Thus, there is always a temptation to do a friend a favor, to put in a good word with the judicial officer who will preside over a traffic ticket. Accordingly, the Commission on Judicial Performance's response to proven instances of ticket fixing should discourage requests for favors and strengthen judicial resistance to such requests. Ticket fixing is among the most obvious forms of abuse of judicial authority. It is an abuse that citizens unquestionably understand and are suspicious about. An ordinary citizen would not respect a judge who dismissed multiple tickets, that were not even before him or her, and then claimed that he or she did not recognize that doing so was wrong. The commission's responsibility for the protection of the public weighs against subjecting future litigants, witnesses, the public, and court staff to a judge who is dishonest or who, after a career in the district attorney's office and five years on the bench, cannot recognize the impropriety of ticket fixing when he or she does it.

(12) Judges § 6.4—Discipline—Proceedings—Mitigating Factors.—While factors in mitigation do not excuse a judge's willful misconduct, the Commission on Judicial Performance may take them into account in considering the totality of the circumstances that are pertinent to determining the appropriate discipline.

(13) Judges § 6.4—Discipline—Proceedings—Removal from Office—Ticket Fixing—Attempts to Influence Other Judicial Officers.—The Commission on Judicial Performance removed the judge from office because, after having been privately admonished, the judge dismissed three traffic tickets, and attempted to dismiss a fourth, and twice attempted to improperly influence another judicial officer. In each instance, the judge had the opportunity to consider alternatives before he acted. Furthermore, none of the tickets would have come before him in the ordinary course of judicial business. Although the judge maintained that when he dismissed the tickets, he did not see any ethical problems with his actions, it was inconceivable that he did not know that ticket fixing is wrong.

OPINION

PICHON, Chairperson.—This disciplinary matter concerns Judge Michael E. Platt, a judge of the San Joaquin County Superior Court. Judge Platt was charged with four counts of ticket fixing, three counts of attempting to influence other jurists, and one count of improperly issuing a stay in a detainer proceeding.

The Commission on Judicial Performance finds that the four charges of ticket fixing and three charges of attempting to influence other jurists are supported by clear and convincing evidence. The commission concludes that Judge Platt's actions on four separate traffic tickets and on one of his attempts to influence another jurist constitute acts of willful misconduct under article VI, section 18, subdivision (d) of the California Constitution. For the reasons set forth in this decision, the commission hereby removes Judge Michael E. Platt from the bench.

PROCEDURAL HISTORY

Judge Platt was appointed to the San Joaquin County Superior Court in September 1994. On October 27, 1997, the commission sent Judge Platt a notice of intended public admonishment for soliciting fundraising contributions from attorneys and court staff. On November 4, 1997, Judge Platt sent the commission a letter accepting the private admonishment and assuring the commission that he would conduct himself and his affairs in compliance with the California Code of Judicial Ethics.

In May 2001, the commission sent a preliminary investigation letter to Judge Platt. Following his response, a second preliminary investigation letter was sent to Judge Platt in June 2001. After considering his response, the commission, on August 31, 2001, issued a notice of formal proceedings. Judge Platt filed his answer on September 18, 2001.

On October 16, 2001, the commission sent another preliminary investigation letter to Judge Platt, to which he responded on November 1, 2001. The commission issued a first amended notice of formal proceedings and Judge Platt filed his answer on December 19, 2001.

Meanwhile on October 16, 2001, the Supreme Court, at the commission's request, appointed Justice Arthur G. Scotland of the Court of Appeal, Third Appellate District (presiding), Judge Jamie A. Jacobs-May of the Superior Court of Santa Clara County, and Judge Peter L. Spinetta of the Superior Court of Contra Costa County, as special masters. A hearing was held before the special masters from February 26 through February 28, 2002, in Sacramento, California. Mr. Jack Coyle and Mr. Brad Battson of the commission's office of trial counsel presented the case in support of the charges. Judge Platt was represented by Mr. Albert M. Ellis, of the Law Offices of Hakeem, Ellis and Marengo in Stockton, California. On April 19, 2002, the masters filed their 50-page report with the commission.

Following the receipt of objections and briefs from Judge Platt and the office of trial counsel, the matter was argued before the commission on June 26, 2002. Mr. Coyle presented argument on behalf of trial counsel. Mr. Ellis represented Judge Platt, and Judge Platt also spoke in his own behalf.

FINDINGS OF FACT

A. Count One

The notice of formal proceedings alleges, and Judge Platt admits, that he had a personal relationship with Mr. G, including the fact that in October 1998, Mr. G loaned Judge Platt approximately $3,500, which debt was discharged in July 1999 by way of bankruptcy proceedings.

On or after December 28, 1999, Mrs. G (Mr. G's wife) telephoned Judge Platt and informed the judge that her niece, Ms. M, had received a speeding ticket in San Joaquin County. Although Ms. M's ticket would not have come before Judge Platt for any purpose in the regular course of judicial business, Judge Platt instructed his clerk, "Clerk N," to locate the court records of the ticket. Subsequently, on or about February 29, 2000, Judge Platt instructed Clerk N to dismiss Ms. M's ticket. As a result, the ticket was dismissed on the court's own motion without an appearance by Ms. M and without a hearing.

The masters noted that Judge Platt testified that, although he now realizes that dismissing the ticket was wrong, he did not perceive any legal or ethical problem when he told his clerk to dismiss the ticket in February 2000. Judge Platt testified that Mrs. G never asked him to dismiss the traffic ticket, and that his decision to dismiss the ticket was not influenced by any sense of obligation to Mr. G's family due to the fact that the loan received from Mr. G was never repaid and had been discharged in bankruptcy. Judge Platt testified that he dismissed the ticket solely because Ms. M had left or was leaving for school in Southern California and would be gone for an extended period of time.

The masters found that Judge Platt's "explanation for dismissing Ms. M's ticket, and his claim that he did not realize at the time his action was wrong, are after-the-fact rationalizations which lack credibility." They noted that common experience and common sense indicate that "ticket fixing is a quintessential bad act of a judge. It is an abuse of power that citizens unquestionably understand and are suspicious about." Judge Platt was described as a careful decision maker who has a good knowledge of the law. Yet he claims that he did not realize that dismissing Ms. M's ticket was improper. The masters found that "it is inconceivable he did not know the obvious, that ticket fixing was wrong when he dismissed Ms. M's traffic ticket."

The masters offered four additional grounds for their finding. First, they found that Judge Platt offered no adequate justification for the act. Judge Platt acknowledged that judges ordinarily do not act on cases which are not pending before them, that Ms. M's departure for Southern California did not justify the dismissal of her ticket, and that there were other solutions available. Second, the masters cited the court staff's reaction to Judge Platt's conduct. The masters explained that Judge Platt had to ask Clerk N several times if she had found Ms. M's ticket and that she later rebuffed Judge Platt's request for her to inquire into the status of Mr. A's ticket (see count six). Although Clerk N never told Judge Platt about her discomfort with his conduct, the masters "infer that Platt recognized Clerk N's reluctance because he then approached Clerk G, rather than Clerk N, on December 26, 2000, about the ticket received by Mrs. G"[1] (see count three).

Third, the masters noted Clerk G's testimony that Judge Platt initially told her that Mrs. G was the wife of a police officer and that when Judge Platt asked her to dismiss Mrs. G's ticket he told her to keep the matter "just between you and me." The masters were of the opinion that both statements suggested a consciousness of wrongdoing. Judge Platt denied the statement about Mr. G, but the masters found Clerk G's testimony more credible. Judge Platt in his testimony conceded that he must have said something to the effect of the second statement. Finally, the masters noted that, although it obviously was wrong, "Judge Platt's dismissal of Ms. M's ticket was consistent with his belief in the need, some might say his compulsion, to help others even at his own risk." The commission adopts the masters' findings of fact on count one.

[1] The masters further note that Judge Platt explained that he called "Clerk G" because he was unable to contact Clerk N, who he believed was on vacation or had taken a few days off. Clerk N, however, testified that she was at work on that date. Also, when Clerk G called Clerk N to inquire why Judge Platt had contacted her, Clerk N responded that the judge knew that she, Clerk N, would not enter the dismissal of Mrs. G's ticket.

B. Count Two

The notice of formal proceedings alleges, and Judge Platt admits that, sometime on or after February 8, 2000, Mrs. G telephoned Judge Platt and informed him that her husband, Mr. G, had received a speeding ticket in San Joaquin County. Although Mr. G's ticket would not have come before Judge Platt for any purpose in the regular course of judicial business, Judge Platt instructed his clerk, Clerk N, to locate the court records of the speeding ticket. Subsequently, on or about February 29, 2000, Judge Platt instructed Clerk N to dismiss Mr. G's ticket. As a result, the ticket was dismissed on the court's own motion without an appearance by Mr. G and without a hearing.

Judge Platt testified before the masters that, although he now realizes that dismissing the ticket was wrong, at the time he dismissed it he did not perceive any legal or ethical problem when he instructed his clerk to dismiss the ticket. The masters noted that, according to Judge Platt, "he dismissed the ticket due to the fact that [Mr. G], a professional baseball player who was Platt's friend, was going to be out of the state for the duration of the baseball season."

The masters concluded, as they did in count one, that at the time he dismissed Mr. G's traffic ticket, Judge Platt "knew this act was unjustified and wrong, but he nonetheless dismissed the ticket to help a friend (rather than for any personal gain)." They also found that Judge Platt's act had a negative effect on the way the public perceives the integrity and impartiality of judges. The commission adopts the masters' findings of fact on count two.

C. Count Three

The notice of formal proceedings alleges, and Judge Platt admits that, sometime on or after November 16, 2000, Mrs. G telephoned Judge Platt and informed him that she had received a speeding ticket in San Joaquin County. Although Mrs. G's ticket would not have come before Judge Platt for any purpose in the regular course of judicial business, Judge Platt instructed his clerk, Clerk N, to locate the court records of the speeding ticket. Subsequently on December 26, 2000, Judge Platt telephoned his former courtroom clerk, Clerk G, then the courtroom clerk for another judge, and told her that he wanted to be certain that Mrs. G would be eligible for traffic school in connection with her outstanding traffic ticket. Clerk G made an entry on the court records that Mrs. G had phoned and would be in to sign up for traffic school and that Judge Platt had "OK'd" her attendance at traffic school. On January 9, 2001, Judge Platt telephoned Clerk G and told her that he wanted Mrs. G's ticket dismissed. He asked Clerk G to enter the dismissal on the court records and told her to keep the matter between him and her. Clerk G subsequently decided not to enter the dismissal and so informed Judge Platt.

Judge Platt testified before the masters that, although he now realizes that directing Clerk G to dismiss Mrs. G's ticket was wrong, he did not perceive any legal or ethical problem when he instructed Clerk G to do so in January 2001. The masters noted that, according to Judge Platt, "he believed it was appropriate to dismiss [Mrs. G's] ticket because she told him that she had missed the traffic school appearance and was leaving the state with her husband to attend spring training."

The masters concluded, as they did in counts one and two, that at the time he instructed Clerk G to dismiss Mrs. G's ticket, Judge Platt "knew this act was unjustified and wrong, but he nonetheless sought to dismiss the ticket to help a friend (rather than for any personal gain)." They also found that Judge Platt's act had a negative effect on the way the public perceives the integrity and impartiality of judges. The commission adopts the masters' findings of fact on count three.

D. Count Four

The notice of formal proceedings alleges, and Judge Platt admits, the following facts. Sometime after March 27, 2000, Judge Platt's bailiff, Deputy A, informed him that F had received a speeding ticket in San Joaquin County. F was the minor son of a reserve deputy sheriff who had acted as Judge Platt's bailiff on occasion. Deputy A explained the circumstances of F receiving a speeding ticket and asked Judge Platt if he could help. Thereafter, Judge Platt contacted the California Highway Patrol officer who had issued the speeding ticket to F and discussed the case with him ex parte. Although the speeding ticket would not have come before Judge Platt for any purpose in the regular course of judicial business, on or about May 23, 2000, Judge Platt dismissed or directed the dismissal of the speeding ticket issued to F without a hearing.

The masters explained that Deputy A felt some responsibility for F's ticket or felt bad about it because the ticket was received while F was on an errand for Deputy A and F's father. After Deputy A explained the circumstances of the ticket to Judge Platt and asked if anything could be done about it, Judge Platt told Deputy A to get the citation number and stated that he would look into it when the matter got close to the court date. Deputy A or F's father told Judge Platt that F had done well in school, was a productive young man who was graduating from high school, was heading to USC (University of Southern California), and was scheduled to leave for Southern California or possibly New Zealand for water polo competitions or something to that effect.

When Deputy A told Judge Platt that F had a court date to appear regarding the ticket, Judge Platt telephoned the California Highway Patrol officer who issued the ticket. Judge Platt indicated that he called the officer to "find out how the minor had reacted and find out what the specific circumstances were" in order to "make a determination about whether anything could be done with the case or should be done with the case." The officer indicated that F's demeanor was appropriate for somebody receiving a citation and that F acknowledged that he was speeding. Based on the information he received from the officer, Judge Platt decided to dismiss the ticket. He asked the officer if the officer had any objection to the ticket being dismissed and the officer said no. Judge Platt had identified himself as a judge, but he did not tell the officer that he was not the judge assigned to F's case.

The masters noted that, although the matter was not pending before him, Judge Platt claimed he had authority to dismiss the ticket because he was the presiding judge of the juvenile court and the commissioners who handled traffic matters were under the presiding judge's position. The masters found, however, that "at the time he dismissed the minor's ticket, Platt was handling an adult murder trial, and Judge Harrington and/or Judge Parker were handling juvenile court matters."

The masters concluded, as they did in counts one, two and three, that at the time he dismissed or directed the dismissal of F's speeding ticket, Judge Platt "knew this act was wrong, but he nonetheless had the ticket dismissed to help the son of an acquaintance (rather than for any personal gain)." They also found that Judge Platt's act had a negative effect on the way the public perceives the integrity and impartiality of judges. The commission adopts the masters' findings of fact on count four.

E. Count Five

The notice of formal proceedings alleges, and Judge Platt admits, the following facts. On or about July 16, 1998, Judge Platt telephoned Judge Holland at his chambers in Stockton, where Judge Holland was assigned to the juvenile dependency calendar. Judge Platt told him that a case that was assigned to him involved the family of a former client (Mr. S) from when Judge Platt had been in private practice as an attorney. Judge Platt told Judge Holland that Mr. or Mrs. S had contacted him regarding their two sons who were dependents of the court; that Mr. S had allegedly absconded with the younger child; that the family was dysfunctional; that Judge Platt had advised Mr. S to return and to cooperate with child protective services; and that Mr. or Mrs. S had inquired when they would be seeing a judge. Judge Holland told Judge Platt that the matter would be heard that day or the next, that the parents would be assigned counsel, and that a date would be scheduled for a jurisdictional hearing.

The notice of formal proceedings further alleges that, when the matter came before Judge Holland the next day, during the hearing Judge Platt "entered Judge Holland's courtroom through a side door and remained in the courtroom near the door, creating the impression that [he was] in a special position to influence the judge and that [he was] attempting to lend the prestige of [his] judicial office to advance the interests of Mr. S or his family." Judge Platt admits, and the masters found, that Judge Platt did briefly stand in the doorway to Judge Holland's court, but that he did so solely to make sure that the S family had remained in the court and that he left almost immediately after determining that they were there. The masters found that Judge Platt's appearance did not create the impression that Platt was in a special position to influence Judge Holland, as the S family did not see him and there was a lack of evidence to establish that anyone else in the courtroom, other than Judge Holland, actually saw Judge Platt.

Judge Platt testified that late in the afternoon of July 16, 1998, Mrs. S telephoned him in his chambers and told him one of her sons was the subject of a pending juvenile dependency proceeding. Mrs. S expressed concern that the father and son had "taken off" and were "going to run" rather than appear at the dependency hearing. Mrs. S asked what could be done about this problem. Judge Platt told her to locate her husband and son and talk them into coming to court and cooperating. She indicated that they had no faith in the system, and Judge Platt told her that if they would be more comfortable, they could come to his chambers and he would take them to the dependency proceeding. Judge Platt then checked with the juvenile court, determined that the proceeding was to be held the next morning before Judge Holland, and telephoned Judge Holland.

The following morning Mr. S and his son came to Judge Platt's courtroom. He escorted them to Judge Holland's courtroom and told them to remain there until their case was called. Judge Platt returned to his courtroom to do his morning calendar. At the midmorning break, Judge Platt went back to Judge Holland's courtroom and looked into the courtroom through an open side door that led into a private hallway. The S family was at the counsel table with their backs to him. After seeing that they were there, Judge Platt left without saying anything to anyone. The commission adopts the masters' findings of fact on count five.

F. Count Six

The notice of formal proceedings alleges that sometime in 1999 or 2000, Judge Platt telephoned Commissioner Kronlund, who was assigned to the Tracy branch of the San Joaquin Superior Court. Judge Platt said he was calling about a friend of his, Mr. A, whom he referred to as his godfather. Judge Platt asked the commissioner questions concerning the handling of traffic tickets, in particular the handling of late fees. Mr. A had received a speeding ticket on October 12, 1999. He appeared before Commissioner Kronlund in April 2000, pled guilty to the speeding ticket, and was ordered to pay a fine and fees, including a late fee.

Judge Platt—in both his answer and testimony—admits to the factual allegations, but denies that he asked the commissioner to do anything with respect to the traffic ticket or that he in any way attempted to influence her.

Judge Platt testified that Mr. A is his godfather. At some point, Mr. A told Judge Platt that he had received a traffic ticket, it was old, and he had never gone to court about it. Mr. A wanted to find out whom he could contact to schedule a court appearance. Judge Platt told him that he did not know how the Tracy court set up its traffic calendar, but that he would find out. Because the ticket was old, Judge Platt assumed a late fee would be an issue. Judge Platt called Commissioner Kronlund because they had previously been colleagues in the district attorney's office and he knew she would be able to tell him how Mr. A could get the matter on the calendar. Judge Platt did not know whether she would be the commissioner who would ultimately adjudicate Mr. A's ticket. The commissioner told him that a personal appearance would have to be made in the clerk's office on a Thursday in order to put the matter on the calendar, and she may have mentioned how late fees were handled. Judge Platt relayed the information to Mr. A and his wife, but he did not tell Mr. A that he had contacted Commissioner Kronlund to get the information.

In his testimony before the masters, Judge Platt explained his conversation with Commissioner Kronlund as follows:

"Q. I may have missed this, but, Judge Platt what did you tell the Commissioner was your reason for calling?

"A. To find out what date and time traffic citations appear so that somebody could put it on the calendar, and I mentioned—and I believe I did mention his name.

"Q. Did you mention you had some relationship to this individual?

"A. I believe so, either as a very close friend—I don't know that I said he was my godfather, but certainly I said it was somebody that I knew and was active in the community, and that was the reason I gave the name, is I knew that Barbara or that Commissioner Kronlund was active in the community, and that that individual at some point, I assumed, would be putting something on the calendar down there, and I didn't know that it was or wasn't her calendar, but that certainly was the information that I provided and asked for."

In her stipulation in lieu of testimony, Commissioner Kronlund recalled receiving a phone call from Judge Platt about his friend, Mr. A, having received a traffic ticket. She recalled that he asked questions about how late fees in traffic cases were determined and whether there was a "going rate." Commissioner Kronlund indicated that Judge Platt did not ask her "to do anything with the ticket, such as dismissing it or taking care of the ticket," and that she did not know "whether [Mr. A] to whom Judge Platt referred ever showed up in her courtroom."

The commission adopts the masters' findings that Judge Platt telephoned Commissioner Kronlund and mentioned that his friend, Mr. A, had received a traffic ticket.

G. Count Seven

The notice of formal proceedings alleges that, at the end of a workday in approximately 1999, Judge Platt approached a clerk in the clerk's office concerning a stay of execution of an order that had been issued by Judge Smith in an unlawful detainer action. Judge Smith had granted the landlord possession of the premises. Judge Platt approached the clerk shortly after Judge Smith had denied the tenant's request for a stay of execution of her order. The notice alleges that the tenant was a personal acquaintance of Judge Platt's and accompanied him on his visit to the clerk. Judge Platt instructed the clerk to enter his order granting a stay, effectively vacating Judge Smith's order.

The masters found that Judge Platt did enter a stay of execution in the unlawful detainer action, but that there was nothing improper in his doing so. They found that Judge Platt entered the clerk's office in order to pick up his mail and that he overheard a person at the public counter speaking in a raised voice and giving the clerk a "hard time." Instead of going to the mail area, Judge Platt turned to the clerk and asked if she needed assistance. The clerk explained that the person was requesting a stay of an eviction order, which required that he be out by 8:00 a.m. the following morning. As he spoke to the clerk, Judge Platt recognized the person who was seeking the stay as someone he had seen refereeing youth basketball games. Judge Platt had never handled an unlawful detainer action, but the person was persistent, and the clerk indicated that both Judge Smith and the judges in the other civil departments, who reviewed such emergency requests, had left for the day. The clerk indicated that any judge could look at the request and make a determination whether to grant a stay. Judge Platt decided to grant the temporary stay.

The masters found that there was a lack of clear and convincing proof to support the allegations in count seven that Judge Platt acted at the ex parte request of a personal acquaintance in a matter not pending before him. Trial counsel agrees. The commission adopts the masters' findings on count seven and hereby dismisses count seven.

H. Count Eight

The notice of formal proceedings alleges that, during the spring or summer of 2000, Judge Platt visited Judge James E. Hammerstone, Jr., at his chambers in the Stockton branch of the court. Judge Platt told Judge Hammerstone that a personal acquaintance of Judge Platt's, or a family member of the acquaintance, was being held in the county jail for a theft-related offense. Judge Platt asked Judge Hammerstone to grant an own recognizance (O.R.) release or to call the jail and order the individual released on her own recognizance. Judge Hammerstone declined to do so.

Judge Platt, in his answer and his testimony, admits that he visited Judge Hammerstone and told him that a family member of an acquaintance was being held in the county jail and raised the issue of a release on one's own recognizance. Judge Platt, however, contends that he told Judge Hammerstone that the family would be requesting a release on her own recognizance, and that he was not vouching for them.[2]

Judge Hammerstone, however, was firm in his testimony that Judge Platt did ask him to grant the relative release on her own recognizance.

[2] Judge Platt testified before the masters: "[W]hen I handled the arraignment calendar for almost two years or two-and-a-half years, on countless occasions people would mention they knew somebody, and I wanted to make sure that Judge Hammerstone knew that if that was done I knew these people, I did not know the individual that was arrested, I wasn't vouching for them."

The masters concluded: "We find credible and convincing Judge Hammerstone's testimony that Judge Platt made an unexpected ex parte visit to Hammerstone's chambers and asked Hammerstone to grant an O.R. release for a family member of an acquaintance of Platt's. Not only did Platt's testimony to the contrary lack credibility, it was inconsistent with Platt's personality trait which motivates him to help others in need. . . . In every other alleged incident, Platt sought to help a friend or acquaintance. But Platt claimed that, in this instance, he in effect was trying to undermine the effort of an acquaintance to receive help for a problem. Rather than ask Hammerstone to grant an O.R. release, Platt went all the way to Hammerstone's chambers simply to tell him that Platt had only seen the family at church and that Hammerstone could factor this into whatever information the family gave him about their relationship with Platt. In other words, Platt 'wasn't vouching for them' and did not want Hammerstone to overvalue the fact that they knew Platt, or otherwise be misled by the information. Simply stated, we find this unbelievable."

The commission adopts the masters' findings of fact on count eight.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

(1) The California Constitution, article VI, section 18, subdivision (d) provides that a judge may be censured or removed from office for an act that constitutes "willful misconduct in office" or "conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute." It further provides that a judge may be publicly or privately admonished for engaging in "improper action." (Ibid.)

(2) A judge, to commit willful misconduct, "must (1) engage in conduct that is unjudicial and (2) committed in bad faith, (3) while acting in a judicial capacity." (Broadman v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1998) 18 Cal.4th 1079, 1091 [77 Cal.Rptr.2d 408, 959 P.2d 715] (Broadman).) Whether a judge's conduct is "unjudicial" is measured by reference to the California Code of Judicial Ethics and its canons. (Dodds v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1995) 12 Cal.4th 163, 172 [48 Cal.Rptr.2d 106, 906 P.2d 1260] (Dodds); accord, Oberholzer v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1999) 20 Cal.4th 371, 395 [84 Cal.Rptr.2d 466, 975 P.2d 663].) "A judge acts in bad faith only by (1) performing a judicial act for a corrupt purpose (which is any purpose other than the faithful discharge of judicial duties), or (2) performing a judicial act with knowledge that the act is beyond the judge's lawful judicial power, or (3) performing a judicial act that exceeds the judge's lawful power with a conscious disregard for the limits of the judge's authority." (Broadman, supra, 18 Cal.4th at p. 1092.) "A judge is acting in a judicial capacity while performing one of the functions, whether adjudicative or administrative in nature, that are associated with the position of a judge or when the judge uses or attempts to use the authority of the judicial office for an improper purpose." (Id. at p. 1104, citing Dodds, supra, 12 Cal.4th at p. 172.)

(3) The Supreme Court has defined "prejudicial conduct" as follows: "Prejudicial conduct is 'either "conduct which a judge undertakes in good faith but which nevertheless would appear to an objective observer to be not only unjudicial conduct but conduct prejudicial to public esteem for the judicial office" [citation] or "willful misconduct out of office, i.e., unjudicial conduct committed in bad faith by a judge not then acting in a judicial capacity" [citation].' (Doan v. Commission on Judicial Performance [(1995)] 11 Cal.4th [294,] 312 [45 Cal.Rptr.2d 254, 902 P.2d 272], original italics (Doan).) In this context, bad faith means a culpable mental state beyond mere negligence and consisting of either knowing or not caring that the conduct being undertaken is unjudicial and prejudicial to public esteem. In sum, to constitute prejudicial conduct, a judge's actions must bring 'the judicial office into disrepute,' that is, the conduct would appear to an objective observer to be prejudicial to ' "public esteem for the judicial office." ' (Kennick v. Commission on Judicial Performance [(1990)] 50 Cal.3d [297,] 314 [267 Cal.Rptr. 293, 787 P.2d 591].)" (Broadman, supra, 18 Cal.4th at pp. 1092–1093.)

An improper action is conduct that violates the California Code of Judicial Ethics, but which, when viewed "from the perspective of an objective observer," does not constitute prejudicial conduct. (Adams v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1995) 10 Cal.4th 866, 899 [42 Cal.Rptr.2d 606, 897 P.2d 544] (Adams).)

A. Counts One Through Four

(4) Each of Judge Platt's attempts to dismiss the four separate traffic tickets violated canon 1 (a judge shall uphold the integrity of the judiciary), canon 2A (a judge shall respect and comply with the law and act at all times in a manner that promotes public confidence in the integrity and impartiality of the judiciary), canon 2B(1) (a judge shall not allow family, social, or other relationships to influence the judge's judicial conduct or judgment; a judge shall not convey, or permit others to convey, that any individual is in a special position to influence the judge), canon 2B(2) (a judge shall not lend the prestige of judicial office to advance the personal interests of others), and canon 3B(7) (a judge shall perform the duties of judicial office impartially by permitting every person who has a legal interest in a proceeding, including the prosecuting authority, a full right to be heard according to law) of the California Code of Judicial Ethics.

Judge Platt's conduct concerning the four separate traffic tickets constitutes willful misconduct. In each instance, Judge Platt, acting in his judicial capacity, sought to dismiss a traffic ticket that was not before him based on ex parte communications. The masters found, and the commission agrees, that in each instance Judge Platt acted in bad faith because he acted for a purpose other than the faithful discharge of his judicial duties, "i.e. to benefit a friend." In addition, the masters concluded, and the commission agrees, that Judge Platt's actions had a negative effect on the way the public perceives the integrity and impartiality of judges.

B. Count Five

The masters concluded, and the commission agrees, that Judge Platt's appearance in the doorway of Judge Holland's courtroom did not create the impression that Judge Platt was in a special position to influence Judge Holland and that Judge Platt was not consciously attempting to influence his decision in the case or to lend the prestige of his judicial office to advance the interests of the S family. In sum, there is insufficient evidence to support any conclusion of unjudicial conduct based on Judge Platt's appearance in a side doorway of Judge Holland's courtroom during a proceeding involving the S family.

(5) The evidence before the commission, however, supports the conclusion that Judge Platt, in relaying information concerning the S family to Judge Holland in the initial phone call that he placed to Judge Holland, violated the California Code of Judicial Ethics. The masters found (as Judge Platt testified) that he had already learned from the clerk that the S family matter would be before Judge Holland the next morning when he telephoned Judge Holland. In his verified answer, Judge Platt admits that he "informed Judge Holland that he had been contacted by the family of Mr. S regarding their two sons who were dependents of the court; that Mr. S allegedly had absconded with the younger child; that the family was dysfunctional; that [Judge Platt] had advised Mr. S to return the boy and to cooperate with child protective services; and that Mr. or Mrs. S had inquired when they would be seeing a judge."

Count five alleges that Judge Platt's actions violated canon 3B(7) of the California Code of Judicial Ethics, which includes a proscription against ex parte communications. In his response brief to the commission, Judge Platt argues that the masters' finding that he "became involved in the S family dependency matter for the sole reason of ensuring that the father and son would come to court rather than hide from authorities," supports a conclusion that his phone conversation with Judge Holland was permissible under canon 3B(7)(b), which provides that a "judge may consult with court personnel whose function is to aid the judge in carrying out the judge's adjudicative responsibilities or with other judges."

This argument is not well taken because the information conveyed—that the family was dysfunctional, the father had absconded with the son and that Judge Platt had advised them to return—in no way furthered the purpose of "ensuring that the father and son would come to court" and in no way facilitated either Judge Platt's or Judge Holland's "adjudicative responsibilities."[3] In fact, the ex parte conveyance of information relevant to the substance of the underlying issues before Judge Holland compromised his impartiality. Judge Holland could do nothing until the case was called the following morning and the father and son either appeared or did not appear. Had they not appeared, Judge Holland would have been placed in the position of having to determine what action to take without considering the improper ex parte communication from Judge Platt that the father and son had absconded and that Judge Platt had advised them to appear in court.

The commission concludes that Judge Platt's ex parte conveyance of information concerning the S family to Judge Holland violated canon 3B(7) and canon 2 (a judge shall avoid impropriety and the appearance of impropriety in all of the judge's activity) of the California Code of Judicial Ethics.

The commission further concludes that this conveyance of substantive information constitutes an improper action under article VI, section 18, subdivision (d) of the California Constitution. The communication violated the California Code of Judicial Ethics, but in light of Judge Platt's arguably laudable reason for becoming involved in the proceeding and the fact that the communication in no way benefited either Judge Platt or the S family, the commission concludes that it is not clear that the communication brings the judiciary into disrepute.

C. Count Six

(6) Judge Platt admits to contacting Commissioner Kronlund, asking her questions concerning the handling of traffic matters and informing her that his godfather, Mr. A, had a traffic ticket and that he was active in the community. The commission concludes that in conveying this information to the commissioner, Judge Platt violated the California Code of Judicial Ethics.

The masters found that Judge Platt "did not know, or attempt to find out, what commissioner would handle Mr. A's ticket when it was calendared," [3] As noted in trial counsel's reply brief, the consultation exception of California Code of Judicial Ethics canon 3B(7)(b) cannot apply because Judge Platt, due to his relationship to the S family, was disqualified from acting in its case.

"did not talk with Kronlund about the specific case pending before her," and "did not ask her to take any action on the ticket." The commission accepts these findings, but they do not compel a conclusion that Judge Platt did not intend to attempt to influence the commissioner. Judge Platt could have learned all about the procedures from Commissioner Kronlund (or the clerk's office) without revealing that he was calling on behalf of his godfather. Judge Platt does not offer any legitimate reason for telling the commissioner about Mr. A.[4] Furthermore, the fact that Commissioner Kronlund was not influenced does not mean that she did not perceive the telephone call as an attempt to influence.[5]

The commission agrees with former Judge David M. Rothman when he writes in California Judicial Conduct Handbook (2d ed. 1999) section 5.10, pages 131–132: "A traffic referee is about to hear a speeding ticket case. A judge sends a note to the referee indicating that the offender is a very good citizen. What should the referee do? This is an inappropriate ex parte communication and the judge who sent the note has engaged in judicial misconduct by attempting to influence another judicial officer. The contact must be disclosed to the parties. In addition, although recusal is not mandatory, it must be considered depending on consideration of the factors set forth in Code of Civil Procedure sections 170.1(a)(1), (6)." In the example, the judge does not explicitly ask the referee to do anything. The judge simply mentions that the offender is a "very good citizen." The attempt to influence is inherent in the unsolicited telephone call and the ex parte conveyance of positive information about the offender. The judge's failure to explicitly ask the referee to do anything does not change the nature of the communication.

[4] In his response brief, Judge Platt indicates that he wanted Commissioner Kronlund to be aware of Mr. A's name so that if he "came to court she would be able to hear it or not hear it." He suggests that if he had not identified Mr. A in connection with the inquiry, the commissioner "would not have been in a position to properly address the fact of their brief conversation regarding the citation, and to disclose it to the parties if necessary pursuant to canon 3B(7)(d)(ii)." Canon 3B(7)(d)(ii) of the California Code of Judicial Ethics requires the disclosure of ex parte communications. A general inquiry concerning the procedures for handling traffic tickets does not become an ex parte communication until or unless it is linked to some specific case. Thus, Judge Platt appears to be admitting that by informing the commissioner that he was calling on behalf of Mr. A, he was making an ex parte communication that the commissioner might have to disclose under the canon. Absent some legitimate reason for the conveyance of the information, such an ex parte communication is a violation of the California Code of Judicial Ethics.

[5] Commissioner Kronlund did not appear before the masters. Instead, the parties submitted a stipulation in lieu of testimony. The stipulation recites that "Judge Platt did not ask Commissioner Kronlund to do anything with the ticket, such as dismissing or taking care of the ticket." This does not mean that the commissioner did not recognize the phone call from the judge on behalf of his friend as an attempt to influence, even though she resisted the attempt.

The commission concludes that Judge Platt's conveyance of information to Commissioner Kronlund regarding Mr. A violated canons 1, 2A, 2B(1), 2B(2) and 3B(7) of the California Code of Judicial Ethics.

The commission further concludes that Judge Platt's conduct constitutes conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute. Prejudicial conduct includes " ' "conduct which a judge undertakes in good faith but which nevertheless would appear to an objective observer to be not only unjudicial conduct but conduct prejudicial to public esteem for the judicial office." ' "[6] Even accepting that Judge Platt conveyed the information in "good faith," this was a violation of the California Code of Judicial Ethics. In addition, this type of subtle attempt to influence is unquestionably prejudicial to public esteem for the judicial office. As the masters noted, ticket fixing "is a quintessential bad act of a judge," and an "abuse of power that citizens unquestionably understand and are suspicious about." The public will perceive an attempt to influence the disposition of a ticket whenever a judge calls a commissioner—who may or may not hear a traffic ticket—and tells her that the offender is his godfather and active in the community, even if the judge does not explicitly ask the commissioner to do anything.

D. Count Eight

(7) The commission agrees with the masters that Judge Platt, in visiting Judge Hammerstone and asking him to grant an O.R. release, was attempting to use the prestige of his office to advance the personal interests of an acquaintance and that his conduct violated canons 1, 2A, 2B(1), 2B(2) and 3B(7) of the California Code of Judicial Ethics.

Judge Platt's conduct constitutes willful misconduct in office. The masters noted that Judge Platt was acting in a judicial capacity "because he was 'us[ing] the authority of [his] judicial office for an improper purpose.' (Broadman v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 18 Cal.4th at p. 1104, [citing Dodds, supra, 12 Cal.4th at p. 172].)" The conduct was undertaken in bad faith because Judge Platt acted for a purpose other than the faithful discharge of his judicial duties, i.e., in an attempt to benefit the relative of an acquaintance.

DISCIPLINE

A. Criteria

(8) When determining the appropriate resolution of a disciplinary proceeding, the commission is guided by the Supreme Court's pronouncement

that the purpose of the proceeding " 'is not punishment, but rather the protection of the public, the enforcement of rigorous standards of judicial conduct, and the maintenance of public confidence in the integrity and independence of the judicial system.' "[7]

The Supreme Court has recognized that in determining the appropriate discipline, each case must be considered on its own facts. "Proportionality review based on discipline imposed in other cases, however, is neither required nor determinative. The factual variations from case to case are simply too great to permit a meaningful comparison in many instances. 'Choosing the proper sanction is an art, not a science, and turns on the facts of the case at bar.' "[8]

Even though each case is considered on its own facts, we are guided in our evaluation of the facts by opinions of the Supreme Court. In decisions concerning the removal of judges, the Supreme Court has referred to several factors. It has often emphasized the number of acts of misconduct.[9] In Furey v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 43 Cal.3d at page 1307, footnote 2, the court explained that "the disposition of a case depends in large measure on the nature and number of charges found to be true . . . ." In Fletcher v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1998) 19 Cal.4th 865, 918 [81 Cal.Rptr.2d 58, 968 P.2d 958] (Fletcher), the Supreme Court, in agreeing with the commission's recommendation to remove Judge Fletcher, noted: " 'The number of wrongful acts is relevant to determining whether they were merely isolated occurrences or, instead, part of a course of conduct establishing "lack of temperament and ability to perform judicial functions in an even-handed manner." [Citation.]' (Wenger [v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1981)] 29 Cal.3d [615,] 653 [175 Cal.Rptr. 420, 630 P.2d 954].) We have determined that petitioner twice committed willful misconduct and committed prejudicial misconduct on multiple occasions. 'Together these incidents reflect a continuing, pervasive pattern of' misconduct. (Kloepfer, supra, 49 Cal.3d at p. 849.)"

[8] Broadman, supra, 18 Cal.4th at page 1112, quoting Furey v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1987) 43 Cal.3d 1297, 1318 [240 Cal.Rptr. 859, 743 P.2d 919].

[9] See, for example, Adams, supra, 10 Cal.4th 866 (Judge Adams was removed from office for engaging "in successive extrajudicial transactions that extended over a significant period of time, creating an appearance of serious impropriety and thereby tending to diminish the public esteem of the judiciary—a consequence petitioner either deliberately ignored or was unable to appreciate." (10 Cal.4th at p. 914)); Kloepfer v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1989) 49 Cal.3d 826 [264 Cal.Rptr. 100, 782 P.2d 239] (Kloepfer) (judge removed for a continuing, pervasive pattern of misconduct—four charges of willful misconduct and 21 charges of prejudicial conduct); McCullough v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1989) 49 Cal.3d 186 [260 Cal.Rptr. 557, 776 P.2d 259] (Judge McCullough was removed for committing four acts of willful misconduct and one act of persistent failure to perform his judicial duties, and his failure to respond to a prior public censure evidenced a lack of regard for the commission, the court and his obligations as a judge).

(9) Notwithstanding the court's emphasis on the number of offenses, an overarching consideration remains whether removal is necessary to protect the public, enforce rigorous standards of judicial conduct and maintain public confidence in the integrity and independence of the judicial system. In Doan v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 11 Cal.4th at page 339, the Supreme Court removed a judge for willful and prejudicial conduct that displayed moral turpitude, dishonesty and corruption, but noted that it "would hesitate to remove a judge who showed himself ready, willing, and able to reform under a less severe sanction."[10] The ability to reform or conversely the likelihood that the judge will reoffend if permitted to remain on the bench, thus emerges as a second important factor in deciding whether the removal sanction should be applied. An isolated instance of misconduct may arise from a momentary ethical lapse, but a continuing pattern "reflects poor judgment and lack of judicial temperament."[11]

The Supreme Court has identified two additional factors suggesting inability to reform and hence unsuitability for judicial office. A judge's failure to appreciate or admit to the impropriety of his or her acts indicates a lack of capacity to reform. In Fletcher, supra, 19 Cal.4th at page 919, the Supreme Court noted that "contrary to the contrite tone he sounds in this court, petitioner's primary response to the misconduct allegations during the Commission proceedings was to allege a conspiracy against him." The court concluded as to Judge Fletcher that: "[T]he record 'belies petitioner's claim that he has learned from past experience and has modified his courtroom behavior. It demonstrates instead an inability to appreciate the importance of, and conform to, the standards of judicial conduct that are essential if justice is to be meted out in every case.' (Kloepfer, supra, 49 Cal.3d at p. 866, fn. omitted, original italics.) It 'does not suggest that petitioner has, or will be able to, overcome [his demonstrated lack of judicial temperament] and that similar incidents will not recur.' (Ibid.)"[12]

Finally, the failure of past sanctions to effect a change in conduct also suggests a lack of ability to reform and unsuitability for judicial office. The Supreme Court has made note of prior discipline in deciding whether removal [10] See also Kennick v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 50 Cal.3d 297. There the Supreme Court declined to remove Judge Kennick from office because of misconduct noting that "it seems likely that our public censure of each of petitioner's misdeeds would have led him to correct and improve his judicial behavior." (50 Cal.3d at p. 341.) The court did remove the judge from office for his persistent failure or inability to perform judicial duties.

is appropriate. (See Doan, supra, 11 Cal.4th at pp. 339–340; McCullough v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 49 Cal.3d at p. 197.) In Doan, supra, 11 Cal.4th at page 340, the court wrote:

"Lastly, Doan did not learn from her public reproval in 1990 for lending the prestige of her office to advance the private interest of others. She again lent the prestige of her office to advance the private interest of others, even though she had promised not to do so in connection with the 1990 public reproval, in the matters relating to Darlene's nephew Darren Powell in 1992, Meneses in 1993, and Darlene herself in 1993.

"In sum, Doan has had three opportunities for reformation. She will have no more."

B. The Case at Bar

There are two troubling features in this case. First, there is a pattern of Judge Platt's continuing failure or inability to recognize when his professional responsibilities and personal proclivities clash. Second, Judge Platt's responses to the allegations raise concerns about his truthfulness.

1. Pattern of Misconduct.

Judge Platt took the bench in 1994. In the fall of 1997, Judge Platt received a private admonishment because in 1995, 1996, and 1997, he (a) solicited attorneys who appeared before him to purchase raffle tickets for a fundraiser for a local church and to purchase tickets for a fundraiser for a local childcare center, and (b) placed open boxes of candy bars in his chambers and on his bailiff's desk for purchase by attorneys and court staff, with the proceeds benefiting his children's parochial school. The private admonishment noted that in 1995, "Judge Platt was advised of the impropriety of soliciting fundraising contributions from attorneys and court staff by two of his fellow judges." Judge Platt's letter accepting the private admonishment offered his assurance that, "not just in the complaint areas, but in all aspects of my future, I shall conduct myself and my affairs in compliance with . . . the Code of Judicial Ethics."

Despite this assurance, in July 1998, Judge Platt, at the request of a former client, injected himself in a juvenile dependency proceeding pending before Judge Holland (count five).

In December 1999, Judge Platt received his first phone call from Mrs. G telling him that her niece Ms. M had received a speeding ticket. Even though the ticket was not before him and would not in the ordinary course of judicial business come before him, Judge Platt apparently offered to be of some assistance and instructed his clerk to locate the court records of the speeding ticket. (Count one.)

In February 2000, Mrs. G again called Judge Platt and this time informed him that her husband (Mr. G) had received a speeding ticket. Again, even though the ticket was not before him and would not in the ordinary course of judicial business come before him, Judge Platt apparently offered to be of some assistance and instructed his clerk to locate the court records of the speeding ticket. (Count two.)

Three weeks later, Judge Platt instructed his clerk to dismiss Ms. M's ticket and Mr. G's ticket. Both tickets were dismissed on the court's own motion without an appearance or hearing.

Sometime in 1999 or 2000, Judge Platt's godfather, Mr. A, informed him that he had an old speeding ticket that he had never gone to court on. He wanted to know whom he should contact to schedule a court appearance. Judge Platt called one of the two commissioners at the Tracy branch of the court to learn how Mr. A might go about getting his ticket on calendar. In his conversation with the commissioner, Judge Platt mentioned Mr. A's name and that he was active in the community. (Count six.)

In March or April 2000, Judge Platt's bailiff informed the judge that F, the son of a reserve bailiff that the judge knew, had received a speeding ticket. The bailiff asked if Judge Platt could do something to help. The judge told the bailiff to get the citation number and offered to look into the matter when F had a court date. The bailiff subsequently told Judge Platt that F had a court date. Judge Platt then attempted to contact the California Highway Patrol officer who had issued the ticket. After several unsuccessful attempts, Judge Platt spoke with the officer, listened to the officer's perspective and ascertained that the officer did not oppose the dismissal of the ticket. Even though the ticket was not pending before him, Judge Platt caused the ticket to be dismissed without any appearance or court hearing. (Count four.)

In the summer of 2000, a family from Judge Platt's church approached him concerning their daughter who was in jail for a theft-related offense. Judge Platt testified that although he did not know the family well, he indicated that he would talk to the judge who would hear the daughter's case. The following day, Judge Platt visited Judge Hammerstone in his chambers and asked him to grant the daughter a release on her own recognizance. (Count eight.)

Sometime on or after November 16, 2000, 11 months after she had first called him, Mrs. G telephoned Judge Platt and told him that now she had received a speeding ticket. Again Judge Platt apparently offered to help. He asked his clerk, Clerk N, to locate the court records of the speeding ticket. Even though he asked her a couple of times, Clerk N did not produce the record. On December 26, 2000, Judge Platt telephoned his former clerk, Clerk G, and told her that he wanted to be certain that Mrs. G would be eligible for traffic school in connection with her outstanding traffic ticket. On January 9, 2001, Judge Platt again called Clerk G and this time asked her to enter a dismissal of Mrs. G's ticket on the record. Clerk G at first agreed to, then decided not to and so informed Judge Platt. (Count three.)

In May 2001, the commission commenced its investigation in response to a complaint noting Judge Platt's conduct with regard to Mrs. G's speeding ticket.

The above chronology suggests that throughout his judicial career, Judge Platt has been willing to use his judicial position for the benefit of friends and acquaintances, even after being warned by his colleagues and privately admonished by the commission.

2. Issues of Credibility.

Judge Platt had served 15 years in the district attorney's office and had been a judge for five years when Mrs. G first called him regarding a traffic ticket. He did not immediately dismiss the ticket. He asked his clerk to locate the court records for the speeding ticket, which she did. Still he did not dismiss the ticket until after Mrs. G had again called him and told him about Mr. G's ticket. He dismissed both tickets in February 2000, some two months after Mrs. G had initially called him. Thus, the dismissals were entered after Judge Platt had considered the matters several times. Nonetheless, Judge Platt told the masters that at the time that he dismissed the tickets, he did not perceive any legal or ethical problem with doing so.

The masters found that Judge Platt's alleged ignorance was an after-the-fact rationalization that lacks credibility. The masters cited Judge Platt's reputation as a careful decision maker with a good knowledge of the law and concluded that "it is inconceivable he did not know the obvious, that ticket fixing was wrong when he dismissed [Ms. M's] traffic ticket."

Judge Platt also had a number of opportunities to consider his actions in regard to F's speeding ticket. His bailiff brought the ticket to his attention several times and Judge Platt testified that it took him a couple of attempts to contact the officer who issued the ticket. Judge Platt proceeded to elicit information about F from the officer, his bailiff, and even F's father.

Nonetheless, Judge Platt told the masters that he did not perceive any legal or ethical problems with his handling of the matter and dismissal of the ticket in May 2000.[13]

Judge Platt also testified before the masters that he believed he had authority to dismiss F's ticket because he was the presiding judge of the juvenile court and the commissioners who handle the traffic matters for juveniles were under him. The masters, however, found that at the time he dismissed the ticket, Judge Platt was handling an adult murder trial. This finding raises concerns as to whether the claim of authority is another "after-the-fact rationalization."

Judge Platt admits that he called Commissioner Kronlund, but protests that he did not have any intention to influence her. Nonetheless, as previously noted, he offers no valid alternative explanation for revealing his relationship to Mr. A and Mr. A's involvement in civic affairs.

Judge Platt's testimony surrounding his visit to Judge Hammerstone is troublesome. He testified before the masters that he told the parents that he would talk to the judge who would hear their daughter's case. He then told the masters that he only visited Judge Hammerstone to alert him that the parents might claim a friendship and that he, Judge Platt, could not vouch for the family. Did Judge Platt, when he told the family he would talk to the judge, intend to undermine the family's case by telling the judge that he could not vouch for the family? The masters found Judge Platt's explanation to be "unbelievable," noting that the explanation was "inconsistent with Platt's personality trait which motivates him to help others in need."[14]

Judge Platt testified that when Mrs. G called him in October 2000, it did not occur to him that, as he had dismissed two tickets at her request, she might expect him to do so a third time. Judge Platt had several opportunities to contemplate his possible actions as his clerk, Clerk N, failed to get him the information on the ticket as he requested. Eventually, Judge Platt contacted his former clerk, Clerk G, and asked her first to note that Mrs. G was eligible for traffic school and subsequently to dismiss the ticket. Judge Platt testified that he contacted Clerk G because Clerk N was absent. The evidence, [13] Although Judge Platt indicated that he did not think there was anything wrong with his ex parte discussions with the officer and others, he reassured the masters that when he was in the district attorney's office his expectation was that all the information that a judge would consider in deciding an issue of bail or O.R. would be presented in open court.

[14] The masters also note that Judge Platt initially testified, in response to Judge Hammerstone's testimony that he had asked for the daughter's release, that if he had wanted a person to get an O.R. release, he would have done it himself. However, when questioned by a master, Judge Platt admitted that, as he was not doing the felony master calendar and it was not a case that was pending before him, he would not have called the jail to authorize an O.R.

however, shows that Clerk N was not absent. Furthermore, there was evidence that when Clerk G asked Clerk N why Judge Platt had contacted her, Clerk N responded that the judge had done so because he knew that Clerk N would not dismiss the ticket for him.

Clerk G further testified that Judge Platt told her that Mrs. G was the wife of a police officer and that when the judge asked her to dismiss the ticket he told her to keep it between themselves. The masters found Clerk G's testimony to be credible. Judge Platt initially denied both allegations. However, he testified before the masters that while he did not recall saying any particular words, he may well have said something to the effect of keeping the matter between themselves. The masters found Judge Platt's statement to be "strong evidence" that he knew the ticket fixing was wrong. Despite all of the above, Judge Platt maintained before the masters that at the time he handled Mrs. G's ticket he did not see any ethical problems with his actions.

3. Application of the Standards Guiding the Commission.

The first of the three standards guiding the commission's decision is "protection of the public." This concern prompts the question, "Is Judge Platt likely to again violate the Code of Judicial Ethics?" The commission is of the opinion that Judge Platt is unlikely to conform his future conduct to the canons.

As noted, a common thread running through all of the counts of misconduct against Judge Platt is his failure to recognize the restraints imposed by his ethical responsibilities as a judge. Whether it is fundraising for a childcare center, helping a niece of a friend with a ticket, or trying to assist a friend from church, Judge Platt repeatedly took up the cause without considering ethical restraints. Furthermore, despite his expressions of remorse, it appears that Judge Platt has not been able to honestly admit or accept his misconduct. Judge Platt admits the fact that he fixed, or attempted to fix, four traffic tickets. He contends, however, that he did not know that it was wrong to do so when he acted. The masters, to be blunt, say this is a lie. There is sufficient evidence to support the masters' findings. Accordingly, it appears that this is a judge who either (a) will not or cannot face the reality that he knowingly engaged in judicial misconduct, or (b) has such a myopic view of his conduct that three masters reasonably believe that he is not telling the truth.

The second standard guiding the commission's decision is "the enforcement of rigorous standards of judicial conduct." This concern prompts the question, "What message will the commission's decision send to the bench?"

(10) Since the advent of the commission, judges have been held to a higher standard of conduct than attorneys.[15] The Supreme Court has noted that it expects all judges to comply with the canons and that failure to do so " 'suggests performance below the minimum level necessary to maintain public confidence in the administration of justice.' "[16]

Judge Platt, after being privately admonished for allowing his judicial office to benefit the interests of others, admittedly dismissed three tickets and attempted to dismiss a fourth ticket to benefit friends and acquaintances. He did so after having had opportunities to consider his actions. He also injected himself into a request for O.R. in a criminal case and into a juvenile dependency proceeding, neither of which was before him. Judge Platt's only explanation is that he did not recognize at the time that his actions were wrong—a response that the masters found to be incredible.

(11) Judges are not insulated from society. Most if not all judges have friends and acquaintances who on occasion receive traffic tickets or have other difficulties that result in court appearances. Thus, there is always a temptation to do a friend a favor, to put in a good word with the judicial officer who will preside over a traffic ticket. Accordingly, the commission's response to proven instances of ticket fixing should discourage requests for favors and strengthen judicial resistance to such requests.

The third standard guiding the commission is "the maintenance of public confidence in the integrity and independence of the judicial system." This prompts the question, "What message will the commission's decision send to the public?"

Ticket fixing is among the most obvious forms of abuse of judicial authority. As the masters noted, "it is an abuse that citizens unquestionably understand and are suspicious about." An ordinary citizen would not respect a judge who dismissed multiple tickets, that were not even before him, and then claimed that he did not recognize that doing so was wrong.

4. Mitigation.

(12) The masters noted that while factors in mitigation do not excuse willful misconduct, the commission may take them into account in considering the totality of the circumstances that are pertinent to determining the appropriate discipline.[17] The masters listed five factors: (1) Judge Platt's remorse, (2) his early acknowledgement of wrongdoing, (3) his performance as a judge, (4) his support in the legal community, and (5) his capacity to rehabilitate.[18] In addition, the record shows that Judge Platt voluntarily sought counseling on ethics issues from retired Judge Martin.

The commission notes Judge Platt's expressions of remorse, his apologies to his colleagues, court staff and others, and his efforts to better understand the California Code of Judicial Ethics. The problem, however, is that, although Judge Platt intellectually recognizes ethical issues once they are brought to his attention,[19] Judge Platt, despite advice from his colleagues, a prior admonition, and even lack of cooperation from his staff, repeatedly fails to recognize that his proclivity to help others causes him to violate judicial canons.

CONCLUSION

(13) The commission has determined to remove Judge Platt from office.[20] This conclusion is mandated by two interrelated factors. First, after having been privately admonished, Judge Platt dismissed three traffic tickets, and attempted to dismiss a fourth, and twice attempted to improperly influence another judicial officer. In each instance he had the opportunity to consider alternatives before he acted. Furthermore, none of the tickets would have come before him in the ordinary course of judicial business. Second, Judge Platt maintains that when he dismissed the tickets he did not see any ethical problems with his actions. The commission agrees with the masters that it is inconceivable that Judge Platt did not know that ticket fixing is wrong.

The application of the guiding standards for disciplinary proceedings supports removal. The commission's responsibility for the "protection of the public" weighs against subjecting future litigants, witnesses, the public and court staff to a judge who is dishonest[21] or who, after a career in the district attorney's office and five years on the bench, cannot recognize the impropriety of ticket fixing when he does it. Judge Platt's insensitivity to ethical

[18] The special masters made "no finding as to whether Judge Platt is capable of rehabilitation, i.e. whether Platt can overcome his 'rescuer' personality trait that apparently has caused him to act to help friends or acquaintances solve their problems rightly or wrongly."

[19] Judge Platt admits that his communications with Judge Holland and Commissioner Kronlund might suggest appearances of impropriety.

[20] This discipline is based on the commission's findings and conclusions on counts one, two, three, four, six and eight. Although Judge Platt's conduct as alleged in count five affirms Judge Platt's pattern of practice, the discipline would be the same even if count five were dismissed.

[21] The Supreme Court has held that honesty is a minimum qualification expected of every judge. (Kloepfer, supra, 49 Cal.3d 826, 865.)

restraints is further reflected in his two attempts to influence other judicial officers on behalf of a friend or an acquaintance. The "enforcement of rigorous standards of judicial conduct" favors removal, as anything less might appear to countenance Judge Platt's multiple acts of willful misconduct. The "maintenance of public confidence in the integrity and independence of the judicial system" also weighs in favor of removal. The public understands ticket fixing and knows that it is wrong. The public need not tolerate a judge who dismisses multiple traffic tickets for friends and acquaintances and then says he saw nothing wrong with what he was doing when he did it.

This decision shall constitute the order of removal of Judge Michael E. Platt and pursuant to the provisions of article VI, section 18 of the California Constitution and rule 120(a) of the Rules of the Commission on Judicial Performance, Judge Michael E. Platt is hereby disqualified from acting as a judge.

Commission members Judge Risë Jones Pichon, Justice Vance W. Raye, Ms. Lara Bergthold, Judge Madeleine I. Flier, Mr. Marshall B. Grossman, Mr. Michael A. Kahn, Mrs. Crystal Lui, Ms. Barbara Schraeger, and Dr. Betty L. Wyman voted in favor of all the findings and conclusions expressed herein and in the removal of Judge Michael E. Platt from judicial office. Commission member Ms. Ramona Ripston voted in favor of all the findings and conclusions expressed herein, but voted to publicly censure Judge Platt. One public member position is vacant.

The judge's petition for review by the Supreme Court was denied on February 19, 2003.

INQUIRY CONCERNING JUDGE BRUCE VAN VOORHIS

SUMMARY

A disciplinary matter was brought concerning a judge of the Contra Costa County Superior Court.

The Commission on Judicial Performance removed the judge from office, determining that he had committed four acts of willful misconduct and seven acts of prejudicial misconduct related to the judge's comments to prosecutors, a public defender, jurors, and staff members. Although the judge sought to minimize his misconduct by characterizing it as a demeanor problem, his "demeanor problem" was much more than being impolite. It included such "demeanor" misconduct as loss of judicial temperament, abuse of authority, and embroilment. The commission found that the misconduct occurred after the judge had been publicly reproved for similar conduct, and had received a separate private admonishment. Furthermore, all but two of the incidents occurred after an incident that reminded the judge of his public reproval and caused his presiding judge to meet with him and warn him that his misconduct must not be repeated. The commission also found that the judge did not appreciate the inappropriateness of his misconduct and that there was a strong likelihood that if he were allowed to remain on the bench he would commit future violations of the California Code of Judicial Ethics. Those conclusions were compelled by the judge's frank admission that the longer he was on the bench, the more difficult it was for him not to lose his temper, and by his failure to recognize that his subjective good intent did not allow him to abuse his authority, become embroiled in matters, or lash out at employees or attorneys. The commission concluded that the judge's misconduct not only brought the judicial office into disrepute, but also interfered with the administration of justice in particular cases. (Opinion by Risë Jones Pichon, Chairperson.)

HEADNOTES

(1) Judges § 6—Prejudicial Misconduct—Comments Suggesting Intentional Disregard of Law.—The judge, by his comments, gave the appearance of having decided a legal issue to teach a new lawyer how to handle adversity. The comments violated Cal. Code Jud. Ethics, canons 1 and 2A and constituted prejudicial misconduct.

(2) Judges § 6.2—Discipline—Prejudicial Misconduct—Definition.—Prejudicial conduct is conduct which a judge undertakes in good faith but which nevertheless would appear to an objective observer to be not only unjudicial conduct but conduct prejudicial to public esteem for the judicial office. The provision that the conduct must be that which brings the judicial office into disrepute does not require actual notoriety, but only that the conduct, if known to an objective observer, would appear to be prejudicial to public esteem for the judicial office.

(3) Judges § 6—Prejudicial Misconduct—Objective Observer Standard.—The "public esteem for the judicial office" aspect of prejudicial misconduct is measured by an objective observer standard. This aspect is established when it would appear to an objective observer familiar with the facts and the standards of conduct that the conduct in question is prejudicial to public esteem for the judicial office. The views of actual observers are sufficient, but not necessary, to establish judicial misconduct under an objective observer standard. The judge's intent and motivation are not significant factors in assessing whether prejudicial conduct has occurred under this standard.

(4) Judges § 6—Prejudicial Misconduct—Demeanor.—The judge engaged in prejudicial misconduct by his comments in front of the jury disparaging the competence of an attorney.

(5) Judges § 6.2—Discipline—Willful Misconduct—Elements.—To commit willful misconduct in office, a judge must (1) engage in conduct that is unjudicial and (2) committed in bad faith, (3) while acting in a judicial capacity. A judge acts in bad faith only by (1) performing a judicial act for a corrupt purpose (which is any purpose other than the faithful discharge of judicial duties), or (2) performing a judicial act with knowledge that the act is beyond the judge's lawful judicial power, or (3) performing a judicial act that exceeds the judge's lawful power with a conscious disregard for the limits of the judge's authority. Because transgressing the limits of a judge's lawful authority is not the faithful discharge of judicial duties, a judge who performs such acts with no regard at all for whether they are legally permitted cannot be said to be acting with a purpose to faithfully discharge judicial duties. Thus, a judge's reckless or utter indifference to whether judicial acts being performed exceed the bounds of the judge's prescribed power is a state of mind properly characterized as bad faith.

(6) Judges § 6—Willful Misconduct—Demeanor.—The judge engaged in willful misconduct and violated Cal. Code Jud. Ethics, canons 1 and 3B(4) by his comments, in front of a jury, questioning the prosecutor's motives for seeking the introduction of evidence, ridiculing her perspective, and threatening to declare a mistrial if she continued. The judge's comments were made in bad faith because they were made for the corrupt purpose of ridiculing the prosecutor.

(7) Judges § 6.2—Discipline—Abandonment of Judicial Role—Acting in Anger or Frustration.—When a judge lashes out in anger or frustration or personally attacks an attorney or becomes embroiled in a matter, the judge abandons his or her judicial role. Although any evaluation of a judge's conduct should consider the context in which the conduct took place, the canons apply even when a judge is angry or frustrated.

(8) Judges § 6—Prejudicial Misconduct—Demeanor.—The judge engaged in prejudicial misconduct and violated Cal. Code Jud. Ethics, canons 1, 2A and 3B(4) by telling a deputy public defender, in front of his client, that his accent was charming but he should lose it and suggesting that the public defender needed speech therapy.

(9) Judges § 6—Willful Misconduct—Demeanor.—The judge's comments to a prosecutor, in front of a jury, attacking the prosecutor's competence, legal training, and motives demonstrated embroilment and were made in bad faith for the corrupt purpose of venting his anger. The comments constituted willful misconduct and violated Cal. Code Jud. Ethics, canons 1, 2A and 3B(4).

(10) Judges § 6—Willful Misconduct—Demeanor.—The judge abused his authority and engaged in willful misconduct by ordering the prosecutor to tell the jury that the evidence she sought to admit "did not mean anything." The judge also engaged in willful misconduct through his comments forcing the prosecutor to agree with his rulings, admit to the jury that the evidence to which she was objecting was relevant, and confess to the jury that she made a mistake. The judge's comments violated Cal. Code Jud. Ethics, canons 1, 2A and 3B(4).

(11) Judges § 6—Prejudicial Misconduct—Demeanor—Court Personnel.—The judge's intemperate public criticisms of court personnel constituted prejudicial misconduct and violated Cal. Code Jud. Ethics, canons 1, 2A, 3B(4), and 3C(1). The judge's conduct included throwing files at a clerk, reducing the clerk to tears, unfairly berating a clerk in open court, and publicly humiliating a new security deputy sheriff.

(12) Judges § 6—Prejudicial Misconduct—Demeanor—Jurors.—The judge's condescending comments to a jury, including telling the foreperson, "you could improve on your English," constituted prejudicial misconduct and violated Cal. Code Jud. Ethics, canons 1, 2A, and 3B(4).

(13) Judges § 6.4—Discipline—Proceedings—Clear and Convincing Evidence Standard—Determining Appropriate Sanction.—Once the Commission on Judicial Performance has determined that the allegations of misconduct have been demonstrated by clear and convincing evidence, the commission must determine the appropriate discipline. The commission takes as its mandate the California Supreme Court's statement that the purpose of the proceeding is not punishment, but rather the protection of the public, the enforcement of rigorous standards of judicial conduct, and the maintenance of public confidence in the integrity and independence of the judicial system. This is consistent with the Supreme Court's statement that the purpose of these proceedings is not to punish errant judges but to protect the judicial system and those subject to the awesome power that judges wield. The Supreme Court has recognized that in determining the appropriate discipline, each case must be considered on its own facts. Proportionality review based on discipline imposed in other cases is neither required nor determinative. The factual variations from case to case are simply too great to permit a meaningful comparison in many instances. Choosing the proper sanction is an art, not a science, and turns on the facts of the case at bar.

(14) Judges § 6.4—Discipline—Proceedings—Determining Appropriate Sanction—Use of Opinions of California Supreme Court as Guidance.—Even though each case is considered on its own facts, the Commission on Judicial Performance looks to opinions of the California Supreme Court and its own prior decisions for guidance in exercising its responsibility to determine the appropriate discipline. The commission has identified considerations that are relevant to its determination of the appropriate discipline: (1) the number of acts of misconduct; (2) the effect of any prior discipline on the judge's conduct; (3) whether the judge appreciates the inappropriateness of his or her actions; (4) whether the judge is likely to continue to engage in unethical conduct; and (5) the impact of the judge's misconduct on the judicial system. In addition, the commission considers any mitigating factors that a judge may advance.

(15) Judges § 6.2—Discipline—Removal—Number of Acts of Misconduct—Prior Discipline.—In decisions concerning the removal of judges, the California Supreme Court has often noted the number of acts of misconduct. The disposition of a case depends in large measure on the nature and number of charges found to be true. There does not appear to be any minimal number of acts of misconduct required for removal. Rather, the number of wrongful acts is relevant to determining whether they were merely isolated occurrences or, instead, part of a course of conduct establishing lack of judicial temperament and ability to perform judicial functions in an evenhanded manner. Although the existence of prior discipline is a relevant factor, the court has removed judges who had not been the subject of prior discipline.

(16) Judges § 6.2—Discipline—Impact of Misconduct on Judicial System.—The fifth consideration relevant to a determination of the appropriate discipline for a judge concerns the impact of the judge's misconduct on the judicial system. At issue is how the judge's misconduct has prejudiced the judiciary's reputation or the actual administration of justice.

(17) Judges § 6.2—Discipline—Mitigating Factors—Totality of Circumstances.—The California Supreme Court has stated that character evidence and evidence of a judge's contributions to the judicial system do not mitigate or excuse willful misconduct or prejudicial misconduct, but may be considered in determining the appropriate discipline. The commission may, however, and does take these factors into account in considering the totality of the circumstances that are pertinent to its determination of the appropriate discipline.

(18) Judges § 6.2—Discipline—Mistreatment of Staff and Counsel—Acting in Anger or Frustration.—The public looks to judges to set the tone of judicial proceedings. When a judge mistreats staff, belittles counsel, or gives vent to his or her anger or frustration, the audience is not only concerned about the result in the specific matter before the court, but worries that other parties, lawyers, jurors, and employees will be subjected to similar mistreatment.

(19) Judges § 6.2—Discipline—Length of Judicial Career as Mitigating Factor—Pattern of Misconduct.—The fact that a judge is a seasoned judge might be a mitigating factor if there are only one or two instances of misconduct. Where, however, there is a pattern of misconduct following prior discipline, the judge's persistence suggests that he or she is unlikely to correct his or her behavior.

(20) Judges § 6.2—Discipline—Removal—Prejudicial Conduct.—The California Constitution authorizes the Commission on Judicial Performance to remove a judge for conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute. The California

Supreme Court's characterization of one ground for imposing discipline as more or less serious than the other does not imply that in a given case it would regard the ultimate sanction of removal as unjustified solely for conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute. Prejudicial conduct, although less grave than willful misconduct, may nevertheless, by itself, justify removal.

(21) Judges § 6.2—Discipline—Purpose of Proceedings—Mitigation of Wrongdoing.—Mitigation of a judge's wrongdoing requires more than an unfulfilled intent to reform. The aim of disciplinary proceedings is not punishment but to protect the judicial system and the public which it serves from judges who are unfit to hold office.

(22) Judges § 6.2—Discipline—Removal—Purpose of Commission on Judicial Performance.—The Commission on Judicial Performance's mandate directs it to focus not on punishment, but on the protection of the public, the enforcement of rigorous standards, and maintenance of public confidence in the integrity of the judiciary. The California Supreme Court has removed judges from the bench for conduct that did not rise to the level of moral turpitude, dishonesty, or corruption.

(23) Judges § 6.2—Discipline—Removal—Willful and Prejudicial Misconduct—Loss of Judicial Temperament—Abuse of Authority—Embroilment—Likelihood of Future Violations.—Where the record demonstrated a judge's inability to appreciate the importance of, and conform to, the standards of judicial conduct that were essential if justice was to be meted out in every case, the Commission on Judicial Performance could not, consistent with its mandate to protect the public, enforce rigorous standards of judicial conduct, and maintain public confidence in the judiciary, allow the judge to continue on the bench. The judge committed four acts of willful misconduct and seven acts of prejudicial misconduct relating to his comments to prosecutors, a public defender, jurors, and staff members, and although he sought to minimize his misconduct by characterizing it as a demeanor problem, his "demeanor problem" was much more than being impolite, as it included such "demeanor" misconduct as loss of judicial temperament, abuse of authority, and embroilment. Moreover, there was a strong likelihood that if the judge was allowed to remain on the bench, he would commit future violations of the California Code of Judicial Ethics.

OPINION

PICHON, Chairperson.—This disciplinary matter concerns Judge Bruce Van Voorhis, a judge of the Contra Costa County Superior Court. The notice of formal proceedings charged Judge Van Voorhis with 11 incidents of unethical conduct.

The commission agrees with the special masters that all 11 charges are supported by clear and convincing evidence. The commission concludes that four of Judge Van Voorhis's acts constitute willful misconduct, that the remaining seven constitute acts of conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute, and that these proven charges constitute a pattern of misconduct similar in nature to the misconduct for which Judge Van Voorhis was previously publicly reproved. Judge Van Voorhis's misconduct not only brought the judicial office into disrepute, but threatened to interfere with the actual administration of justice. Furthermore, the commission finds that Judge Van Voorhis does not appreciate the inappropriateness of his conduct and the commission concludes that Judge Van Voorhis would again violate the California Code of Judicial Ethics, if allowed to remain on the bench. For the reasons more fully set forth in this decision, the commission hereby removes Judge Bruce Van Voorhis from the bench.

PROCEDURAL HISTORY

Judge Van Voorhis was elected as a judge of the Contra Costa County Municipal Court and took office on January 5, 1987. On September 8, 1992, the commission publicly reproved Judge Van Voorhis for a number of instances of misconduct including ex parte communications, improper questioning of potential jurors, interrupting the proceedings in an adjoining courtroom, and giving directions to staff in a manner which was perceived as harsh. On February 1, 1994, the commission privately admonished Judge Van Voorhis for issuing subpoenas in his own dissolution case.

Judge Van Voorhis was elevated to the Contra Costa County Superior Court on June 8, 1998, as a result of the consolidation of the courts.

In May 2001, the commission sent a preliminary investigation letter to Judge Van Voorhis. Following his response, a notice of formal proceedings was filed on December 17, 2001. Judge Van Voorhis filed his verified answer on January 2, 2002.

On January 25, 2002, the Supreme Court, in response to the commission's request, appointed three special masters. An evidentiary hearing was held from March 24 through March 27, 2002, in San Francisco, California, before the special masters: Justice Thomas Hollenhorst of the Court of Appeal, Fourth Appellate District, presiding; Justice Kenneth Yegan of the Court of Appeal, Second Appellate District; and Judge Thompson Hanks of the Superior Court of Riverside County. Mr. Jack Coyle and Mr. Brad Battson of the commission's office of trial counsel presented the case in support of the charges. Judge Van Voorhis was represented by Mr. James A. Murphy and Mr. Harlan B. Watkins of Murphy, Pearson, Bradley & Feeney of San Francisco, California. On September 6, 2002, the masters submitted their 64-page report to the commission.

Following the receipt of objections and briefs from Judge Van Voorhis and the office of trial counsel, the matter was argued before the commission on December 4, 2002. Mr. Coyle presented argument on behalf of trial counsel. Judge Van Voorhis spoke in his own behalf and was represented by Mr. Murphy.

FINDINGS OF FACT AND CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

A. Count One

1. Findings of Fact

Judge Van Voorhis presided over a jury trial in People v. Elze in Walnut Creek from January 30 to February 1, 2001. Mr. Elze was charged with driving under the influence of alcohol. Deputy District Attorney Stacey Brock prosecuted the case and Timothy Gomes, a private attorney, was defense counsel. At the time of the trial, Ms. Brock had been an attorney for approximately three months.

One of the issues in the case concerned statements that Mr. Elze had made to the police. Police officers in a marked patrol car were driving behind Mr. Elze on an on-ramp to a major highway. Mr. Elze stopped very abruptly, and the officers had to slam on their brakes to avoid rear-ending him. The officers found this to be unusual. They followed Mr. Elze for a while and he was driving slowly. They then put on their lights and siren to pull Mr. Elze over. He was very slow to pull over. The officer approached Mr. Elze on the right side to avoid traffic, and asked him some questions such as why he braked so abruptly. The officer smelled alcohol and asked Mr. Elze whether he had been drinking. The questions were asked before the field sobriety tests were administered and while Mr. Elze was still in his car.

Attorney Gomes filed a written motion in limine to exclude Mr. Elze's statements on the theory that they were elicited in violation of Miranda v. Arizona (1966) 384 U.S. 436 [16 L.Ed.2d 694, 86 S.Ct. 1602]. Although the written motion sought to exclude all statements made from the time of Mr. Elze's "detainment," the pretrial oral argument focused on the admissibility of the pre-field-sobriety-test statements. Ms. Brock sought to introduce these statements. Judge Van Voorhis ruled that the pre-field-sobriety-test statements could not be introduced and warned Ms. Brock that introduction of the statements could lead to reversal, but noted that she could use the statements for impeachment should the defendant testify. Ms. Brock did not introduce the statements, but they were admitted during Mr. Elze's questioning by his own counsel.[1] Mr. Elze was convicted.

After sentencing, Judge Van Voorhis remained on the bench and gave Ms. Brock an assessment of her performance. He told her that she had done well during the trial, but he also told her that as a young lawyer, she had to be prepared for an unanticipated ruling by a judge and that she needed to be able to adjust her strategy of attack. Ms. Brock and two other district attorneys, who were present in the courtroom, testified that Judge Van Voorhis stated that he knew that Mr. Elze's statements were admissible, but that he kept them out to see how Ms. Brock would handle herself. Judge Van Voorhis testified that his statements were taken out of context and denied that he intentionally made a wrong ruling in order to see how Ms. Brock would react.

The masters, having weighed the evidence of all the witnesses, credited the testimony of the district attorneys and found that Judge Van Voorhis, by his comments, gave the appearance of having decided a legal issue to teach a new lawyer how to handle adversity. The masters, however, also found that "[g]iven the poor quality of the briefing by opposing counsel, the poor quality of the record which was not developed in a pretrial evidentiary hearing, and the lack of any intelligent analysis by the parties or Judge Van Voorhis, we cannot find, as of the time of the ruling, he deliberately made an erroneous ruling."

(1) The commission adopts the masters' finding that Judge Van Voorhis by his comments gave the appearance of having decided a legal issue to teach a new lawyer how to handle adversity. The commission notes that even at the evidentiary hearing before the masters, Judge Van Voorhis failed to appreciate how his choice of topics, "unexpected results," implicitly suggested that his ruling was questionable, if not wrong. In addition, he testified before the masters: "The other two walked in the room, and I started talking to her about how unexpected results can happen in a trial. And you know, I expressed to her that—and I can't remember the exact words. But on the face of it, she should have expected a victory and that I knew that, in a case of detained motorist, you're not entitled to Miranda warnings and any of the admissions that you make are admissible but that she failed to consider the unexpected result and instead, you know, decided to pursue on this battlefield." This statement by Judge Van Voorhis, like his statement to Ms. Brock, gives the clear appearance that he knew that the defendant's statement was admissible.

[1] Ms. Brock sought to introduce evidence that Mr. Elze initially stated, "All I had to drink was coffee and water," but then stated he had been drinking "brandy and 7-Up." Mr. Elze later testified that he told the police he had been drinking "brandies and seven" and admitted having had two brandies and an Irish coffee.

2. Conclusions of Law

(2) Prejudicial conduct is " ' "conduct which a judge undertakes in good faith but which nevertheless would appear to an objective observer to be not only unjudicial conduct but conduct prejudicial to public esteem for the judicial office." ' "[2] "The provision that the conduct must be that which 'brings the judicial office into disrepute' does not require actual notoriety, but only that the conduct, if known to an objective observer, would appear to be prejudicial to public esteem for the judicial office."[3]

(3) The "public esteem for the judicial office" aspect of prejudicial misconduct is measured by an "objective observer" standard. This aspect is established when it would appear to an "objective observer" familiar with the facts and the standards of conduct that the conduct in question is prejudicial to public esteem for the judicial office.[4] The views of actual observers are sufficient, but not necessary, to establish judicial misconduct under an objective observer standard.[5] The judge's intent or motivation "is not a significant factor in assessing whether prejudicial conduct has occurred under this standard."[6]

The commission concludes that Judge Van Voorhis's comments in court after the sentencing violated canons 1 and 2A of the California Code of Judicial Ethics (all references to a canon are to the California Code of Judicial Ethics) and constituted conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute. Judge Van Voorhis, by commenting to the prosecutor on her reaction to his questionable ruling to exclude Mr. Elze's pre-field-sobriety-test statements,[7] violated canon 1 by failing to observe "high standards of conduct . . . so that the integrity and independence of the judiciary will be preserved." The judge also violated canon 2A by failing to act in a manner that promotes public confidence in the integrity and impartiality of the judiciary. As noted by the masters, to the "objective observer," Judge Van Voorhis's statement "that he made a ruling for the purpose of seeing how the prosecutor would handle it, was prejudicial to public esteem for the judicial office."

B. Count Two A(1)

1. Findings of Fact

Judge Van Voorhis presided over People v. Silva, a criminal case tried before a jury on June 1 and 2, 1999. Ms. Silva was charged with possession of methamphetamine with intent to sell. The prosecutor was Deputy District Attorney Dana Filkowski and Ms. Silva was represented by William Gardner, a private attorney. The masters found that Mr. Gardner was physically unkempt and did not appear ready for trial. He had no paper on which to take notes during the trial and had to borrow a tablet from the prosecutor.

During the course of trial, Mr. Gardner attempted to present a third party culpability defense based on the arrest of another person the day before the search warrant was executed at Ms. Silva's residence. Mr. Gardner, however, had no witnesses or admissible evidence to present on the issue of third party culpability.

A discussion ensued between Judge Van Voorhis and Mr. Gardner in front of the jury. In a dialogue that extended for 13 pages of transcript, Judge Van Voorhis became increasingly exasperated by counsel's ineptness. The prosecutor serially objected to questions poorly framed by defense counsel. The judge was critical of Mr. Gardner's questions, Mr. Gardner appeared to be confused, and Judge Van Voorhis became increasingly aggressive toward Mr. Gardner. When it became clear that the jury seemed more interested in the exchange between the court and Mr. Gardner, the prosecutor asked the court to complete the discussion outside the presence of the jury. Judge Van Voorhis responded, "That won't be necessary."

The masters noted that "[d]uring this exchange, the judge interjected a lengthy series of questions and comments about Mr. Gardner's cross-examination that disparaged his professional competence. The prosecutor saw that the judge was making Mr. Gardner look 'somewhat pathetic' and became concerned that the jury might take pity on Mr. Gardner. Partly for that reason, the prosecutor stated, 'Your Honor, please. May we do this outside the presence of the jury?' "

Judge Van Voorhis ignored the prosecutor's request and continued to disparage Mr. Gardner.[8] The masters found that Judge Van Voorhis raised his voice and his tone was condescending, disrespectful and contemptuous. They noted that when "the judge made his statements about law school, his eyes got very wide, he leaned forward in his chair, and gestured with his hand adding to the aggressiveness of the encounter."

(4) The exchange took place in front of the jury with the risk of having the jury decide the case based on nonevidentiary reasons. The masters noted "that even when the judge's attention was drawn to the fact that [the] jury was listening to offers of proof and witnessing repeated hostility toward defense counsel, the judge refused to continue the discussions at sidebar thus ignoring the prejudicial effect of his conduct." Judge Van Voorhis's explanation for not excusing the jury was that "they would attach significance to what they weren't hearing as much as they would attach to what they were and . . . start speculating about what they did and didn't hear." The masters noted that the judge admitted that his approach " 'enabled the defense attorney to place in front of the jury inadmissible evidence,' and that 'a skillful judge would have called a recess.' " The commission adopts the masters' findings of fact on count two A(1).

2. Conclusions of Law

The masters concluded and the commission agrees that Judge Van Voorhis's comments to Mr. Gardner constitute prejudicial misconduct. It would have appeared to an "objective observer" familiar with the facts and the standards of conduct that the judge's comments to Mr. Gardner about his law school education were prejudicial to public esteem for the judicial office.

[8] Judge Van Voorhis made statements such as, "That's not the way to prove a case in criminal court. Didn't you learn that in law school?"; "You learned what hearsay was in law school"; and "Now you need to ask him the question that you learned in law school is a legitimate question."

C. Count Two A(2)

1. Findings of Fact

Judge Van Voorhis presided over a jury trial on August 12 and 13, 1999, in People v. Gotchall. Mr. Gotchall was charged with driving while under the influence of alcohol, resisting arrest and driving on a suspended driver's license. Deputy District Attorney Kathleen McMurray prosecuted the case and Mr. Gotchall was represented by David Larkin, a private attorney.

During the course of the prosecution's case, Ms. McMurray attempted to introduce evidence of the results of a field sobriety test known as the horizontal gaze nystagmus test. The masters explained that the "theory of this test is that when an officer places a finger in front of a suspect and has the suspect follow the finger with his eyes, the eyes will begin to bounce if there is intoxication." Prior to introducing the results of the test, Ms. McMurray asked the arresting officer to describe the test. Ms. McMurray had tried another driving while under the influence of alcohol case before another judge and believed the evidence to be admissible. No in limine motion had been filed prior to trial to exclude the test.

During Ms. McMurray's preliminary questioning of the arresting officer, Judge Van Voorhis sustained an objection to the admission of evidence of Mr. Gotchall's performance on the test. Judge Van Voorhis told the prosecutor that she needed to be able to lay a foundation for the evidence to be submitted to the jury, and that she would need an expert witness who would testify on the topic. Ms. McMurray told Judge Van Voorhis that she had not subpoenaed an expert. The prosecutor stated that she believed the officer could testify about the administration of the test, and that she did not believe that she needed to produce a separate expert witness.

Judge Van Voorhis did not agree with Ms. McMurray, and he continued, as the masters found, "in a condescending and somewhat hostile tone" to ask: "Now we have opened the door to something that really you have no intention of completing. Do we leave the jury with these half-truths?" Although Judge Van Voorhis told the masters that this statement did not necessarily impugn Ms. McMurray's motives in front of the jury, the masters emphatically disagreed, finding that in the context in which they were spoken, the fair import of the court's comments was that counsel was acting inappropriately and perhaps unethically.

After disparaging counsel, Judge Van Voorhis proceeded to disparage the prosecutor's case by noting that although the officer had seen "a person demonstrate some sort of a symptom," this did not necessarily connect it to alcohol. The judge continued: "Probably everybody she has ever arrested has a smaller finger on the end of their hand. That doesn't mean that everybody with a small finger is drunk."

When the prosecutor attempted to move the proceedings along, Judge Van Voorhis responded, "That really doesn't solve the problem completely, because you went down a road that you could not complete, and now this jury has heard about gaze nystagmus, and they are supposed to wonder what it all means." Ms. McMurray asked to approach the bench to reach a resolution outside the presence of the jury. The masters found that Judge Van Voorhis "with a smirk on his face, replied, in a condescending and mocking tone," "And what would you tell me up here?" The prosecutor replied that she had questions for the court, and Judge Van Voorhis told her "ask me now."

Judge Van Voorhis then conducted a lengthy colloquy critical of Ms. McMurray.[9] The masters found that the judge's last comments in the [9] The masters' report cites the following exchange.

"MS. McMURRAY: If this was in the police report, and I indicated there was no motion indicating that this was to be excluded from this trial—

"JUDGE VAN VOORHIS: Let me interrupt. Case law says you can prove gaze nystagmus if you can bring an expert who can show a jury that it has some scientific basis, and you told me you are not prepared to do that.

"MS. McMURRAY: Not at this time.

"JUDGE VAN VOORHIS: So then you have no business even going into the topic because you can't complete it. You can't show that it's reasonable. And so even going down that road is wrong because you know that you're not going to finish going down that road.

"MS. McMURRAY: No, your Honor.

"JUDGE VAN VOORHIS: And you leave the jury with half the information they need in order to use that information.

"MS. McMURRAY: It was not my intention to do that, Your Honor. I have qualified officers in prior trials in different courts to testify on gaze nystagmus, so it wasn't my intention to start something that I could not finish. This is the first time I've had a Court—

"JUDGE VAN VOORHIS: They are usually not in a position to tell us what it means. They can only tell us what their experience has been. But, like I say, it's like the little finger. It doesn't necessarily mean they are right.

"MS. McMURRAY: Fine. [¶] . . . [¶]

"JUDGE VAN VOORHIS: And she is not in a position to know what experts say about this and what the field says about it. She only knows her own opinion about it.

"MS. McMURRAY: If I can ask her her own opinion about it, that's—

"JUDGE VAN VOORHIS: No more admissible than her opinion about a little finger. It could be entirely coincidental, and you need to show it's based upon the logic. How will we ever get there? The eyeballs do something, and this jury is supposed to assume that magically the officer can tell that it means something? [¶] And you are leaving them with the impression that the officer can and that you think this can be done, and I don't—I just don't think you ought to go there unless you are going all the way there.

"MS. McMURRAY: If that's the Court's opinion—

"JUDGE VAN VOORHIS: I've seen this before many times.

"MS. McMURRAY: —I have never heard of it.

colloquy were made in a "sing-song sarcastic, and very condescending tone of voice." They noted that Judge Van Voorhis admitted that he criticized Ms. McMurray's performance as an attorney and that when he queries an attorney in front of the jury—as he did here—it was with the potential of diminishing the attorney's credibility in the eyes of the jury.

The masters further found that Ms. McMurray's perspective on using the officer was reasonable. "In People v. Leahy (1994) 8 Cal.4th 587, 611 [34 Cal.Rptr.2d 663, 882 P.2d 321], our Supreme Court held that once the gaze nystagmus test had been shown to be generally accepted in the scientific community and as reflected in a published opinion, no reason would exist to require an independent expert to testify. A trained law enforcement officer could testify as to the results of the test. The following year, in People v. Joehnk (1995) 35 Cal.App.4th 1488, 1507–1508 [42 Cal.Rptr.2d 6], the court of appeal concluded that gaze nystagmus testing had been accepted in the scientific community. Thus, it appears that the evidence was admissible without further foundation as claimed by Ms. McMurray. No contrary authority was cited by the court."

"JUDGE VAN VOORHIS: If you do gaze nystagmus, you have to have an expert. That's what the Court of Appeals [sic] has said. [¶] If you don't produce the expert, you can't open the topic because it leaves these people with the impression that it's got some sort of scientific basis and they ought to give it some weight. [¶] I can instruct them to give it no weight whatsoever, just like the little finger—

"MS. McMURRAY: That's fine.

"JUDGE VAN VOORHIS: —and make fun of it and ridicule it to the point they will disregard it. [In a footnote, the masters noted, 'At this point in the proceedings, Ms. McMurray was concerned that the judge's proposal to make fun and ridicule her evidence would result in a devastating blow to her case.']

"But suppose they are not able to do that—

"MS. McMURRAY: If Your Honor wants to instruct them on this one test, that's fine, Your Honor. It was only one piece of the entire field sobriety test she gave the defendant.

"JUDGE VAN VOORHIS: You are not able to offer sufficient scientific evidence to support gaze nystagmus in a court of law?

"MS. McMURRAY: I have this officer present here.

"JUDGE VAN VOORHIS: This officer probably will not qualify. I'll let you go down that road, but if you keep pursuing it and try to qualify her and she doesn't qualify, and you have wasted a lot of time, and I may have to take the jury away from you because you leave them with the impression that it means something. [¶] You can't start off leaving them with the impression that it means something and then never tell them what it means. [¶] This officer probably will not qualify as an expert in the field of gaze nystagmus.

"MS. McMURRAY: So, Your Honor, you have given me two options. One is continue and waste time or, two, is give the jury an instruction, so I'm not going to do something that the Court is telling me not to in a convoluted way.

"JUDGE VAN VOORHIS: Right, you would only waste more time.

"MS. McMURRAY: That's correct.

"JUDGE VAN VOORHIS: You're only asking to waste more time.

"MS. McMURRAY: I don't want to waste the Court's time.

"JUDGE VAN VOORHIS: Exactly. So aren't we ready now to find out whether the jurors can follow my instruction or not and then we will abandon this topic?"

Finally, the masters discounted Mr. Larkin's testimony that Judge Van Voorhis was not overly harsh with Ms. McMurray and that she continued to argue with the court after the court had ruled. The masters explained: "We have independently reviewed the transcript and do not accept Mr. Larkin's version of the events. Clearly, the judge prolonged the argument by asking more questions that were leading nowhere. Moreover, the caustic comments about Ms. McMurray and her case were made in the presence of the jury. Here, there was absolutely no hint of bad faith by the prosecutor as she had tried a case with similar issues before another judge where that court allowed gaze nystagmus evidence before the jury without an expert. Likewise, there was no motion in limine to exclude such testimony. The court's continued discourse in full view of the jury was wholly unnecessary. Ms. McMurray's request to handle the matter outside the presence of the jury was denied leaving the jury to hear this discussion."

In addition to reviewing the transcript, the masters had the benefit of hearing testimony from Judge Van Voorhis, Ms. McMurray, Mr. Larkin and others. The Supreme Court has consistently held that the factual findings of the special masters are accorded "special weight."[10] The commission, having reviewed all the materials before it, including the masters' report and Judge Van Voorhis's objections to the report, adopts the masters' findings on count two A(2).

2. Conclusions of Law

(5) The masters concluded that Judge Van Voorhis's remarks constituted willful misconduct. The Supreme Court has held that to commit willful misconduct in office, "a judge must (1) engage in conduct that is unjudicial and (2) committed in bad faith, (3) while acting in a judicial capacity."[11]

(6) Judge Van Voorhis's comments were clearly unjudicial. The masters observed that Judge Van Voorhis impugned the prosecutor "by accusing her of starting something she had no intention of finishing" and that by "making this false accusation, the judge abandoned his role of neutrality." The masters further noted that Judge Van Voorhis "abandoned his role of neutrality by interjecting his views and opinions about the gaze nystagmus test."[12] The masters concluded that Judge Van Voorhis "violated Canon 1 by failing to observe 'high standards of conduct . . . so that the integrity and independence of the judiciary will be preserved.' " The judge violated canon 2A by failing to act "in a manner that promotes public confidence in the integrity and impartiality of the judiciary," and he violated canon 3B(4) by failing to be "patient, dignified and courteous" to Ms. McMurray.

As he was presiding over a criminal jury trial when he uttered his comments, Judge Van Voorhis was acting in his judicial capacity.

Judge Van Voorhis contends that his comments cannot constitute willful misconduct because there is no "bad faith." In his brief, he explains that he felt obligated to advise the jury that it was not to consider the evidence in order to ensure that the criminal defendant received a fair and unbiased trial. In his oral presentation to the commission, Judge Van Voorhis appeared to argue that because his comments arose out of frustration or anger, he did not have a "corrupt purpose" and thus he did not act in "bad faith."

The Supreme Court has indicated that "bad faith" is not limited to matters involving corruption or moral turpitude,[13] but includes intentionally committed acts, which the judge knew, or should have known, were beyond his or her lawful power.[14] The Supreme Court offers the following relevant explanation: "Because transgressing the limits of a judge's lawful authority is not the faithful discharge of judicial duties, a judge who performs such acts with no regard at all for whether they are legally permitted cannot be said to be acting with a purpose to faithfully discharge judicial duties. Thus, a judge's reckless [12] The masters explain: " ' "It is fundamental that the trial court, however, must refrain from advocacy and remain circumspect in its comments on the evidence, treating litigants and witnesses with appropriate respect and without demonstration of partiality or bias." ' (Kloepfer v. Commission on Judicial Performance [(1989)] 49 Cal.3d 826, 845 [264 Cal.Rptr. 100, 782 P.2d 239], quoting People v. Carlucci (1979) 23 Cal.3d 249, 258 [152 Cal.Rptr. 439, 590 P.2d 15].) 'A trial judge may not . . . in the course of examining witnesses become an advocate for either party or cast aspersions or ridicule upon a witness.' (McCartney v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications [(1974)] 12 Cal.3d 512, 533 [116 Cal.Rptr. 260, 526 P.2d 268].) The same principle applies to judges who are commenting about a witness's testimony. While ' "nothing would prevent the defendant from challenging" ' a police officer's evaluation of an HGN test ' "with expert testimony of his own . . ." ' (People v. Joehnk, supra, 35 Cal.App.4th 1488, 1508, quoting Leahy, supra, 8 Cal.4th 587, 611), it is not the judge's role to be that expert."

[13] See Doan, supra, 11 Cal.4th 294, 340, noting that in Geiler, supra, 10 Cal.3d 270, and Gonzalez, supra, 33 Cal.3d 359, the Supreme Court removed judges from office but permitted them to resume the practice of law because the Court did not find moral turpitude, dishonesty, or corruption.

or utter indifference to whether judicial acts being performed exceed the bounds of the judge's prescribed power is a state of mind properly characterized as bad faith."[15]

The Supreme Court summarizes its analysis of "bad faith" with the following sentence: "A judge acts in bad faith only by (1) performing a judicial act for a corrupt purpose (which is any purpose other than the faithful discharge of judicial duties), or (2) performing a judicial act with knowledge that the act is beyond the judge's lawful judicial power, or (3) performing a judicial act that exceeds the judge's lawful power with a conscious disregard for the limits of the judge's authority."[16]

Judge Van Voorhis's explanation that he was concerned that the defendant receive a fair trial, if believed, would justify his ruling and his instruction to the jury. The issue in this count, however, as in other counts, is not whether the judge's legal ruling was correct. The issue also is not whether counsel provoked the judge. Rather, the issue is how to characterize the judge's lashing out at counsel.

The judge was clearly authorized to rule and instruct the jury, even if his ruling were ultimately determined to be incorrect. Instead, he engaged in a lengthy colloquy in which he questioned the prosecutor's motives for seeking to introduce the evidence, ridiculed her perspective and threatened to declare a mistrial if she continued. Judge Van Voorhis conducted this dialogue in front of the jury, and disparaged the prosecutor's request that the matter be resolved outside the presence of the jury. Furthermore, Judge Van Voorhis did not make a firm ruling until the end of the colloquy after he had ridiculed the prosecutor and prejudiced her case before the jury.

(7) When a judge lashes out in anger or frustration or personally attacks an attorney or becomes embroiled in a matter, the judge abandons his or her judicial role. This is not to suggest that judges do not become frustrated or angry. The California Code of Judicial Ethics, however, restrains the way a judge may manifest anger or frustration. For example, canon 2A states that a judge "shall act at all times in a manner that promotes public confidence in the integrity and impartiality of the judiciary," and canon 3B(4) provides that a judge "shall be" patient, dignified and courteous. Although any evaluation of a judge's conduct should consider the context in which the conduct took place, the canons apply even when a judge is angry or frustrated.

The masters found that the "judge's statements here could not have been meant for any purpose other than to deliberately ridicule Ms. McMurray and prejudice her case in front of the jury" and accordingly Judge Van Voorhis made his comments " 'for a corrupt purpose (which is any purpose other than the faithful discharge of judicial duties) . . . .' " The masters, in essence, did not believe Judge Van Voorhis's rationale for his comments. The commission adopts the masters' findings on count two A(2) and has no quarrel with the masters' conclusion of law.

Even if the commission were to accept Judge Van Voorhis's explanation, it would justify only his ruling (and possibly his instructions to the jury). His concern that the defendant receive a fair trial in no way justifies his deprecation of the prosecutor's motives, his ridiculing of her perception or his prejudicing of her case before the jury. In other words, the comments cannot be said to have been made in the "faithful discharge of judicial duties." It is clear that—as he implied in his oral presentation to the commission—Judge Van Voorhis lost his temper and made comments for the corrupt purpose of venting his anger or frustration.

Finally, the commission notes that if bad faith were not apparent under the first of the three tests for "bad faith," it might well be proved under the third test: "performing a judicial act that exceeds the judge's lawful power with a conscious disregard for the limits of the judge's authority." Judge Van Voorhis had been publicly reproved by the commission for his demeanor and, just two weeks before his comments, his presiding judge had cautioned Judge Van Voorhis verbally and in writing about his demeanor. Under these circumstances, Judge Van Voorhis's attack on the prosecutor's personal motives and his ridicule of her perspective has the appearance of a "conscious disregard for the limits of the judge's authority."

The commission joins the masters in concluding that Judge Van Voorhis's comments to the prosecutor constituted willful misconduct.[17]

D. Count Two A(3)

1. Findings of Fact

Estaban Alvear is a deputy public defender in Contra Costa County who represented Mr. Hoye in a criminal trial before Judge Van Voorhis in January 2000. Mr. Alvear was born in Ecuador and had lived in San Francisco for 10 years before the trial. The state was represented by Deputy District Attorney Christine Meade.

[17] In Cannon v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications (1975) 14 Cal.3d 678, 703 [122 Cal.Rptr. 778, 537 P.2d 898] (Cannon), the Supreme Court held that the judge's deliberate ridiculing of attorneys constituted willful misconduct in office.

After a guilty verdict and the imposition of judgment, Judge Van Voorhis, while still on the bench, offered a critique of Ms. Meade's performance, possibly at her request. After he completed his critique of Ms. Meade, Judge Van Voorhis turned to Mr. Alvear, who was still at counsel table helping his client fill out forms. Judge Van Voorhis, after generally complimenting Mr. Alvear, stated something to the effect that Mr. Alvear's accent was charming but he should lose it. As noted by the masters, Mr. Alvear did not ask Judge Van Voorhis for a critique of his performance. Mr. Hoye immediately rose to the defense of his attorney saying that he thought Mr. Alvear did a good job.

The masters found that the "comments to Mr. Alvear were hurtful to him personally, and made worse because his client was seated next to him when the remark was made."

(8) The masters further found that "[i]n a conversation between Judge Van Voorhis and Assistant Public Defender Susan Hutcher that occurred in the hallway of the courthouse, the judge told Ms. Hutcher that Mr. Alvear performed well as an attorney but that he was concerned about Mr. Alvear's accent. Specifically, the judge said that he needed to lose the accent and suggested that speech therapy might help. Ms. Hutcher explained that Mr. Alvear was from another country and that she thought the accent was charming. Judge Van Voorhis told Ms. Hutcher something to the effect that he thought the accent was annoying or difficult to understand. It was after that conversation that Ms. Hutcher heard about the comments made to Mr. Alvear about his accent."

Judge Van Voorhis testified that he suggested to Mr. Alvear that he "work on" or "lose" his accent in order to better communicate with the jury and witnesses. Judge Van Voorhis stated that there were two reasons for his comment. First, he felt that because he had made positive and negative comments about Ms. Meade's performance, Mr. Alvear "may feel slighted if I don't offer some words of advice." Second, he testified that when Mr. Alvear was cross-examining the police officer, the officer and others in the courtroom momentarily misunderstood Mr. Alvear's statement about "walking around" as an obscenity. Judge Van Voorhis admitted that the advice was "uninvited," "too bluntly stated," and "perhaps inept."

The masters, however, stated: "We do not credit the testimony of Judge Van Voorhis that his comments were motivated by concern that Mr. Alvear's pronunciation of walking was heard by others as cursing. The judge did not mention that to anyone at the time the remarks were made to Mr. Alvear. Secondly, no one else that was present testified to any such concerns. Finally, our own perceptions of Mr. Alvear's accent compel us to discredit Judge Van Voorhis's alleged concerns."[18]

Judge Van Voorhis never apologized to Mr. Alvear concerning this incident, even after the public defender wrote him a letter.

The commission adopts the masters' findings on count two A(3) concerning Judge Van Voorhis's comment to Mr. Alvear.

2. Conclusions of Law

Judge Van Voorhis's comment constitutes prejudicial misconduct because it would have appeared to an "objective observer" familiar with the facts and the standards of conduct that the judge's comment was prejudicial to the public esteem for the judicial office. It is one thing for a judge to respond to a request for advice from a prosecutor who has just won a conviction. This, however, does not justify offering unsolicited criticism from the bench to the losing defense counsel in front of his client. Accordingly, Judge Van Voorhis's gratuitous remark violated canons 1, 2A and 3B(4), regardless of his subjective intent.

The masters further concluded that Judge Van Voorhis also manifested bias or prejudice based on race or national origin in violation of canon 3B(5). They state that the "comment to Mr. Alvear was insensitive and could have been perceived by members of the public as indicative of bias related to Mr. Alvear's ethnicity."

The commission concludes that Judge Van Voorhis's comment to Mr. Alvear gave the appearance of bias or prejudice based on race or national origin in violation of canon 3B(5). The masters, having observed all the witnesses, including Judge Van Voorhis and Mr. Alvear, concluded that the judge's comment could reasonably be perceived by members of the public as indicative of bias. The masters' findings are entitled to special weight,[19] and the commission, having considered the evidence and the judge's arguments, concurs that the comment gave the appearance of bias or prejudice. Judge Van Voorhis's subjective intent is not controlling and the commission makes no determination as to his subjective intent.[20]

[18] The masters noted, "[a]lthough Mr. Alvear speaks with an accent, we had no difficulty understanding him, even in a hearing room where the acoustics were not particularly good. Christine Meade testified that Alvear's accent has not changed since the trial. We find that his accent does not make him difficult to understand."

E. Count Two A(4)

1. Findings of Fact

Judge Van Voorhis presided over a criminal jury trial in People v. McDonald in March 2000. The defendant was represented by James Crew. Deputy District Attorney Christine Meade, who had tried her first case six weeks earlier in front of Judge Van Voorhis, was the prosecutor. This was her first trial on a theft-related offense.

A motion in limine was filed concerning the use of a prior conviction for theft for impeachment and the court ruled that the prior conviction was admissible. At trial, the defendant, while under cross-examination, claimed he did not know whether he had been convicted of embezzlement. Ms. Meade then asked the defendant if he was on probation for that conviction and the defendant asked her to repeat the question. The defendant then agreed that he had been convicted of theft, and the prosecutor asked if he was on probation for that offense. At that point, Judge Van Voorhis interrupted and began to interrogate Ms. Meade in the presence of the jury.[21]

The masters stated that after the exchange, "Ms. Meade left the courtroom in tears. She called her supervisor to tell him that she had been accused of misconduct and thought she could be disbarred."

in which the judiciary is held by members of the public who become aware of the circumstances of the conduct. [Citations.] The subjective intent or motivation of the judge is not a significant factor in assessing whether prejudicial conduct has occurred under this standard." (Adams, supra, 10 Cal.4th at p. 878.) In Gonzalez, supra, 33 Cal.3d 359, 376, the Supreme Court considered several ethnic and sexual remarks and held: "Judge Gonzalez' subjective intent is not at issue. As a judge he is charged with the obligation to conduct himself at all times in a manner that promotes public confidence and esteem for the judiciary."

"JUDGE VAN VOORHIS: I want to ask you a question, and I have the power to do that. [¶] I want to know where you learned in law school, or the District Attorney's Office, that his probationary status is admissible in a court of law.

"MS. MEADE: I'm sorry, Your Honor. I did not learn that.

"JUDGE VAN VOORHIS: Yeah. And so were you just guessing what you could get away with in a courtroom?

"MS. MEADE: No, Your Honor.

"JUDGE VAN VOORHIS: Then, tell me, on what basis did you ask that question?

"MS. MEADE: On the basis of having a certified copy of the terms—

"JUDGE VAN VOORHIS: But you know and I know that what I agreed you may do is prove the conviction. [¶] And you remember me, many times, asking you in what form you intended to prove this conviction, and you never mentioned anything about asking him about probation; did you?

"MS. MEADE: No, Your Honor. [¶] . . . [¶]

"JUDGE VAN VOORHIS: You see why I feel a little jilted now?

"MS. MEADE: Yes, Your Honor.

"JUDGE VAN VOORHIS: And then I gave you an opportunity to show me any legal basis that you may have to do it, and you contended there is absolutely none. [¶] So now, I want to

The masters then made the following findings:

"The judge's demeanor during this exchange, which was all in front of the jury, was extremely demeaning, belittling and sarcastic. Several of the judge's statements (e.g., 'And so were you just guessing what you could get away with in a courtroom?' [and] 'So when I asked at the beginning of this trial how you were going to prove it, you thought I was just making conversation?') were sarcastic; the judge admitted that the latter statement had a sarcastic tone.

"The judge's closing threat, 'Abide by my rulings or you'll tangle with me,' and his reference to law school, 'I want to know where you learned in law school, or the District Attorney's Office, that his probationary status is admissible in a court of law' were undignified and discourteous. The judge has admitted that a similar reference to law school made to William Gardner in the Silva matter was 'gratuitous,' 'demeaning,' and 'undignified.'

"The judge's questioning of Ms. Meade's motives ('So, now I want to know what your motives are, because they appear to be—to violate my rulings and to break California law in terms of what is permitted in a criminal know what your motives are, because they appear to be—to violate my rulings and to break California law in terms of what is permitted in a criminal courtroom, and I'm here to stop you.

"MS. MEADE: I understand that, Your Honor. I have a certified copy of the conviction—

"JUDGE VAN VOORHIS: That's not what I'm talking about. [¶] Shall you focus again on what you did? You asked him about his probationary status; didn't you?

"MS. MEADE: Yes, Your Honor.

"JUDGE VAN VOORHIS: Well, you know you can't do that; don't you?

"MS. MEADE: I do now, Your Honor.

"JUDGE VAN VOORHIS: Didn't you know it at the time of the question?

"MS. MEADE: No, Your Honor.

"JUDGE VAN VOORHIS: So when I asked at the beginning of this trial how you were going to prove it, you thought I was just making conversation?

"MS. MEADE: No, Your Honor.

"JUDGE VAN VOORHIS: You knew that you were going to be confined to those for [sic] rules of proof because that's why I was asking the question, to find out what you were going to do; right?

"MS. MEADE: I believed I was confined to the certified copy of the probation terms.

"JUDGE VAN VOORHIS: I made that very clear to you now, and now you have gone off in another direction, without any legal basis whatsoever, and you have made a mistake. I won't let you do that."

The masters went on to note that after the above mentioned dialogue, "the court then instructed the jury to disregard the question and proceedings continued":

"JUDGE VAN VOORHIS: . . . You need to be way more careful in my courtroom than you just were—

"MS. MEADE: Yes, Your Honor.

"JUDGE VAN VOORHIS: —or you could be in a lot of trouble.

"MS. MEADE: Yes, your honor.

"JUDGE VAN VOORHIS: Abide by my rulings or you'll tangle with me."

courtroom, and I'm here to stop you.') was discourteous and suggested a lack of impartiality. The phrase 'break the law' carries the connotation of a criminal act and would be interpreted by the jurors as such. The judge admitted that a 'skilled judge just doesn't make those accusations in the presence of the jury . . . .'

"The judge's statement—'You see why I feel a little jilted now?'—was personal and undignified. His cross-examination of Ms. Meade ('Well, you know you can't do that; don't you?'; 'Didn't you know it at the time of the question?'; 'You knew that you were going to be confined to those rules of proof because that's why I was asking the question, to find out what you were going to do; right?'[)] and his personal criticism of her ('I made that very clear to you now, and now you have gone off in another direction, without any legal basis whatsoever, and you have made a mistake. I won't let you do that.'), were also inappropriate, especially when made in front of the jury.

"The judge's conduct toward Ms. Meade was part of a pattern of being undignified, impatient, discourteous and sarcastic to her. When the judge asked Ms. Meade during a colloquy involving another witness, 'What is the point?' and Ms. Meade responded, 'There really isn't,' the judge stated, in front of the jury: 'Congratulations. You are the first lawyer that has ever admitted that in my courtroom.'

"When Ms. Meade objected to a line of questioning on the ground that the matter should have been raised [at] pretrial, the judge asked where she learned that. When Ms. Meade replied that she learned it from the normal practice, the judge replied, in front of the jury: 'You are wrong. Study more.' "

The commission, having reviewed all the materials before it, adopts the masters' findings of fact on count two A(4).

2. Conclusions of Law

(9) The transcript shows that Judge Van Voorhis, in the masters' words: "interjected himself into the proceedings by engaging in a lengthy, antagonistic critique of Ms. Meade's performance and ethics, in front of the jury, the defendant and opposing counsel. The judge's statements unnecessarily attacked Ms. Meade's legal training, professional competence, and motives, and accused her of breaking the law, when it should have been obvious to the judge that Ms. Meade was simply an inexperienced prosecutor who innocently misunderstood what she could do. The judge's remarks violated his duty to be patient, dignified and courteous, and gave the appearance that he was unable to remain neutral and impartial in the consideration of the matter.

He unnecessarily embroiled himself, as he has shown a propensity to do on other occasions, in a needless and harmful harangue."

The commission agrees with the masters that Judge Van Voorhis's extended remarks to Ms. Meade constitute willful misconduct. They were made in his judicial capacity and were unjudicial as they violated canons 1, 2A and 3B(4).

Judge Van Voorhis defends his comments on the ground that he sought to correct the potential prejudicial effect of the prosecutor's inquiry into whether the defendant was on probation. Judge Van Voorhis's contention, like his contention on count two A(2), might well justify his determination not to allow the prosecutor to inquire into the defendant's probation status, but does not excuse the judge being "undignified, impatient, discourteous and sarcastic" to Ms. Meade in front of the jury. One of the charges against the judge in Kennick v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1990) 50 Cal.3d 297 [267 Cal.Rptr. 293, 787 P.2d 591] (Kennick) alleged that the judge's behavior toward the prosecutor was "demeaning, rude, impatient and abusive." The court agreed with the commission that the judge's actions constituted willful misconduct, even though the judge's underlying ruling was not misconduct.[22]

Similarly, in this case there is no challenge to Judge Van Voorhis's decision to block the prosecutor's line of inquiry. At issue is Judge Van Voorhis's personal attacks on the prosecutor's motives, education and performance. These attacks were not made in the "faithful discharge of judicial duties." Rather, it is clear that Judge Van Voorhis lost his temper and made comments in bad faith for the corrupt purpose of venting his anger or frustration.

F. Count Two A(5)

1. Findings of Fact

In the Elze case (see count one), Deputy District Attorney Stacey Brock attempted to introduce evidence that the defendant was unable to understand or follow the officer's directions when attempting to perform the gaze nystagmus test. Ms. Brock was not attempting to introduce the results, only the fact that the defendant could not follow directions.

When Ms. Brock asked the officer whether the defendant appeared to understand what he was supposed to do, Judge Van Voorhis interrupted and the following colloquy took place:

"JUDGE VAN VOORHIS: You are only going to be able to admit this if you bring an expert that's going to tell us what it means.

[22] Kennick, supra, 50 Cal.3d at page 324.

"MS. BROCK: We won't be offering the results of it, Your Honor.

"JUDGE VAN VOORHIS: So why even bring it up?

"MS. BROCK: Inability to follow directions.

"JUDGE VAN VOORHIS: You could ask him about that in general, but you know that if you offer evidence of that, they are liable to think it means something. [¶] Tell them it does not mean anything.

"MS. BROCK: This doesn't mean anything.

"JUDGE VAN VOORHIS: Yeah. So why bother with it?

"MS. BROCK: I would like to proceed, your Honor.

"JUDGE VAN VOORHIS: You can ask him if on other tests he failed to follow directions, and take your answer and go with that.

"MS. BROCK [to the witness]: Q. Did the defendant—

"JUDGE VAN VOORHIS: But, you know, I'm not going to let you offer any evidence of what you referred to as horizontal gaze nystagmus because it means nothing. [¶] If you can't follow that instruction from me, raise your hand now. Great. Then we'll ignore it. Try again. Stay away from that."

The masters found that this exchange took place in open court in front of the jury, Judge Van Voorhis "was red faced, tense and raised his voice," and he "pointed when he told Ms. Brock to instruct the jury that it did not mean anything." They found that Judge Van Voorhis was discourteous and humiliated Ms. Brock in front of the jury. They further noted that Ms. Brock was afraid she was going to be held in contempt by the court.

The masters determined:

"Judge Van Voorhis admitted during the hearing that he had no authority for requiring an attorney to confess mistakes to a jury by requiring the lawyer to speak directly to the jury. The judge testified that he took very serious action because he believed that [he] thought that Deputy District Attorney Brock had jeopardized a fair trial. Judge Van Voorhis stated, '[he] felt that [Ms. Brock] was—there was an attempt on her part to have the jury disregard what I was doing as a judge and—' Judge Van Voorhis testified that Ms. Brock had been trying to undermine his 'power to rule that this was not admissible evidence.' Even though the prosecutor limited her basis for discussing the gaze nystagmus issue to defendant's inability to follow directions, Judge Van Voorhis testified that Ms. Brock was 'leaving the jury with the implication' that the test could help the jury 'determine sobriety.' The judge also testified that Ms. Brock was 'doing something which she knows she can't do.'

"Based on the record, we find that the judge's explanation for his conduct, that he was protecting the defendant's rights against the prosecutor's attempt to introduce inadmissible evidence, unconvincing. The proffer made by the prosecutor in compliance with the court's questionable understanding of the status of the law on gaze nystagmus was that the evidence was not being introduced for the results of the test, only the inability of the defendant to follow directions. It was the court that ignored the proffer and began his finger-pointing, red-faced tirade. This culminated in the humiliating experience of the prosecutor being forced into making a statement that the evidence meant nothing directly to the jury, thus risking her credibility with the jury as the case progressed to conclusion.

"We find that Ms. Brock had done nothing wrong or inappropriate and the conduct and humiliation imposed on her by Judge Van Voorhis entirely inappropriate."

The commission, having reviewed all the materials before it, adopts the masters' findings of fact on count two A(5).

2. Conclusions of Law

(10) It is the judge's role to make evidentiary rulings and instruct the jury if necessary. Here, the masters concluded that Judge Van Voorhis "abused his authority by ordering the prosecutor to admit to the jury that relevant evidence, which she in good faith was attempting to introduce, 'does not mean anything.' " The masters concluded that the judge's order "served no proper purpose, violated his duty to be patient, dignified and courteous, and gave the appearance that he was unable to remain neutral and impartial in the consideration of the matter."

The commission agrees with the masters that Judge Van Voorhis's remarks and order to Ms. Brock to admit that the evidence "does not mean anything" constitute willful misconduct. Judge Van Voorhis was acting in his judicial capacity and his statements were unjudicial in that they violated canons 1, 2A and 3B(4).

Judge Van Voorhis's determination to exclude any evidence of the gaze nystagmus test is not in issue. At issue is his belittling of the prosecutor and his forcing her to make an admission to the jury. These actions and comments were not made in the "faithful discharge of judicial duties." The masters commented that Judge Van Voorhis "admitted that he knew of no authority in California that permitted him to order a lawyer to confess her mistakes to the jury, and must have known there was none." As indicated by Judge Van Voorhis's apparent failure to appreciate that the prosecutor sought only to introduce evidence of the defendant's inability to follow instructions, Judge Van Voorhis lost his temper and made comments before the jury in bad faith for the corrupt purpose of venting his anger or frustration.

G. Count Two A(6)

1. Findings of Fact

The day following the events described in count two A(5), Mr. Gomes asked his client, Mr. Elze, whether he drank more at home or when he went out. Ms. Brock objected to the question. In the exchange that followed Ms. Brock's objection, Mr. Gomes several times declined Judge Van Voorhis's suggestions that the evidence was admissible character evidence to prove a pattern of behavior and that the defendant had acted consistently with that behavior.[23] Nonetheless, Judge Van Voorhis determined that the evidence

"MR. GOMES [to Mr. Elze, the witness]: Do you ever go out in public and get drunk?
"MS. BROCK: Objection. Relevance.
"THE WITNESS [Mr. Elze]: For what purpose?
"MR. GOMES: I asked you that question. Please answer it.
"JUDGE VAN VOORHIS: What's the relevance?
"MR. GOMES: Well, it's relevant as to the frequency of his drinking.
"THE WITNESS: What purpose? I mean, why should I go out to get drunk?
"JUDGE VAN VOORHIS: You are offering [it] as character evidence?
"MR. GOMES: Okay.
"JUDGE VAN VOORHIS: Are you?
"MR. GOMES: No. No. I'm just—I'll rephrase the question.
"JUDGE VAN VOORHIS: Uh-huh.
"MR. GOMES [to the witness]: Q. Now, I want you to answer my questions 'yes' or 'no.'
"JUDGE VAN VOORHIS: All right. He's not really required to do that, and you are really not supposed to prompt him on how you would like him to answer.
"MR. GOMES: I'm just trying to—okay.
"Q. [to the witness]: So do you go out every week and drink?
"MS. BROCK: Objection. Relevance.
"JUDGE VAN VOORHIS: Are you trying to show a habit or custom on his part and then—
"MR. GOMES: Yes.
"JUDGE VAN VOORHIS: —conduct in conformity with that habit?
"MR. GOMES: Yes.
"JUDGE VAN VOORHIS: That's character evidence. You are offering character evidence?
"THE WITNESS [Mr. Elze]: Are you telling me to answer, your Honor?
"JUDGE VAN VOORHIS: I'm asking him.
"THE WITNESS: Okay.

was relevant and turned to Ms. Brock. The masters' report referred to the following excerpt from the transcript and explanation.

"JUDGE VAN VOORHIS: And so now you see the relevance of it; right? It's character evidence, obviously, and there has been a lot of it already, so it's clearly relevant; isn't it? Isn't it? Tell me.[24]

"MR. GOMES: No.[25]

"JUDGE VAN VOORHIS: You tell me that it's relevant.

"MS. BROCK: Do you want me to say that it's relevant, your Honor?

"MR. GOMES: I'll withdraw that question.
"Q. [to the witness]: Do you drink at home?
"THE WITNESS: Sometimes.
"MR. GOMES: Yeah?
"THE WITNESS: Yeah. When we have dinner, when we stay at home, I have three tenants, and frequently, they will prepare me—one from Afghanistan, and two from the United States and different parts of the country—so we have dinner, and we have something to drink, yes.
"MR. GOMES: How about when you go out?
"THE WITNESS: The same thing.
"MR. GOMES: Do you drink less or more when you go out?
"MS. BROCK: Objection. Relevance.
"THE WITNESS: It depends on the situation.
"JUDGE VAN VOORHIS: What's the relevance what he does on other occasions?
"MR. GOMES: I think it's—I think it's probative, your Honor.
"JUDGE VAN VOORHIS: I know you think that. Otherwise, you wouldn't be wasting our time. I would just like to have you explain what you're up to. It sounds to me like it's character evidence again; isn't it? [¶] You can do that, if you want to.
"MR. GOMES: I'm—I'm certainly just asking questions within the scope, the same questions that she asked.
"JUDGE VAN VOORHIS: Right. You just need to recognize that if what you're trying to do is show that he has a pattern of behavior, and, therefore, on this occasion, he acted consistent with that behavior, that's character evidence.
"MR. GOMES: Yeah. I'm not using it to show that.
"JUDGE VAN VOORHIS: Well, that's exactly what you are doing, aren't you?
"MR. GOMES: I'm just rehabilitating him.
"JUDGE VAN VOORHIS: That's exactly what you are doing, and if you want to do that, you are welcome to do that.
"MR. GOMES: Okay.
"JUDGE VAN VOORHIS: Just tell me that's what you're doing so she knows, you know, that you are doing that. [¶] You have the right to open up that topic or not. It's already pretty well open; isn't it?"

[24] "The judge paused between each 'isn't it?' and 'tell me,' waiting for the prosecution to respond."

[25] "Curiously, while the judge was looking at Ms. Brock for a response, the proponent of the evidence responded with no, that was not the legal theory for admissibility."

"JUDGE VAN VOORHIS: Sure, it is; isn't it?[26]

"MS. BROCK: Yes."

The masters' findings of fact concluded with the following paragraph. "The remarks made by the judge were in front of the jury and clearly done with the intent of forcing Ms. Brock to agree with him. Ms. Brock felt humiliated by the judge who was angry, loud, short-tempered and red-faced. Our review of the transcript reveals nothing done by Ms. Brock to provoke such a response by Judge Van Voorhis. She replied yes to the judge's question, even though she believed the evidence was not relevant, because she was afraid the judge would hold her in contempt. The judge's testimony on this subject was that he allowed Ms. Brock to be heard because he had to 'give her an opportunity to speak' and argue the evidence was not relevant. This explanation was not credible because the judge clearly badgered Ms. Brock into acquiescence. Ms. Brock's version of the incident is far more credible and is supported by the transcript."

The commission, having reviewed all the materials before it, adopts the masters' findings of fact on count two A(6).

2. Conclusions of Law

The masters concluded that Judge Van Voorhis's remarks and order to Ms. Brock constituted willful misconduct as they were unjudicial, were made in bad faith and were made in his judicial capacity. The masters noted that although it is the judge's role to make evidentiary rulings and instruct the jury if necessary, Judge Van Voorhis abused his authority by forcing the prosecutor to agree with his ruling, admit to the jury that evidence to which she was objecting was relevant, and confess to the jury that she made a mistake.

The commission agrees with the masters that Judge Van Voorhis's statements constituted willful misconduct and violated canons 1, 2A and 3B(4) as they "served no proper purpose, violated his duty to be patient, dignified and courteous, and gave the appearance that he was unable to remain neutral and impartial in the consideration of the matter." The evidence shows that Judge Van Voorhis once again lost his composure and made comments before the jury for the corrupt purpose of venting his anger or frustration. The commission agrees with the masters that Judge Van Voorhis's contention that he intended to give the prosecutor an opportunity to register an objection under Evidence Code section 352 is not credible because the judge clearly badgered the prosecutor into acquiescence.

[26] "Ms. Brock testified that the judge actually said, 'Sure. It is. Isn't it?' "

H. Count Two B

1. Findings of Fact on Count Two B(1)

Ms. Carmichael, a court clerk in the Contra Costa Superior Court, was assigned to work as a fill-in clerk for Judge Van Voorhis on July 13, 1999. The judge asked her to check the jury trial calendar for later in the week and to have the files brought upstairs so he could look at them. Ms. Carmichael called downstairs to the clerk's office and the office responded that they would get the files upstairs as soon as they could. Ms. Carmichael told the judge that there were six jury trials scheduled. When the files were not immediately brought up, Judge Van Voorhis began to get angry. The clerk's office advised that of the six files, they were missing two. When the files were brought to the courtroom, Ms. Carmichael handed them to the judge. The masters found that while court was in session, Judge Van Voorhis angrily told Ms. Carmichael to call and find out where the missing files were. They further found that he pointed his finger at the clerk when he was speaking harshly to her.

Judge Van Voorhis testified that he had no recollection of the incident. He testified that in the morning he had notified the presiding judge that he would be free the following day to handle assignments. Judge Van Voorhis explained that Ms. Carmichael had failed to notify him that there were cases scheduled before him the following day. This prompted Judge Van Voorhis to tell the supervising clerk, Ms. Morgado, that he hoped that his replacement clerk was properly trained to make sure that there were no pending matters on calendar the next day.

During the noon recess, Ms. Morgado told Ms. Carmichael that Judge Van Voorhis was upset with her. When Ms. Carmichael returned to the courtroom after lunch, Judge Van Voorhis told her how important it was for him to have accurate information about his caseload to report to the presiding judge. He further told her that otherwise he looked like he did not know what was going on in his own courthouse. Judge Van Voorhis testified that he noticed that Ms. Carmichael was becoming teary eyed as he spoke to her and that he stopped.

The afternoon calendar included "in custody" defendants and "volaps" (individuals that voluntarily appear on bench warrants or violations of probation). None of the volaps were in the courtroom when the calendar was called.

The masters found that in "an angry tone of voice," the judge said, "I have no bodies. I have these files. What's going on?" As Judge Van Voorhis was saying this, he threw the files over the ledge of the bench. The stack of files was about four inches high. The judge was very, very angry when he threw the files. The judge never apologized for throwing the files.

Ms. Carmichael was shocked and started to tear up as she picked up the files. Ultimately, she telephoned a neighboring courtroom and found the defendants who had been sent to the wrong courtroom.

Judge Van Voorhis denies that he threw the files at Ms. Carmichael. He testified that he put the files on a tabletop next to his computer and directed Ms. Carmichael to go and get the missing defendants. He stated, "If it fell, it was accidental. Believe me." The judge testified that he did not remember if the files spilled over to the other side.

Judge Van Voorhis attributed his lack of memory to the delay in informing him of the accusation. The masters commented: "Indeed, the judge went to great lengths to claim that no one ever told him that 'it was the throwing of the files that was the problem.' He even wrote a letter to Presiding Judge Mark Simons, after meeting with him on August 4, 1999, and stated that they had not discussed the 'details relating to the incident,' and that Judge Van Voorhis had never been told what Ms. Carmichael had reported to the presiding judge. Judge Van Voorhis testified that because the presiding judge never wrote back to tell him 'what this was all about,' he was 'in a worse position to defend' himself in front of the masters."

The masters found that "despite his denials, the truth slipped out during cross-examination." When discussing his lack of memory, Judge Van Voorhis testified: "Because I know at the instant I threw the files—human beings looking in that direction are going to have, you know, the ability to perceive it."

After completing the calendar Ms. Carmichael began to cry. She went to Ms. Morgado's office. As a result of her report, Ms. Carmichael was not sent back to Judge Van Voorhis's courtroom and a complaint was filed with Paul Kunkel, the human resources officer.

Presiding Judge (now Justice) Mark Simon drove to Walnut Creek to meet with Judge Van Voorhis to discuss the incident and to make sure the conduct did not occur again. Judge Simon thought that Judge Van Voorhis clearly recognized that "his demeanor may have been such that it was viewed as harsh and rude." Judge Simon indicated that he was interested in making sure that the behavior did not recur and recommended that Judge Van Voorhis enroll in a counseling or anger management program. Judge Van Voorhis replied that he was not interested in either program, but that he had private resources if he decided it was necessary. Judge Simons told Judge Van Voorhis that the incident could not be repeated and Judge Van Voorhis accepted that the conduct needed to be avoided in the future. Judge Simons sent a letter to Judge Van Voorhis memorializing the conversation and his advice that the conduct must not be repeated.

The commission, having reviewed all the materials before it, adopts the above recitation of the masters' findings as its findings of fact on count two B(1).

2. Findings of Fact on Count Two B(2)

Ms. Van Horn has been a courtroom clerk in Contra Costa County for 20 years. She filled in for Judge Van Voorhis's court clerk on April 19, 2000. When she arrived in the courtroom, the lawyers were completing their closing arguments in a jury trial.

It is the clerk's job at the end of the proceedings to swear the bailiff to take charge of the jury. After the judge gave closing instructions, the bailiff walked over to Ms. Van Horn and both raised their right hands and the oath was given. Ms. Van Horn administered the oath in the same way she had administered it in every other case, including cases in which Judge Van Voorhis had presided.

The masters found that after "she swore the bailiff, the judge stood up and told Ms. Van Horn that she had wasted 20 seconds of the court's time by swearing the bailiff on the record. He was red faced, tense and upset with her." They found that he also told her that there was a manual in the courtroom that would explain the correct procedures. The masters noted that jurors, the district attorney, defense counsel, members of the audience and the defendant were present in the courtroom.

Ms. Van Horn was shaken and experienced shortness of breath. She felt embarrassed and humiliated. After composing herself, Ms. Van Horn went with another clerk back into the courtroom, retrieved the manual and found that it made no reference to swearing the bailiff off the record.

Both Michael Markowitz, an experienced defense attorney, and Ms. Christine Meade, the prosecutor in the case, agreed that the method used by Ms. Van Horn to swear in the bailiff was the same they had seen in all other jury trials.

Judge Van Voorhis stated in his verified answer that he "expressed a desire to Ms. Van Horn to dispose of cases in a more timely manner." He testified that he told her "in [a] conversational tone"—"the way I often do with clerks"—that within the previous couple of months, they had started swearing in the bailiff off the record and that the law does not require that the bailiff be sworn in on the record. He testified that he indicated that it saved only about 30 seconds, and that it did not matter to him if she wanted to swear in the bailiff on or off the record. He denied that he told her she had wasted 20 seconds of time or that there was a folder with written instructions on how to swear in the bailiff.

The masters credited "the testimony of Ms. Van Horn and Mr. Markowitz who corroborated her testimony." They rejected "the testimony of Judge Van Voorhis. Ms. Meade testified that the judge demanded to know of Ms. Van Horn how much of the court's time she had wasted to which Ms. Van Horn responded about 10 seconds. We find that the comments of Judge Van Voorhis were uncalled for, belittling and sarcastic." "We conclude that the criticism of Ms. Van Horn was inappropriate and unjust. She had followed the directions contained in the courtroom manual and Judge Van Voorhis failed to explain any policy changes in his courtroom. His characteristic overreaction was so distressful to the clerk that she requested not to be assigned to Judge Van Voorhis's courtroom in the future."

The commission, having reviewed all the materials before it, adopts the masters' findings of fact on count two B(2).

3. Findings of Fact on Count Two B(3)

Ms. Brown is a deputy sheriff in Contra Costa County and is assigned to the Court Services Bureau. On December 26, 2000, she filled in as a security deputy in Judge Van Voorhis's courtroom. Her responsibilities included "the maintenance of inmates and getting them into the courtroom assuring that the proper inmates appeared in court." She had never worked in Judge Van Voorhis's court before.

At around 7:00 a.m., Deputy Brown compared the list of inmates being transported to court with a list of inmates needed by the court. She noticed that there was an inmate, Ms. Johnson, who was not being transported, but was listed on the court calendar. Deputy Brown called the transportation unit and the main detention facility and was told that the records showed that the court date had been vacated and that Ms. Johnson did not need to appear. When Judge Van Voorhis's bailiff, Deputy La Fortune, came to work around 8:15 a.m., Deputy Brown advised him of the fact that Ms. Johnson was not being transported because jail records showed that her court date had been vacated.

Deputy Brown then reported to the courtroom because the "in custody" calendar was starting. Her task was to get each inmate defendant and bring the person into the courtroom. During the course of the morning, Deputy Public Defender Quandt asked Deputy Brown to have Ms. Johnson brought out so he could speak with her. The request was made in the courtroom in the presence of Judge Van Voorhis, Deputy La Fortune and several attorneys.

The masters found that Deputy Brown informed Mr. Quandt that Ms. Johnson "had not been transported because her court date was shown to be vacated."[27] Mr. Quandt told Deputy Brown that there was a mistake and that Ms. Johnson needed to be in court that day. Judge Van Voorhis testified that when he overheard this conversation, he spoke up immediately. "I started off with, 'You need to learn how to do your job,' and I stopped myself. And I started that sentence over. [¶] And I said, 'You need to learn how to do your job in my courtroom.' And I said, 'Steve is going to teach you how to do your job in my courtroom, aren't you, Steve?' Steve was standing right there. [¶] And then I believe I repeated, 'Steve is going to teach you' or 'help you to learn how to do your job in my courtroom.' "

The masters found that Judge Van Voorhis further stated that Deputy Brown needed to learn how to do her job so he did not blow his top in open court and that Deputy La Fortune was going to show her how to do her job. The masters found that when the judge made those remarks, he was angry, agitated and irritated. He was pointing his finger at Deputy Brown and he had a clenched jaw.

Deputy Brown was embarrassed by the remarks that were made in open court. She felt she was doing her job and had done nothing wrong. One of the inmates found the judge's remarks amusing. Judge Van Voorhis never asked her why the inmate was not there and never apologized for his remarks.

Judge Van Voorhis testified that Deputy Brown should have directly communicated to him the fact that Ms. Johnson was not being transported. He testified that he was concerned how the public would perceive Deputy Brown's statement in open court that the inmate was not coming to court.

[27] Deputy Brown told the masters, "I believe I said that she was not transported because her court date had shown to be vacated." Judge Van Voorhis testified concerning Deputy Brown's response to Mr. Quandt, "I believe she said either 'she' or the person's name—'She's not coming to court.' She did not use the word[s] 'going to be transported.' She said, 'She's not coming to court.' "

The masters found the charge that the judge chastised Deputy Brown in a belittling tone to be sustained by clear and convincing evidence. Judge Van Voorhis stated there had been a long history of inmates not being transported to court by the sheriff's department, but he admitted that he did not know whether Deputy Brown was at fault and her conduct was not disrespectful to the court.

The commission adopts the masters' findings of fact on count two B(3).

4. Conclusions of Law on Count Two B

(11) The commission agrees with the masters' conclusion that Judge Van Voorhis's "public criticisms of court personnel were harsh, rude and intemperate, and continued despite a 1992 public reproval for conduct that included twice giving directions to his staff in a manner that was perceived to be harsh and despite a warning from the presiding judge following the [Ms.] Carmichael incident."

The masters noted: (a) "In the incident involving [Ms.] Carmichael, the judge had a temper tantrum that included throwing files, and reduced a temporary clerk to tears"; (b) "In the incident involving [Ms.] Van Horn, the judge unfairly berated an experienced clerk in open court for swearing in a bailiff in the customary manner" and "also told the clerk that she would have known better if she had read his courtroom manual, even though the manual contained nothing that indicated that the clerk had done anything wrong"; and (c) "In the incident involving Deputy Brown, the judge took out his frustration with the sheriff's department by publicly humiliating a new security deputy who had never before performed those duties, and who was not at fault."

The judge's conduct in each of the three instances constituted prejudicial misconduct as it would have appeared to an "objective observer" familiar with the facts and the standards of conduct that the judge's comments were prejudicial to the public esteem for the judicial office. Similar conduct by other judges toward personnel has been found to be prejudicial misconduct.[28] Judge Van Voorhis's conduct violated canons 1, 2A, 3B(4) and 3C(1).[29]

[29] The masters explained: "In each instance, the judge violated Canon 1 by failing to observe 'high standards of conduct . . . so that the integrity and independence of the judiciary will be preserved.' The judge violated Canon 2A by failing to act 'in a manner that promotes

I. Count Two C

1. Findings of Fact

People v. Sowande was a jury trial before Judge Van Voorhis on August 17 and 18, 2000. The charge was driving under the influence of alcohol and driving with an invalid license. The issue was whether the defendant, at the time that he was drunk, was actually driving.

Mr. Lewis, a defense witness, testified that he drove the defendant to the place where the defendant was later arrested, exited the car and left the keys in the ignition. The defendant testified that after Mr. Lewis left, he moved to the driver's seat, but did not go anywhere because he did not feel well and he fell asleep until a police officer woke him. The police officer testified that when he shook the defendant to consciousness, the defendant reached for the keys in the ignition to start the car. The defense contended that a conviction could not be based on the defendant fumbling for his keys and attempting to start the car. Rather, a conviction could only be based on the defendant actually driving the car.

During deliberations, the jury sent several written questions to the judge. The last of these questions was: "Could the intent of the defendant, the act of reaching for the keys to start the car, be considered driving under the influence of alcohol?" After a discussion with counsel, Judge Van Voorhis decided that the answer to the jury's question was no. The judge then asked counsel if they wanted the jury brought back into the courtroom to receive the answer, and defense counsel opted to have the jury brought back.

(12) When the jury was assembled, Judge Van Voorhis, while looking directly at the jury foreman, addressed the jury as follows: "Mr. Foreperson, I'll give the answer to my question [sic], the parties and jurors are present, and you'll be able to take it with you to the deliberating room. [¶] I normally correspond in writing, but this time I've decided to answer your question orally, because I want you to look at the question you gave me. And you'll see that you could improve on your English, and therefore your question could be way more precise for me. [¶] And one of the things you can help me to do is to make your questions as precise as possible, which means look public confidence in the integrity and impartiality of the judiciary.' The judge violated Canon 3B(4) by failing to be 'patient, dignified and courteous' to persons with whom the judge dealt in an official capacity. In addition, by ignoring a warning from his presiding judge that his conduct should not be repeated, Judge Van Voorhis failed to cooperate with the presiding judge in the administration of court business in violation of Canon 3C(1)."

them over several times, because an English teacher would object to the wording of that question. But I'll read it to you and then you'll see my answer." The masters found that "Judge Van Voorhis's voice was condescending, arrogant, belittling, very nasty and derogatory." There was a wide variety of educational backgrounds among the jurors. One juror had a third grade education, others had college degrees. All of the jurors seemed upset by the judge's remarks.

Mr. M., a registered nurse, was the foreperson of the jury. He felt it was an honor to be on the jury and sought to do the best he could as a citizen. He was astounded by the judge's comments and felt that he was being questioned in front of the rest of the jury. The masters found that "the judge's comment almost affected the outcome of the case because Mr. M. was so upset that he considered deciding the case on grounds other than the evidence. But in an effort to be fair, he based his decision in the case on the evidence, not his anger at the judge."

Judge Van Voorhis "testified that he wanted to explain to the jurors that they were coming into the courtroom to hear his answer when, on previous occasions, he had responded to their questions in writing." When defense counsel requested that the jury be brought in, the "first thing" that came through the judge's mind was that, because he had "given her an adverse ruling, maybe this was payback or something." It also occurred to Judge Van Voorhis that defense counsel might be trying to "attract attention to this as a particular issue and try to emphasize it for the jury in hopes that they would continue to focus on that . . . ." The judge testified that he did not want the jurors to speculate why they were being brought into the courtroom, or to draw any inference from it. He also testified that he anticipated additional questions from the jurors and he wanted them to be precise in their questions. Once he brought the jurors in, he decided that he would say something about the imprecision of the question.

The commission adopts the masters' findings of fact on count two C.

2. Conclusions of Law

The commission agrees with the masters that Judge Van Voorhis's comments constituted prejudicial misconduct and violated canons 1, 2A and 3B(4). As noted by the masters, the comments "were unnecessarily disparaging and embarrassing to the jury foreperson, as well as to the other members of the jury whose thought processes were represented in the question. The judge made his comments after receiving a public reproval in 1992 for conduct that included questioning a potential juror in each of two criminal cases in such a way that each person perceived a 'lack of sensitivity' and felt 'intimidated.' "

DISCIPLINE

A. Criteria

(13) Once the commission has determined that the allegations of misconduct have been demonstrated by clear and convincing evidence, the commission must determine the appropriate discipline. The commission takes as its mandate the Supreme Court's statement that the purpose of the proceeding " 'is not punishment, but rather the protection of the public, the enforcement of rigorous standards of judicial conduct, and the maintenance of public confidence in the integrity and independence of the judicial system.' "[30] This is consistent with the Supreme Court's prior statement that the purpose of these proceedings "is not to punish errant judges but to protect the judicial system and those subject to the awesome power that judges wield."[31]

The Supreme Court has recognized that in determining the appropriate discipline, each case must be considered on its own facts. "Proportionality review based on discipline imposed in other cases, however, is neither required nor determinative. The factual variations from case to case are simply too great to permit a meaningful comparison in many instances. 'Choosing the proper sanction is an art, not a science, and turns on the facts of the case at bar.' "[32]

(14) Even though each case is considered on its own facts, the commission looks to opinions of the Supreme Court and its own prior decisions for guidance in exercising its responsibility to determine the appropriate discipline. The commission has identified five considerations that are relevant to its determination of the appropriate discipline in this case: (1) the number of acts of misconduct; (2) the effect of any prior discipline on the judge's conduct; (3) whether the judge appreciates the inappropriateness of his or her actions; (4) whether the judge is likely to continue to engage in unethical conduct; and (5) the impact of the judge's misconduct on the judicial system.[33]

In addition, the commission considers any mitigating factors that a judge may advance.

[33] This is not an exhaustive list of possible considerations and no one consideration should be considered critical to the commission's determination of the appropriate level of discipline.

1. The Number of Acts of Misconduct

(15) In decisions concerning the removal of judges, the Supreme Court has often noted the number of acts of misconduct.[34] In Furey, the court explained that "the disposition of a case depends in large measure on the nature and number of charges found to be true . . . ."[35] There does not appear to be any minimal number of acts of misconduct required for removal. Rather, as noted by the Supreme Court in Fletcher: " 'The number of wrongful acts is relevant to determining whether they were merely isolated occurrences or, instead, part of a course of conduct establishing "lack of temperament and ability to perform judicial functions in an even-handed manner." [Citation.]' (Wenger, supra, 29 Cal.3d at p. 653.) We have determined that petitioner twice committed willful misconduct and committed prejudicial misconduct on multiple occasions. 'Together these incidents reflect a continuing, pervasive pattern of' misconduct. (Kloepfer, supra, 49 Cal.3d at p. 849.)"[36]

Similarly, in Adams the Supreme Court noted: "[T]he misconduct that we have determined justified this most severe of disciplinary sanctions generally has involved a pattern of arbitrary, irrational and inappropriate conduct of the judge while acting on the bench in dealings with litigants, attorneys, witnesses, and other persons, or while otherwise performing his or her judicial functions, and an abuse of his or her judicial powers and authority."[37]

Most recently, the commission ordered Judge Platt's removal from the bench based on five acts of willful misconduct and two acts of conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute.[38]

[34] See, for example, Adams, supra, 10 Cal.4th 866 (Judge Adams was removed from office for engaging "in successive extrajudicial transactions that extended over a significant period of time, creating an appearance of serious impropriety and thereby tending to diminish the public esteem of the judiciary—a consequence petitioner either deliberately ignored or was unable to appreciate." (Id. at p. 914.)); Kloepfer, supra, 49 Cal.3d 826 (Judge Kloepfer was removed for a continuing, pervasive pattern of misconduct—four acts of willful misconduct and 21 acts of prejudicial conduct); and McCullough v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1989) 49 Cal.3d 186 [260 Cal.Rptr. 557, 776 P.2d 259] (McCullough) (Judge McCullough was removed for committing four acts of willful misconduct and one act of persistent failure to perform his judicial duties and his failure to respond to a prior public censure evidenced a lack of regard for the commission, the court and his obligations as a judge).

2. Prior Discipline

The second consideration is the effect of any prior discipline on the judge's conduct. In Doan, supra, 11 Cal.4th 294, 339, the Supreme Court removed a judge for willful and prejudicial conduct that displayed moral turpitude, dishonesty and corruption, but noted that it "would hesitate to remove a judge who showed himself ready, willing, and able to reform under a less severe sanction."[39] The Supreme Court, in removing Judge Doan, noted:

"Lastly, Doan did not learn from her public reproval in 1990 for lending the prestige of her office to advance the private interest of others. She again lent the prestige of her office to advance the private interest of others, even though she had promised not to do so in connection with the 1990 public reproval, in the matters relating to Darlene's nephew Darren Powell in 1992, Meneses in 1993, and Darlene herself in 1993.

"In sum, Doan has had three opportunities for reformation. She will have no more."[40]

Similarly, the Supreme Court in McCullough, supra, 49 Cal.3d 186, 199, in removing the judge from office noted: ". . . his failure to respond to our public censure evidences a lack of regard for the Commission, this court and his obligations as a judge."

In its decision ordering the removal of Judge Platt from the bench, the commission noted that "the failure of past sanctions to effect a change in conduct also suggests a lack of ability to reform and unsuitability for judicial office."[41]

Although the existence of prior discipline is a relevant factor, the Supreme Court has removed judges who had not been the subjects of prior discipline.[42]

3. Appreciation of Misconduct

The third consideration is whether the judge appreciates the inappropriateness of his or her conduct. In Fletcher, the Supreme Court noted that [39] See also Kennick, supra, 50 Cal.3d 297. The Supreme Court declined to remove Judge Kennick from office because of misconduct noting that "it seems likely that our public censure of each of petitioner's misdeeds would have led him to correct and improve his judicial behavior." (Id. at p. 341.) The court did remove the judge from office for his persistent failure or inability to perform judicial duties.

[42] See Fletcher, supra, 19 Cal.4th 865; Kloepfer, supra, 49 Cal.3d 826; and Ryan v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1988) 45 Cal.3d 518 [247 Cal.Rptr. 378, 754 P.2d 724].

"contrary to the contrite tone he sounds in this court, petitioner's primary response to the misconduct allegations during the Commission proceedings was to allege a conspiracy against him."[43] The court concluded as to Judge Fletcher that: "[T]he record 'belies petitioner's claim that he has learned from past experience and has modified his courtroom behavior. It demonstrates instead an inability to appreciate the importance of, and conform to, the standards of judicial conduct that are essential if justice is to be meted out in every case.' (Kloepfer, supra, 49 Cal.3d at p. 866, fn. omitted, original italics.)"[44]

4. Likelihood of Future Violations

The fourth consideration is whether the judge is likely to continue to violate the California Code of Judicial Ethics. The Supreme Court in its opinion removing Judge Fletcher from the bench concluded that the judge's perspective did not suggest that he had overcome his demonstrated lack of judicial temperament and, accordingly, similar incidents were likely to recur.[45]

In Kloepfer, the Supreme Court in removing the judge noted that his "lack of judicial temperament is manifest" and stated: "The record does not suggest that petitioner has, or will be able to, overcome this trait and that similar incidents will not recur. For this reason comparison of the discipline imposed in other cases, as petitioner suggests, is not fruitful. Our role is to determine, in the individual case, the action necessary to protect the public and the reputation of the judiciary. The evidence fully supports the conclusion of the Commission that this purpose requires that petitioner be removed from the bench."[46]

In its decision to remove Judge Platt, the commission concluded that Judge Platt was "unlikely to conform his future conduct to the canons."[47] However, the commission issued a public censure of Judge Willoughby, rather than ordering removal, in part because it could not conclude that the judge's pattern of inappropriate conduct was "so continuing or pervasive as to preclude his reformation."[48]

5. Impact of Misconduct on the Judicial System

(16) The fifth consideration concerns the impact of the judge's misconduct on the judicial system. How has the judge's misconduct prejudiced the judiciary's reputation or the actual administration of justice? This concern with the effect of the misconduct upon the integrity of and respect for the judiciary is inherent in the Supreme Court's determination in Fletcher that Judge Fletcher's removal was "necessary to protect the public and the judiciary's reputation."[49]

In Adams, the Supreme Court removed Judge Adams from the bench, noting that he had "engaged in successive extrajudicial transactions . . . creating an appearance of serious impropriety and thereby tending to diminish the public esteem of the judiciary—a consequence petitioner either deliberately ignored or was unable to appreciate."[50] The importance the court gave to the impact of the misconduct on the judicial system becomes evident when contrasted with the considerable character evidence in support of Judge Adams[51] and Justice Mosk's strong dissent.[52]

The impact of the misconduct on the judiciary also has been recognized in other states as a factor in determining the appropriate level of judicial discipline. The Michigan Supreme Court has indicated that among the criteria to be used in evaluating judicial misconduct is that "misconduct that is prejudicial to the actual administration of justice is more serious than misconduct that is prejudicial only to the appearance of propriety . . . ."[53] The Washington Supreme Court has listed as a factor in determining the appropriate discipline "the effect the misconduct has upon the integrity of and respect for the judiciary."[54] The Arizona Commission on Judicial Conduct has adopted a rule which lists factors that may be considered in determining

[51] The court noted: "Several judges and numerous attorneys testified to their perception of petitioner's outstanding legal and administrative skills, noting his significant contributions toward streamlining the court system and implementing a 'fast-track' system." (Adams, supra, 10 Cal.4th at p. 911.)

appropriate disciplinary action including, "the nature and extent to which the acts of misconduct injured other persons or respect for the judiciary."[55]

6. Mitigating Factors

(17) The Supreme Court has stated that character evidence and evidence of a judge's contributions to the judicial system do not mitigate or excuse misconduct, but may be considered in determining the appropriate discipline. In Adams, the Supreme Court noted: "The foregoing evidence of petitioner's qualifications for and contribution to the judicial system, during the course of a lengthy judicial career, does not mitigate or excuse petitioner's wilful misconduct or prejudicial conduct. (Spruance v. Commission on Judicial Performance [(1975)] 13 Cal.3d 778, 800 [119 Cal.Rptr. 841, 532 P.2d 1209].) We may, however, and do take these factors into account in considering the totality of the circumstances that are pertinent to our determination of the appropriate discipline. (See McCartney v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications[, supra,] 12 Cal.3d 512, 539–540 . . . .)"[56]

In Broadman, the Supreme Court reiterated that evidence that a judge is industrious and innovative does not mitigate or excuse willful or prejudicial conduct, and indicated that the commission had properly considered evidence in mitigation in the determination of the appropriate discipline.[57]

B. Applying the Criteria to Judge Van Voorhis

1. The Number of Acts of Misconduct

The commission and the masters conclude that Judge Van Voorhis had engaged in four acts of willful misconduct and seven instances of conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute. These 11 incidents of misconduct took place between June 1999 and December 2000. The masters described the situation as follows: "We conclude from the evidence that Judge Van Voorhis has a serious problem with judicial temperament and self-control. Witness after witness has come forward with believable testimony concerning abusive conduct by Judge Van Voorhis. The witnesses have run the gamut from public lawyers, privately retained counsel, new court staff, a member of law enforcement, a veteran court staffer and members of a jury. Unfortunately, Judge Van Voorhis allowed his impatience and seeming compulsion to display his judicial authority to embarrass, humiliate or simply humble those who cross him. Sadly, he has done this to lawyers in front of jurors creating the risk of having cases decided on other than the merits. On one occasion, Judge Van Voorhis embarrassed a lawyer with an accent in front of the client."

The masters also stated that the instances of misconduct were not isolated occurrences, but were indicative of a lack of judicial temperament. The masters wrote: "The record establishes by clear and convincing evidence that Judge Van Voorhis's actions 'cannot be characterized as occasional lapses or isolated instances of misconduct.' Rather, there has been 'a persistent pattern of abuse and arbitrary conduct . . . .' (Kloepfer, supra, 49 Cal.3d 826, 833.) In Judge Van Voorhis's case, the instances of misconduct have been 'too numerous to permit us to speculate that [the judge] was guilty of misconduct only in isolated occasions which might be individually explained and excused.' (Cannon v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications, supra, 14 Cal.3d 678, 705.)"

2. Prior Discipline

Judge Van Voorhis was publicly reproved in 1992, received a private admonishment in 1994, and was advised orally and in writing by his presiding judge in early August 1999 that he still had a demeanor problem that needed to be addressed.

The 1992 public reproval included the following instances of unethical conduct by Judge Van Voorhis:

"In two criminal cases in May 1989 and April 1990, your conduct during questioning of a potential juror in each case caused that person to perceive a lack of sensitivity and to feel intimidated by your questioning.

"In October 1991, when arrangements for the loaning of the neighboring court reporter faltered, you entered the adjoining courtroom through a side door wearing your judicial robe and immediately directed that the court reporter be sent to your courtroom. Your inappropriate interruption of the proceedings was an abuse of authority.

"On two occasions, you gave directions to your court staff in a manner which was perceived as harsh.

"In two criminal cases in December 1989 and December 1990, you used a sarcastic and intimidating tone toward the attorneys appearing before you when they requested continuances."

The public reproval states that in determining that a public reproval "would be adequate discipline," the commission considered "the absence of prior discipline, your recognition that you should have handled the incidents differently, and your assurance that this conduct will not be repeated."

The 1994 private admonishment states that Judge Van Voorhis "issued Contra Costa subpoenas and signed them using his official judicial title in his own dissolution case in Solano County." Judge Van Voorhis's defense was that, although doing anything as a judge in his own case initially struck him as improper, he thought his act was a "mandatory ministerial act" and therefore, he could perform it even in his own case.

On August 4, 1999, as a result of Judge Van Voorhis's treatment of Ms. Carmichael (see count two B(1)), Presiding Judge Simons traveled to the Walnut Creek courthouse to meet with Judge Van Voorhis. The presiding judge memorialized the meeting in an August 5, 1999 letter to Judge Van Voorhis. The letter noted: "Primarily, we discussed the incident involving Kim Carmichael on July 13. Before I mentioned any details relating to the incident, you indicated you were aware of my concern because you had been informed that an investigator was talking to individuals at the courthouse. You expressed great regret at the incident and described in some detail the many different efforts you have made since the CJP public reproval in 1992 to modify the ways you interact with staff."

Presiding Judge Simons indicated that he was impressed with Judge Van Voorhis's "obvious sincerity in recognizing the problem raised by the incident with Ms. Carmichael and the need to resolve it." He explained that he believed "the issues I was aware of required me to bring them to your attention and to discuss ways to avoid repetition." The presiding judge mentioned two programs that Judge Van Voorhis might take, including a course on anger management. The letter noted that Judge Van Voorhis indicated that he would not follow up on the suggestions, "not because [he] rejected the need for such assistance, but that [he] felt [he] had adequate private resources to draw on for this assistance." The presiding judge's letter concluded: "I very much appreciated your attitude during the meeting, but must underscore my insistence that there be no repetition of these incidents."

Despite his reassurances to his presiding judge, within two weeks of the meeting, Judge Van Voorhis engaged in misconduct in the Gotchall trial by questioning the prosecutor's motives for seeking to introduce evidence, ridiculing her perspective in front of the jury and threatening to declare a mistrial if she continued. (See count two A(2).) With the exception of Judge

Van Voorhis's comments in the Silva trial (count two A(1)) and his comments to Ms. Carmichael, all of the charged incidents of unethical conduct occurred after Judge Van Voorhis met with Presiding Judge Simons. Whatever the effect of the public reproval and private admonishment on Judge Van Voorhis's conduct prior to the summer of 1999, his meeting with Presiding Judge Simons with its reference to his prior public reproval did not deter Judge Van Voorhis—in the words of the masters—from continuing "with the same issues of judicial temperament that have previously brought him to the attention of the Commission."

3. Appreciation of Misconduct

Judge Van Voorhis "acknowledges" that he should not have made some of the comments he did, but this is at best a conditional admission. In addition to challenging the masters' findings, Judge Van Voorhis in his briefs argued that "the conduct at issue here usually arose from an argument over a disputed evidentiary issue (or jury instruction) in the heat of the moment during trial, or it was the result of a failure of the court staff to adequately perform their duties."

In Cannon, Judge Cannon proffered a similar defense when she sought to mitigate her misconduct on the basis of frustrations provoked by " 'inexperienced and sometimes disrespectful lawyers.' " The Supreme Court first found that the record did not support the judge's "claim that the numerous deputy public defenders involved in the misconduct charged and found to be true were disrespectful or that their inexperience reasonably could have frustrated petitioner or have provoked her unwarranted conduct." The court noted that " '[E]ven assuming arguendo that the evidence was clear and convincing, disrespect on the part of the public defender cannot serve to justify petitioner's injudicious response.' "[58]

In Gonzalez, the Supreme Court rejected the judge's attempt to blame the disciplinary proceedings on his detractors. The court noted: "In the final analysis Judge Gonzalez utterly fails to grasp either the substance or the seriousness of the numerous charges levelled against him by the Commission. Despite multiple admonitions and the normal evidentiary limitations of the hearing process, Judge Gonzalez has treated this investigation as an attack on his character. Thus he boasts he is opinionated, outspoken, hardworking, and extroverted, but never prejudiced and always impartial. He persists in his theory that his adversaries conspired to record his every misdeed and regards virtually every allegation as personally motivated. Rather than respond affirmatively and convincingly to the specific charges, he expends most of his defense effort in attacking the character and credibility of the adverse witnesses. While he concedes there may be certain minor irregularities in his judicial manner and procedures, he denies that he has ever deliberately abused his judicial office and generally refuses to admit he has done anything improper."[59]

The record here does not support Judge Van Voorhis's suggestion that his unethical conduct can be justified on the basis of "the heat of the moment" or by actions on the part of attorneys or court employees. To the contrary, the record indicates that Judge Van Voorhis fails to appreciate the inappropriateness of his conduct.

Ms. Brock did not provoke the conduct charged in count one. Judge Van Voorhis chose to comment on his controversial ruling and to do so in such a way that it was reasonably perceived as indicating that he kept the evidence out to see how the prosecutor reacted. As previously noted, Judge Van Voorhis continued to give this impression in his testimony before the masters.

In his brief to the commission, Judge Van Voorhis stated that he regrets his comments to Mr. Gardner (count two A(1)) and suggests that this is a "significant fact in mitigation." The judge's testimony, however, was somewhat equivocal[60] and there is no indication that the judge ever apologized to Mr. Gardner.

There is little in the transcript to suggest that Ms. McMurray provoked Judge Van Voorhis's comments (count two A(2)). She honestly and reasonably believed that the evidence was admissible. When Judge Van Voorhis indicated that Ms. McMurray could not qualify the police officer as an expert, Ms. McMurray twice offered to move on and then asked to approach the bench.[61] There was no provocation for Judge Van Voorhis's response.

[59] Gonzalez, supra, 33 Cal.3d at page 377.

[60] On the third day of the hearing before the masters, Judge Van Voorhis's counsel asked him, "Do you acknowledge that you said to Mr. Gardner words to the effect, 'Where did you learn that in law school?' " Judge Van Voorhis's response was: "I do. It's, again, something that I regret and that I could say it better now. You know, I should have directed it in connection with having a colorable basis for asking the question, and I should have made that comment outside the presence of the jury."

[61] The transcript records the following exchange:

"MS. McMURRAY: If—I wasn't aware that the Court wouldn't qualify her, based on her training and the times that she had administered the test, so if you would like me to move on, I am more than—

There is no indication that Judge Van Voorhis recognizes the impropriety of his comment to Mr. Alvear (count two A(3)). The masters explained that their conclusion of prejudicial conduct was based on how an "objective observer" would perceive the comment, and not on the judge's intent or motivation. Judge Van Voorhis's response, however, focused solely on his intent. His obliviousness toward appearances is also reflected in his letter of April 11, 2000, to the Contra Costa Public Defender in response to his letter complaining about the comment to Mr. Alvear. Despite knowing that the matter had been referred to the commission, Judge Van Voorhis commenced his letter with the sentence, "Why does it seem that whenever I go on vacation, the first day back at work is particularly difficult, wiping out the benefits of my relaxing time?" This opening, as well as his closing,[62] suggests that Judge Van Voorhis has little awareness of how his statements are reasonably perceived.

The inexperienced prosecutor in the McDonald case (count two A(4)) did nothing to provoke Judge Van Voorhis. She asked about the defendant's probation status after the defendant denied that he had been convicted and after the defendant requested that the prosecutor repeat her question. When Judge Van Voorhis asked Ms. Meade where she had learned that a defendant's probationary status was admissible, she apologized. Rather than accept the apology, Judge Van Voorhis impugned her motives ("And so were you just guessing what you could get away with in a courtroom?").

Judge Van Voorhis does not admit that his comments were unethical. He argues that the potential prejudice from the prosecutor's inquiry into the defendant's probationary status was great and required the court's immediate

"JUDGE VAN VOORHIS: Many times, she has seen a person demonstrate some sort of symptom. That doesn't necessarily connect it with alcohol. [¶] Probably everybody she has ever arrested has a smaller finger on the end of their hand. That doesn't mean that everybody with a small finger is drunk.

"MS. McMURRAY: So if this Court is not willing to qualify officers as experts, I will move on.

"JUDGE VAN VOORHIS: That doesn't really solve the problem completely, because you went down a road that you could not complete, and now this jury has heard about gaze nystagmus, and they are supposed to wonder what it all means.

"MS. McMURRAY: If we could approach the bench, I think that's probably appropriate.

"JUDGE VAN VOORHIS: And what would you tell me up here?

"MS. McMURRAY: I have questions of the Court.

"JUDGE VAN VOORHIS: Ask me now."

[62] The letter concludes with the following paragraph: "I know that another meaning of 'maturity' has to do with aging and the ripening of character that comes with the passage of time and the accumulation of experience. Being expected to be almost without imperfections has a way of aging a person. Hopefully, I can make it through the few years of my legal career which remain and make it to retirement in one piece. Thank you for your letter encouraging me to do better."

intervention. The judge's misconduct, however, was not his determination not to allow the inquiry, but his demeaning, rude and abusive behavior toward the prosecutor. Judge Van Voorhis's failure to address the manner in which he acts suggests that he believes that as long as his subjective intent is proper there are no ethical limits on how he expresses himself.

Judge Van Voorhis also does not admit to any unethical conduct in his order that Ms. Brock admit to the jury that certain evidence "does not mean anything" (count two A(5)). He contends that he was protecting the defendant's constitutional right to a fair trial. Again, the misconduct is not Judge Van Voorhis's decision to exclude evidence of the gaze nystagmus test, but his demeanor and insistence that the prosecutor admit to the jury that she was wrong. By focusing solely on his subjective motive, Judge Van Voorhis fails to indicate any appreciation for ethical constraints on the manner in which he acts.

The gap between Judge Van Voorhis's subjective intent and his actions also is reflected in his comments in the Elze matter concerning the relevance of evidence of the defendant's drinking habits (count two A(6)). Although the defense counsel who initially proffered the evidence was not sure the evidence was really relevant, Judge Van Voorhis insisted that it was, and then insisted that the prosecutor, who had objected, admit that it was relevant. Before the masters and the commission, Judge Van Voorhis contended that he had sought to give the prosecutor an opportunity to object under Evidence Code section 352. There is nothing in the record to suggest that anyone in the courtroom, other than Judge Van Voorhis, could have been aware of the judge's purported intent.

Although Judge Van Voorhis honestly may not recall throwing the files down, he might still have apologized for his demeanor toward Ms. Carmichael (count two B(1)). Instead, he has offered as defenses that Ms. Carmichael, a fill-in clerk, did not properly check his calendar for jury trials later in the week and that in the afternoon certain defendants were not properly directed to his court. He also argues that he did not know that the throwing of the files was the problem. However the testimony before the masters and Presiding Judge Simon's letter indicate that when Judge Simon met with him, Judge Van Voorhis immediately provided him with his version of the events. Again, the issue was not Judge Van Voorhis's intent, but his demeanor.

Judge Van Voorhis's obliviousness to his demeanor is apparent in his response to the allegations in count two B(2) concerning his comments to Ms. Van Horn about swearing in the bailiff. After hearing all the testimony concerning his demeanor, Judge Van Voorhis testified that he spoke to Ms. Van Horn in a "conversational tone." In addition, Ms. Van Horn testified that when she and another clerk went back into the courtroom to show Judge Van Voorhis that the manual did not indicate how the bailiff should be sworn in, Judge Van Voorhis ignored them for approximately 15 minutes until they left, preferring to focus on an extended conversation he was having with a student. Judge Van Voorhis denies that he ignored them, but his testimony indicates that he was aware of their presence and chose not to acknowledge it.

Judge Van Voorhis never apologized to Deputy Brown for telling her in open court and before an incarcerated defendant that she needed to learn how to do her job (count two B(3)). Judge Van Voorhis never asked Deputy Brown why the inmate was not transported nor did he inquire why he had not been told that the inmate would not be transported. If he had, he would have learned that Deputy Brown had promptly told Judge Van Voorhis's bailiff, Deputy La Fortune, and that Deputy La Fortune—whom Judge Van Voorhis announced would train Deputy Brown—had failed to tell the judge or to instruct Deputy Brown to tell the judge.

Judge Van Voorhis's failure to appreciate the context in which he presides also is apparent from his comments to the juror in the Sowande case (count two C). Judge Van Voorhis carefully worked out his response to the jury's question with counsel and gave counsel the option of having the jury return to the courtroom to hear the answer. He then decided—without consulting the attorneys and prompted apparently by some suspicion of defense counsel's motives (which were never disclosed to counsel)—that he needed to give the jury some reason for being brought back into court and decided to chastise the jury for the lack of clarity in its question.

Finally, Judge Van Voorhis's lack of appreciation of his misconduct is reflected in his testimony concerning his 1992 assurance to the commission that his misconduct would not be repeated. When questioned before the masters, Judge Van Voorhis could not say that he had given any such assurance.[63] This failure to remember his assurance suggests that Judge Van Voorhis either did not consider it important or did not think it was relevant to his more recent misconduct.

[63] In the following exchange during his appearance before the commission, Judge Van Voorhis admitted he had given the commission an assurance.

"COMMISSION CHAIR (Judge Risë Jones Pichon): Judge Van Voorhis, I have a question. [¶] In 1992, you were publicly reproved by the Commission, and in that reproval, Ms. Henley indicated that the Commission determined that a public reproval was adequate discipline for a few reasons, one of which was your assurance that this conduct would not be repeated. [¶] In this case before the hearing before the special masters, you were asked by Mr. Coyle whether you promised the commission that the conduct which caused the reproval would not be

4. Likelihood of Future Violations

The commission is of the opinion that it is not only likely, but close to a certainty that Judge Van Voorhis, if allowed to remain on the bench, will continue to violate the California Code of Judicial Ethics. This conclusion is compelled by Judge Van Voorhis's failure to appreciate the inappropriateness and importance of his manner of acting, his defense to the allegations, his statements to the masters, his failure to present any evidence of steps taken to avoid future violations, and his oral presentation to the commission.

It is very difficult for a judge to avoid repeating an ethical violation unless he or she recognizes the act as misconduct. Of course, a judge may not have intended the violation or may not have initially recognized that the act constituted misconduct. In a disciplinary proceeding, however, a judge is well advised to maintain alternate defenses. First, the judge may, and should—if he or she so believes—maintain that the act was not a violation of the California Code of Judicial Ethics. Second, the judge should indicate that despite any lack of improper intent at the time, he or she now recognizes how the act could be perceived as unethical. Otherwise, should it ultimately be determined that the act was unethical, there may be serious concerns that the judge is likely to repeat the violation.

Judge Van Voorhis, while stoutly arguing that he has not engaged in any misconduct, has provided little evidence that he appreciates how the masters and the commission could find 11 instances of misconduct. Judge Van Voorhis does admit that he could have done some things better, but the commission perceives little appreciation of the factors that gave rise to this disciplinary proceeding. For example, Judge Van Voorhis has shown no awareness of how his comments to Ms. Brock (about his ruling to exclude evidence) and to Mr. Alvear (to lose the accent) could be perceived as unethical (even assuming his good intent). Instead of indicating that he will try to improve how he addresses staff, Judge Van Voorhis maintains that he repeated. And you said, 'I can't tell you what assurance I gave them.' And you were asked many questions about this, but you never agreed that you made such an assurance. [¶] If you were asked this question today, what would your answer be?

"JUDGE VAN VOORHIS: I gave that testimony under oath, and I was in no position to tell you with 100 percent certainty what happened.

"COMMISSION CHAIR: But you can tell us today—

"JUDGE VAN VOORHIS: If you will notice that—

"COMMISSION CHAIR: But can you tell us today what your assurance was?

"JUDGE VAN VOORHIS: Since the testimony, I have researched and I did give such an assurance. And I'm able now to say with 100 percent certainty, yes, I did. But at the time, I was not able to give that testimony."

spoke to Ms. Van Horn in a "conversational tone." Although Judge Van Voorhis maintains that he did not consciously belittle an attorney in front of the jury, there is little to suggest that in the future he would refrain from making comments in front of a jury.

The commission's concern is supported by Judge Van Voorhis's comments to the masters. While Judge Van Voorhis was being questioned concerning his comments to Ms. McMurray before the jury (count two A(2)), the following colloquy took place:

"JUSTICE HOLLENHORST: That position is also undermined however by the fact that, when you decide to query an attorney, that you do so in front of the trier of fact, which has the potential for diminishing this lawyer's value or credibility in front of the trier of fact or the client. Isn't that true?

"JUDGE VAN VOORHIS: It is. And again, what I feel has happened in the course of my career is that I think I show more of my feelings the longer I stay on bench. And I have to now factor that into my decision as to whether or not to conduct these discussions in open court in the presence of a jury. [¶] Whether or not I simply fooled myself earlier in my career that these things weren't being seen or whether I was oblivious to it or whether or not I really did at that time have better skills than I did at this phase—but what I hope to present to the Commission, to you folks, is that these experiences for me were pretty unusual. I was pretty astonished at the approach that's being taken by these lawyers. [¶] It's not that I hadn't ever seen it before, but it—I think it caused an unusual reaction. Not unusual for a human being, but I have expressed it the best I can."

Judge Van Voorhis's honest statement is tantamount to an admission that the longer he stays on the bench the more likely it is that he will lose control.[64] Furthermore, contrary to Judge Van Voorhis's perception of the situation as "unusual," both the masters and the commission found that Ms. McMurray did nothing to justify Judge Van Voorhis's conduct.

Later in the proceedings, while trial counsel was examining Judge Van Voorhis concerning his meeting with Presiding Judge Simon, the following dialogue took place:

"MR. COYLE: I believe your response to Judge Simon, you said, 'I recognize the need to resolve this problem'; correct?

[64] It might be noted that Judge Van Voorhis's response brief to the commission states, "Judge Van Voorhis has been working to control his demeanor and was successful for approximately eight years."

"JUDGE VAN VOORHIS: Yes.

"MR. COYLE: What problem?

"JUDGE VAN VOORHIS: The problem he and I discussed is that people often misunderstand me. They don't perceive really where I'm coming from, what I'm about, and what it means when I do what I do.

"MR. COYLE: So that's the problem, people don't understand you?

"JUDGE VAN VOORHIS: I think it would be easier for people to deal with me if they did understand me.

"MR. COYLE: But you don't have a problem?

"JUDGE VAN VOORHIS: Understanding me?

"MR. COYLE: You don't have a demeanor problem?

"JUDGE VAN VOORHIS: Are you asking me my opinion of whether I have a demeanor problem?

"MR. COYLE: Yes. Yes, I am.

"JUDGE VAN VOORHIS: I think that I'm special compared to other people in that category. And I—I don't think it's nice to use the word 'special' because it means that I'm not like other—the average person, not like the average person or other people in general in that category.

"MR. COYLE: Can you expound on how you're special in that regard?

"JUDGE VAN VOORHIS: Well, I referenced my sleeve, I think.

"MR. COYLE: I'm sorry. You referenced what?

"JUDGE VAN VOORHIS: My sleeve. I think that my emotions are closer to the surface, so to speak, than other people's are.

"JUSTICE HOLLENHORST: What does that mean?

"JUDGE VAN VOORHIS: That I don't think that the behavior means the same for me as it does for you.

"JUSTICE HOLLENHORST: Then you misunderstand or mistake signals from other people?

"JUDGE VAN VOORHIS: No. I think they mistake them—I think they mistake them from me. Because if they were to say to themselves, take what he is showing you and divide it by some number—say, two or ten—and then consider that's what he's displaying. And if you do that, maybe you understand better what it is that I'm trying to portray, what feeling I'm trying to portray in what I do because—you've heard of the phrase 110 percent. I think most of my life people have said that I try too hard and that, if I aimed at 80 percent, I would look pretty optimistic."

Again, while Judge Van Voorhis is frank, his perspective suggests that further incidents will arise as he admits that he is emotional and that people misunderstand him, but he fails to take responsibility for controlling his emotions or being concerned with how he is perceived.

In light of Judge Van Voorhis's admissions, one might have expected him to present some evidence of steps he had taken to control his feelings. However, the record contains only Judge Simon's letter suggesting that Judge Van Voorhis take an anger management program for executives and indicating that Judge Van Voorhis declined the suggestion because he had "adequate private resources to draw on for this assistance." There is no evidence that Judge Van Voorhis took any judicial education classes. There was no evidence, other than Judge Van Voorhis's self-serving argument,[65] that he had changed his manner of addressing counsel or staff.

Any doubts that the commission may have had as to the likelihood of repetition were dispelled by Judge Van Voorhis's oral presentation to the commission. Judge Van Voorhis argued that he was not like the commission members and was afraid of being "misjudged."[66] He went on to argue that as long as he had a "good" subjective intent, the commission could not find that [65] In his oral presentation to the commission Judge Van Voorhis spoke of handling 64 jury trials in the last 18 months and opined that he "handled things better," but there is nothing in the record to support these representations.

[66] Judge Van Voorhis stated: "In your evaluation of me, I'm worried about being misjudged. I'm not like you. If I seem completely different than you are, would that by itself make you dislike me? It sounds silly doesn't it? Being different can ignite a special tension if you let it. Conformity feels secure, so most people are naturally attracted to being part of the group, to blending in. And it's easier to understand and communicate with someone who sounds like you, so we're comfortable with people from our own group. [¶] But differences between people shouldn't bother anyone. People from different parts of the world with different patterns of speech and ways of thinking shouldn't be poorly treated because they're different. Ethnic bias is unjustifiable. [¶] Isn't the phenomenon a ridiculous paranoia that we should all try to eliminate. Please nod with me."

he had proceeded in "bad faith," and could not remove him from office.[67] Regardless of the legal merits of his argument, Judge Van Voorhis left the impression that he believed his good faith so mitigated his misconduct that he would not hesitate to commit similar ethical violations in the future as long as he was convinced in his own mind that he had a good intent.

5. Impact of Misconduct on the Judicial System

The fifth consideration concerns the impact of the judge's misconduct on the judicial system. The commission agrees with the masters that Judge Van Voorhis's misconduct not only compromises the appearance of the integrity of the judiciary, but actually interferes with the administration of justice. The masters noted that Judge Van Voorhis "in the various hostile exchanges with counsel not only demonstrated a lack of judicial temperament to counsel but jeopardized the parties' right to a fair and impartial verdict based on only the evidence and not on sympathy for the attorney victim of the judge's wrath or the offers of proof and speaking objections that the court routinely entertained in front of the jury." The masters also noted that Judge Van Voorhis's criticism of the jury's question (count two C) "almost affected the outcome of the case because [the jury foreman] was so upset that he considered deciding the case on grounds other than the evidence."

(18) The commission further notes that Judge Van Voorhis's misconduct, however it is characterized, seriously undermines the public's confidence in and respect for the judicial system. The public looks to judges to set the tone of judicial proceedings. When a judge mistreats staff, belittles counsel or gives vent to his or her anger or frustration, the audience is not only

"COMMISSIONER KAHN: Following your logic, so long as you have a good purpose in mind, do you think that you can behave in any way that you feel is appropriate under the circumstances and you have immunity from removal so long as you're acting with good purpose?

"JUDGE VAN VOORHIS: The Supreme Court has not decided whether reckless disregard of a judge's duty would constitute bad faith.

"COMMISSIONER KAHN: So in other words, you think that you can make as many demeanor mistakes as can happen and there's no limit to the number of demeanor mistakes you make, and you can't be removed because they were just done with the good purpose? Is that your position?

"JUDGE VAN VOORHIS: Are you asking if it's my position legally or are you asking me my own personal opinion?

"COMMISSIONER KAHN: As I understood it, you were suggesting that removal was inappropriate. And I'm asking you whether you think you are immune from removal regardless of how many mistakes you make so long as those mistakes are made in good faith.

"JUDGE VAN VOORHIS: Without bad faith, a judge cannot be removed from office for demeanor purposes. That is the legal position that I asked my advocate to take. I have not ever stated what I think personally, and I don't think it's appropriate for me to do that."

concerned about the result in the specific matter before the court, but worries that other parties, lawyers, jurors and employees will be subjected to similar mistreatment.

6. Mitigating Factors

In his briefs to the commission, Judge Van Voorhis offered as a mitigating factor his good judicial character as attested to by the attorneys who came forward on his behalf. Other possible mitigating factors are Judge Van Voorhis's industriousness and efficiency as a judge, his intensity and his years on the bench.

The commission respectfully finds little weight in these factors. Of the eight attorneys who came forward on Judge Van Voorhis's behalf only five had tried more than one case before the judge. These five related that Judge Van Voorhis was extremely hard working and efficient.[68] They did not volunteer their opinions as to the judge's demeanor, and when asked, their responses were qualified.[69] The testimony of the only judge other than Judge Van Voorhis to appear in the proceedings did not support Judge Van Voorhis.[70]

(19) Judge Van Voorhis's intensity and his years on the bench weigh against him as much as in his favor. His intensity may have contributed to his reputation for being hard working and efficient, but it also appears to have contributed to his impatience and his inability to appreciate the perspectives of others. The fact that Judge Van Voorhis is a seasoned judge might be a mitigating factor were there only one or two instances of misconduct. Where, however, there is a pattern of misconduct following prior discipline, the judge's persistence suggests that he is unlikely to correct his behavior.

C. Removal Is the Appropriate Discipline

Judge Van Voorhis contends that because his intent was always to do justice, the commission cannot make a finding of "bad faith" and hence his

[68] In Cannon, supra, 14 Cal.3d at page 706, the Supreme Court noted: "It is manifest in any event that a lack in the quality of justice cannot be balanced by the fact that justice, such as it is, is administered in large quantities."

[69] One attorney testified that he once had a case in which he thought the jury was "swinging away" from him because of the interaction Judge Van Voorhis was having with the prosecutor. Another lawyer testified that if an attorney was not prepared, Judge Van Voorhis would call the attorney on it and scold the attorney.

[70] Justice Simons (the presiding judge in 1999) testified that he used Judge Van Voorhis less and less in Martinez as time went on because "the benefits began to be outweighed by the problem-solving [that] was required after he helped out."

misconduct cannot be characterized as "willful misconduct" and the commission cannot remove him from office.

(20) As a matter of law, this argument is incorrect. The California Constitution clearly authorizes the commission to remove a judge for "conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute."[71] In 1973, when the Supreme Court was first flushing out the differences between "willful misconduct in office" and "conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute," it noted: "It should be emphasized that our characterization of one ground for imposing discipline as more or less serious than the other does not imply that in a given case we would regard the ultimate sanction of removal as unjustified solely for 'conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice which brings the judicial office into disrepute.' "[72] In McCullough, the Supreme Court, citing Geiler, reiterated that prejudicial conduct, although "less grave" than willful misconduct, "may nevertheless, by itself, justify removal."[73]

The more difficult question is whether Judge Van Voorhis should be removed from office for what he calls violations of demeanor. The commission concludes that Judge Van Voorhis should be removed from office.

First, it may well be that Judge Van Voorhis did not set out to violate the California Code of Judicial Ethics. Nonetheless, the record shows that on at least four instances he lost his temper and vented his anger or frustration in ways that compromised the administration of justice and the integrity of the judiciary. The "fact" that a judge does not intend to lose his or her temper does not excuse the judge from taking responsibility for what the judge says or does when angry or frustrated.

Second, the four instances of bad faith and seven instances of prejudicial misconduct are much more than just poor demeanor. They present a pattern of abuse of authority, embroilment and appearances of impropriety. In addition, in several instances the masters found witnesses' testimony more credible than Judge Van Voorhis's contrary testimony.

[71] Article VI, section 18, subdivision (d) of the California Constitution states that the commission may "censure a judge or former judge or remove a judge for action occurring not more than 6 years prior to the commencement of the judge's current term or of the former judge's last term that constitutes willful misconduct in office, persistent failure or inability to perform the judge's duties, habitual intemperance in the use of intoxicants or drugs, or conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute."

Third, prior discipline and warnings have not resulted in Judge Van Voorhis modifying his behavior. Judge Van Voorhis was previously publicly reprimanded for similar misconduct and was again warned verbally and in writing by his presiding judge that he continued to have a demeanor problem.

Fourth, Judge Van Voorhis's misconduct not only compromises confidence in the integrity of the judicial system, but also potentially interferes with the administration of justice and hurts people. Jurors heard inadmissible evidence, attorneys' credibility was improperly compromised in front of juries, and at least one juror considered not deciding a case on the evidence because of the judge's insult. Also attorneys, staff members and jurors were humiliated.

Fifth, as noted, Judge Van Voorhis does not appear to recognize how the way he speaks and acts violates the California Code of Judicial Ethics. The thrust of his defense in this proceeding has been that he meant no harm and that others misunderstand him.

Sixth, (1) because Judge Van Voorhis does not understand his misconduct, (2) because he has not presented any evidence of steps taken to learn about his misconduct or to control it, (3) and because he frankly admitted that the longer he is a judge the more likely it is that he will "show his emotions," the commission is convinced that Judge Van Voorhis will continue to violate the California Code of Judicial Ethics if he is allowed to remain on the bench.

punishment but " 'to protect the judicial system and the public which it serves from judges who are unfit to hold office,' " faithfulness to that aim required removal.[76]

There is no evidence that Judge Van Voorhis "neglected his work or used his office for illicit gain." Judge Van Voorhis's own testimony before the masters and the commission suggests a zealous, if not overzealous, performance of his duties. However, unlike Judge Wenger, Judge Van Voorhis has failed to explicitly accept responsibility for his misconduct.

The commission concludes that the record in this case—as did the records in Kloepfer and Fletcher—demonstrates " 'an inability to appreciate the importance of, and conform to, the standards of judicial conduct that are essential if justice is to be meted out in every case,' " and does not suggest that Judge Van Voorhis " 'has, or will be able to, overcome [his demonstrated lack of judicial temperament] and that similar incidents will not recur.' "[77]

(22) The commission is mindful of the impact of its determination on Judge Van Voorhis, but its mandate directs the commission not to focus on punishment, but on the protection of the public, the enforcement of rigorous standards and maintenance of public confidence in the integrity of the judiciary.[78] In light of the evidence of misconduct, the judge's prior discipline, the judge's lack of appreciation of his misconduct and the likelihood of repetition, faithful adherence to this mandate compels that future parties, staff employees and attorneys not be subjected to Judge Van Voorhis's misconduct. In reaching this conclusion the commission notes that the Supreme Court has removed judges from the bench for conduct that did not rise to the level of moral turpitude, dishonesty or corruption.[79]

CONCLUSION

(23) The commission has found that Judge Van Voorhis committed four acts of willful misconduct and seven acts of prejudicial misconduct. Judge Van Voorhis seeks to minimize his misconduct by characterizing it as a demeanor problem, but his "demeanor problem" is much more than being impolite. It includes such "demeanor" misconduct as loss of judicial temperament, abuse of authority and embroilment. The commission has found that this misconduct occurred after the judge had been publicly reproved for similar conduct, and had received a separate private admonishment. Furthermore, all but two of the incidents occurred after an incident which reminded Judge Van Voorhis of his public reproval and caused his presiding judge to meet with Judge Van Voorhis and warn him that his misconduct must not be repeated. The commission has also found that Judge Van Voorhis does not appreciate the inappropriateness of his misconduct and that there is a strong likelihood that if he is allowed to remain on the bench he will commit future violations of the California Code of Judicial Ethics. These conclusions are compelled by Judge Van Voorhis's frank admission that the longer he is on the bench the more difficult it is for him not to lose his temper, and by his failure to recognize that his subjective good intent does not allow him to abuse his authority, become embroiled in matters or lash out at employees or attorneys. Finally, the commission finds that Judge Van Voorhis's misconduct not only brings the judicial office into disrepute, but has also interfered with the administration of justice in particular cases. In sum, the record demonstrates " 'an inability to appreciate the importance of, and conform to, the standards of judicial conduct that are essential if justice is to be meted out in every case.' "[80] Accordingly, the commission cannot, consistent with its mandate to protect the public, enforce rigorous standards of judicial conduct, and maintain public confidence in the judiciary, allow Judge Van Voorhis to continue on the bench.

This decision shall constitute the order of removal of Judge Bruce Van Voorhis and, pursuant to the provisions of article VI, section 18 of the California Constitution and rule 120(a) of the Rules of the Commission on Judicial Performance, Judge Bruce Van Voorhis is hereby disqualified from acting as a judge.

Commission members Judge Risë Jones Pichon, Ms. Lara Bergthold, Judge Madeleine I. Flier, Mr. Michael A. Kahn, Mrs. Crystal Lui, Mrs. Penny Perez, Ms. Barbara Schraeger, and Dr. Betty L. Wyman voted in favor of all the findings and conclusions expressed herein and in the removal of Judge Bruce Van Voorhis from judicial office. Commission members Justice Vance Raye and Ms. Ramona Ripston dissent in part from the commission's decision. Commission member Mr. Marshall Grossman did not participate in this matter.

I concur with my colleagues on the essential principles of judicial decorum that should guide our decision in this case. Rudeness, arrogance, and nastiness have no place in the courtroom. The increasing lack of civility among lawyers is a frequent topic of legal commentaries; judicial incivility is no less reprehensible. A judicial appointment is not a license to insult and demean. Indeed, judges, who are shielded from intemperate attorneys by rules of attorney discipline and the contempt power, should set the standard for courtroom demeanor and conduct. On those principles there can be little disagreement. Our task, however, is not to compose ethical maxims but to apply them. Ultimately, we must determine whether respondent's actions can be properly characterized as misconduct and, if so, must decide on an appropriate sanction.

Clearly, not every discourteous act constitutes willful misconduct, and not every act of misconduct warrants the ultimate sanction of removal. Indeed, the extreme sanction of removal is appropriate only if essential to public protection. I differ with the majority's characterization of certain acts committed by Judge Van Voorhis. Those differences, however, are of relatively minor significance. Of greater importance is my conviction that respondent's actions, no matter how characterized, do not warrant the extreme sanction of removal from office. For that reason, I must respectfully dissent.

Despite our disagreements, my colleagues and I share a common perception of respondent based on the record and his presentation to the commission: Judge Van Voorhis is not a warm and fuzzy individual. His sharp edges are plain and visible and he makes no effort to conceal them. He speaks his mind with bluntness and candor and appears to be neither ingratiating nor endearing. This should not matter. Affability is not a qualification of judicial office. We have not been empowered to cull the judiciary of persons who lack congeniality; that discretion is left to the appointing power, in the first instance, or the voters who may express a preference for a more likeable candidate. Our power is tethered to the judge's conduct, not his personality.

The judge's conduct here can be summarized thusly. Following trial in People v. Elze, respondent made comments to a young prosecutor that created the impression his earlier decision on a legal issue was not based on the merits but was calculated to teach the new lawyer how to handle adversity. During trial in People v. Silva, respondent excoriated an inept attorney in a voice that was condescending, disrespectful, and contemptuous. In People v. Gotchall, he again adopted a hostile and condescending tone in reprimanding a young district attorney for what he perceived to be an effort to circumvent his evidentiary ruling concerning the horizontal gaze nystagmus test.[81] The judge's understanding of the evidentiary foundation necessary for introduction of the horizontal gaze nystagmus test was also the source of friction in People v. Elze.[82] Again, the judge made a ruling and perceived an effort by the prosecutor to circumvent the ruling. He angrily objected to the prosecutor's questioning and instructed her to tell the jury to disregard the answer. In a separate case involving the same prosecutor, he disagreed with the prosecutor's objection on an evidentiary matter and instructed her, in front of the jury, to agree with his ruling. In People v. McDonald, respondent again undertook to teach a young prosecutor rules of evidence, interrupting and questioning her in front of the jury in a manner that could only be described as demeaning and sarcastic. Following the trial of People v. Hoye in January 2000, respondent volunteered to the young public defender trial deputy that his accent was charming but he should "lose it."

In three other matters involving court staff, respondent is accused of throwing files in a fit of anger, with some of the files landing on a clerk's workspace; castigating a clerk in front of a jury for wasting the court's time; and chastising a deputy sheriff for not knowing her job, though his criticism was not warranted and her conduct could have been explained had he only asked. In a single matter involving a jury, he criticized members of the jury for the wording of a question they submitted, telling them, "you could improve on your English, and therefore your question could be way more precise for me." Some jurors felt insulted by the comment.

[81] I note, however, defense counsel observed he did not believe that Judge Van Voorhis raised his voice or was harsh or discourteous, contrary to the deputy district attorney's observation of a "smirk" on respondent's face. The masters "independently reviewed the transcript" and sided with the deputy district attorney. Regrettably, an independent review of a written record cannot discern smirks or vocal intonations. Nevertheless, for purposes of this dissent, I accept the masters' finding.

[82] The judge appears to have been wrong in his rulings on the test. It is difficult to disregard this legal error in assessing his conduct. However, for purposes of my analysis, I have assumed that his ruling was correct, in which case his righteous indignation with the prosecutor's response to his rulings may have been warranted. Nonetheless, respondent was still under an obligation to act courteously and to treat the participants with dignity and respect. He did neither.

There is no doubt that respondent was intemperate in his remarks and his actions, that the objects of his tirades were embarrassed and humiliated, and that many of his words should have best been left unsaid. Respondent's regrettable conduct speaks for itself. For that reason, I offer a mild dissent from efforts to amplify the seriousness of respondent's lapses in regard to his angry outbursts at counsel by labeling them as "willful misconduct." According to the majority, a judge's "lashing out at counsel" constitutes bad faith under two of the three tests for bad faith articulated by the Supreme Court: First, according to the majority, comments made to vent anger or frustration cannot be said to have been made in the "faithful discharge of judicial duties" and thus were made for a "corrupt purpose." Second, because respondent had recently been cautioned about his demeanor, his subsequent loss of poise evinced a "conscious disregard for the limits of the judge's authority."

I am not persuaded by either of these justifications. Certainly the conduct here is no worse than the judge's conduct in Kennick v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1990) 50 Cal.3d 297 [267 Cal.Rptr. 293, 787 P.2d 591] (Kennick). There, the commission found the judge screamed in an abusive manner at an attorney in open court when she attempted to make a bail motion and screamed at her again in chambers when she suggested the court reassign counsel in certain cases to expedite the calendar. Further, the commission found that the yelling so intimidated the attorney that she felt she could never make another bail motion before petitioner, and the yelling in chambers frightened her and reduced her to tears. The masters concluded this conduct constituted prejudicial conduct; the commission concluded it constituted willful misconduct. The Supreme Court concluded it was only prejudicial conduct, declaring, "The evidence does not establish clearly and convincingly that the acts in question were committed for a purpose other than the faithful discharge of judicial duties and thus amounted to more than spontaneous outbursts." (Kennick, supra, 50 Cal.3d at p. 326.) Perhaps our respondent's outbursts were more protracted, but they were spontaneous in origin and derived from the same motivation—anger and frustration.[83]

I also do not agree that respondent's comments to the jury constituted misconduct. As our Supreme Court has suggested, "It is sometimes difficult to determine the line between 'extremely poor taste' and 'conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute.' "[84] Jurors are the lifeblood of the court system. Performing a civic duty for a pittance, they should be praised, not ridiculed. Nevertheless, I do not believe respondent crossed the line. He lacks courtside manners, but his request of the jury to be careful in crafting their questions is not an actionable offense. The fact the jury foreman "was so upset that he considered deciding the case on grounds other than the evidence" is regrettable—jurors are sworn to render a verdict according to the evidence—but it does not support a finding of misconduct.

[83] The allegations against respondent are unlike another angry judicial outburst examined in Kennick where the judge verbally abused an attorney and later joked about the deed, suggesting the episode was instigated, in whole or part, for the judge's amusement.

I will make no further effort to defend respondent's conduct. It is largely indefensible. The ultimate question—the question that really matters—is whether respondent's conduct, no matter the labels affixed to it, warrants removal from office. Regrettably, questions of penalty cannot be answered with scientific precision. There are no sentencing guidelines for us to follow, no mandatory sentencing laws or three strikes laws applicable to judges. But we are not without guidance. According to the Supreme Court, the sanction of removal is invoked when necessary for "the protection of the public, the enforcement of rigorous standards of judicial conduct, and the maintenance of public confidence in the integrity and independence of the judicial system."[85] Our task is not to punish but " 'to determine the nature of the discipline, if any, that is necessary to achieve these goals.' "[86]

Obviously, what is necessary to protect the public from boorish behavior is different from what may be necessary to protect the public from corrupt decisionmaking based on friendship,[87] a persistent pattern of ex parte contacts and alteration of court records,[88] persistent failures to perform duties in a diligent fashion,[89] accepting gifts from litigants,[90] abuse of the contempt power,[91] prejudgment of cases,[92] or interfering with the conduct of a commission investigation.[93]

Certain conduct is so egregious that even a single instance warrants the severest of sanctions. For example, a judge who accepts a single bribe arguably poses too great a risk to the public and to public confidence in the integrity and independence of the judiciary to be permitted to continue in office. The same cannot be said of intemperance because intemperance can take so many forms and vary in degree. Perhaps that explains why there are no cases removing a judge from office based solely on demeanor violations.[94] This is not to suggest that there will never be a case warranting removal based on outrageous demeanor. This is simply not an appropriate one.

A review of the 14 removal cases published since 1960 confirms this assessment. Of those 14 cases, eight included allegations of intemperate conduct. In Fletcher, supra, 19 Cal.4th 865, the judge engaged in a pattern of ex parte contacts (six counts), prejudged evidence, altered court documents, entered judgment without notice to the parties, and used a photograph of staff for campaign purposes without their consent. The accusation also included a demeanor allegation (berating an attorney in open court: " 'She shouldn't be handling criminal cases' "; " '[She] probably had something more important to do today, like go to a PTA meeting' "; " 'She has a whole bunch of kids. She's been having kids ever since I've known her,' "[95] but it hardly mattered given the weight of the other misconduct.

Kennick, supra, 50 Cal.3d 297 is an interesting case where the judge was removed from office for failure to perform the duties of office. However, he was charged with a multitude of other violations. Among other things, he was found to have been rude and abusive to officers who arrested him for driving under the influence (DUI) and thereafter sought preferential treatment in the investigation of the DUI charge. It was also alleged that he treated attorneys with disrespect. In addition to yelling at a prosecutor, detailed ante, the judge also argued with another deputy district attorney who objected to being addressed as "ma'am" and ordered her " 'not to come in here again,' " to which she responded, " 'Thank you very much. That's a privilege.' " Given the mutual nature of the combat, the Supreme Court disagreed with the determination of prejudicial conduct and ordered the charge dismissed. However, the court concluded the judge had committed prejudicial conduct in addressing female attorneys and others appearing before him as "sweetie," "sweetheart," "honey," or "dear" and in treating both criminal defendants and [94] The majority decision appears to treat respondent's reference to his difficulty as a "demeanor problem" as an effort to minimize the seriousness of his conduct. My use of the term is not so intended; it is a convenient shorthand description of the various allegations at issue in this proceeding.

Nevertheless, while the court found multiple instances of prejudicial conduct and one of willful misconduct based on demeanor and other allegations, in determining whether removal was appropriate, the court concluded: "All this judicial misbehavior by petitioner, though deplorable and clearly calling for censure, falls significantly short of the showings of willful misconduct and prejudicial conduct on which we have based orders removing judges."[97] In brief, the fact that the judge was "demeaning, rude, impatient, and abusive," "addressed women in the courthouse . . . with undue and demeaning familiarity" and "[t]wice . . . yelled at and unjustly intimidated a deputy city attorney, and on another occasion . . . imparted similar treatment to a deputy district attorney" did not warrant removal. (Kennick, supra, 50 Cal.3d at p. 339.)[98]

Kloepfer, supra, 49 Cal.3d 826 is another case in which allegations of poor demeanor are part of a mix of findings that include four acts of willful misconduct and 21 acts of prejudicial conduct. In addition to a "persistent pattern of rude, abusive, and hostile behavior" that makes Judge Van Voorhis seem angelic, Judge Kloepfer persistently abused the contempt power, threatening and finding attorneys and parties in contempt with reckless abandon, and became embroiled in the cases to the point of refusing to dismiss prosecutions on the People's motion based on his personal perception of the defendants' guilt and raising bail in another case based on his view the defendant was " 'fraudulent, a liar, and deceitful.' "[99] There is no comparison between the scope and nature of the charges in Kloepfer and those involved here. The 18 charges of willful misconduct and two of prejudicial conduct in Gonzalez, supra, 33 Cal.3d 359 also do not resemble the charges in the present proceeding. Judge Gonzalez used his judicial office to intercede in criminal matters on behalf of friends, acted improperly on bail releases, impugned the character of his judicial colleagues, made ethnic and racial slurs, and generally conducted himself and his courtroom in a manner befitting a television comedian. Even more egregious than Gonzalez was the case of Cannon, supra, 14 Cal.3d 678, where the judge engaged in 21 acts of willful misconduct and eight acts of prejudicial conduct involving actions that the Supreme Court has described as "bizarre." In Wenger, supra, 29 Cal.3d 615, the court sustained 10 charges of willful misconduct in nine separate

[98] The court ultimately upheld the removal recommendation but based "on the sole ground of persistent failure or inability to perform his judicial duties." (Kennick, supra, 50 Cal.3d at pp. 342–343.)

incidents, including failure of the judge to disqualify himself, abuse of the contempt power, and retaliating against a prosecutor by banishing her from his courtroom because he suspected she had spoken with the commission regarding his judicial performance. Spruance, supra, 13 Cal.3d 778, like Wenger, is another case in which findings of intemperance are overshadowed by findings the judge attempted to influence the disposition of a case against a friend, acquitted a defendant who was the son of a friend and political supporter, reduced a traffic charge against the nephew of a friend and later, in another case involving the same defendant, ordered his own recognizance release to prevent him from being arrested on an outstanding warrant. The judge also solicited another judge to dismiss a traffic citation against him and altered the records to create the impression the dismissal was based on attendance at traffic school.

The one removal case that seems faintly comparable to the present one is Geiler v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications (1973) 10 Cal.3d 270 [110 Cal.Rptr. 201, 515 P.2d 1], in which a judge was removed for bringing the judicial office into disrepute. Judge Geiler, however, did not confine his misconduct to words. He invited a deputy public defender into chambers, produced a battery-powered dildo, and proceeded to thrust the object in the area of the attorney's buttocks. Later, during the attorney's cross-examination of a witness in open court, the judge suggested the dildo might be used to speed up the public defender's cross-examination, a suggestion that the Supreme Court concluded was made with the intent of curtailing cross-examination. Judge Geiler appeared obsessed with sex and public defenders. He used crude, vulgar, and profane language in conversations with court personnel and female attorneys. As to the public defender, the court concluded he arbitrarily and capriciously removed the public defender from cases.

I cite previous removal cases with a full understanding of their limited utility. While some light is shed by precedent, each case we consider is singular and must be decided on the unique facts presented. Still, the fact respondent's conduct in this case is so much less egregious than the conduct in other cases in which demeanor served as the basis for removal should give us pause.

So also a review of cases in which we have imposed censure is instructive. In Roberts v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1983) 33 Cal.3d 739 [190 Cal.Rptr. 910, 661 P.2d 1064] (Roberts), Judge Roberts was censured after he became visibly angry when told by an attorney that the attorney intended to petition the Court of Appeal for review of the judge's ruling, telling the attorney that he was " 'chicken to take the case to trial.' " He poked the attorney in the chest with his finger and told him, " 'Buddy boy, you're not going to get away with this,' " further stating, " 'I'm going to see that you lose this case big.' " When the attorney protested the threat, petitioner replied, " 'I'll threaten you anytime I feel like it.' " He later had ex parte conversations with the attorney on the other side and, after the Court of Appeal reversed his ruling, called the presiding justice and engaged in an angry diatribe. Further, the commission found that in a child neglect proceeding, Judge Roberts " 'improperly acted as an advocate, prejudged issues, abusively curtailed the presentation of evidence, and treated witnesses, litigants and an attorney in a rude, intimidating and demeaning manner.' " The Supreme Court did not review the evidence in detail but noted some examples: In response to an objection by counsel, the judge replied, " 'I don't care whether you object to it or not . . . . I will hear no further objections of this kind, do you understand, Miss [M.]?' " In response to a statement by a minor's mother, he admonished: " 'If you have anything to offer you are going to be sworn. You have no credibility with this court. When you are sworn, let alone volunteer statements, . . . I don't believe a word you have testified to in this courtroom.' " He demonstrated similar impatience towards another witness, interrupting testimony in midsentence and stating: " 'You may step down. I wouldn't believe you under oath. I don't want any more testimony like this. This witness doesn't know in one breath, and in the next breath it makes no difference. She would have [the mother], who had abused her own child, baby sit hers. Now, I don't have to listen to that kind of evidence.' "[100]

And that is not all. Judge Roberts also displayed impatience with a young, inexperienced counsel. During a recess, "he accused her of being incompetent to represent the defendant, and rudely quizzed her regarding her legal experience. As a result of petitioner's loud and angry manner, Miss A. began to cry and left the conference . . . ."[101] Finally, Judge Roberts was convicted of violating section 148 of the Penal Code (resisting, delaying, or obstructing a public officer) based on his interference with uniformed California Highway Patrol officers who stopped a car being driven erratically by the judge's son.

Censure was also considered an appropriate sanction in In re Stevens (1982) 31 Cal.3d 403 [183 Cal.Rptr. 48, 645 P.2d 99] (Stevens), which involved the conduct of a judge who remarked to counsel that Black persons have to learn how to live in their own neighborhoods and that it was "typical" of Black persons to fight unfairly. During his term in office, the judge frequently referred to Black persons as " 'Jig, dark boy, colored boy, nigger, coon, Amos and Andy, and jungle bunny.' "[102] The commission recommended censure in In re Gordon (1996) 13 Cal.4th 472 [53 Cal.Rptr.2d 788, 917 P.2d 627].

Dodds v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1995) 12 Cal.4th 163 [48 Cal.Rptr.2d 106, 906 P.2d 1260] (Dodds) is another censure case worthy of mention. Judge Dodds was found to have failed to report a law violation by a colleague and to have suggested to his staff that they also refuse to cooperate. More relevant to the present case, it was also determined that Judge Dodds on several occasions engaged in rudeness and prejudgment in the handling of cases and on one occasion spoke insultingly of two lawyers who had appeared before him. His rudeness included interrupting and yelling loudly and angrily at counsel and a litigant, as well as telling a joke that suggested bias. The Supreme Court concluded one of the offensive remarks was outside the statute of limitations and could not be considered and determined the remaining allegations did not support censure. Noting the judge had won praise from the bar and approval of the electorate, the court concluded public censure would not further the purpose of judicial discipline. The commission's recommendation thus was rejected. Declaring, "Cases in which we have publicly censured judges involve conduct more serious than that involved here,"[103] the court cited a long list of censure cases, some of which in my estimation involved conduct more serious than the conduct here under consideration. Thus, in Fitch v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1995) 9 Cal.4th 552, 556 [37 Cal.Rptr.2d 581, 887 P.2d 937] the judge told a court reporter, " 'Your butt looks good in that dress,' " and also said, " 'I certainly hope you're not that frigid at home with your husband.' " For good measure, the judge slapped or patted a court reporter and a court trainee on their buttocks.

Another factor in deciding an appropriate sanction is our assessment of the likelihood that the judge will reoffend. The majority decision indicates it is not merely likely, it is "close to a certainty." The near certainty is inspired by respondent's testimony before the masters and before the commission. The import of his testimony, according to the majority decision, is that respondent presents himself as well meaning but "misunderstood" and refuses to take responsibility for his actions or the problems created by them. The decision quotes liberally from colloquies between respondent and participants in these proceedings to make the point that respondent remains unremorseful; inasmuch as reform begins with repentance, Judge Van Voorhis is incapable of reform.

I would be persuaded by this logic had the evidence against the respondent been undisputed and the heinousness of his conduct conceded. Certainly, in all cases, respondents before the commission would be well advised of the value of contrition. However, a respondent is entitled to present a defense notwithstanding the unfavorable findings of the masters. Judge Van Voorhis appeared before the commission to dispute certain evidence and to explain his conduct. I do not regard his statement that he is often misunderstood as the ranting of a petulant adolescent attempting to evade responsibility for his actions. Respondent is simply acknowledging that he is hard and tough and crusty and becomes more so with age—but that beneath that exterior he attempts to be fair and compassionate. Despite his best efforts, he at times crosses the line. We have correctly rejected this plea as a defense. But it should not be viewed as a matter in aggravation. I do not begrudge respondent for his clumsy and ultimately unsuccessful effort to persuade us that he should be forgiven. He is simply explaining why conduct that comes naturally to some of us can be an effort for him.

I respect the opinions of my colleagues. Their assessment of respondent is probably correct in certain respects. Judge Van Voorhis will likely always be testy and somewhat ill humored. Perhaps charm and geniality will not be his hallmark. But that is not an appropriate measure of his prospects for reform and future judicial temperance. Judicial temperance is not the ability to ingratiate but the ability to keep the pressures of the moment from overpowering judicial composure. The question is whether he can conform his conduct to what is expected of him by the California Code of Judicial Ethics as construed and applied by this commission and by the Supreme Court. I am persuaded that he can. It would be nice if we had a greater array of sanction options—suspension, probation, compulsory education programs—to provide greater assurance.[104] I understand that my colleagues believe censure is too weak a sanction. I believe removal is too great.

Like Justice Raye, I believe that the removal of Judge Van Voorhis from his judicial office is too harsh an action. I, too, would find censure more than adequate for his misdeeds. Judge Van Voorhis's conduct does not, as Justice Raye so ably points out, represent the type of behavior for which the ultimate sanction is warranted. In short, I fully join in Justice Raye's separate statement dissenting from the commission's decision and order.

[104] Regrettably, we are without the authority conferred on judicial commissions in other states to impose discipline greater than reprimand or censure but less than removal. Suspension and training might be appropriate in this matter.

I write separately only to note that, while the precedent Justice Raye cites makes it clear that the discipline imposed on Judge Van Voorhis is excessive, we have come a long way from some of the attitudes reflected in several of the earlier cases and I would not want our examination of them to suggest an endorsement of each and every result. Times have changed and so have our standards. For example, I believe that the conduct that led the California Supreme Court to censure Judge Stevens a generation ago would today unquestionably demand his removal. In my view, in a number of areas including race and gender bias, we should hold our judiciary to a higher level of conduct than we did on some occasions in the past. (I hasten to add that Judge Van Voorhis was guilty of no such offense.) Still, all in all, our precedent retains a certain value and wisdom, and I would not abandon it as completely as my colleagues in the majority appear willing to do. More particularly, I would reserve the sanction of removal for jurists whose misconduct is more willful and egregious, and constitutes a more central affront to the judicial function.

The judge's petition for review was denied September 10, 2003.

INQUIRY CONCERNING JUDGE D. RONALD HYDE

SUMMARY

A disciplinary matter was brought concerning a superior court judge.

The commission on Judicial Performance ordered the judge removed from office. The commission found that the judge had used his judicial position to obtain confidential information from restricted Department of Motor Vehicles records that pertained to a matter of personal interest to him, not to business before the court. He also told a sexual story to a new court executive officer and a member of the clerk's office. The judge prevented a continuance of his daughter's small claims case and selected his replacement for the case. He failed to provide the prosecutor or the defense attorney with a copy of his letter to a criminal defendant and failed to give the prosecutor notice of his letter or an opportunity to respond. The judge also failed to disclose his telephone conversation with another criminal defendant and his relationship to her family. He improperly acted as a domestic violence victim's advocate. Finally, after being disqualified from a case, the judge initiated an ex parte substantive discussion with his successor judge.

The commission observed that the judge had previously received three advisory letters, a private admonishment, and a severe public censure. In the instant proceeding, the commission determined that the judge had committed two acts of willful misconduct, four acts of conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brought the judicial office into disrepute, and one act of improper action. The commission further determined that at least four of the judge's most recent acts of misconduct were for unethical conduct for which he had been previously disciplined. In addition, the judge's lack of candor in his filings with the commission raised serious questions about his integrity. The judge's persistence in violating the standards of judicial conduct, his inability or unwillingness to learn from prior discipline, and his general approach to the commission and to the disciplinary proceeding precluded the commission from having any confidence that he would not continue to violate the California Code of Judicial Ethics if allowed to remain on the bench. The commission concluded that, despite the judge's contributions to his community and his court, the totality of the circumstances mandated the judge's removal for the protection of the public, the enforcement of rigorous standards of judicial conduct, and the maintenance of public confidence in the integrity and independence of the judicial system. (Opinion by Risë Jones Pichon, Chairperson.)

(1) Judges § 6—Willful Misconduct—Accessing DMV Records for Personal Use.—The judge who used his judicial position to obtain confidential information from restricted Department of Motor Vehicles records for his personal use engaged in willful misconduct and violated Cal. Code Jud. Ethics, canons 1, 2A, 2B(2) and 3B(11).

(2) Judges § 6—Discipline—Canons.—Cal. Code Jud. Ethics, canon 1, provides that a judge shall uphold the integrity and independence of the judiciary. Cal. Code Jud. Ethics, canon 2A, provides that a judge shall avoid impropriety and the appearance of impropriety. Cal. Code Jud. Ethics, canon 2B(2) provides that a judge shall not lend the prestige of judicial office to advance the personal interests of the judge. Cal. Code Jud. Ethics, canon 3B(11), provides that a judge shall not disclose or use, for any purpose unrelated to judicial duties, nonpublic information acquired in a judicial capacity.

(3) Judges § 6—Discipline—Willful Misconduct—Elements.—Willful misconduct by a judge is (1) unjudicial conduct that is (2) committed in bad faith (3) by a judge acting in his or her judicial capacity. A judge acts in bad faith only by (1) performing a judicial act for a corrupt purpose (which is any purpose other than the faithful discharge of judicial duties), (2) performing a judicial act with knowledge that the act is beyond the judge's lawful power, or (3) performing a judicial act that exceeds the judge's lawful power with a conscious disregard for the limits of the judge's authority.

(4) Judges § 6—Discipline—Prejudicial Conduct.—Unjudicial conduct by a judge performed in bad faith but not committed in a judicial capacity may constitute prejudicial conduct.

(5) Judges § 6—Discipline—Prejudicial Misconduct.—Prejudicial misconduct does not require actual notoriety, but only that the conduct, if known to an objective observer, would appear to be prejudicial to public esteem for the judicial office. The judge's intent or motivation is not a significant factor in assessing whether prejudicial misconduct has occurred. Prejudicial misconduct includes conduct that a judge undertakes in good faith but that nevertheless would appear to an objective observer to be not only unjudicial conduct but conduct prejudicial to the public esteem for the judicial office.

(6) Judges § 6—Prejudicial Misconduct—Telling Story of Sexual Nature to Court Employees.—The judge who told a story concerning a former court employee engaging in oral sex in the courthouse parking lot to the new court executive officer and a member of the clerk's office, in a manner that could be overheard by other court employees, engaged in prejudicial misconduct and violated Cal. Code Jud. Ethics, canons 1, 2A and 3B(4).

(7) Judges § 6—Prejudicial Misconduct—Interfering in Daughter's Small Claims Case.—The judge who prevented the continuance of his daughter's small claims case and selected a pro tem judge to hear the case violated Cal. Code Jud. Ethics, canons 1, 2A, 3B(2) and 3E(1), and engaged in prejudicial misconduct.

(8) Judges § 6—Improper Action—Ex Parte Communication.—The judge committed improper action by failing to provide the prosecutor or the defense attorney with a copy of a letter sent to him by a criminal defendant, and violated Cal. Code Jud. Ethics, canons 1, 2A and 3B(7).

(9) Judges § 6—Prejudicial Misconduct—Ex Parte Communication.—The judge who failed to disclose an ex parte discussion with a probationer and his relationship to her family when the probationer appeared before him to request a waiver of her probation engaged in prejudicial misconduct and violated Cal. Code Jud. Ethics, canons 2A and 3E(2). Even in a small town, an objective observer would view a judge's failure to disclose a prior relationship and an ex parte communication as prejudicial to the administration of justice.

(10) Judges § 6—Prejudicial Misconduct—Ex Parte Communication—Embroilment.—The judge who had an ex parte conversation with the wife of a criminal defendant after presiding over the defendant's domestic violence case and intervened on the wife's behalf in her efforts to serve marital dissolution papers on the defendant and receive a fee waiver engaged in prejudicial misconduct and violated Cal. Code Jud. Ethics, canons 2A, 2B(1), 2B(2) and 3B(7). The conversation concerned much more than ministerial matters, and the judge became embroiled in the matter.

(11) Judges § 6—Willful Misconduct—Disqualification—Communication with Successor Judge.—The judge engaged in willful misconduct and violated Cal. Code Jud. Ethics, canons 1, 2A, 2B(2) and 3B(7) by, after being disqualified, assigning a case to another judge, communicating with the successor judge about his reasons for increasing the defendant's bail, and asking the successor judge to "back me up" on his bail increase. A disqualified judge cannot have a proper judicial purpose in initiating an ex parte substantive discussion with his or her successor judge.

(12) Judges § 6.4—Discipline—Proceedings—Duty to Cooperate—Judge's Responses.—The Rules of the Commission on Judicial Performance spell out the requirements that a judge be forthright and cooperate with the Commission on Judicial Performance. Rules of Com. on Jud. Performance, rule 104(a), requires that a judge shall cooperate with the commission and provides that a judge's cooperation or lack of cooperation may be considered by the commission in determining the appropriate disciplinary sanction or disposition. Rules of Com. on Jud. Performance, rule 119, requires that a judge's answer to a notice of formal proceedings be as complete and straightforward as the information reasonably available to the respondent judge permits. In addition, Rules of Com. on Jud. Performance, rule 106, provides that written communications by a respondent judge's attorney shall be deemed to be the written communication of the judge. The signing of any document or statement warrants that the signer has personal knowledge of the matter contained in the document or statement or has investigated the matter and has a good faith belief in the accuracy of the representations contained in the document.

(13) Judges § 6.4—Discipline—Proceedings—Credibility.—The Commission on Judicial Performance, following the Supreme Court's guidance, gives considerable weight to the masters' comments on credibility.

(14) Judges § 6.4—Discipline—Proceedings—Factors.—Once the Commission on Judicial Performance has determined that allegations of misconduct have been demonstrated by clear and convincing evidence, the commission must determine the appropriate discipline. The purpose of a disciplinary proceeding is not punishment, but rather the protection of the public, the enforcement of rigorous standards of judicial conduct, and the maintenance of public confidence in the integrity and independence of the judicial system. In determining the appropriate discipline, each case must be considered on its own facts. Nonetheless, the commission looks to opinions of the Supreme Court and its own prior decisions for guidance in exercising its responsibility to determine the appropriate discipline in a particular case. The commission has identified five factors that are particularly relevant to its determination of discipline: (1) the number of acts of misconduct; (2) the effect of prior discipline on the judge's conduct; (3) concerns regarding the judge's integrity; (4) whether the judge is likely to continue to engage in unethical conduct; and (5) the impact of this matter on the judicial system. In addition, the commission considers the mitigating evidence offered by the judge.

(15) Judges § 6.4—Discipline—Proceedings—Number of Wrongful Acts.—The number of a judge's wrongful acts is relevant to determining whether they were isolated occurrences or part of a course of conduct that reflects a lack of temperament and ability to perform judicial functions in an evenhanded manner.

(16) Judges § 6.4—Discipline—Proceedings—Prior Discipline.—The California Supreme Court has often looked at whether a judge has received prior discipline and the effect of such discipline in determining the appropriate discipline for wrongful conduct. The Supreme Court has noted that it would hesitate to remove a judge who showed himself or herself ready, willing, and able to reform under a less severe sanction.

(17) Judges § 1—Honesty.—Honesty is a minimal qualification that is expected of every judge.

(18) Judges § 6.4—Discipline—Proceedings—Likelihood of Future Violations.—In determining whether a judge is likely to again violate the California Code of Judicial Ethics, the Commission on Judicial Performance reviews a judge's approach to the current proceedings and other indicia of the judge's recognition of, and ability to conform to, the standards of judicial conduct.

(19) Judges § 6.4—Discipline—Proceedings—Mitigating Factors.—Character evidence and evidence of a judge's contributions to the judicial system do not mitigate or excuse willful misconduct, but may be considered in determining the appropriate discipline.

(20) Judges § 6.2—Discipline—Grounds—Willful and Prejudicial Misconduct—Lack of Candor—Removal from Office.—After having received three advisory letters, a private admonishment, and a severe public censure, the judge was again before the Commission on Judicial Performance. The commission determined that the judge had committed two acts of willful misconduct, four acts of conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brought the judicial office into disrepute, and one act of improper action. The commission further determined that at least four of the judge's most recent acts of misconduct were for unethical conduct for which he had been previously disciplined. In addition, the judge's lack of candor in his filings with the commission and the masters' concerns with the judge's credibility raised serious questions about his integrity. Those factors compelled the removal of the judge from office.

PICHON, Chairperson.—This disciplinary matter concerns Judge D. Ronald Hyde, a judge of the Alameda County Superior Court. The notice of formal proceedings charged Judge Hyde with seven incidents of unethical conduct.

The Commission on Judicial Performance agrees with the special masters that the seven charges are supported by clear and convincing evidence and that Judge Hyde committed two acts of willful misconduct, four acts of conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that bring the judicial office into disrepute, and one act of improper action. In determining the appropriate discipline the commission also must consider Judge Hyde's five prior disciplines, the close relationship between his current misconduct and the prior misconduct for which he was disciplined, Judge Hyde's lack of candor in his filings with the commission, and concerns about his credibility. For the reasons more fully set forth in this decision, the commission hereby removes Judge D. Ronald Hyde from the bench.

PROCEDURAL HISTORY

Judge Hyde was appointed to the Livermore-Pleasanton-Dublin Municipal Court in 1982 and elevated to the Alameda County Superior Court on July 31, 1998, as a result of the consolidation of the courts.

On October 23, 2001, the commission sent a preliminary investigation letter to Judge Hyde. Following Judge Hyde's response, a further investigation letter was sent to Judge Hyde on December 18, 2001, and Judge Hyde filed a response.

A notice of formal proceedings was filed on June 17, 2002, and Judge Hyde filed his verified answer on July 31, 2002. Meanwhile, on July 12, 2002, a supplemental preliminary investigation letter was sent to Judge Hyde. Judge Hyde's response to the letter was received on August 14, 2002. On October 17, 2002, a first amended notice of formal proceedings was filed, and Judge Hyde filed his verified answer to the first amended notice on November 4, 2002.

On August 2, 2002, the Supreme Court, in response to the commission's request, appointed three special masters. An evidentiary hearing was held from March 24 through March 27, 2003, in San Francisco, California, before the special masters: Judge Joseph F. Biafore of the Superior Court of Santa Clara County, presiding; Judge Bradley L. Boeckman of the Superior Court of Shasta County; and Judge Talmadge R. Jones of the Superior Court of Sacramento County. Mr. Jack Coyle and Mr. Andrew Blum of the commission's office of trial counsel presented the case in support of the charges. Judge Hyde was represented by Mr. James A. Murphy and Mr. Harlan B. Watkins of Murphy, Pearson, Bradley & Feeney of San Francisco, California. On June 13, 2003, the masters submitted their 54-page report to the commission.

Following the receipt of objections and briefs from Judge Hyde and the office of trial counsel, the matter was heard by the commission on August 27, 2003. Mr. Coyle presented argument on behalf of trial counsel. Judge Hyde was represented by Mr. Murphy and Mr. Watkins. Judge Hyde presented argument on his own behalf and answered questions from commission members.

REQUESTS TO TAKE ADDITIONAL EVIDENCE

Two weeks before argument, Judge Hyde's counsel submitted a letter requesting a continuance to allow further evidence to be taken. The letter alleged that "it would have been prejudicial to respondent to present the evidence during the Rule 123 hearing before the special masters." On August 18, 2003, trial counsel submitted a letter opposing the request. On August 19, 2003, the commission denied the letter request for a continuance.[1]

In the days immediately preceding the hearing, Judge Hyde requested that the commission consider four additional letters from attorneys and a judge in support of Judge Hyde. At the hearing, Judge Hyde requested that the commission take additional evidence, and he proffered a package of materials which were described as his resume, the results of a survey form filled out by attorneys and court staff concerning Judge Hyde's performance over the last several months, and additional letters in support of Judge Hyde. The commission took the requests under submission.

The commission now denies the request to consider the four letters and the request to take additional evidence. The commission's rules contemplate that all evidence, including mitigation evidence, be presented at the evidentiary hearing before the masters.[2] Nonetheless, rule 133 provides that the commission may order the taking of additional evidence.

[1] The commission's order noted that there had been "no proffer of the proposed 'further evidence,' and no showing of why the evidence was not provided to the special masters or why it would have been 'prejudicial' to have done so." At the hearing, when asked by a commission member, Judge Hyde's counsel was unable to explain why it would have been "prejudicial" to have presented the evidence to the special masters.

Judge Hyde has failed to present good cause for the commission to reopen the record. The letters in support of Judge Hyde could have been, and should have been, obtained prior to the evidentiary hearing before the masters and offered into the record at that time. Absent exceptional circumstances (and none has been alleged), evidence of a judge's performance subsequent to the masters' hearing and report is not appropriate for inclusion in the record. There must always be some passage of time between the filing of the masters' report and the judge's appearance before the commission. If evidence of the judge's performance during this period of time was routinely admitted, the record could never be closed. Furthermore, Judge Hyde had not shown the materials proffered at the hearing to trial counsel. Finally, it should be noted that due process concerns would arise were the commission to consider in a formal proceeding a new complaint against the judge (that had not been included in an amended notice of formal proceedings and proved by evidence submitted at a public evidentiary hearing).

FINDINGS OF FACT AND CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

A. Count One

1. Findings of Fact

One workday morning before September 2001, Judge Hyde walked into the traffic clerk's area of the courthouse, approached clerk Denise Silva, told her that a driver had "cut him off" on the way to work, gave her a vehicle license plate number, and asked her to obtain the Department of Motor Vehicles (DMV) records for the driver. Ms. Silva used her computer to obtain the DMV information and gave it to Judge Hyde.

There was no case pending before the Pleasanton court to which these DMV records related. The records accessed are part of the California Law Enforcement Telecommunications System (CLETS) which is not available to the general public. The court clerks are trained regarding the confidentiality of DMV records, including the basic restriction that the records may be accessed only for court business. The clerks are required to sign acknowledgements that violations of confidentiality may result in dismissal from employment and criminal or civil action.

[2] See rules 121 and 123 of the Rules of the Commission on Judicial Performance. The provision in rule 121 allowing the commission to hold the hearing before itself has not been used since 1995.

Judges are generally aware that access to DMV records is restricted to court business. Judge Hyde was specifically on notice because in 1996 he was publicly censured for, among other things, having court personnel access DMV records for matters "not related to court business." Judge Hyde was also on notice that clerks were required to sign acknowledgements of the confidentiality of DMV records.

After reviewing the DMV records, Judge Hyde telephoned the Pleasanton police to report the driver to a police officer. The judge either identified himself as a judge or the officer recognized him as a judge. In any event, the judge did not indicate that he was calling as a private citizen. Judge Hyde told the officer he had checked the driver's record and did not want a complaint filed, but wanted the police to "issue a cautionary warning." Judge Hyde's decision to request a cautionary warning was based on his review of the DMV record, which showed that the driver had a "pretty good record." Judge Hyde testified that, if the DMV record had revealed that the driver had a bad record, he would have filed a complaint.

Judge Hyde asserted that his actions were motivated by a concern for public safety. The masters, however, found, and the commission agrees, that Judge Hyde's primary motivation was anger at the driver. During his testimony before the masters, Judge Hyde stated that he told Ms. Silva "some idiot cut me off." The masters noted that Judge Hyde did not call the police while the driver was still on the road, purportedly endangering others, even though he had a cell phone in the car. Instead, he stopped for coffee and drove on to the courthouse. He then went to his chambers and approached Ms. Silva while on his way to his courtroom.

2. Conclusions of Law

(1) The masters concluded, and the commission agrees, that Judge Hyde's use of his judicial position to obtain confidential information from restricted DMV records that pertained to a matter of personal interest to him, not to business before the court, constitutes willful misconduct.[3] (2) Judge Hyde's conduct violated California Code of Judicial Ethics (further references to a canon are to this code) canons 1 (a judge shall uphold the integrity and independence of the judiciary), 2A (a judge shall avoid impropriety and the appearance of impropriety), 2B(2) (a judge shall not lend the prestige of judicial office to advance the personal interests of the judge),

[3] Willful misconduct as a matter of law includes the lesser offense of prejudicial misconduct.

and 3B(11) (a judge shall not disclose or use, for any purpose unrelated to judicial duties, nonpublic information acquired in a judicial capacity).[4]

(3) Willful misconduct is (1) unjudicial conduct that is (2) committed in bad faith (3) by a judge acting in his or her judicial capacity.[5] A judge acts in bad faith only by (1) performing a judicial act for a corrupt purpose (which is any purpose other than the faithful discharge of judicial duties), or (2) performing a judicial act with knowledge that the act is beyond the judge's lawful power, or (3) performing a judicial act that exceeds the judge's lawful power with a conscious disregard for the limits of the judge's authority.[6]

The masters concluded, and the commission agrees, that Judge Hyde acted in bad faith as his purpose in accessing DMV records was personal and not the faithful discharge of judicial duties. The masters properly rejected Judge Hyde's claim that he could review the DMV records because of his concern for public safety.[7]

The commission also agrees with the masters' conclusion that the bad faith element of willful misconduct was independently satisfied because Judge Hyde knew that he was acting beyond his lawful judicial power when he accessed the restricted DMV records. Judge Hyde was publicly censured in 1996 for conduct that included asking court employees to access DMV records "for the purpose of obtaining information regarding motorists that was not related to court business." In negotiating the censure, Judge Hyde signed a statement that he was "aware of the inappropriateness" of his actions and he represented that he had "taken steps to ensure that neither court personnel nor county equipment is utilized in any manner or any activity that is not strictly court related."

[4] Judge Hyde misinterprets canon 3B(11) when in his brief he argues that he did not violate the canon because there was no evidence that he used nonpublic information for any "personal advantage." The canon states that a judge shall not use nonpublic information "for any purpose unrelated to judicial duties."

[7] The masters noted: "The penal code is patently irrelevant to the conduct at issue. Judge Hyde cannot seriously contend that he was consciously acting pursuant to the penal code when he accessed the DMV records, nor that the penal code provides a justification for his actions. There was no case pending involving the driver and even if there had been, Judge Hyde would be disqualified from taking any judicial action because he was a percipient witness."

When Judge Hyde asked Ms. Silva to access the DMV records, he was "acting in his judicial capacity."[8] Judge Hyde did not give Ms. Silva advice, but made a request as a judge to a clerk to perform a task that was a normal duty for a clerk. Ms. Silva could not reasonably have been expected to refuse. In his testimony before the masters, Judge Hyde conceded that he was acting as a judge when he asked Ms. Silva to access the DMV records.

(4) Judge Hyde's contention that the commission is collaterally estopped from finding that he acted in his judicial capacity is without merit. The first requirement of the doctrine of collateral estoppel is that "the issue necessarily decided in the previous suit is identical to the issue sought to be relitigated . . . ."[9] One of the findings in Judge Hyde's May 10, 1996 public censure is that between "1991 and 1995, Judge Hyde asked various court employees to access DMV records for the purpose of obtaining information regarding motorists that was not related to court business." The public censure notes that the "stipulated facts establish repeated instances of conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice," and in a footnote states: "The use of DMV records for personal purposes comes very close to willful misconduct in office. The stipulated facts do not afford, however, clear and convincing evidence that Judge Hyde's actions were performed in a judicial capacity. Dodds v. Commission on Judicial Performance[, supra,] 12 Cal.4th 163." The commission's finding of repeated instances of prejudicial conduct did not require a determination of whether Judge Hyde had acted in his judicial capacity because actions by a judge not committed in a judicial capacity may constitute prejudicial conduct.[10] The commission's footnote, rather than adjudicating a necessary basis for the commission's action, was a warning—not heeded by Judge Hyde—that accessing DMV materials for personal purposes might well constitute willful misconduct. In sum, the commission is not estopped from concluding that Judge Hyde acted in a judicial capacity when he directed Ms. Silva to access DMV records.

B. Count Two

1. Findings of Fact

On November 1, 2000, Arthur Sims, the new Alameda County Court Executive Officer, made an initial visit to the Pleasanton courthouse. He was given a tour of the facilities by two members of the clerk's office, Michelle Sunseri and Sue Stewart. Following the tour, Mr. Sims was taken by them to a break room in the civil clerk's area to meet court staff.

Judge Hyde, who had been on the bench when Mr. Sims stopped by his department, came to the break room to meet Mr. Sims, whom he had not met before. Judge Hyde started telling anecdotes and stories about the history of the court, which had been located in Livermore until the late 1980's. Staff members[11] were entering and leaving the room and Ms. Stewart was seated within a few feet of Mr. Sims.

One of the stories Judge Hyde related to Mr. Sims and Ms. Stewart was about two people in a car engaged in oral sex in the courthouse parking lot, one of whom was a former court employee. Judge Hyde did not have an intimate conversation with Mr. Sims, but spoke in a manner that could be heard by the employees who were in the break room. Mr. Sims and Ms. Stewart heard Judge Hyde tell this story and use the term "blow job." Ms. Stewart was "completely embarrassed" that the judge related this story and used this language in the presence of the new court executive officer. Mr. Sims testified that he found Judge Hyde's statement "kind of strange, kind of weird." The masters found, and the commission agrees, that Judge Hyde's purpose in telling anecdotes and stories about the old courthouse was to be entertaining.

2. Conclusions of Law

(5) Judge Hyde's conduct constitutes "conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute." (Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (d).) Prejudicial misconduct does not require actual notoriety, but only that the conduct, if known to an objective observer, would appear to be prejudicial to public esteem for the judicial office.[12] The judge's intent or motivation is not a significant factor in assessing whether prejudicial misconduct has occurred.[13] Prejudicial misconduct includes " ' "conduct which a judge undertakes in good faith but which nevertheless would appear to an objective observer to be not only unjudicial conduct but conduct prejudicial to the public esteem for the judicial office . . . .' "[14]

[11] There was testimony that at this time all the employees of the clerk's office were female.

(6) Under the circumstances, Judge Hyde, by telling a sexual story using the particular language, violated canons 1, 2A, and 3B(4).[15] The commission agrees with the masters that: "It is irrelevant whether or not the anecdote or story was true, as the judge asserts; its veracity is not at issue. And the judge's contention that he was merely repeating a story that had been told to him using the term 'blow job' is not a defense; repetition of such an offensive, sexual story in these circumstances demeans the judiciary."

C. Count Three

1. Findings of Fact

In December 1999, the judge's daughter, Suzanne Hyde, was involved in a minor car accident in a Pleasanton shopping mall. Ms. Hyde decided to sue the other driver in small claims court in Pleasanton. On December 21, 2000, Judge Hyde brought the paperwork for his daughter's small claims case to the clerk's area to be filed. He gave the paperwork to a clerk and asked for the case to be set for night court. The case was set for the night of January 23, 2001.

Small claims cases were heard in the Pleasanton court during the day and on one evening per month. Judges were assigned to the night calendars, and the daytime small claims matters were usually heard by attorneys sitting as pro tempore (pro tem) judges. The judges sometimes switched their night court calendars with each other, and pro tems were occasionally used.

When the January 23 hearing date was set for Ms. Hyde's case, the judges' assignments to the night court calendars had not been made. On January 3, 2001, the administrator sent a memorandum to the judges and clerical staff setting forth the judges' night court assignments for 2001. On this schedule, Judge Hyde was assigned to hear night court on January 23.

On January 8, 2001, clerk Maria Mateo, having noticed that Judge Hyde was scheduled to preside over the January 23 evening small claims calendar, [14] Broadman v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 18 Cal.4th 1079, 1104, citing Doan v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 11 Cal.4th 294, 312.

[15] Canon 3B(4) states that a judge "shall be patient, dignified, and courteous to litigants, jurors, witnesses, lawyers, and others with whom the judge deals in an official capacity." Judge Hyde met with Mr. Sims in his "judicial capacity . . . ." The commission rejects the argument in Judge Hyde's brief that because canon 3B is entitled "Adjudicative Responsibilities," canon 3B(4) does not apply when a judge is acting in his or her judicial capacity, but is not exercising an adjudicative responsibility.

called Ms. Hyde and left a message that her court date would need to be rescheduled. The next day, Judge Hyde approached Ms. Mateo and told her to keep Ms. Hyde's case on the January 23 calendar.[16]

Around midafternoon on January 23, 2001, a clerk reminded Judge Hyde that he was scheduled to preside in night court that evening and that his daughter's case was on the calendar. Judge Hyde testified before the masters that he had forgotten that he was scheduled to preside that evening.

Judge Hyde then called longtime pro tem, John Harding, and asked him to cover the January 23 night court because he had an unspecified conflict. Judge Hyde contacted Mr. Harding because he lived nearby, was well liked and respected by the court clerks and had a reputation for honesty and integrity. Judge Hyde had been acquainted with Mr. Harding since he was a child. He knew Mr. Harding as an adult through their mutual service as directors in the local Rotary Club.

Mr. Harding agreed to handle the January 23 night court calendar. When he saw the Suzanne Hyde case file that night, he realized that the conflict involved a family member of the judge's, and disclosed to the defendant that he knew Judge Hyde. The defendant waived the conflict, and both parties and Ms. Hyde's sister testified. Mr. Harding rendered judgment in Ms. Hyde's favor, but he awarded her less than the full amount of damages she sought.

In January 2001, the assignment of pro tems for small claims calendars was the responsibility of Michelle Sunseri, the secretary to the administrator, Ms. Norcup. Ms. Sunseri kept an organized list of more than 50 pro tems. A certain group of pro tems could be counted on to fill in at the last minute.

Judge Hyde did not ask anyone to find a pro tem for the evening's calendar. The masters found that there was no reason that court staff could not have obtained a pro tem for that evening. The commission concurs with the masters' rejection of Judge Hyde's claim that his call to Mr. Harding was not unusual. Ms. Norcup, Ms. Sunseri, Ms. Stewart and Judge Hugh Walker all testified that judges did not help in obtaining pro tems. Mr. Harding testified that other than on January 23, he has never been called directly by a judge to serve as a pro tem.

[16] The masters rejected Judge Hyde's suggestion that the clerk approached him. They explained: "We find no reason to doubt Ms. Mateo's testimony that it was the judge who approached her. Ms. Mateo discussed the conflict issue with her supervisor before leaving the message for Suzanne Hyde, had no contact with Judge Hyde before leaving the message (even under the judge's version of the facts), had chosen to leave a message for the litigant, not her father, and had done so only the day before. It would not make sense that Ms. Mateo, an experienced clerk who was promoted to supervisor shortly thereafter, would the next day choose to initiate a conversation with Judge Hyde and ask him what he wanted to do about scheduling, as Judge Hyde claims. On the other hand, it does make sense that the judge would approach Ms. Mateo—a message for his daughter had been left the day before, the judge admits generally that he discussed the status of the case with his daughter, and most significant, he clearly had a definite opinion that the case should not be continued."

2. Conclusions of Law

a. Telling Clerk to Keep the Date

(7) Judge Hyde's prevention of the continuance of his daughter's small claims case constituted prejudicial misconduct and violated canons 1, 2A, 2B(2) and 3E(1) (a judge shall disqualify himself in any proceeding in which disqualification is required by law).

Judge Hyde acknowledged that he was disqualified by law from any proceeding in which his daughter is a party. Yet he continued to be involved in his daughter's case by telling the clerk to keep the January 23 date, solely for the admitted reason of his daughter's convenience. Judge Hyde used the authority of his position to confer a benefit on his daughter.

The masters concluded that Judge Hyde's intervention constituted prejudicial misconduct rather than willful misconduct because there was evidence that "Judge Hyde would have made efforts to maintain a trial date in order to avoid the inconvenience to a litigant in any case where a conflict existed." Accordingly, the masters declined to find that Judge Hyde acted in "bad faith." The commission questions whether a "corrupt purpose" of knowingly benefiting a relative should be ameliorated by a finding that the judge would have extended a similar benefit to any other litigant, but, in this particular case, the commission accedes to the masters' conclusion that Judge Hyde's intervention with the clerk constituted only prejudicial misconduct.

b. Picking the Pro Tem

Judge Hyde's selection of his replacement also constituted prejudicial misconduct and violated canons 1, 2A and 3E(1). By selecting the pro tem who would hear his daughter's case, Judge Hyde at a minimum created the appearance of using his position to gain an advantage for his daughter. The appearance of attempting to help was exacerbated by the fact that he did not call a randomly selected pro tem, but someone with whom he had a social relationship. Judge Hyde contends that Mr. Harding was one of the most respected pro tems and that any pro tem would have ruled as Mr. Harding did. The commission agrees with the masters that even if these contentions are true, they are irrelevant. As the masters explained, the "issue is not whether the judge's conduct affected the case outcome (which was not alleged), but the propriety of the judge's involvement in his daughter's case."

When reminded of the conflict on the evening calendar, Judge Hyde should have allowed the clerk to select a pro tem. However, the commission agrees with the masters that Judge Hyde did not act in "bad faith" when he immediately called Mr. Harding.

D. Count Four

1. Findings of Fact

On June 14, 2000, Judge Hyde sentenced Eddie Streeter on a charge of misdemeanor injury to a child. The sentence included three years of probation.

A year later, while Judge Hyde was on vacation, a letter from Mr. Streeter to Judge Hyde arrived at the Pleasanton courthouse. In the letter, Mr. Streeter requested that his probation be considered fully satisfied because he and his family were relocating out of state and he had completed the court-ordered program of counseling. Mr. Streeter's letter also thanked Judge Hyde for getting directly involved in pulling his family together and perhaps saving him and his son from further self-destruction.

In Judge Hyde's absence, Judge Walker held a hearing on Mr. Streeter's request. Judge Walker granted his request for early termination of probation and dismissed the action pursuant to Penal Code section 1203.4.

On the minute order of Judge Walker's ruling, a clerk noted, "Judge Hyde to see the letter." Judge Hyde testified that when he returned from vacation the letter and court file were on his desk. Judge Hyde wrote Mr. Streeter a letter dated July 5, 2001, which read in part: "There is no problem with you leaving the state. And, not only can you leave, but I am terminating your probation on an early basis, if for no other reason than you have truly earned it. . . . I am further enclosing a 1203.4 form for you to sign and submit to the Court. You need not be present at the hearing, but may if you wish. This allows the plea of guilty to be withdrawn and the matter dismissed and thus be off your record for most purposes."

Judge Hyde did not send a copy of the letter to the district attorney's office or to the defense attorney. Judge Hyde testified that within a relatively short time he told the prosecutor and the defense attorney that he had sent the letter to Mr. Streeter.

The commission accepts the masters finding that Judge Hyde knew that Judge Walker had already terminated Mr. Streeter's probation when he wrote his July 5 letter to Mr. Streeter. Judge Hyde admitted that the letter was "inarticulately written" and explained that the purpose of the letter was to ensure that Mr. Streeter's file contained a completed Penal Code section 1203.4 form. In response to Judge Hyde's letter, Mr. Streeter submitted a written petition under Penal Code section 1203.4. At a hearing on July 11, 2001, Judge Hyde gave Mr. Streeter a copy of the filed section 1203.4 form.[17]

2. Conclusions of Law

(8) Judge Hyde committed improper action in failing to provide the prosecutor or the defense attorney with a copy of his letter to Mr. Streeter and failing to give the prosecutor notice of his letter or an opportunity to respond. Judge Hyde's action violated canons 1, 2A and 3B(7) (prohibiting certain ex parte communications).

E. Count Five

1. Findings of Fact

In July 2000, Judge Walker sentenced Karissa Kernan on a misdemeanor charge of alcohol-related reckless driving (reduced from driving under the influence). Her sentence included three years of court probation.

In June 2001, Ms. Kernan filed an application to join the Air Force National Guard to pursue a nursing degree. The enlistment was to be a part-time position requiring attendance every other weekend. Ms. Kernan was told that the only factor preventing her enlistment into the military was her probation.

Although Judge Walker had sentenced her, Ms. Kernan called Judge Hyde around October 23, 2001, because she knew him. When she identified herself, Judge Hyde knew who she was immediately. She is the daughter of Patrick Kernan, an attorney and president of the school board. Judge Hyde had known Mr. Kernan and his children for many years. He had worked with Ms. Kernan when she was in high school on a community volunteer project serving Thanksgiving dinner.

The masters noted that Ms. Kernan's memory of what was said during the telephone conversation was not totally reliable. However, based on Judge [17] Judge Hyde's actions in accepting the written Penal Code section 1203.4 form, holding a hearing, and giving Mr. Streeter a copy of the filed form, belie the argument in Judge Hyde's brief that he could not violate canon 3B(7) because there was no pending or impending matter.

Hyde's admissions and the commonality of their testimony, the masters found that: "Ms. Kernan told Judge Hyde she was on probation for driving under the influence of alcohol. She told him she intended to join the military, but she was still on probation. She asked whether probation is ever terminated early so the defendant can get into the service. Judge Hyde told her that 'we do it all the time.' Judge Hyde instructed Ms. Kernan to go to the clerk's office and have her case added to the calendar, the usual practice."

After the telephone conversation, Ms. Kernan went to the criminal clerk's window and told clerk Beth Duarte that she had had a "personal conversation" with Judge Hyde and wanted her matter added to the calendar. At that time in the Pleasanton court, defendants could have their matters added to the calendar by asking at the clerk's window. The clerk's first choice of department was the judge who last heard the case. Based on Ms. Kernan's comments, Ms. Duarte added her case to Judge Hyde's calendar even though Judge Walker had last heard the case.

In court, Judge Hyde called the case by saying, "Karissa Marie Kernan. What can I do for you?" This gave the impression that Judge Hyde did not know what Ms. Kernan wanted, and was therefore misleading. Judge Hyde testified before the masters that he already knew what Ms. Kernan wanted when she came into court that day. Nonetheless, Judge Hyde did not disclose to the prosecutor that he had had the ex parte telephone conversation with the defendant. Nor did he disclose his relationship with the defendant and her family.

Ms. Kernan told Judge Hyde in court that she needed to have her probation waived to go into the military. Ms. Kernan offered no proof that she was enlisting and Judge Hyde did not request any. As a result, it was never revealed that the contemplated military service would only be part time. Judge Hyde asked the prosecutor if he had any objection to Ms. Kernan's request; he did not. Judge Hyde granted Ms. Kernan's request and terminated her probation.[18]

2. Conclusions of Law

(9) Judge Hyde's failure to disclose his discussion with Ms. Kernan and his relationship to her family constituted prejudicial misconduct and violated

[18] The masters noted that a veteran prosecutor testified that he has never agreed to an early termination of probation based on a part-time enlistment. They also commented: "Judge Hyde has attempted to rely on the prosecutor's non-objection to the termination of probation in order to minimize this charge. However, the decision to grant or deny the defendant's request was Judge Hyde's. Moreover, because the prosecutor was totally unaware of the ex parte conversation and the judge's relationship with the defendant and her family, he was not in an informed position to make an objection."

canons 2A and 3E(2).[19] Judge Hyde was aware of the requirements of canon 3E as he received a private admonishment in 1997 for failing to disclose a telephone conversation from a friend of a litigant. Judge Hyde suggested that disclosure was not required because he has "lots of friends" in the small community of Pleasanton. The masters observed, however, that the Supreme Court has noted that even in a small town, an objective observer would view failure to disclose a prior relationship and an ex parte communication as prejudicial to the administration of justice.[20]

F. Count Six

1. Findings of Fact

On Friday, August 24, 2001, Judge Hyde presided over an arraignment calendar. Beau Dempsey appeared for arraignment on a misdemeanor domestic violence charge. Mr. Dempsey, who was in custody, was disruptive in court and made threatening throat-slashing gestures toward his wife, who was in the front row of the audience. Judge Hyde told Mr. Dempsey: "You're already in deep trouble. Write a report on him. Intimidating a witness. Felony. State Prison. . . . Shut up. . . . [H]is bail just went up to one million dollars. . . . Isolate him. Lock him down and get a new report. . . . I want him next time in chains." Mr. Dempsey's arraignment was continued until Monday, August 27. On August 27, Mr. Dempsey again appeared before Judge Hyde. He was arraigned on the misdemeanor, told of the possible addition of felony charges, and referred to the public defender. Judge Hyde told him: "[I]f you ever come into this court and make noise like you did the other day, I'm going to hold you in contempt of court. Every time I hear a noise out of you, it will be a consecutive year in jail. You're looking at a lot of felony state prison time." The next appearance was set for August 29, and Mr. Dempsey remained in custody.

After the August 27 afternoon arraignment calendar concluded, Judge Hyde had a conversation with Mr. Dempsey's wife, Dana Wagner, in the courthouse hallway, close to the civil clerk's window. Ms. Wagner told the judge that she wanted to serve marital dissolution papers on the defendant before he was transported from the courthouse back to the jail, which was located away from the courthouse. Judge Hyde agreed that she should do so.

[19] Canon 3E(2) reads: "In all trial court proceedings, a judge shall disclose on the record information that the judge believes the parties or their lawyers might consider relevant to the question of disqualification, even if the judge believes there is no actual basis for disqualification."

The masters made the following findings, which the commission adopts[21]:

"Judge Hyde accompanied Ms. Wagner to the civil clerk's window and spoke to Ms. Wells on Ms. Wagner's behalf. Judge Hyde told Ms. Wells that defendant Dempsey was in custody, that the defendant had beaten Ms. Wagner, and that they had been married only briefly. The judge also told Ms. Wells that during the defendant's earlier arraignment appearance, the defendant had made a motion as if he were going to slit someone's throat. Judge Hyde imitated the gesture on himself to demonstrate to Ms. Wells what the defendant had done.

"Ms. Wagner had already prepared the marital dissolution papers. The judge told Ms. Wells that Ms. Wagner needed to obtain a fee waiver order for the dissolution papers. He conveyed that the fee waiver process had to happen fast because Ms. Wagner needed to serve the defendant that day, before he was transported back to the jail. Judge Hyde did all the talking while he and Ms. Wagner were at Ms. Wells' window.

"Ms. Wells gave a fee waiver application form to Ms. Wagner. Ms. Wagner and the judge walked to a table in the center of the hallway, in view of and immediately opposite the clerk's window where Ms. Wells was sitting. The judge remained at the table talking with Ms. Wagner for five or ten minutes while she was filling out the form. As they stood at the table, Ms. Wagner's side was to Ms. Wells and Judge Hyde was facing Ms. Wells; although Ms. Wells could not hear them from behind her window, she could see their mouths moving as they talked.

"Either the judge or Ms. Wagner gave the completed fee waiver application back to Ms. Wells. She immediately stamped the completed application with the date and time, which was August 27, 2001, at 3:37 p.m. It and the dissolution papers (which at the time were not stamped until filed, either with the fee or a waiver order) were quickly routed to Commissioner Foland, who heard family law matters.

"Less than an hour later, Judge Hyde went to Commissioner Foland's chambers to check on the status of the fee waiver application. Judge Hyde asked the commissioner if he had reviewed Ms. Wagner's application yet. The judge explained that he was asking because Ms. Wagner was trying to get her in-custody husband served, and the jail van was waiting to transport the defendants from court. Commissioner Foland pulled Ms. Wagner's application out of a basket containing other applications, reviewed it and signed it. Judge Hyde said that he would return it to the clerk himself, so that Ms. Wagner could get the dissolution papers filed and served.

"Judge Hyde then carried the signed fee waiver order and accompanying dissolution paperwork back to Ms. Wells and handed it to her. Ms. Wells filed and time-stamped the dissolution papers at 4:23 p.m. She filed and time-stamped the signed fee waiver order at 4:28 p.m., which was only fifty-one minutes after the application was filed. This was an unusually fast turnaround time, and was due to Judge Hyde's intervention. Ms. Wells explained that it normally takes 24 hours (and can take up to 48 hours) for the family law commissioner to sign a fee waiver order and return it, and that the clerks' practice is to advise litigants to call the court in a day or two to see if their paperwork is ready."

Judge Hyde and Ms. Wagner then advised the judge's deputy of the situation and the deputy took the dissolution papers to serve them on Mr. Dempsey. Mr. Dempsey was served at 4:40 p.m., while he was still at the courthouse.

2. Conclusions of Law

(10) Judge Hyde's conduct constitutes prejudicial misconduct. He improperly acted as Ms. Wagner's advocate and violated the basic tenets of canons 1, 2A, 2B(1), 2B(2) and 3B(7). Judge Hyde's conversation with Ms. Wagner concerned much more than ministerial matters such as giving her directions; he became embroiled in the matter. His conduct lessens public esteem for the judiciary and underscores the need for the judiciary to remain impartial. The commission agrees with the masters that Judge Hyde "became angry with the defendant" and that: "[A]n objective observer would conclude that his evident desire to help Ms. Wagner was motivated at least in part by that anger. It is also exacerbated by the fact that Judge Hyde did not recognize that he was embroiled, as he apparently still intended to preside over Mr. Dempsey's case as of August 29 . . . ."

The masters recognized that there can be some degree of informality when dealing with the public in a smaller courthouse such as Pleasanton. They noted, however, that Judge Hyde is an experienced judge, and that he had received an advisory letter in 1998 for assisting a propria persona (pro per) litigant. The masters chastised Judge Hyde for not recognizing "the impropriety of acting as an advocate for someone who was a victim/witness in a case over which he was presiding," and for attempting to justify his action "on the basis that [Ms. Wagner] was somehow morally or rightfully deserving of his assistance."[22]

[22] The masters comment: "However charitable or kind, or however well intentioned, Judge Hyde's conduct ignores his own embroilment with defendant Dempsey. It is not the 'right thing' (as the respondent's attorney argued) for a judge to choose to act as an advocate for a

1. Findings of Fact

On November 14, 2001, Judge Hyde presided over the arraignment of Christopher Plute on felony drug charges. Codefendant Nicole Araiza, who was scheduled for arraignment on the same charges at a later date, was present in the audience. When the case was called, Mr. Plute's attorney mentioned that Ms. Araiza was in the courtroom and she was called forward. Judge Hyde read the charges filed against her, increased her bail from $60,000 to $350,000, referred her to the public defender's office, and remanded her into custody. Deputy Public Defender Ray Keller then became Ms. Araiza's attorney.

The next day, Ms. Araiza filed a peremptory challenge requesting that Judge Hyde be disqualified. Mr. Keller appeared briefly in court. Judge Hyde acknowledged his disqualification and sent the Araiza case up to Judge Walker. Judge Hyde made the decision himself that Judge Walker would be his successor judge. Judge Hyde and Judge Walker are longtime friends.

While still on the bench after sending the Araiza case to Judge Walker, Judge Hyde telephoned Judge Walker, who was on the bench in his own courtroom. In the phone conversation, Judge Hyde explained his reasons for increasing Ms. Araiza's bail (the substantial quantity of methamphetamine involved, approximately 300 grams, and that a loaded firearm was found in association with the drugs) and asked Judge Walker to "back me up" on his bail increase.

Judge Hyde denied any memory of the exact words, but testified that if Judge Walker recalled the words "back me up," then he must have said so. Judge Hyde admitted that backing him up was the concept of his telephone call. He added, "I had raised the bail, I was concerned, and I wanted it kept that way, and I was upset for being challenged."

Mr. Keller took his file on Araiza upstairs to Judge Walker's courtroom. Mr. Keller saw that Judge Walker was on the telephone and correctly suspected that Judge Hyde had called about the Araiza case. Mr. Keller confronted Judge Walker, who acknowledged that it was Judge Hyde on the telephone and offered to recuse himself from the Araiza case. Mr. Keller declined Judge Walker's offer because he believed Judge Walker would "be bending over backwards to be fair" to Ms. Araiza as a result of the improper litigant, regardless of the circumstances. There was also no urgency as contended by Judge Hyde. When Judge Hyde assisted Ms. Wagner, defendant Dempsey was scheduled to appear again only two days later."

communication. After a hearing, Judge Walker granted Mr. Keller's motion to reduce Ms. Araiza's bail back to $60,000. The motion was not opposed by the prosecutor.

Although he did not let Judge Hyde know this during the telephone conversation, Judge Walker was very upset by Judge Hyde's call. Later that day, Judge Walker went into Judge Hyde's chambers and confronted him. Judge Walker told Judge Hyde that his telephone call was something that "you just don't do" and that it had "put him [Judge Walker] in jeopardy." Judge Hyde was apologetic and said that it would not happen again. The masters found that Judge Walker initiated the apology and "rejected as self-serving" Judge Hyde's claim that he initiated the apology. The next day, Judge Hyde called Mr. Keller into chambers and apologized to him for having called Judge Walker.[23]

At the hearing before the masters, Judge Hyde claimed for the first time that on November 15, 2001, he was under stress from a particularly difficult court session and that he was "woozy" from Indocin, an anti-inflammatory medication he took for gout. The masters noted that Judge Hyde provided no specific case or event in court that morning that caused him stress and that Mr. Keller did not recall the calendar being busier or more stressful than usual. Judge Hyde provided no corroboration that the medication affected his behavior and he did not mention "wooziness" to either Judge Walker or Mr. Keller when he apologized to them. The commission, as did the masters, "decline[s] to find that Judge Hyde was suffering stress or experiencing the side effects of medication that had any bearing on the conduct at issue."

2. Conclusions of Law

(11) Judge Hyde committed willful misconduct. Judge Hyde's conduct was unjudicial because it violated canons 1, 2A, 2B(2) and 3B(7), constituted embroilment and was an improper reaction to being disqualified. Judge Hyde clearly acted in a judicial capacity. While still on the bench after being disqualified, Judge Hyde had his clerk telephone Judge Walker, and continued to preside over cases until his clerk was able to get Judge Walker on the phone. When Judge Hyde talked to Judge Walker on the phone, it was "kind of at sidebar," with court still in session and with attorneys and litigants

[23] The masters commented in a footnote: "It is likely that this apology, which Mr. Keller described as emotional, was made in hopes of avoiding a complaint to the commission by Mr. Keller. At the time, Judge Hyde was under investigation by the commission for other conduct now at issue. He had received the commission's first letter just three weeks before. . . . With his prior discipline, including the severe public censure, it is very reasonable to assume that Judge Hyde recognized the grave danger that this misconduct posed to his judicial career if the commission learned of it."

present. Judge Hyde acted in bad faith because his purpose was not the faithful discharge of his judicial duties. A disqualified judge cannot have a proper judicial purpose in initiating an ex parte substantive discussion with his successor judge. A second independent basis for finding bad faith is that Judge Hyde knew he was acting beyond his lawful authority. Judge Hyde, although claiming that he did not "think of it" at the time, admitted in his testimony before the masters that he "knew" at the time that he was acting without authority.

PRIOR DISCIPLINE

Judge Hyde's present misconduct must be evaluated against the background of his prior discipline.[24] Judge Hyde has previously received three advisory letters, a private admonishment and a severe public censure.

A. The October 27, 1992 Advisory Letter

The second paragraph of this two-paragraph letter states that in closing the matter with a confidential advisory letter: "[T]he commission expressed its agreement with your evaluation that a reference to yourself as the 'vacuum cleaner for the court' was clearly inappropriate. The commission also expressed its concern about the appearance of possible bias created by inquiring at the beginning of a proceeding which party has refused to stipulate to a pro tem judge."

B. The April 25, 1996 Advisory Letter

The letter addressed four distinct types of misconduct. The first section recited that between January 1991 and December 1995, Judge Hyde "personally participated in the solicitation of funds or in-kind donations from persons other than judges on behalf of charitable organizations and used or permitted the use of the prestige of judicial office for fund-raising." The letter noted that before selling raffle tickets in December 1995, "the presiding judge of [Judge Hyde's] court told [Judge Hyde] orally and in writing that he believed participation in the fund-raising event as described would violate the Code of Judicial Conduct," but that Judge Hyde nonetheless participated in the fund-raising event.

The second section indicated that around April 5, 1995, Judge Hyde "told a female visitor to the court, 'I can get you a job,' took her to lunch and gave [24] Rule 125(b) of the Rules of the Commission on Judicial Performance states that any "prior disciplinary action may be received in evidence to prove that conduct is persistent or habitual or to determine what action should be taken regarding discipline." Judge Hyde's five prior disciplines were admitted into evidence before the masters.

her a rose from the rose garden [he] cultivate[d] on court property." The letter goes on to state that Judge Hyde later told a reporter from the local newspaper that his "comment about getting the woman a job 'was just an off-hand remark made in an effort to be friendly. I certainly never followed it up, nor did I intend to.' "

The third section noted that over the years, Judge Hyde "used nicknames for female employees that are or appeared to be demeaning or have sexual connotations, and which were offensive either to those who were the subject of such nicknames or to others who heard them. Examples of such nicknames are 'Boom Boom,' 'Breath,' 'Chubbs,' 'Legs,' and 'Mousemeat.' "

The fourth section noted the appearance of embroilment arising out of comments Judge Hyde made to a defendant involved with drugs. The letter recited the following comment by Judge Hyde:

"This is a dope dealer. He keeps coming back. He's scum in our society. He doesn't belong here. I want him in state prison. I want him out of here as fast as he can go. . . .

"Reid, I don't like it, but I'll tell you what, you show up in this court with anything, if I hear about a PV, I'm personally going to call Judge Goodman up and plead with him to give you the maximum time in state prison. . . .

"I hate dope dealers. You want to screw up your own life and blow your brains out, fine. Leave the rest of the people out there alone."

C. The May 1996 Public Censure

This severe public censure concluded proceedings that commenced with a seven-count notice of formal proceedings "all generally concerning misuse of the judicial office." Prior to filing an answer, Judge Hyde submitted a proposed disposition with a stipulated statement of facts. Based on that submission, the commission made findings of fact, including the following:

(1) "In the fall of 1990, Judge Hyde asked certain court employees to access DMV records for the purpose of obtaining the addresses of former classmates in connection with a class reunion."

(2) "Between 1991 and 1995, Judge Hyde asked various court employees to access DMV records for the purpose of obtaining information regarding motorists that was not related to court business."

(3) "In 1991, 1993 and 1994, a court secretary performed typing, photo-copying, and other services in connection with a paralegal class which Judge

Hyde taught at a local college. This included typing a lengthy lesson plan, typing mid-term and final examinations, photocopying class materials, mailing out graded final examinations using court envelopes and postage, and typing correspondence."

(4) "On January 14, 1991, Judge Hyde requested that the court secretary type an 'affidavit in lieu of appearance' that he submitted in connection with a complaint regarding a neighbor's dog, which he filed in his personal capacity."

(5) "In 1992, Judge Hyde requested that the court secretary type up his application for a federal judgeship. Judge Hyde then had a discussion with the clerk/administrator regarding the best way to get the application to San Francisco on short notice, and the application was ultimately driven to San Francisco by a court attendant utilizing a county vehicle."

(6) "In 1993 and 1994 there were occasions when Judge Hyde brought his elementary school-aged daughter to work and the court secretary and other court employees assisted in watching her activities. On one occasion in 1993, during her break, a court employee picked up Judge Hyde's daughter from a dental appointment during what would be considered work hours."

(7) "Between 1990 and 1995, the court secretary performed work for Judge Hyde that benefited a particular club, an organization of which Judge Hyde was a member and past president."

(8) "During 1991 and 1992, Judge Hyde requested that the court secretary create a 94-page mailing list for a particular charity; whereupon she also generated copies of a fund-raising letter addressed to those on the mailing list. Additionally, she typed labels, envelopes, by-laws, and personnel policies relating to the charity. The court secretary spent the equivalent of approximately 24 work days on such tasks."

(9) "In November 1991, Judge Hyde and a clerk/administrator had a conversation regarding utilization of the court secretary's time, during which the clerk/administrator formed the impression that Judge Hyde was attempting to intimidate him regarding his job security."

(10) "Between 1991 and 1995, Judge Hyde made sexually related comments toward female court employees which were deemed to be offensive by some court employees who overheard the statements. For example, during the week of October 23, 1995, Presiding Judge Hugh Walker and two division chiefs were having a conversation regarding court policies and procedures when Judge Hyde commented to a female division chief, 'Are we having a PMS day?' "

The commission noted that none of the judge's misconduct concerned "the manner in which Judge Hyde conducted his courtroom proceedings or deported himself while on the bench." The commission further noted that in a signed separate statement, Judge Hyde represented that he was "aware of the inappropriateness of the actions reflected by the Agreed Statement of Facts and assure[d] the Commission that these actions will not be repeated in the future." The commission concluded that in view of Judge Hyde's response to the notice and his assurances that the challenged conduct has ceased and will not resume, "discipline less than removal from office would be appropriate." The commission therefore accepted "the proposed disposition and agree[d] that it will not order that Judge Hyde be removed from office."

D. The June 25, 1997 Private Admonishment[25]

The private admonishment concerned Judge Hyde's action in People v. Pamela Keane. In December 1995, Ms. Keane pled guilty to driving under the influence of alcohol and was sentenced by Judge Walker to probation on the condition that she serve two days in jail through the sheriff's weekend work program. Ms. Keane served one day in the weekend work program and, on February 29, 1996, Judge Hyde issued an order revoking Ms. Keane's probation for her failure to comply with the weekend work program condition. On March 14, 1996, Ms. Keane appeared before Judge Walker and admitted to the probation violation. Judge Walker ordered Ms. Keane's probation revoked and reinstated on the same terms and conditions, with the exception of increasing her jail sentence to five days.

The notice of intended private admonishment then states the following facts:

"On May 6, 1996 [Judge Hyde] received a telephone call from Robert Rossi concerning the Keane case. Rossi is a close friend of [Judge Hyde's] and is also Keane's employer. Rossi told [Judge Hyde] of concerns he had regarding Keane's case and he asked for [Judge Hyde's] advice regarding what she should do. [Judge Hyde] told Rossi to tell Keane to prepare a letter setting forth the details of the incident that led to her probation violation and to appear in [Judge Hyde's] court the next day with the letter.

"On May 7, 1996, Keane appeared in [Judge Hyde's] courtroom and her case was added to that day's calendar. [Judge Hyde] called the Keane case later that day, but [Judge Hyde] did not disqualify [himself] or disclose [his] communication with Rossi of the previous day. Keane appeared in propria [25] The notice of intended private admonishment issued on June 25, 1997. Judge Hyde did not contest the admonishment and, pursuant to rule 114(a) of the Rules of the Commission on Judicial Performance, the admonishment became final 30 days after its issuance.

persona and submitted the letter that Rossi told her [Judge Hyde] had said to prepare. Keane also explained why she had not completed the initial two-day jail sentence and admitted violating her probation. [Judge Hyde] revoked and reinstated Keane's probation on the same terms and conditions, with the exception of modifying the jail sentence imposed by Judge Walker on March 14, 1996 by reducing it from five days to one."

The commission unanimously found that Judge Hyde's failure to disqualify himself or to disclose his discussion with Mr. Rossi violated canon 3E (disqualification) and gave rise to an appearance of impropriety in violation of canon 2A. The commission also found that the discussion with Mr. Rossi was an improper ex parte communication in violation of canon 3B(7).

E. The February 4, 1998 Advisory Letter

This advisory letter expressed disapproval of Judge Hyde's "involvement in a pro per defendant's case including [Judge Hyde's] reading an inmate's letter addressed to [him] at the courthouse regarding her receipt of a complaint and summons in an unlawful detainer case, [Judge Hyde's] direction to the clerk's office to send her an 'answer packet' so she could respond to the unlawful detainer complaint and summons and [Judge Hyde's] direction to a clerk to prepare a fee waiver order, which [Judge Hyde] signed." The commission noted that the "inmate/defendant was given additional time in which to respond, without notice to the other side."

The commission viewed Judge Hyde's actions "as providing legal and judicial assistance not available to other pro per litigants," and cited canons 2B (use of the prestige of judicial office) and 3B(7) (as regards ex parte communications).

LACK OF CANDOR IN FILINGS WITH THE COMMISSION

(12) The Rules of the Commission on Judicial Performance spell out the requirements that a judge be forthright and cooperate with the commission. Rule 104 is entitled "Duty to Cooperate; Response by Respondent Judge." Subdivision (a) requires that a judge "shall cooperate with the commission" and provides that a "judge's cooperation or lack of cooperation may be considered by the commission in determining the appropriate disciplinary sanction or disposition."[26] Rule 119 requires that a judge's answer to a notice of formal proceedings be "as complete and straightforward as the information reasonably available to the respondent judge permits."[27] In addition, rule 106 provides that written communications by a respondent judge's attorney "shall be deemed to be the written communications of the judge." The rule further provides that the signing of any document or statement "warrants that the signer has personal knowledge of the matter contained in the document or statement or has investigated the matter and has a good faith belief in the accuracy of the representations contained in the document."[28]

[26] Subdivision (a) reads: "A respondent judge shall cooperate with the commission in all proceedings in accordance with Government Code section 68725. The judge's cooperation or lack of cooperation may be considered by the commission in determining the appropriate

Although Judge Hyde should have been well acquainted with the commission's rules and procedures, his filings in this discipline proceeding have not complied with the spirit or letter of the commission's rules.

A. Count One

Before the masters, Judge Hyde testified that when he arrived at the court, he went to his chambers, probably spent some time in his chambers, and then on his way to his courtroom went through the clerk's office and approached Ms. Silva. This differed from his response to the commission's preliminary disciplinary sanction or disposition as well as further proceedings to be taken by the commission but may not be considered in making evidentiary determinations."

[27] Subdivision (c) reads: "The answer shall be as complete and straightforward as the information reasonably available to the respondent judge permits. The answer shall (1) admit each allegation which is true, (2) deny each allegation which is untrue, and (3) specify each allegation as to the truth of which the judge lacks sufficient information or knowledge. If a respondent judge gives lack of information or knowledge as a reason for a failure to admit or deny any allegation, the respondent judge shall state in the answer that a reasonable inquiry concerning the matter in the particular allegation has been made, and that the information known or readily obtainable is insufficient to enable the respondent judge to admit or deny the matter."

"A judge may be represented by counsel in all commission proceedings. The written communications of counsel shall be deemed to be the written communications of the judge. Counsel has the authority to bind the judge as to all matters except a stipulation as to discipline.

"Any paper filed with the commission and any written statement made to the commission or to its staff must be signed by the judge or the judge's counsel. A stipulation as to discipline must be signed by the judge. The signing of any document or statement warrants that the signer has personal knowledge of the matter contained in the document or statement or has investigated the matter and has a good faith belief in the accuracy of the representations contained in the document or statement.

"This rule applies to the filing of responses to staff inquiry letters and preliminary investigation letters under rules 110 and 111, to the filing of answers in formal proceedings under rule 119, and to all other filings with the commission and the masters and all other correspondence with the commission."

investigation letter as well as his verified answers[29] which read: "[I]mmediately upon arriving at the courthouse, Judge Hyde walked to the clerk's office and reported the incident to a clerk in the traffic department."

Also, Judge Hyde's verified answer "specifically denie[d] the allegation in Count One that he 'asked a traffic clerk to obtain information from the Department of Motor Vehicles (DMV) regarding the identity of a driver that [Judge Hyde] said had cut [him] off.' " However, Judge Hyde testified before the masters: "I just said, Nise, will you run this guy's record? He cut me off. I think that's all I told her. I didn't have time to go into a big explanation."

B. Count Two

Before the masters, Judge Hyde admitted that to be entertaining he initiated the story about the sex act during his conversation with Mr. Sims in the break room. In his answer, Judge Hyde had asserted that "at a holiday party at the end of the day in the courthouse lunchroom . . . several strange and wild incidents regarding the old Livermore courthouse were being told." The answer goes on to state: "One of the true stories that was discussed by several of the individuals attending the party was that a certain unnamed court administrator was caught once with another individual in a male-male act of fellatio in the parking lot of the old courthouse. Judge Hyde confirmed that the story was not just a rumor floating around about the old courthouse, but was a true story. It was related that one judge wanted to fire the individual while another judge did not. Ultimately the individual was not fired. The story was just one of many that day that was being recounted. The story was not told in a malicious fashion nor was it meant to be offensive and at the time it did not appear that anyone was offended."

During the hearing before the masters, trial counsel asked Judge Hyde about this answer and he admitted that the answer was incorrect, that he told the story, and that he used the term "blow job."

C. Count Three

In his answer, Judge Hyde stated that he intended to call a pro tem for the January 23 small clams night court when he first learned in early January that he was scheduled to preside at that session, "but he became busy and forgot about the matter, totally." Before the masters, Judge Hyde testified that he had intended to trade the calendar with some other judge and it was only on the afternoon of January 23—when his oversight was brought to his attention—that he decided to seek a pro tem to cover the calendar.

[29] Judge Hyde's representations on count one in his verified answers to the notice of formal proceedings and the amended notice of formal proceedings are identical.

D. Count Five

In his verified answer to count five, Judge Hyde wrote: "Judge Hyde has never had a business or professional relationship of any kind with Ms. Kernan. Judge Hyde does not recall ever meeting Ms. Kernan prior to the incident."

Before the masters, Judge Hyde testified that when he received a phone call from Ms. Kernan, he immediately knew who she was. He stated that she was the daughter of the school board president and that he had known Mr. Kernan and his kids for years.

When the denial of knowledge in his answer was brought to his attention, Judge Hyde stated: "I didn't see that. That's not correct. I mean, I have known Karissa for a long time. I've known all the Kernan kids for a long time. Not real well, but they know me, and I know them."

E. Count Six

In his response to the preliminary investigation letter, Judge Hyde stated that he "did recognize that he became upset with Mr. Dempsey's conduct during the proceedings." Judge Hyde continued that he "appreciated that this could potentially affect his impartiality at the next hearing," and accordingly, he "recused himself from the case prior to the hearing." Judge Hyde's verified answer denied the allegation in the notice of formal proceedings that he became angry with Mr. Dempsey. Before the masters, Judge Hyde testified that his answer to the preliminary investigation letter was wrong. "It's an instance where I explained the situation to my lawyer and wrote it down wrong and I didn't catch that."

F. Count Seven

On October 17, 2002, the first amended notice of formal proceedings included count seven and alleged that on November 15, 2001, Judge Hyde telephoned Judge Walker and asked him to back him up on the bail increase. Judge Hyde's verified answer was filed on November 4, 2002, less than a year following the incident, and states: "However, after being disqualified, Judge Hyde has no recollection of making any statement to Judge Walker that Judge Walker should back him up on the case as alleged in the First Amended Notice of Formal Proceedings."

At the hearing before the masters, Judge Hyde admitted to making the statement, but claimed that he did not recall the incident until several months after he had filed his answer, when the defense attorney, Mr. Keller, mentioned that the commission had called him.[30]

THE MASTERS' COMMENTS ON JUDGE HYDE'S CREDIBILITY

(13) The lack of candor indicated by Judge Hyde's filings is consistent with the masters' observations about the judge's testimony before them. The commission, following the Supreme Court's guidance, gives considerable weight to the masters' comments on credibility.[31]

A. Count One

The masters found Judge Hyde's "various explanations" to be "less than uniform." They noted the differences between representations made in Judge Hyde's letters and answers and his testimony, and concluded that the "conflicting responses to the Commission's inquiry, and to questions at the hearing, cast doubt upon Judge Hyde's professed motive to simply protect the public."

B. Count Two

The masters found that Judge Hyde was not credible with regard to the specifics of this allegation, "in light of his prior inconsistent statements

[30] When trial counsel started to question Judge Hyde about calling Judge Walker, Judge Hyde responded:

"Initially, in my response, I said I didn't remember this at all. You're going to ask me about that, I presume.

"And the reason is, when my lawyer presented it to me, presented that I went to Judge Walker to talk to him about this case.

"I said, I never went to Judge Walker. I couldn't remember it.

"Much later than that, after this was progressing, I had an occasion to talk with Mr. Keller, who came to talk to me about some other matters. And he said, I got a call from the Commission, or I've talked to them. And I said, about what? And he goes, the phone call.

"And all of a sudden, it was like a slap in the head, I remembered exactly what it was. And I remember the morning was the very high—high-volume, lots of stuff going on, stressful morning. And I remember about that time, and at that time, I was taking the gout medicine, which causes me sometimes to be a little woozy. That doesn't excuse what happened.

"I don't recall the total colloquy between Mr. Keller and I with regard to the raising of bail. But because of the amount of dope and the weapons involved, I was—when I was challenged, I did something that I don't do. I got angry. I was ticked, because this was a real danger to the community, I felt."

denying it." They rejected "Judge Hyde's assertion that he was sitting 'fairly close to' or 'right next to' Mr. Sims at the break room table when the story was told, and the implication that he intended his comments only to be heard by Mr. Sims and not by anyone else."

C. Count Three

As previously noted, the masters rejected Judge Hyde's testimony that it was Ms. Mateo who initiated the conversation with him. They commented that Judge Hyde "has given completely inconsistent and irreconcilable accounts of his intentions between January 9, when he realized the conflict, and January 23, when he called Mr. Harding."[32] The masters also rejected Judge Hyde's "claim that his call to Mr. Harding was not unusual, and that he has been asked to secure the services of a pro tem many times in the past."

D. Count Four

The masters noted that Judge Hyde's "testimony as to this matter" was credible.

E. Count Six

The masters were very critical of Judge Hyde's testimony on this count. They characterized his testimony regarding his contact with Ms. Wells as "both inconsistent and vague."[33] The masters noted that, although Judge

[32] The masters explain: "He has moved from: (1) implying that he always intended that the case be heard by a pro tem, stating that he called one himself because he heard from a clerk at the last minute that the clerk had not located one and because it was not unusual for judges to call pro tems (Response, exh. 2, p. 2); to (2) explicitly stating that it was his intention on January 9 to 'call for a pro tem but he forgot about the matter, totally,' until reminded by one of the clerks on the afternoon of January 23 (Answer pp. 3–7); to, finally, (3) admitting that no clerk ever tried to contact a pro tem, claiming that he believed he was trading calendars with Judge Walker, and claiming that he never contemplated even the idea of a pro tem until the moment on January 23 when the clerk reminded him of the case (Hyde RT 87:20-99:24)."

[33] The masters wrote:

"We see no reason to doubt Ms. Wells' rather detailed recollection of events leading up to the point where Judge Hyde admittedly handed her the signed waiver form. This was the first and only time that a judge ever approached Ms. Wells' window with a litigant, or asked for a form on behalf of a litigant. (Wells RT 485:7-24.) For the judge to speak with a clerk on Ms. Wagner's behalf is entirely consistent with his admitted willingness to speak with another judicial officer, Commissioner Foland, on her behalf.

"Moreover, in his response to the first preliminary investigation letter and his answer, the judge never directly addresses the allegation that he accompanied Ms. Wagner to the window and spoke to a clerk on her behalf regarding a fee waiver. (Virtually all of the details of that conversation—including mention of the fee waiver—were set forth in the investigation letter, which is dated only two months after the events in question.) In the response, Judge Hyde states without explanation that he 'merely assisted Ms. Dempsey in obtaining the forms she

Hyde testified that "he did not recall any further contact with Ms. Wagner after returning the signed paperwork to Ms. Wells, other than to wish her luck," "according to the judge's response, the judge and Ms. Wagner advised the judge's deputy of the situation, and the deputy then took the dissolution papers and had the defendant served, which we find to be true." The masters also rejected Judge Hyde's testimony that he did not become angry with Mr. Dempsey.[34]

F. Count Seven

The masters are very skeptical of Judge Hyde's claim that he did not remember his telephone conversation with Judge Walker.[35] They "find that Judge Walker initiated the apology, and reject as self-serving Judge Hyde's claim that he initiated it." They also question Judge Hyde's motivation for requested to file her dissolution.' He does not specifically deny the details contained in the investigation letter. (Exh. 1, p. 5, Exh. 2, p. 9, emphasis added.) The Answer states only that he denies asking for an expedited fee waiver. (Answer, p. 15.)

"That denial in the Answer not only contradicts the very detailed testimony of Ms. Wells, but also is inconsistent with the gist of the judge's testimony at the hearing. Judge Hyde believed that time was of the essence, and acted accordingly in order to help Ms. Wagner. For example, he testified that he was unaware of the normal turnaround time, but that it would not have mattered under the circumstances because this was an 'abnormal situation.' (Hyde RT 128:9-14.)

"Judge Hyde's testimony at the hearing regarding his contact with Ms. Wells was both inconsistent and vague, including the potential that Mrs. Dempsey did not yet have a fee waiver application at the time of her hallway encounter with the judge. [Fn. omitted.]

"In sum, to reject Ms. Wells' detailed testimony (which included a visual memory of the judge imitating the throat slashing gesture) would require us to conclude that it was fabricated. No reason was offered to support such a conclusion. [Fn. omitted.]"

"The August 24 and August 27 transcripts indicate otherwise. Moreover, Judge Hyde in response to the first preliminary investigation letter stated that he 'did recognize that he became upset with Mr. Dempsey's conduct during the proceedings,' 'appreciated that this could potentially affect his impartiality,' and 'for that reason recused himself.'

"The judge disavowed his response at the hearing and claimed that he recused himself on August 29 solely because of his status as a potential witness. Whether or not anger was the reason for the judge's recusal, he later told Ms. Norcup that he had become angry with the defendant when he made the throat slashing gesture, and we so find."

"Up until the hearing, Judge Hyde had claimed in his response to investigation (Exh. 6), his verified answer, and his prehearing brief, that he had no memory of the alleged telephone conversation with Judge Walker. He concludes each document by stating, 'Judge Hyde has no recollection of making any statement to Judge Walker that Judge Walker should back him up on the case as alleged. . . .' There is no mention of any conversation with Judge Walker about the case.

"Judge Hyde exhibited a detailed memory of the Araiza case in his response letter and his answer in an effort to show that his increase in bail was warranted. Yet he alleges that he had forgotten calling Judge Walker about it. It is difficult to reconcile Judge Hyde's excellent recall about the bail enhancement with his memory lapse about the phone call by an angry Judge apologizing to Mr. Keller.[36] The masters decline to accept Judge Hyde's claim that the drug he was taking for gout had some bearing on his conduct. Finally, the masters suggest that Judge Hyde's conduct in Araiza reflects the lack of objectivity toward a drug defendant for which Judge Hyde received an advisory letter in 1996.

DISCIPLINE

(14) Once the commission has determined that the allegations of misconduct have been demonstrated by clear and convincing evidence, the commission must determine the appropriate discipline. The Supreme Court has held that the purpose of a disciplinary proceeding "is not punishment, but rather the protection of the public, the enforcement of rigorous standards of judicial conduct, and the maintenance of public confidence in the integrity and independence of the judicial system."[37]

The Supreme Court has recognized that in determining the appropriate discipline, each case must be considered on its own facts.[38] Nonetheless, the commission looks to opinions of the Supreme Court and its own prior decisions for guidance in exercising its responsibility to determine the appropriate discipline in a particular case.

The commission has identified five factors that are particularly relevant to its determination of discipline in this matter: (1) the number of acts of misconduct; (2) the effect of prior discipline on the judge's conduct; (3) concerns regarding the judge's integrity; (4) whether the judge is likely to continue to engage in unethical conduct; and (5) the impact of this matter on the judicial system.

In addition, the commission considers the mitigating evidence offered by the judge.

Walker and his emotional apology to Mr. Keller about the whole incident (discussed below). We hasten to add that Judge Hyde had been under investigation by the commission at the time all of this occurred."

[36] In a footnote, the masters state: "It is likely that this apology, which Mr. Keller described as emotional, was made in hopes of avoiding a complaint to the commission by Mr. Keller. At the time, Judge Hyde was under investigation by the commission for other conduct now at issue. He had received the commission's first letter just three weeks before. (Exh. 1.) With his prior discipline, including the severe public censure, it is very reasonable to assume that Judge Hyde recognized the grave danger that this misconduct posed to his judicial career if the commission learned of it."

(1) The Number of Acts of Misconduct

(15) The Supreme Court has noted that the number of wrongful acts is relevant to determining whether they were isolated occurrences or part of a course of conduct that reflects a lack of temperament and ability to perform judicial functions in an evenhanded manner.[39]

In this proceeding, the commission finds that Judge Hyde engaged in two acts of willful misconduct, four instances of conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute, and one instance of improper action. This misconduct took place over a 15-month period between September 2000 and the middle of November 2001. Furthermore, these acts of misconduct follow five prior disciplines for over 20 other acts of misconduct.

(16) The Supreme Court has often looked at whether a judge has received prior discipline and the effect of such discipline in determining the appropriate discipline for wrongful conduct. In one case, the Supreme Court removed a judge for willful and prejudicial misconduct, but noted that it "would hesitate to remove a judge who showed himself ready, willing, and able to reform under a less severe sanction."[40] The Supreme Court nonetheless removed Judge Doan, noting:

"Lastly, Doan did not learn from her public reproval in 1990 for lending the prestige of her office to advance the private interest of others. She again lent the prestige of her office to advance the private interest of others, even though she had promised not to do so in connection with the 1990 public reproval, in the matters relating to Darlene's nephew Darren Powell in 1992, Meneses in 1993, and Darlene herself in 1993.

"In sum, Doan has had three opportunities for reformation. She will have no more."[41]

The Supreme Court declined to remove Judge Kennick from office because of misconduct noting that "it seems likely that our public censure of each of petitioner's misdeeds would have led him to correct and improve his judicial behavior." (Kennick, at p. 341.) The court did remove the judge from office for his persistent failure or inability to perform judicial duties.

Judge Hyde has received three advisory letters, a private admonishment and a severe public censure. Moreover, most of his present misconduct is repetitious of, or similar to, wrongful acts for which he was disciplined.

The first three counts concern wrongful acts that were previously addressed in Judge Hyde's 1996 censure. The censure found that on numerous occasions Judge Hyde accessed "DMV records for the purpose of obtaining information regarding motorists that was not related to court business." Nonetheless, Judge Hyde subsequently asked a clerk to access DMV records of a person who cut him off in traffic. The censure also criticized Judge Hyde for making sexually related comments. In November 2000, Judge Hyde repeated the offense by reciting, on his own volition, an inappropriate sexual story in front of the new court administrator (whom he had not previously met) and clerk's office employees. In addition, the 1996 censure found that Judge Hyde had requested that a secretary prepare a document that he then filed in a personal lawsuit and had brought his daughter to the court causing court staff to assist in watching over her. This discipline, however, did not sensitize Judge Hyde to the impropriety of intervening in his daughter's small claims case and then personally selecting the pro tem to hear her case.

In June 1997, Judge Hyde was admonished for failing to disqualify himself from a case in which he had received an ex parte telephone call from a friend and for failing to disclose the phone call. Three years later, Judge Hyde talked to Ms. Kernan on the telephone about terminating her probation, but again failed to disqualify himself from subsequently presiding over her case and failed to disclose the telephone call.

In February 1998, Judge Hyde received an advisory letter for providing a pro per litigant with legal and judicial advice. In August 2001, he again became embroiled in a pro per litigant's case, assisting Ms. Wagner with filing her papers and then making sure that the commissioner immediately considered her request.

Judge Hyde's April 1996 advisory letter noted that his comments to a criminal defendant who was involved with drugs were not patient, dignified or courteous. The advisory letter also stated that the comments, which included threatening to call another judge, gave the appearance of embroilment. In 2001, Judge Hyde again became angry with a criminal defendant involved with drugs and this time he called another judge, despite having been disqualified from the matter.

This repetition of wrongful acts identical to, or similar to, the previously disciplined misconduct indicates that the prior discipline failed to motivate Judge Hyde to study the California Code of Judicial Ethics or to change his behavior. This conclusion finds support in Judge Hyde's testimony before the masters. When asked about his 1996 censure for improperly accessing DMV records, Judge Hyde first tried to distinguish the censure on the grounds that it concerned accessing the names of high school classmates for a reunion. When pressed, Judge Hyde admitted that the censure also covered other incidents of accessing DMV records, but asserted that count one was the only time he had improperly accessed DMV records since the censure. Judge Hyde also admitted that in 1996 he had assured the commission that his offenses would not be repeated and that he had taken measures to ensure that they were not repeated, but before the masters, Judge Hyde could not say whether he had read the code to make sure he knew what he could and could not do. Moreover, during his testimony concerning Ms. Kernan, Judge Hyde only remembered his 1997 private admonishment after he had reread it.

(3) Judge Hyde's Integrity

(17) It is generally accepted that honesty is a minimal qualification that is expected of every judge.[42] In this case, substantial questions concerning Judge Hyde's integrity are raised by (1) the discrepancies between Judge Hyde's filings and his testimony, and (2) the masters' comments concerning Judge Hyde's credibility. These questions remain despite the commission's review of the record and its consideration of Judge Hyde's oral argument.

Judge Hyde's approach to the final two counts is particularly problematic. Judge Hyde first admitted in his response to the preliminary investigation letter that he became angry with Mr. Dempsey. Then in his verified answer he denied that he had become angry. Before the masters, Judge Hyde testified that when he explained the situation to his lawyer, his lawyer "wrote it down wrong" and Judge Hyde did not catch the mistake. Although this explanation cannot be totally discounted,[43] it seems more likely that Judge Hyde denied becoming angry because (1) his anger would suggest an improper motive for his embroilment with Ms. Wagner's case, and (2) if he admitted to being angry with Mr. Dempsey, he might have to attempt to explain why he did not immediately recuse himself when Mr. Dempsey next appeared before him.[44]

[42] Fletcher v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 19 Cal.4th 865, 919, footnote 24; Kloepfer v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1989) 49 Cal.3d 826, 865 [264 Cal.Rptr. 100, 782 P.2d 239].

[43] In his argument before the commission, Judge Hyde stated that he had not read the briefs his attorneys had submitted on his behalf.

[44] Trial counsel did ask Judge Hyde why he recused himself, and Judge Hyde testified:

"Very honestly, when he came on for counsel and plea with the Public Defender, I called the case, and said, what's your plea. And Mr. Ulfelder says, I don't think you can hear this, Judge.

Judge Hyde's representations concerning his activities on behalf of Ms. Wagner are also troublesome. Without directly denying Ms. Wells's account, Judge Hyde attempts to minimize the assistance he provided Ms. Wagner. Judge Hyde, nonetheless, admits that he went to Commissioner Foland's office and inquired as to the status of Ms. Wagner's request for a fee waiver. Judge Hyde's admitted visit to Commissioner Foland supports Ms. Wells's version of Judge Hyde's involvement. Judge Hyde explains his visit as motivated by his concern that Mr. Dempsey be served before he was transported back to the jail. Judge Hyde, however, told the masters that after Commissioner Foland signed the order, he gave it to the clerk or Ms. Wagner, wished Ms. Wagner good luck, and had no further dealings with her. The masters disagree, finding that Judge Hyde advised his deputy of the situation. They further note that the signed fee waiver order was time-stamped at 4:28 p.m. and Mr. Dempsey was served at 4:40 p.m. It seems unlikely that Mr. Dempsey would have been served so quickly without Judge Hyde's encouragement, if not participation.

Judge Hyde's insistence that he did not recall his telephone call to Judge Walker in the Araiza matter strains credulity. As noted by the masters, Judge Hyde at all times had a clear recollection of the facts in the underlying case. He insists, however, that when he filed his verified answer, less than a year after the events, he did not remember his telephone call to Judge Walker from the bench, his confrontation that afternoon with an angry Judge Walker, or his emotional apology to Mr. Keller the next morning. Then, at the hearing before the masters, Judge Hyde, for the first time, suggests that on November 15, 2001, he had a particularly stressful calendar and that he was "woozy" as a result of taking medicine for his gout. Judge Hyde offered no medical evidence to support this claim and Judge Walker and Mr. Keller testified that Judge Hyde had not mentioned that he took medication or that he suffered from any side effects from his medicine.

"I'm like, why? I mean, I just didn't think it through, and a busy morning. He said, you're a percipient witness. I said, you're right, I am. I saw him make the slashing throat thing across his throat to her.

"So I recused myself. And I had no idea what happened to that case. I didn't touch it again."

Trial counsel then asked Judge Hyde if he recused himself in part because he had become upset with Mr. Dempsey and Judge Hyde responded:

"No. I mean, when you're used to dealing with criminal people and they act out, you get upset, and sometimes they get removed. And I think, that's what happened to him.

"I don't get upset very often, but sometimes you get upset. But that's no reason to recuse yourself, unless I really have some strong personal feelings against him, which I didn't at that time. Other than observing him, because I knew—I wouldn't keep the case. It would probably go upstairs for a preliminary hearing."

(4) Likelihood of Future Violations

(18) In determining whether a judge is likely to again violate the California Code of Judicial Ethics, the commission reviews a judge's approach to the current proceedings and other indicia of the judge's recognition of, and ability to conform to, the standards of judicial conduct. In Fletcher the Supreme Court noted: "[T]he record 'belies petitioner's claim that he has learned from past experience and has modified his courtroom behavior. It demonstrates instead an inability to appreciate the importance of, and conform to, the standards of judicial conduct that are essential if justice is to be meted out in every case.' "[45]

In Kloepfer the Supreme Court noted that the record did not "suggest that petitioner has, or will be able to, overcome" his lack of judicial temperament.[46]

In its decision to remove Judge Platt, the commission concluded that Judge Platt was "unlikely to conform his future conduct to the canons."[47] Similarly, in its decision to remove Judge Van Voorhis, the commission concluded that it was "close to a certainty" that the judge would continue to violate the California Code of Judicial Ethics if he remained on the bench.[48]

Judge Hyde's repetition of misconduct for which he has been previously disciplined suggests that he cannot, or will not, conform his behavior to the standards of judicial conduct. For example, he argues that his concern for public safety justified his request that a clerk access DMV records on a driver who cut him off in traffic. As has been noted, this defense is not supported by the findings of fact (concerning the timing of his request) and is not legally sound.[49] Thus, a determination that Judge Hyde sincerely believed in this defense would raise concerns that he would always be able to rationalize departures from the standards of judicial conduct.

A similar dilemma is presented by Judge Hyde's defense to count two. Although he had been previously disciplined for making sexually related [45] Fletcher v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 19 Cal.4th 865, 920–921, quoting Kloepfer v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 49 Cal.3d at page 866.

[49] Moreover, the defense conveniently overlooks that the 1996 public censure states: "Judge Hyde represents (and the Commission accepts as true) that he has taken measures to ensure that neither court personnel nor county equipment is utilized in any manner or in any activity that is not strictly court-related."

comments, he claims that he was entitled to tell Mr. Sims about a past incident of an employee engaging in oral sex in a car in the court parking lot because it was a true story. The commission questions whether any judge with 20 years of experience really believes that an otherwise inappropriate recitation of a sexual story is justified solely because the story is true. Accordingly, Judge Hyde either does not really believe in his defense or has questionable judgment, or both.

Judge Hyde's willingness to ignore the standards of judicial conduct is further demonstrated by his assistance of Ms. Wagner. Although he received an advisory letter in 1998 for providing assistance to a pro per litigant, Judge Hyde justified assisting Ms. Wagner because Mr. Dempsey, her husband, was dangerous.[50] Contrary to the implication of Judge Hyde's argument, there was no apparent emergency. Judge Hyde knew that Mr. Dempsey was incarcerated and was not due back in court for a couple of days.

Judge Hyde's actions in Ms. Kernan's case demonstrate his inability or unwillingness to appreciate the underlying principles of the California Code of Judicial Ethics. Despite his 1997 private admonishment, Judge Hyde felt that there was no need to disclose his telephone conversation with Ms. Kernan or to recuse himself from the case. He explained to the masters that, although Ms. Kernan kept trying to explain her case and ask questions, he kept reiterating that she should go to the clerk's window. He further stated that disclosure was not required because he knows half the defendants by their first names and it is not "necessary to disclose unless there's some sort of relationship that the law requires." Following his admonishment, Judge Hyde should have known that canon 3E(2) states that a trial judge "shall disclose on the record information that the judge believes the parties or their lawyers might consider relevant to the question of disqualification, even if the judge believes there is no actual basis for disqualification."

Judge Hyde's telephone call to Judge Walker in the Araiza matter is the most recent demonstration of his inability to conform to the standards of judicial conduct. Judge Hyde was warned in 1996 about a lack of objectivity with drug defendants and for threatening to call another judge. Furthermore, in November 2001, Judge Hyde had just received a preliminary investigation letter from the commission. Accordingly, Judge Hyde had every reason to scrupulously observe the standards of judicial conduct. Instead, Judge Hyde became angry at being disqualified and called Judge Walker, although he knew that this was unethical.[51] Even when the commission's attention was focused on him, Judge Hyde could not resist repeating an act of misconduct.

[50] Judge Hyde testified that he volunteered to help Ms. Wagner because "This was a young man that could kill someone. His anger was such. And I was concerned about her. And she had already taken a pretty good beating from this guy, and so she wanted to get him served."

(5) Impact of Misconduct on the Judicial System

The effect of the misconduct upon the integrity of and respect for the judiciary is a concern inherent in the Supreme Court's determination that Judge Fletcher's removal was "necessary to protect the public and the judiciary's reputation."[52] Similarly, when the Supreme Court removed Judge Adams from the bench, it noted that he had "engaged in successive extrajudicial transactions . . . creating an appearance of serious impropriety and thereby tending to diminish the public esteem of the judiciary—a consequence petitioner either deliberately ignored or was unable to appreciate."[53] The importance the court gave to the impact of the misconduct on the judicial system becomes evident when contrasted with the considerable character evidence in support of Judge Adams[54] and Justice Mosk's strong dissent.[55]

This is the sixth time that the commission has had to discipline Judge Hyde. He has already received three advisory letters, a private admonishment and a severe public censure. How could the commission meet its mandate to

"Q: When you apologized to Judge Walker, as you testified, and to Mr. Keller, weren't you worried that the Commission on Judicial Performance would find out about this incident where you had called Judge Walker on this case?

"A: No. That did not cross my mind. It crossed my mind that I had done something that I shouldn't have done in a fit of anger.

"Q: Well, you recognized it to be unethical, didn't you, what you had done?

"A: I didn't put it in those terms. I just knew it was improper.

"Q: What impropriety did you recognize?

"A: Once you're challenged from a case, you shouldn't be talking to another judge.

"Q: You did not recognize that as an ethical issue?

"A: At the moment, I acted in anger. In the afternoon, I knew it was wrong, and the next morning with Mr. Keller, and I admitted it to both of them."

[54] The court noted: "Several judges and numerous attorneys testified to their perception of petitioner's outstanding legal and administrative skills, noting his significant contributions toward streamlining the court system and implementing a 'fast-track' system." (Adams, supra, 10 Cal.4th at p. 911.)

enforce rigorous standards of judicial conduct and to maintain public confidence in the integrity of the judicial system if it does not remove Judge Hyde from office when it finds that he has repeated acts of misconduct for which he has been previously censured and admonished?

When it publicly censured Judge Hyde in 1996, the commission noted that none of Judge Hyde's acts of misconduct concerned "the manner in which Judge Hyde conducted his courtroom proceedings or deported himself while on the bench." Here, Judge Hyde's prejudicial conduct concerning Ms. Kernan and his willful misconduct in the Araiza matter concern his deportment on the bench.

When it publicly admonished Judge Hyde in 1996, the commission accepted Judge Hyde's assurances that he was aware of the inappropriateness of his actions and had taken steps to ensure that they would not be repeated. The record before the commission shows that these assurances were hollow. Not only did Judge Hyde repeat some of the very acts of misconduct for which he was disciplined, but it appears that he did not review the California Code of Judicial Ethics to determine what he could and could not do.

In addition, Judge Hyde's repeated acts of misconduct have a deleterious impact on court staff. The clerks have to handle Judge Hyde's improper requests for DMV records, accept his interference with the normal procedures for small claims cases, listen to his sexual stories, and facilitate his assistance to litigants. They know that litigants talk to Judge Hyde on the telephone and that he neither discloses the conversations nor disqualifies himself from the cases. The staff knows that these acts of misconduct have continued despite Judge Hyde's prior discipline.

(6) Mitigating Factors

(19) The Supreme Court has stated that character evidence and evidence of a judge's contributions to the judicial system do not mitigate or excuse misconduct, but may be considered in determining the appropriate discipline. In Adams, the Supreme Court noted: "The foregoing evidence of petitioner's qualifications for and contribution to the judicial system, during the course of a lengthy judicial career, does not mitigate or excuse petitioner's wilful misconduct or prejudicial conduct. (Spruance v. Commission on Judicial Performance [(1975)] 13 Cal.3d 778, 800 [119 Cal.Rptr. 841, 532 P.2d 1209].) We may, however, and do take these factors into account in considering the totality of the circumstances that are pertinent to our determination of the appropriate discipline. (See McCartney v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications (1974) 12 Cal.3d 512, 539–540 [116 Cal.Rptr. 260, 526 P.2d 268].)"[56]

In Broadman the Supreme Court reiterated that evidence that a judge is industrious and innovative does not mitigate or excuse willful or prejudicial misconduct, and indicated that the commission had properly considered evidence in mitigation in the determination of the appropriate discipline.[57]

Judge Hyde expressed genuine concern for his community and there is evidence that Judge Hyde was an innovative judge. In addition, the commission recognizes that a number of attorneys testified as to Judge Hyde's contributions to his community, his good character and his good judicial performance. The weight accorded Judge Hyde's concern for his community as a mitigating factor, however, is lessened by the fact that Judge Hyde's 1996 advisory letter and his 1996 public censure chastised him for not keeping his community and judicial activities separate.

CONCLUSION

(20) After having received three advisory letters, a private admonishment and a severe public censure, Judge Hyde is again before the commission. This time the commission has determined that Judge Hyde has committed two acts of willful misconduct, four acts of conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute, and one act of improper action. The commission has further determined that at least four of Judge Hyde's most recent acts of misconduct were for unethical conduct for which he had been previously disciplined. In addition, Judge Hyde's lack of candor in his filings with the commission and the masters' concerns with Judge Hyde's credibility raise serious questions about his integrity.

The commission has determined that these factors compel the removal of Judge Hyde from office.[58] Judge Hyde's persistence in violating the standards of judicial conduct, his inability or unwillingness to learn from prior discipline, and his general approach to the commission and to this proceeding preclude the commission from having any confidence that he will not continue to violate the California Code of Judicial Ethics if allowed to remain on the bench. The commission concludes that, despite Judge Hyde's contributions to his community and his court, the totality of the circumstances mandates Judge Hyde's removal for "the protection of the public, the enforcement of rigorous standards of judicial conduct, and the maintenance of public confidence in the integrity and independence of the judicial system."[59]

This decision shall constitute the order of removal of Judge D. Ronald Hyde and, pursuant to the provisions of article VI, section 18 of the California Constitution and rule 120(a) of the Rules of the Commission on Judicial Performance, Judge D. Ronald Hyde is hereby disqualified from acting as a judge.

Commission members Judge Risë Jones Pichon, Justice Vance W. Raye, Judge Madeleine I. Flier, Mr. Marshall B. Grossman, Mr. Michael A. Kahn, Mrs. Crystal Lui, Mr. Jose C. Miramontes, Mrs. Penny Perez, Ms. Ramona Ripston, and Ms. Barbara Schraeger voted in favor of all the findings and conclusions expressed herein and the removal of Judge D. Ronald Hyde from judicial office. Commission member Dr. Betty L. Wyman did not participate in this matter.

INQUIRY CONCERNING JUDGE KEVIN A. ROSS

SUMMARY

A disciplinary matter was brought concerning a superior court judge.

The Commission on Judicial Performance ordered the judge's removal from judicial office, determining that there were four instances of willful misconduct, two instances of prejudicial misconduct, and one instance of improper action under Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (d). Through his actions in four unrelated criminal cases, the judge violated Cal. Code Jud. Ethics, canons 1, 2A, 3B. He added new criminal charges against a defendant, thereby intruding into the charging authority of the prosecutor, and incarcerated the defendant summarily, without any pretense of due process, based on the faulty new charges; he called and spoke on the telephone with a defendant in a drug case; he questioned an unrepresented defendant and accused the defendant of lying until the defendant admitted to the alleged facts, despite the defendant's request for counsel; and he accused a defendant of being a pathological liar, proceeded with the hearing in the absence of counsel, and denied the defendant the opportunity for a hearing and the right to present evidence. In addition, the judge violated Cal. Code Jud. Ethics, canons 1, 2A, 3B(9), by discussing details of a pending juvenile case on a general public affairs television program and violated Cal. Code Jud. Ethics, canons 1, 2A, 2B(2), 4A(2), 4D(1)(a), 4D(2), and 4F, by acting as a private arbitrator during filming of a pilot television program for a possible reality series. As to the appropriate discipline, the commission concluded that the judge's manifest and pervasive lack of honesty and accountability throughout the disciplinary proceedings compelled his removal from office, despite testimony that he was a role model and community leader. (Opinion by Marshall B. Grossman, Chairperson.)

HEADNOTES

(1) Judges § 6.2—Discipline—Removal—Willful and Prejudicial Misconduct—Pervasive Lack of Honesty Before Commission.—A judge was removed from office based on four instances of willful misconduct, two instances of prejudicial misconduct, and one instance of improper action, together with his manifest and pervasive lack of honesty and accountability throughout the disciplinary proceedings. The mandate of the Commission on Judicial Performance to protect the public required nothing short of that ultimate sanction. Although the judge was presented as a role model and community leader, the commission nonetheless was constrained to conclude that he should not remain on the bench.

(2) Judges § 6.2—Discipline—Willful Misconduct—Definition.—The most serious form of judicial misconduct is willful misconduct, defined as consisting of (1) unjudicial conduct that is (2) committed in bad faith (3) by a judge acting in his or her judicial capacity. In order to determine whether a judge's conduct is unjudicial under the first prong of the foregoing standard, the conduct is measured with reference to the California Code of Judicial Ethics. The bad faith requirement for willful misconduct is satisfied when a judge is (1) performing a judicial act for a corrupt purpose (which is any purpose other than the faithful discharge of judicial duties), or (2) performing a judicial act with knowledge that the act is beyond the judge's lawful judicial power, or (3) performing a judicial act that exceeds the judge's lawful power with a conscious disregard for the limits of the judge's authority. The judicial capacity prong of the willfulness test has been defined as follows: A judge is acting in a judicial capacity while performing one of the functions, whether adjudicative or administrative in nature, that are associated with the position of a judge or when the judge uses or attempts to use the authority of the judicial office for an improper purpose.

(3) Judges § 6.2—Discipline—Prejudicial Misconduct—Definition.—The Supreme Court of California has defined prejudicial misconduct, the second most serious category of judicial misconduct, as follows: Prejudicial conduct is distinguishable from willful misconduct in that a judge's acts may constitute prejudicial conduct even if not committed in a judicial capacity, or, if committed in a judicial capacity, not committed in bad faith. Prejudicial conduct is either conduct that a judge undertakes in good faith, but which nevertheless would appear to an objective observer to be not only unjudicial conduct but conduct prejudicial to public esteem for the judicial office, or willful misconduct out of office, i.e., unjudicial conduct committed in bad faith by a judge not then acting in a judicial capacity. In this context, bad faith means a culpable mental state beyond mere negligence and consisting of either knowing or not caring that the conduct being undertaken is unjudicial and prejudicial to public esteem. In sum, to constitute prejudicial conduct, a judge's actions must bring the judicial office into disrepute, that is, the conduct would appear to an objective observer to be prejudicial to public esteem for the judicial office.

(4) Judges § 6.2—Discipline—Improper Action—Definition.—The least serious type of judicial misconduct is improper action. It consists of conduct that violates the California Code of Judicial Ethics, but that does not rise to the level of prejudicial misconduct. Improper conduct includes conduct that an objective observer aware of the circumstances would not deem to have an adverse effect on the reputation of the judiciary.

(5) Judges § 6.2—Discipline—Mitigation—Dishonesty.—Honesty is a minimum qualification for every judge. If the essential quality of veracity is lacking, other positive qualities of the person cannot redeem or compensate for the missing fundamental. Moreover, a judge who is willing to fabricate justifications for a challenged ruling demonstrates misconduct of the worst kind, evidencing moral turpitude and dishonesty. Lack of candor toward the Commission on Judicial Performance is uniquely and exceptionally egregious.

(6) Judges § 6.2—Discipline—Failure to Comply with Canons.—The failure of a judge to comply with the canons suggests performance below the minimum level necessary to maintain public confidence in the administration of justice.

(7) Judges § 6—Discipline—Willful Misconduct—Disregard of Fundamental Rights—Embroilment.—The judge engaged in willful misconduct by adding a new charge against a defendant who appeared before him and remanding her to custody without advising her of her constitutional rights. By doing so, the judge intruded into the charging authority of the prosecutor, became embroiled, and deprived the defendant of an impartial judge.

(8) Judges § 6.2—Discipline—Improper Action—Ex Parte Communications.—The judge's ex parte telephone contact with Prop. 36 defendant violated Cal. Code Jud. Ethics, canon 3B(7), which prohibits ex parte communication, and constituted improper action.

(9) Judges § 6—Discipline—Willfull Misconduct—Denial of Right to Counsel—Embroilment.—The judge engaged in willful misconduct by continuing to question a probationer concerning violation of probation after the probationer requested an attorney.

(10) Judges § 6—Discipline—Willfull Misconduct—Disregard of Fundamental Rights—Embroilment.—The judge engaged in willful misconduct and demonstrated embroilment and lack of partiality by refusing defendant's request for a formal probation violation hearing.

(11) Judges § 6—Discipline—Willfull Misconduct—Demeanor—Embroilment.—The judge's conduct in accusing the defendant of being a pathological liar and evicting defense counsel from the proceedings violated Cal. Code Jud. Ethics, canon 3B(4), reflected embroilment and constituted willful misconduct.

(12) Judges § 6—Discipline—Mitigation—Malicious Conduct.—There can be no mitigation for maliciously motivated unjudicial conduct.

(13) Judges § 6—Discipline—Political Activity—Measures to Improve the Law, Legal System, or the Administration of Justice—Judicial Outreach.—The judge's comments on a radio program concerning state proposition which proposed substantial changes to juvenile court law was not prohibited by Cal. Code Jud. Ethics, canon 5D.

(14) Judges § 6—Discipline—Precedence of Courtroom Activities—Tardiness.—The judge's arrival at court 10 minutes late because he was speaking on a radio program about a matter concerning the administration of justice did not violate Cal. Code Jud. Ethics, canons 3 and 4A, which require that a judge's courtroom activities take precedence over all other activities.

(15) Judges § 6—Discipline—Public Outreach.—The judge's participation in two different, but appropriate, judicial outreach activities, prior to attending a specifically approved program, did not violate the canons.

(16) Judges § 6—Discipline—Public Comment on Pending Case—Constitutionality of Prohibition.—A First Amendment challenge to the limits on speech imposed by the canons has been rejected by the California Supreme Court. The state has a strong interest in regulating public comments by a judge on a pending case.

(17) Judges § 6.4—Discipline—Constitutionality of Canons.—It is not the prerogative of the Commission on Judicial Performance to decide the constitutionality of a canon promulgated by the California Supreme Court. An administrative agency created by the Constitution, and granted judicial or quasi-judicial authority, lacks authority to refuse to enforce a statute on grounds of unconstitutionality unless an appellate court has determined the statute to be unconstitutional.

(18) Judges § 6.4—Discipline—Constitutionality of Canons.—Cal. Code Jud. Ethics, canon 3B(9), which prohibits public comment by judges on a pending or impending proceeding, serves the compelling public interest in maintaining a fair and impartial system of justice.

(19) Judges § 6—Discipline—Prejudicial Misconduct—Public Comment on Pending Case—Prejudgment.—The judge's public comments about a confidential juvenile case pending before him, including a discussion of the juvenile's family background, the nature of the charges, and the judge's intention regarding disposition, violated Cal. Code Jud. Ethics, canon 3B(9) and constituted prejudicial misconduct. The judge's comments were improper even though he did not disclose the minor's name. Discussion of the judge's intended disposition of the juvenile gave the appearance of prejudgment.

(20) Judges § 6.2—Discipline—Canons—Public Comment—Legal Education.—The concept of legal education in Cal. Code Jud. Ethics, canon 3B(9), refers to education of legal professionals. In the immediately preceding sentence of canon 3B(9), there is an express provision allowing for judges to explain for public information the procedures of the court. Thus, in the canon itself, there is a distinction between discussing issues pending in appellate courts in legal education programs and materials and informing the public about procedures of the court. The legal educational exemption of Cal. Code Jud. Ethics, canon 3B(9), allows only limited comment on pending appellate cases and does not extend to general public outreach activities by a judge.

(21) Judges § 6—Discipline—Prejudicial Misconduct—Public Comment on Pending Case.—The judge's televised comments about a case pending in the California Supreme Court about the defendant's family's wealth, the defendant's charisma, the fact that people were watching, and the reckless suggestion that politics may drive the outcome of the case were both unseemly and potentially prejudicial to the litigants. The comments also risked undermining public respect for the court's ultimate decision in the case. The judge committed prejudicial misconduct with his unwarranted and inappropriate comments.

(22) Judges § 6—Discipline—Prohibition on Public Comment—Exception—Explaining Court Procedures.—The judge's explanation in a media interview of the role of the various entities involved in a pending criminal prosecution and of general concepts of criminal law did not violate Cal. Code Jud. Ethics, canon 3B(9), as the comments fell within the exception for comments "explaining for public information the procedures of the court."

(23) Judges § 6.2—Discipline—Arbitration.—With exceptions, Cal. Code Jud. Ethics, canon 4F, prohibits a judge from acting as a private arbitrator.

(24) Judges § 6.2—Discipline—Prejudicial Misconduct—Judicial Capacity.—The California Supreme Court has included a variety of activities within the definition of "judicial capacity," in the context of the three-pronged Broadman standard for prejudicial misconduct. Generally speaking, it refers to a judge performing judicial functions, that is, one of the varied functions generally associated with his or her position as a judge. Additionally, however, it also is defined to include the following: If a judge uses, or attempts to use, his or her authority as a judge for improper ends, regardless of location, the court considers the judge to be acting in a judicial capacity.

(25) Judges § 6—Discipline—Willful Misconduct—Acting as Private Arbitrator—Use of Prestige of Office.—The judge was acting in a judicial capacity when he attempted to leverage the prestige of his judicial office for his financial and personal gain by appearing as a private arbitrator in a pilot television show. By serving as a private arbitrator during filming of the program and in allowing the use of his judicial title to engage in a commercial or business enterprise, the judge violated Cal. Code Jud. Ethics, canons 2B(2), 4D(1)(a), 4D(2) and 4F, and engaged in willful misconduct.

(26) Judges § 6.2—Discipline—Purpose.—The purpose of judicial discipline is not punishment, but rather the protection of the public, the enforcement of rigorous standards of judicial conduct, and the maintenance of public confidence in the integrity and independence of the judicial system.

(27) Judges § 6.2—Discipline—Appropriate Level—Factors.—The Commission on Judicial Performance has identified several factors that are relevant to determining appropriate discipline: the number of acts of misconduct; the existence of prior discipline; whether the judge appreciates that he or she committed misconduct; the judge's integrity; the likelihood of future misconduct; and the impact of the misconduct on the judicial system. In addition, court decisions make clear that it is also relevant that the misconduct involves moral turpitude and corrupt intentions.

(28) Judges § 6.2—Discipline—Factors—Number of Acts.—The number of acts of judicial misconduct is relevant to the question of discipline, but not according to any rigid formula. The number of wrongful acts by a judge is relevant to determining whether they were merely isolated occurrences or, instead, part of a course of conduct establishing lack of temperament and ability to perform judicial functions in an evenhanded manner.

(29) Judges § 6.2—Discipline—Factors—Improper Action.—Under the California Constitution, improper action is not a basis for a judge's censure or removal (Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (d)).

(30) Judges § 6.2—Discipline—Factors—Appreciation of Misconduct.—A judge's failure to appreciate or admit to the impropriety of his or her acts indicates a lack of capacity to reform.

(31) Judges § 6.2—Discipline—Factors—Integrity.—There are few judicial actions that provide greater justification for removal from office than the action of a judge in deliberately providing false information to the Commission on Judicial Performance in the course of its investigation into charges of wilful misconduct on the part of the judge.

(32) Judges § 6.2—Discipline—Factors—Likelihood of Future Violations.—Repeat misconduct by a judge indicates an inability to reform. Implicit in the lack of reform is the risk of yet further violations in the future.

(33) Judges § 6.2—Discipline—Factors—Positive Qualities.—The positive qualities of a judge are properly considered as part of the totality of circumstances pertinent to determining appropriate discipline, but do not mitigate willful or prejudicial misconduct.

I. INTRODUCTION AND SUMMARY

This disciplinary matter concerns Judge Kevin A. Ross of the Los Angeles County Superior Court. On August 30, 2004, the commission filed its first amended notice of formal proceedings against Judge Ross in which it charges Judge Ross with the following misconduct:

Count 1 charges that Judge Ross committed a variety of misconduct while presiding over four unrelated criminal cases between August 2001 and April 2003, including that he interfered with and abridged the defendants' constitutional rights to counsel and to fair hearings and against self-incrimination, abused his judicial authority, and became embroiled in two of the pending cases.

Count 2 charges Judge Ross with unapproved absences from court on two different days in connection with community outreach activities.

Count 3 charges that the judge made improper comments about pending cases during appearances he made on Life & Times Tonight, a television program produced by and shown on KCET, a public broadcasting station in Los Angeles.

Count 4 charges Judge Ross with acting as a private arbitrator during the filming of a pilot television program that was intended to be and was used to market and promote a proposed new syndicated "reality" series. The tentative name of the show was Mobile Court; the television pilot featured Judge Ross adjudicating actual private disputes at the scenes of the controversies.

The Supreme Court appointed three special masters who held an evidentiary hearing and reported to the commission. The masters are Hon. Judith L. Haller, Associate Justice of the Court of Appeal, Fourth Appellate District, Division One; Hon. Vincent J. O'Neill, Jr., Judge of the Ventura County Superior Court; and Hon. Michael A. Smith, Judge of the San Bernardino County Superior Court. The hearing before the masters took place in Pasadena over four days, November 15 through 18, 2004, followed by oral argument before them on February 10, 2005. The masters presented their detailed 77-page report to the commission on April 18, 2005.

The masters concluded that Judge Ross committed one instance of willful misconduct, four instances of prejudicial misconduct, and one instance of improper action. They concluded that the commission had failed to prove any misconduct in five of the subcounts.

For reasons we explain, we determine there were four instances of willful misconduct, two instances of prejudicial misconduct, one instance of improper action, and that no misconduct was proven respecting four subcounts. In addition, there is clear and convincing evidence of a pervasive lack of candor and accountability on Judge Ross's part during the proceedings, compelling the conclusion that he is fundamentally unsuited to be a judge.

Based on the testimony and evidence adduced at the hearing before them, the masters repeatedly stated in their report that they disbelieved Judge Ross's testimony and claimed defenses. We have the same reaction to that testimony and evidence. Moreover, subsequent to the masters' hearing, Judge Ross has confirmed by his arguments and conduct before this commission that his lack of veracity and refusal or inability to be accountable for his actions are persistent and profound.

Subsequent to the masters' hearing, Judge Ross submitted three briefs to the commission pursuant to Rules of the Commission on Judicial Performance, rule 130. We have studied those briefs, and they are discussed in this decision. We also have had the opportunity to listen to Judge Ross and observe him during his personal hour-long oral argument before us on August 24, 2005. (Selected excerpts from the transcript of the oral argument are set forth and discussed in this decision.) Following the oral argument before the commission, we requested a supplemental brief from the parties on the subject of whether removal was the appropriate remedy in this matter. We have reviewed that fourth brief from Judge Ross.

(1) Cumulatively, these presentations that follow the masters' hearing and report move us beyond the masters' expressed doubts concerning Judge Ross's capacity for truth telling. Judge Ross's manifest and pervasive lack of honesty and accountability throughout these proceedings compels our unanimous conclusion that we must remove him from office. Our mandate to protect the public requires nothing short of that ultimate sanction. While Judge Ross is presented as a role model and community leader, we nonetheless are constrained to conclude that he should not remain on the bench.

Judge Ross is represented by Edward P. George, Jr., of Long Beach. The examiners for the commission are commission trial counsel Jack Coyle and commission assistant trial counsel Valerie Marchant.

II. GENERALLY APPLICABLE LEGAL PRINCIPLES

A. BURDEN OF PROOF

The commission has the burden of proving the charges against Judge Ross by clear and convincing evidence. (Doan v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1995) 11 Cal.4th 294, 313 [45 Cal.Rptr.2d 254, 902 P.2d 272] (Doan); Geiler v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications (1973) 10 Cal.3d 270, 275 [110 Cal.Rptr. 201, 515 P.2d 1].) "Evidence of a charge is clear and convincing so long as there is a 'high probability' that the charge is true. [Citations.] The evidence need not establish the fact beyond a reasonable doubt." (Broadman v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1998) 18 Cal.4th 1079, 1090 [77 Cal.Rptr.2d 408, 959 P.2d 715] (Broadman).)

B. LEVELS OF MISCONDUCT

The levels or types of judicial misconduct that may subject a judge to discipline by the commission are described in article VI, section 18, subdivision (d), of the California Constitution. We summarize each of them.

1. Willful Misconduct

In order to determine whether a judge's conduct is "unjudicial" under the first prong of the foregoing standard, the conduct is measured with reference to the California Code of Judicial Ethics. (Dodds, supra, 12 Cal.4th at p. 172; accord, Oberholzer v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1999) 20 Cal.4th 371, 395 [84 Cal.Rptr.2d 466, 975 P.2d 663] (Oberholzer).)

The "bad faith" requirement for willful misconduct is satisfied when a judge is "(1) performing a judicial act for a corrupt purpose (which is any purpose other than the faithful discharge of judicial duties), or (2) performing a judicial act with knowledge that the act is beyond the judge's lawful judicial power, or (3) performing a judicial act that exceeds the judge's lawful power with a conscious disregard for the limits of the judge's authority." (Broadman, supra, 18 Cal.4th at p. 1092.)

The "judicial capacity" prong of the willfulness test has been defined as follows: "A judge is acting in a judicial capacity while performing one of the functions, whether adjudicative or administrative in nature, that are associated with the position of a judge or when the judge uses or attempts to use the authority of the judicial office for an improper purpose." (Broadman, supra, 18 Cal.4th at p. 1104, citing Dodds, supra, 12 Cal.4th at p. 172.)

2. Prejudicial Misconduct

(3) The Supreme Court has defined prejudicial misconduct, the second most serious category of judicial misconduct, as follows: "Prejudicial conduct is distinguishable from willful misconduct in that a judge's acts may constitute prejudicial conduct even if not committed in a judicial capacity, or, if committed in a judicial capacity, not committed in bad faith. Prejudicial conduct is 'either "conduct which a judge undertakes in good faith but which nevertheless would appear to an objective observer to be not only unjudicial conduct but conduct prejudicial to public esteem for the judicial office" [citation] or "willful misconduct out of office, i.e., unjudicial conduct committed in bad faith by a judge not then acting in a judicial capacity" [citation].' [Citation.] In this context, bad faith means a culpable mental state beyond mere negligence and consisting of either knowing or not caring that the conduct being undertaken is unjudicial and prejudicial to public esteem. In sum, to constitute prejudicial conduct, a judge's actions must bring 'the judicial office into disrepute,' that is, the conduct would appear to an objective observer to be prejudicial to ' "public esteem for the judicial office." ' [Citation.]" (Broadman, supra, 18 Cal.4th at pp. 1092–1093.)

3. Improper Action

C. JUDICIAL VERACITY

(5) The Supreme Court has stated unequivocally that honesty is a minimum qualification for every judge. (Kloepfer v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1989) 49 Cal.3d 826, 865 [264 Cal.Rptr. 100, 782 P.2d 239] (Kloepfer).) If the essential quality of veracity is lacking, other positive qualities of the person cannot redeem or compensate for the missing fundamental. (Ibid.)

Moreover, a judge who is willing to fabricate justifications for a challenged ruling demonstrates "misconduct of the worst kind, evidencing moral turpitude and dishonesty." (Ryan v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1988) 45 Cal.3d 518, 535 [247 Cal.Rptr. 378, 754 P.2d 724] (Ryan).) Lack of candor toward the commission is uniquely and exceptionally egregious. (Adams II, supra, 10 Cal.4th at p. 914; see also Doan, supra, 11 Cal.4th at p. 338 [by urging witnesses to conceal information from commission, judge commits willful misconduct]; Fletcher v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1998) 19 Cal.4th 865, 888–891 [81 Cal.Rptr.2d 58, 968 P.2d 958] (Fletcher) [by forwarding copy of altered court record to commission, judge commits willful misconduct].)

In Adams II, the California Supreme Court concluded that Judge Adams had engaged in a variety of misconduct, including four instances of willful misconduct in "making material misstatements or omissions to the Commission." (Adams II, supra, 10 Cal.4th at p. 914.) The court held that misleading the commission "in particular" warranted the removal of the judge from office. (Ibid.) The highest courts in Michigan and in New York also have upheld the removal of a judge based particularly on lack of veracity, including toward the judicial conduct board in each state.

In Michigan Judicial Tenure Commission v. Ferrara (1998) 458 Mich. 350 [582 N.W.2d 817], the Michigan Supreme Court ordered Judge Ferrara removed solely for fraud and lying to the press, the master and the commission. The court did not determine whether the initial charges of misconduct had been proven.

Similarly, in In re Collazo (1998) 91 N.Y.2d 251 [668 N.Y.S.2d 997, 691 N.E.2d 1021], New York's highest court ordered Judge Collazo removed based on his deceitful conduct during the investigation of the initial wrongdoing, noting that the original misconduct alone would not warrant removal. Commenting on the "lack of candor" and upholding the New York commission's recommended removal, the Court of Appeals stated, "Particularly relevant here is our conviction that 'deception is antithetical to the role of a Judge who is sworn to uphold the law and seek the truth' [citations]." (668 N.Y.S.2d at p. 999.)

III. COUNT 1: MISCONDUCT TOWARD CRIMINAL DEFENDANTS

There are four subparts to count 1, each alleging misconduct by Judge Ross in a separate criminal matter over which he presided. Count 1D involves defendant Debra Fuentes. We discuss it first because it shows a shocking abuse of power and disregard of fundamental rights, as well as clear examples of lack of candor and accountability by Judge Ross. The judge's response to the charges and the evidence demonstrate clearly his failure or refusal to acknowledge the implications of his wrongdoing. The Fuentes matter, thus, presents an important framework for viewing the remainder of the wrongdoing.

A. COUNT 1D—PEOPLE V. DEBRA FUENTES

1. Findings of Fact

We paraphrase and adopt the following basic findings of the masters. The Fuentes hearing occurred during a busy traffic arraignment calendar over which Judge Ross presided on the morning of April 21, 2003. Ms. Fuentes had two old outstanding traffic citations, and the description of her differed on each citation. On the citation from May 1995 (for violating the seatbelt law), she was described as five feet four inches, 250 pounds, and born April 25, 1967. On the other citation from February 1996 (for no driver's license and violating the seatbelt law), she was described as five feet seven inches, 180 pounds, and born April 25, 1965. The signatures on each citation also appear to differ.

At the hearing, Ms. Fuentes presented Judge Ross with a "Wrong Defendant" declaration to assert she was not the person actually cited. Her self-description on the declaration matched the height-weight-birth information on the 1995 citation, but not the other citation. She also gave Judge Ross a grocery store identification card.

Judge Ross examined the Wrong Defendant declaration, the citations and grocery ID card, and then told the defendant, "I believe you're lying to me. I believe all [sic] these tickets are yours." He unilaterally added a misdemeanor count to the charges in both cases, and summarily sentenced the defendant to jail for 30 days; Ms. Fuentes was taken into custody immediately. The new charge, noted in Judge Ross's handwriting as "Count 3" in each case, was stated to be a violation of a statute making it a misdemeanor knowingly to provide false evidence of automobile insurance to a peace officer or court clerk in connection with financial responsibility laws. Judge Ross also wrote on Ms. Fuentes's Wrong Defendant declaration "Don't Return ID card."

The judge entered a "not guilty" plea for the defendant. However, she was never arraigned in the sense of being advised either of the charges against her or of her other constitutional rights, including her rights to counsel and to a hearing. Judge Ross did not notify either the prosecutor or the public defender that he had added misdemeanor charges.

Ms. Fuentes remained in jail until she was released on bail on the evening of April 23—two and one-half days after Judge Ross ordered her incarcerated. She testified before the masters that she was not told the nature of the charges against her, had no idea why she was jailed, and apparently never has learned why Judge Ross ordered her jailed.

In their report, the masters note Judge Ross's testimony that his handling of the Fuentes matter "was a complete error" and a "screw-up," and a total "mess." They go on to describe in detail what they call his "troubling statements" that he made in an effort to minimize his "mess," as follows:

a. Taking Immediate Steps to Rectify Error: The masters disbelieved the judge's claim that he "took immediate steps" and did "everything in [his] power to rectify a terrible wrong." We also reject the claim because the clear evidence is to the contrary.

The judge testified that the day after he incarcerated Ms. Fuentes, he told his clerk, Mary Wechter, to contact Commissioner Michael Levanas, the master calendar judge, to have Ms. Fuentes released. The masters found, and we concur, that the judge's testimony is inconsistent with and undermined by the more credible testimony of Commissioner Levanas and Judge David Sotelo (the "site judge," that is, the supervising judge of the court facility where Judge Ross was assigned at the time) concerning when they learned of the Fuentes matter. Judge Sotelo testified that he did not learn of the Fuentes matter until three days later, on April 24, and that he immediately contacted Commissioner Levanas. The commissioner testified his first knowledge of the case came during that telephone call from Judge Sotelo.

The testimony of these two credible witnesses thoroughly undermines Judge Ross's claim of taking "immediate" remedial action. Nonetheless, and notwithstanding that the masters had rejected Judge Ross's claim—because it was discredited by the other bench officers—the judge still persisted in arguing before the commission that he promptly took remedial action.

Judge Ross's testimony before the masters that he directed his clerk to contact the commissioner also is inconsistent with the judge's response of September 26, 2003, to the commission's second preliminary investigation letter. There, he represented that he personally made the call to Commissioner Levanas. The masters justifiably disbelieved Judge Ross when he tried to reconcile the two responses by saying that the earlier reference to himself was, in effect, an "imperial I" that included his clerk. Also, in his answer,[1] Judge Ross again stated under oath that he "told Ms. Wechter to contact [Commissioner Levanas]." In any case, Commissioner Levanas's testimony that he first learned of the Fuentes matter from Judge Sotelo on April 24 negates an earlier call from either Judge Ross or his clerk.

As noted by the masters, at the time of the Fuentes case, Judge Ross knew he was under investigation by the commission concerning his handling of the Carrillo, Aka and Salcido cases (counts 1A, 1B and 1C, discussed post). In fact, Judge Ross testified that the reason he notified Judge Sotelo was that he thought the Fuentes case would become part of the commission's pending investigation. By his own admission then, he was worried that his "mess" in the Fuentes matter would not just disappear, and was concerned about this commission. We conclude Judge Ross reported himself to his supervising judge to improve his own position later in these proceedings. He was not trying to rectify his errors by minimizing the harm to Ms. Fuentes.

b. Fuentes's Alleged Persistent Arguing: Judge Ross testified he remembered feeling " 'very frustrated' because Fuentes kept insisting that she was not the person on the citations." Even assuming Ms. Fuentes did persist in asserting her innocence, there was no reasonable basis for Judge Ross to have become so "frustrated" in response that he would usurp the function of the prosecutor to add additional charges, and then summarily incarcerate her on the new charges. In fact, the more persuasive evidence shows the defendant was not being persistent. Ms. Fuentes testified before the masters that the proceedings were handled in a summary manner, with little or no opportunity for her even to speak. Previously, she told commission staff that the judge sounded "mad," and that she did not say anything.[2]

[1] The answer to which we refer in this decision is Judge Ross's answer to the first amended notice of formal proceedings, verified by him on September 17, 2004, and filed on September 20, 2004.

[2] All exhibits to which we refer in this decision were admitted into evidence by stipulation.

c. Fuentes's Alleged Presentation of "Insurance Documents": The masters also questioned Judge Ross's claim that he added the charges of providing false evidence of insurance against the defendant because she gave him insurance documents. In our view the claim is fabricated.

Ms. Fuentes specifically denied bringing insurance papers with her to court. Also, when Judge Ross reported the Fuentes matter to Judge Sotelo, he made no mention that the defendant presented false insurance documents. Further, if such documents were the basis of charging a new crime, it strains credulity that Judge Ross, a former prosecutor, would have returned them. They were the evidence of the alleged new crime. Finally, the judge's note in the file is "Don't Return ID card"; he did not direct the retention of insurance papers.

Even if insurance papers somehow were involved, Judge Ross has never satisfactorily explained how that fact figured into his decision to charge the defendant with any new crimes. He did testify that a bailiff once told him a judge could add charges concerning false insurance papers. The judge could not recall the name of the bailiff and we disbelieve the story. Additionally, we do not believe Judge Ross, an eight-year veteran prosecutor, in fact thought that as a judge he could make charging decisions, let alone because a bailiff said he could. The entire "insurance papers" story is incredible and we reject it.

As the masters correctly noted, the story about insurance papers is a diversion from the egregious act of the judge adding any charges—and his failure to appreciate the latter as serious misconduct. When Judge Ross reported on the Fuentes matter to Judge Sotelo on April 24, he mentioned only that he added a "wrong charge"—not that he was wrong in adding a new charge. Judge Sotelo confirmed that Judge Ross reported he had made a mistake concerning the nature of the charge he had added. Combined, these statements show that three days after he made his mistakes in the Fuentes matter, Judge Ross still did not appreciate that his real error was to have usurped the prosecutorial function of adding new charges—not merely charging the wrong offense—and incarcerating the defendant on the spot, in the absence of any due process, based on his newly added charges. (Ibid.)

d. Claimed Referral to Another Court for Arraignment and Counsel: The masters rejected Judge Ross's additional claim during his testimony and at oral argument before them that he thought that before Ms. Fuentes was incarcerated, she would be sent to another courtroom, where counsel would be provided in connection with a proper arraignment. As described by the masters, there was no expectation of such an occurrence in the absence of some action by Judge Ross to bring about such a result. Indeed, by his order, she was to go directly to jail, and that is exactly what happened. We find this claim, too, is fabricated.

e. Claimed Automatic Release on Bail: The masters also found unpersuasive Judge Ross's claim that he had a "reasonable expectation" Ms. Fuentes would be released as a matter of standard court or jail policy. According to the judge, because of overcrowding in the jail, anyone with bail under $26,000 in a misdemeanor or infraction case is automatically released. There is no evidence of such a policy beyond the judge's claim. The fact that Ms. Fuentes was not automatically released raises doubts whether the policy in fact exists at all and, if so, whether it is as Judge Ross describes it.[3]

If in fact Judge Ross realized the true nature of his wrongdoing, or if he truly were concerned about rectifying his mistakes, we are convinced he could and would have taken affirmative and effective steps to ensure Ms. Fuentes's prompt release by issuing an order to that effect, rather than leave it to claimed assumptions. (This latter issue is discussed further (post, pp. 96–99) in connection with Judge Ross's oral argument before the commission.)

f. Claimed Admission of "Screw-up": A few weeks after the Fuentes case, Judge Sotelo reminded various traffic court judges assembled at a meeting that they should not incarcerate defendants for traffic infractions. When one of the other judges expressed surprise at the idea of anyone doing such a thing, Judge Ross stated that he had "screwed up." The masters viewed Judge Ross's "admission" in front of his colleagues as mitigating behavior. However, in light of all the indicators that show Judge Ross neither understands nor accepts the true extent or ramifications of what he did, his "admission" was superficial, at most. Further, mitigation does not operate to counteract basic dishonesty (Kloepfer, supra, 49 Cal.3d at p. 865) or maliciously motivated misconduct (Adams II, supra, 10 Cal.4th at pp. 911–912, citing Spruance v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications (1975) 13 Cal.3d 778, 800 [119 Cal.Rptr. 841, 532 P.2d 1209] (Spruance)).

[3] At oral argument before the commission, Judge Ross made a passing reference that "the bail amounts were incorrectly set" as a seeming explanation for the defendant's nonrelease. It is unclear who he claims allegedly set those wrong amounts, but he appears to suggest it was someone else's fault the defendant remained in jail for two and one-half days.

g. The Realization of Mistake "Trigger Case": In Judge Ross's verified answer to the charges, he stated that his concern that he had made a mistake in the Fuentes matter was triggered the following day by a similar case that he handled differently. The judge told a similar story to the masters; he testified that he first became concerned about what he had done in the Fuentes matter that same evening, and that the next morning, he had an "immediate" reaction when he handled an "identical" case. However, Judge Ross could remember no details at the masters' hearing concerning the supposed "trigger case." The inescapable conclusion is that there was no such case and that the story is made up.

The examiner asserts the story was engendered by the judge's concern about the pending commission investigation and his intent to have this commission believe that he quickly realized his mistake and promptly undertook to rectify it. The judge accuses the examiner of unreasonably expecting the judge to remember the details of the one case from among the estimated 10,000 to 20,000 cases he had handled between the time of "that case" in April 2003 and the time of the masters' hearing in November 2004.

The judge's argument illustrates he is quick to blame someone else—this time, the examiner—and he twists the facts, to adjust them to the moment. The issue here is not the time lapse between April 2003 and November 2004. Judge Ross first raised the issue of the "trigger case" in his answer in September 2004, just two months before the master's hearing. By the time of the hearing, he allegedly had forgotten all details of the alleged "trigger." We believe the judge invented the "trigger case" as part of his discredited claim that he quickly realized his mistake, hoping to minimize his problems later with the commission. Even if that was not his motivation, we do not believe the story that there was a second case that caused an awakening. When Judge Ross called Judge Sotelo three days later, he still did not appreciate what he had done.

h. Claimed "Inability to Find" the Defendant to Release Her: Judge Ross's inability or refusal to be forthright concerning the Fuentes matter was driven home during oral argument before the commission. Commission member Judge Risë Pichon asked Judge Ross, in light of his claim that he realized his mistake the morning after he jailed Ms. Fuentes, why he did not simply order her released at once. In his evasive response, Judge Ross contradicted himself repeatedly. The complete series of questions by the three judge members of the commission on this issue, and Judge Ross's comments, are set forth here:

"JUDGE PICHON: Judge Ross, you indicated you were very concerned about your actions in remanding Ms. Fuentes, so you asked your clerk to pull the file for you. [¶] When you had the file pulled, why didn't you immediately release her at that time?

"JUDGE ROSS: In downtown Los Angeles, where we are, we are at the Metropolitan courthouse, individuals who are in custody are sent to another location downtown, called the Twin Tower Jail Facility. At that point, when I realized there had been an error, Ms. Fuentes was not in the building in which we reside. [¶] I contacted my clerk. My first question was, I made a mistake. We need to do something about this. I said, [f]ind out what the status is of the case. She then advised me, to my surprise, that the defendant had not been released. The reason I say it was a surprise to me was because in Los Angeles on misdemeanor cases, especially infractions, if an individual has bail of under $26,000 they are automatically released. It's just how—because the jails are overcrowded. [¶] In her particular case, the bail amounts were incorrectly set. So in my mind, given when I sentence someone to 30 days in jail, usually they are out the next day. So in my mind, she had already been released and was going to be coming back to court.

"JUDGE PICHON: Even though your clerk said she was still in?

"JUDGE ROSS: Well, what happened was, over the lunch hour I told her to give me the case. We went through the entire afternoon calendar, which took some time. Then I said, [f]ind out what happened in this case. [¶] So at the end of the day I said to her, okay, what's the status? And she said, well, she's still in custody. My response was, oh, we have to get her out because she shouldn't be in there and I clearly erred. [¶] What then happened was, my clerk indicated that she called the other courtroom. Because my mindset was she should have been sent to what's called Division 61. Division 61 is the arraignment court. [¶] Now, handling these traffic matters, typically, if one went to trial it went to Division 67. I knew that. All my cases, when they had trials, went to Division 67. [¶] If you look at the documentation that I provided, I wrote down Division 61, with the understanding that she would immediately go to that courtroom. And then once she would be arraigned—and, again, knowing that my actions now were wrong, but at the time thinking that that would happen, she would be released and then she would come back to court. And I relied on that because just a week prior—

"JUSTICE McCONNELL: The question is, why didn't you order her released immediately, when you found out she was still in custody?

"JUDGE ROSS: Because at that point we couldn't find her. We didn't know where she was in terms of being in the system. [¶] So the next day when—this happened on Monday. Tuesday afternoon—

"JUDGE HORN: I'm sorry. You say you couldn't find her?

"JUDGE ROSS: That's what I'm getting ready to explain.

"JUDGE HORN: I don't know what you mean by that.

"JUDGE ROSS: Okay. The incident happened on Monday. Tuesday afternoon is when I indicated we need to have her removed. [¶] When the clerk, based on her representation to me, contacted the jail facility, they didn't have a record of her, based on what my clerk told me.

"JUSTICE McCONNELL: How would the clerk then know she was still in jail?

"JUDGE ROSS: Because it had not showed any type of release. Although, it had indicated that she was still in custody, but for whatever reason she could not be found.

"JUDGE HORN: Doesn't your bailiff usually do this? Doesn't the bailiff usually handle those issues?

"JUDGE ROSS: In this particular instance for me, I typically will rely on my clerk. If it's something that's not worked out, if I need to go to a bailiff, I will do so. [¶] But it had been my experience that in relying on my clerk that things would be handled properly. Which is why I still work with her. [¶] That takes us to, now, Wednesday.

"JUSTICE McCONNELL: No, but she found out that this person was still in jail and you couldn't just order her released?

"JUDGE ROSS: The issue at that point was, she had not been released. They were not clear as to whether or not she had posted bail or not.

"JUSTICE McCONNELL: You just told us they couldn't find her.

"JUDGE ROSS: Right. And that was one of the reasons. Because they didn't know, had she been released? Was she just lost in the system? There was no knowledge of that. [¶] So then Wednesday morning we said, okay, what is the status of this case? My clerk advised me the reason why they can't find her was because she had posted bail, and so she was no longer in custody. And that's why they couldn't locate her. And as it turned out, she had, in fact, posted bail.

"JUDGE HORN: Wasn't that three days later?

"JUDGE ROSS: No, that was two days later. [¶] So at that point I said, okay, it's horrible that she ended up spending these two days in custody. I know that she's now out of custody. The only thing that I can do at this point is to notify the others that when her case comes back it should be dismissed, that I erred, I know I erred, I have no explanation as to what I was thinking at the time, and I won't make any excuses for it. But that was the scenario of the events."

The foregoing reflects Judge Ross's inability or refusal to confront the reality of his wrongdoing and the seeming ease with which he makes things up. Alternatively, or additionally, it demonstrates he is intentionally trying to mislead the commission. When Judge Ross reported himself to Judge Sotelo on April 24—three days after he incarcerated Ms. Fuentes—he still thought his mistake was to have charged her with submitting false insurance evidence. He still did not realize the gravity of his error in usurping the prosecutor's function. The claims of what he did, or assumed, during the days Ms. Fuentes was behind bars are concoctions. As the masters stated, "Judge Ross's claim that he took immediate steps to rectify his error is belied by the record . . . ."

Although the masters disbelieved and discredited all of Judge Ross's stories related to the Fuentes matter, he persists. Whatever the basis for his tales, Judge Ross's lack of candor before the masters and this commission is apparent. He concluded the quoted exchange with the three judge commission members with the statement, "I know I erred, I have no explanation as to what I was thinking at the time, and I won't make any excuses for it." Nonetheless, Judge Ross made a number of unconvincing excuses that are clear and convincing evidence of his efforts to mislead the masters and this commission.

2. Conclusions of Law

We agree with the masters that Judge Ross's actions in connection with the Fuentes matter constitute willful misconduct. The three elements of that most serious form of misconduct, specified in Broadman, supra, 18 Cal.4th at page 1091, are present here. There is (1) unjudicial conduct that is (2) committed in bad faith (3) by Judge Ross acting in his judicial capacity.

(6) The masters concluded, as do we, that Judge Ross violated California Code of Judicial Ethics canons 1 and 2A (all further references to a canon are to the California Code of Judicial Ethics) (by creating an appearance of impropriety and undermining the integrity and independence of the judiciary), canon 3B(4) (by failing to be patient, dignified and courteous to persons with whom the judge deals in his or her official capacity), canon 3B(7) (by failing to afford litigant full right to be heard) and 3B(8) (by failing to dispose of all matters fairly). His conduct therefore was unjudicial under the Broadman test. (Accord, Dodds, supra, 12 Cal.4th at p. 172; Oberholzer, supra, 20 Cal.4th at

p. 395.) " 'The failure of a judge to comply with the canons "suggests performance below the minimum level necessary to maintain public confidence in the administration of justice." ' " (Adams II, supra, 10 Cal.4th at p. 878, citing Adams v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1994) 8 Cal.4th 630, 662 [34 Cal.Rptr.2d 641, 882 P.2d 358].)

(7) Judge Ross was acting in his judicial capacity. He also acted in bad faith because he acted out of pique, irritation or impatience, any of which is a purpose other than the faithful discharge of his judicial duties. Alternatively or additionally, he acted beyond his lawful authority, either with knowledge that it was beyond his authority or with a conscious disregard for the limits of his authority.

The judge clearly lacked authority to add new criminal charges against Ms. Fuentes. In doing so, he intruded into the charging authority of the prosecutor, became embroiled, and deprived the defendant of an impartial judge. (Cf. Fletcher, supra, 19 Cal.4th at pp. 907–910 [willful misconduct for judge to have ordered district attorney to add new charges]; Ryan, supra, 45 Cal.3d at pp. 535–536 [willful misconduct for judge to have urged district attorney, ex parte, to pursue felony, not misdemeanor, charges].)

Judge Ross testified "it was clear" that he should not have added charges, and he admitted he "should have known that, having been a former prosecutor myself." He then added, "having been a former prosecutor, I knew that that authority rested with the prosecutorial agency." However, he reverted to the following: "And I had been on the bench long enough to where, in that particular instance, I should have known that that was something that I should not have done." When asked to clarify between the two "should have known" assertions and the clear statement "I knew," Judge Ross declined to respond, stating instead, "I'm very comfortable with the answer that I already indicated."

The judge's unwillingness to clarify whether he in fact knew manifests a consciousness of wrongdoing. Further, his experience as an eight-year veteran prosecutor, and his experience on the criminal bench at the time of the Fuentes matter, combine to convince us he in fact knew he lacked the authority to add charges. By a parity of reasoning, we also are convinced he knew he lacked the authority to incarcerate the defendant summarily, without any pretense of due process, based on the faulty new charges.

In Kloepfer, the judge also had substantial prebench experience as a prosecutor (11 years), from which the Supreme Court deduced that he was "well acquainted with the constitutional and procedural rights of criminal defendants." (Kloepfer, supra, 49 Cal.3d at p. 865.) Judge Kloepfer's failure to use his knowledge and experience to ensure the rights of persons appearing before him suggested an improper motive, according to the court. (Id. at pp. 865–866.) We likewise conclude that Judge Ross's failure to use his knowledge suggests that he violated Ms. Fuentes's rights for an improper motive. He acted in bad faith.

We are fortified in the conviction that Judge Ross acted in bad faith in the Fuentes matter by the fact that there is equally clear evidence of malicious intent—bad faith—in two of the other counts. In both the Aka case (discussed post, pp. 110–112) and the Salcido matter (post, pp. 112–118), Judge Ross trampled on the defendants' rights also while angry or vexed. His knowing disregard of fundamental rights and abuse of judicial authority in Fuentes was not an aberration, but rather, part of a pattern that renders Judge Ross unsuited for the bench.

B. COUNT 1A—PEOPLE V. LENORE CARRILLO

1. Findings of Fact and Conclusions of Law Concerning Basic Charges

(8) The defendant, a long-term heroin user who was seven months pregnant, appeared before Judge Ross on Thursday, August 23, 2001, on three drug charges in one of the earliest cases brought under new laws enacted under Proposition 36.[4] As a condition of probation, Ms. Carrillo was ordered to report for an assessment at the Community Assessment Service Center (CASC) the next day, Friday, August 24, and to return to court the following Wednesday, August 29. She failed to appear on either occasion. Judge Ross concedes he called and spoke with the defendant on the telephone. The commission charges that the telephone communication violated canon 3B(7) which, generally speaking, and as applicable here, prohibits ex parte communications.

The parties dispute the timing and circumstances of the judge's call to the defendant. The masters accepted Judge Ross's basic version of the events. According to the judge, the defendant called the court and left a voice message on a recording system, crying and sounding desperate because she had failed to return to court on August 29 as ordered, and requesting that someone call her. Judge Ross testified that he was working late on August 30, heard the message, and returned the call around 5:30 or 6:00 p.m. that evening.

[4] Proposition 36, the "Substance Abuse and Crime Prevention Act of 2000," was passed by the voters in November 2000 and became effective July 1, 2001. Under it, defendants convicted of nonviolent drug possession charges must be sentenced to probation and drug treatment, rather than incarcerated.

We decline to adopt Judge Ross's version because, as will be discussed, he created a self-serving after-the-fact record of his call that he misrepresented to the commission as having been contemporaneously created. This subsequent action is described more fully (post, pp. 104–109), and at a minimum, casts doubt on his claim of what happened.

The timing and circumstances of the call are not critical in terms of analyzing the basic impropriety of the ex parte contact with the defendant. The significant fact is that the masters find, and the judge admits, that he had a private telephone conversation with the defendant in a case then pending before him. We adopt this basic finding. The masters concluded the call was in violation of canon 3B(7), and we concur in that as well.

The commission charges that Judge Ross's ex parte communication also created an appearance of impropriety and undermined the integrity and independence of the judiciary in violation of canons 1 and 2A. The masters rejected this further charge based on the finding that in the setting of a Proposition 36 case, members of the public would approve of a judge being sufficiently concerned about this particular defendant's welfare to make such a call. Based on that reasoning, they concluded that the public would not question the judge's integrity or impartiality because of the telephone contact. Continuing with the analysis, the masters concluded that the phone conversation constituted improper action, not prejudicial misconduct, because an element of the latter is the adverse effect on public esteem for the judiciary that is missing here.

We adopt the masters' analyses and conclusion, and agree that in the unique setting of this early Proposition 36 case, the telephone contact with the defendant constituted improper action, for the reasons described.

2. Findings of Fact and Conclusions of Law Concerning Judge Ross's Defenses and Subsequent Actions

a. Judge Ross's Claimed "Emergency" Under Canon 3B(7)(d): Judge Ross asserted before the masters that his ex parte telephone conversation did not violate canon 3B(7) because the situation fell within the exception of subdivision (d) of that canon, allowing ex parte communication "where circumstances require" because of an "emergenc[y]."[5] The masters rejected

[5] In "Respondent's Opening Brief," Judge Ross argues that the telephone call was proper and was not prohibited by canon 3B(7). In effect, he urges that there is, or should be, an exception to the prohibition against ex parte communications in a Proposition 36 case. There is no such exception.

the judge's argument on two grounds—that there was no "emergency" within the meaning of the exception, and that the judge failed to promptly notify the parties of the substance of the conversation, an additional requirement for the exception to be available under subdivision (d).

(1) Lack of Emergency: We adopt the masters' finding that the record does not support the judge's claim that the alleged voice mail message triggered an emergency within the meaning of subdivision (d) of canon 3B(7). According to Judge Ross's description of the recording, the defendant was upset and frightened because she failed to return to court. That does not suggest an emergency. Further, and again according to the judge's version of his call, he merely told Ms. Carrillo to come to court the next day to deal with the issues. That instruction also does not suggest any emergency.

(2) Failure to Promptly Notify the Parties: We also adopt the masters' finding that Judge Ross did not "promptly notify the parties." Judge Ross claimed that he told both the prosecutor and defense counsel of the phone call on August 31—the day after he claims he returned the voice mail message. However, he made no contemporaneous record of the call and there is no evidence both counsel were in his courtroom that day.

Further, both counsel testified that they first learned of the call later. Defense counsel, deputy alternate public defender (DAPD) Charlean Hartsfield, testified that Judge Ross first told her about the call in early October 2001. The prosecutor, Deputy City Attorney Bryan Bowers, has no recollection of knowing of the call until he was contacted by an investigator for the commission.

The masters stated they were "not persuaded Judge Ross accurately recalled when he made this disclosure." Nonetheless, Judge Ross persists in asserting that he gave prompt notice to counsel even though the evidence belies the claim. In both his opening brief and in "Respondent's Response" brief, he repeats the discredited claim of prompt notice, with no new argument or supporting evidence.

In "Respondent's Reply" brief, Judge Ross resorts to out-of-context excerpts from the testimony of the defendant's counsel in a misleading attempt to buttress his argument that he gave prompt notice. In fact, the two excerpts directly contradict the judge's claim. In the first quotation from DAPD Hartsfield, she testified that her client, not Judge Ross, told her of the judge's call. In the second quote, DAPD Hartsfield is repeating something the judge said earlier—"You know I called Ms. Carrillo at home"—to which Hartsfield testified she responded, "Yes, I know because she had told me." (Italics added.) Thus, in this second excerpt, it was again the client, not the judge, who had told Ms. Hartsfield of the call.

We determine that Judge Ross's claim that he promptly notified counsel of his ex parte telephone contact with the defendant is false.

Judge Ross makes two additional assertions that again demonstrate his penchant for blaming others to divert attention from his own wrongdoing. First, he criticizes DAPD Hartsfield because she delayed disclosing the ex parte communication "to any court officials" until October 2001. The pertinent inquiry is whether Judge Ross had an improper ex parte communication, not whether or when DAPD Hartsfield notified court officials of it.

Second, DAPD Hartsfield did report Judge Ross's ex parte telephone call to Commissioner Jeffrey Harkavy, the acting site judge of the facility where Judge Ross was assigned, who promptly ordered the Carrillo case transferred to his own department. Judge Ross attempts to deflect responsibility for his own misconduct by complaining that Commissioner Harkavy thereby had an improper ex parte conversation with Hartsfield. The judge also criticizes Commissioner Harkavy, using strident language, for transferring the case from Judge Ross. Judge Ross also suggests something nefarious on the part of the examiner in not calling Commissioner Harkavy as a witness. The subject of this inquiry is Judge Ross, not others.[6]

b. Judge Ross's Alteration of the Record to Buttress His Version of Telephone Call: Judge Ross also altered a court docket sheet in an attempt to buttress his defense. He then used that altered document, first, to attempt to mislead his supervising judges so they would not report his ex parte communication to this commission. Then, after charges were filed against him by the commission, Judge Ross relied on the same altered document as the basis for a false defense he asserted under oath in his answer to the charges. The developments unfolded as follows:

(1) Judge Ross Learns That Defense Counsel Knows of Ex Parte Conversation; Counsel Reports It: As mentioned, several weeks after the ex parte telephone conversation, Judge Ross learned that the defendant's attorney,

[6] It seems clear that when Commissioner Harkavy spoke with Hartsfield about Judge Ross's improper telephone call, the commissioner was performing legitimate administrative duties, pursuant to canon 3C(3), and was not having an ex parte conversation that was improper under canon 3B(7). Further, the matter pending before the commission concerns formal charges against Judge Ross, not allegations against Commissioner Harkavy.

DAPD Hartsfield, knew about it. DAPD Hartsfield met with Judge Ross in his chambers on or about October 4, 2001, to discuss the fact that she had begun to file selective peremptory challenges (Code Civ. Proc., § 170.6) to disqualify him from her cases. During that meeting, Hartsfield acknowledged that Ms. Carrillo had told her of the judge's phone call. According to a memo dated that same day by Commissioner Harkavy, DAPD Hartsfield reported the phone call to him (the commissioner) on October 4; he in turn reported it to Judge Dan Oki, the supervising judge of the criminal law division of the Los Angeles County Superior Court.

(2) Judge Ross Learns That Defendant's Version of Call Differs from His: By November 8, 2001, word of the ex parte contact had reached Presiding Judge James A. Bascue, who, in a memo on that date, directed Judge Oki to investigate and report back to him. Judge Ross testified that he was contacted by Judge Oki on November 8, and met with him the following day, November 9. Assistant Supervising Judge C.H. Rehm also attended the meeting.

Judge Oki prepared a memorandum on November 9 memorializing the meeting. Judge Ross agreed at oral argument before the commission that Judge Oki's memo was a fair summary of the meeting. According to Judge Oki's memo, the following transpired when the three judges met:

Judge Ross described the telephone call to his supervising judges basically as he describes it in these proceedings, namely, that he responded to the defendant's voice mail message after she had called the court because she had missed a court date. Judge Ross also told his supervising judges that he told Ms. Carrillo to return to court, but that she never reappeared.

Judge Oki responded to Judge Ross at the meeting that the defendant's version differed from Judge Ross's in that she claimed the judge called her at her father's house in the early evening of August 23—the same day as the initial Proposition 36 hearing—and not on August 30. According to Judge Oki's memo, Judge Ross denied to Judges Oki and Rehm that he initiated the first call.

Apart from the discrepancy concerning who initiated the call, the timing of it is crucial to the judge's version of the events. If one were to accept Ms. Carrillo's version that the judge called her on the 23rd, the conversation would have occurred before she was due to report to the CASC on the 24th, and before she was due back in court on the 29th. Thus, there would have been no basis for her to have called the court upset and crying; she would not yet have failed to satisfy the terms of probation. Judge Ross's claim concerning the alleged voice mail message thereby would have been exposed as false.

Continuing, Judge Oki wrote in his memo as follows: "I asked [Judge Ross] to review the files, check the dates, and reconstruct what happened as accurately as he could in a letter to me by November 16 which could be forwarded to Judge Bascue. I indicated that if what he represented is accurate, I would be inclined to recommend to Judge Bascue that the incident not be reported to the [Commission on Judicial Performance]."

(3) Judge Ross Creates After-the-fact Notes of Telephone Call: On November 9, the same day as the judges' meeting, three sets of computer-generated records of court minutes—one for each of the three pending Carrillo cases—were printed. During oral argument before the commission, Judge Ross denied that he had printed out the minutes and denied knowing who had done so. Judge Ross admits, though, that he made handwritten notes on one of the printouts of the minutes for August 29, 2001. In the handwritten notes, Judge Ross wrote: "Case Wednesday & BW [bench warrant] called Thursday & said she'd be in on Friday & never showed." The computer-generated records, including the page on which Judge Ross wrote, show that they were printed on November 9, 2001.

The import and meaning of the notes is clear: they buttress the judge's version of what he claims occurred back in August. "Case Wednesday" refers to the date, Wednesday, August 29, that Carrillo was ordered to return to court; upon her failure to do so, a bench warrant issued. Judge Ross allegedly then "called [her on] Thursday," and she "said she'd be in on Friday," the next day, "& never showed."[7]

Judge Ross's motivation to make the notes is equally clear. He had just learned on November 9 that his supervising judges knew of the ex parte call. At that time, he also learned that the defendant claimed that Judge Ross made the first call—that is, that she disputed that he was responding to any message from her—and that she placed the timing of the call a week earlier than he claimed. His immediate supervising judge, Judge Oki, had directed Judge Ross to reconstruct what happened, and told him that if he, Judge Oki, was convinced by Judge Ross's version of the events, he was "inclined to recommend" to the presiding judge that the matter not be reported to this commission.[8] Judge Ross had a clear and strong incentive to fortify his version of the events.

[7] Judge Ross used language in the notes that would be consistent with contemporaneous entry—referring to "Wednesday," "Thursday" and "Friday." Normally, given that the entries in fact were made subsequent to the actual events, the language more likely would have been "Wednesday, August 29," "Thursday, August 30," and "Friday, August 31."

[8] The record of these formal proceedings does not reflect whether any of Judge Ross's supervising judges reported the incident to this commission.

Judge Ross stated at oral argument before the commission that "someone" gave him the November 9 computer printouts. He confirmed, however, that he added the notes and gave them to Judge Oki along with a letter dated November 15. The letter contained Judge Ross's version of the events, pursuant to Judge Oki's instructions from the November 9 meeting. In other words, Judge Ross buttressed his explanation to Judge Oki by including his altered docket record. That altered version of the court record bearing Judge Ross's notes is part of the official court file.

(4) Judge Ross Files False Answer to Commission Charges Based on the Altered Record: On September 17, 2004, Judge Ross signed his verified answer to the commission's charges against him, and the answer was filed with the commission on September 20, 2004. In it, the judge purports to describe the proceedings in the Carrillo matter on Friday, August 31; according to his chronology, this would have been the day after his phone call. He states in the answer that "the court was anticipating defendant Carrillo's presence."

Continuing, Judge Ross states as follows: "Ms. Carrillo, however, never reappeared in court on her own volition. Because the bench warrants had already issued, nothing additional was noted or transcribed that day on the record. Respondent, however, jotted down in the court's minute order for future reference what had actually occurred concerning the telephone call and Ms. Carrillo's actions. After adjourning that day, Respondent had no further contact with the defendant."

The clear inference in the foregoing sworn statement is that Judge Ross "jotted down" the notes at issue contemporaneously with the August 31 hearing. The reference to the note-making is immediately preceded and followed in the quoted text by descriptions of events of "that day," August 31.

Quite obviously, Judge Ross did not realize, either when he made the notes or when he filed his verified answer, that he had written on a document that showed it was not printed until November 9. By the time of the masters' hearing, however, the judge had received the commission's discovery documents (containing the annotated Nov. 9 printout) and the examiner's prehearing brief. In the brief, the examiner demonstrated the impossibility that the judge made the notes in August, given the November print date of the document on which the judge had written them. Accordingly, during his testimony before the masters, Judge Ross was constrained to concede that it was impossible for him to have made the notes contemporaneously with the events in August.

Judge Ross's verified answer was false in a material respect and we conclude it was knowingly false. By his own testimonial admission, it was not until after signing and filing his answer that he realized he was trapped by the print date on the computer printout. He knew the notes were not contemporaneous, but he did not realize there was irrefutable evidence of the after-the-fact alteration, and of his sworn misrepresentation built on the altered court record.

(5) Judge Ross's Subsequent Assertions Concerning His Conduct: Even after being confronted with his deception, Judge Ross has continued to search for ways to avoid responsibility.

First, as noted, Judge Ross conceded before the masters that his answer could not be correct, given the recorded computer print date. Prior to that full admission, however, he attempted to dodge the issue, at least partially, in the following exchange with the examiner before the masters concerning his annotation on the printout:

"Q. When did you make that note?

"A. I made the representation in my verified answer that my memory was that I had made it in August of 2001. When I read the information, as well as your pre-examiner's [sic] brief and you pointed out 'you couldn't have done it then, because this document wasn't printed until November 9,' then I had to stop and go, okay, I guess I didn't do it on August 31st. . . ."

There was, in fact, no qualification in his verified answer that the judge's memory was that he made the notes contemporaneously in August. Rather, there was a carefully written statement that the notes were contemporaneous, with no qualification whatsoever.

Second, in Judge Ross's reply brief, he refers to his note on the computer printout, and to his answer as follows: "Respondent admitted to returning Carrillo's phone call when she initially contacted the court by voicemail after warrants were issued on her three cases. If the Special Masters found these facts to be true and the examiner is now conceding the truthfulness of the statement, then the notation made in November 2001 inside the court file accurately reflects the circumstances that occurred."

We reject this explanation. The assertion skirts the obvious—that the alteration was made for the improper purpose of trying to short-circuit a report to this commission; the judge's answer then compounded the deception. Further, the examiner did not concede the truthfulness of the judge's claim. In the examiner's opening brief (EOB), he stated only that he did not object to the masters' findings and conclusions regarding the Carrillo matter.

Finally, when asked during oral argument before the commission about his verified answer as respects the timing of the notes, the judge responded to questioning by the chairperson as follows:

"COMMISSIONER GROSSMAN: Why did you represent in your defense before this commission that you made these notes contemporaneously with the events back in late August 2001?

"JUDGE ROSS: The reason that I initially made that representation was because I recall that I didn't have any particular notes about that event, but it was very vivid in my mind. And so when I actually saw the documents from the examiner, that was really the first time that I had seen that document. And this would have occurred in 2004.

"COMMISSIONER GROSSMAN: You mean the first time since you wrote on the document?

"JUDGE ROSS: Right. So we're talking about three years later, and I'm looking at documents. [¶] And I have a very clear memory of what took place with respect to Mr. [sic] Carrillo. So when I saw that document from the examiner, it appeared to me, oh, I guess I actually did write a note indicating what took place. [¶] When the examiner then pointed out that it was stamped November 9, 2001, and so it would not have been possible for me to have actually recorded that, in my subsequent answer I acknowledged that.

"COMMISSIONER GROSSMAN: You had no choice.

"JUDGE ROSS: I could have said, no, that's incorrect. I mean, yes, I had a choice. And my choice was to say, yes, this could not have happened prior to November the 9th.

"COMMISSIONER GROSSMAN: Thank you. . . ."

In this exchange, Judge Ross's evasiveness is apparent and troublesome. His concluding remark also is telling. "I could have said, no, that's incorrect." We understand this to be an assertion, in the face of proof that his notes could not have been contemporaneous, that he still had a choice to assert the contrary, that is, he could have lied. Catching himself, he switched position, and conceded, in effect, that his answer was false. He never explained why he made a materially false representation to the commission.

C. COUNT 1B—PEOPLE V. WILFRED AKA

1. Findings of Fact

The relevant proceedings before Judge Ross in the Aka case were recorded and the facts are not in dispute. We adopt the findings of the masters, which we summarize.

Mr. Aka was charged in October 2001 with zoning and other violations in connection with holding religious services in his home. He entered into a diversion agreement with the city attorney (the prosecutor in the case) for dismissal of the case if Mr. Aka moved the services elsewhere.

On September 26, 2002, Judge Ross presided over the case for the first time; the purpose of the hearing was a "progress report." Mr. Aka had not been arraigned, and appeared without counsel. The deputy city attorney (DCA) announced at the outset that Mr. Aka had not complied with the diversion agreement; the DCA said he wanted to proceed with the criminal charges. The DCA told Judge Ross that neighbors had signed petitions against Mr. Aka; he asked that Judge Ross enter a plea, schedule a trial, and issue a "cease and desist" order—in effect, a temporary restraining order to prohibit Mr. Aka from holding services pending trial.

Judge Ross informed Mr. Aka of his right to legal representation, to which Aka responded directly, "I would need to seek legal representation." (Original italics.) Notwithstanding the defendant's unambiguous request for counsel, Judge Ross immediately asked Mr. Aka questions bearing on the requested restraining order. Many of the defendant's neighbors were in court and loudly disagreed when Mr. Aka stated that only 20 to 25 people attended services. Noting the spectators' vocal reactions, Judge Ross said to Mr. Aka: "Well, we've got a choir over here that's disagreeing with you. Let the church say Amen, okay?" After suggesting that someone—either Mr. Aka or the neighbors were "not telling . . . the truth"—Judge Ross told Mr. Aka to "be straight" with him.

Continuing, Judge Ross told Mr. Aka—in the presence of the neighbors in the courtroom—that if the neighbors took pictures that came into evidence, Mr. Aka would be in a "bad" position, perhaps facing jail time and civil liability. The DCA then handed the judge photographs of Mr. Aka's home, showing an altar and 12 benches. After viewing the photos, Judge Ross began accusing Mr. Aka of lying to him. The judge continued to press the defendant, and continued to accuse him further of lying, until Mr. Aka admitted that as many as 60 people had come to his house, and that he "officiated" at services. After having obtained these incriminating admissions, Judge Ross entered a not guilty plea on Mr. Aka's behalf and then told Mr. Aka that he needed to get a lawyer.

2. Conclusions of Law

The masters concluded that Judge Ross's conduct at the September 26 hearing was in violation of canons 1 and 2A (by creating an appearance of impropriety and undermining the integrity and independence of the judiciary), 3B(4) (by failing to be patient, dignified and courteous) and 3B(8) (by failing to dispose of the matter fairly). They also concluded Judge Ross became embroiled in the controversy, abandoned his role as an independent arbiter, and exceeded his judicial authority through deliberate violations of the defendant's constitutional rights to counsel and against self-incrimination. The masters rejected Judge Ross's proffered defenses, and determined he committed prejudicial misconduct. We concur in all of the foregoing except we determine that the wrongdoing constitutes willful misconduct.

(9) Given the canon violations, the conduct was unjudicial under the threefold Broadman test. It is also clear that Judge Ross was acting in his judicial capacity. On the third issue—bad faith—we find that Judge Ross intentionally violated Mr. Aka's constitutional rights. No other conclusion is reasonable based on the sequence of events: (1) Judge Ross told Mr. Aka "it may be in your best interest to secure legal representation . . . . You have by law the right to do that or you can represent yourself. What would you like to do, sir?" (Italics added.) (2) Mr. Aka responded directly, "I would need to seek legal representation." (Italics added.) (3) Judge Ross ignored Mr. Aka's invocation of that constitutional right, and further violated the defendant's right to basic due process by his prearraignment badgering of Mr. Aka until he incriminated himself.

There can be no question that Judge Ross knew of Mr. Aka's right to counsel; the judge advised him of the right. Additionally, given Judge Ross's prebench and on-bench experience and practice in the area of criminal law, we entertain no doubt that Judge Ross also knew of the defendant's right to a hearing, with counsel, and of his right against self-incrimination. We are likewise convinced the judge was aware he was abusing his authority by violating those rights through his determined extraction of incriminating admissions from the defendant in the absence of counsel; alternatively, he did not care about the limits of his authority or about Mr. Aka's fundamental rights.

Judge Ross manifestly was swayed by the audible protests from Mr. Aka's neighbors in the courtroom. Prodded on by that spectator reaction, the judge sided with the neighbors, became annoyed with Mr. Aka and chastised him for not being "straight" with him, and then progressed to the repeated accusations that the defendant was a liar. The embroilment and lack of impartiality are clear.

As in Kloepfer, supra, 49 Cal.3d at pages 865–866, Judge Ross's failure to use his knowledge and experience to ensure Mr. Aka's rights suggests an improper motive. We conclude there was manifest embroilment, a loss of impartiality, abuse of judicial authority and resulting violation of fundamental rights, and willful misconduct.

D. COUNT 1C—PEOPLE V. HECTOR SALCIDO

1. Findings of Fact Concerning Basic Charges

There is general agreement concerning the basic facts of the relevant proceedings before Judge Ross in the Salcido case. We adopt and summarize the masters' findings.

Mr. Salcido was placed on probation by Judge Ross on September 30, 2002, in connection with three domestic violence offenses; the defendant admitted to long-term drug abuse problems but indicated willingness to reform. Mr. Salcido was represented at the September 30 hearing by Deputy Public Defender (DPD) Lisa Gordon. One of the conditions of probation was that the defendant was required to appear before Judge Ross on October 18 to show proof that he was attending required 12-step meetings.

When Mr. Salcido failed to appear on October 18 as ordered, a bench warrant issued. He was arrested on October 22, and brought before Judge Ross the following day, with different defense counsel, for a probation violation hearing. Mr. Salcido claimed he had not appeared on the 18th because he was in a rehabilitation facility. Judge Ross continued the hearing to permit the defendant to appear with DPD Gordon. The judge testified before the masters that he thought it was important for Ms. Gordon to appear with the defendant because of her familiarity with the case.

The continued hearing took place a week later, on October 29, with DPD Gordon appearing with Mr. Salcido. Although the issue to be determined was whether the defendant had violated the terms of probation, Judge Ross made clear that he already had determined there was a violation, given that the defendant had failed to appear on the 18th. The judge stated that he intended to sentence the defendant to 90 days in jail.

When DPD Gordon protested Judge Ross's determination of the probation violation and announced sentence, the judge asked Mr. Salcido directly if he wanted to admit the probation violation, stating, "I've already found him in violation . . . ." Ms. Gordon again protested and stated that her client was not admitting the violation; she demanded a hearing and the right to subpoena witnesses. Judge Ross reiterated that he had already determined the probation violation. DPD Gordon again asserted that her client had a right to a hearing, and she asked to make a record. Judge Ross refused both requests and announced he was sentencing Mr. Salcido to jail for 90 days. Witnesses describe the exchange between the judge and Ms. Gordon as having "escalated," with both of them speaking in "raised voices," and that Ms. Gordon was "out of control" and "disrespectful" and "out of line."

The heated exchange culminated with Judge Ross evicting Ms. Gordon from the courtroom. Thereafter, without taking a break, the judge immediately proceeded with the sentencing of Mr. Salcido, addressing the defendant directly. At that point, another defense attorney who happened to be in the courtroom stated his name for the record. According to the transcript, this sequence of events unfolded as follows:

"MS. GORDON: May I make—I'm making a record.

"THE COURT: No. Now you need—if you need to go outside and cool off, then you need to do that, but I don't want to hear anything else. That's it.

"MS. GORDON: Is the court not allowing me to make a record?

"THE COURT: Deputy Robinson, take her outside. Go outside, Ms. Gordon.

"[Bailiff Robinson escorted Ms. Gordon out of the courtroom.]

"THE COURT: All right, Mr. Salcido. Regarding the 1SF015342 matter, your probation will be revoked and reinstated under the following modifications: the 12-step meetings are deleted for that matter.

"MR. BERRY: For the record, Michael Berry for the defendant since his attorney has left.

"THE COURT: That's fine."

Michael Berry, who stated his name for the record, was an experienced civil attorney, but was a trainee deputy public defender. He happened to be in Judge Ross's courtroom when Judge Ross had the bailiff remove DPD Gordon. DPD Berry had not been paying attention to the Salcido proceedings, knew nothing about the pending issue, and had never reviewed the file or spoken with the defendant or anyone else about the case. When Mr. Berry stated his name, he was standing by the glass enclosure for in-custody defendants at the side of the courtroom.

After Judge Ross stated "That's fine," he continued with the sentencing proceedings. He ignored DPD Berry and continued to address Mr. Salcido directly, questioning him about the rehabilitation center he claimed to have attended. After examining some documents provided by the defendant, Judge Ross accused the defendant of lying to him: "See you are lying to me. You keep lying. See, you are making me mad again. You are a pathological liar. You don't get it. You don't get it. I don't know about—I think we are setting him up for failure. We're setting him up for failure." After DPD Berry interrupted to inquire "[a]re we finished?," there were further discussions on and off the record. Judge Ross put the matter over until the afternoon.

Judge Ross met with Ms. Gordon in chambers on the afternoon of the day he had ordered her removed. The judge explained the circumstances of the meeting as follows: "The public defenders left me no choice. Because, that afternoon, they decided that they were going to boycott the court and that they wouldn't interview anyone in custody, that they wouldn't appear in court. . . . At 4:00, there are no attorneys, none have checked in. . . ."

According to the judge, Ms. Gordon's supervisor and a deputy city attorney also attended the afternoon meeting in chambers. Judge Ross testified that he apologized to Ms. Gordon in chambers, but told her that "she couldn't be arguing with him in open court." The judge said at the meeting that he needed some time to think about what he would do in the case. At a hearing the next day, Judge Ross granted DPD Gordon's request for a formal probation violation hearing, at which she could present evidence to substantiate Mr. Salcido's claim he was in a residential program when he failed to appear on October 18.

Ultimately, on November 5, 2002, Mr. Salcido appeared with DPD Gordon and admitted the probation violation. Judge Ross revoked and then reinstated probation and stayed jail time.

2. Findings of Fact Concerning Judge Ross's Defenses

The judge claimed before the masters, and continues to assert in his briefs to the commission, that he committed no wrongdoing in his handling of the Salcido matter. We, like the masters, reject his claims.

a. Judge Ross's Claim That the October 29 Hearing Was a Formal Probation Violation Hearing: The underlying disagreement between Judge Ross and DPD Gordon was whether the hearing on October 29 was a formal probation violation hearing, where the parties would be expected to put on evidence of whether there was a violation, or whether it was an informal proceeding, more akin to a pretrial conference. The argument Ms. Gordon was pressing was that her client did not admit the probation violation and that she wanted a formal hearing at which to present evidence. Because the client refused to admit the violation, formal proceedings were required by law. (See In re Wagner (2005) 127 Cal.App.4th 138, 146 [25 Cal.Rptr.3d 201].)

Judge Ross testified before the masters that the subject hearing was a formal one, claiming that all probation hearings in his court were formal. The masters rejected the judge's latter claim, finding it "inconsistent" with the clear evidence that the "long-established" procedure followed by judges in Los Angeles—including Judge Ross personally—was that the initial probation violation hearing would be an informal pretrial conference. We agree with the masters' assessment of the evidence.

Judge Ross's assertion that all probation hearings in his court were formal is knowingly false. We, like the masters, are convinced from the evidence that the judge knew that all probation violation hearings in his court were not formal ones.

As a subtheme of the judge's assertion the hearing was a formal one, he casts blame on DPD Gordon because she allegedly should have been prepared to present evidence at the October 29 hearing. Since she "should have been ready," her insistence on a later hearing was a disguised motion for a continuance, according to the judge. We agree with the masters' rejection of the claim. As they correctly note, the judge's assertion is invalid because of the following: "[It] ignores the defendant's absolute right to a hearing, the prosecution's obligation to present evidence of the defendant's probation violations, the accused's right to challenge that evidence, and the deputy city attorney's acknowledgement he was not prepared to present evidence of Salcido's probation violation. (R.T. 641.) (See Morrissey v. Brewer (1972) 408 U.S. 471, 487–488 [33 L.Ed.2d 484, 92 S.Ct. 2593]; People v. Vickers (1972) 8 Cal.3d 451, 457–458 [105 Cal.Rptr. 305, 503 P.2d 1313]; In re Wagner[, supra,] 127 Cal.App.4th 138, 146.)"

Judge Ross again uses a scapegoat—in this instance, unjustifiably blaming DPD Gordon for her alleged unpreparedness—in an attempt to divert focus from his own wrongdoing.

b. Judge Ross's Justification for Proceeding After Evicting Counsel: Judge Ross contends that it was appropriate for him to continue with the hearing "with another attorney" after he ordered DPD Gordon removed. The judge claims, in effect, that he was justified in proceeding because DPD Michael Berry happened to be present in the courtroom and announced his appearance in Ms. Gordon's absence. This justification is in marked contrast to his testimony that he specifically continued the first hearing after Mr. Salcido's arrest because it was important that DPD Gordon be present because of her familiarity with the case.

Judge Ross's assertion that he was justified in proceeding because of DPD Berry's presence was soundly rejected by the masters. We also reject it. As noted, even before Mr. Berry announced his presence, the judge addressed the defendant directly, announcing his sentence. Additionally, and as the masters correctly note, there is no indication that DPD Berry was prepared to adequately represent Mr. Salcido, and Judge Ross did nothing to determine that issue. In fact, DPD Berry testified that he was not prepared. Beyond that, however, the judge questioned the defendant directly on the substantive issues for which Ms. Gordon had been demanding a hearing, requiring him to answer—ignoring Ms. Gordon's absence, Mr. Berry's lack of preparation, and Mr. Salcido's constitutional rights.

In response, Judge Ross now argues in a brief to the commission that he was justified in proceeding in DPD Berry's presence because Berry did not say that he was not prepared to represent the defendant. This time Berry is the scapegoat; because of Berry's silence Judge Ross proceeded to deny the defendant's constitutional rights. However, the judge has no one to blame for his own actions before Mr. Berry announced his presence.

Judge Ross also contends that when Berry announced his appearance, Berry thereby demonstrated "Berry was aware that [Judge Ross] saw him as being Salcido's legal representative for the limited purpose of imposing sentence." (Italics added.) The judge claims that when he said "That's fine," in response to Berry's stating his name for the record, the judge thereby was "acknowledging [the] understanding" that both of them were clear that Judge Ross viewed Berry as representing Salcido. The convoluted explanation is unreasonable and, in any event, Judge Ross's actions belie that either he or Mr. Berry understood Berry to have replaced Gordon or to have been in a position to provide effective representation of Mr. Salcido. The judge ignored DPD Berry and proceeded to examine the defendant directly.

3. Conclusions of Law

The masters concluded that Judge Ross violated canons 1 and 2A (by creating an appearance of impropriety and undermining the integrity and independence of the judiciary), 3B(4) (by failing to be patient, dignified and courteous), 3B(7) (by failing to afford the defendant a full right to be heard) and 3B(8) (by failing to dispose of the matter fairly). The judge became angry, accusing the defendant of being a pathological liar; he demonstrated embroilment and a lack of impartiality and failed to act as a neutral arbiter, according to the masters. We concur in all of the foregoing and adopt the masters' foregoing conclusions as our own.

The masters also concluded that Judge Ross caused serious infringements of the defendant's constitutional rights to due process by denying him the opportunity for a hearing and the right to present evidence, and by proceeding with the hearing in the absence of his counsel. They concluded that the judge properly had Ms. Gordon removed from the courtroom; the record showed that she was loud and discourteous. We adopt all of these conclusions of the masters as well.

(10) The masters concluded that Judge Ross committed prejudicial misconduct in his mishandling of the Salcido case. We determine that Judge Ross acted in bad faith and that he committed willful misconduct. As noted in our conclusions in the Fuentes and Aka matters, and again guided by the Supreme Court in Kloepfer, we attribute to Judge Ross, based on his many years as a prosecutor and a criminal law judge, a presumptive knowledge of fundamental constitutional rights of criminal defendants in connection with determining a probation violation.

Given the combination of Gordon's persistent arguments that her client denied the violation and insisted on his right to a hearing, with counsel, and the judge's presumed experience-based knowledge of those rights, we conclude that Judge Ross intentionally disregarded the defendant's fundamental rights or knowingly acted beyond his judicial power or with a conscious disregard for the limits of his authority.

(11) Alternatively or additionally, it appears that the judge, fresh from his heated exchanges with Ms. Gordon, directed his residual agitation or anger at her client. (See McCullough v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1989) 49 Cal.3d 186, 196 [260 Cal.Rptr. 557, 776 P.2d 259] (McCullough) [judge allowed his impatience with defense counsel to outweigh the client's right to a fair trial and an attorney of her choice; resulting constitutional violations constituted willful misconduct].) In any case, directly after removing the lawyer, the judge turned to abusing Mr. Salcido and denying his rights, angrily calling him a pathological liar. This embroilment is evidence of anger, pique, revenge or other improper purpose. Judge Ross's alarming violation of Mr. Salcido's rights clearly evinces a judge motivated by an improper purpose. There was bad faith and willful misconduct.

(12) The masters found Judge Ross's wrongdoing was mitigated by the fact that he, "on his own initiative, quickly vacated his rulings, eliminating any prejudice to Salcido." We respectfully disagree for a number of reasons. Primarily, there can be no mitigation for maliciously motivated unjudicial conduct. (Kloepfer, supra, 49 Cal.3d at p. 865, citing Gonzalez v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1983) 33 Cal.3d 359, 377 [188 Cal.Rptr. 880, 657 P.2d 372]; accord, Spruance, supra, 13 Cal.3d at p. 800.)

It is true that Judge Ross relented and scheduled a formal probation violation hearing following the boycott of his courtroom. However, it does not follow that the defendant thereby suffered no prejudice. Judge Ross became angry and humiliated Mr. Salcido by calling him a pathological liar in open court. This unjudicial behavior manifested embroilment and had the further prejudicial effect of depriving Mr. Salcido of an impartial judge. None of these prejudices to the defendant was undone by the subsequent events. We see no mitigating circumstances in the foregoing.

At no time did Judge Ross give any indication that he comprehended any of his serious misconduct. Indeed, in his posthearing briefs, he still asserts he committed no misconduct in connection with his handling of the Salcido matter. These facts also militate against a conclusion there was mitigation.

IV. COUNT 2: ABSENCES FROM COURT

In count 2, the commission charges Judge Ross with misconduct in connection with two absences from court. We adopt and summarize the masters' findings and conclusions that there was no proven ethical violation on either occasion.

A. COUNT 2A: MARCH 6 RADIO SHOW

1. Findings of Fact

On March 6, 2000, Judge Ross arrived at the Inglewood courthouse where he was assigned, and went directly across the street to the studio of radio station KJLH. The station has a public interest/community focus, serving a largely Latino and African-American audience. The topic of discussion that morning was Proposition 21 which was on the ballot for the election the following day; the measure proposed substantial changes to the juvenile court law and was opposed by the California Judges Association and a number of judges.

Judge Ross began speaking on radio KJLH about 9:10 a.m. He mentioned once or twice on the air that he had people waiting for him in his courtroom, but that he had chosen to take time away because the ballot measure posed issues of importance and would have a disproportional effect on the particular listener audience. The comment about people waiting in court may have been part of a "humorous" exchange.

The judge completed his radio appearance at 9:30 and was on the bench in his courtroom approximately 10 minutes later. There were 50 or 60 matters on calendar and the courtroom was full. Given typical preliminaries, the 9:40 a.m. start time for the general calendar was not a substantial deviation from the normal morning schedule. Despite the slight delay, Judge Ross completed the calendar in a timely manner without assistance from other judges. The judge had not notified court personnel in advance of his scheduled radio appearance.

2. Conclusions of Law

(13) The parties agree that Judge Ross's subject appearance on KJLH constituted legitimate judicial outreach activity. The masters concluded that because Proposition 21 concerned improvement of the law, the legal system and administration of justice, the activity was permissible under canon 5D. We concur. (14) Canons 3 and 4A require that a judge's courtroom activities take precedence over all other activities, but the masters conclude and we agree that the slight delay in the calendar did not conflict with these canons. The fact that Judge Ross mentioned on the air that he had people waiting for him did not cause a diminution of public respect for the judiciary or cast it into disrepute. The comment was made in the context of his explanation that Proposition 21 was sufficiently important that he had prioritized it over beginning his morning calendar. Thus, there was no violation of canon 1 or 2A. There was only one incident of minor tardiness, and it does not constitute misconduct.

B. COUNT 2B: APRIL 2002 CONFERENCE

On March 20, 2002, Judge Ross submitted a request for time off to attend and serve on a panel at a conference of the California Association of Black Lawyers (CABL) in Palm Springs from Thursday, April 18 through Sunday, April 21. The two-day absence from work was requested as a court-related absence. The request was approved and coverage was arranged for another bench officer to preside over Judge Ross's calendar while he was at the conference.

Prior to the beginning of the conference, Judge Ross learned there would be no formal conference activities until Thursday evening, and he agreed to participate that day in an economic conference sponsored by Operation HOPE, a nonprofit organization that provides " 'economic tools and services' to 'empower . . . underserved communities.' (R.T. 295-296; exh. 45.)"

On April 17, 2002, the day before his approved absence, Judge Ross sent an e-mail to the acting site judge, Commissioner Kristi Lousteau, with a subject line "CABL conference" and text confirming his absence the following two days. On the morning of April 18, Judge Ross participated on a panel at the Operation HOPE conference, and that afternoon, he taped a segment for a television program, Life & Times Tonight. (We discuss Judge Ross's broader involvement in that program immediately following in pt. V, post.)

(15) All of Judge Ross's activities on April 18 concededly involved appropriate judicial outreach. While the subject line on the e-mail technically was partially inaccurate because Judge Ross knew he would not be at the CABL conference until Friday the 19th, there is no misconduct. The absence had been approved for judicial outreach activities, and courtroom coverage had been arranged. The fact that the judge participated in two different, but appropriate, judicial outreach activities on Thursday, prior to attending the specifically approved program on Friday, does not violate the canons.

V. COUNT 3: COMMENT ON PENDING CASES

The charges in this count arise out of four appearances by Judge Ross on Life & Times Tonight, a general public affairs program produced by, and broadcast on, PBS station KCET in Los Angeles. Judge Ross is charged with making improper public comments about three pending cases, in violation of canons 1 and 2A, which prohibit a judge from creating an appearance of impropriety and undermining the integrity and independence of the judiciary, and canon 3B(9), which generally prohibits a judge from commenting publicly on pending cases. We adopt and summarize the masters' findings.

Judge Ross has been a regular participant on numerous Life & Times Tonight programs since 1999, with encouragement by a former presiding judge of the Los Angeles Superior Court, and support from responsible persons in the court's public information office. Numerous other judges and legal professionals have appeared with Judge Ross on the show, and the program has included a wide range of public interest topics concerning the law, the courts, and the administration of justice.

Judge Ross testified that prior to his first appearance on the show, he consulted with the judicial ethics hotline and other judges. He has been aware throughout that the judicial canons prohibited him from discussing pending cases.

We agree with the masters that Judge Ross's participation in the program "was consistent with the strong public policy encouraging California judges to promote public awareness of the judiciary and the judicial system. (See California Standards of Judicial Administration § 39.)" We also agree with them that the issue is whether, in discharging his judicial outreach activities, Judge Ross violated the canons. We now turn to that topic.

A. COUNT 3A: COMMENT ON PENDING JUVENILE CASE

1. Findings of Fact

On January 15, 2001, Judge Ross appeared on Life & Times Tonight and spoke about his new assignment to a juvenile delinquency department of the court in Compton. During the program, he discussed a specific case over which he was presiding and that was still pending; the judge had yet to announce his disposition of the matter in court. From the program transcript, the masters and we verify that the judge openly discussed the young man's difficult family background, the nature of the current offenses and the judge's intentions regarding disposition.

2. Conclusions of Law

We adopt the following conclusion of the masters concerning Judge Ross's discussion of the juvenile case: ". . . Judge Ross's remarks violate Canon 3B(9). Judge Ross discussed—in a very public forum—a case that was pending before him and one that, by law, is confidential. Canon 3B(9) prohibits a judge from commenting on pending proceedings, and specifically prohibits a judge from discussing cases—even for an educational purpose—in which the judge has 'personally participated.' "

In his testimony, Judge Ross conceded that he "may have divulged too much information." He argues, nonetheless, that because the court proceedings remained confidential, there was no ethical impropriety. The masters and we do not agree. Numerous persons familiar with the juvenile or his case likely could have recognized his identity from the public discussion of the young man's biographical information. The disclosure violated the minor's right to strict confidentiality. "The strong public policy of confidentiality of juvenile proceedings and records has long been recognized." (In re Keisha T. (1995) 38 Cal.App.4th 220, 231 [44 Cal.Rptr.2d 822]; see T.N.G. v. Superior Court (1971) 4 Cal.3d 767, 778 [94 Cal.Rptr. 813, 484 P.2d 981]; Foster v. Superior Court (1980) 107 Cal.App.3d 218, 228 [165 Cal.Rptr. 701].) Further, it appeared from the judge's discussion during the program of his intended disposition of the matter that he had prejudged the case.

The judge's assertions that his comments were directed primarily at explaining the juvenile system and the difficult issue of rehabilitation of troubled youth ignore and do not overcome the impropriety of his discussion of the case specifics. The masters rejected this claim for that reason, as do we.

Alternatively, the judge contended before the masters that canon 3B(9) is unconstitutional as applied to this charge because its application causes a chilling effect on judicial speech in violation of the First Amendment. During his appearance before the commission, Judge Ross appeared to disclaim that assertion, relying instead on his claim (rejected by the masters and us) that his television comments were about general process and thus not in violation of the canon.

"JUSTICE McCONNELL: You are now claiming that you are allowed to speak out publicly about [juvenile proceedings]; is that correct?

"JUDGE ROSS: No. What I am saying is, I understand these proceedings are confidential and private. To the extent that I did not indicate who this person was by name, or where they lived, or this wasn't a case in the news, so anybody would necessarily know who this individual was.

"I felt as though I had taken sufficient prophylactic measures to keep that juvenile's identity from not [sic] being revealed. . . .

"JUSTICE McCONNELL: So it's your position that you do not believe the First Amendment gives you the right to speak publicly about these confidential proceedings?

"JUDGE ROSS: No. And thank you for bringing that up. [¶] My whole point was, in this particular case, based on these circumstances, I did not feel as though the canon was violated . . . ." (Italics added.)

(16) The masters rejected the First Amendment argument, and to the extent the judge may still assert it, we reject it as well, including for the following reasons explained by the masters: The California Supreme Court has upheld the constitutionality of the limits imposed by the canons on judicial speech concerning pending cases. (Broadman, supra, 18 Cal.4th at pp. 1100–1103.)[9] As the court explained in Broadman, the compelling public interest in maintaining a judicial system that is fair and impartial, both in fact and in appearance, justifies the restriction on judicial speech to the extent it prohibits comments on pending cases. Judge Ross also acknowledges that the "state has [a] strong interest in regulating the public commentary by a judge during the pendency of a proceeding." (Italics omitted.)

[9] The court in Broadman was concerned with former canon 3A(6), the pertinent substance of which is carried over to the current canon 3B(9).

Judge Ross also argued that in order for the canon's speech restriction to be applied constitutionally, there had to be a proven nexus between the purposes of protecting the appearance and reality of a fair system, and the challenged judicial comment. The court in Broadman specifically pointed out the danger posed to the public perception of judicial impartiality when a judge makes comments indicating prejudgment of a case. This is precisely the situation we confront with Judge Ross's public statement of his intended disposition of the pending juvenile case. Thus, there is the direct nexus that Judge Ross claims is necessary.

We are, of course, bound by the Supreme Court's holding in Broadman. Further, the United States Supreme Court decision in Republican Party of Minn. v. White (2002) 536 U.S. 765 [153 L.Ed.2d 694, 122 S.Ct. 2528], does not affect the continued validity of the state high court's ruling, as suggested by Judge Ross. The Republican Party case, at the Supreme Court level, involved issues of judicial candidates' free speech under the Minnesota canons. The Supreme Court remanded the case to the Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit; in a deeply divided en banc decision, the circuit court recently expanded the ruling to invalidate other Minnesota canon limitations on judges' and judicial candidates' political association and activities. (Republican Party of Minn. v. White (8th Cir. 2005) 416 F.3d 738.) The matter now before us does not concern either candidates' rights or issues of political association or activities.

(17) Additionally, it is not our prerogative to decide the constitutionality of a canon promulgated by our Supreme Court (and see Cal. Const., art. III, § 3.5; Lockyer v. City and County of San Francisco (2004) 33 Cal.4th 1055, 1092–1095 [17 Cal.Rptr.3d 225, 95 P.3d 459] [administrative agency created by Constitution, and granted judicial or quasi-judicial authority, lacks authority to refuse to enforce statute on grounds of unconstitutionality unless appellate court has determined statute to be unconstitutional (dictum)]). (18) Further, in our view, canon 3B(9) does serve the compelling public interest in maintaining a fair and impartial system of justice.

(19) We adopt the masters' reasoning and conclusion that Judge Ross committed prejudicial misconduct. He revealed confidential information on Life & Times Tonight, including that the juvenile in question was dealing drugs from a hotel room and that his mother had a drug problem. Judge Ross's improper public revelation of his intended disposition created the appearance of prejudgment. Although the public may have thought Judge Ross appeared compassionate, his televised disclosure of confidential information and his apparent abandonment of his status as a neutral arbiter combine to undermine public confidence in the integrity and impartiality of the judiciary. He violated canons 1, 2A and 3B(9).

B. COUNT 3B: COMMENT ON PENDING GHILOTTI CASE

1. Findings of Fact

People v. Superior Court (Ghilotti) (2002) 27 Cal.4th 888 [119 Cal.Rptr.2d 1, 44 P.3d 949], involved issues regarding the release of violent sexual offender Patrick Ghilotti. The case was pending before the California Supreme Court on March 4, 2002, when Judge Ross discussed it on Life & Times Tonight. (The court issued its decision on Apr. 25, 2002.) During the program on March 4, the judge discussed the general legal issues raised in the Ghilotti case; he provided neutral and public background information concerning the case and the specific issue before the court. As the masters correctly note, "these comments were likely to give the public a better understanding of the legal issues" involved in the case.

However, Judge Ross also moved beyond generalities during his appearance on the program, most notably with the following comments: "What's interesting about this case, in Southern California, we don't know a lot about this individual, but up north, his family is very wealthy. Ghilotti Construction Company. He married a woman who worked at the Atascadero State Hospital. He's somewhat charismatic. They've been following this case, so some feel there are some political overtones to his particular case."

The masters characterized the foregoing statements as "peripheral" in the sense of not constituting an expression on the merits of the case. They also observed that Judge Ross did not advocate a particular outcome and that the remarks were not likely to interfere with a fair hearing on the case. We concur.

Nonetheless, we determine that the comments cannot be squared with the language or purpose of canon 3B(9). The statements about the defendant's wealthy family, his charisma, and the suggestion that the case "is being watched" by some who felt it might have political overtones, all combine to suggest that the case had significance beyond the legal issues. Judge Rothman sums up the policy considerations that make such comments improper: "In regard to public comment on cases pending in another court, judges must avoid the unseemly spectacle of commenting on others' cases. Such comments could affect the result, or be seen by the judge before whom the case is pending as public judicial pressure to decide the case in a certain way. It also undermines public confidence in the decisions of the court. [Fn. omitted.]" (Rothman, Cal. Jud. Conduct Handbook, supra, § 5.32, p. 142, italics added.)

This commission has disciplined a judge for commenting to the media about a case pending on appeal. (Com. on Jud. Performance, Ann. Rep.

(1997) Advisory Letter No. 32, p. 23.) Judge Ross's public media comments about the pending Ghilotti appeal were improper.

2. Conclusions of Law

The primary legal issue concerning Judge Ross's comments on the Ghilotti case is whether an exemption under canon 3B(9) applies. It provides in pertinent part as follows: "Other than cases in which the judge has personally participated, this Canon does not prohibit judges from discussing in legal education programs and materials, cases and issues pending in appellate courts. This educational exemption does not apply to cases over which the judge has presided or to comments or discussions that might interfere with a fair hearing of the case." (Canon 3B(9), italics added.)

(20) The masters construed "legal education programs and materials" broadly and found that it encompasses legal education of the public; they concluded that Judge Ross's explanations on the March 4 program came within the exemption. As we explain, we have reached a different conclusion. The concept of "legal education" is more limited; it refers to education of legal professionals. In the immediately preceding sentence of canon 3B(9), there is an express provision allowing for judges to explain "for public information the procedures of the court." Thus, in the canon itself, there is a distinction between discussing issues pending in appellate courts in "legal education programs and materials" and informing the public about "procedures of the court."

The history of canon 3B(9) is instructive. It derives from the American Bar Association (ABA) Model Code of Judicial Conduct. In the 1972 version of the model code, there was the following blanket restriction: "A judge should abstain from public comment about a pending or impending proceeding in any court." Prior to 1992, the California Code of Judicial Conduct was only slightly less restrictive: canon 3A(6), as it existed then, included the same basic ABA model code prohibition for judges and required them to demand similar abstention by subordinate court staff. The predecessor of the current "public information" exception of canon 3B(9) also was part of the pre-1992 canon 3A(6): "This subsection does not prohibit judges from making public statements in the course of their official duties or from explaining for public information the procedures of the court."

In 1990, the ABA culminated a three-year review process with the promulgation of a revised model code. The prohibition against comment on pending cases was relaxed slightly to provide: "A judge shall not, while a proceeding is pending or impending in any court, make any public comment that might reasonably be expected to affect its outcome or impair its fairness or make any non-public comment that might substantially interfere with a fair trial or hearing." (1990 ABA Model Code Jud. Conduct, canon 3B(9).)

The change was adopted following substantial debate among both commentators and ABA members. (See Moser, The 1990 ABA Code of Judicial Conduct: A Model for the Future (1991) 4 Geo. J. Legal Ethics 731, 732–735.) Among the criticisms at the time of the 1972 rule was that "it was over-broad and its literal terms were frequently violated by judges making perfectly proper comments about cases when teaching law, explaining procedure, and addressing judicial conferences." (Id. at p. 749.) Indeed, among the specific comments included in a compendium that was part of the final submission to the ABA House of Delegates meeting in August 1990 (at which the new model code was adopted), was the following comment, referring to what became the 1990 ABA Model Code of Judicial Conduct version of canon 3B(9): "The section as presently worded is simply too restrictive. 'Any public comment' clearly includes law teaching and law writing. The second to the last sentence should be amended as follows: 'This section does not prohibit judges from making public statements in the course of their official duties, or from commenting publicly about proceedings pending in courts other than the judge's own court while engaged in law teaching or law review or text writing, or from explaining . . . .' " (ABA Standing Com. on Ethics and Prof. Responsibility, Rep. to the House of Delegates No. 112 (Aug. 1990), appen. D, com. 31, p. 14, original underscoring.)

Although the issue of a "legal education" exception was raised in the ABA deliberations, as noted, it was not adopted as part of the 1990 ABA Model Code of Judicial Conduct. However, in California, "the California Judges Association began review of the 1990 Model Code later that year, culminating in the adoption of a revised California Code of Judicial Conduct on October 5, 1992." (Cal. Code Jud. Conduct (1992) preface, ¶ 4.) For the first time, the following appeared in the "Commentary" to the newly numbered canon 3B(9)—the former canon 3A(6)—in the 1992 California code: "Other than cases in which the judge has personally participated, this Canon does not prohibit judges from discussing in legal education programs and materials cases and issues pending in appellate courts."[10]

The "legal education" exemption in California derives from the comments on the 1990 ABA Model Code of Judicial Conduct. Based on the historical development, we are convinced that the exemption arises out of the desire to clarify judges' right to engage in up-to-the-minute discussions among themselves or with lawyers of pending appellate cases. Indeed, one commentator, in discussing the unusual "education exception" of the California canon, discusses it under the heading "Scholarly Teaching and Writing." (Gray, Commenting on Pending Cases in Key Issues in Judicial Ethics (American Judicature Society 2001) pp. 15–16.) Judge Rothman discusses the provision in the section of his treatise entitled Legal Education Programs (Rothman, Cal. Jud. Conduct Handbook, supra, § 5.35, pp. 144–145); he has a separate subdivision, Communicating with the Media (ch. 5, pt. II, subd. B) that includes the section entitled Making Television Appearances (id., § 5.38, p. 146). Judge Rothman's delineation suggests the distinction that we determine to be applicable.

[10] Proposition 190 (amending Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (m), eff. Mar. 1, 1995), created a new constitutional provision transferring to the Supreme Court the authority for issuing a code of judicial ethics. In March 1995, the Supreme Court formally adopted the California Judges Association's 1992 California Code of Judicial Conduct as a transitional measure. The high court then formally adopted the California Code of Judicial Ethics effective January 15, 1996, with amendments effective April 15, 1996. As a result of the amendments, the "legal education" exemption became part of the text of canon 3B(9) as it now exists.

Thus, we conclude that the "legal education" exemption of canon 3B(9) allows only limited comment on pending appellate cases, as described, and does not extend to general public outreach activities by a judge. Judge Ross's comments about the Ghilotti appeal on the March 4 segment of Life & Times Tonight were not permitted under canon 3B(9).

(21) The masters viewed Judge Ross's televised comments on Ghilotti as a technical violation, at most, and one that was not sufficiently serious to have brought the judiciary into disrepute. We cannot agree. The judge's comments about the Ghilotti family wealth, the defendant's charisma, the fact that people were watching, and the reckless suggestion that politics may drive the outcome of the case were both unseemly and potentially prejudicial to the litigants. The comments also risked undermining public respect for the court's ultimate decision in Ghilotti and for the court in general. We determine that Judge Ross committed prejudicial misconduct with his unwarranted and inappropriate comments.[11]

C. COUNTS 3C & 3D: COMMENT ON INGLEWOOD POLICE OFFICERS CASE

1. Findings of Fact

During the summer of 2002, a criminal case was pending in the Los Angeles Superior Court against two Inglewood police officers charged with assaulting a minor during an arrest that was videotaped. The arrest and alleged police misconduct had generated widespread media coverage and substantial local controversy. Judge Ross had no judicial responsibilities concerning the case, but made comments concerning it during two appearances on Life & Times Tonight while the case was pending.

[11] Because the masters concluded the exemption applied, they found that there was no violation of canon 3B(9), and thus they did not need to reach the issue of the constitutionality of the canon. We conclude that Judge Ross's First Amendment arguments concerning count 3B fail for the same reasons as we discussed in connection with count 3A concerning the juvenile case, discussed in the text, ante, at pages 121–123.

We adopt and summarize the masters' findings. During the program segment broadcast on July 22, 2002 (the subject of count 3C), Judge Ross responded to the host's questions about "confusing" layers of prosecuting agencies and courts. He explained the roles of the various entities in the prosecution of a criminal case against a police officer. He emphasized the concept of presumption of innocence and cautioned against prejudgment notwithstanding the videotape. The judge also commented on a potential effect of the charges against the officers on other criminal cases in which the officers had been involved.

On the program of August 15, 2002 (the subject of count 3D), the host expressed concerns whether the officers' case was being transferred to a less racially diverse jurisdiction in order to benefit the officers. Judge Ross responded with an objective explanation concerning the distinction between changes of venue and transfers within the same court district. He explained the authority of a trial judge to order a change of venue based on statutory factors, pointing out that the key determination concerning venue was whether the defendant would receive a fair trial. The judge also described geographical areas from which jury pools are drawn after court unification, and the concept of juror challenges.

2. Conclusions of Law

(22) As noted previously, canon 3B(9) permits a judge to comment publicly on a pending case for purposes of "explaining for public information the procedures of the court." The masters conclude, based on their review of the program transcripts, that Judge Ross's comments during the two program segments fit within the exception. We concur, based on our review of the transcripts, that the comments were permissible under the "public procedural information" exemption to canon 3B(9). We conclude that no misconduct was proven under counts 3C or 3D.

VI. COUNT 4: MOBILE COURT PRIVATE ARBITRATIONS

The final count charges Judge Ross with misconduct in acting as a private arbitrator during filming of a pilot television program for a possible new series, tentatively known as Mobile Court. He is alleged to have violated canons 1 and 2A (by creating an appearance of impropriety and undermining the integrity and independence of the judiciary), 2B(2) (by using the prestige of office to advance his and others' pecuniary interests), 4A(2) (by engaging in off-bench activities that demeaned the judicial office), 4D(1)(a) (by engaging in financial and business dealings that may reasonably be perceived as exploiting the judicial position), 4D(2) (by participating in a business venture or commercial advertising, or permitting others to use the judge's title, or otherwise lending the prestige of office to promote a commercial venture) and 4F (by acting as a private arbitrator).

The masters concluded that Judge Ross violated all of the foregoing canons in connection with arbitrating the Mobile Court cases, and that he committed prejudicial misconduct. We agree as to the canon violations, but determine that he committed willful misconduct. Additionally, the masters suggested Judge Ross was not telling the truth in parts of his testimony concerning Mobile Court. We conclude that Judge Ross's pervasive lack of candor and accountability throughout these proceedings was especially pronounced as respects the charges of court 4.

1. Findings of Fact Concerning Basic Charges

We adopt and summarize the findings of the masters concerning the basic facts. During the summer of 2002, a television producer contacted Judge Ross and ultimately invited him to audition for the role as a judge/host for a proposed reality television series. The tentative name for the series was Mobile Court, reflecting the theme of the show, which was for an actual judge to resolve actual cases, but in "court on location," taking "justice from the courtroom to the streets."

Judge Ross agreed to audition for the position of judge/host of the program. Following the audition and numerous discussions with the producer's agent, the judge signed a contract with the producer in mid-July 2002. Judge Ross utilized the services of a talent agent, and also was assisted in the contract negotiations by an attorney agent whom he knew from his tenure in the district attorney's office. The contract gave the producer the "exclusive, independent irrevocable option . . . to engage [Judge Ross] to render on-camera judge/host services in connection with [the] television series . . . ," and obligated Judge Ross to provide these services after February 1, 2003, if the television pilot was purchased. Judge Ross warranted in the agreement that he was "free to enter into this Agreement" and that he was "not subject to any conflicting obligation. . . ." (Original italics.)

Judge Ross testified that he knew he would need to resign from the bench if he was chosen to host the series. He also testified that a television career was very appealing to him because it would "only require [him] to work six months out of the year." The masters presumed, as do we, that Judge Ross was aware, further, of the "potential monetary and other substantial benefits of a successful television career."

The pilot show was filmed on the weekend of July 27 and July 28, 2002. The producers intended to use the pilot solely for marketing the show to television producers. In the pilot, Judge Ross arbitrated two actual pending cases that had been filed as small claims matters. A videotape of the pilot was submitted into evidence and both the masters and we have viewed it. Judge Ross is identified in the pilot as "Judge Kevin Ross." He appears in each case in a dark suit with a uniformed bailiff who announces that the witnesses have been sworn, that Judge Kevin Ross is "presiding," and that "Mobile Court is now in session." Judge Ross testified that the bailiffs were off-duty deputies from the sheriff's department, hired by the producer.

The first case, entitled on the film as "Revenge and Rotten Eggs," involved cross-claims of a teenage boy and two teenage girls for damage to two vehicles, allegedly caused by rotten eggs having been thrown on the vehicles. The filming took place on a residential street with numerous spectators. During the show—or the "hearing"—the parties engaged in nasty name calling, personal insults and derogatory language; they generally ignored Judge Ross's repeated admonitions that they were required to follow his "rules." Judge Ross held several "side-bar" discussions during which he questioned the respective parties, and then issued his decision on camera in favor of the teenage boy.

The second program case is entitled "Beauty and the Beast." An "erotic model" using the stage name Angel Cassidy sued the "Dream Girls" adult club in San Diego, claiming that the club cheated her out of prize money because the security guard (identified on film as "Wolverine") disqualified her from the final round of a "Miss Wet on the Net" contest. The filming took place inside a Los Angeles strip club—described as such on the video. The parties again engaged in substantial name calling and exchanged derogatory and insulting remarks that Judge Ross was unable to control.

Prior to the filming, the parties to the two actual small claims cases (and show participants) signed arbitration agreements in which they consented to submit their disputes to "Judge Kevin Ross" for binding arbitration and to dismiss their small claims court cases. The producer agreed to pay any monetary judgments that were awarded. Judge Ross was given written summaries of "evidence" and witness statements for each case; the summaries stated the cases had been filed in the court as small claims actions. The judge was not told how to decide the cases; rather, his decisions were based on the written summaries, as well as the on-camera assertions of the claimants and other "witnesses."

After the filming, each party signed a form letter printed on Mobile Court letterhead, stating that the case had been resolved in private arbitration, and formally asking the small claims division of the respective courts to dismiss the case with prejudice. Judge Ross signed a document for each case, again on Mobile Court stationery, entitled in large capital black letters, "ARBITRATOR'S AWARD." Next to his signature on each award is the date "7/29/02," the Monday following the weekend filming. The date appears to have been written with the same pen as Judge Ross's signature on each respective document. The documents state the amount of money awarded to the prevailing party in each respective case. Judge Ross received $5,000 in compensation for his work on the pilot, which he turned over to the Judicial Resources Office, net of taxes. He paid his talent agent her percentage of his earnings from his personal funds.

The producer then used the pilot to make sales presentations to several groups of executives in the broadcasting field. The presentation included marketing the fact that Judge Ross "was an actual legitimate judge in Los Angeles" because the promoters thought that would "lend . . . credibility to the show" and increase the opportunity to sell the series to an interested buyer.

On August 4, 2002, articles about the proposed Mobile Court show appeared in online and print versions of a leading entertainment industry trade publication, Variety. The articles included the statement that the proposed syndicated series would be "hosted by Judge Kevin Ross, who gets dispatched into the streets by car with his bailiff . . . ." (Original italics.)

Judge Ross testified that he "did go out and actually go get a copy" of Variety. He described his reaction as follows: "And at that point, I was like, 'Okay, I'm going to end up being kicked off the bench' because I know that this is something that can't be done. So that was something that I was—I was very upset." The judge testified that the producers and their agents had assured him orally that they would not use his judicial position for marketing purposes. However, neither the judge nor his agent nor his attorney ensured that the alleged assurance was reduced to writing, either as part of the general contract between the judge and the producer, or otherwise. Ultimately, the show was not purchased or developed into a series.

2. Findings of Fact Concerning Judge Ross's Defenses

(23) a. Judge's Assertion That He Did Not Know He Was Acting As an Arbitrator: With exceptions not applicable here, canon 4F prohibits a judge from acting as a private arbitrator. By the time of the masters' hearing, Judge Ross conceded that he then realized he had violated canon 4F by arbitrating the small claims cases he decided during the filming of the pilot. He testified, though, that as of the time of the filming, he was unaware he arbitrated the cases. The masters rejected this claim as false, as follows: "Based on the evidence presented, we find that when Judge Ross was participating in the Mobile Court project he had to have known and understood that he was retained to serve as a private arbitrator and, in fact, did so. Most important, Judge Ross signed two documents, each entitled 'ARBITRATOR'S AWARD,' that awarded money to each plaintiff according to Judge Ross's stated findings. . . ."

Not only did Judge Ross sign the two awards, but his testimony concerning the signing is false. Judge Ross claims that he signed the arbitration awards during a very hectic period while having makeup applied prior to the actual filming that took place on Saturday, July 27, and Sunday, July 28, 2002. The documents bearing the judge's signature, however, are dated Monday, July 29, after the filming was complete. Clearly, Judge Ross was not in the process of having makeup applied while getting ready for the camera on Monday.

Judge Ross's signature and date on each arbitration award appear to be written with the same pen on each respective document. This is particularly apparent on exhibit 75, the award for the "Beauty and the Beast" case. Although there was no specific testimony on the subject, Judge Ross has never asserted, either to the masters or to the commission, that he did not sign and accurately date both awards. We are confident the awards were signed on Monday the 29th, and not while makeup was being applied prior to filming on Saturday or Sunday.

As noted by the masters, it "does not make sense" that Judge Ross signed the awards before the filming. The awards are just that—the arbitrator's decision after the "hearing." Further, by Judge Ross's own admission those decisions did not occur before filming: he made his decision during the filming and was not told what decision to reach. Additionally, the basic premise of the show was that the judge was going to decide actual disputes, a fact that further undermines the judge's claim that he did not know he was acting as an arbitrator when he was doing so.

The judge's testimony concerning the circumstance of the signing of the awards was preceded by a question from the examiner, "Did you actually think at the time that judges were allowed to act as arbitrators privately?" The question clearly sought to elicit the judge's understanding as of the time of the filming concerning the ethical propriety of his engaging in private arbitration.

Judge Ross's initial reply to the question was that he "really did not see it as what would be considered officially arbitration and mediation" and that until he received copies of the awards through discovery, he did not recall signing the arbitration awards. This was followed by his description of the hectic scene, prefilming, when makeup was being applied.

The following exchanges then took place between the examiner and Judge Ross:

"Q. Are you saying that you were never told by anyone involved with Mobile Court that these cases were going to be arbitrated by you?

"A. I'm not saying that.

"Q. Who told you they were going to be arbitrated?

"A. I don't recall.

"Q. But someone did tell you that you were going to be doing arbitration?"

Judge Ross gave a lengthy and evasive response concerning whether "someone" had told him, the essence of which was summed up in the following: "And it was—again, it was this performance. So that's really what I went into it thinking, that I was kind of going through this role-playing performance situation." Continuing, the judge claimed that he thought the only difference between his audition for the role and the actual filming was that in the latter situation, "we were actually going to make it look as real as possible," to enhance marketing potential.

The examiner then showed Judge Ross copies of the arbitration awards and asked him whether his position was that he did not know he had arbitrated the cases until he received those documents in discovery. The judge gave another rambling and evasive reply that included a repetition of his claim that he was distracted while "I'm in a trailer, and I'm having someone applying makeup . . . ."

The examiner's exchange with Judge Ross on this subject concluded with the following:

"Q. My question goes to your state of mind at the time you participated in all the Mobile Court dealings. In your mind, you had not engaged in arbitration. Is that right?

"A. I think I've already indicated what my state of mind was, Mr. Coyle. I'm comfortable with that.

"Q. Can you answer that question yes or no?

"A. I don't think—that's not really a question I can answer yes or no. I'm not trying to be evasive, but I indicated, again, that at the particular moment when this came up, had I been sitting in a lawyer's office and/or sitting in a courtroom, that the circumstances would reflect one of, well, you really should have known this. That wasn't the situation. I'm in a trailer, and I'm having someone applying makeup, and I'm having someone say, 'Okay, let's try this tie. And by the way, what about the W-2 forms? Judge Ross, have you eaten yet? Oh, by the way could you look at this other piece of paper. You know, you didn't sign this document here.' So all these things were going on. They don't excuse the fact that I signed an arbitrator's award. It doesn't excuse the fact that that's a direct violation of the canon. And so I accepted responsibility from day one."

The patent attempts at avoidance, mixed with the false story about the makeup and other confusion prefilming, demonstrate serious lack of candor and accountability. They also highlight the hollowness of the final claim by the judge in the just-quoted excerpt that he "accepted responsibility from day one."

Judge Ross continues in his efforts to avoid admitting conscious knowledge of wrongdoing. In his findings that he proposed to the masters following the hearing, he suggested that they should find that he "unintentionally" engaged in arbitration.

In his posthearing briefs to the commission, Judge Ross glosses over the details of the arbitrations, although he does "concede" wrongdoing. In his recitation of the facts in his opening brief, the judge omits any mention of the arbitrator's award documents that he signed. Later, he makes a passing and misleading reference to those documents, as follows: "Respondent realizes he was unclear as to when he signed the documents but does not dispute these actions." (Italics added.) To the contrary, he was quite clear, repeatedly and falsely, that he signed the awards while makeup was being applied.

In the judge's reply brief, he accuses the examiner of being "intentionally misleading" in asserting that Judge Ross was unwilling to admit that he knew he was acting as an arbitrator. Again, the judge points the finger of blame at someone else—unjustifiably so, in that what the examiner asserted is precisely what the masters expressly found, namely, that "Judge Ross has been unwilling to admit that he knew he was acting as an arbitrator when the pilots were filmed." The judge has been and is unwilling to acknowledge his true state of mind.

Judge Ross states that he now "understands" that private arbitration is prohibited, and that he "fully understands" that he acted as an arbitrator. The belated concessions, however, miss the point that Judge Ross has repeatedly refused to concede in the face of compelling evidence that he had to have known at the time of the filming that he was engaging in arbitration.

b. Judge Ross's Claim That He Asked and Expected the Producer Not to Use His Title in Promoting the Show: The masters correctly concluded that Judge Ross violated several canons because he used his judicial position for financial advantage, and used the prestige of office to engage in a commercial or business enterprise. In an attempt to avoid this conclusion, Judge Ross testified that he asked the producer not to use his judicial title in marketing the show and that he expected his request would be respected. The masters concluded that since the judge failed to have this limitation reduced to writing, his efforts were inadequate to ensure that a violation of the canons would not ensue.

Beyond the foregoing, with which we agree, the claim is inherently unbelievable. Judge Ross was selected as the host because his judicial position enhanced the show's credibility, reliability and marketability. There was an underlying premise of marketing him as a judge as a way of selling the program. The judge was willing to allow himself to be marketed as a judge in hopes that he then could leave the bench for a more lucrative career in television. His claims that he directed and expected that he would not be marketed as a judge are not credible.

c. Judge's "Contract" Claim: Judge Ross urges that it was acceptable for him to participate in the pilot filming because he "never made a final decision to do the show." The masters rejected the claim based on the contract, under the terms of which Judge Ross did not have the right to withdraw. We agree with the masters. Furthermore, the contractual formalities are irrelevant to the ethical violations that occurred.

3. Conclusions of Law

The masters' summary legal conclusions were that Judge Ross's participation in the Mobile Court arbitrations "violated judicial canons prohibiting judges from: (1) serving as private arbitrators; (2) using their positions to obtain benefits for themselves and others; and (3) conducting themselves in a manner that is undignified and brings disrepute to the judiciary." We concur and adopt these summary conclusions; we also summarize and adopt the following reasoning of the masters respecting these conclusions.

Judge Ross violated canon 4F which prohibits a judge from acting as a private arbitrator. Notwithstanding the judge's evasion of the question of whether he knew at the time that he was violating the canon, he concedes now that he in fact did violate it.[12]

The judge's participation in the Mobile Court program also conflicted with three canons prohibiting judges from using their judicial positions for financial advantage for themselves or others, and from using the prestige of office to engage in a commercial or business enterprise. (Canons 2B(2), 4D(1)(a), 4D(2).) As noted previously, the underlying premise of the proposed new "reality" series was to have a "real judge" as host. Authenticity of the judge, and the concept of taking justice to the street—resolving actual cases "at the scene"—were core themes of the show and key underlying marketing strategies. The judge was among those who stood to realize substantial financial benefits if the pilot had been purchased and aired. The judge admitted that he understood these facts, at least as pertained to his own potential to benefit, and that he would be required to leave the bench if the project succeeded.

The videotape of the "judicial" proceedings is degrading to Judge Ross and to the judiciary. In the "Revenge and Rotten Eggs" installment, the "trial" was held in the middle of a street, with a substantial public gathered around, as the parties called each other names and disrespected Judge Ross and "his rules." The "courtroom" for the "Beauty and the Beast" case was a strip club, which Judge Ross described on the program as a location with "zebra carpet, neon, mirrors, pole front and center. . . ." The garish surroundings were apparent on screen; it was inappropriate for the judge to draw attention to props that were created for a striptease act, not for the dispensing of justice. Similarly, it was inappropriate for Judge Ross repeatedly to ask the plaintiff (the "erotic model") to detail the components of a "wet T-shirt contest." The judge knew his conduct was unjudicial; upon seeing even a benign description of the show and the use of his title in Variety, he thought he would be "kicked off the bench."

The videotape was not shown to the general public. It was, however, seen by broadcast executives, and the unjudicial activities were witnessed by those who participated in and attended each filming. That is sufficient opportunity for disrespect to be brought upon the judiciary. "It is enough that the conduct be known to those members of the public who observed it." (Dodds, supra, 12 Cal.4th at p. 173.)

The masters concluded that Judge Ross's involvement in the Mobile Court venture constituted prejudicial misconduct. They reached this conclusion based on the determination that one element of willful misconduct under the three-pronged Broadman standard—that the judge be acting in a judicial capacity—was lacking. (Broadman, supra, 18 Cal.4th at p. 1091.) We conclude that he was acting in a judicial capacity and, thus, that there was willful misconduct.

(25) Arbitration is not necessarily a "judicial function" in that persons other than judges frequently act as arbitrators. Also, the prohibition of canon 4F against a judge performing arbitration in a "private capacity" suggests that a sitting judge who improperly acts as an arbitrator is not acting in a judicial capacity. In other words, Judge Ross could have done private arbitration in his capacity as attorney or private citizen, in which case there arguably would have been no involvement of "judicial function." In such instance and under this theory, the wrongdoing would have amounted to prejudicial, not willful, misconduct.

Judge Ross, however, was not acting in his capacity as attorney or private citizen during the Mobile Court arbitrations. He was required to be a judge and act as a judge in order to get the job and perform the role of onscreen arbitrator. It was a key premise of the reality TV show and a condition for the marketing scheme that Judge Ross be, and perform the role of arbitrator as, an actual judge. It was a program requirement that Judge Ross act in a judicial capacity. While acting as a private arbitrator, the judge also engaged in the improper end of using the prestige of his office and his authority as a judge, in an attempt to leverage his status as a bench officer for financial gain. He was acting in a judicial capacity, and the underlying venal purpose constitutes willful misconduct.

VII. DISCIPLINE

A. PURPOSES OF JUDICIAL DISCIPLINE

(26) The starting point for our decision concerning the appropriate level of discipline to impose on Judge Ross is the Supreme Court's admonition that the purpose of judicial discipline " 'is not punishment, but rather the protection of the public, the enforcement of rigorous standards of judicial conduct, and the maintenance of public confidence in the integrity and independence of the judicial system.' " (Broadman, supra, 18 Cal.4th at pp. 1111–1112, citing Adams II, supra, 10 Cal.4th at p. 912.)

B. RELEVANT STANDARDS FOR DETERMINING DISCIPLINE

(27) Based on Supreme Court decisions, the commission has identified several factors that are relevant to determining appropriate discipline: the number of acts of misconduct; the existence of prior discipline; whether the judge appreciates that he or she committed misconduct; the judge's integrity; the likelihood of future misconduct; and the impact of the misconduct on the judicial system. (Inquiry Concerning Van Voorhis (2003) No. 165, Decision and Order Removing Judge Van Voorhis from Office, p. 31 [48 Cal.4th CJP Supp. 257, 295]; Inquiry Concerning Hyde (2003) No. 166, Decision and Order Removing Judge Hyde from Office, p. 27 [48 Cal.4th CJP Supp. 329, 363].) In addition, court decisions (e.g., Adams II, supra, 10 Cal.4th at pp. 908–911; Doan, supra, 11 Cal.4th at pp. 338–339) make clear that it is also relevant here that the misconduct involves moral turpitude and corrupt intentions. And, as noted at the outset, honesty is a minimum qualification for every judge. (Kloepfer, supra, 49 Cal.3d at p. 865.) We apply these standards to the facts here; in many respects, the various considerations overlap one another.

1. Number of Acts of Misconduct

(28) The Supreme Court has stated that the number of acts of misconduct is relevant to the question of discipline, but not according to any rigid formula. (Furey v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1987) 43 Cal.3d 1297, 1307 [240 Cal.Rptr. 859, 743 P.2d 919].) Judge Ross engaged in four acts of willful misconduct, two acts of prejudicial misconduct and one act of improper action. (29) Under the California Constitution, improper action is not a basis for censure or removal (Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (d)); accordingly, we do not consider the judge's improper action, that is, the basic underlying misconduct of talking by telephone with Ms. Carrillo in count 1A, in reaching our determination to remove Judge Ross from office. " 'The number of wrongful acts is relevant to determining whether they were merely isolated occurrences or, instead, part of a course of conduct establishing "lack of temperament and ability to perform judicial functions in an even-handed manner." [Citation.]' " (Fletcher, supra, 19 Cal.4th at p. 918.)

Based on our determination of repeated wrongdoing by Judge Ross, compounded by his pervasive lack of candor and accountability and the fact that he has prior discipline for misconduct similar to certain of the wrongdoing present in these proceedings (discussed immediately following), we are satisfied that a course of conduct has been clearly established. The evidence we have discussed convinces us beyond any doubt that Judge Ross has demonstrated that he lacks the temperament and ability to perform judicial functions in an evenhanded manner.

2. Prior Discipline

The commission previously disciplined Judge Ross with an advisory letter issued on February 14, 2001. The misconduct that was the subject of the earlier discipline was similar to that involved here, as found by the masters. It involved abuse of authority, acting in derogation of the attorney-client relationship and the right against self-incrimination, and conducting proceedings that lacked decorum and were demeaning and humiliating to defendants. The wrongdoing that has been proven in these proceedings began on January 15, 2001—four months prior to the advisory letter—with the improper comment on the juvenile case on Life & Times Tonight—followed six months after the advisory letter with the Carrillo hearing on August 23, 2001.

3. Appreciation of Misconduct

(30) "A judge's failure to appreciate or admit to the impropriety of his or her acts indicates a lack of capacity to reform." (Inquiry Concerning Platt (2002) No. 162, Decision and Order Removing Judge Platt from Office, p. 15 [48 Cal.4th CJP Supp. 227].) We have documented in detail Judge Ross's unceasing attempts to distance himself from his actions, including by casting blame and aspersions on others. Indeed, his lack of acceptance and accountability is ever present.

During his testimony before the masters, Judge Ross made the following assertions that demonstrate his denial of wrongdoing:

Judge Ross maintained that he was neutral and detached in questioning Mr. Aka, and he did not think he was demeaning toward him, despite cross-examining him like a prosecutor and repeatedly calling him a liar.

The judge denied that he derogated the attorney-client relationship in the Salcido matter, or that he proceeded improperly after evicting DPD Gordon, or that removing counsel from the courtroom affected the attorney-client relationship. The judge asserts he was patient and dignified, despite having called Mr. Salcido a pathological liar in open court.

The judge recognized no wrongdoing in revealing on television facts he learned in a confidential juvenile hearing and announcing his intended decision on screen, while the case was still pending before him.[13]

Judge Ross was unwilling to admit that he knew he was acting as an arbitrator for Mobile Court.

When commission member Michael Kahn asked Judge Ross at oral argument "what [he] has learned from this, and how [he] will apply it to individual cases in the future," the judge was unable to provide a cogent or convincing response that he has learned anything pertinent—despite being invited twice by the chairperson to please answer the question.

Following oral argument before the commission, we asked for supplemental briefs from the parties on the subject of the propriety, or lack thereof, of removal in this case; the parties were asked to assume for purposes of the brief that the commission would adopt the basic findings and conclusions of the masters, and that it had determined that Judge Ross displayed serious lack of candor before the masters and the commission. In response, Judge Ross filed a 24-page brief that again highlights the judge's inability or refusal to acknowledge what he has done.

At the outset of the brief, under the heading "Summary of Proceedings," Judge Ross states as follows: "In affirming all the findings made by the Special Masters with respect to these charges, it is clear that the Commission believes that respondent failed to demonstrate strict adherence to the Code of Judicial Ethics. It is also clear that the Commission is deeply concerned that respondent failed to display the utmost candor during appearances before both the Special Masters and the Commission."

The judge's choice of modifiers—strict adherence to the canons, and utmost candor—qualifies even his basic description of the issues at hand. They suggest that there were only technical ethical violations and slight deviations from absolute honesty. This same refusal or inability to acknowledge the gravity of the wrongdoing permeates the judge's brief.

Following the introduction, he sets forth in a series each of the subcounts in which the masters found misconduct. There is an introductory subheading to each subcount in which Judge Ross sets forth what we call a "concession of error." For example, he begins with the Carrillo case, concerning which he "acknowledges" his misconduct as follows: "Respondent's [sic] recognizes that his sense of compassion cannot override ethical obligations to handle cases in a manner consistent with the Code of Judicial Ethics." Notably, the judge's "concession" is enveloped in a self-serving comment about his compassion.

In each instance of misconduct, then, the judge includes a purported summary of the facts that constitute the wrongdoing. The descriptions are self-serving and omit the most egregious portions of the wrongful conduct. For example, the judge's summary heading, or "admission of error," concerning the Salcido case is as follows: "Respondent recognizes that he failed to show Mr. Salcido the proper respect he was entitled to, demonstrating embroilment and lack of impartiality by accusing him of 'lying' and being a 'pathological liar.' " Neither in that heading, nor in the ensuing discussion of the facts, does Judge Ross make any mention of his egregious violations of Mr. Salcido's fundamental constitutional rights.

Judge Ross continues a similar process with each of the subcounts—offering concessions, the lack of sincerity and depth of which are exposed by the superficial factual descriptions that follow. His attempts to minimize his wrongdoing fail because they are hollow.

In another part of the supplemental brief, the judge also discusses his prior advisory letter. The masters found that the conduct that was the subject of the earlier discipline repeats itself here. Judge Ross does not argue against that observation. Instead, describing the circumstances underlying the discipline, he suggests that his intentions were good, even though he violated defendants' constitutional rights and otherwise demeaned them. Judge Ross demonstrates again that he is incapable of just admitting his wrongdoing.

4. The Judge's Integrity

Honesty is a "minimum qualification[]" expected of every judge. (Kloepfer, supra, 49 Cal.3d at p. 865.) A person cannot be a judge if he or she is not honest; other positive qualities cannot redeem or compensate for the missing fundamental. (Ibid.) Judge Ross's lack of candor is another demonstrated and predominant theme of these proceedings; it is pervasive.

In the Fuentes matter, the judge fabricated stories that the defendant gave him insurance papers, that an unnamed bailiff told him a judge could add charges for false insurance information, that another "identical" case triggered him into realizing he had made a "mess" of the Fuentes matter, that he took prompt action to remedy the prejudice, that he thought the defendant would appear in another court for arraignment even though he had just sent her to jail, that she would be "automatically" released on bail, and that he did not just order her released from jail because, even though his clerk told him the defendant was still in jail, "they could not find her."

In the Carrillo matter, he persists in the false claim that he gave prompt notice to counsel of his ex parte conversation with the defendant. He admits that he made an after-the-fact addition to the court minutes that he gave to his supervising judge, and that he then filed an answer based on the alteration that concededly cannot be true.

In the Aka matter, Judge Ross testified that all probation violation hearings in his courtroom were formal ones. He knew that was not true.

Throughout these proceedings, Judge Ross has refused to admit that at the time he arbitrated the Mobile Court cases, he knew then that he was acting as an arbitrator. The assertion is defeated by overwhelming evidence to the contrary. He persists in his position that he signed the arbitration awards while distracted as makeup was being applied prior to filming, even after the impossibility of that being true—given the postfilming date on the awards—has been pointed out to him repeatedly. The judge's further assertion that he requested and expected the producer not to promote him and his position is without merit since real-life Judge Ross was the premise of the program and the key to the marketability of the new reality show.

The Supreme Court has denounced conduct such as Judge Ross repeatedly displays here. As to fabricating stories, the court stated in Ryan: "The misconduct in this matter is especially serious because it indicates that the judge was willing to fabricate justifications for a challenged ruling. This is misconduct of the worst kind, evidencing moral turpitude and dishonesty." (Ryan, supra, 45 Cal.3d at p. 535.)

As to altering documents, the court commented as follows in Wenger where the judge had backdated an affidavit: Judge Wenger "knew or should have known that it would create a false impression that he had signed on the earlier date." (Wenger v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1981) 29 Cal.3d 615, 644 [175 Cal.Rptr. 420, 630 P.2d 954].) Even though the affidavit was not submitted to the commission, and it was not clear why the judge had altered the date, the court denounced it as corrupt, based on an inference that whatever the purpose, it was "not the faithful discharge of judicial duties." (Id. at pp. 644–645.)

(31) As to attempts to mislead the commission, the court has denounced the practice as especially egregious. In Adams II, the court determined that the judge made "material misstatements or omissions" to the commission, concerning which it stated: "There are few judicial actions in our view that provide greater justification for removal from office than the action of a judge in deliberately providing false information to the Commission in the course of its investigation into charges of wilful misconduct on the part of the judge." (Adams II, supra, 10 Cal.4th at p. 914; accord, Fletcher, supra, 19 Cal.4th at pp. 887–891.)

5. Likelihood of Future Violations

(32) Repeat misconduct, such as is present here, indicates an inability to reform. (Doan, supra, 11 Cal.4th at pp. 339–340; McCullough, supra, 49 Cal.3d at p. 199.) Implicit in the lack of reform is the risk of yet further violations in the future.

We are convinced that Judge Ross's behavior suggests a strong likelihood of future violations. Judge Ross's misconduct here began before his prior discipline, repeats it in many respects, and becomes far more serious. Furthermore, the judge committed his willful misconduct in the Fuentes matter when he knew he was under investigation by the commission for his wrongdoing in the Carrillo, Aka and Salcido matters. In a previous removal case, the commission noted that the judge "had just received a preliminary investigation letter from the commission. Accordingly, [he] had every reason to scrupulously observe the standards of judicial conduct. Instead, [he committed willful misconduct]. . . . Even when the commission's attention was focused on him, [the judge] could not resist repeating an act of misconduct." (Inquiry Concerning Hyde, supra, No. 166, Decision and Order Removing Judge Hyde from Office, p. 32 [48 Cal.4th CJP Supp. at pp. 369–370].) The same can be said about Judge Ross.

In a similar vein, during Judge Ross's oral argument before the commission, faced with the masters' extensive negative credibility findings, Judge Ross resorted to the same type of evasive answers that led to those findings. Reviewing the questioning by the three judge members of the commission as to why he had not just ordered Ms. Fuentes released from jail (ante, pp. 96–99), the only conclusion one can draw from Judge Ross's "responses" is that he was actively fabricating.

It is obvious that the prior private discipline did not have its desired deterrent effect. We are convinced that there is a strong likelihood that Judge Ross will commit further misconduct if we do not protect the public and the judiciary by removing him.

6. Impact on Judicial System

We have detailed Judge Ross's serious infringements of criminal defendants' constitutional rights, including the multiday deprivation of Ms. Fuentes's liberty without any pretense of due process of law. Beyond the cloud these violations cast over Judge Ross personally, there has been a vicarious besmirching of the reputation of the judiciary in general. The judge has made unseemly suggestions concerning political considerations in the dispensing of justice by our Supreme Court, thus risking that the public will accord the court's decisions less respect than they rightfully deserve. The protected right of a juvenile to confidentiality was sacrificed on television and the premature on-air announcement of the intended disposition of the juvenile matter demonstrated prejudgment. His attacks on criminal defendants show an uneven temperament, a manifest embroilment and a lack of impartiality.

We are dismayed by Judge Ross's conduct in and out of the courtroom, culminating in his willingness to be filmed as a judge in a strip club in hopes of being able to market himself off the bench into a more lucrative career. Last but certainly not least, Judge Ross's pervasive lack of candor is utterly incompatible with the role of judge and impacts on the administration of justice, and the public's image of it. The adverse consequences of Judge Ross's conduct are undeniable, and demand that we redress them as best we can.

C. ORDER REMOVING JUDGE ROSS FROM OFFICE

(33) Numerous witnesses testified before the masters concerning Judge Ross's dedication and talents as a community leader and role model. He is gifted and dedicated to important judicial outreach activities. He brought to the bench excellent credentials by way of schooling and prior work experience. These factors make our task all the more difficult. They have caused us considerable pause and reflection in the time and detail of our deliberations, and in our ultimate decision. However, they do not and cannot mitigate the totality of the wrongdoing or the conclusion that removal from office is required. (See Adams II, supra, 10 Cal.4th at p. 912 [positive qualities of a judge are properly considered as part of the totality of circumstances pertinent to determining appropriate discipline, but do not mitigate willful or prejudicial misconduct].)

Pursuant to the provisions of article VI, section 18 of the California Constitution, Judge Kevin A. Ross hereby is ordered removed from his judicial office; pursuant to that section of the Constitution and rules 120(a) and 136 of the Rules of the Commission on Judicial Performance, Judge Ross hereby is disqualified from acting as a judge.

Commission members Mr. Marshall B. Grossman, Judge Frederick P. Horn, Mr. Michael A. Kahn, Mrs. Crystal Lui, Justice Judith D. McConnell, Mr. Jose C. Miramontes, Mrs. Penny Perez, Judge Risë Jones Pichon, and Ms. Barbara Schraeger voted in favor of all the findings and conclusions expressed herein and in the foregoing order of removal and disqualification of Judge Ross. Commission member Patricia Miller is recused and commission member Lawrence Simi did not participate in this matter.

The judge's petition for review by the Supreme Court was denied on May 10, 2006.

[No. 175. Dec. 12, 2006.]

INQUIRY CONCERNING JUDGE DIANA R. HALL.

SUMMARY

A disciplinary matter was brought concerning a superior court judge.

The Commission on Judicial Performance ordered the judge removed from office. The commission found that the judge's inappropriate political activity, signing four campaign disclosure statements under penalty of perjury listing herself as the source of a $20,000 contribution from her romantic partner knowing that information to be false, was prejudicial misconduct within the meaning of Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (d), and violated Cal. Code Jud. Ethics, canons 1, 2A, and 5. A judge who engages in materially deceitful and lawless conduct that undermines the electoral process, and thereafter attempts to explain it away with specious arguments and misleading testimony, should not continue in judicial office. In addition, the judge committed prejudicial misconduct by driving under the influence of alcohol, for which she had two misdemeanor convictions, and she committed willful misconduct by improperly questioning a prosecutor concerning his reasons for exercising an unqualified right to disqualify her in a judicial proceeding. The judge also committed the misconduct underlying a prior private admonishment when she knew that the commission was investigating her in connection with the current charges, thus showing an inability to control her behavior and a likelihood of future misconduct. (Opinion by Marshall B. Grossman, Chairperson.)

HEADNOTES

(1) Judges § 6.2—Discipline—Standard of Personal Conduct.—Cal. Code Jud. Ethics, canon 1, requires a judge to uphold and preserve the integrity of the judiciary and to do so by maintaining high standards of personal conduct.

(2) Judges § 6.2—Discipline—Compliance with Law.—Cal. Code Jud. Ethics, canon 2A, requires a judge to respect and comply with the law and to act at all times in a manner that promotes public confidence in the integrity and impartiality of the judiciary.

(3) Judges § 6.2—Discipline—Prejudicial Misconduct—Driving Under the Influence.—Prejudicial misconduct within the meaning of Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (d), arises out of conduct which is not done in bad faith, but which nevertheless would appear to an objective observer to be not only unjudicial conduct but also conduct prejudicial to public esteem for the judicial office. When a judge is arrested and convicted of DUI, it is prejudicial to public esteem for the judicial office.

(4) Elections § 14—Campaign Financing—Statements—Commingling Funds.—Campaign statements are mandated by the Political Reform Act of 1974 (Gov. Code, §§ 84200–84216.5) and require disclosure of detailed information about receipts and disbursements of money by a campaign committee. They are the primary means of providing transparency in connection with election finances; they directly implement one of the primary purposes of the act—to ensure that receipts and expenditures in election campaigns be fully and truthfully disclosed in order that the voters may be fully informed and improper practices may be inhibited (Gov. Code, § 81002, subd. (a)). Gov. Code, § 84307, prohibits commingling of a contributor's investment funds with a candidate's own funds in the candidate's own personal checking account. Cal. Code Jud. Ethics, canon 5, requires judges to refrain from inappropriate political activity. By commingling funds, intentionally concealing the source of nearly half of all the judge's campaign contributions, and signing four declarations under penalty of perjury knowing they were false, the judge violated five sections of the Political Reform Act and canon 5.

(5) Judges § 6—Discipline—Grounds—Maintain High Standards—Promote Public Confidence.—The judge also violated Cal. Code Jud. Ethics, canon 1, by failing to maintain a high standard of conduct when she failed to read the law governing her reelection and then violated it. She also violated the provision of Cal. Code Jud. Ethics, canon 2A requiring judges to promote public confidence in the judiciary. The public can have no confidence in a judge, and hence a judiciary, that is required to know and respect the law but does neither.

(6) Judges § 6.2—Discipline—Elections—Ignorance of Law.—Any candidate for judicial office must know and strictly adhere to all applicable election laws; utmost integrity is required of every candidate for judicial office. A claim by a judicial candidate of ignorance of the law as a defense to a wide-ranging violation of the law aggravates the violation itself.

(7) Judges § 6.2—Discipline—Grounds—Prejudicial Misconduct—Judical Capacity—Campaign Misconduct.—A judge is acting in a judicial capacity while performing one of the functions, whether adjudicative or administrative in nature, that are associated with the position of a judge or when the judge uses or attempts to use the authority of the judicial office for an improper purpose. The judge was not acting in a judicial capacity when she signed false campaign statements under penalty of perjury, as a candidate. The judge's campaign violations constitute prejudicial misconduct.

(8) Judges § 6.2—Discipline—Grounds—Prejudicial Misconduct—Bad Faith.—In the context of a judicial disciplinary matter, bad faith means a culpable mental state beyond mere negligence and consisting of either knowing or not caring that the conduct being undertaken is unjudicial and prejudicial to public esteem. In sum, to constitute prejudicial conduct, a judge's actions must bring the judicial office into disrepute, that is, the conduct would appear to an objective observer to be prejudicial to public esteem for the judicial office. The judge's campaign misconduct was unjudicial conduct committed in bad faith by a judge not then acting in a judicial capacity.

(9) Judges § 6—Discipline—Grounds—Willful Misconduct—Response to Disqualification.—When the judge asked the prosecutor why he was challenging her from a case, she violated Cal. Code Jud. Ethics, canons 1 and 2A by failing to maintain the high standard of conduct required by a judge, and acted without integrity. All three elements of willful misconduct within the meaning of Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (d) are met. The judge's conduct was (1) unjudicial and (2) committed in her judicial capacity, and (3) she committed an act she knew was beyond her lawful power and thus acted in bad faith.

(10) Judges § 6.3—Discipline—Prior Proceedings—Admissibility.—There is no prohibition in the Constitution, statute or any Supreme Court case against a private sanction becoming public. Furthermore, Rules of Com. on Jud. Performance, rule 125(b), by expressly making prior discipline admissible in formal proceedings, gives advance notice of the possibility of such an occurrence. The consideration by the Commission on Judicial Performance of prior private discipline also is consistent with the established policy and practice of escalating discipline for successive misconduct. When the commission relies on prior private discipline, it is important that the commission explain that its disciplinary decision is informed or influenced by the fact the judge has committed other misconduct, and its nature.

(11) Judges § 6.2—Discipline—Grounds—Prior Proceedings.—Prior discipline is relevant to a judicial disciplinary determination, irrespective of when the underlying misconduct occurred. Rules of Com. on Jud. Performance, rule 125(b), defines prior discipline as any disciplinary action that is in effect before the conclusion of a commission proceeding, including review by the California Supreme Court. The determining consideration is not when the other misconduct occurred, but rather, that it resulted in discipline that had taken effect before the conclusion of the current proceeding. Rule 125(b) further provides that prior discipline is admissible to determine what action should be taken regarding discipline. That a judge committed misconduct subsequent to the events underlying formal proceedings is a highly relevant factor in determining the appropriate discipline to impose. That the judge committed misconduct when she knew she was under investigation by the commission, a time when one would expect her to be on her very best behavior, is highly relevant to the decision concerning the appropriate level of discipline.

(12) Judges § 6.2—Discipline—Grounds—Violation of Campaign Finance Laws—Deceit—Removal from Office.—A judge who engages in materially deceitful and lawless conduct that undermines the electoral process, and thereafter attempts to explain it away with specious arguments and misleading testimony, should not continue in judicial office. Her misconduct is fundamentally at odds with the core qualities and role of a judge in our society.

(13) Judges § 6.2—Discipline—Dishonesty.—Honesty is a minimum qualification for every judge. If the essential quality of veracity is lacking, other positive qualities of the person cannot redeem or compensate for the missing fundamental. The deception practiced by the judge during her reelection campaign, as well as her specious arguments before the special masters and the commission are equally antithetical to, and inherently incompatible with, her duties to uphold the law and the search for truth.

(14) Judges § 6—Discipline—Determining Appropriate Sanction—Mitigation—Character Evidence.—Testimony that the judge was a beloved, loyal and respected friend, a mentor and role model, and positive testimony about the judge's integrity, honesty, demeanor and impartiality were taken into account by the commission in considering the totality of the circumstances. However, the testimony could not mitigate or excuse willful or prejudicial misconduct.

(15) Judges § 6—Discipline—Determining Appropriate Sanction—Removal from Office.—The judge's election fraud overwhelmed other considerations and compelled removal of her from office. She engaged in deceit and misrepresentation to keep her position as a judge. She also dissembled before the masters and the commission with excuses to minimize fault, thereby demonstrating a lack of acceptance of, and accountability for, her wrongdoing. She demonstrated extreme lack of judgment when she drove drunk. She questioned an attorney's disqualification of her, knowing the impropriety of doing so. Finally, her conduct during a hearing involving a high-profile celebrity demonstrated an alarming disrespect for the authority of the judge presiding over that case, the presiding judge of the court, and other court personnel. Her actions show the serious degree to which she is unable to control her behavior. That inability to exercise self-restraint is a convincing indicator of the strong likelihood that she will reoffend in the future. The commission's constitutional mandate to protect the public and the reputation of the judiciary does not allow its running that risk.

I. INTRODUCTION AND SUMMARY

This disciplinary matter concerns Judge Diana R. Hall, a judge of the Santa Barbara County Superior Court, whose current term began in 2002 after she won reelection in the contested election that is a subject of these proceedings. At the time of the election, the judge lived in a romantic relationship with Deidre Dykeman and did not want that fact generally known. Ms. Dykeman gave the judge $20,000 for the reelection campaign—approximately half of the total amount of contributions. Concerned that the contribution might raise questions about the relationship, the judge deposited the $20,000 into her own personal checking account to conceal its source. During the campaign, she signed four campaign disclosure statements under penalty of perjury listing herself as the source of the $20,000, knowing that to be false. She undermined the fair electoral process with her deceit and misrepresentations. At a minimum, there is an appearance Judge Hall holds her judicial office as the result of election fraud.

Judge Hall claims she violated campaign finance and disclosure laws inadvertently, as the result of not reading them. She further asserts she had a legitimate belief her partner's separate funds belonged to the two of them. We regard these attempts to minimize the wrongdoing as aggravating the underlying campaign violations.

Additionally, Judge Hall has two misdemeanor convictions by a jury for driving under the influence of alcohol (DUI). She also improperly questioned a prosecutor concerning his reasons for exercising an unqualified right to disqualify her in a judicial proceeding, knowing that doing so was improper.

We order Judge Hall removed from office because of the seriousness and breadth of her misconduct. Further, we issued a private admonishment against Judge Hall last year for conduct that shows an alarming disrespect for authority. The judge committed the misconduct underlying the private admonishment when she knew this commission was investigating her in connection with the current charges. She thereby also has shown an inability to control her behavior, demonstrating the strong likelihood she will continue to commit misconduct in the future.

The commission commenced this inquiry with the filing of its notice of formal proceedings (Notice) on July 25, 2005, setting forth the charges against Judge Hall in three counts. We discuss the charges beginning at page 152, post. The judge filed her amended answer (Answer) on October 26, 2005. At the request of the commission, the Supreme Court appointed three special masters to hear and take evidence and report to the commission under Rules of the Commission on Judicial Performance, rule 129. (All references to a rule are to the Rules of the Commission on Judicial Performance.) The three masters held a three-day hearing during November 2005.

Immediately following the conclusion of the November hearing, the commission received information that caused it to conclude that, at a minimum, the appearance of the fundamental fairness of the proceedings had been irreparably compromised. We immediately issued a stay, and on December 23, 2005, we petitioned the Supreme Court to appoint a successor panel of special masters to hear the matter de novo. (In re Judicial Disciplinary Proceeding Concerning Judge Diana R. Hall (Jan. 4, 2006, S139619).) The court granted the commission's petition on January 4, 2006 (ibid.), and appointed new special masters on February 9, 2006. At the request of Judge Hall, on February 6, 2006, the commission ordered all transcripts of proceedings before the original panel of masters sealed. We have not seen those transcripts.

The presiding special master appointed by the Supreme Court in 2006 is Hon. Dennis A. Cornell, Associate Justice of the Court of Appeal, Fifth Appellate District. The other two special masters are Hon. Tani G. Cantil-Sakauye, Associate Justice of the Court of Appeal, Third Appellate District; and Judge Desiree A. Bruce-Lyle, Judge of the San Diego County Superior Court. They held an evidentiary hearing in Ventura April 24 through 26, 2006, followed by oral argument in Sacramento on June 14, 2006. The masters' 51-page report to the commission, containing their detailed findings of fact and conclusions of law, was filed with the commission on July 26, 2006.

We base our decision to remove Judge Hall from office on the masters' factual findings and legal conclusions, with which we agree in their entirety and which we adopt as our own in all respects. They resolved numerous credibility issues and factual disputes. We adopt their determinations in all instances.

Judge Hall is represented by Attorney Rebecca D. Lizarraga of Studio City, California. The examiners for the commission are Commission Trial Counsel Andrew Blum and Commission Assistant Trial Counsel Valerie Marchant.

II. ANALYSIS OF THE CHARGES AND EVIDENCE

The charges against Judge Hall appear in the Notice in three separate counts, which we discuss separately. Count 1 involves the judge's misdemeanor drunk driving convictions, discussed at pages 152–153, post. Count 2 relates to campaign finance and disclosure violations (pp. 154–165, post), and count 3 concerns the judge's improper questioning of a prosecutor as to why he was exercising a statutory right to assert a peremptory challenge against her (pp. 165–167, post).

The commission, through its examiner, has the burden of proving the charges against Judge Hall by clear and convincing evidence. (Doan v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1995) 11 Cal.4th 294, 313 [45 Cal.Rptr.2d 254, 902 P.2d 272] (Doan); Geiler v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications (1973) 10 Cal.3d 270, 275 [110 Cal.Rptr. 201, 515 P.2d 1].) " '[C]lear and convincing' evidence [is] ' " 'so clear as to leave no substantial doubt'; 'sufficiently strong to command the unhesitating assent of every reasonable mind.' " ' " (Broadman v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1998) 18 Cal.4th 1079, 1090 [77 Cal.Rptr.2d 408, 959 P.2d 715] (Broadman).) "Evidence of a charge is clear and convincing so long as there is a 'high probability' that the charge is true. [Citations.] The evidence need not establish the fact beyond a reasonable doubt." (Ibid.)

A. COUNT 1—FINDINGS OF FACT

Judge Hall admitted in her verified Answer, during her testimony, and in written stipulations, the charges in count 1 concerning her drunk driving. Based thereon, the masters and we find the judge committed the DUI violations. Paraphrasing the masters' findings, the pertinent details follow.

On December 21, 2002, in Santa Ynez, California, Judge Hall committed the misdemeanor offenses of driving under the influence of alcohol in violation of Vehicle Code section 23152, subdivision (a), and of driving while having a blood-alcohol level of 0.08 percent or higher in violation of section 23152, subdivision (b). A jury convicted her of the two DUI offenses and acquitted her of other charges the district attorney brought against her as part of the same proceedings.

In December 2002, Judge Hall was in a romantic relationship with Deidre Dykeman. The two had met in 1998 and had bought a house together in 1999 in which they both resided on December 21, 2002. They owned the property as tenants in common. They were not registered domestic partners under California law.

On December 21, the judge had a beer with lunch, and wine during the afternoon. She and Ms. Dykeman had an argument. Judge Hall left the house in her car after Ms. Dykeman called 911 to complain of domestic violence by the judge. The judge intended to drive to her office to phone someone.

While driving, Judge Hall saw a patrol car traveling at a high speed. She stopped; the officer turned on his lights and stopped behind her. A second patrol vehicle arrived. The judge was placed under arrest; her blood-alcohol level was 0.18 percent, or more than twice the legal limit.

The judge's counsel notified the district attorney of the judge's willingness to plead guilty to DUI charges. The judge changed her mind, however, when the district attorney filed additional charges against her, including a felony that carried a mandatory state prison sentence upon conviction. She went to trial on all the charges; the jury acquitted her of all charges, except for the two DUI misdemeanors which she admitted at trial and of which she was convicted.

Judge Hall testified she has ceased drinking alcohol since November 2005. In her Answer, the judge expressed deep remorse for driving while intoxicated. She also states she regrets that her impaired judgment led her to drive while under the influence of alcohol.

B. COUNT 1—CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Violations of the Code of Judicial Ethics

(1) Count 1 charges Judge Hall with violating California Code of Judicial Ethics canon 1 (all references to a canon are to the California Code of Judicial Ethics), which requires a judge to uphold and preserve the integrity of the judiciary and to do so by maintaining high standards of personal conduct. (2) We adopt the following conclusions of the masters that Judge Hall violated this canon as well as canon 2A, which requires a judge to respect and comply with the law and to act at all times in a manner that promotes public confidence in the integrity and impartiality of the judiciary: "By driving a car when impaired by alcohol with a blood-alcohol level of more than two times the legal limit, Hall failed to observe high standards of conduct. Her conduct exhibited a complete lack of concern for the safety of others, an inability to control her impulses and poor judgment, thereby seriously injuring the integrity of the judiciary in the eyes of the public. This same conduct reflects her lack of respect for and compliance with the law in violation of canon 2A."

2. Prejudicial Misconduct

(3) The masters and we conclude the DUI violations and convictions constitute prejudicial misconduct within the meaning of article VI, section 18, subdivision (d) of the California Constitution. The Supreme Court has defined this category of misconduct by a judge as arising out of conduct which is not done in bad faith, " ' "but which nevertheless would appear to an objective observer to be not only unjudicial conduct but conduct prejudicial to public esteem for the judicial office" . . . .' " (Broadman, supra, 18 Cal.4th at p. 1092, citing Doan, supra, 11 Cal.4th at p. 312.) We adopt the masters' apt summation of why drunk driving by a judge fits within this definition: "The offenses, driving under the influence of alcohol and driving with a blood-alcohol level above 0.08 percent are high profile, heavily legislated crimes. This is so because these types of crimes, while having the potential for serious and fatal injuries to the innocent public on the roadways, are preventable and yet not uncommon. When an elected official, especially a judge, is arrested for DUI, the arrest can often inflame the emotions of a community and often makes front page news. Thus, when a judge is arrested and convicted for DUI, it is prejudicial to public esteem for the judicial office."

C. COUNT 2—FINDINGS OF FACT

Count 2 charges Judge Hall with election law violations, including that she illegally commingled campaign and personal funds, and filed four sworn false campaign finance statements, thereby engaging in improper political activity. We summarize the facts, again paraphrasing the masters. As we discuss, the judge disputes key facts and their significance.

1. Ms. Dykeman's $20,000 Contribution to Judge Hall's Reelection Campaign

In the fall of 2001, Judge Hall learned she would have a challenger in her bid for reelection to the bench in March 2002. She formed a reelection committee consisting of herself and an acquaintance as treasurer. She also retained an election consultant.

The judge had no experience in fundraising or running a campaign, and she loathed asking people for money. She did not want to accept contributions either from friends or from anyone else, including attorneys appearing before her, who might believe they would gain influence or advantage in her court.

In the fall of 2001, Judge Hall was given, and signed a receipt for, a copy of the Fair Political Practices Commission (FPPC) "Manual A" containing election information for candidates, including judges, and their campaign committees. The judge "went through" the manual, but did not "review" the portion of it outlining the duties of officeholders, candidates and campaign treasurers, prior to giving the pamphlet to her campaign treasurer. She did not review the Government Code sections applicable to campaigns. The judge testified, though, that at the time of her campaign, she knew she was required to disclose campaign contributions. She also knew then that the filing of various campaign statements required her signature and verification.

In early 2002, Judge Hall believed her campaign needed more money. She discussed with Ms. Dykeman the amount of money needed and the options for sources of funds. The two women then lived together in a romantic relationship, although only family members and a few of the judge's close friends knew that fact. Ms. Dykeman wanted to help with the campaign, but the judge discouraged it because she did not want members of the public to know of the relationship. The judge and Ms. Dykeman discussed holding a fundraiser at their home, but the judge did not want to do that, again because of her desire to keep the relationship confidential. They also discussed borrowing against the equity value of their house. Ms. Dykeman opposed that option. There was conflicting testimony whether the judge's sister was in a position to loan the judge money for the campaign.

Ms. Dykeman proposed using money from her personal mutual fund investment accounts to build up the judge's campaign coffers. Ms. Dykeman had the investment accounts before she met the judge, and the judge had not contributed any money to them. Ms. Dykeman testified the two of them discussed using funds from her investment accounts for the campaign and that she would go online and transfer the funds on an expedited basis. Judge Hall denied any such discussion. The masters accepted Ms. Dykeman's testimony on this point because they found it credible. We adopt their credibility assessment and finding because both appear reasonable and correct.

Ms. Dykeman withdrew approximately $20,000 from several of her investment accounts and wire-transferred them to her personal checking account. She promptly wrote a $20,000 check, dated February 3, 2002, drawn on that same account, payable to "Diana Hall" for the reelection campaign. Ms. Dykeman testified she asked the judge to whom she should write the check and the judge said to write it to her and she (the judge) would take care of it. The judge denied this conversation, but the masters and we adopt Ms. Dykeman's version—primarily because, as the masters found, Ms. Dykeman was credible and without any motive to fabricate this portion of her testimony. Additionally, the masters found Ms. Dykeman's inquiry concerning the payee comports with common experience of asking the recipient of a check to whom it should be made payable. We agree, particularly under the rather unusual circumstances present here, that the person writing such a check likely would ask to whom it should be made payable.

It is undisputed that when Ms. Dykeman gave her check to the judge, the two of them did not discuss whether the funds were to be repaid or otherwise reallocated between them. Ms. Dykeman testified that when she wrote the check and gave it to the judge, she did not expect the judge to return the $20,000, but there was no discussion whether it was a gift or a loan. From Ms. Dykeman's perspective at the time, she wanted the judge to be happy and she considered her $20,000 to be an investment in their happiness and future. She did not expect the judge to return the money, in part because their relationship was fine at the time.

Judge Hall admits she never advised Ms. Dykeman that Ms. Dykeman might be required to file a campaign report under Government Code section 84105 because of the check. (All code section citations are to the Government Code unless otherwise indicated. All of the subject Government Code sections are part of the Political Reform Act of 1974 (§ 81000 et seq.; the Act).)

On February 12, 2002, Judge Hall wrote a check for $25,000 to her campaign from her personal checking account, to which she had deposited Ms. Dykeman's $20,000 check. The source of funds for the judge's check was Ms. Dykeman's $20,000 and an additional $5,000 of the judge's own money. The judge testified she was not aware at the time that the Act prohibited such commingling of funds. She gave her check to her campaign treasurer, who deposited it into the campaign account. She did not tell the treasurer that $20,000 of the funds came from Ms. Dykeman.

2. The Four Campaign Statements

(4) During the reelection campaign, on four separate occasions Judge Hall signed an FPPC Form 460 campaign report with attached schedules, including a monetary contributions received schedule and a campaign disclosure statement. (The masters and we refer to the 460 forms as "the campaign statements.") Campaign statements, such as those signed by Judge Hall, are mandated by the Act (§§ 84200–84216.5) and require disclosure of detailed information about receipts and disbursements of money by a campaign committee. They are the primary means of providing transparency in connection with election finances; they directly implement one of the primary purposes of the Act—to ensure that "[r]eceipts and expenditures in election campaigns . . . be fully and truthfully disclosed in order that the voters may be fully informed and improper practices may be inhibited." (§ 81002, subd. (a).)

The four campaign statements Judge Hall signed cover the period January 20 through October 26, 2002. They consist of a preelection statement, an amended preelection statement, a semiannual statement and a termination statement. The judge signed all four statements under penalty of perjury, verifying pursuant to the preprinted text on each form, that she had "used all reasonable diligence in preparing and reviewing" each statement, and attesting to "the best of [her] knowledge" that the information on the forms and attached schedules is "true and complete."

In contrast to the verification on each of the campaign statements, Judge Hall testified concerning the first one, the preelection statement, that she did not "review it to see that all the contributors were listed there." There is no testimony concerning whether or the extent to which she reviewed the second, or amended preelection, statement. As to the third, the semiannual statement, she testified she did not read it before signing the verification. The judge "glanced over" but "did not read" the fourth, the termination statement. "There is no mention in any of Hall's campaign statements that Dykeman contributed to Hall's campaign. Hall did not list Dykeman's $20,000 contribution as coming from Dykeman. [Citation.] In all of her campaign statements, under penalty of perjury, Hall listed herself as the sole source of the $25,000 knowing that Dykeman contributed $20,000 of the $25,000 from [Dykeman's] own funds. [Citations.]"

The judge testified that when she filed her campaign statements, she did not know the Act required her to report the $20,000 from Ms. Dykeman as either a contribution or a loan.

After the election, Judge Hall learned there was campaign money left over, which she returned to Ms. Dykeman, even though Ms. Dykeman did not believe that was the preferable disposition of the unused funds. In addition to returning those excess campaign funds, the judge began the process of repaying Ms. Dykeman the balance of the $20,000 by paying the entire mortgage installment payment for several months and paying for substantial home improvements and other items. Ms. Dykeman testified she felt the judge repaid the $20,000 contribution in full.

Judge Hall testified that Ms. Dykeman's $20,000 constituted roughly half of the total combined contributions to her campaign. She admits she did not report Ms. Dykeman's $20,000 on any campaign statement—as either a loan or a contribution—even after she began repaying the money. We discuss her explanations for these repeated nondisclosures next.

3. Judge's Explanation for Nondisclosure of Ms. Dykeman's $20,000

Judge Hall did not want it known that Ms. Dykeman contributed to the judge's campaign. The judge testified that her relationship with Ms. Dykeman was her first same-sex relationship. In the judge's view, disclosure of the relationship would have made her job very difficult in the conservative area in which she was running for reelection. She also testified she told Ms. Dykeman that although as a judge she was a public official, their relationship would need to remain nonpublic.

In response to questioning by the examiner whether the judge was concerned about the relationship becoming known if Ms. Dykeman's name appeared on her campaign statements, Judge Hall testified, "the honest answer is I never really thought about it." However, in earlier testimony under oath in her drunk driving trial, the judge testified she claimed the money as her own because she did not want people to know Ms. Dykeman had given her money and did not want Ms. Dykeman's name on reporting records. She admitted before the masters she was telling the truth in that DUI trial testimony.

The masters' reaction to the foregoing, with which we concur, was the following strong rejection of the judge's claim: "Based on this evidence, we find Hall intentionally evaded the reporting requirements. We reject Hall's 'honest answer that she never really thought about it' and her feigned ignorance of the reporting requirement."

The judge also testified she considered Ms. Dykeman's $20,000 to be jointly owned. Allegedly, she therefore believed she did not need to disclose the source of those funds. She testified she considered the $20,000 "our money" because of a combination of factors, including the intimate relationship, the partners' co-ownership of the house in which they lived, and their practice of sharing household expenses. The judge's claim is irreconcilable with Ms. Dykeman's testimony that she, Dykeman, had wanted to merge finances, but the judge refused. Ms. Dykeman testified the judge said, "her money was her money, and my money was my money; and she wanted us to keep our financial documents separate."

Further, all the evidence clearly showed the two partners divided expenses and regularly made certain on an ongoing basis their respective contributions to the household were roughly equal. "Together, they lived in a romantic partnership, maintaining their separate accounts, sharing expenses by equalizing costs of the mortgage, property taxes, home improvements, groceries and entertainment. [Citations.]" As the masters summarized the issue, "based on the history and financial practices of the relationship, we find no basis in fact or law for Hall's position that the $20,000 was 'our money.' " We concur.

4. Violations of the Political Reform Act

In her Answer, Judge Hall admits violating the Act in that she did not comply with the terms of sections 84105 and 84211, subdivisions (f), (g). She also admits that under section 84216, subdivision (b)(3), reporting of Ms. Dykeman's $20,000 was required under section 84211, subdivision (g). In summary terms, section 84105 requires a candidate or committee receiving contributions of $5,000 or more from any person to inform the person he or she may be required to file campaign reports. Section 84211, subdivision (f) specifies details regarding reporting of cumulative contributions, including loans of $100 or more; section 84211, subdivision (g) specifies the reporting details in the case of cumulative amounts of loans of $100 or more. Under section 84216, subdivision (b)(3), certain loans must be reported at the time of receipt if the money is used for political purposes.

Additionally, the judge admits commingling the funds from Ms. Dykeman's investment funds with her own funds in her own personal checking account, and then writing her own $25,000 check consisting of funds from the two different sources. Section 84307 prohibits such commingling.

Although Judge Hall admits the foregoing violations of the Act, she claims she did not willfully violate the law because she was ignorant of its requirements at the time of the violations. The masters, and we, reject the judge's claim. "Simply put, Hall is attempting to diminish the severity of her actions by using her self-imposed ignorance to defeat a knowledge requirement. She fails."

We also agree with the masters, for the reasons they and we explain, that Judge Hall intentionally failed to report Ms. Dykeman as a contributor. Most importantly, she admitted as much under cross-examination under oath in her DUI trial. The judge admitted before the masters she was telling the truth in her earlier testimony, which was as follows: "[Prosecutor]: And, I mean, you even went to the extent that when [Ms. Dykeman] gave you this $20,000 for your campaign, that you actually claimed it as your own money, didn't you, because you didn't want to report Ms. Dykeman's name on the reporting records? You didn't want people to know that Ms. Dykeman had given you any money; isn't that right?

"[Judge Hall]: That's correct."

Second, clear and convincing circumstantial evidence supports the finding of the judge's intentional nondisclosure of Ms. Dykeman's $20,000 contribution. As described by the masters, the combination of the following five considerations leads inexorably to such finding.

(1) The judge admitted she knew she had a duty to disclose campaign contributions. In fact, her campaign statements list many contributors.

(2) The judge did not want to include Ms. Dykeman's name in the reporting because of concern that the largely secret relationship would not remain confidential.

(3) The judge feared that if her relationship became known, the knowledge would negatively affect her reelection.

(4) The judge in fact did not disclose Ms. Dykeman's name.

(5) The judge accomplished her goal of hiding Ms. Dykeman's identity by orchestrating the transfer of funds in a manner to camouflage the source. The judge told Ms. Dykeman to write the check to her personally; she then put the money in her own personal account, and did not tell her treasurer that 80 percent of her $25,000 personal check was Ms. Dykeman's money. There is no evidence the judge directed anyone else to write a check to her personally, or that she ran any other check for the campaign through her personal checking account en route to the campaign account.

The masters rejected Judge Hall's assertion that her close relationship with Ms. Dykeman justified the nondisclosure of her partner's contribution. We also reject the claim. The two women were not registered domestic partners. Furthermore, they in fact kept their finances strictly separate, constantly ensuring roughly equal sharing of joint costs and disbursements, at the judge's insistence. The judge's claim that her relationship with Ms. Dykeman cloaked Ms. Dykeman's $20,000 with a special status, somehow insulating it from disclosure requirements, is evidence of a "further irresponsible ignorance of the law," rendering the defense "specious at best," according to the masters. We agree.

5. Stipulated Dismissal of Charges of Additional Violations of Political Reform Act

The charges against Judge Hall include that she also violated sections 84301, 84302, 87207, subdivision (a)(5) and 87461, subdivision (a), all of which are part of the Act. The examiner stipulates there were no violations of these provisions, and we now dismiss those charges both because the stipulation is well founded and because there is no evidence Judge Hall violated any of these sections.

Section 84301 states that no person may contribute to a campaign other than in the contributor's legal name. This section appears to be directed at the person who contributes the money. Ms. Dykeman was the source of the $20,000. By listing herself as the contributor, the judge did not provide the correct legal name. However, the masters accepted the examiner's concession that this section is inapplicable, and we do the same. To the extent the section may apply to these facts, it does so only in a technical, tangential way. The violations of the sections discussed previously in part 2.A.4. (beginning at p. 159, ante) more appropriately apply to the gravamen of the wrongdoing that occurred. This charge is dismissed.

Section 84302 prohibits a person from contributing as an agent or on behalf of another person without making specified identifying information. There is no evidence of any violation of this section. This charge is dismissed.

Under section 87207, subdivision (a)(5), certain information must be provided concerning campaign income, including in the case of a loan, the annual interest rate, any security, and the terms of the loan. As the masters note, there is no evidence Ms. Dykeman loaned the $20,000 to the judge. Ms. Dykeman testified that when she gave the money to the judge, she had no expectation of seeing the money again. She was surprised when the campaign ended with a surplus and argued in favor of doing something other than returning the excess funds to her. The contribution did not originate as a loan and there is no evidence there ever were any loan negotiations. There is no evidence of a violation of section 87207, subdivision (a)(5). This charge is dismissed.

Section 87461, subdivision (a) prohibits any specified elected government official from receiving a personal loan of $500 or more, absent a written lending agreement subject to certain requirements. Again, there is no evidence that when Ms. Dykeman gave the judge $20,000 she intended it to be a loan. That the judge later voluntarily decided to repay the $20,000 does not change the fact that when given, it was a contribution, not a loan. This code section thus is inapplicable and this charge is dismissed.

6. False Sworn Declarations

Count 2 charges Judge Hall signed each of the four campaign statements under penalty of perjury knowing they were false because they incorrectly list the judge as the source of the $20,000. The judge testified she signed all four campaign statements under penalty of perjury and they all bear her signature. All four statements falsely identify the judge as the sole source of the $25,000 represented by her personal check to her campaign when she knew $20,000 of that amount came from Ms. Dykeman.

The judge admits she did not disclose Ms. Dykeman as a campaign contributor and admits she did not disclose Ms. Dykeman as the source of the $20,000. As a result, the masters found that Judge Hall signed all four campaign statements under penalty of perjury knowing each of them contained false information. We agree. The judge's nondisclosure of Ms. Dykeman as the true source, and the concomitant false representation of the judge as the source, are highly material because her misconduct subverts a core purpose of the Act—that "the voters may be fully informed and improper practices may be inhibited." (Gov. Code, § 81002, subd. (a).)

D. COUNT 2—CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Violations of the Code of Judicial Ethics

Judge Hall violated five sections of the Act; she commingled funds, intentionally concealed Ms. Dykeman as the source of nearly half of all of her campaign contributions, and signed four declarations under penalty of perjury knowing they were false. The charges against her are that this behavior constitutes inappropriate political activity in violation of canons 1, 2A and 5. We have noted the dictates of canons 1 and 2A on pages 153–154, ante. Canon 5 requires judges to refrain from inappropriate political activity. The masters and we conclude the judge violated each of those canons. Their summary statement, which we adopt, is as follows: "[W]e conclude that all three canons are violated when an incumbent judge running in a contested election violates the applicable law, and then attempts to excuse her conduct by claiming ignorance of the applicable law. This is a strict standard of liability."

(5) Judge Hall violated canon 1 by failing to maintain a high standard of conduct when she failed to read the law governing her reelection and then violated it. She also violated the provision of canon 2A requiring judges to promote public confidence in the judiciary. Public confidence in the judiciary is seriously impacted when the public learns a judge, one who is entrusted to apply the rule of law, does not read, and therefore does not abide by, the law. The public can have no confidence in a judge, and hence a judiciary, that is required to know and respect the law but does neither.

(6) The judge also violated the directive of canon 5 that a judge refrain from inappropriate political activity. The masters stated, "we can think of no greater inappropriate political activity than an incumbent judge ignoring then violating the law applicable to a judicial campaign." We agree. Any candidate for judicial office must know and strictly adhere to all applicable election laws; utmost integrity is required of every candidate for judicial office.

As the masters noted, there is strict liability for violations of the Political Reform Act. One may violate the reporting requirements of the Act through negligence or inadvertence, exposing the candidate to administrative penalties or civil liability. (§§ 83116.5, 91004.) The FPPC takes into consideration whether the violation was "deliberate, negligent or inadvertent," in determining the appropriate penalty. (Cal. Code Regs., tit. 2, § 18361.5, subd. (d)(3).)

It is a misdemeanor for a person to violate the Act knowingly or willfully. (§ 91000, subd. (a).) Criminal charges were brought against Judge Hall for these violations. She entered into a diversion agreement with the prosecutor under which the criminal charges were suspended pending resolution of these commission proceedings. The agreement provides that upon resolution of this matter, the prosecutor will dismiss the criminal case provided the judge has no intervening criminal conviction and commits no interim campaign violations.

The FPPC has primary responsibility for enforcing the Act, including as to candidates for judicial office. That agency may consider it mitigating when a candidate violates the Act through inadvertence due to lack of familiarity with the intricacies of the law. However, because of the additional constraints imposed by the canons on a candidate for judicial office, we consider a claim by a judicial candidate of "ignorance of the law" as a defense to a wide-ranging violation of the law, such as here, to aggravate the violation itself. It is axiomatic that candidates for judicial office are obligated to know the requirements of the law and to conduct their election campaigns in strict accordance with it.

2. Prejudicial Misconduct

We are not aware of any California case that directly considers the issue of whether an incumbent judge running for reelection is acting in a judicial capacity while campaigning. However, the Pennsylvania Supreme Court has considered the issue. It held that a judge's signing false campaign statements did not constitute misconduct in office because the judge did not execute the reports in the course of official duties, that is, as part of "the judicial decision-making process." (In re Cicchetti (2000) 560 Pa. 183 [743 A.2d 431, 438–441].) This highly analogous holding persuades us Judge Hall was not acting in a "judicial capacity" when she committed the violations at issue. The labeling of the misconduct does not diminish its seriousness or affect the level of appropriate discipline.

(8) Judge Hall's campaign misconduct is prejudicial misconduct within the meaning of the California Constitution. As concluded by the masters, it is "unjudicial conduct committed in bad faith by a judge not then acting in a judicial capacity." (Citing Broadman, supra, 18 Cal.4th at pp. 1092–1093 and Doan, supra, 11 Cal.4th at p. 312.) "In this context, bad faith means a culpable mental state beyond mere negligence and consisting of either knowing or not caring that the conduct being undertaken is unjudicial and prejudicial to public esteem. In sum, to constitute prejudicial conduct, a judge's actions must bring 'the judicial office into disrepute,' that is, the conduct would appear to an objective observer to be prejudicial to ' "public esteem for the judicial office." ' [Citation.]" (Broadman, supra, 18 Cal.4th at p. 1093.)

In our previous explanation that Judge Hall's campaign violations also violated the canons of judicial ethics (pp. 162–163, ante), we concurred in the masters' conclusions that the judge has brought the judiciary into disrepute and that her conduct is prejudicial to public esteem for the judiciary. The masters also concluded that Judge Hall's irresponsible failure as a judge running for election to read the applicable campaign laws "goes beyond mere negligence" within the meaning of Broadman. We agree. We conclude, as did the masters, based on the quoted legal standards, that Judge Hall committed prejudicial misconduct when she violated the Act as described here, including when she swore to the accuracy of the four campaign statements she knew were false.

E. COUNT 3—FINDINGS OF FACT

Count 3 charges that Judge Hall asked Deputy District Attorney (DDA) Kevin Duffy to explain why he had filed a peremptory challenge against her under Code of Civil Procedure section 170.6 (170.6), and threatened to report him to the district attorney. The charges assert such behavior violated canons 1 and 2A. As we discuss, there is not clear and convincing evidence Judge Hall threatened to report Mr. Duffy to his ultimate supervisor, the district attorney, and that portion of the charge is dismissed.

When a 170.6 challenge is properly and timely filed, a judge must accept the disqualification without inquiry. (McCartney v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications (1974) 12 Cal.3d 512, 531–532 [116 Cal.Rptr. 260, 526 P.2d 268].) Judge Hall does not dispute the validity of DDA Duffy's 170.6.

The judge admits she knew she could not question Duffy's challenge of her, and she consistently and absolutely denies she did so. However, Duffy and his opposing counsel on the case in question, Deputy Public Defender (DPD) Mary Johnston, both testified Judge Hall did question Duffy. The masters resolved this fact dispute against the judge. Their determination rests on an assessment of the credibility of the various witnesses whom they observed and heard. There is no evidentiary basis or other reason for us to second-guess their evaluation of the situation, and we adopt their finding that Judge Hall did ask Duffy why he was challenging her.

When the commission filed its charges against Judge Hall, it provided discovery to her that included a copy of a memo Duffy wrote, dated June 25, 2001, in which, among other topics, he described the 170.6 incident he asserts occurred earlier that day in a case named People v. Hernandez. Upon receipt of that discovery document, the judge located Duffy's 170.6 declaration in the Hernandez file and obtained the transcript of the Hernandez case and of her entire morning calendar for June 25, 2001. She testified she reviewed the transcript several times, which refreshed her recollection of the 170.6. She recalled the Hernandez hearing.

The transcript of June 25, 2001, shows the Hernandez case was one of numerous matters on Judge Hall's morning calendar. The attorneys and the judge discussed scheduling issues in Hernandez. For some reason, the 170.6 that Duffy filed on June 22 was not in the file; he still had the original document on June 25. Duffy advised the judge of the 170.6, whereupon she reassigned the case to a different judge.

Duffy testified Judge Hall heard other cases after Hernandez, and then, during a lull called him to the bench to discuss the 170.6. He asserts the judge said during the ensuing sidebar conversation that she knew she was not supposed to ask him why he had challenged her, but she wanted to know "why did you do this?" He also claims Judge Hall said she was going to report him through the presiding judge to his ultimate supervisor, Santa Barbara County District Attorney Thomas Sneddon, and that Duffy would be in Sneddon's office to explain himself. Finally, Duffy testified the judge threatened to have domestic violence cases reassigned to a judge whom prosecutors frequently disqualified, which Duffy interpreted as a threat. His observation was that Judge Hall appeared quite angry, although she spoke quietly.

Duffy testified defense counsel frequently challenged Judge Hall while the prosecutor rarely did so. Judge Hall's counsel agreed with Duffy on these points in her opening brief to the commission pursuant to rule 130(a). Duffy was surprised and shocked Judge Hall called him to the bench because he had never seen her question a defense lawyer who challenged her. He reported the incident widely in his office, including to his immediate supervisor, Christy Stanley Schultze. Ms. Schultze told Duffy to write up the incident so she could alert District Attorney Sneddon, in case Judge Hall or the presiding judge called Sneddon.

Duffy testified he wrote down his 170.6 experience in a memo on the same day it happened, June 25, 2001; his recollection was he sent the memo as an attachment to an email to Ms. Schultze. The memo contained information on the Hernandez matter, other cases Duffy had prosecuted before Judge Hall, and his personal opinions of Judge Hall.

Judge Hall testified to having very different recollections of all of the subject matters in Duffy's memo. The judge's counsel vigorously cross-examined Duffy about many of the assertions in his memo and succeeded in our view in impeaching him on many of the collateral matters in that document. Further, the masters found the judge refuted Duffy's opinions of any prejudices she allegedly holds against victims of domestic violence. Based on our reading of the transcript of the hearing before the masters, we agree with this latter point and adopt the masters' finding concerning it.

DPD Mary Johnston was Duffy's opposing counsel on the Hernandez matter and was in court with him before Judge Hall on June 25, 2001. She does not remember many of the details of what happened in connection with a 170.6 incident between the judge and Duffy. She testified clearly, however, that she remembered one occasion when Duffy motioned for her to accompany him to the bench after Judge Hall had summoned him to approach. At the sidebar, she heard the judge ask Duffy "why are you papering me?"—a colloquialism for a 170.6 challenge—or words to that effect. She did not want to be involved in the exchange between the prosecutor and the judge, and backed away from the bench entirely.

Based solely on the testimony of DPD Johnston, the masters found that on June 25, 2001, Judge Hall did ask DDA Duffy why he had filed a 170.6 against her in the Hernandez case. They found a lack of clear and convincing evidence of the remainder of the charges of count 3. We agree in both respects.

F. COUNT 3—CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Violations of the Code of Judicial Ethics

(9) The masters concluded that when Judge Hall asked the prosecutor why he was challenging her in the Hernandez case, she again violated canons 1 and 2A. She failed to maintain the high standard of conduct required of a judge and acted without integrity. We agree.

2. Willful Misconduct

All three elements of willful misconduct within the meaning of article VI, section 18, subdivision (d) of the California Constitution are present. Judge Hall's conduct was (1) unjudicial and (2) committed in her judicial capacity, and (3) she committed an act she knew was beyond her lawful power and thus acted in bad faith. (See Broadman, supra, 18 Cal.4th at p. 1091.) The masters concluded there was willful misconduct under the Broadman standard, as do we.

G. PRIOR DISCIPLINE

1. Admissibility of Prior Private Admonishment

The masters overruled Judge Hall's objection and admitted into evidence the examiner's exhibit 29, a private admonishment this commission issued against Judge Hall in 2005. The masters did not consider the prior discipline; they admitted it in response to the examiner's assertion it was relevant to the commission's determination of the appropriate sanction.

The admissibility question is governed by rule 125(b), which provides as follows: "Any prior disciplinary action may be received in evidence to prove that conduct is persistent or habitual or to determine what action should be taken regarding discipline. Prior disciplinary action includes any disciplinary action which is in effect before the conclusion of a commission proceeding, including review by the Supreme Court." (Rule 125(b), italics added.)

The judge's two-fold argument against the admissibility of the admonishment was set forth in her "Objection to Admission of Examiner's Exhibit, No. 29" (Objection or Obj.). We discuss each point separately.

(10) Turning Private Discipline into Public: Judge Hall argued that admitting the admonishment "impermissibly and automatically" makes private discipline public. There is no prohibition in the Constitution, statute or any Supreme Court case against a private sanction becoming public. Furthermore, rule 125(b), by expressly making prior discipline admissible in formal proceedings, gives advance notice of the possibility of such an occurrence. The commission's consideration of prior private discipline also is consistent with the established policy and practice of escalating discipline for successive misconduct. When, as here, we rely on prior private discipline, it is important that we explain that our disciplinary decision is informed or influenced by the fact the judge has committed other misconduct, and its nature.

In Doan, supra, 11 Cal.4th at page 340, the Supreme Court referred to the judge's prior private admonishment in determining the appropriate level of discipline to be imposed. The commission also has considered prior private discipline in its public decisions in a number of recent inquiries. (E.g., Inquiry Concerning Ross (2005) No. 174, Decision and Order Removing Judge Ross from Office, p. 65 [49 Cal.4th CJP Supp. 79, 139] [advisory letter]; Inquiry Concerning Wasilenko (2005) No. 170, Decision and Order Imposing Censure and Bar, p. 33 [49 Cal.4th CJP Supp. 26, 58] [private admonishment]; Inquiry Concerning Hyde (2003) No. 166, Decision and Order Removing Judge Hyde From Office, pp. 16–20 [48 Cal.4th CJP Supp. 329, 352–356] [private admonishment and three advisory letters].)

(11) Allowing Subsequent Misconduct to Exacerbate the Effect of Earlier Wrongdoing: All of the misconduct that is the subject of the formal charges occurred in 2001 and 2002. The incident that is the subject of the private admonishment occurred later, in January 2004. Judge Hall objects that consideration of the subsequent conduct violates the letter and spirit of the commission's own rules and case law interpreting the rules. This latter assertion rests on Doan, where the Supreme Court noted that Judge Doan had failed to heed the warning that prior similar discipline represented. However, there is nothing in the court's opinion suggesting that consideration of prior discipline is limited to whether the judge heeded an earlier commission warning. Prior discipline is relevant to our disciplinary determination, irrespective of when the underlying misconduct occurred.

The express language of rule 125(b) defeats the judge's assertion the commission cannot consider prior discipline based on subsequent conduct. The rule defines prior discipline as "any disciplinary action which is in effect before the conclusion of a commission proceeding, including review by the Supreme Court." The determining consideration is not when the other misconduct occurred, but rather, that it resulted in discipline that had taken effect before the conclusion of the current proceeding.

Rule 125(b) further provides that prior discipline is admissible "to determine what action should be taken regarding discipline." That a judge committed misconduct subsequent to the events underlying formal proceedings is a highly relevant factor in determining the appropriate discipline to impose. Indeed, Judge Hall committed the misconduct underlying the admonishment when she knew she was under investigation by the commission. She has shown her inability to control her behavior at a time one would expect her to be on her very best behavior. This fact is highly relevant to our decision concerning the appropriate level of discipline, as we discuss at page 173, post.

Judge Hall accepted the admonishment, allowing it to go into effect by operation of law (see rule 114(a)), with knowledge there were other serious allegations then pending against her—that is, those that form the formal charges here. Rule 125(b) put her on notice that the private admonishment would be admissible in the formal proceedings that likely would, and did, ensue. The masters correctly applied rule 125(b) and admitted the prior admonishment. We consider it in connection with determining the appropriate sanction.

2. Facts Underlying Admonishment

The following is a summary of the facts underlying the commission's 2005 private admonishment of Judge Hall, as set forth in the admonishment.

On or about January 16, 2004, Judge Hall spoke with Judge Rodney Melville in his chambers, requesting that she have a seat in his courtroom for the arraignment and argument on a "gag order" before Judge Melville that day in the high profile criminal case against Michael Jackson. All the seats in the courtroom had been assigned either to members of the press or the public. Judge Melville initially agreed Judge Hall could sit near the bench area where his clerk and research attorney had assigned seats, but later suggested she should sit in an overflow courtroom where she could watch the proceedings on closed circuit television. Judge Hall declined the latter suggestion.

In correspondence with the commission concerning the foregoing, Judge Hall stated she wanted to have District Attorney Thomas Sneddon "see me no worse off than before he had occasioned the wrath of his office to come down upon me following my irresponsible and unlawful act of driving under the influence of alcohol." (Underscoring in judge's correspondence.)

Judge Melville directed Judge Hall not to enter the main courtroom. In response to her reply that she would take a seat there, he said he would be required to call a bailiff if she disobeyed his order. In correspondence with the commission, Judge Hall admitted she defied Judge Melville's directive and that she told him to do whatever he deemed necessary.

Judge Hall entered Judge Melville's courtroom and took a seat assigned to the press. Assistant Court Administrator Darrel Parker came to the courtroom and asked Judge Hall to accompany him into chambers because Presiding Judge Clifford Anderson wished to speak with her on the telephone. She refused to do so without her attorney present, and refused to vacate her seat. A bailiff inquired if she was sitting in a seat assigned to her, to which she responded, "It is now." At Mr. Parker's suggestion, a chair was procured and placed in the back of the courtroom and Judge Hall was escorted to it.

III. APPROPRIATE SANCTION

1. Precedent

(12) This case requires that we decide whether a judge who engages in materially deceitful and lawless conduct that undermines the electoral process, and thereafter attempts to explain it away with specious arguments and misleading testimony, should continue in judicial office. Our decision is that she should not. We order Judge Hall removed from office. Her misconduct is fundamentally at odds with the core qualities and role of a judge in our society.

In 2001, we ordered Judge Patrick Couwenberg removed from office because of his dishonesty in connection with his seeking appointment to the bench. He provided materially false information concerning his educational, professional and military background to various persons, including Governor Wilson. We concluded that " 'Judge Couwenberg's falsehoods create the appearance that he obtained his judicial office by deceit.' " (Inquiry Concerning Couwenberg (2001) No. 158, Decision and Order Removing Judge Couwenberg from Office, p. 12 [48 Cal.4th CJP Supp. 205, 221].) At a minimum, Judge Hall's election-related nondisclosures and misrepresentations are of the same import and create a similar appearance; they also require the same result.

In Michigan Judicial Tenure Com. v. Ferrara (1998) 458 Mich. 350 [582 N.W.2d 817], the Michigan Supreme Court ordered Judge Ferrara removed solely for fraud and lying to the press, the master and the commission. The court did not even reach the question of whether there was evidence supporting the underlying charges of misconduct.

Similarly, in In re Collazo (1998) 91 N.Y.2d 251 [668 N.Y.S.2d 997, 691 N.E.2d 1021], New York's highest court ordered Judge Collazo removed based on his deceitful conduct during the investigation of the initial wrongdoing, noting that the original misconduct alone would not warrant removal. Commenting on the judge's "lack of candor" and upholding the New York commission's recommended removal, the Court of Appeals stated, "Particularly relevant here is our conviction that 'deception is antithetical to the role of a Judge who is sworn to uphold the law and seek the truth' [citations]." (668 N.Y.S.2d at p. 999.) The deception practiced by Judge Hall during her reelection campaign, as well as her specious arguments before the masters and us, are equally antithetical to, and inherently incompatible with, her duties to uphold the law and the search for truth.

The Florida Supreme Court removed a judge from office earlier this year for campaign misconduct very similar to that in which Judge Hall engaged. (Inquiry Concerning Renke (Fla. 2006) 933 So.2d 482.) The Florida Judicial

Qualifications Commission had recommended a public reprimand and $40,000 fine based on its findings that Judge Renke's father had made very substantial campaign contributions that the judge disguised as earned income from which he then made loans to his campaign fund. In addition to the election fraud itself, Judge Renke—similar to Judge Hall—dissembled before the commission, arguing that the payments from his father were his share of a settlement to which he was entitled. Judge Renke claimed it was mere coincidence that he received the money at a time he was in need of campaign funds. The court upheld the commission's rejection of this defense and removed the judge from office.[2]

In 2004, the judicial conduct board in Illinois removed a judge from office for false campaign statements, other election fraud and dissembling before the board when called to explain his conduct. (In re Golniewicz, Order (Ill. Cts. Com., Nov. 14, 2004).) Judge Golniewicz used his parents' address within the subcircuit in which he was running for judicial office, concealing his actual residence in the suburbs. He also sent out deceptive advertising to the voters, telling them he was their "neighbor" and a lifelong resident of the subcircuit. Additionally, the judge violated state residency laws by residing outside the subcircuit from which he was elected, and by maintaining his voter registration and voting within a subcircuit in which he did not live. He gave dishonest testimony and evasive answers before the conduct board. (The judge also exhibited improper demeanor in three cases over which he presided.)

In a case involving one false sworn affidavit, the South Carolina Supreme Court recently approved a stipulated one-year suspension of a judge from office without pay. (In re Augustus (2006) 367 S.C. 364 [626 S.E.2d 346].) Judge Augustus claimed on a notarized continuing education compliance report that he had attended all three days of a seminar when he only had attended one day. He repeated the same misrepresentation to disciplinary counsel. Subsequently, the judge amended his compliance report by making a pen and ink change to the number of hours reported, without having the amended report renotarized or the change initialed by the notary. He also filed an amended, true response with disciplinary counsel. We observe that in many instances, financial realities may cause the suspension of a judge without pay for a year to have the same practical effect as removal.

2. Aggravating, Mitigating, and Other Considerations

(14) In the masters' report, they list factors in aggravation and mitigation as part of their discussion of each separate count. To a considerable degree,

[2] Two justices dissented concerning the sanction; they would have accepted the Florida commission's recommendation, or remanded for the commission to consider a harsher penalty short of removal.

the listed factors derive from testimony given by numerous character witnesses the judge called to testify before the masters. These witnesses, from many walks of life, described the judge as a beloved, respected and loyal friend, a mentor and role model. Five experienced attorneys who have appeared before her testified positively about her integrity, honesty, demeanor and impartiality. We have taken this evidence " 'into account in considering the totality of the circumstances.' " (Broadman, supra, 18 Cal.4th at p. 1112, quoting Adams v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1995) 10 Cal.4th 866, 912 [42 Cal.Rptr.2d 606, 897 P.2d 544].) However, it does not mitigate or excuse willful or prejudicial misconduct. (Broadman, at p. 1112; accord, Kloepfer, supra, 49 Cal.3d at p. 865 [lack of honesty cannot be mitigated or excused by other positive characteristics].)

Several witnesses described Judge Hall as a hard-working, conscientious and well-prepared jurist. The masters generally viewed these asserted character traits as mitigating considerations. We view such attributes as descriptive of a good judge. To the extent Judge Hall is possessed of these traits, it makes more unbelievable her claim that she somehow failed to read and follow the law governing her campaign. The masters described that alleged failure as an "appalling lack of common sense" and something the judge never satisfactorily explained. They also found her claimed ignorance to be feigned. That she was fully aware of the campaign law is more consistent with the character witnesses' description of the judge as a jurist who was thoroughly versed in the law. Moreover, "a good reputation for legal knowledge and administrative skills," although relevant to discipline, does not mitigate willful or prejudicial misconduct. (Kloepfer, supra, 49 Cal.3d at p. 865.)

(15) The judge's election fraud overwhelms other considerations and compels our removal decision. Judge Hall engaged in deceit and misrepresentations to keep her position as a judge. She also has dissembled before the masters and us with excuses to minimize fault, thereby demonstrating a lack of acceptance of, and accountability for, her wrongdoing. She demonstrated extreme lack of judgment when she drove drunk. She questioned an attorney's disqualification of her, knowing the impropriety of doing so. Finally, her conduct during the Michael Jackson hearing last year demonstrates an alarming disrespect for the authority of the judge presiding over the case, the presiding judge of the Santa Barbara courts, and other court personnel. Her actions show the serious degree to which she is unable to control her behavior. That inability to exercise self-restraint, including when she knew she was under investigation by this commission, convinces us there is a strong likelihood she will reoffend in the future. We cannot run that risk and still fulfill our constitutional mandate to protect the public and the reputation of the judiciary.

IV. ORDER REMOVING JUDGE HALL FROM OFFICE

Pursuant to the provisions of article VI, section 18 of the California Constitution, Judge Diana R. Hall hereby is ordered removed from her judicial office; pursuant to that section of the Constitution and rules 120(a) and 136 of the Rules of the Commission on Judicial Performance, Judge Hall hereby is disqualified from acting as a judge.

Commission members Mr. Marshall B. Grossman, Judge Frederick P. Horn, Mr. Michael A. Kahn, Mrs. Crystal Lui, Justice Judith D. McConnell, Mr. Jose C. Miramontes, Mrs. Penny Perez, Judge Risë Jones Pichon, Ms. Barbara Schraeger and Mr. Lawrence Simi voted in favor of all the findings and conclusions expressed herein and in the foregoing order of removal and disqualification of Judge Hall. Commission member Patricia Miller did not participate in this matter.

INQUIRY CONCERNING JUDGE JOSÉ A. VELASQUEZ

SUMMARY

A disciplinary matter was brought concerning a superior court judge.

The Commission on Judicial Performance ordered the judge removed from office. The commission concluded that the judge engaged in an egregious pattern of misconduct that infringed the constitutional rights of numerous defendants and transgressed the limits of his authority, often in a capricious and malicious manner. The judge incarcerated several defendants without respect for their constitutional rights; he increased sentences and showed irritation when defendants asked him straightforward and respectful questions about their sentences; he interfered with defendants' exercise of the right to trial by jury and coerced defendants into diversion; he expressed his unhappiness with attorneys by not recalling bench warrants for the arrest of their clients and by making disparaging remarks regarding attorneys; and he used inappropriate humor about incarceration at the expense of persons whose constitutional rights he had sworn to uphold. These incidents were not isolated; rather, they reflected a disturbing and persistent pattern of conduct that was at odds with the standard of conduct expected of the judiciary. The judge had engaged in prior misconduct resulting in a censure. The breadth and seriousness of the judge's present and past misconduct compelled the commission to conclude that removal was required. (Opinion by Frederick P. Horn, Chairperson.)

HEADNOTES

(1) Judges § 6—Discipline—Removal from Office—Egregious Pattern of Misconduct.—A judge was ordered removed from office, where the judge, who had engaged in prior misconduct resulting in a censure, engaged in an egregious pattern of misconduct that infringed the constitutional rights of numerous defendants and transgressed the limits of his authority, often in a capricious and malicious manner. These incidents were not isolated; rather, they reflected a disturbing and persistent pattern of conduct that was completely at odds with the standard of conduct expected of the judiciary. The breadth and seriousness of the judge's present and past misconduct compelled the conclusion that removal was required.

(2) Judges § 6—Disciplinary Proceeding—Clear and Convincing Evidence.—The Commission on Judicial Performance has the burden of proving the charges against a judge by clear and convincing evidence. Evidence of a charge is clear and convincing so long as there is a high probability that the charge is true. The evidence need not establish the fact beyond a reasonable doubt.

(3) Judges § 6—Discipline—Willful Misconduct—Bad Faith—Judicial Capacity.—The most serious form of wrongdoing committed by a judge is willful misconduct, defined as (1) unjudicial conduct that is (2) committed in bad faith (3) by a judge acting in his or her judicial capacity.

(4) Judges § 6—Discipline—Unjudicial Misconduct—Code of Judicial Ethics.—Failure to comply with the California Code of Judicial Ethics is generally considered to constitute unjudicial conduct.

(5) Judges § 6—Discipline—Willful Misconduct—Bad Faith.—The bad faith requirement for willful misconduct is satisfied when a judge is (1) performing a judicial act for a corrupt purpose (which is any purpose other than the faithful discharge of judicial duties), or (2) performing a judicial act with knowledge that the act is beyond the judge's lawful judicial power, or (3) performing a judicial act that exceeds the judge's lawful power with a conscious disregard for the limits of the judge's authority. A judge who performs acts with no regard at all for whether they are legally permitted cannot be said to be acting with a purpose to faithfully discharge judicial duties. Thus, a judge's reckless or utter indifference to whether judicial acts being performed exceed the bounds of the judge's prescribed power is a state of mind properly characterized as bad faith.

(6) Judges § 6—Discipline—Willful Misconduct—Judicial Capacity.—The judicial capacity prong of the willfulness test has been defined as follows: A judge is acting in a judicial capacity while performing one of the functions, whether adjudicative or administrative in nature, that are associated with the position of a judge or when the judge uses or attempts to use the authority of the judicial office for an improper purpose.

(7) Judges § 6—Discipline—Prejudicial Conduct—Disrepute.—Prejudicial conduct by a judge is distinguishable from willful misconduct in that a judge's acts may constitute prejudicial conduct even if not committed in a judicial capacity, or, if committed in a judicial capacity, not committed in bad faith. Prejudicial conduct is either conduct which a judge undertakes in good faith but which nevertheless would appear to an objective observer to be not only unjudicial conduct but conduct prejudicial to public esteem for the judicial office or willful misconduct out of office, i.e., unjudicial conduct committed in bad faith by a judge not then acting in a judicial capacity. In this context, bad faith means a culpable mental state beyond mere negligence and consisting of either knowing or not caring that the conduct being undertaken is unjudicial and prejudicial to public esteem. In sum, to constitute prejudicial conduct, a judge's actions must bring the judicial office into disrepute, that is, the conduct would appear to an objective observer to be prejudicial to public esteem for the judicial office.

(8) Judges § 6—Discipline—Improper Action.—The least serious type of judicial misconduct is improper action. It consists of conduct that violates the California Code of Judicial Ethics, but that does not rise to the level of prejudicial misconduct. Improper conduct includes conduct that an objective observer aware of the circumstances would not deem to have an adverse effect on the reputation of the judiciary.

(9) Judges § 6—Discipline—Unjudicial Conduct—Violation of Defendants' Rights.—By conducting probation violation hearings and ordering immediate incarceration without affording the defendant notice that such a hearing would be taking place and the basis for the alleged violation, and without advising the defendant of his constitutional rights, including the right to counsel and to a formal hearing, the judge failed to comply with minimum due process requirements.

(10) Judges § 6—Discipline—Legal Error.—Legal error alone does not constitute judicial misconduct subject to discipline. However, a judge who commits legal error which, in addition, clearly and convincingly reflects bad faith, bias, abuse of authority, disregard for fundamental rights, intentional disregard for the law, or any purpose other than the faithful discharge of judicial duty is subject to sanctions.

(11) Judges § 6—Discipline—Legal Error—Exceptions—Disregard of Fundamental Legal Right.—The judge's actions in conducting probation violation hearings without notice and immediately incarcerating the defendants after the hearing went beyond mere legal error; they reflected disregard of the defendants' fundamental right to due process.

(12) Judges § 6—Discipline—Embroilment—Lack of Impartiality.—By becoming embroiled with defendants, the judge surrendered his role as an impartial jurist and was acting for a purpose other than the faithful discharge of his duties. In various cases, the judge independently investigated the facts, refused to consider the documents the defendant had brought to court, engaged in a contest with the defendant to determine who was lying, and increased sentences out of impatience and pique when a defendant attempted to explain his failure to comply with a court order or to question a sentence. The judge engaged in unjudicial conduct in a judicial capacity.

(13) Judges § 6—Discipline—Willful Misconduct—Bad Faith.—The judge acted in bad faith, the third element of willful misconduct. He acted beyond his lawful authority, either knowingly or with a conscious disregard for the limits of his authority. The judge was aware that a defendant cannot be found in violation of probation and sentenced unless he or she either has a formal hearing or waives hearing. Nevertheless, the judge did just that. He also acted out of pique, irritation or impatience, any of which is a purpose other than the faithful discharge of judicial duties.

(14) Judges § 6—Discipline—Proceedings—Defenses—Practices of Other Judges.—The judge's contention that he was acting on the good faith belief that he was following the practices of other judges in the county was rejected by the commission. The judge has an obligation to ensure the rights of defendants irrespective of the practices of other judges.

(15) Judges § 6—Discipline—Willful Misconduct—Unjudicial Conduct—Judicial Capacity.—The judge threatened to impose jail time, and in some instances actually imposed jail time, in response to a legitimate question from the defendant. The judge admitted he was trying to discourage defendants from questioning their sentences. By so doing, he disregarded the defendants' rights to be heard as to matters that might influence the decisionmaking process and as to sentencing. By infringing upon the defendants' right to be heard and becoming embroiled with the defendants, the judge violated the canons of California Code Judicial Ethics and engaged in unjudicial conduct while acting in a judicial capacity.

(16) Judges § 6—Discipline—Willful Misconduct—Bad Faith.—By increasing or threatening to increase a sentence when a defendant merely questioned the sentence or offered a defense or explanation in response to an accusation, the judge was performing a judicial act that seriously transgressed his lawful authority, and was acting in bad faith. As an experienced judge, he either knowingly violated or consciously disregarded his obligation to assure those in his courtroom of their right to be heard. He was also performing a judicial act for the "corrupt purpose" of venting his anger. In one matter, he also knew or was recklessly indifferent to the law prohibiting incarceration for failure to pay attorney fees. In another matter, he in effect held the defendant in contempt without following proper contempt procedures, which in itself constitutes bad faith.

(17) Judges § 6—Discipline—Willful Misconduct—Mitigation—Bad Faith.—There can be no mitigation for maliciously motivated judicial misconduct. Neither lack of prejudice to the defendant nor a judge's subsequent corrective action mitigates willful misconduct. With regard to the denial of a criminal defendant's fundamental rights, it is immaterial whether the judge's abuse of power results in just or unjust treatment for any given defendant. A judge's bad faith is directed towards the legal system itself.

(18) Judges § 6—Discipline—Willful Misconduct—Threatening Increased Sentence.—The judge's conduct in threatening to impose jail time for offering a defense or questioning a sentence is no less willful because the jail time was never imposed or because he later apologized. The judge engaged in willful misconduct in each instance.

(19) Judges § 6—Discipline—Prejudicial Misconduct—Questioning Defendants.—The judge's question to defendants charged with excessive speed—whether it felt good to "peel out"—was prejudicial to public esteem for the judiciary and constituted prejudicial misconduct. The judge made prejudgments regarding the defendants' credibility based on the judge's own experiences as a young man. The judge also became embroiled with the defendants, unreasonably accusing some of lying, and acting in a way that manifested prejudgment. His questions turned the proceedings into a game show with each defendant trying to guess the right answer in order to obtain the lower fine. Additionally, the judge's announcement in court that he had engaged in the same criminal conduct as the defendant detracted from the dignity of the proceedings.

(20) Judges § 6—Discipline—Prejudicial Misconduct—Interference with Rights.—After receiving a mass advisement, when defendants charged with misdemeanor alcohol or marijuana charges came before the judge individually, the judge presented them with a choice of diversion or jail time; he did not tell them that they had the option of pleading not guilty and having a trial. The judge interfered with the most basic and important of constitutional rights, the right to a jury trial. Rather than ensuring constitutional rights, which he was obligated to do, he created an environment in which the full exercise of those rights was unlikely. His conduct constituted prejudicial misconduct.

(21) Judges § 6—Discipline—Willful Misconduct—Bench Warrants.—The judge issued bench warrants for misdemeanor defendants who had authorized counsel to appear for them under Pen. Code, § 977, when neither the attorney nor the defendant appeared for a scheduled appearance. When the judge learned that the failure to appear was the result of the attorney's mistake and not the client's, the judge refused to recall the warrant. Both the issuance of the warrants and the failure to recall them constituted willful misconduct. The judge disregarded the defendants' fundamental due process right to notice and seriously undermined the attorney-client relationship. In addition, he abused his authority and acted in bad faith with utter and conscious disregard for the limits of his authority by issuing warrants for defendants who were not required to appear. Further, he was performing a judicial act for a purpose other than the faithful discharge of judicial duties—to punish errant lawyers.

(22) Judges § 6—Discipline—Willful Misconduct—Postdisqualification Conduct.—After being disqualified from two cases, the judge ordered the attorney in both cases to produce copies of his letter of complaint about the judge to the presiding judge. The judge's conduct constituted willful misconduct.

(23) Judges § 9—Disqualification—Taking Further Action.—A judge is prohibited from taking any further action in a case once disqualified, including questioning or criticizing the attorney who filed an affidavit of disqualification. Moreover, a judge is expected to know the proper procedure for handling a motion to disqualify.

(24) Judges § 8—Powers and Duties—Incarceration of Individuals.—The authority vested in the judiciary to incarcerate individuals carries with it a solemn responsibility that should never be taken lightly. A judge must be sensitive to the anxiety inherently associated with the possibility of serving time in custody.

(25) Judges § 6—Discipline—Prejudicial Misconduct—Joking About Incarceration.—The judge's "joking" with defendants about incarceration was undignified, out of place, and prejudicial to public esteem for the judiciary. The remarks constituted prejudicial misconduct.

(26) Judges § 6—Discipline—Conduct Prejudicial—Disparaging Remarks Regarding Attorneys.—Disparaging and demeaning comments addressed to attorneys in open court have repeatedly been considered indicative of a lack of appropriate judicial temperament. Belittling an attorney violates the ethical obligation in Cal. Code Jud. Ethics, canon 3B(4), to be dignified and courteous to all persons who come before the court, and expressly includes attorneys. The judge's comments were prejudicial to public esteem for the judiciary and constituted prejudicial misconduct.

(27) Judges § 6—Discipline—Appropriate Sanction—Factors.—In making its determination of the appropriate disciplinary sanction, the Commission on Judicial Performance considers that the purpose of a judicial disciplinary proceeding is not punishment, but rather the protection of the public, the enforcement of rigorous standards of judicial conduct, and the maintenance of public confidence in the integrity and independence of the judicial system. Various factors are relevant in determining the appropriate discipline, including (1) the number of acts of misconduct; (2) the existence of prior discipline; (3) whether the judge appreciates the inappropriateness of his or her conduct; (4) the judge's integrity; (5) the likelihood of future misconduct; and (6) the impact on the judicial system.

(28) Judges § 6—Discipline—Number of Wrongful Acts—Isolated Occurrences—Course of Conduct.—The number of wrongful acts committed by a judge is relevant to determining whether they were merely isolated occurrences or, instead, part of a course of conduct establishing lack of temperament and ability to perform judicial functions in an evenhanded manner.

(29) Judges § 6—Discipline—Prior Discipline.—In addition to receiving a prior censure, the judge had also received an advisory letter. Given the entirety of his disciplinary history and the misconduct at issue, a second censure was clearly insufficient and contrary to the commission's established policy and practice of escalating discipline for successive misconduct.

(30) Judges § 6—Discipline—Appreciation of Misconduct.—A judge's failure to appreciate or admit to the impropriety of his or her acts indicates a lack of capacity to reform.

(31) Judges § 6—Discipline—Integrity.—Integrity as it relates to a determination of the appropriate discipline in a judicial disciplinary proceeding has generally focused on honesty. Integrity may concern not the misconduct itself, but a judge's candor in testimony before the masters.

(32) Judges § 6—Discipline—Likelihood of Future Misconduct.—The judge's repetition of misconduct after being publicly censured, and his unwillingness or inability to appreciate the principles underlying his current misconduct, led to the conclusion that there was a very strong likelihood, if not a certainty, of future misconduct if the judge was not removed.

(33) Judges § 6—Discipline—Impact on Judicial System.—A pattern of misconduct reflecting abuse of authority and serious infringement of criminal defendants' constitutional rights necessarily has a negative impact on the judicial system. Such misconduct undermines the integrity of and respect for the judiciary and weakens the constitutional foundation of our system of justice.

(34) Judges § 6—Discipline—Character Evidence.—In a judicial disciplinary proceeding, character evidence is taken into account in considering the totality of the circumstances that are pertinent to the determination of the appropriate discipline.

I. INTRODUCTION AND SUMMARY

This disciplinary matter concerns Judge José A. Velasquez of the Monterey County Superior Court. On April 25, 2006, the commission filed a notice of formal proceedings against Judge Velasquez in which it charges Judge Velasquez with the following misconduct:

Count I charges that in eight criminal cases Judge Velasquez violated the probation of unrepresented defendants who appeared to request a modification of probation and imposed time in custody without complying with minimal due process requirements, including notice and a formal hearing.

Count II charges that in six criminal cases Judge Velasquez improperly increased or threatened to increase the defendant's sentence for asking legitimate questions regarding his or her sentence or offering a defense.

Count III charges that in five criminal cases Judge Velasquez asked defendants convicted of misdemeanor exhibition of speed if it felt good to "peel out" and improperly conditioned their sentence on the response given. Judge Velasquez is charged with having predetermined that there was only one truthful answer based on his personal experience.

Count IV charges that in seven criminal cases Judge Velasquez informed unrepresented defendants at arraignment that their only choices were to plead guilty or accept diversion, which required they attend Alcoholics Anonymous (AA) meetings, without advising the defendants of their constitutional right to plead not guilty and have a trial.

Count V charges Judge Velasquez with improperly issuing bench warrants for absent defendants (whose absence had been excused pursuant to Pen. Code, § 977) because the defense attorney was not present when the case was called; refusing to recall the warrant when the attorney later appeared and explained his or her absence; and, in one case, after knowing that he had been disqualified pursuant to Code of Civil Procedure section 170.6, ordering an attorney to produce the letters he had filed with another judge regarding the disqualification.

Count VI charges Judge Velasquez with making inappropriate comments in 14 instances that disparaged counsel, or suggested, as a "joke," that a person appearing before him was about to be remanded to custody.

Count VII charges Judge Velasquez with improperly allowing his children in the bench area while court was in session and in chambers during case discussions.

The Supreme Court appointed three special masters who held an evidentiary hearing and reported to the commission. The masters are Justice Laurence D. Rubin of the Court of Appeal, Second Appellate District, Division Eight, Judge Kevin M. McCarthy of the San Francisco County Superior Court, and Judge Eleanor Provost of the Tuolumne County Superior Court. The hearing before the masters took place in San Jose over three days commencing August 21, 2006, followed by oral argument before them on November 3, 2006. The masters presented their report to the commission on December 22, 2006.

The factual findings of the masters are largely undisputed. Although Judge Velasquez objects to some of the masters' legal conclusions, he concedes numerous incidents of serious misconduct. Judge Velasquez also concedes that he has engaged in prior misconduct resulting in a censure in 1997, the second most serious form of discipline available to the commission, and in an advisory letter in 2006. Nevertheless, Judge Velasquez contends that he should not be removed. We disagree and order Judge Velasquez removed from office.

(1) Judge Velasquez has engaged in an egregious pattern of misconduct that infringed the constitutional rights of numerous defendants and transgressed the limits of his authority, often in a capricious and malicious manner. The masters concluded as do we that "Judge Velasquez incarcerated several defendants without respect for their constitutional rights; he showed irritation when defendants asked him straightforward and respectful questions about their sentences; he coerced defendants into attending AA meetings; he expressed his unhappiness with attorneys by not recalling warrants for the arrest of their clients and by making disparaging remarks; and he used humor inappropriately at the expense of persons whose constitutional rights he has sworn to uphold." These incidents are not isolated; rather, they reflect a disturbing and persistent pattern of conduct that is completely at odds with the standard of conduct expected of the judiciary.

Judge Velasquez presented evidence in mitigation of his conduct, mostly in the form of testimony and declarations from character witnesses. However, the image portrayed of Judge Velasquez as a respected member of the community and role model outside the courtroom stands in sharp contrast to his egregious pattern of past and present misconduct in the courtroom. The breadth and seriousness of the judge's present and past misconduct overwhelms other considerations and compels our conclusion that removal is required.

Judge Velasquez is represented by James A. Murphy and Harlan B. Watkins, of San Francisco. The examiners for the commission are Trial Counsel Jack Coyle and Assistant Trial Counsel Valerie Marchant.

II. GENERALLY APPLICABLE LEGAL PRINCIPLES

A. Burden of Proof

(2) The commission has the burden of proving the charges against Judge Velasquez by clear and convincing evidence. (Doan v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1995) 11 Cal.4th 294, 313 [45 Cal.Rptr.2d 254, 902 P.2d 272]; Geiler v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications (1973) 10 Cal.3d 270, 275 [110 Cal.Rptr. 201, 515 P.2d 1].) "Evidence of a charge is clear and convincing so long as there is a 'high probability' that the charge is true. [Citations.] The evidence need not establish the fact beyond a reasonable doubt." (Broadman v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1998) 18 Cal.4th 1079, 1090 [77 Cal.Rptr.2d 408, 959 P.2d 715] (Broadman).)

B. Levels of Misconduct

The levels or types of judicial misconduct that may subject a judge to discipline by the commission are described in article VI, section 18, subdivision (d), of the California Constitution. We summarize each of them.

1. Willful Misconduct

(4) Failure to comply with the California Code of Judicial Ethics is generally considered to constitute unjudicial conduct. (Dodds, supra, 12 Cal.4th at p. 172.)

(5) The "bad faith" requirement for willful misconduct is satisfied when a judge is "(1) performing a judicial act for a corrupt purpose (which is any purpose other than the faithful discharge of judicial duties), or (2) performing a judicial act with knowledge that the act is beyond the judge's lawful judicial power, or (3) performing a judicial act that exceeds the judge's lawful power with a conscious disregard for the limits of the judge's authority." (Broadman, supra, 18 Cal.4th at p. 1092.) The Supreme Court has described "conscious disregard" in this context as follows: "Because transgressing the limits of a judge's lawful authority is not the faithful discharge of judicial duties, a judge who performs such acts with no regard at all for whether they are legally permitted cannot be said to be acting with a purpose to faithfully discharge judicial duties. Thus, a judge's reckless or utter indifference to whether judicial acts being performed exceed the bounds of the judge's prescribed power is a state of mind properly characterized as bad faith." (Ibid.)

2. Prejudicial Misconduct

(7) The Supreme Court has defined prejudicial misconduct, the second most serious category of judicial misconduct, as follows: "Prejudicial conduct is distinguishable from willful misconduct in that a judge's acts may constitute prejudicial conduct even if not committed in a judicial capacity, or, if committed in a judicial capacity, not committed in bad faith. Prejudicial conduct is 'either "conduct which a judge undertakes in good faith but which nevertheless would appear to an objective observer to be not only unjudicial conduct but conduct prejudicial to public esteem for the judicial office" [citation] or "willful misconduct out of office, i.e., unjudicial conduct committed in bad faith by a judge not then acting in a judicial capacity" [citation].' [Citation.] In this context, bad faith means a culpable mental state beyond mere negligence and consisting of either knowing or not caring that the conduct being undertaken is unjudicial and prejudicial to public esteem. In sum, to constitute prejudicial conduct, a judge's actions must bring 'the judicial office into disrepute,' that is, the conduct would appear to an objective observer to be prejudicial to ' "public esteem for the judicial office." ' [Citation.]" (Broadman, supra, 18 Cal.4th at pp. 1092–1093, original italics.)

3. Improper Action

III. FINDINGS OF FACT AND CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

The following findings of fact are adopted from the factual findings of the masters, unless otherwise indicated. We find the masters' factual findings adopted herein to be supported by the record and worthy of deference. (See Fletcher v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1998) 19 Cal.4th 865, 878 [81 Cal.Rptr.2d 58, 968 P.2d 958] (Fletcher) ["special weight" given to the special masters' factual determinations].) We reach our own legal conclusions based on our independent review of the record and the law. (See ibid.)

A. Count I: Denial of Due Process at Probation Modification Hearings

1. Findings of Fact

a. Common Findings

Each of the eight instances of misconduct charged in count I involves a criminal defendant who appeared before Judge Velasquez to request a modification of the terms of probation; by the end of each proceeding, Judge

Velasquez found the defendant to be in violation of probation and remanded him to serve a jail sentence in addition to the sentence imposed on the original charge. The defendants were on probation for either driving under the influence (DUI) or public intoxication, and most were requesting more time to complete the requirements of their probation (i.e., AA meetings, installing interlock devices, surrendering to serve time). With the exception of defendant Gonzales (I C), each defendant appeared voluntarily and not by court order. Each defendant arranged to have his case placed on the court's calendar by filing an application for modification of probation with the clerk's office. Neither the district attorney nor a defense attorney appeared in any of the cases. The defendants were not advised of their rights, including their right to a formal hearing and counsel, nor did the defendants waive their rights.

Judge Velasquez has handled probation violation matters throughout his 11 years on the bench. He is aware that a defendant cannot be found in violation of probation and sentenced unless he or she either has a formal hearing or waives hearing. In some of the cases in count I, Judge Velasquez was handling more than one calendar and felt under unusual pressure.

Practice of Other Judges in Monterey County

Judge Velasquez testified that when he was a practicing attorney over 11 years ago, he observed other judges in Monterey County handle the probation modification calendar in the same manner—immediately remanding defendants to custody based on a violation of probation without a waiver of rights. The masters found this testimony to be "unconvincing." We agree and adopt this finding.

In making their factual findings on this issue, the masters also considered the testimony of Linda Chavez, Judge Velasquez's courtroom clerk. She testified that over the last 18 years she has been a clerk in Monterey County, and that she has seen judges other than Judge Velasquez remand a defendant who appears on the probation modification hearing and impose additional fines for willful failure to comply with the terms and conditions of probation, without an advisement of rights. The masters considered Ms. Chavez to be credible, but found her testimony to be "of only limited significance" since she testified only in generalities and without regard to specific cases, judges or time periods. We concur and adopt this finding as our own.

Based on their evaluation of the testimony on this issue, the masters concluded that the evidence was insufficient to find that other judges in Monterey County either did or did not engage in the same probation modification practices as alleged in count I. In his brief to the commission, Judge Velasquez objects to this factual finding and maintains that there was sufficient evidence presented to establish that Judge Velasquez was following the practice of other judges in the county. We have carefully reviewed the evidence submitted on this issue and agree with the finding of the masters.

b. Count I A—People v. Ortega

On March 24, 2004, Adolfo Ortega submitted an application for modification of probation at the clerk's office. As a condition of his probation, Mr. Ortega had been ordered to either enroll in the work alternative program or surrender to serve five days in jail by January 15, 2004. Having done neither, he requested an extension to enroll in the work alternative program.

On March 26, 2004, Mr. Ortega, without an attorney, appeared before Judge Velasquez on the probation modification calendar. Mr. Ortega told Judge Velasquez that, subsequent to his original surrender date, he had left for a family emergency in Mexico. Judge Velasquez determined that Mr. Ortega had intentionally violated his order to surrender to begin serving his sentence. Mr. Ortega was remanded to serve his sentence. Without advisement or waiver of rights, Judge Velasquez imposed an additional five days of jail for a willful failure to comply with probation.

c. Count I B—People v. Manzo

As a condition of his probation, José Manzo was ordered to either enroll in the work alternative program or surrender to serve five days in jail by May 13, 2004. On July 9, 2004, the court was notified that Mr. Manzo had only completed four of the required 24 hours in the work alternative program.

On July 19, 2004, Mr. Manzo came to the clerk's office and requested that his case be placed on the modification calendar to request a restricted license. When Mr. Manzo appeared in court on July 30th, unrepresented by counsel, Judge Velasquez questioned him about his failure to complete the work hours. Mr. Manzo referred to information he had from "Jaime." A business card from Jaime Prieto was in the court file with confusing entries suggesting that Mr. Manzo may have completed up to 18 1/2 hours. Judge Velasquez characterized these entries as "not legitimate" and ordered Mr. Manzo to surrender to serve out the rest of his time. When Mr. Manzo persisted that he had proof from Jaime that he had completed his hours, Judge Velasquez turned the proceedings into an evidentiary hearing. Judge Velasquez left the bench and called the program ex parte. Someone named Ophelia told Judge Velasquez that Mr. Manzo had not completed his hours.

After talking to Ophelia, Judge Velasquez ordered Mr. Manzo to serve 15 additional days in jail for his willful failure to comply with the terms of his probation.

Judge Velasquez does not consider the conversation with Ophelia to be an improper ex parte communication. The masters disagreed because the "conversation was held for the purpose of obtaining information that could be used in connection with Mr. Manzo's court proceedings." We concur. (See Fletcher, supra, 19 Cal.4th at pp. 896–897 [judge committed misconduct by conducting an ex parte phone conversation from the bench with the park ranger who arrested the defendant for purposes of deciding whether to accept a plea bargain].)

d. Count I C—People v. Gonzalez

As a condition of his DUI probation, Guillermo Gonzalez was ordered to attend 30 AA meetings. When he appeared before Judge Velasquez, unrepresented by an attorney, for a review hearing on October 29, 2004, he brought proof of having attended 27 meetings. He explained that work obligations prevented him from attending the remaining three meetings. Judge Velasquez reminded Mr. Gonzalez that he had previously been told that he would receive two days of custody for each AA meeting he did not complete. Without an advisement or waiver of rights, Judge Velasquez found a willful violation of probation and sentenced Mr. Gonzales to six days in jail and 10 additional AA meetings.

e. Count I D—People v. Narez

In October 2004, Sigifredo Narez submitted an application for modification of his DUI probation. The court had previously received information that Mr. Narez had not installed a court-ordered interlock device or shown proof of the 30 AA meetings he was required to attend. On October 29th, Mr. Narez appeared on the probation modification calendar without a lawyer. Mr. Narez explained to Judge Velasquez that the DUI school told him to install the interlock device after completing his DUI classes. Judge Velasquez told Mr. Narez that he would be immediately taken into custody for a willful failure to comply with the court order to install the interlock device.

Then Judge Velasquez asked about the AA meetings. Mr. Narez replied: "I am doing that. I bring some proof here." Without looking at the AA materials that Mr. Narez offered, Judge Velasquez said: "Did the school tell you not to go to them (the AA meetings)?" As Judge Velasquez was ordering Mr. Narez remanded to custody, Mr. Narez started to say something. Before the interpreter could translate, Judge Velasquez said: "Hold on. . . . You continue to interrupt me, you'll be at 45 in a hurry." When Mr. Narez again tried to explain what the school had told him, Judge Velasquez warned: "I told you you're at 20 days, you insist, you'll be at 45 and you'll get to 60 in a hurry." Judge Velasquez then imposed 20 days in custody for a "willful failure to comply" and ordered Mr. Narez to attend 30 new AA meetings by January.

As he was being sentenced, Mr. Narez asked if he could say something. After being granted permission to speak, Mr. Narez attempted to explain that he had been going to AA meetings and already had been given a completion date. Judge Velasquez interrupted him and increased his sentence to 30 days, while warning, "If you'd like to take more of the court's time, and you'll be at 60." When Mr. Narez said that he "just wanted to explain," Judge Velasquez increased the sentence to 60 days. Mr. Narez started to speak, but before the interpreter could translate, Judge Velasquez increased his sentence to 75 days and threatened to increase the time to 120 days if he continued to speak.

Judge Velasquez was asked at the proceedings before the special masters, "Wasn't [Mr. Narez] entitled to present evidence and argument that he attended the [AA] meetings?" The judge responded, "That's what the hearing was for." Judge Velasquez admitted that he threatened to increase and did increase Mr. Narez's sentence for trying to offer a defense and for taking up the court's time.

The masters concluded: "Despite repeated efforts, Mr. Narez was not given any meaningful opportunity to explain his position before Judge Velasquez summarily found him in violation of probation and remanded him. [Citation.] Mr. Narez did not interfere with the court proceedings and at all times was respectful to the court. Judge Velasquez understands that a defendant is entitled to speak and to inquire about sentencing. [Citation.] Judge Velasquez became fully embroiled with the defendant, increasing his time in custody for reasons unrelated to criminal punishment purposes." We concur.

In his testimony before the special masters, Judge Velasquez acknowledged that he did not handle the matter properly; however, he did not believe that he violated Mr. Narez's due process rights.

f. Count I E—People v. Nunez

Angel Nunez was placed on DUI probation and ordered to serve 60 days in jail, with a surrender date of October 12, 2004, and to install an interlock device. On October 29, 2004, Mr. Nunez appeared before Judge Velasquez on his application for a new surrender date, unrepresented by counsel. The court had been previously notified that Mr. Nunez had not installed the interlock device as ordered.

When Mr. Nunez appeared, unrepresented, he explained that he had lost the paperwork for his surrender and that his sick child was in court with him. Judge Velasquez gave him a new surrender date and asked if Mr. Nunez had any questions. Mr. Nunez made a general reference to the interlock device and, in response to questioning by Judge Velasquez, admitted that it had not been installed. Judge Velasquez ordered Mr. Nunez remanded immediately for failing to surrender, for lying, and "[f]or trying to use his family as a shield." An additional 30 days was imposed for willful failure to install the interlock device.

The masters found: "Mr. Nunez did not interfere with the court proceedings and at all times was respectful to the court. Judge Velasquez became fully embroiled with the defendant, increasing his time in custody for reasons unrelated to criminal punishment purposes." We agree.

g. Count I F—People v. Hernandez

As a condition of his probation, Barnabee Hernandez had been ordered to attend 30 AA meetings by December 15, 2004. Mr. Hernandez filed an application for an extension of time to complete his AA meetings. When Mr. Hernandez appeared before Judge Velasquez unrepresented by counsel on December 10, 2004, five days before his December 15th AA completion date, he had attended 16 of the 30 meetings. Mr. Hernandez offered various reasons why he had not completed more meetings. Judge Velasquez stated that he had "little confidence" that the 30 meetings would be completed in the remaining five days.

Mr. Hernandez was immediately remanded to serve three days and ordered to attend 30 AA meetings by January 21st for his willful failure to comply with probation.

h. Count I G—People v. Huitron

On December 10, 2004, Prescilliano Huitron appeared, unrepresented by counsel, before Judge Velasquez on his application for a modification of probation. Mr. Huitron had been ordered to either enroll in the work alternative program or surrender to serve 20 days in jail by November 5, 2004, as a condition of his probation. He failed to do either.

After Mr. Huitron offered his excuse for failing to enroll in the work alternative program, he was immediately remanded to serve the original 20-day sentence, and an additional five days for willful failure to comply with the terms of probation.

At the proceedings before the special masters, Judge Velasquez testified that he believed at the time that he was complying with due process, but now believes that the "best procedure" would be to give an advisement of rights.

i. Count I H—People v. Narciso

Donato Narciso was ordered to either enroll in the work alternative program or surrender to serve seven days in jail by November 30, 2004. He failed to do either.

On December 10, 2004, Mr. Narciso appeared, without a lawyer, before Judge Velasquez on his application for a modification of probation and asked for a new program date. Mr. Narciso insisted that he did not understand that he had to surrender for jail if he did not enroll in the work program. Judge Velasquez accused Mr. Narciso of lying and implied that Mr. Narciso was accusing Judge Velasquez of lying. At the conclusion of the hearing, Judge Velasquez remanded Mr. Narciso to serve the original seven-day sentence and imposed an additional three days for violating probation.

2. Conclusions of Law

The masters concluded that Judge Velasquez engaged in willful misconduct in each of the eight cases that comprise count I. We reach the same conclusion.

(9) The masters found, as do we, that Judge Velasquez was conducting probation violation hearings and ordering immediate incarceration "without affording the defendant notice that such a hearing would be taking place and the basis for the alleged violation, and without advising the defendant of his constitutional rights, including the right to counsel and to a formal hearing." These hearings failed to comply with minimum due process requirements as specified by the California Supreme Court in People v. Vickers (1972) 8 Cal.3d 451, 457–458 [105 Cal.Rptr. 305, 503 P.2d 1313] (Vickers). Before a defendant can be found to be in violation of probation, the defendant has a right to notice of the basis of the alleged probation violation, and a formal hearing which affords an opportunity to cross-examine the witnesses and to present evidence rebutting the allegations. (Ibid.) As observed by the masters, the violations of the defendants' rights in these cases "were neither minor nor of a technical nature, as in each instance, the defendant was immediately incarcerated."

(10) In his written briefing before the commission, Judge Velasquez contends that at most his conduct constitutes legal error and, as such, is not subject to discipline under Oberholzer v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1999) 20 Cal.4th 371, 395 [84 Cal.Rptr.2d 466, 975 P.2d 663] (Oberholzer). The California Supreme Court in Oberholzer held that legal error alone does not constitute judicial misconduct subject to discipline. (Id. at pp. 395–398.) However, a judge who commits legal error which, in addition, clearly and convincingly reflects "bad faith," "bias," "abuse of authority," "disregard for fundamental rights," "intentional disregard of the law," "or any purpose other than the faithful discharge of judicial duty" is subject to sanctions. (Id. at p. 398.)

(11) The masters concluded, as do we, that Judge Velasquez's actions went well beyond mere legal error; they reflected a disregard of the defendant's fundamental right to due process. (See Vickers, supra, 8 Cal.3d at p. 457.) As the masters correctly concluded, Judge Velasquez "engaged in intentional conduct that diminished or virtually eliminated those rights."

(12) In addition, Judge Velasquez acted for a purpose other than the faithful discharge of his duties by becoming embroiled with the defendants, thereby surrendering his role as an impartial jurist. In various cases, Judge Velasquez independently investigated facts, refused to consider documents the defendant had brought to court, engaged in a contest with the defendant to determine who was lying, and increased sentences out of impatience and pique when a defendant attempted to explain his failure to comply with a court order or questioned a sentence. The masters concluded that this "conduct suggests embroilment and abandonment of the role of neutral magistrate." We agree and adopt this conclusion as our own.

We conclude that Judge Velasquez engaged in unjudicial conduct in a judicial capacity that violated California Code of Judicial Ethics canons 1 and 2A (judge shall uphold integrity of the judiciary, shall comply with the law and avoid impropriety and appearance of impropriety), as well as canons 3B(2) (judge shall maintain professional competence in the law), 3B(4) (judge shall be patient, dignified, and courteous to litigants and others with whom the judge deals in an official capacity), 3B(7) (judge shall accord every person with legal interest in proceeding the full right to be heard and shall not initiate, permit, or consider ex parte communications), and 3B(8) (judge shall dispose of all judicial matters fairly, promptly, and efficiently). (All references to a canon are to the California Code of Judicial Ethics.) This constitutes the first two components of willful misconduct. (Broadman, supra, 18 Cal.4th at p. 1091.)

defendant cannot be found in violation of probation and sentenced unless he or she either has a formal hearing or waives hearing. Nevertheless, Judge Velasquez did just that; he sentenced the defendants in count I for being in willful violation of probation without providing the defendants with the opportunity for formal hearing. (See Inquiry Concerning Ross (2005) No. 174, Decision and Order Removing Judge Ross from Office, pp. 32–39 [49 Cal.4th CJP Supp. 79, 112–118] (Ross) [judge committed willful misconduct by finding the defendant had violated the terms of his probation without providing the opportunity for a formal hearing and by proceeding without counsel].)

Additionally, "he acted out of pique, irritation or impatience, any of which is a purpose other than the faithful discharge of his judicial duties" constituting bad faith. (Ross, supra, No. 174 at pp. 17–18 [49 Cal.4th CJP Supp. at p. 100].)

(14) Judge Velasquez maintains that he was acting on the good faith belief that he was following the practices of other judges in Monterey County. We reject this contention for the same reason offered by the masters: "Even if other judges in Monterey County may have on some prior occasions conducted their modification calendars in a similar fashion, or did so when Judge Velasquez was an attorney 11 years ago, this fact does not excuse Judge Velasquez's behavior; nor does the fact that some attorneys may not have complained." Judge Velasquez has an obligation to ensure the rights of defendants irrespective of the practices of other judges. (See Kloepfer, supra, 49 Cal.3d at pp. 849–854.)

We also reject Judge Velasquez's suggestion that he acted on the good faith belief that his practice of incarcerating defendants for violating probation without complying with due process was proper because these were probation modification hearings, as opposed to probation violation hearings. Insofar as the demands of due process are concerned, it makes no difference what the proceedings are called—if in the end the defendant is found in violation of probation and incarcerated, the defendant is entitled, at minimum, to notice and a formal hearing. (Vickers, supra, 8 Cal.3d at pp. 457–458.) Moreover, we have adopted the masters' factual finding that Judge Velasquez is aware of the difference between violation of probation and modification of probation.

Nor are we persuaded by Judge Velasquez's suggestion that he was entitled to find the defendant in violation of probation based on the defendant's factual admission in court. Before a defendant can be found in violation of probation and sentenced based on a factual admission, the defendant must be advised of and make a knowing and intelligent waiver of his or her constitutional rights. (Boykin v. Alabama (1969) 395 U.S. 238 [23 L.Ed.2d 274, 89 S.Ct. 1709]; In re Tahl (1969) 1 Cal.3d 122 [81 Cal.Rptr. 577, 460 P.2d 449]; Vickers, supra, 8 Cal.3d 451.)

We determine that Judge Velasquez committed willful misconduct in each of the eight cases charged in count I.

B. Count II: Threatening to Increase and Increasing Sentences When Defendants Questioned a Sentence or Otherwise Commented at Sentencing

1. Findings of Fact

a. Common Findings

The masters found: "In each of the cases identified in Count II, Judge Velasquez became embroiled with the defendant at the time of sentencing, and threatened to increase time in custody—and in some instances actually increased time in custody. . . . In each instance, Judge Velasquez acted with anger." We concur and adopt this finding as our own.

b. Count II A—People v. Merwin

As Judge Velasquez was sentencing Toni Merwin to 10 days in jail on a misdemeanor, Merwin asked "is there a way you can make the time less?" Judge Velasquez responded, "I can make it more." In the end, Ms. Merwin's sentence was not increased. The masters found that Judge Velasquez did not like Merwin questioning her sentence (which the judge characterized as "nickel and diming me") and that his remark was designed to make her stop questioning the sentence and deter others in the courtroom from doing the same. We concur.

c. Count II B—People v. Gawf

When David Gawf appeared for arraignment, unrepresented by counsel, on a charge of possession of alcohol by a minor, Judge Velasquez offered him the choice of jail or 30 AA meetings, the successful completion of which would result in dismissal of the charges (diversion). Mr. Gawf chose AA meetings. When he asked if the number of AA meetings could be reduced, the judge threatened to take Mr. Gawf's driver's license and give him jail time instead:

"Defendant: I was—sorry to interrupt you. I was wondering if I can get that reduced even more because I work full time.

"Judge: I'll take your license if you keep talking that way.

"Defendant: Yes, Your Honor.

"Judge: Zero tolerance.

"Female voice: He's going to dismiss the case if you go to 30 AA meetings.

"Defendant: Oh, okay. Yes, Your Honor.

"Judge: What—how many days in jail do you want?

"Defendant: None, Your Honor."

At the hearing before the special masters, Judge Velasquez acknowledged that he did not have authority to impose jail time or take Mr. Gawf's license at that point in the proceedings because the defendant had not pled guilty or been convicted.

d. Count II C—People v. Narez

The factual findings in this case were made in conjunction with count I D.

e. Count II D—People v. Maya

After Erik Maya pled no contest and was sentenced for trespassing, Judge Velasquez asked whether he had paid a $250 fee for public defender services that had been ordered on previous cases.[1] When Mr. Maya offered various reasons why he had not paid the fee, Judge Velasquez suggested he was lying and ordered him to pay the fee by the following Tuesday. When Mr. Maya questioned the date, the judge told him to pay a day earlier. As Mr. Maya again began to speak, Judge Velasquez ordered him immediately remanded into custody. Mr. Maya's lawyer then spoke with his client and the following exchange occurred:

"DPD [Mr. Maya's deputy public defender]: Your Honor, he can do it by Monday.

"Judge: Well, you just told me no.

[1] A defendant can be ordered to pay a fee for the services of a public defender (Pen. Code, § 987.5, subd. (a)), but cannot be incarcerated for failure to pay the fee—it is only enforceable as a civil judgment (People v. Amor (1974) 12 Cal.3d 20 [114 Cal.Rptr. 765, 523 P.2d 1173]).

"Defendant: Yeah, yeah. I can do it by Monday.

"Judge: How am I supposed to believe in you?

"Defendant: Yeah—

"Judge: You can't have it—you don't have the money you told me.

"Defendant: Okay. I do—I'll find a way to come up with it.

"Judge: Then what were you—then why were you lying to me? Why didn't you come up with the money when you were supposed to?

"Defendant: Because I didn't want to go back to my mom and ask her for, to borrow money, she's been helping me out a lot.

"Judge: Well, then you're going to be remanded—

"Defendant: But I'll do that again—

"DPD: Your Honor.

"Defendant: But I'll do that—I'll (unintelligible) do it—

"Judge: Excuse me. Mr. Maya, you're going to be quiet, okay. You were told to pay your fine—your $25 registration fee for a lawyer by a certain date. You chose not to do that. Okay. That was your choice. I just asked you if you could do it by Monday, and you're there crying like a kid that you can't do it by Monday. Okay. Until your lawyer butts in and tries to help you and encourages you, all of a sudden you're creative. I'm talking to you as a man, okay, not as a kid. So you're going to be remanded. You'll be released Monday.

"DPD: Your Honor, Your Honor—

"Defendant: My baby's in the back—

"DPD: Your Honor,—

"Judge: I'm going—okay, you want 30 days? I'll give you 30 days.

"Defendant: No, I don't want 30 days.

"Judge: Okay. So then you're going to be remanded to the custody of the sheriffs effective immediately.

"Defendant: But my baby's in the back—what about my baby?

"Judge: We'll get CPS to come and get somebody for you.

"Defendant: Oh, god.

"Judge: Okay.

"Defendant: I have to go to the school today, too, you know, you'll make me lose all my—

"Judge: Right. Okay. You gotta learn to pay attention." (Italics added.)

Judge Velasquez eventually agreed to the public defender's request for an extension to pay the fee until that afternoon, but stated that Mr. Maya would receive an additional 45 days in custody if he failed to pay.

In his testimony before the special masters, Judge Velasquez denied that Mr. Maya's failure to pay the fee was the basis for his threat to remand Mr. Maya. He claimed that incarceration was threatened as part of the trespass sentence in the case Mr. Maya was appearing on that day. The masters concluded that "[t]his testimony is not credible." We agree and adopt that finding as our own.

f. Count II E—People v. Herrero

While being sentenced pursuant to a plea bargain, Modesto Herrero stated that Judge Velasquez had not told him about the $750 fine that was being imposed. Judge Velasquez explained that the fine had been discussed in chambers (apparently in Mr. Herrero's absence). When Mr. Herrero asked why the fine had to be so high, Judge Velasquez threatened to increase the fine to $2,000. Then, when Mr. Herrero attempted to question Judge Velasquez further about the fine, Judge Velasquez threatened to impose an additional year of jail time. Ultimately, Judge Velasquez did not impose the threatened jail time, but did impose the additional $2,000 fine.

Judge Velasquez testified that he both increased the fine and threatened to increase the jail time because he believed Mr. Herrero was accusing him of not honoring the indicated sentence and calling him a liar. He acknowledged that he did not handle the matter properly and that he owed Mr. Herrero an apology.

g. Count II F—People v. Martinez

As Juan Martinez was being sentenced to 10 days in jail and ordered to pay a fine following his misdemeanor no contest plea, he made bizarre statements that indicated he might have mental problems. When Judge Velasquez asked if he wanted to pay the $250 fine or "serve it out," Mr. Martinez responded, "I will give you $500." When Judge Velasquez told him he would "serve out the fine," the defendant replied "I will give you $500 for being an asshole." Judge Velasquez then ordered Mr. Martinez to serve 180 days in jail. Mr. Martinez responded by stating "Your Honor, even a month or two—." Judge Velasquez interrupted: "I'm listening to his comments. I don't think he's out of his mind."

The public defender then requested that the matter be put over for "further evaluation" (apparently referring to a mental evaluation). After the public defender interceded, Judge Velasquez allowed the defendant to withdraw his plea.

Judge Velasquez testified that he threatened to impose 180 days for comments suggestive of contempt of court, but acknowledged that he did not follow contempt procedures.

2. Conclusions of Law

The masters reached different legal conclusions on individual subcounts of count II—finding two instances of willful misconduct, two instances of prejudicial misconduct, one instance of improper action and no misconduct in one instance. We have concluded that Judge Velasquez committed willful misconduct in all of the cases that comprise count II.

(15) In each case, Judge Velasquez threatened to impose jail time, and in some instances actually imposed jail time, in response to a legitimate comment or question from the defendant. In addition, Judge Velasquez admitted he was attempting to discourage the defendant before him and others in the courtroom from questioning their sentences. By so doing, he disregarded the defendant's right to be heard. Due process affords litigants the right to speak regarding matters which might influence the decisionmaking process. (Dodds, supra, 12 Cal.4th at pp. 176–177.) In addition, a criminal defendant has a statutory right to address the court at sentencing. (Pen. Code, § 1200; In re Shannon B. (1994) 22 Cal.App.4th 1235, 1245 [27 Cal.Rptr.2d 800].)

We are also troubled by the manner in which Judge Velasquez interfered with the defendants' right to be heard. In every case, with the exception of Martinez (who apparently had mental problems), the defendants were respectful to the court and did nothing more than attempt to offer an explanation or ask a legitimate question concerning their sentences. The masters concluded, as do we, that Judge Velasquez responded out of anger and became embroiled with the defendants. As the masters concluded regarding the Maya matter, "rather than acting as a neutral magistrate handling a rather perfunctory fee matter, [Judge Velasquez] vented his anger and flaunted his power in response to what he unreasonably believed to be an attack on his power and authority." In the Herrero matter, we concur with the masters that Judge Velasquez "became unnecessarily embroiled with the defendant based on his perception that the defendant was essentially accusing Judge Velasquez of lying," when the defendant was at most honestly confused about the imposition of the second fine. As a result of his inability to maintain a judicial distance and composure in the Narez matter, Judge Velasquez escalated the defendant's sentence from 20 to 75 days and failed to accept evidence offered by Mr. Narez which may have resolved the question of how many AA meetings he had attended.

By infringing upon the defendants' right to be heard and becoming embroiled with the defendants, Judge Velasquez violated canons 1, 2A, 3B(4), 3B(7), and 3B(8). Therefore, Judge Velasquez engaged in unjudicial conduct while acting in a judicial capacity.

(16) We also conclude that Judge Velasquez was acting in bad faith. He was performing a judicial act that seriously transgressed his lawful authority by increasing or threatening to increase a sentence when a defendant merely questioned the sentence or offered a defense or explanation in response to an accusation. As an experienced judge, he either knowingly violated or consciously disregarded his obligation to assure those in his courtroom of their right to be heard. Judge Velasquez was also performing a judicial act for the "corrupt purpose" of venting his anger. (See Broadman, supra, 18 Cal.4th at p. 1092; Ross, supra, No. 174 at p. 4 [49 Cal.4th CJP Supp. at p. 88]; Inquiry Concerning Van Voorhis (2003) No. 165, Decision and Order Removing Judge Van Voorhis from Office (2003) pp. 12, 18, 21, 23 [48 Cal.4th CJP Supp. 257, 275, 281, 284, 286] (Van Voorhis) [willful misconduct where judge acted for "corrupt purpose of venting his anger or frustration"].) In addition, in the Maya matter, Judge Velasquez knew or was recklessly indifferent to the law prohibiting incarceration for failure to pay attorney fees. (People v. Amor (1974) 12 Cal.3d 20 [114 Cal.Rptr. 765, 523 P.2d 1173]; see also Kloepfer, supra, 49 Cal.3d at pp. 863–864.) In the Martinez matter, Judge Velasquez was in effect holding the defendant in contempt without following proper contempt procedures, which in itself constitutes bad faith. (Ryan v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1988) 45 Cal.3d 518, 533 [247 Cal.Rptr. 378, 754 P.2d 724]; Cannon v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications (1975) 14 Cal.3d 678, 694 [122 Cal.Rptr. 778, 537 P.2d 898].)

(17) In a number of instances, the masters gave deference to mitigating factors in determining that Judge Velasquez did not engage in willful misconduct. For instance, in the Gawf (II B), Herrero (II E), and Martinez (II F) matters, the masters considered that Judge Velasquez did not actually impose the threatened jail time and that he apologized for his conduct in the proceedings before the special masters. We do not consider these factors as being relevant on the issue of bad faith. It is well established that there can be no mitigation for maliciously motivated judicial misconduct. (Kloepfer, supra, 49 Cal.3d at p. 865; Gonzalez v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1983) 33 Cal.3d 359, 377 [188 Cal.Rptr. 880, 657 P.2d 372]; Ross, supra, No. 174 at p. 39 [49 Cal.4th CJP Supp. at pp. 117–118] [fact that judge quickly vacated his bad faith ruling, eliminating any prejudice to the defendant, does not reduce willful misconduct to prejudicial misconduct].) Neither lack of prejudice to the defendant nor a judge's subsequent corrective action mitigates willful misconduct. (Broadman, supra, 18 Cal.4th at pp. 1095–1096.) With regard to the denial of a criminal defendant's fundamental rights, the Supreme Court held: "It is immaterial whether [the judge's] abuse of power resulted in just or unjust treatment for any given defendant. . . . [The judge's] bad faith was directed towards our legal system itself . . . ." (Geiler v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications, supra, 10 Cal.3d at p. 286.) (18) Thus, Judge Velasquez's conduct in threatening to impose jail time for offering a defense or questioning a sentence is no less willful because the jail time was never imposed or because he later apologized for his conduct. We conclude that Judge Velasquez engaged in willful misconduct in each instance charged in count II.

C. Count III—Conditioning Sentence on the Defendant's Response to Whether It Felt Good To "Peel Out"

1. Findings of Fact

a. Common Findings

In each of the five cases that comprise count III, Judge Velasquez asked a defendant who was being sentenced on a misdemeanor charge of exhibition of speed if it "felt good" to "peel out." The masters found that in each instance Judge Velasquez equated an affirmative answer with taking responsibility for the defendant's actions, and a negative answer with a failure to accept responsibility. Further, the masters found that "Judge Velasquez to some degree became embroiled in the process, acted in a way that might have suggested he had prejudged the case, and used his own experience as a young man as a factor in the ultimate sentence given." We adopt these findings and further find, based on our independent review of the record, that Judge Velasquez used his experience as a young man in determining the "correct" answer to the question.

b. Count III A—People v. Herrera

After Nicholas Herrera entered a guilty plea to exhibition of speed, Judge Velasquez questioned him concerning whether it felt good to "peel out" in the following exchange:

"Judge: Listen to the question and I want you to be honest. That's whether you pay $200 or $800 depends on your honesty. When you peel out tires, because that's what you did, you spin your wheels? Did it feel good?

"Defendant: Did it feel good?

"Judge: Yeah. Yes or no?

"Defendant: Yes.

"Judge: Are you sure?

"Defendant: I mean it didn't feel good because I was in the water.

"Judge: Well no. The reason for peeling out is because there's a thrill to it. Right?

"Defendant: Yes.

"Judge: So are you sure it feels good or it doesn't?

"Defendant: No, it doesn't feel good.

"Judge: Okay. Now you're starting to lie.

"Defendant: No, I don't like it.

"Judge: I do. And if I ever peel out, I do it for a reason. But anyways. You answered straight. This will be your sentence.

"You'll be placed—and I just questioned you a little more, and then you weakened and went the other way."

Judge Velasquez imposed a $200 fine and wished the defendant good luck.

c. Count III B—People v. Lopez

Prior to accepting Leonard Lopez's plea to exhibition of speed, Judge Velasquez informed him that his fine would be between $200 and $1,000

"depending on your answer." After Mr. Lopez pled guilty, Judge Velasquez asked him "does it feel good" to peel out. When the defendant replied "no," Judge Velasquez accused him of lying. As Mr. Lopez began to speak, Judge Velasquez interrupted: "I didn't ask you if it was an accident, I just asked you a straightforward question. When we do that stuff, and I've done it, you peel out, you're just—you're showing off. You do it for a reason. Some girls are passing by, you wanted to get their attention."

When Judge Velasquez again asked Mr. Lopez if it felt good, Mr. Lopez replied "not when you get pulled over." Judge Velasquez imposed a fine of $800.

d. Count III C—People v. Lynch

Aaron Lynch was told that he would be fined between $200 and $1,000 depending on his answer to the question of whether it felt good to "peel out." When the defendant answered "yes," Judge Velasquez imposed a $200 fine and told Mr. Lynch "[t]hat's the answer I wanted."

e. Count III D—People v. Lopez, Jr.

Joe Lopez, Jr., answered "yes" when Judge Velasquez asked him if it felt good to peel out. Judge Velasquez responded: "That's why we do it."

f. Count III E—People v. Martinez

At sentencing Judge Velasquez said to Samuel Martinez: "When you do it [peel out], whether by accident or by mistake or because you don't know—you're familiar with the truck—the vehicle. But when it happens does it feel good?" When Mr. Martinez replied "yes," Judge Velasquez said, "That's why we do it, right? . . . That's why we do it sometimes—to show off?"

2. Conclusions of Law

The masters concluded that accusing the defendants in the Herrera (III A) and Lopez (III B) matters of lying was improper action, but otherwise found no misconduct in count III. We, however, determine that Judge Velasquez engaged in prejudicial misconduct in each of the five cases in count III.

(19) In the proceedings before the special masters, Judge Velasquez maintained that determining whether a defendant is willing to "own up" to having intentionally engaged in exhibition of speed is within his sentencing discretion. Whether a defendant accepts responsibility for committing the offense is a proper factor for a judge to take into consideration in sentencing.

However, whether it feels good to "peel out" does not equate with accepting responsibility for the offense of exhibition of speed. The offense does not include a requirement that the defendant "feel good." (Veh. Code, § 23109, subd. (a).)

Moreover, the record reflects that Judge Velasquez was not really concerned with whether the defendants were accepting responsibility for intentionally committing the offense, but with whether they would admit that it felt good. When Leonard Lopez tried to explain that his peeling out was an accident, Judge Velasquez responded: "I didn't ask you if it was an accident, I just asked you a straightforward question." Similarly, Judge Velasquez told Samuel Martinez that it did not matter whether he peeled out by accident or by mistake, the only question was whether it felt good.

The record further reflects that Judge Velasquez made prejudgments regarding the defendant's credibility based on his own personal experiences as a young man. We conclude that Judge Velasquez violated canons 1, 2A, 3B(4), and 3B(8) by becoming embroiled with the defendants, unreasonably accusing some defendants of lying, and acting in a way that manifested prejudgment.

Judge Velasquez's conduct was prejudicial to public esteem for the judiciary. His questions turned the proceedings into a game show with the defendant attempting to guess the correct answer in order to obtain the lower fine. As Special Master Provost put it during argument, "[D]on't you think, though, the perception of the public was that this was a setup?" Additionally, Judge Velasquez detracted from the dignity of the proceedings by announcing in court that he has engaged in the same criminal conduct as the defendant. As such, we determine that Judge Velasquez engaged in five instances of prejudicial misconduct in count III.

D. Count IV: Giving Defendants the Choice of Diversion or Jail Time, Without Advisement of the Right To Plead Not Guilty and, In Some Cases, Suggesting That the Consequence of Failure to Successfully Complete Diversion Was Immediate Incarceration

1. Findings of Fact

In each of the seven cases in count IV, the defendant appeared for arraignment on misdemeanor alcohol or marijuana charges. Before each case was called individually, Judge Velasquez gave a mass advisement of constitutional rights to those seated in the courtroom that included the right to plead not guilty and go to trial. However, when the defendants appeared before the judge individually, Judge Velasquez presented them with a choice of diversion (attending AA meetings after which the charges would be dismissed) or jail time. ("Would you like to go to jail or go to 30 AA meetings?" (count IV A, Gawf); "Do you want to plead guilty or do you want to go to 20 AA meetings?" (count IV B, Guerrero).) Judge Velasquez did not tell them that they had the option of pleading not guilty and having a trial. Further, although the consequence of failing to successfully complete the AA meetings (diversion) is resumption of the proceedings, including the right to a trial, in certain cases the judge told the defendants they would go to jail. ("Don't come back short of the meetings because then the deal is off and you'll go to jail." (Count IV D, McEwan.))

The masters found that Judge Velasquez "did not appear to understand that his statements suggested to the defendants that the adverse consequences would be automatically imposed on the defendants if they failed to complete the AA meetings, even though they had not entered a plea." We agree.

2. Conclusions of Law

(20) The masters concluded that in each of the seven cases, Judge Velasquez engaged in prejudicial misconduct. We reach the same conclusion. Judge Velasquez's conduct interfered with the defendants' exercise of one of the most basic and important of constitutional rights, the right to jury trial. As stated by the masters: "When the individual case was called, defendant was given a Hobson-like choice that did not include the right to plead not guilty and have a trial. Rather than ensuring constitutional rights, which Judge Velasquez was obliged to do (see Kloepfer, supra, 49 Cal.3d 826, 850–851), Judge Velasquez created an environment in which the full exercise of those rights was unlikely."

Judge Velasquez violated canons 1, 2A, and 3B(7). As Judge Velasquez concedes, his conduct in each instance in count IV constitutes prejudicial misconduct.

E. Count V: Issuance of Bench Warrants When the Defendant Was Not Legally Required To Appear and Ordering Attorney To Produce Letter Related to Judge Velasquez's Disqualification

1. Findings of Fact

a. Common Findings

In seven of the eight cases in count V (in one case, count V B, no evidence was presented), the defendants had authorized counsel to appear for them in misdemeanor proceedings pursuant to Penal Code section 977 (section 977). That section authorizes an attorney to appear on the defendant's behalf in misdemeanor cases and excuses the defendant from appearing. When neither the attorney nor the defendant appeared for a scheduled appearance, Judge Velasquez issued a bench warrant for the defendant's arrest.

In his testimony before the masters, Judge Velasquez insisted that he was legally entitled to issue the warrants because a lawyer has a responsibility to be present or inform the court of his or her absence. He denied that his actions had the effect of punishing the defendants for their attorney's conduct. When asked whether he considered sanctioning the lawyer instead of issuing a warrant for the defendant, Judge Velasquez responded that he has never sanctioned a lawyer.

b. Count V A—People v. Kitchen

Attorney Shawn Mills represented Douglas Kitchen. On the date set for a plea "without the defendant's presence," there was no response when the case was called at 9:03 a.m. on the 8:15 a.m. calendar. Judge Velasquez understood that the defendant was not expected to be present, but nevertheless issued a $15,000 bench warrant for the defendant's arrest.

A few minutes after the warrant issued, Mr. Mills can be heard on the tape asking Judge Velasquez to call his case. Judge Velasquez neither called the case nor informed Mr. Mills that a warrant had been issued for his client's arrest. Later during a recess, Mr. Mills spoke to the judge and the prosecutor in chambers regarding a condition of Mr. Kitchen's probation—again, the judge did not tell Mr. Mills that he had issued a warrant.

When court resumed, Mr. Mills waited for his case to be called. As the court started to take another recess approximately 25 minutes later, Mr. Mills inquired about why his case had not been called. At that point, Judge Velasquez informed him that a warrant had been issued. Mr. Mills explained that he had been delayed in another courtroom, but had been in Judge Velasquez's courtroom five times that morning to see if his case had been called. Judge Velasquez refused to recall the warrant and told Mr. Mills "it isn't, not my responsibility to baby-sit attorneys' offices or manage their calendars."

Mr. Mills wrote the judge a letter later that day, noting that the bailiff had seen him several times that day and that he had once told the bailiff he was in another department. He asked that his client not be punished for his actions. The next day, Judge Velasquez recalled the warrant.

c. Count V C—People v. Hoffman

Judge Velasquez issued a warrant for Scott Hoffman when he missed his arraignment. Attorney Peter Leeming wrote the calendar clerk and explained that Mr. Hoffman had not received notice of the arraignment because he had moved. Mr. Leeming requested that the matter be set for November 17, 2004. When Judge Velasquez called the case on November 17, neither the attorney nor the defendant was present—the clerk had apparently failed to inform Mr. Leeming that his request had been granted. Judge Velasquez knew from Mr. Leeming's letter that Mr. Leeming intended to appear on Mr. Hoffman's behalf and the defendant would not be present. Another attorney in court offered to appear on Mr. Leeming's behalf. Judge Velasquez refused the request and issued a $15,000 warrant for the defendant (having recalled the original $6,000 warrant).

The next day Attorney George Gigarjian wrote Judge Velasquez and explained that he was handling Mr. Leeming's cases while he was out of town and that Mr. Leeming had not been informed of the November 17 date. Judge Velasquez denied Mr. Gigarjian's request to withdraw the warrant.

On December 7, 2004, Mr. Gigarjian spoke to Judge Velasquez regarding the warrant, but again the judge refused to withdraw the warrant. The defendant filed a peremptory challenge against Judge Velasquez and the case was reassigned. On December 20, 2004, Presiding Judge Sillman ordered the warrant recalled.

d. Count V D—People v. Holt

Attorney Shawn Mills represented Dustin Holt. When neither appeared at a pretrial hearing, Judge Velasquez issued a $15,000 warrant for the defendant's arrest.

A week later, Mr. Mills wrote Judge Velasquez and explained that he had mistakenly set the matter for a different date and asked that the warrant be withdrawn. He explained that Mr. Holt was in the military and could be charged with AWOL if he surrendered or was arrested on the warrant. Judge Velasquez made handwritten comments on the letter including, "As an attorney, you have an obligation to represent your client effectively. Your lack of responsibility is your own fault." The letter with the comments was placed in the file but not sent to Mr. Mills. Judge Velasquez denied the request to recall the warrant and Mr. Holt was arrested on the warrant.

e. Count V E—People v. Holder

Attorney Mills also represented Ronald Holder. When neither appeared at the pretrial conference, Judge Velasquez issued a $15,000 warrant for the defendant's arrest. The next day, Mr. Mills wrote to the court clerk and asked that the matter be recalendared. Judge Velasquez denied the request. Mr. Holder was arrested on the warrant.

f. Count V F—People v. Huggins

Attorney Frank Dice represented Demetrious Huggins. When neither appeared at a scheduled court appearance on January 5, 2005, Judge Velasquez issued a bench warrant for the defendant.

On February 7, 2005, Mr. Dice sent a letter to the Monterey County Superior Court in which he explained that he had missed the court date because of a failure in the office calendaring system. He said that his attempts to have the matter recalendared had not been processed. Mr. Dice stated that Mr. Huggins's case did not fall within any of the provisions of Penal Code section 978.5, which specifies when warrants may be issued, and attached a copy of the statute. The letter further stated, "Sanctions under Civil Code are appropriate . . . against counsel. [¶] Mr. Huggins should not suffer because counsel missed a court appearance."

Judge Velasquez reset the matter and recalled the bench warrant. However, Mr. Dice failed to appear again at a subsequent court appearance and another warrant was issued. At Attorney Dice's request, the matter was recalendared and the warrant was recalled.

g. Count V G—People v. Huerta/People v. Kammer

Attorney Steve Liner was appearing for the defendants Huerta and Kammer. The record does not reflect whether Mr. Liner had previously appeared for either defendant or whether a section 977 authorization was noted in the court file.

When the calendar was first called in the morning, Mr. Liner asked that his two cases be called but did not identify them by name. Judge Velasquez responded "just a minute," and called another case. When Judge Velasquez called the Huerta and Kammer matters, there was no appearance and bench warrants were issued for each defendant.

When Mr. Liner returned to the courtroom, he reminded Judge Velasquez that he had been in court earlier that morning and that Judge Velasquez had "refused to call my case." Judge Velasquez told Mr. Liner that he did not want to put Mr. Liner's cases "in front of other people," because "[y]ou're nothing special." Judge Velasquez further informed Mr. Liner that it was his responsibility to "come here on time" and if he did not "that's your problem."

The same day, Judge Velasquez was disqualified pursuant to an affidavit of disqualification under Code of Civil Procedure section 170.6. Also, on the same day, the presiding judge recalled the warrants for defendants Huerta and Kammer.

Over three weeks later, Attorney Steve Liner appeared before Judge Velasquez on an unrelated matter. By this time, Judge Velasquez knew he had been disqualified in the Kammer and Huerta matters. Despite that, he mentioned the cases by name and demanded that Mr. Liner provide him with copies of letters of complaint that Mr. Liner had submitted to the presiding judge. He told Mr. Liner that he expected the letters by 5:00 p.m. that day. Judge Velasquez also warned Mr. Liner, "[i]f [the letters] are incorrect, you will be dealing with the Bar . . . ."

Judge Velasquez acknowledged that he was not aware of any authority that permitted him to order production of the letters.

h. Count V H—People v. Gonzalez

Miguel Gonzalez's case was placed on the court's calendar at his public defender's (DPD) request to ask for a re-referral to a court-ordered program; a warrant had previously been issued for failure to enroll in the program. The DPD was not present when the case was called because she thought it was on a later calendar. Judge Velasquez was told that the DPD would be right back and he fully expected that she would return, as she was the assigned public defender in his courtroom. Nevertheless, he issued a warrant for the defendant's arrest.

Later that morning, the DPD asked about the Gonzalez warrant and told the judge that she thought the matter was on later in the morning. Judge Velasquez knew that the DPD wanted him to recall the warrant, but it was not recalled until over two months later.

2. Conclusions of Law

The masters concluded that Judge Velasquez did not commit misconduct in issuing the warrants, but did engage in misconduct in failing to recall them when he learned that the failure to appear was the result of the attorney's mistake and not the client's. We conclude that Judge Velasquez engaged in willful misconduct both by issuing the warrants when he knew that the defendants were not present because they were proceeding under section 977 and by subsequently refusing to recall the warrants upon the attorneys' requests. We further determine that Judge Velasquez engaged in willful misconduct by ordering an attorney to produce letters that had been submitted to the presiding judge when Judge Velasquez knew that he had been disqualified in the cases that were the subject of the letters.

Issuing Bench Warrants

In his briefs to the commission, Judge Velasquez maintained that his conduct in issuing the warrants constitutes at most legal error citing Oberholzer, supra, 20 Cal.4th 371. In his oral presentation before the commission, Judge Velasquez conceded that he had improperly penalized defendants for their attorney's failure to appear. We conclude that Judge Velasquez manifested a callous indifference to the bounds of his authority by issuing bench warrants for defendants when he knew they were not required to appear, and did so for the improper purpose of teaching the defendants' attorneys a lesson. The judge's misconduct resulted in the incarceration of at least two defendants in violation of due process.

The masters made a factual finding, which we have adopted, that in each of the cases "the defendant had authorized counsel to appear for him" pursuant to section 977. Section 977 provides that a misdemeanor defendant may "appear by counsel only," except in specified circumstances that are not applicable here. This section "confers upon a defendant in a misdemeanor proceeding a 'statutory right to be absent under the Penal Code.' " (Simmons v. Superior Court (1988) 203 Cal.App.3d 71, 76 [249 Cal.Rptr. 721], quoting People v. Kriss (1979) 96 Cal.App.3d 913, 916 [158 Cal.Rptr. 420]; see Olney v. Municipal Court (1982) 133 Cal.App.3d 455, 459 [184 Cal.Rptr. 78].)

Penal Code section 978.5, subdivision (a), provides that a bench warrant may be issued whenever a defendant "fails to appear in court as required by law" (italics added). Since a misdemeanor defendant who has authorized an attorney to appear on his or her behalf is not required to appear (ibid.), a warrant cannot issue. Section 978.5 sets forth a nonexclusive list of circumstances where a bench warrant may issue, none of which applies in these cases. In Kloepfer, supra, 49 Cal.3d at page 851, the judge's removal was based in part on issuing a warrant for a misdemeanor defendant when counsel represented that he was appearing on the defendant's behalf. The Supreme Court stated: "Issuance of the warrant was proper only if the defendant had been ordered to appear and failed to do so. (See Pen. Code, § 978.5.)" (Ibid.) As we stated in the public admonishment of Judge Stephen Gildner, "[n]o reasonable or reasonably competent judge would assume or conclude" that a bench warrant could be issued when the defendant had not been ordered to appear or otherwise been given notice that his or her appearance was required. (In re Gildner (2005) Decision and Order Imposing Public Admonishment, p. 4.)[2]

(21) Issuance of the warrants constitutes more than mere legal error under Oberholzer, supra, 20 Cal.4th at page 398. Judge Velasquez disregarded the defendant's fundamental due process right to notice and seriously undermined the attorney-client relationship. In addition, he abused his authority and acted in bad faith with utter and conscious disregard for the limits of his authority by issuing warrants for defendants who were not required to appear. (Broadman, supra, 18 Cal.4th at p. 1092.) Further, he was performing a judicial act for a purpose other than the faithful discharge of his duties—to punish errant lawyers. (See Ross, supra, No. 174 at pp. 17–18, 32 [49 Cal.4th CJP Supp. at pp. 100, 111]; Van Voorhis, supra, No. 165 at pp. 9, 11, 18 [48 Cal.4th CJP Supp. at pp. 271, 273–274, 280–281].)

In each of these cases, there is clear and convincing evidence that Judge Velasquez knew at the time he issued the warrant that the failure to appear was the fault of the attorney and not the defendant. In the proceedings before the special masters, Judge Velasquez testified: "I was issuing a warrant because that defendant's lawyer was not present." The appropriate remedy would have been to sanction the lawyer, rather than penalizing the defendant by issuing a bench warrant.

We conclude that the judge's conduct in issuing the warrants violated canons 1, 2A, 3B(2), 3B(4), 3B(7) and 3B(8). Having determined that Judge Velasquez performed these judicial acts in bad faith (with conscious disregard for the limits of his authority and for a corrupt purpose), we conclude that he engaged in willful misconduct with regard to the issuance of the bench warrants in counts V A (Kitchen), V C (Hoffman), V D (Holt), V E (Holder), and V F (Huggins).

The misconduct in issuing the warrant was exacerbated by Judge Velasquez's refusal to withdraw the warrant when the lawyer subsequently explained his absence and requested that the warrant be withdrawn. The handwritten note on Mr. Mill's letter in the Holt matter admonishing the attorney's "lack of responsibility" manifests the extent to which Judge Velasquez became embroiled with the attorneys. Punishing a defendant for the actions of his or her attorney is callous and punitive.

There is not clear and convincing evidence that Judge Velasquez was aware that the defendants in the Huerta and Kammer (count V G) matters were proceeding under section 977 at the time he issued the warrants. As such, we conclude that there is no misconduct in the issuance of the warrants in those cases. However, Judge Velasquez did commit willful misconduct in refusing to recall the warrant when Attorney Liner arrived later that morning. Further, as we explain next, Judge Velasquez's subsequent actions in those cases constitute additional willful misconduct.

Ordering Attorney to Produce Letters

(22) The masters found that Judge Velasquez ordered Attorney Liner to deliver the letters to him when he "had no authority to make such an order, as he was disqualified from acting in the only case to which those letters had any arguable relevance." This conduct, the masters concluded, violated Code of Civil Procedure section 170.4 (which delineates the power of a disqualified judge) and canons 1, 2A, 3B(2) and 3B(4). We concur and adopt these findings and conclusions as our own. However, we decline to adopt the legal conclusion of the masters that this conduct constitutes only improper action; instead, we conclude that it constitutes willful misconduct.

(23) It is well established that a judge is prohibited from taking any further action in a case once disqualified, including questioning or criticizing the attorney who filed an affidavit of disqualification. (McCartney v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications (1974) 12 Cal.3d 512, 531–532 [116 Cal.Rptr. 260, 526 P.2d 268]; Inquiry Concerning Hall, No. 175, Decision and Order Removing Judge Hall from Office (2006) p. 22 [49 Cal.4th CJP Supp. 146, 167] (Hall).) Moreover, a judge is expected to know the proper procedure for handling a motion to disqualify. (Spruance v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications (1975) 13 Cal.3d 778, 797 [119 Cal.Rptr. 841, 532 P.2d 1209].) Judge Velasquez knew he had been disqualified in the case and conceded that he was not aware of any authority that permitted him to order Mr. Liner to produce the letters. As such, he acted with knowledge of, or a conscious disregard for, the limits of his authority.

Finally, Judge Velasquez not only exceeded his authority, but did so to pursue a personal interest in proving that Mr. Liner had lied to the presiding judge about the events in the Huerta and Kammer matters. As such, he was performing a judicial act for a purpose other than the faithful discharge of his judicial duties, providing a further basis for our conclusion that he acted in bad faith. (See Ross, supra, No. 174 at pp. 17–18 [49 Cal.4th CJP Supp. at pp. 99–100].)

F. Count VI: Inappropriate Humor and Disparaging Remarks

1. Findings of Fact

In the 14 instances charged in count VI, Judge Velasquez is alleged to have made inappropriate comments in the courtroom, including joking about imposing jail time and disparaging attorneys. We reach the following findings of fact from our own independent review of the record.

The following are the judge's "jokes" about imposing jail time:

Count VI A, People v. Martinez: In response to the defendant's asking if he could work off the fine, Judge Velasquez said: "I wasn't going to give you any jail time, but if you want some, I'll give you some. How many days would you like? You have 180 to pick from."

Count VI B, People v. Oksen: In response to the defendant's asking if he could do home confinement instead of 10 days' jail, Judge Velasquez said, "I'll give you a full year if you want it."

Count VI C, People v. Lutz: In response to the defendant's asking if he had to worry about the warrant that had just been recalled, Judge Velasquez said: "Unless, you want us to execute it?"

Count VI D, People v. McGill: In response to the defendant's asking if jail time would be imposed, Judge Velasquez said: "If you want some, I'll give you some."

Count VI E, People v. Flores: In response to the defendant's asking a question about his fine, Judge Velasquez said: "Would you like some jail?"

Count VI G, People v. Lainez: At sentencing, Judge Velasquez said to the defendant: "You're only going to be locked up for one year unless you want two years, I'll give them to you. Do you want one year or two?"

Count VI H, People v. Kadjevich: While looking through the files of Mr. Kadjevich's old cases, Judge Velasquez pretended to find information that the defendant "owed" 35 days of jail time on a previous case. When the defendant objected that he had already served that time, Judge Velasquez said: "No, but new—new—new days, 35 new days." Eventually, Judge Velasquez told the defendant that he was "[j]ust kidding."

Count VI I, People v. Hildago: When the defendant's friend appeared for the defendant, Judge Velasquez asked who he was and then said: "Okay. We'll take you to jail. Come on in. No, I'm kidding."

Count VI J, People v. Narez: The defendant pled guilty after having been advised that he would not be sentenced to jail time. During sentencing, Judge Velasquez said: "Were you taken to jail at all? . . . [W]ould you like to be taken to jail?"

Count VI K, People v. McDonald: The defendant asked if he could say something after being told that he would be "put away" for a full year if he did not come back to court with $5,000 in child support. Judge Velasquez replied: "Before you go to jail for the full year or after?"

Count VI L, People v. James: A defendant who appeared to have mental problems, asked the judge if he had watched the presidential debate where the president "overturned the weapon charge and suggested that I pack a side-arm." Judge Velasquez asked him if that was "on cable or on local?"

Count VI M, People v. Lopez: After the defendant tried to correct the judge's pronunciation of his first name, Judge Velasquez said: "Oh, the minutes says Leonard. Leonardo is the one that's going to jail. Leonard is staying home. [¶] Which do you prefer? . . . I'm just kidding."

The following are the judge's remarks disparaging attorneys:

Count VI F, People v. Bowen: After the defendant's attorney made a two-and-a-half-minute plea that his client not be incarcerated, Judge Velasquez responded, "Let me wake up."

Count VI N, People v. LeBow: The defendant appeared without her attorney who had allegedly failed to file proof of acknowledgment of the terms of probation. After asking the name of the attorney, Judge Velasquez said in a crowded courtroom, "[T]his is the second case he blows it for his client." Later, the judge said: "You can bill him at $300 bucks an hour, charge him two hours."

2. Conclusions of Law

We conclude that Judge Velasquez engaged in prejudicial misconduct in each instance charged in count VI, except subcount L, James. Having adopted the masters' finding that the judge's comment about "cable or local" television in the James matter may have been intended to appease a defendant who apparently had mental problems, we conclude that there is not clear and convincing evidence of misconduct in that instance.

"Joking" About Incarceration

(24) The authority vested in the judiciary to incarcerate individuals carries with it a solemn responsibility that should never be taken lightly. A judge must be sensitive to the anxiety inherently associated with the possibility of serving time in custody. Judge Velasquez contends that he was attempting in good faith to interject humor into the courtroom. We fail to see how suggesting that a person is going to be incarcerated can ever be considered appropriate humor in the courtroom. Judge Velasquez was not trying to motivate the defendants to accept responsibility or succeed at probation—he was joking at the expense of the defendants and a person who appeared in court only as a favor to a friend.

(25) The people to whom Judge Velasquez addressed his jail comments were being respectful and appropriate and were often asking legitimate questions about their sentences. The fact that some of the judge's remarks were brief does not make them any less offensive or inappropriate. The comments most likely caused stress and concern to the defendants, even if for a brief moment. With regard to the remark to the defendant's friend in Hildago, the masters correctly observe that Judge Velasquez "appeared to have no appreciation for what may have been an anxious situation for the friend who may have been unfamiliar with the court system . . . ." In addition, Judge Velasquez's attempts at humor in a public courtroom under the circumstances were undignified, out of place, and prejudicial to public esteem for the judiciary. As such, the remarks violated canons 1, 2A, and 3B(4), and constitute prejudicial misconduct.

Disparaging Remarks Regarding Attorneys

(26) Disparaging and demeaning comments addressed to attorneys in open court have repeatedly been considered indicative of a lack of appropriate judicial temperament. (Van Voorhis, supra, No. 165 at pp. 5–23 [48 Cal.4th CJP Supp. at pp. 267–286]; Fletcher, supra, 19 Cal.4th at pp. 879–880; Kennick v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1990) 50 Cal.3d 297, 326–327 [267 Cal.Rptr. 293, 787 P.2d 591]; Kloepfer, supra, 49 Cal.3d at pp. 841–844, 849.) Such comments are inappropriate irrespective of the judge's personal opinion of the attorney's competence. (Van Voorhis, No. 165 at pp. 5–23 [48 Cal.4th CJP Supp. at pp. 267–286]; Fletcher, at pp. 879–880; Kennick, at pp. 326–327; Kloepfer, at pp. 841–844, 849.) As the masters concluded: "Belittling an attorney violates the ethical obligation in Canon 3B(4) to be dignified and courteous to all persons who come before the court, expressly attorneys. When inappropriate conduct occurs in front of the attorney's client, it may actually interfere with the attorney-client relationship."

As the masters observed, in Bowen, the defendant's attorney was making "a passionate but reasonable plea that his client, who was suffering from a disabling disease, not be placed in custody, even if the client herself had intimated otherwise." Judge Velasquez's response, "Let me wake up," was rude and disrespectful in violation of canons 1, 2A, and 3B(4). Judge Velasquez violated these same canons by questioning the competence of defendant LeBow's attorney in a crowded courtroom. We conclude that it would appear to an objective observer that the judge's comments in both the Bowen and LeBow matters were prejudicial to public esteem for the judicial office and as such constitute prejudicial misconduct.

We also note that Judge Velasquez's 1997 censure was based in part on essentially the same conduct—making "public statements disparaging fellow Monterey County judges and certain Monterey County attorneys."

G. Count VII: Allowing His Children in the Bench Area and in Chambers While Conducting Court Business

In light of our conclusions in counts I through VI, we take no action with respect to count VII.

IV. DISCIPLINE

A. Standards for Determining Appropriate Discipline

(27) In making our determination of the appropriate disciplinary sanction, we consider that the purpose of a judicial disciplinary proceeding is not punishment, " 'but rather the protection of the public, the enforcement of rigorous standards of judicial conduct, and the maintenance of public confidence in the integrity and independence of the judicial system.' " (Broadman, supra, 18 Cal.4th at p. 1112, quoting Adams v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 10 Cal.4th at p. 912.) Based on Supreme Court decisions, the commission has identified various factors that are relevant in determining the appropriate discipline, including (1) the number of acts of misconduct; (2) the existence of prior discipline; (3) whether the judge appreciates the inappropriateness of his or her conduct; (4) the judge's integrity; (5) the likelihood of future misconduct; and (6) the impact on the judicial system. (Ross, supra, No. 174 at pp. 63–64 [49 Cal.4th CJP Supp. at pp. 137–138]; Van Voorhis, supra, No. 165 at p. 31 [48 Cal.4th CJP Supp. at p. 295].)

By Judge Velasquez's own admission, he has engaged in numerous instances of serious misconduct. We have determined Judge Velasquez engaged in 21 instances of willful misconduct and 25 instances of prejudicial misconduct—a plethora of misconduct by any standard. In addition, the misconduct is wide ranging in both nature and impact. It was directed toward criminal defendants, attorneys, and even a person who appeared in court as a favor for a friend who was having difficulty making his court appearance.

(28) The Supreme Court has stated: "The number of wrongful acts is relevant to determining whether they were merely isolated occurrences or, instead, part of a course of conduct establishing 'lack of temperament and ability to perform judicial functions in an even-handed manner.' [Citation.]" (Fletcher, supra, 19 Cal.4th at p. 918, quoting Wenger v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1981) 29 Cal.3d 615, 653 [175 Cal.Rptr. 420, 630 P.2d 954].) The record before us demonstrates a disturbing and persistent pattern of misconduct that not only reflects a lack of judicial temperament, but utterly fails to comply with "the standards of judicial conduct that are essential if justice is to be meted out in every case." (Kloepfer, supra, 49 Cal.3d at p. 866, original italics.)

2. Prior Discipline

Judge Velasquez has already been censured, the most serious form of discipline short of removal available to the commission. The 1997 censure was based on the following misconduct: (1) displaying a crucifix on the wall behind the bench; (2) authorizing a private group to use his name with his judicial title in a newspaper advertisement endorsing one side in the ongoing abortion debate; (3) creating an appearance of prejudgment by publicly announcing a policy of imposing a specific predetermined sentence in all DUI cases; and (4) making statements in court, in newspapers, and on television broadcasts disparaging fellow Monterey County judges and certain attorneys, including accusing attorneys of incompetence and fellow judges of racism and conspiring to "manipulate" his calendar and make him "look bad." (Inquiry Concerning Velasquez (1997) No. 139, Decision and Order Imposing Public Censure.)

The commission's decision not to remove Judge Velasquez in 1997 was based in part on the fact that "prior to the time that formal proceedings were instituted by the Commission, and throughout the past year, Judge Velasquez had refrained from further misconduct." Judge Velasquez's efforts at reform were short lived; he has since continued to engage in serious misconduct, some very similar to the conduct that led to his censure.

(29) In addition to the prior censure, Judge Velasquez received an advisory letter in April 2006 for addressing defendants directly in Spanish regarding matters of substance in violation of Code of Civil Procedure section 185, subdivision (a) which provides that all judicial proceedings are to be conducted in English.

Given the entirety of his disciplinary history and the misconduct at issue here, a second censure is clearly insufficient. It also would be contrary to the commission's "established policy and practice of escalating discipline for successive misconduct." (Hall, supra, No. 175 at p. 23 [49 Cal.4th CJP Supp. at p. 168].)

3. Appreciation of Misconduct

(30) "A judge's failure to appreciate or admit to the impropriety of his or her acts indicates a lack of capacity to reform." (Inquiry Concerning Platt (2003) No. 162, Decision and Order Removing Judge Platt from Office, p. 15 [48 Cal.4th CJP Supp. 227, 248]; see Ross, supra, No. 174 at p. 65 [49 Cal.4th CJP Supp. at p. 139].) In his appearance before the commission, Judge Velasquez orally assured the commission that he has learned from his past experiences and will refrain from engaging in future misconduct. However, his responses to the charges throughout these proceedings suggest otherwise. Judge Velasquez rarely displayed any recognition or understanding of the ethical and legal principles underlying the misconduct. Moreover, in many instances he has completely denied any wrongdoing.

In his testimony before the masters, Judge Velasquez conceded that he did not always handle the probation violation proceedings in count I properly, but denied that his procedures violated the defendants' due process rights. Even in the face of these charges, he failed to acknowledge the serious constitutional defects in his practice.

Judge Velasquez testified that he thought it was proper to tell defendants they would go to jail if they did not successfully complete diversion by attending AA meetings because jail could be imposed if they were later convicted. As the masters observed, he "did not appear to understand that his statements suggested to the defendants that the adverse consequences would be automatically imposed on the defendants if they failed to complete the AA meetings even though they had not entered a plea."

In his testimony before the special masters, Judge Velasquez compared "joking" about sending a defendant to jail with the injection of appropriate and good-natured humor during jury selection. There is no comparison between the two situations. Further, he fails to recognize that in the cases before the commission it was the nature of the joke that was inappropriate.

Regarding the ex parte phone call he made to a witness in the Manzo matter (count I B), Judge Velasquez testified that he did nothing wrong, because, "I'm trying to find the truth." This statement reflects a serious lack of understanding of basic due process principles, including the right to confront and cross-examine a witness. It also manifests his failure to appreciate that the boundaries of his judicial role prohibit him from engaging in private investigation of material facts of a pending case.

Judge Velasquez offered numerous other justifications and excuses for his conduct as noted in our factual findings. Special Master Justice Rubin aptly observed: "It did seem to me that there was a theme throughout the proceedings that . . . Judge Velasquez did not always articulate—at least did not seem to appreciate in his own mind what he was doing with respect to some of these actions. Calling it penalty, increasing jail time, in really contemptuous situations without using contempt, going from modification to probation violation in a kind of seamless way." Judge Velasquez's repeated failure to grasp the substance or seriousness of his misconduct leaves us with no confidence in his capacity to reform.

4. Integrity

(31) Integrity as it relates to a determination of the appropriate discipline has generally focused on honesty. (Ross, supra, No. 174 at pp. 68–69 [49 Cal.4th CJP Supp. at pp. 141–142]; Inquiry Concerning Hyde (2003) No. 166, Decision and Order Removing Judge Hyde from Office, pp. 29–30 [48 Cal.4th CJP Supp. 329, 366–367].) In this case, the misconduct itself does not involve dishonesty. However, Judge Velasquez was less than candid in his testimony before the special masters regarding one of the charges. He attempted to deflect responsibility for his misconduct in count II D (Maya) by falsely testifying that he threatened to impose jail time as part of the defendant's sentence for the underlying offense of trespass. The record, however, establishes that the threatened jail time was for the defendant's failure to pay attorney fees, which was patently improper.

5. Likelihood of Future Misconduct

(32) Judge Velasquez's repetition of misconduct after being publicly censured, and his unwillingness or inability to appreciate the principles underlying his current misconduct combine to lead us to the conclusion that there is a very strong likelihood, if not a certainty, of future misconduct if he is not removed. His repeated failure to comply with basic due process requirements and well-established legal authority after 11 years on the bench in a criminal assignment leaves us with no reasonable assurance that more time and the best of intentions would prevent future misconduct. Further, we concur with the following assessment by the masters: "The breadth of the previous and current misconduct suggests to us that Judge Velasquez does not appreciate the limits of his authority and the unique role a judge plays in our system of government."

Judge Velasquez points to the testimony of Attorney Lawrence Biegel as evidence of his capacity to reform. Mr. Biegel testified that he and the judge have recreated a professional relationship after Mr. Biegel was the target of disparaging remarks that were included in Judge Velasquez's 1997 censure. He also offered his opinion that Judge Velasquez has grown as a jurist. We reach the opposite conclusion. Despite having been censured for publicly accusing Mr. Biegel of malpractice, Judge Velasquez again engaged in the exact same conduct directed at a different attorney in LeBow.

6. Impact on Judicial System

(33) A pattern of misconduct reflecting abuse of authority and serious infringement of criminal defendants' constitutional rights necessarily has a negative impact on the judicial system. Such misconduct undermines the integrity of and respect for the judiciary and weakens the constitutional foundation of our system of justice. We are dismayed by the capricious and often callous manner in which Judge Velasquez treated criminal defendants and others who appeared before him. He manifested a blatant disrespect for the constitutional rights he has sworn to uphold by increasing sentences when a defendant dared to ask an appropriate and respectful question, incarcerating defendants without notice or a hearing, and issuing bench warrants for defendants when he knew they were not required to appear. Additionally, he set an undignified tone in his courtroom that demeaned the judiciary by quizzing defendants about how it felt to "peel out" based on his own youthful indiscretion, using humor inappropriately, and disparaging counsel and defendants.

B. Mitigating Evidence

Judge Velasquez presented evidence in mitigation consisting of testimony and declarations from character witnesses. For the most part, these witnesses testified to the judge's positive contributions to the community outside of his judicial capacity and his reputation as a role model in the Latino community.

Four Monterey County attorneys testified that they have found Judge Velasquez to be hard working, courteous, and appropriate in court. There is no evidence that any of the character witnesses were present in Judge Velasquez's court when any of the misconduct occurred.

(34) We take this character evidence into account in considering "the totality of the circumstances that are pertinent to our determination of the appropriate discipline." (Adams v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 10 Cal.4th at p. 912; see Kloepfer, supra, 49 Cal.3d at pp. 865–866; Ross, supra, No. 174 at p. 71 [49 Cal.4th CJP Supp. at p. 144].) The contributions Judge Velasquez has made to the community are laudable. We are also mindful of the challenges Judge Velasquez has faced in life as the son of migrant farmworkers. Nevertheless, these considerations are overwhelmed by the breadth and severity of the judge's past and present misconduct. Members of the community who appear before Judge Velasquez inside the courtroom are entitled to the same respect and dignity he accords those who consider him to be a role model outside the courtroom.

C. Order Removing Judge Velasquez From Office

Judge Velasquez urges the commission to impose a second censure rather than removal. Another censure would be woefully inadequate to address the egregious and persistent pattern of misconduct before us. Conscientious discharge of our duty to protect the public and maintain public confidence in the integrity and independence of the judiciary mandates that we remove Judge Velasquez from office.

Pursuant to the provisions of article VI, section 18 of the California Constitution, Judge José A. Velasquez hereby is ordered removed from his judicial office; pursuant to that section of the Constitution and rules 120(a) and 136 of the Rules of the Commission on Judicial Performance, Judge Velasquez is disqualified from acting as a judge.

Commission members Hon. Frederick P. Horn, Hon. Judith D. McConnell, Hon. Katherine Feinstein, Mr. Marshall B. Grossman, Mr. Michael A. Kahn, Ms. Patricia Miller, Mr. Jose C. Miramontes, Ms. Barbara Schraeger, and Mr. Lawrence Simi voted in favor of all the findings and conclusions expressed herein and in the foregoing order of removal and disqualification of Judge Velasquez. There are two vacancies on the commission.

The judge's petition for review by the Supreme Court was denied on October 10, 2007.

[No. 182. Oct. 2, 2007.]

INQUIRY CONCERNING JUDGE ROBERT G. SPITZER

SUMMARY

A disciplinary action was brought concerning a superior court judge for judicial misconduct involving inexcusable delays and inaction, false salary affidavits, embroilment, and ex parte communications. The judge often failed to give signed orders to his clerk and to make prompt rulings. He signed salary affidavits pursuant to Gov. Code, § 68210, and Cal. Const., art. VI, § 19, declaring that he had no matters pending for more than 90 days after submission, although he had been informed he had such matters. He engaged in ex parte communications regarding witnesses and the filing of a murder charge. He failed to respond to a preliminary investigation letter.

The Commission on Judicial Performance ordered that the judge be removed from his judicial office. The delays violated Cal. Code Jud. Ethics, canons 1, 2A, 3B, 3C, and constituted prejudicial misconduct and persistent failure to perform judicial duties. Submitting false salary affidavits, even if recklessly rather than knowingly, was willful misconduct. The ex parte communications violated canons 1, 2A, 3B, and constituted prejudicial misconduct as to some acts and willful misconduct and embroilment as to others. In light of the judge's lack of veracity, his failure to cooperate in the investigation under Gov. Code, § 68725, and the strong likelihood of future misconduct, removal under Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (b), was appropriate. (Opinion by Frederick P. Horn, Chairperson.)

HEADNOTES

(1) Judges § 6.2—Removal—Grounds—Prejudicial or Willful Misconduct or Persistent Nonperformance of Duties.—A judge may be removed from office for prejudicial misconduct, willful misconduct, or persistent failure to perform judicial duties (Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (b)).

(2) Judges § 6.2—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Grounds—Prejudicial Misconduct.—Prejudicial misconduct is conduct which a judge undertakes in good faith but which nevertheless would appear to an objective observer to be not only unjudicial conduct but also conduct prejudicial to public esteem for the judicial office.

(3) Judges § 8—Duties—Cooperation with Other Judges and Court Officials.—Judges have a duty to cooperate with other judges and court officials in the administration of court business (Cal. Code Jud. Ethics, canon 3C(1)).

(4) Judges § 6.2—Removal—Grounds—Persistent Nonperformance of Duties.—Persistent nonperformance of duties, an independent ground for removal, entails a pattern of legal or administrative omissions or inadequacies in the performance of a judge's duties.

(5) Judges § 8—Duties—Timely Deciding Submitted Matters—Salary Affidavit.—Under California law, judges are expected to decide matters submitted to them within 90 days of submission, and are prohibited from receiving their salaries during times when they have undecided matters under submission for more than 90 days (Cal. Const., art. VI, § 19). To be paid, the judge must sign an affidavit affirming he or she has no overdue cases (Gov. Code, § 68210).

(6) Judges § 6.2—Willful Misconduct—Elements.—Willful misconduct, the most serious form of judicial misconduct, consists of (1) unjudicial conduct (2) that is committed in bad faith (3) by a judge acting in his or her judicial capacity. Failure to comply with the California Code of Judicial Ethics is generally considered to constitute unjudicial conduct. The bad faith requirement for willful misconduct is satisfied when a judge is (1) performing a judicial act for a corrupt purpose (which is any purpose other than the faithful discharge of judicial duties), or (2) performing a judicial act with knowledge that the act is beyond the judge's lawful judicial power, or (3) performing a judicial act that exceeds the judge's lawful power with a conscious disregard for the limits of the judge's authority. A judge who transgresses the limits of a judge's lawful authority, with no regard for whether his or her acts are legally permitted, cannot be said to be acting with the purpose of faithfully discharging judicial duties. Rather, a judge's reckless disregard for, or utter indifference to, whether his or her judicial acts exceed the bounds of a judge's prescribed powers is a state of mind properly characterized as bad faith.

(7) Judges § 6.2—Willful Misconduct—Knowingly Signing False Salary Affidavits.—A judge who signs salary affidavits declaring that he has no cases under submission for over 90 days after having been informed that he has cases that are at least 90 days delayed acts in utter and reckless disregard for the truth and engages in willful misconduct.

(8) Judges § 8—Duties—Timely Deciding Submitted Matters—Salary Affidavit—Truthfulness.—A judge who executes a salary affidavit affirming he or she has no overdue rulings should take care to ensure that the statement is true when it is made. It is unjudicial and damaging to the public esteem for judicial office for a judge to submit false statements to obtain salary to which the judge is not then entitled.

(9) Judges § 6.2—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Grounds—Failure to Promptly Decide Submitted Matters.—The judge's failure to promptly decide submitted matters constituted prejudicial misconduct and a violation of the judge's duty to promptly and efficiently hear and decide all matters assigned to the judge (Cal. Code Jud. Ethics, canon 3B) and to act in a manner that promotes and preserves the integrity of the judiciary (Cal. Code Jud. Ethics, canons 1, 2A). The delays also constituted a persistent failure to perform judicial duties. Litigants and the public have a right to expect judges to take action on matters assigned to them in an expeditious and efficient manner. A judge's failure to act deprives litigants of resolution of their disputes and grievances through the court system. Litigants who are not represented by counsel, as is the case in all small claims actions, are especially vulnerable when a judge fails to take prompt action in their cases. This is particularly true when the judge fails to respond to litigants' inquiries concerning the status of their cases.

(10) Judges § 6.2—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Grounds—Prejudicial Misconduct—Inexcusable Delay and Inaction.—The judge's inexcusable judicial delay and inaction undermined public confidence in the judiciary, and therefore constituted prejudicial misconduct. The delays also demonstrated a continuing pattern of persistent failure to perform judicial duties.

(11) Judges § 6.2—Willful Misconduct—Ex Parte Communication.—The judge, who made an ex parte phone call to determine the availability of a witness and granted a defense motion to dismiss based on the information he obtained during the phone call without informing the parties of the ex parte communication, engaged in willful misconduct. Cal. Code Jud. Ethics, canon 3B(7), prohibits a judge from initiating, permitting or considering an ex parte communication outside the presence of the parties concerning a pending case. The canon provides an exception for ex parte communication intended for scheduling if the judge reasonably believes no party will gain an advantage as a result of the communication and the judge promptly notifies all parties of the substance of the communication (canon 3B(7)(d)).

(12) Judges § 6.2—Prejudicial Misconduct—Ex Parte Communication—Embroilment.—The judge, who took it upon himself to make an ex parte phone call to locate a witness and had an ex parte conversation with the witness, exhibited embroilment and engaged in prejudicial misconduct. The conduct violated Cal. Code Jud. Ethics, canons 1, 2, 3B(5), 3B(7), and 3B(8).

(13) Judges § 6.2—Prejudicial Misconduct—Embroilment.—Cal. Code Jud. Ethics, canon 3B(5), requires a judge to refrain from speech that could reasonably be perceived as reflecting bias or prejudice. The judge engaged in prejudicial misconduct and violated Cal. Code Jud. Ethics, canons 3B(4) and 3B(5) by making gratuitous public remarks demeaning the integrity of a deputy sheriff and suggesting that his negative impression of the deputy would be shared by other judges.

(14) Judges § 6.2—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Grounds—Prejudicial Misconduct—Embroilment.—Embroilment is the process by which the judge surrenders the role of impartial fact finder/decision maker, and joins the fray. The subjective intent or motivation of the judge is not a significant factor in assessing whether prejudicial conduct has occurred.

(15) Judges § 6.2—Willful Misconduct—Ex Parte Communication—Embroilment.—The judge, who had an ex parte communication with the mother of a murder victim in an attempt to persuade her to acquiesce in a manslaughter disposition and to enlist her in his efforts to persuade the district attorney to drop the murder charge, became embroiled, engaged in willful misconduct and violated Cal. Code Jud. Ethics, canons 1, 2A, 3B(5), 3B(7), and 3B(8).

(16) Judges § 6.2—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Grounds—Willful Misconduct—Judicial Capacity.—"Judicial capacity" within the definition of willful misconduct is not limited to actions taken from the bench. A judge acts in a judicial capacity when the judge is performing one of the functions, whether adjudicative or administrative in nature, that are associated with the position of a judge or when the judge uses the authority of the judicial office for an improper purpose.

(17) Judges § 6.4—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Proceedings—Duty to Cooperate.—Gov. Code, § 68725, requires judges to cooperate with and give reasonable assistance and information to the Commission on Judicial Performance in connection with its investigations.

(18) Judges § 6.2—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Grounds—Prejudicial Misconduct—Objective Observer Standard.—Prejudicial misconduct does not require that a judge act in bad faith; rather, it is conduct which would appear to an objective observer to be prejudicial to public esteem for the judiciary. The public expects judges to comply with the law.

(19) Judges § 6.4—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Proceedings—Determining Appropriate Discipline.—In determining the appropriate level of discipline, the ultimate objective of the Commission on Judicial Performance is to protect the judicial system and the public which it serves from judges who are unfit to hold office. The purpose of a commission disciplinary proceeding is not punishment, but rather the protection of the public, the enforcement of rigorous standards of judicial conduct, and the maintenance of public confidence in the integrity and independence of the judicial system.

(20) Judges § 6.4—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Proceedings—Determining Appropriate Discipline—Factors—Number of Acts of Misconduct.—The number of acts of misconduct is relevant to discipline to the extent it shows isolated incidents, or a pattern of misbehavior that demonstrates the judge lacks judicial temperament and the ability to perform judicial functions in an evenhanded manner.

(21) Judges § 6.4—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Proceedings—Determining Appropriate Discipline—Factors—Failure to Appreciate or Admit Impropriety.—A judge's failure to appreciate or admit to the impropriety of his or her acts indicates a lack of capacity to reform.

(22) Judges § 8—Duties—Diligently Discharging Administrative Responsibilities.—Faithful discharge of judicial responsibilities requires the ability to multitask. In addition to handling the cases that come before them, judges are expected to diligently discharge their administrative responsibilities and to cooperate with other judges and court officials in the administration of court business (Cal. Code Jud. Ethics, canon 3C(1)).

(23) Judges § 6.4—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Proceedings—Determining Appropriate Discipline—Factors—Lack of Veracity.—Honesty is a minimum qualification for every judge. If the essential quality of veracity is lacking, other positive qualities of the person cannot redeem or compensate for the missing fundamental.

(24) Judges § 6.2—Removal—Grounds—Providing False Information During Investigation.—There are few judicial actions that provide greater justification for removal from office than the action of a judge in deliberately providing false information to the Commission on Judicial Performance in the course of its investigation into charges of wilful misconduct on the part of the judge.

(25) Judges § 6.2—Removal—Grounds—Embroilment and Persistent Non-performance of Duties.—The impact of the judge's misconduct and persistent failure to perform his judicial duties was significant. A pattern of misconduct consisting of delays, indecision, signing false salary affidavits, ex parte communication, embroilment, and failure to co-operate with his presiding judge and the Commission on Judicial Performance inevitably lowered public esteem for the judiciary. His indifference toward his obligation to promptly and efficiently decide matters had an adverse impact on the litigants who appeared before him and his fellow judges. A judge who is not competent to handle a civil calendar and who has a history of embroilment which at various times has resulted in his being disqualified from hearing criminal cases does not serve the public and cannot remain on the bench.

I.

INTRODUCTION AND PROCEDURAL HISTORY

This disciplinary matter concerns Judge Robert G. Spitzer, a judge of the Riverside County Superior Court. He was appointed to the municipal court in 1990 and became a superior court judge in 1998. The notice of formal proceedings, filed July 31, 2006, charges Judge Spitzer with eight counts of judicial misconduct.

Count I charges Judge Spitzer with backdating orders and failing to dispose of matters promptly and efficiently.

Count II charges Judge Spitzer with failing to decide matters that were under submission for decision for over 90 days and executing false salary affidavits in four cases.

Count III charges Judge Spitzer with failing to take action on pending matters in two cases.

Count IV charges Judge Spitzer with failing to timely decide matters submitted to him for decision in two cases.

Count V charges Judge Spitzer with improperly initiating an ex parte communication with a prosecution witness in a criminal case, considering information he obtained during the ex parte communication in dismissing the case, and making comments in open court reflecting bias against the prosecution witness.

Count VI charges Judge Spitzer with initiating an ex parte communication with a potential witness in a criminal case, improperly investigating the facts of the case, and arranging for the witness to give sworn testimony over the telephone, reflecting embroilment and bias.

Count VII charges Judge Spitzer with putting pressure on the district attorney's office to charge the defendant in a murder case with manslaughter, engaging in an ex parte communication with the decedent's mother in an attempt to persuade her to ask the district attorney's office to agree to a manslaughter plea, and suggesting to the decedent's family that the case would be dismissed if the jury was not able to reach a verdict on the murder charge after a retrial.

Count VIII charges Judge Spitzer with failing to cooperate with the commission during its preliminary investigation as required by law.

A panel of three special masters appointed by the California Supreme Court heard evidence in this disciplinary proceeding, made factual findings and issued their conclusions of law. The masters are the Hon. Fred K. Morrison, Associate Justice of the Court of Appeal, Third Appellate District, the Hon. Mary Jo Levinger, Judge of the Superior Court of Santa Clara County, and the Hon. Mark H. Tansil, Judge of the Superior Court of Sonoma County. The masters held an evidentiary hearing and filed a report with the commission on April 16, 2007. Judge Spitzer made an oral argument before the commission on August 29, 2007. Judge Spitzer is represented in this proceeding by Reginald A. Vitek and Heather L. Rosing of San Diego. The examiners for the commission are Andrew Blum and Bradford L. Battson.

The masters found the charges were proven by clear and convincing evidence, except for the charge in count I that Judge Spitzer backdated orders. Our review of the record leads us to the same conclusion. We adopt most of the masters' factual findings. We reach our own independent legal conclusions, which at times diverge from those of the masters. For reasons set forth in this decision, we conclude that Judge Spitzer engaged in willful misconduct by signing false salary affidavits with an utter disregard for the truth in two cases charged in count II, and through his embroilment and ex parte communications in two criminal cases charged in counts V and VII. With regard to the remaining proven charges, we conclude Judge Spitzer engaged in prejudicial misconduct. In addition, we conclude Judge Spitzer persistently failed to perform his judicial duties through his derelict practices which resulted in inexplicable delays and in some cases a complete failure to decide matters assigned to him, and by his failure to abide by his obligation to cooperate with the commission.

(1) A judge may be removed from office for prejudicial misconduct, willful misconduct, or persistent failure to perform judicial duties. (Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (b).) Judge Spitzer has engaged in a course of conduct over a significant period of time within each of these categories. The pattern of misconduct before us involving inexcusable delays, failure to act, and gross neglect of court orders demonstrates an unwillingness or inability to perform judicial functions which are essential to the fair and efficient administration of justice. Judge Spitzer also has engaged in willful misconduct involving the execution of false salary affidavits, embroilment, and ex parte communications which is fundamentally at odds with the integrity and restraint expected of the judiciary. Further, the lack of candor and accountability manifested by Judge Spitzer in these proceedings raises substantial concerns regarding his suitability to remain on the bench. For these and other reasons expressed in this decision, we order Judge Spitzer removed from office.

II.

FINDINGS OF FACT AND CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

The factual findings we make are adopted for the most part from those of the special masters, which we have determined are supported by clear and convincing evidence and worthy of deference. When necessary to our decision, we have made additional factual findings shown by clear and convincing evidence based on our review of the record. (Broadman v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1998) 18 Cal.4th 1079, 1090 [77 Cal.Rptr.2d 408, 959 P.2d 715] (Broadman); *Geiler v. ### A. Count I—Backdating and Delay

1. Findings of Fact and Conclusions of Law Concerning Backdating

Count I charges Judge Spitzer with delay in deciding matters and backdating orders to make it appear as if they had been decided in a timely fashion.

In each of the four cases charged, the order was given to the clerk for filing and entering into the computer ("processing") months after the date next to the judge's signature. Judge Spitzer testified to a practice of signing orders and placing them somewhere in his cluttered chambers or courtroom rather than giving them to his clerk to be processed. The masters found "[i]t is credible that if Judge Spitzer signed an order and did not put it out for processing it could get lost in chambers that by all accounts were extremely disorganized." As such, the masters concluded that there was not clear and convincing evidence of backdating.

We agree with the masters that the evidence of backdating does not meet the burden of proof by which commission proceedings are governed. The examiner has the burden of proving the charges by clear and convincing evidence. Clear and convincing evidence is " ' " 'so clear as to leave no substantial doubt'; 'sufficiently strong to command the unhesitating assent of every reasonable mind.' " ' " (Broadman, supra, 18 Cal.4th at p. 1090, quoting In re Angelia P. (1981) 28 Cal.3d 908, 919 [171 Cal.Rptr. 637, 623 P.2d 198].) The evidence must establish a "high probability" the charge is true, but need not prove the charge beyond a reasonable doubt. (Broadman, at p. 1090.)

Numerous witnesses, including Justice Douglas Miller, the former presiding judge,[1] and Tonia Bealer, Judge Spitzer's longtime courtroom clerk, testified that the judge's courtroom and chambers were in shambles. Files and loose documents were strewn about without any discernable organization. As a result, court records were routinely lost or misplaced.

Sometime between 2001 and 2002, the presiding judge was informed that Judge Spitzer was not taking care of routine matters in a timely fashion. As a result, routine matters that should have been assigned to Judge Spitzer had to be spread out among the other judges.

Missing documents and daily inquiries from attorneys and litigants regarding the status of cases pending before Judge Spitzer prompted the supervising judge to direct the court services director to conduct a housecleaning or inventory of the judge's courtroom and chambers. At least two inventories took place in late 2002 and early 2003, with Judge Spitzer's consent.

The masters found that Judge Spitzer has been "plagued" by organizational issues since "the beginning of his career in the district attorney's office." Based on the uncontested evidence supporting this finding and the complete state of disarray in the judge's courtroom and chambers, we concur with the masters that it is plausible signed orders were misplaced. Nevertheless, we do not consider Judge Spitzer's chronic state of disorganization and gross neglect of court records to be mitigating in any sense. While his dysfunctional practices may raise substantial doubts regarding backdating, as we discuss later in relation to the appropriate discipline, these practices raise serious concerns regarding his fitness to hold judicial office.

[1] Justice Miller has since been appointed to the California Court of Appeal, Fourth Appellate District, Division Two.

2. Findings of Fact Concerning Delays

The masters found Judge Spitzer's "practice of signing orders and not sending them to be entered and processed is inexplicable and amounts to a dereliction of duty . . . ." We agree.

In each of the four cases charged in count I, Judge Spitzer admitted significant delays in giving signed orders to his clerk for processing. The periods of delay were as follows:

1. Count I A (Hubbard v. Madia). The orders were dated August 30, 2002, but not processed until February 2003.

2. Count I B (City of Moreno Valley v. Southern Cal. Assn. of Governments (SCAG)). The judgment and writ were dated July 3, 2003, and file stamped July 7, 2003, but not processed until June 2004. SCAG's appeal, filed August 16, 2004, was dismissed as untimely because over thirteen months had elapsed since the "entry of judgment."

3. Count I C (California Casualty Insurance v. Methany (CCI)). The order was dated December 31, 2003, but not processed until June 2004.

4. Count I D (Sharp v. Betelli, S.P.A.). The order was dated May 10, 2004, but not processed until June 2004.

During the periods of delay in the last three cases, Judge Spitzer failed to cooperate with his presiding judge's repeated inquiries regarding the status of the cases and directives to resolve all outstanding matters. In early June, Judge Spitzer received an e-mail from Judge Miller informing him his paycheck would be withheld because the Sharp matter had been under submission for over 90 days. Within days of receiving this e-mail, the matters in count I B through D were processed.

Judge Spitzer suggested the Sharp matter (count I D) had not been timely processed because his clerk, Ms. Bealer, was on vacation and matters had piled up at her workstation while she was gone. The testimony of Ms. Bealer and her replacement clerk refutes this claim. Judge Spitzer testified that the signed document in the CCI matter (count I C) sat on Ms. Bealer's workstation for months waiting to be processed. However, Ms. Bealer testified that she kept up-to-date in processing documents because she did not have enough work to do during that time.

3. Conclusions of Law Concerning Delay

We conclude that these delays constitute a violation of the judge's duty (1) to dispose of matters promptly and efficiently (Cal. Code Jud. Ethics, canon 3B(8); all references to a canon are to the California Code of Judicial Ethics), (2) to uphold the integrity of the judiciary (canon 1), and (3) to act in a manner that promotes public confidence in the judiciary (canon 2A). The masters concluded, as do we, Judge Spitzer engaged in prejudicial misconduct, and persistently failed to perform judicial duties in each of the four cases charged.

(2) Prejudicial misconduct is " ' "conduct which a judge undertakes in good faith but which nevertheless would appear to an objective observer to be not only unjudicial conduct but conduct prejudicial to public esteem for the judicial office." ' " (Broadman, supra, 18 Cal.4th at p. 1092.) Judge Spitzer's imprudent and inexcusable delays prejudiced parties and were detrimental to the fair, orderly, and efficient administration of the court. SCAG's appeal was dismissed as untimely as a result of the judge's delay in processing the judgment. By allowing judicial orders to sit unprocessed in his cluttered chambers for months, Judge Spitzer showed a complete indifference to the rights of litigants and his judicial responsibilities. Limited court resources had to be expended conducting inventories of his courtroom and files searching for missing documents, responding to persistent complaints from attorneys and litigants, and corresponding with Judge Spitzer concerning his overdue cases.

(3) Moreover, we agree with the masters that the delays in this and subsequent counts were aggravated by Judge Spitzer's failure to cooperate with his presiding judge. Judges have a duty to "cooperate with other judges and court officials in the administration of court business." (Canon 3C(1); see also canon 3C(3) [presiding judges have duty to ensure the prompt disposition of matters before judges they supervise].) Rather than cooperating with his presiding judge, who made repeated attempts to get Judge Spitzer to resolve delayed matters, Judge Spitzer resented being "micro-managed." As a result, in the words of the masters, "Judge Spitzer became passive-aggressive and actually ignored some of the directions he received from Judge Miller (for example, an order to not start a new trial until all overdue matters were decided) . . . . The failure to cooperate with the presiding judge was foolish and unhelpful, since the presiding judge was seeking to assist him."

(4) These delays, when combined with similar derelict conduct in counts II through IV and count VIII, constitute a persistent failure to perform judicial duties. Persistent nonperformance of duties, an independent ground for removal, "entails a pattern of legal or administrative omissions or inadequacies in the performance of a judge's duties." (Doan v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1995) 11 Cal.4th 294, 312 [45 Cal.Rptr.2d 254, 902 P.2d 272] (Doan); see McCullough v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1989) 49 Cal.3d 186, 197 [260 Cal.Rptr. 557, 776 P.2d 259] [judge delayed signing judgment for six years].) The evidence clearly and convincingly establishes such a pattern.

B. Count II—Delay and False Salary Affidavits

(5) In the four cases included in this count, Judge Spitzer is charged with delaying decisions and signing salary affidavits falsely declaring he had no causes pending and undecided that had been under submission for more than 90 days. Under California law, judges are expected to decide matters submitted to them within 90 days of submission, and are prohibited from receiving their salaries during times when they have undecided matters under submission for more than 90 days. (Cal. Const., art. VI, § 19; Mardikian v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1985) 40 Cal.3d 473, 477, fn. 4 [220 Cal.Rptr. 833, 709 P.2d 852].) To be paid, the judge must sign an affidavit to that effect. (Gov. Code, § 68210.)

1. Findings of Fact

As all judges are required to do, Judge Spitzer signed monthly affidavits declaring that he had no matters pending for more than 90 days after submission prior to receiving his paycheck.[2] The masters found that Judge Spitzer delayed making decisions for more than 90 days after submission in each case charged in count II and signed erroneous salary affidavits during those delayed periods.

Judge Spitzer denied ever knowingly signing false salary affidavits. The masters found the evidence did not clearly and convincingly prove Judge Spitzer knowingly signed false salary affidavits. We defer to this finding. (See Fletcher v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1998) 19 Cal.4th 865, 878 [81 Cal.Rptr.2d 58, 968 P.2d 958] (Fletcher) ["special weight" given to the special masters' factual determinations]; Inquiry Concerning Freedman (2007)

[2] Judge Spitzer testified that there were occasions over the years when he did not sign salary affidavits because he knew he had matters under submission for more than 90 days. He was not specific as to which months or cases he was referring to and did not testify that he refrained from executing salary affidavits as a result of his delays in any of the cases charged in this count.

No. 179, Decision and Order Imposing Public Censure, p. 20 [49 Cal.4th CJP Supp. 223, 243] (Freedman).) However, as we discuss in relation to our legal conclusions, we reach our own determination that Judge Spitzer signed false salary affidavits with a reckless disregard for the truth in those instances where the evidence clearly and convincingly proves he continued to execute salary affidavits after being informed he had delayed matters[3] pending. (See Fletcher, supra, at p. 878 [commission has "expertise" with regard to legal conclusions].)

We make the following findings as to each case charged in count II, which are for the most part adopted from the masters' factual findings and are supported by clear and convincing evidence.

Count II A—McGuire v. L.M. Jones Roofing (McGuire)

On June 21, 1996, Judge Spitzer presided over a small claims trial de novo and took the matter under submission. Judge Spitzer testified he made a decision sometime in 1996, but did not sign an order. The masters rejected this testimony, finding clear and convincing evidence Judge Spitzer failed "to timely decide the McGuire matter for nearly six years, after inquiry from the parties and the plaintiff's family . . . ." We concur in this finding.

A few weeks after the trial, the plaintiff, Timothy McGuire, contacted Judge Spitzer's clerk and was told the file was missing. Mr. McGuire's wife contacted the court clerk numerous times after the trial and was told there was no ruling. Stella Provencio, Judge Spitzer's clerk from 1996 until 2001, received complaints from parties, and gave the messages to Judge Spitzer who had no response. The register of actions shows a call from the defendant on April 4, 2001, inquiring about the decision.

By Judge Spitzer's own account, he became aware a decision was never issued when he received a communication from the clerk's office regarding an inquiry from a party and again when the plaintiff's mother, who was a prospective juror, told him her son had not received a decision. These contacts were in 2001 and early 2002.

On May 17, 2002, Judge Spitzer conducted a second de novo trial and rendered a decision in favor of the plaintiff.

Judge Spitzer signed 39 false salary affidavits between August 1998 and April 2002 when the McGuire matter had been under submission for over 90 days and a decision had not been rendered.

[3] The term "delayed matters" refers to matters that were under submission to Judge Spitzer but undecided for more than 90 days.

Count II B—Pownall v. American City Mortgage Corp.

On July 30, 2001, Judge Spitzer heard the plaintiff's discovery motion which was under submission as of August 15, 2001. Judge Spitzer never issued a ruling on the discovery motion. The case was settled on December 21, 2001, and dismissed on January 22, 2002. Judge Spitzer signed a false salary affidavit on December 11, 2001, while the motion was pending for over 90 days.

Count II C—Lindsay v. City of Riverside (Lindsay)

The plaintiff's motion to tax or strike costs (objection to the defendant's request for costs) was submitted to Judge Spitzer on May 21, 2003. Judge Spitzer never ruled on the motion.

In July 2005, the commission sent Judge Spitzer a letter stating he "never issued a ruling on the plaintiff's Motion to Tax Costs and Fees" in this case. After receiving that letter, Judge Spitzer still did not resolve the matter and continued to sign salary affidavits.

Judge Spitzer signed false salary affidavits between September 2003, when the matter had been under submission for more than 90 days, and July 2006, when the notice of formal proceeding was filed, with the exception of February 2004.

Count II D—Cervantes v. Riverside Community Hosp.

In March 2004, Judge Spitzer took the defense discovery motion under submission. Judge Spitzer never ruled on the motion but continued to sign salary affidavits after the matter had been under submission for over 90 days.[4]

We defer to the masters' finding that Judge Spitzer "mistakenly thought Cervantes was not his case" after he was transferred to a criminal assignment on June 11, 2004. However, we question the reasonableness of this "mistake." As an experienced judge he should have been aware that a matter remains his to decide once it is under submission to him regardless of his present assignment, unless specifically told the matter has been assigned to another judge. Moreover, the presiding judge informed Judge Spitzer when he was transferred to criminal that he was to continue to work on those civil matters that were under submission.

[4] The false salary affidavits in this case are the same as those signed during part of the delay period in the Lindsay matter (count II C). Fewer false salary affidavits were executed in this case because the delay period was shorter than in the Lindsay matter.

2. Conclusions of Law

False Salary Affidavits

We conclude Judge Spitzer engaged in willful misconduct when he signed false salary affidavits after having been informed that he had delayed matters in the McGuire (count II A) and Lindsay matters (count II C), and engaged in prejudicial misconduct in executing the remaining false salary affidavits as charged in count II.

Failure to comply with the California Code of Judicial Ethics is generally considered to constitute unjudicial conduct. (Dodds, supra, 12 Cal.4th at p. 172.) By signing false salary affidavits, Judge Spitzer violated his duty to comply with the law and act in a manner that upholds the integrity of the judiciary (canons 1, 2A).

The "bad faith" requirement for willful misconduct is satisfied when a judge is "(1) performing a judicial act for a corrupt purpose (which is any purpose other than the faithful discharge of judicial duties), or (2) performing a judicial act with knowledge that the act is beyond the judge's lawful judicial power, or (3) performing a judicial act that exceeds the judge's lawful power with a conscious disregard for the limits of the judge's authority." (Broadman, supra, 18 Cal.4th at p. 1092.) The Supreme Court has described "conscious disregard" in this context as follows: "Because transgressing the limits of a judge's lawful authority is not the faithful discharge of judicial duties, a judge who performs such acts with no regard at all for whether they are legally permitted cannot be said to be acting with a purpose to faithfully discharge judicial duties. Thus, a judge's reckless or utter indifference to whether judicial acts being performed exceed the bounds of the judge's prescribed power is a state of mind properly characterized as bad faith." (Ibid.)

present case, we conclude Judge Spitzer engaged in willful misconduct by executing false salary affidavits in the McGuire (count II A) and Lindsay matters (count II C).

Judge Spitzer acknowledged he had been informed in 2001 and early 2002 that a decision had not been issued in the McGuire matter. Nevertheless, he failed to rule on the matter until May 2002 and continued to execute salary affidavits stating he had no delayed matters under submission.

In the Lindsay matter, Judge Spitzer testified he thought he ruled on the matter. However, in July 2005 he was expressly told in a letter from the commission that the plaintiff's motion to tax costs was undecided. At that point, Judge Spitzer's persistence in signing salary affidavits without even looking into whether the matter had been resolved constituted a reckless indifference to the truth.[5] We reject the judge's argument he did not have to decide the plaintiff's motion to tax costs because the case was concluded. The plaintiff was entitled to resolution of the motion regarding reimbursement of court costs and fees even if other issues in the case had been resolved.

(8) There is not clear and convincing evidence that Judge Spitzer executed other false salary affidavits charged in count II in bad faith. In those instances, we conclude that Judge Spitzer engaged in prejudicial misconduct by failing to ensure he did not have delayed matters pending before executing his salary affidavits. Judge Spitzer had no reliable system for keeping track of cases under submission. In determining that Judge Freedman engaged in prejudicial misconduct by executing false salary affidavits even when there was not clear and convincing evidence of bad faith, we stated: "A judge who executes a salary affidavit affirming he or she has no overdue rulings should take care to ensure that the statement is true when it is made. There is no question Judge Freedman knew the law, for he signed the state and county affidavits for the express purpose of receiving his salary. It is unjudicial and damaging to the public esteem for judicial office for a judge to submit false statements to obtain salary to which the judge is not then entitled." (Freedman, supra, No. 179 at p. 24 [49 Cal.4th CJP Supp. at p. 246].)

Judge Spitzer has similarly compromised public confidence in the judiciary by executing erroneous salary affidavits without ensuring their truthfulness.

Delays

(9) Judge Spitzer's failure to promptly decide the matters charged in count II constitutes prejudicial misconduct, separate and in addition to the misconduct associated with executing false salary affidavits. In the McGuire matter, he failed to rule for six years, and in the other three matters he never issued a ruling. These failures constitute a violation of the judge's duty to promptly and efficiently hear and decide all matters assigned to him (canons 3B(1), 3B(8)) and to act in a manner that promotes and preserves the integrity of the judiciary (canons 1 & 2A). Litigants and the public have a right to expect judges to take action on matters assigned to them in an expeditious and efficient manner. A judge's failure to act deprives litigants of resolution of their disputes and grievances through the court system. Litigants who are not represented by counsel, as is the case in all small claims actions, are especially vulnerable when a judge fails to take prompt action in their cases. This is particularly true when the judge fails to respond to litigants' inquiries concerning the status of their cases, as occurred in the McGuire matter.

The masters concluded that the failure to promptly rule on submitted matters in count II constitutes prejudicial misconduct and a persistent failure to perform judicial duties, and we adopt these conclusions as our own. (In re McCullough (1987) 43 Cal.3d 534, 535 [236 Cal.Rptr. 151, 734 P.2d 987]; In re Creede (1986) 42 Cal.3d 1098, 1099 [233 Cal.Rptr. 1, 729 P.2d 79] ["protracted delays served to damage the esteem of the public for the judiciary . . ."]; Mardikian v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 40 Cal.3d at pp. 482, 485; see also Freedman, supra, No. 179 at p. 17 [49 Cal.4th CJP Supp. at pp. 240–241].)

C. Counts III and IV—Delay and Inaction

1. Findings of Fact

In count III, Judge Spitzer is charged with failing to take necessary action in two civil cases. In Robinson v. Brighton Lake Hills Associates (count III A), a construction defects case, the parties submitted proposed case management orders in April 2003. Judge Spitzer conducted a case management conference in June 2003 but failed to issue a case management order. As the masters explain, a case management order in a construction defects case is "mandatory" and "important"; it "can help organize such complex, expensive litigation, facilitating the parties' consideration of alternative dispute resolution, and orchestrating streamlined, economical trial preparation."

In Portofino Development, L.P. v. Van Daele Development Corp. (count III B), Judge Spitzer failed to issue orders on the defendants' motions for summary judgment filed in April 2003 despite reminders from counsel. The masters accurately described motions for summary judgment as "a significant aspect of civil litigation," which need to be promptly ruled on "[i]n order for civil litigants to efficiently litigate or resolve their cases."

In count IV, Judge Spitzer is charged with failing to timely decide two matters. In a criminal case, People v. Gorton (count IV A), the defendant filed a request with Judge Spitzer for a certificate of probable cause in March 2002. The defendant, who had pled guilty and was sentenced by Judge Spitzer, was required to obtain this certificate in order to appeal certain issues in his case. (Cal. Rules of Court, rule 8.304(b).) Judge Spitzer was aware of the requirement that he act on the request within 20 days. Nevertheless, he did not rule on the request until directed to do so by the supervising judge of the criminal division almost 10 months later.

In Horst v. Del Webb Corp. (count IV B), Judge Spitzer took a matter involving an order to show cause under submission on April 11, 2003. He did not issue an order until four months later after receiving an e-mail inquiry concerning the case from the presiding judge. Judge Spitzer testified he prepared the order in his computer in June 2003, at which point he thought the matter was no longer under submission. We adopt the masters' finding that "[r]egardless whether Judge Spitzer believed that typing an order and leaving it in the computer was equivalent to making a decision in a submitted matter, this case was not decided until August 11, 2003."

2. Conclusions of Law

In each of the cases charged in counts III and IV, the masters concluded Judge Spitzer engaged in prejudicial misconduct and a persistent failure to perform judicial duties. We concur. By failing to take action on the matters in count III, Judge Spitzer violated his duty to decide "all matters assigned to him," in violation of canon 3B(1). His inaction in count III and his delays in deciding the matters in count IV, also constitute a violation of his duty pursuant to canon 3B(8) to dispose of all matters promptly and efficiently. Moreover, Judge Spitzer failed to act in a manner which promotes the integrity of the judiciary in violation of canons 1 and 2A.

(10) In the cases included in these counts, as in the delayed cases in counts I and II, Judge Spitzer gave little consideration to the interests of litigants whose matters had been under submission for prolonged periods of time. The criminal defendant in Gorton had to wait 10 months while incarcerated to determine whether he could appeal certain issues in his case as a result of Judge Spitzer's delay. Inexcusable judicial delay and inaction undermine public confidence in the judiciary, and, as such, constitute prejudicial misconduct. (In re McCullough, supra, 43 Cal.3d at p. 535.) The evidence clearly and convincingly establishes a continuing pattern of persistent failure to perform judicial duties (in conjunction with counts I and II). (See ibid.)

D. Count V—Ex Parte Communication and Embroilment (People v. Johnson)

1. Findings of Fact

During the criminal trial in People v. Johnson, Judge Spitzer became suspicious that the deputy district attorney (DDA) did not have all his witnesses for the trial, including the arresting officer, Deputy Villalobos. Based on that suspicion, on the evening of September 8, 1999, the judge called the watch commander where Deputy Villalobos worked and was told the deputy was on medical leave.

The next afternoon, Deputy Villalobos, the only remaining witness, was not present. Judge Spitzer granted the defense motion to dismiss the case. He took the information he received from the watch commander into consideration, but did not inform either counsel or the defendant of the ex parte communication.

In dismissing the case, Judge Spitzer commented: "It's not been without cost to Mr. Villalobos who, if he had a measure of credibility in the court, now walks into the court with a certain negative impression which will not be confined to this courtroom, but to every courtroom in western Riverside County." Judge Spitzer seemed upset and annoyed when he made this comment and refused to let the DDA address the court on the issue.

Later that day, the DDA and his supervisor, Chief DDA Soccio, went to Judge Spitzer's chambers and asked the judge why he felt compelled to dismiss the case. Judge Spitzer told them he called the watch commander the night before and was told Deputy Villalobos was on medical leave. The DDA told Judge Spitzer he felt it was unfair of the judge to dismiss the case without giving him an opportunity to explain that the deputy was on medical leave but still available to testify. At that point, according to the DDA, Judge Spitzer "kind of took a step back and responded that although he had made that call, that had not been the reason or played a role in the dismissal of the case."

The next day, after receiving a call from Deputy Villalobos explaining why he failed to appear at the trial, the DDA went back to Judge Spitzer's chambers to try to "salvage the deputy's reputation." During the conversation, Judge Spitzer indicated he felt the DDA had misunderstood what he said the day before. He explained the watch commander had called him for some other reason, and it occurred to him to ask about Deputy Villalobos's availability.

In his testimony before the special masters, Judge Spitzer denied initiating the phone call with the watch commander and stated the watch commander called him at home while he was the on-call magistrate.[6] We agree with the masters that this testimony is not credible. Both the DDA and Chief DDA Soccio testified Judge Spitzer told them the same day he dismissed the case that he called the watch commander. The judge's recantation the next day to the DDA reflects a consciousness of the inappropriateness of his having initiated the communication. Judge Spitzer's acknowledged suspicion that the witness was unavailable and concern that the trial was not proceeding in a timely manner provided motivation for him to make the call. We also agree with the masters that it is highly improbable, given the size of Riverside County, that Deputy Villalobos's watch commander would happen to call Judge Spitzer for an order and, if he did, that Judge Spitzer would know the officer calling was Deputy Villalobos's watch commander.

Judge Spitzer also denied that he considered his communication with the watch commander in making his decision to dismiss the matter. The masters rejected this testimony, as do we. When the DDA and the DDA supervisor asked why he dismissed the case, Judge Spitzer told them Deputy Villalobos was on medical leave.

2. Conclusions of Law

Judge Spitzer engaged in multiple instances of misconduct in this one case. As the masters concluded: "The initiation of the ex parte communication is the beginning of Judge Spitzer's embroilment in this case. He considered the information to the advantage of the defense, without allowing the prosecution to address his concerns. He made an intemperate comment about Deputy Villalobos's credibility. The comment showed a bias as to the officer's credibility and an indication that he would communicate bias to other judges on the bench." We conclude that Judge Spitzer engaged in willful misconduct by failing to promptly reveal the ex parte communication to the parties and by considering information obtained during the ex parte communication in his decision to dismiss the case. The judge's public comments questioning the deputy's credibility constitute prejudicial misconduct.

Judge Spitzer's conduct related to the ex parte communication violated canons 1 and 2A (duty to uphold integrity of judiciary and avoid impropriety and appearance of impropriety), and 3B(7) (prohibiting ex parte communications). As such, the conduct was unjudicial under the three-prong Broadman test. He was also acting in a judicial capacity.

[6] No evidence was admitted confirming or refuting that Judge Spitzer was an on-call magistrate that night.

(11) Judge Spitzer contends that the bad faith element of willful misconduct is not satisfied because he was acting in a good faith, but misguided, attempt to move the trial along by determining the availability of a witness for scheduling purposes. Canon 3B(7) prohibits a judge from initiating, permitting or considering an ex parte communication outside the presence of the parties concerning a pending case. The canon provides an exception for ex parte communication intended for scheduling if the judge reasonably believes no party will gain an advantage as a result of the communication and the judge promptly notifies all parties of the substance of the communication. (Canon 3B(7)(d).) We agree with and adopt the masters' conclusion that the ex parte communication did not fall within this exception.

(12) As an experienced jurist, Judge Spitzer should have realized that determining the availability of a prosecution witness could give one side an advantage if a motion to continue or dismiss was made during the trial. However, even if Judge Spitzer did not believe any party would gain an advantage at the time he initiated the communication, he knew by the next day the information he obtained from the watch commander gave the defense an advantage in its motion to dismiss. Nevertheless, Judge Spitzer did not inform the parties of the communication before dismissing the case. His own explanation for failing to disclose establishes he acted in bad faith: "I was put in the Hobson's [sic] choice kind of situation of . . . [¶] . . . now saying, 'Well, should I tell the parties about this?' If I inform the parties at that point in time, then I violate the Canon of Ethics which indicates that I shouldn't engage or communicate things to the parties which would give an advantage, a tactical advantage to one side over the other. And so that's the conduct that I would do differently."

Thus, by his own admission, Judge Spitzer made a conscious decision not to reveal the ex parte communication to the parties for a purpose other than the faithful discharge of his duties—so the parties would not know he violated the canons. (See Broadman, supra, 18 Cal.4th at p. 1092.) Further, by considering an ex parte communication he knew was a violation of the canons in reaching a judicial decision, Judge Spitzer knowingly exceeded the bounds of his authority, and thus acted in bad faith. (See ibid.)

"are the polar opposites of promoting public confidence in the integrity and impartiality of the judiciary." As such, the conduct violates canons 1 and 2A and constitutes prejudicial misconduct. (See Fletcher, supra, 19 Cal.4th at p. 899 [prejudicial misconduct when judge expressed prejudgment on the credibility of a potential witness who, according to the judge, had " 'broken many promises to this court' " and whose " 'credibility is not too high' "]; Dodds, supra, 12 Cal.4th at p. 176.)

E. Count VI—Ex Parte Communication and Embroilment (People v. Cobarruvias)

1. Findings of Fact

In March 2000, Judge Spitzer presided over the attempted murder trial in People v. Cobarruvias. During the trial, the defense attempted to call a police officer to testify about a statement made by the victim at the scene of the crime (an elementary school) that was inconsistent with the victim's trial testimony. Because the victim spoke Spanish, the officer used Margaret Herrera, the school principal, as a translator. In order to admit the prior inconsistent statement, the defense first needed to establish through Ms. Herrera that she was competent to interpret and the statement was accurately translated. However, Ms. Herrera, who was not under subpoena, was reportedly out of the state. The prosecution had completed its case, and the trial was close to conclusion.

Judge Spitzer took it upon himself to call Ms. Herrera's employer in an attempt to locate her. He did not consult with or inform either counsel or the defendant before making the call. Later the same day, the judge received a return call from Ms. Herrera. He spoke to her about her "observations" on the day she translated the victim's statement and whether she was fluent in Spanish, prerequisite facts to the admissibility of her testimony.

The next day, Judge Spitzer informed both counsel of his conversation with Ms. Herrera, and announced he had arranged for an immediate conference call with her. He then proceeded to conduct a hearing in chambers on the admissibility of the victim's prior inconsistent statement. Based on Ms. Herrera's telephone testimony, Judge Spitzer ruled the prior inconsistent statement was admissible.

Judge Spitzer testified he called Ms. Herrera to expedite the trial, but acknowledged the conversation exceeded the topic of scheduling.

2. Conclusions of Law

(14) Judge Spitzer's conduct in this case violates canons 1 and 2A (duty to uphold integrity of judiciary and avoid impropriety and appearance of impropriety), 3B(5) (judge to refrain from conduct that reasonably could be perceived as bias or prejudice), 3B(7) (prohibiting ex parte communications), and 3B(8) (duty to dispose of all judicial matters fairly). As the masters concluded, Judge Spitzer "abandoned his role as a neutral arbiter and became embroiled." "Embroilment is the process by which the judge surrenders the role of impartial factfinder/decisionmaker, and joins the fray." (Rothman, Cal. Jud. Conduct Handbook (3d ed. 2007) § 2.01, p. 37.) The judge's embroilment manifested through his improper ex parte communication with Ms. Herrera constitutes prejudicial misconduct.

Even if Judge Spitzer called Ms. Herrera in a good faith attempt to expedite the trial, his actions were " ' "prejudicial to public esteem for the judicial office." ' " (Broadman, supra, 18 Cal.4th at p. 1104, quoting Kennick v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1990) 50 Cal.3d 297, 314 [267 Cal.Rptr. 293, 787 P.2d 591].) "The subjective intent or motivation of the judge is not a significant factor in assessing whether prejudicial conduct has occurred . . . ." (Adams v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1995) 10 Cal.4th 866, 878 [42 Cal.Rptr.2d 606, 897 P.2d 544].) Judge Spitzer took on the role of the defense attorney by locating a defense witness and making arrangements for her testimony. Once again, Judge Spitzer improperly engaged in an ex parte communication that had the potential to benefit one side. (See, e.g., Wenger v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1981) 29 Cal.3d 615, 631–632 [175 Cal.Rptr. 420, 630 P.2d 954] [prejudicial misconduct for judge to conduct an investigation into defense raised in unlawful detainer case]; Ryan v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1988) 45 Cal.3d 518, 536–537 [247 Cal.Rptr. 378, 754 P.2d 724] (Ryan); Fletcher, supra, 19 Cal.4th at pp. 898–899.) By so doing, he crossed the line between a neutral arbitrator and an advocate.

F. Count VII—Ex Parte Communication and Embroilment (People v. Carr)

1. Findings of Fact

While presiding over the jury trial in People v. Carr in May 2004, Judge Spitzer engaged in his third and most egregious course of conduct involving embroilment and ex parte communications. The defendant was charged with the murder of a child stemming from a driving under the influence automobile accident. During a discussion with counsel concerning jury instructions, the judge urged the DDA to charge gross vehicular manslaughter as an alternative to murder. When the DDA declined, Judge Spitzer questioned the DDA's qualifications and requested that he speak with his supervisor to determine whether "the district attorney's office is not seeking to amend" the murder charge to add an alternative charge of gross vehicular manslaughter.

Judge Spitzer then requested a meeting with the DDA's supervisor. As a result, Chief DDA Cregor Datig appeared in front of Judge Spitzer that afternoon to explain his office's filing decision.

After the jury deadlocked 11 to one in favor of guilt on the murder charge and convicted the defendant of lesser offenses, Judge Spitzer addressed several members of the decedent's family who were present in the courtroom. He told them the case should be settled with a plea to vehicular manslaughter and even suggested he would dismiss the murder charge if a second jury did not reach a verdict.

The decedent's mother, Kathleen Kavanagh, arrived with her five-year-old son and 16-year-old daughter after court had recessed. Judge Spitzer saw her in the hallway and directed her into his office to talk. The office door was closed, with Ms. Kavanagh's children left in the hallway. According to Judge Spitzer, he only informed Ms. Kavanagh of what he had stated in open court earlier. However, contrary to Judge Spitzer's testimony, the record amply supports the masters' finding that "the judge's comments to Ms. Kavanagh went beyond what he said in open court." He read her sections of the Penal Code, explained the difference between second degree murder and manslaughter, and told her it would be difficult for the prosecution to prove murder. According to Ms. Kavanagh, Judge Spitzer said words to the effect of "Look, basically the charge should have never been murder in any degree; [i]t was a crime that should only have held a manslaughter charge. . . . Mr. Carr did not intentionally plan to kill your son, with all due respect, Ms. Kavanagh, for you and your son it was an accident." Judge Spitzer also told Ms. Kavanagh the defendant faced a "substantial amount of time" if convicted of manslaughter. Ms. Kavanagh replied: "Well, my son isn't never getting to come home; so why should he [the defendant] ever get to come home?"

Judge Spitzer also suggested Ms. Kavanagh should try to influence the DDA to charge the defendant with manslaughter so there would not have to be a second trial. He warned he would have to dismiss the murder charge if the second jury did not reach a verdict. Ms. Kavanagh testified he said words to the effect of "This is my house; and when you get your house, you can do things your way. And this is my house, and we're going to do things my way."[7] As a result of these and other comments, Ms. Kavanagh felt very intimidated by Judge Spitzer.

Judge Spitzer admitted his comments to Ms. Kavanagh gave the appearance he was trying to influence her to consent to a reduction of the murder charge to manslaughter, but denied that was his intention. The masters rejected the judge's testimony that his only intention was to "comfort" Ms. Kavanagh and provide her with the same information he had given those who appeared in court that day. We similarly reject this claim which the judge repeated at his oral argument before the commission. The testimony of Ms. Kavanagh clearly and convincingly proves that Judge Spitzer attempted to enlist her in his efforts to convince the district attorney's office to agree to a manslaughter disposition.

At a subsequent court appearance, Judge Spitzer continued to pressure the DDA for a manslaughter disposition. He told the DDA and defense attorney he had a conversation with Ms. Kavanagh and his impression was she was "not hostile" to a manslaughter plea bargain.

During a trial readiness conference the following week, after the defendant rejected an offer to plead guilty to manslaughter with a 44-year sentence, Judge Spitzer called Chief DDA Datig. Judge Spitzer inquired whether there was the possibility of further negotiations. He also told Mr. Datig he had talked to Ms. Kavanagh who was not opposed to a manslaughter plea. Mr. Datig informed the judge that further negotiation would not occur.

Judge Spitzer was disqualified from presiding over the second trial in the case. The district attorney's office subsequently disqualified him from all felony cases for a period of time.

The defendant was convicted of second degree murder at a second trial before a different judge.

2. Legal Conclusions

(15) The masters and we conclude that Judge Spitzer engaged in willful misconduct when "he met with Kathleen Kavanagh outside the presence of the parties, attempted to persuade her to acquiesce in a manslaughter disposition, and attempted to enlist her in his efforts to persuade the DA's office to drop the murder charge and charge the defendant with vehicular manslaughter." His willful misconduct also included pressuring the district attorney's office to amend the charges and his public statement in court attempting to persuade the decedent's family to agree to a manslaughter disposition. This conduct was unjudicial, the first element of willful misconduct, in that it violated canons 1, 2A (duty to uphold integrity of judiciary and avoid appearance of impropriety), 3B(5) (duty to perform judicial duties without bias or prejudice), 3B(7) (prohibiting ex parte communications), and 3B(8) (duty to dispose of all judicial matters fairly). The prohibition against ex parte communications concerning pending or impending cases applies to Judge

Spitzer's conversation with Ms. Kavanagh because she was a potential witness at the retrial. In addition, it was improper for Judge Spitzer to enlist Ms. Kavanagh as his agent in communicating his desire to have the case resolved with a manslaughter plea, since canon 3B(7) prohibited ex parte communication with the prosecutor.

Judge Spitzer acted in bad faith, the second element of willful misconduct. He acted for a purpose other than the faithful discharge of his judicial duties (Broadman, supra, 18 Cal.4th at p. 1092); he was improperly attempting to intrude on the functions of another branch of government. In Ryan, supra, 45 Cal.3d at pages 535–536, the Supreme Court determined the judge engaged in willful misconduct when, after conducting a preliminary hearing, he called the district attorney ex parte and urged him to pursue the matter as a felony.[8] (See also Gonzalez v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1983) 33 Cal.3d 359, 369 [188 Cal.Rptr. 880, 657 P.2d 372].)

We agree with the masters' conclusion that, as he had in the previous two counts, Judge Spitzer once again "abandoned his role as a neutral arbiter and became embroiled in the case." Judge Spitzer disputes this and maintains he was acting in good faith for the purpose of providing Ms. Kavanagh with comfort and clarification of the legal issues. However, as previously discussed, like the masters we have rejected the judge's testimony in this regard. In his testimony before the special masters, Judge Spitzer concurred with the conclusion of the judge who ruled on the motion to disqualify him from the retrial that "Judge Spitzer took unusual steps to try to influence the office of the District Attorney to exercise his discretion to prosecute this defendant for manslaughter," and later "to try to influence the District Attorney to offer the defendant an acceptable plea bargain for manslaughter."

Far from perceiving Judge Spitzer's comments as comforting, Ms. Kavanagh testified that she "took it as he was intimidating me." Attempting to convince a mother whose child was killed by a drunk driver that her child's death was unintentional by reference to Penal Codes, legal terminology, and sentence calculations reflects an alarming lack of sensitivity in addition to being extraordinarily inappropriate and unjudicial.

[8] Judge Spitzer contends the commission did not find willful misconduct under similar factual circumstances in the public admonishments of Judge Susanne Shaw (Inquiry Concerning Shaw (2000) No. 156, Decision and Order Imposing Public Admonishment [48 Cal.4th CJP Supp. 125]), Judge Bruce Clayton Mills (2006), and Judge Ronald Maciel (1997). In the Mills and Maciel matters the commission did not address whether the judge's improper ex parte communications were willful or prejudicial misconduct. In Shaw, the commission adopted the masters' conclusion that the judge engaged in prejudicial misconduct when she told the DDA not to undercut the 30-day offer she made to a misdemeanor defendant. Each case turns on its own facts, and the facts in Shaw do not present the same degree of embroilment and improper conduct that is present in this case.

(16) We reject Judge Spitzer's argument that his conduct cannot be considered willful misconduct because he was not acting in a judicial capacity. "Judicial capacity" within the definition of willful misconduct is not limited to actions taken from the bench. (See Ryan, supra, 45 Cal.3d at pp. 535–536.) A judge acts in a "judicial capacity" when the judge is "performing one of the functions, whether adjudicative or administrative in nature, that are associated with the position of a judge or when the judge uses . . . the authority of the judicial office for an improper purpose." (Broadman, supra, 18 Cal.4th at p. 1104, citing Dodds, supra, 12 Cal.4th at p. 172.)

The facts of two cases cited by Judge Spitzer in which the Supreme Court held the judge was not acting in a judicial capacity are not analogous to the facts of this case. In Dodds, the misconduct did not relate to a case pending before the judge. (Dodds, supra, 12 Cal.4th at pp. 170–171, 175–176 [judge failed to report a fellow judge he saw deflating a tire in the court parking lot and suggested to court staff they delay making a statement to the authorities].) In Broadman, the judge made comments on a pending case in the course of a press interview. In contrast, Judge Spitzer made statements to a person involved in a case pending before him and used the authority of his judicial office in an attempt to influence the district attorney's office. As such, he was clearly acting in a judicial capacity.

We conclude Judge Spitzer engaged in a course of conduct constituting willful misconduct.

G. Count VIII—Failure to Cooperate with the Commission

1. Findings of Fact

In this final count, Judge Spitzer is charged with failing to cooperate with the commission during its preliminary investigation of these proceedings. On July 14, 2005, the commission sent Judge Spitzer a preliminary investigation letter, requesting a response to the allegations set forth in the letter. Through counsel, the judge made three requests for extensions of time to respond. The final extension was granted until November 8, 2005, at which time there was no response from the judge. On January 18, 2006, Judge Spitzer, who was no longer represented by counsel, faxed a letter to the commission indicating he was waiting for transcripts and would endeavor to respond within the next two weeks. Judge Spitzer never responded to the allegations in the preliminary investigation letter.

2. Conclusions of Law

(17) Government Code section 68725 requires judges to "co-operate with and give reasonable assistance and information" to the commission in connection with its investigations. The masters concluded, as do we, that Judge Spitzer violated this legal requirement and, in so doing, violated canons 1 and 2A and engaged in prejudicial misconduct. (Doan, supra, 11 Cal.4th at pp. 337–338 [prejudicial misconduct when judge asked two friends not to cooperate with commission investigators and refused to cooperate with, or give assistance to the commission during its preliminary investigation].)

(18) Judge Spitzer urges the commission to find his conduct to be improper action rather than prejudicial misconduct. He contends his lack of response is attributable to his failure to appropriately prioritize his required work, rather than a willful disregard of his responsibilities. Prejudicial misconduct does not require that the judge act in bad faith; rather, it is conduct which would appear to an objective observer to be prejudicial to public esteem for the judiciary. (Broadman, supra, 18 Cal.4th at p. 1092.) The public expects judges to comply with the law. Judge Spitzer was aware of his legal obligation to cooperate with the commission. His explanation for failing to do so, that he placed priority on his caseload, is belied by his persistent failure to attend to his judicial obligations as reflected in the misconduct before us.

We recognize that Judge Spitzer was caring for his ill mother in September and October; however, his response was requested in July and the commission provided him with three extensions of time. Moreover, as the masters found, he never requested time off from his judicial responsibilities to prepare a response.

Judge Spitzer's failure to cooperate with the commission, when combined with the delays and failure to take action in counts I through IV, constitutes a persistent failure to perform judicial duties. (Doan, supra, 11 Cal.4th at p. 312.)

III.

A. Introduction

(19) In determining the appropriate level of discipline, our "ultimate objective is to protect the judicial system and the public which it serves from judges who are unfit to hold office." (McComb v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1977) 19 Cal.3d Spec. Trib. Supp. 1, 9 [138 Cal.Rptr. 459, 564 P.2d 1]; see Doan, supra, 11 Cal.4th at p. 314.) The purpose of a commission disciplinary proceeding " 'is not punishment, but rather the protection of the public, the enforcement of rigorous standards of judicial conduct, and the maintenance of public confidence in the integrity and independence of the judicial system.' " (Broadman, supra, 18 Cal.4th at pp. 1111–1112, quoting Adams v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 10 Cal.4th at p. 912.) After careful consideration, we have concluded that these objectives can only be met through removal from office. As we explain below, Judge Spitzer has engaged in a course of conduct which seriously undermines public confidence in the fair and competent administration of justice and demonstrates a lack of ability and temperament to perform judicial functions. We are left with no confidence in his ability to refrain from future misconduct.

B. Analysis

In our analysis, we address those factors which we have previously considered relevant when determining what discipline is appropriate in a given case. (Inquiry Concerning Ross (2005) No. 174, Decision and Order Removing Judge Ross from Office, pp. 63–64 [49 Cal.4th CJP Supp. 79, 137–138]; Inquiry Concerning Van Voorhis (2003) No. 165, Decision and Order Removing Judge Van Voorhis from Office, p. 31 [48 Cal.4th CJP Supp. 257, 295].) Within our discussion of these standards, we also address factors in aggravation and mitigation listed in the masters' report.

1. Number of Acts of Misconduct

(20) The number of acts of misconduct is relevant to discipline to the extent it shows isolated incidents, or a pattern of misbehavior that demonstrates the judge lacks judicial temperament and the " ' "ability to perform judicial functions in an even-handed manner." ' " (Fletcher, supra, 19 Cal.4th at p. 918 [pervasiveness of misconduct over the judge's entire career demonstrated unfitness for office].) Judge Spitzer has engaged in numerous instances of willful and prejudicial misconduct over a period of 10 years. The misconduct involves dereliction of judicial duties, embroilment, ex parte communications, and executing at least 70 false salary affidavits, some of which were signed with utter disregard for the truth. This pattern of repeated wrongdoing leaves us with no doubt that Judge Spitzer lacks the temperament and ability to perform judicial functions with the competence, temperament, and impartiality expected of the judiciary.

2. Appreciation of Misconduct

(21) "A judge's failure to appreciate or admit to the impropriety of his or her acts indicates a lack of capacity to reform." (Inquiry Concerning Platt (2002) No. 162, Decision and Order Removing Judge Platt from Office, p. 15 [48 Cal.4th CJP Supp. 227, 248]; see Inquiry Concerning Ross, supra, No. 174 at p. 65 [49 Cal.4th CJP Supp. at p. 139].) In his testimony before the special masters and at his oral argument before the commission, Judge Spitzer repeatedly avoided taking full responsibility for his actions.

Judge Spitzer blamed his persistent delays and failure to decide matters on the overburdened courts, and, in some instances, on court staff. The Riverside County Superior Court is clearly overburdened. However, by the judge's own account, he had no more cases than other judges in the county. Judge Spitzer also suggests that he is more backlogged than other judges because he presides over more trials, and therefore did not have time to handle submitted matters and administrative tasks. We do not disagree with the masters and the character witnesses who testified that Judge Spitzer is a hard-working judge. However, as one of the special masters suggested, it appears that "to some degree, [he was] . . . escaping to trial" where he was most comfortable as a judge. We concur with the masters that Judge Spitzer's failure to give his other judicial responsibilities his prompt attention "added insult to existing disadvantage and did nothing to improve public confidence in an increasingly inaccessible system of civil justice." In the words of a fellow judge and former presiding judge, "Judge Spitzer was in a state of denial for a long time that he wasn't able to control his caseload."

In his testimony before the special masters, Judge Spitzer suggested that his clerk let signed orders sit unprocessed on her desk for significant periods of time, a claim refuted by his clerk. In his oral presentation before the commission, Judge Spitzer implied that court staff shared responsibility for his delays and missing documents because they refused to come into his cluttered chambers and because they failed to locate files and documents he had misplaced. He also blamed staff for failing to bring inquiries about cases to his attention, a claim contradicted by the testimony of court staff. We emphatically reject any implication that staff were at fault—Judge Spitzer, not his staff, was responsible for his misconduct.

Judge Spitzer attempted to deflect responsibility for his six-year delay in deciding the McGuire (count II A) small claims case by testifying he had decided the matter but simply failed to sign the order, a claim we and the masters have rejected. He also took the position that he was not responsible for deciding matters under submission after he was transferred to a criminal assignment, despite receiving e-mails from his presiding judge informing him he was still responsible for civil matters under submission.

(22) At the hearing before the special masters and in his oral presentation to the commission, Judge Spitzer portrayed his failure to perform judicial duties, including his failure to cooperate with the commission, as being the result of his diligence in focusing on cases currently before him. We find

Judge Spitzer's conduct demonstrates an inability to properly attend to and prioritize his judicial obligations. Faithful discharge of judicial responsibilities requires the ability to multitask. In addition to handling the cases that come before them, judges are expected to diligently discharge their administrative responsibilities and to "cooperate with other judges and court officials in the administration of court business." (Canon 3C(1); see also canon 3B [adjudicative responsibilities]; Rothman, Cal. Jud. Conduct Handbook, supra, § 6.10, p. 262.)

Judge Spitzer also engaged in denials regarding his misconduct in the criminal cases. He insisted that he was attempting to comfort Ms. Kavanagh and denied attempting to influence her to consent to a reduction of the murder charge despite overwhelming evidence to the contrary. He persisted in his refusal to accept responsibility for the full extent of his misconduct in his oral argument before the commission where he stated: "I thought that I was communicating well with Kathleen Cavanaugh [sic] saying exactly to her what I had said in open court."

Judge Spitzer denied initiating the ex parte communication with the watch commander in People v. Johnson (count V). In response to the charges in count VI (People v. Cobarruvias), he testified that he still does not see "anything particularly wrong" about contacting Ms. Herrera and discussing the facts of the case with her.

Significantly, Judge Spitzer expressed little recognition or understanding of the impact his misconduct had on the litigants in the criminal or civil cases. Furthermore, his failure to respond to the commission's investigation reflects a lack of appreciation for the seriousness of the charges.

3. Likelihood of Future Misconduct

The likelihood of future misconduct is a key factor in our decision to remove Judge Spitzer from judicial office. The masters accepted Judge Spitzer's assurance that he has taken steps to ensure timely performance of his judicial duties, including therapy and making procedural changes in his courtroom. We are not similarly persuaded by the judge's assurances. Judge Spitzer made similar representations in the past, which have subsequently proven to be hollow.

In 2003, the commission issued a notice of intended public admonishment based on Judge Spitzer's failure to timely decide matters in three cases and executing at least one false salary affidavit. The matter was closed without discipline after the judge made an appearance before the commission on December 11, 2003. (Rules of Com. on Jud. Performance, rule 116(b).) At the appearance, Judge Spitzer assured the commission that he had no cases under submission for more than 90 days, that the problem had not reoccurred since February or March of that year, and that he had set up procedures to "avoid a repetition of this problem." In fact, the evidence in this case establishes that these assurances were false. At the time of his appearance, the Lindsay matter (count II C) which was submitted in May 2003 remained undecided and the proposed case management order in the Robinson matter (count III A) submitted by the parties in April 2003 remained unsigned. The judge's representation that he had changed his practices to avoid delay is refuted by his conduct in SCAG (count I B) and CCI (count I C). Judge Spitzer had the unprocessed judgment in SCAG, signed July 2003, with him when he came to the commission meeting in San Francisco. Nevertheless, he took no steps to have it processed when he returned to his court. In CCI, he signed the order just 20 days after his appearance before the commission, but had no procedures in place to ensure it was timely processed.

When Judge Spitzer was transferred to a civil assignment in 2001, he told Judge Tranbarger that he had a plan to deal with his organizational problems—he would not bring court papers into his chambers. The evidence amply demonstrates that he did not follow through with that plan.

By Judge Spitzer's own account, it would be imprudent to assign him to a civil department because "it would be difficult for me to do the work that's associated with doing justice in a civil courtroom." When asked whether he would give more attention to submitted matters and administrative tasks if returned to civil, Judge Spitzer responded that he did not think his priorities would change. These statements are tantamount to an admission that further misconduct would occur if he were assigned to civil in the future. His long history of disorganization, pervasive pattern of dysfunctional practices resulting in delays and inaction, and failure to appreciate the seriousness or consequences of his misconduct leave us with no doubt that similar misconduct would reoccur if he was assigned to a civil department.

Even the initiation of a preliminary investigation in these proceedings did not spur Judge Spitzer to change his practices. Instead, consistent with his pervasive pattern of failure to attend to his judicial duties, he ignored his duty to cooperate with the commission.

There is also a strong likelihood of future misconduct in a criminal assignment. Judge Spitzer engaged in similar misconduct involving embroilment and ex parte communications in three criminal cases. These cases reflect Judge Spitzer's inability or unwillingness to act within appropriate judicial boundaries. The most egregious misconduct, in People v. Carr, occurred just months after his appearance before the commission in 2003 and after he had been disqualified by the district attorney's office from hearing other criminal cases, in part, because of his past embroilment. We have no confidence in his ability to conform to standards of judicial conduct.

4. Integrity and Honesty

(23) Judge Spitzer's integrity is called into question by his conduct in executing salary affidavits with reckless disregard for the truth and by his lack of candor in these proceedings. Honesty is a minimum qualification for every judge. (Kloepfer v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1989) 49 Cal.3d 826, 865 [264 Cal.Rptr. 100, 782 P.2d 239]; Inquiry Concerning Ross, supra, No. 174 at p. 68 [49 Cal.4th CJP Supp. at p. 141].) Based on the testimony of Riverside County judges and lawyers, the masters found that Judge Spitzer has a reputation as a knowledgeable and honest judge. We do not question Judge Spitzer's intelligence or knowledge of the law. Nor do we doubt that his character witnesses believe Judge Spitzer to be a man of integrity, albeit with organizational issues. Nevertheless, the record in these proceedings reflects a lack of candor incompatible with the role of a judge. "If the essential quality of veracity is lacking, other positive qualities of the person cannot redeem or compensate for the missing fundamental." (Inquiry Concerning Hall (2006) No. 175, Decision and Order Removing Judge Hall from Office at p. 26 [49 Cal.4th CJP Supp. 146, 171].)

On numerous occasions, Judge Spitzer was deceptive in his testimony before the masters and in his oral presentation to the commission. He falsely denied calling the watch commander and considering the ex parte communication in his decision to dismiss the Johnson case (count V). In the Carr matter (count VII), he attempted to mislead the masters and the commission by claiming that he was only trying to comfort Ms. Kavanagh and was not trying to influence her or the district attorney to agree to a manslaughter disposition. In the McGuire matter (count II A), he falsely testified that he made a decision shortly after the first trial, where the evidence established that he delayed rendering a decision for six years. Judge Spitzer also engaged in disingenuous attempts to explain his delays and failure to cooperate with the commission as being the result of his conscientious dedication to the cases at hand and the shortcomings of his staff.

Judge Spitzer testified that he requested a transfer to a civil assignment in 2001 because he wanted a change. However, according to his former presiding judge, Judge Spitzer was transferred to civil because "his [criminal] caseload was virtually nonexistent" as a result of having been disqualified from criminal cases by the district attorney's office, and Judge Spitzer was not pleased with the transfer.

(24) The Supreme Court strongly denounced a judge who made material misstatements to the commission in Adams v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 10 Cal.4th at page 914, stating: "There are few judicial actions in our view that provide greater justification for removal from office than the action of a judge in deliberately providing false information to the Commission in the course of its investigation into charges of wilful misconduct on the part of the judge." (Ibid.; accord, Fletcher, supra, 19 Cal.4th at pp. 887–891.) Additionally, we are troubled by Judge Spitzer's willingness to impugn the credibility of two district attorneys and Ms. Kavanagh by implying they falsely testified concerning material facts in these proceedings.

The lack of candor we have observed in these proceedings is fundamentally at odds with the role of a judge who is sworn to uphold the law.

5. Prior Discipline

Judge Spitzer has not previously been disciplined. Nevertheless, the pattern of willful and prejudicial misconduct and persistent failure to perform judicial duties in this case spanning a period of 10 years overshadows his lack of prior discipline.

6. Impact on the Judicial System

(25) The impact of Judge Spitzer's misconduct and persistent failure to perform his judicial duties has been significant. A pattern of misconduct consisting of delays, indecision, signing false salary affidavits, ex parte communication, embroilment, and failure to cooperate with his presiding judge and the commission inevitably lowers public esteem for the judiciary.

Judge Spitzer's indifference toward his obligation to promptly and efficiently decide matters had an adverse impact on the litigants who appeared before him and his fellow judges. As the masters recognized, "[w]ith severely overcrowded court dockets, a failure to make timely decisions on these motions exacerbates frustrations felt by civil parties regarding limited trial opportunities." Other judges had to take over his calendar when his presiding judge was forced to relieve him from his assignments so he could get caught up on his cases. Likewise, his fellow judges had to handle his routine matters when he was unable to keep up with them.

A judge who is not competent to handle a civil calendar and who has a history of embroilment which at various times has resulted in his being disqualified from hearing criminal cases does not serve the public and cannot remain on the bench.

ORDER REMOVING JUDGE SPITZER FROM OFFICE

Pursuant to the provisions of article VI, section 18 of the California Constitution, Judge Robert G. Spitzer is ordered removed from his judicial office; pursuant to that section of the Constitution and rules 120(a) and 136 of the Rules of the Commission on Judicial Performance, Judge Spitzer is hereby disqualified from acting as a judge.

Commission members Hon. Frederick P. Horn, Hon. Judith D. McConnell, Hon. Katherine Feinstein, Mr. Peter E. Flores, Jr., Mr. Marshall B. Grossman, Ms. Patricia Miller, Ms. Barbara Schraeger, Mr. Lawrence Simi, and Ms. Maya Dillard Smith voted in favor of all of the findings and conclusions expressed herein and in the forgoing order of removal and disqualification of Judge Spitzer. Commission member Mr. Samuel A. Hardage did not participate. There is one vacancy on the commission.

The judge's petition for review by the Supreme Court was denied on March 19, 2008.

INQUIRY CONCERNING JUDGE KELLY A. MACEACHERN

SUMMARY

A disciplinary matter was brought concerning a superior court judge.

The Commission on Judicial Performance ordered that the judge be removed from her judicial office and that she be disqualified from acting as a judge. The judge requested educational leave to attend a one-week seminar but obtained confirmation of admittance into only one half-day class. The court travel coordinator prepared a travel request for the judge that estimated her expenses for five days. The judge signed the travel request without disclosing that she was not enrolled for five days. After her arrival at the seminar venue, the judge attempted to enroll in other courses, but she actually attended only two half-day courses. Upon being told that she could receive reimbursement for only one night, she sent an e-mail to the travel coordinator claiming that she "sat in" on classes two other days. When confronted about it, she denied any intent to mislead and claimed that she had chosen her words carelessly. The judge also lacked candor in response to the commission's investigation and testified falsely under oath during the proceedings. The commission found that the judge engaged in willful misconduct by sending an intentionally deceitful e-mail in an attempt to obtain court funds under false pretense. The judge's intentional dishonesty and her subsequent lack of candor warranted removal, despite a previously good reputation. (Opinion by Judith D. McConnell, Vice-chairperson.)

HEADNOTES

(1) Judges § 6.2—Discipline—Grounds—Willful Misconduct—Elements.—Willful misconduct is the most serious basis for censure or removal of a judge (Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (d)). Willful misconduct is (1) unjudicial conduct that is (2) committed in bad faith (3) by a judge acting in his or her judicial capacity. Failure to comply with the California Code of Judicial Ethics is generally considered to constitute unjudicial conduct. A judge acts in bad faith only by (1) performing a judicial act for a corrupt purpose (which is any purpose other than the faithful discharge of judicial duties), (2) performing a judicial act with knowledge that the act is beyond the judge's lawful judicial power, or (3) performing a judicial act that exceeds the judge's lawful power with a conscious disregard for the limits of the judge's authority. Making false representations to the court in order to obtain money reflects a corrupt purpose.

(2) Judges § 6.2—Discipline—Grounds—Willful Misconduct—Judicial Capacity.—A judge acts in a judicial capacity, for purposes of a determination of willful misconduct, while performing one of the functions, whether adjudicative or administrative in nature, that is associated with the position of a judge or when the judge uses or attempts to use the authority of the judicial office for an improper purpose. The judge's e-mail was sent in the judge's administrative capacity as a judge, and the judge used her authority as a judge to ask for the claim to be submitted. The judge was acting in a judicial capacity.

(3) Judges § 6.2—Discipline—Grounds—Willful Misconduct—Attempting to Obtain Money Through False Pretense.—A judge engaged in willful misconduct by sending an intentionally deceitful e-mail in an attempt to obtain court funds to which she was not entitled.

(4) Judges § 6—Removal—When Appropriate.—Removal may be appropriate even where the factors identified in previous judicial disciplinary proceedings do not each weigh against the judge.

(5) Judges § 6—Discipline—Factors—Number of Acts of Misconduct.—The number of acts of misconduct is relevant to judicial discipline to the extent it shows isolated incidents or a pattern that demonstrates that the judge lacks judicial temperament and the ability to perform judicial functions in an evenhanded manner. A level of discipline may be warranted either by the existence of a pattern of misconduct or by the seriousness of a single incident. Consideration of this factor might militate against removal were it not for the corrupt nature of the misconduct and pervasive lack of candor during the commission proceedings.

(6) Judges § 6—Discipline—Factors—Lack of Veracity.—Honesty is a minimum qualification for every judge. If the essential quality of veracity is lacking, other positive qualities of the person cannot redeem or compensate for the missing fundamental. Judges have been removed from office for providing false and misleading information in various contexts.

(7) Judges § 6.4—Discipline—Proceedings—Disciplinary Precedent from Other States.—Judicial disciplinary decisions from other states in cases involving similar misconduct can provide guidance.

(8) Judges § 6.4—Discipline—Proceedings—Choosing Proper Sanction.—In determining the appropriate discipline, each case must be considered on its own facts. Choosing the proper sanction is an art, not a science, and turns on the facts of the case at bar.

(9) Judges § 6.2—Removal—Grounds—Dishonesty During Investigation.—There are few judicial actions that provide greater justification for removal from office than the action of a judge in deliberately providing false information to the Commission on Judicial Performance in the course of its investigation into charges of willful misconduct on the part of the judge. It is particularly troubling when a judge is willing to lie under oath to the special masters appointed by the California Supreme Court to make factual findings critical to its decision. In seeking the truth, the justice system relies on the integrity of the oath. A judge who does not honor the oath to tell the truth cannot be entrusted with judging the credibility of others.

(10) Judges § 6—Discipline—Stringent Standard of Conduct.—The Commission on Judicial Performance has the responsibility of enforcing rigorous standards of judicial conduct. Because judges occupy a position of enormous power and responsibility and pass judgment on the conduct of others, they are held to a more stringent standard of conduct than ordinary citizens and even attorneys.

(11) Judges § 6—Discipline—Factors—Appreciation of Misconduct.—Contrition at the last opportunity has limited impact in comparison with well over a year of misrepresentations and excuses. Simply put, the judge's purported acceptance of responsibility was too little too late.

(12) Judges § 6—Discipline—Factors—Likelihood of Future Misconduct.—A judge's failure to appreciate or admit to the impropriety of his or her acts indicates a lack of capacity to reform.

(13) Judges § 6—Discipline—Factors—Prior Discipline.—The seriousness of the judge's misconduct and subsequent lack of candor overshadow the judge's lack of prior discipline.

(14) Judges § 6.2—Discipline—Factors—Impact on Judicial System.—Public faith in the integrity of the judicial system is seriously compromised by a judge who attempts to obtain money from the government through false pretense. Court staff must be able to rely on the truthfulness of information provided by judicial officers. Judges uphold laws which require citizens to provide truthful information for purposes of obtaining funds from the government. A judge must follow and respect the same laws and standards that apply to the public.

(15) Judges § 6.2—Discipline—Removal—Grounds—Dishonesty During Investigation.—A judge who lies under oath when his or her conduct is called into question does grave damage to public respect for the judiciary. Litigants and attorneys can have little confidence in that judge's ability to determine the credibility of witnesses and seek the truth. Any discipline short of removal would not be adequate to fulfill the mandate to uphold public confidence in the integrity and propriety of the judiciary.

(16) Judges § 6.4—Discipline—Proceedings—Mitigating Evidence.—Mitigating evidence is not relevant in determining if a judge engaged in bad faith, and thus engaged in willful misconduct, but may be taken into account in determining the totality of the circumstances as pertinent to determining the appropriate discipline.

I

INTRODUCTION AND SUMMARY

This disciplinary matter concerns Judge Kelly A. MacEachern, a judge of the Orange County Superior Court since 2003. The commission commenced this inquiry with the filing of its notice of formal proceedings (Notice) on August 13, 2007.

The Notice charges Judge MacEachern in one count with making intentionally false and misleading statements in an e-mail to the superior court travel coordinator in support of her reimbursement claim for hotel expenses associated with her attendance at the Continuing Judicial Studies Program (CJSP) in San Diego the week of July 31, 2006. Judge MacEachern is charged with making the following false and misleading statements: (1) there was a "mix up" in her registration when she arrived at the conference; and (2) she "sat in" on two classes on days for which she sought hotel reimbursement. The Notice alleges there was not a mixup with her registration—when she arrived at registration, she knew she was only registered for one half-day class later in the week; and, she did not attend the two classes she claimed to have "sat in" on.

The Supreme Court appointed three special masters to hear and take evidence and report to the commission under Rules of the Commission on Judicial Performance, rule 129. (All references to a rule are to the Rules of the Commission on Judicial Performance.) The masters are Hon. Judith Ashmann-Gerst, Associate Justice of the Court of Appeal, Second Appellate District; Hon. Tani G. Cantil-Sakauye, Associate Justice of the Court of Appeal, Third Appellate District; and Judge George J. Abdallah, Jr., Judge of the San Joaquin County Superior Court.

The three masters held a two-day hearing in January 2008, followed by an oral argument in March 2008. The masters' report to the commission, containing their detailed findings of fact and conclusions of law, was filed with the commission on March 17, 2008.

The masters concluded Judge MacEachern engaged in willful misconduct by deliberately making false and misleading representations concerning her registration and attendance at CJSP to obtain court funds to which she was not entitled. They resolved credibility issues and factual disputes, finding Judge MacEachern's testimony was not credible on material issues. We base our decision to remove Judge MacEachern from office on the masters' factual findings and legal conclusions, as adopted and discussed in this decision. The lack of integrity manifested by her misconduct, compounded by her lack of candor in response to the commission's investigation and deceitful testimony under oath before the masters, compels our conclusion that removal is necessary to protect the public and maintain public trust in the integrity of the judiciary.

Judge MacEachern is represented by Attorneys Edward P. George of Long Beach, California, and Paul S. Meyer of Costa Mesa, California. The examiners for the commission are Commission Trial Counsel Jack Coyle and commission assistant trial counsel Valerie Marchant.

FINDINGS OF FACT AND CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

A. Findings of Fact

The examiner has the burden of proving the charges by clear and convincing evidence. (Broadman v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1998) 18 Cal.4th 1079, 1090 [77 Cal.Rptr.2d 408, 959 P.2d 715] (Broadman).) "Evidence of a charge is clear and convincing so long as there is a 'high probability' that the charge is true." (Ibid.) Factual findings of the masters are entitled to great weight because the masters have "the advantage of observing the demeanor of the witnesses." (See ibid.; Inquiry Concerning Freedman (2007) No. 179, Decision and Order Imposing Public Censure, pp. 7, 20 [49 Cal.4th CJP Supp. 223, 232, 243] (Freedman).) The following facts are adopted from the masters' factual findings which we have determined are supported by clear and convincing evidence based on our own review of the record.

Registration for the Seminar

During the week of July 31, 2006, through August 4, 2006, the Center for Judicial Education and Research (CJER) of the Administrative Office of the Courts (AOC) sponsored CJSP, a judicial education seminar, in San Diego, California. Because Judge MacEachern was on medical leave, she asked her clerk, Felicia Bicknell (Bicknell), to register her for the seminar, but did not instruct Bicknell to sign her up for any particular classes. On June 16, 2006, the registration deadline, Bicknell applied online for two courses: (1) Excellence in Judging, held Monday, July 31, 2006, through the morning of Wednesday, August 2, 2006; and (2) Statement of Decision, held in the afternoon of Wednesday, August 2, 2006.

An e-mail response was sent from AOC to Judge MacEachern on the same day. It stated, in relevant part: "This is only a confirmation that your CJSP application has been received by CJER. [¶] Notification of acceptance into your course choice(s) will be sent via e-mail the week following the June 16 application deadline. You will receive further information regarding travel arrangements with your acceptance confirmation. We ask that you do not make hotel or airline reservations until you have received your Acceptance Email." (Original boldface.)

On June 20, 2006, the day after returning to work, Judge MacEachern submitted a "Judicial Officer's Planned Absence" form, indicating she planned to be away from the court attending CJSP the entire week of July 31, 2006. The next day, Judge MacEachern was informed by AOC Attorney Bonnie Pollard (Pollard) via e-mail that she had been accepted only into the half-day Statement of Decision class on Wednesday afternoon. She was denied admittance into the Excellence in Judging class because it was designed for judges with at least eight years' experience on the bench, and she had been a judge for less than four years at the time.

Pollard's e-mail included an attached participant's manual which provided information on hotel accommodations. The manual stated that AOC would pay the hotel directly for "lodging only for the nights stated in [the] confirmation email . . ." and only "for judicial officers . . . who attend the entire course in which they are enrolled." (Original boldface.) "Attending entire course" was defined as "arriving before the course begins and staying until the course officially ends." Specifically, the e-mail provided: "Those who do not attend the entire course will remain individually responsible for their own lodging expense."

On June 22, 2006, the day after receiving her e-mail confirming admittance into only one half-day class, Judge MacEachern was notified by a court administrative assistant that her educational leave request for the entire week of July 31st had been approved. The same day, court travel coordinator Rick Valadez (Valadez) prepared a travel request for the judge which estimated expenses for meals and incidentals for five days. It did not include hotel costs because they were paid directly by CJER. Judge MacEachern signed the travel request and returned it to Valadez. It was then approved by Presiding Judge Nancy Wieben Stock. Judge MacEachern did not inform Judge Stock or Valadez that she had been admitted only to one half-day class or seek to amend her request for an entire week of educational leave. On June 28, 2006, Judge MacEachern made reservations at one of the hotels approved by the AOC for five nights, Sunday, July 30, 2006, through Friday, August 3, 2006.

Sometime before CJSP began, Judge MacEachern telephoned Pollard to inquire about her registration status. They discussed what classes remained open. Judge MacEachern was not interested in any of the classes that had openings, but did express interest in the Evidence class, which was full. Judge MacEachern was placed on the wait list for the Evidence class.

On the Friday before the start of the program, Judge MacEachern contacted CJSP Education Coordinator Susan Gordon (Gordon) to inquire whether there was an opening in the Evidence course. Gordon told her that there were no openings, but she remained on the wait list.

Judge MacEachern's Activities During the Week of CJSP

On Sunday, July 30, 2006, Judge MacEachern went to San Diego with her husband, Michael Bruce McClellan (McClellan), and his twin seven-year-old daughters. This was McClellan's one week of the year to have his daughters for vacation. They checked into one of the hotels approved by AOC for lodging during the program.

Judge MacEachern arrived at registration around 7:45 a.m. on Monday, July 31, 2006, the first day of CJSP. Gordon was surprised to see the judge since she was not enrolled in any course until Wednesday. At the registration table, Judge MacEachern spoke with Aline Tashjian (Tashjian), the senior conference coordinator for the AOC. Judge MacEachern told Tashjian that she wanted to sit in on a class she was not enrolled in. When told this was not permitted, Judge MacEachern responded that she would sit in the class anyway.

According to Judge MacEachern, despite being denied admission to the class, she went to the Excellence in Judging classroom anyway. She claims that she arrived before 8:30 a.m. to "scope out" whether she could get in. Judge MacEachern testified that she stayed in the classroom for 10 to 15 minutes and left shortly after the class started. Pollard arrived at the Excellence in Judging classroom around 8:00 a.m. to check on the room setup and see if faculty needed assistance. When the class started about 8:30 a.m., the door was closed. During the next five or 10 minutes, the team leaders presented an overview of the class. Pollard testified that no one came in or out of the classroom between the time the door was closed and the end of the overview. No judge approached Pollard about being admitted into the class.

The masters found, "in no uncertain terms" that Judge MacEachern lied about going into the Excellence in Judging classroom. We adopt this credibility finding. Pollard's testimony contradicts Judge MacEachern's testimony that she remained in the classroom after the class started. Moreover, the masters were in a position to listen to the judge and observe her demeanor when she testified about specifics of being in the classroom and did not find her credible.

Judge MacEachern returned to the registration area at around 8:45 a.m. and spoke with Gordon about whether there had been any cancellations in the Evidence class. Gordon told her she would have to wait 30 to 60 minutes to determine if there were openings in the class and urged Judge MacEachern to check back in with her later that morning. Judge MacEachern did not return or make further inquiries about the Evidence class. As it turned out, Judge MacEachern probably would have gotten into the class had she returned because there were two openings in the class.

At her appearance before the commission, Judge MacEachern said she did not hear Gordon tell her to come back because she was so angry about being denied admittance into the Evidence class. We believe Judge MacEachern disregarded Gordon's instruction, just as she disregarded other directions from the AOC staff.

Judge MacEachern admits Gordon specifically told her she could not just "sit in" on a class unless admitted. Despite this clear instruction, Judge MacEachern claims she went to the Evidence classroom after speaking with Gordon.[1] She testified that she sat in the classroom for 15 or 20 minutes until Gordon "stuck her head" in the room. Judge MacEachern explained that she left because she was afraid she would make Gordon mad. The masters concluded: "We do not believe that she was intimidated by Gordon's momentary entrance into the classroom. In fact, MacEachern should have expected Gordon to appear in the Evidence class to verify attendance, given that Gordon had requested MacEachern check back at registration to see if there were any absences in the class. Rather, MacEachern's actions and statements evince her disrespect for, not fear of, AOC staff." We concur.

At some point on Monday or Tuesday morning, Judge MacEachern enrolled in a half-day Introduction to Microsoft Word and Windows course, scheduled for Tuesday, August 1, 2006. She attended that class in the morning, and joined her husband and his daughters for kayaking and paddle boating in the afternoon.

On Wednesday, August 2, 2006, Judge MacEachern attended the half-day Statement of Decision class.

Judge MacEachern claims to have "sat in" on the Domestic Violence (DV) Workshop on Thursday, August 3, 2006. The two-day workshop started on Wednesday and was an invitation-only course, designed to train judges to be instructors on the subject. Judge MacEachern testified she arrived at the classroom between 8:00 a.m. and 8:30 a.m. and stayed for about 15 to 20 minutes, during which time there were small-group discussions. In unequivocal terms, the masters found Judge MacEachern lied about even entering the DV Workshop classroom. We adopt this finding. Two witnesses who know Judge MacEachern and were in the DV Workshop classroom Thursday morning did not recall seeing her. AOC Attorney Bobbie Welling, who was sitting near the door observing the class, testified that she would have noticed if anyone had entered the classroom. Orange County Superior Court Judge Eric Larsh was one of 12 participants in the class. He spoke with Judge MacEachern at a break outside the classroom Thursday morning, but never saw her enter the classroom. In further support of the masters' finding that Judge MacEachern was never in the classroom, we note that Judge MacEachern was uncertain of most of the details concerning her alleged time in the classroom, including what time she arrived, whether class had started, whether the door was open or shut, whom she talked to, and what subject was being discussed.

Judge MacEachern testified that after leaving the DV Workshop, she sat in the back of the Selected Civil Topics class for about 20 to 30 minutes on [1] We make no finding as to whether Judge MacEachern went into the Evidence or Civil Topics classrooms since she was not charged with making misrepresentations concerning her attendance at these classes.

Thursday morning, but left and returned to her hotel because she could not follow the discussion without the materials.

Judge MacEachern did not go to CJSP at all on Friday, August 4, 2006. According to Judge MacEachern, they drove home after checking out of their hotel in the morning; according to her husband, they spent the day at Sea World. Judge MacEachern made no effort to see if she was needed in court that day or change her day off on Friday from educational leave to vacation time.

McClellan testified that in addition to going to Sea World on Friday, the judge participated in many other activities with him and his children during the week. They visited a mission; they went to the San Diego Zoo; they rented a kayak and a paddle boat; and they visited a nature preserve.

Judge MacEachern's Travel Reimbursement Request and E-mail

Shortly after CJSP ended, Judge MacEachern submitted a travel reimbursement claim to Valadez asking the court to reimburse her for three nights of hotel expenses and meals from dinner on Sunday through lunch on Friday. Valadez contacted Judge MacEachern and CJER about the claim, because it was his understanding that CJER directly paid hotel expenses. In his e-mail to the judge, sent the afternoon of August 14, 2006, he wrote:

"Good afternoon your Honor,

"I was reviewing your reimb. claim for the conf. above and I had a few questions.

"I show that you were scheduled to attend Excellence in Judging Mon–Wed. AM and Statements . . . in the PM. It looks like CJER only picked up Tues. night. However, the hotel charged you for 4 other nights? I sent CJER a message to see if they can research if they were supposed to pick up the other nights or if the hotel made a mistake with the registration?

"If you know any other info. please let me know so that I can piece your reimb. claim with the Conf.

"thank you."[2]

[2] Valadez thought Judge MacEachern had attended the Excellence in Judging class because he had the judge's e-mail confirming her registration request with him when he was processing the claim. Judge MacEachern testified that she did not believe she sent this document to Valadez with her reimbursement claim. Valadez testified that he "probably" received it along with the judge's travel reimbursement claim. Based on this record, we find that there is not

Not having received a response from Judge MacEachern, Valadez sent a followup e-mail the next afternoon. In this e-mail, he wrote:

"Good afternoon your Honor,

"I wanted to update you with regards to your claim. I spoke with Susan Gordon (CJER Coord) and she informed me that your class schedule was for a computer class in the AM and a Statements of Decision in the PM Wed. 8/2. Since that was the only class you attended CJER only covered one night (8/1 Tues.). Hence, the charges on your credit card for 7/30–31 and 8/2–4.

"The court will reimb. you for mileage r/t 180 miles and dinner for 8/1+2.

"Please let me know if this looks ok or if I'm missing any other info. to add to your reimb. claim from the court?

"thank you."

Judge MacEachern replied the next morning with the following e-mail, which is the subject of this inquiry:

"Dear Rick,

"When I got to the CJSP it turned out there was a mix up with my registration. SO I just sat in on the judicial excellence class on Monday, They allowed me to attend a Tuesday a.m. computer class, and the Wednesday afternoon S.O.D. class., [sic] and I sat in on the Thursday a.m. D.V. class. I attended no classes on Friday. I know they won't cover any other nights, however I was hoping the [cou]nty would. Thank you for your help. JKM"

Valadez e-mailed Gordon inquiring whether CJER would cover hotel expenses for the three nights requested by Judge MacEachern. Gordon responded in an e-mail that CJER would pay for Monday night's hotel stay because Judge MacEachern had attended the Tuesday computer class.[3] However, Gordon informed Valadez that CJER would not cover Sunday and Wednesday night because the judge had not enrolled in or attended entire courses on Monday or Thursday. Gordon added: "I am not sure what she means by 'a mix up with my registration'—I was very clear with her on the Friday before that she was still waitlisted in her first choice course—clear and convincing evidence that the registration confirmation was sent by Judge MacEachern when she submitted her reimbursement request.

[3] CJER had already paid for Tuesday night's stay based on Judge MacEachern's attendance at the Wednesday Statement of Decision class.

Evidence in Civil and Criminal Cases—so the fact that she showed up on Monday morning was quite a surprise."

Based upon Judge MacEachern's representation in her e-mail that she had "sat in" on classes on Monday and Thursday, Valadez submitted an amended travel reimbursement request form to Judge Stock on August 17, 2006. The amended request sought hotel reimbursement for $220, for two nights, Sunday and Wednesday.

Judge Stock's Investigation and Meeting with Judge MacEachern

Presiding Judge Stock had concerns about Judge MacEachern's representation that she had "sat in" on the Excellence in Judging class. Having been on the faculty for the class, Judge Stock knew it was not the type of class a judge can audit. Based on those concerns, she had her executive assistant conduct an investigation into Judge MacEachern's expense reimbursement claim. Judge Stock also asked her assistant to schedule a meeting with Judge MacEachern.

The meeting was held on September 8, 2006. At Judge Stock's request, Judge Thierry Colaw, a member of the court's executive committee, was present. Judge MacEachern appeared surprised when told the purpose of the meeting. Due to the confidential nature of the subject, Judge Stock had not informed her assistant, who arranged the meeting, of its purpose. Judge Stock went through the events of the week with Judge MacEachern who acknowledged that she was registered only for a half-day class on Wednesday when she arrived at CJSP on Monday. Judge MacEachern indicated that she had briefly "sat in" on the Excellence in Judging and DV Workshop courses, but quickly realized they were not appropriate for her and left. Judge Stock told Judge MacEachern that it appeared her statements to Valadez in the August 16 e-mail were misleading. Judge MacEachern acknowledged that her statements could be misleading and convey a false impression. She agreed to withdraw her claim for hotel reimbursement and convert her educational leave to vacation leave for the days that she did not attend any classes.

At the time of her meeting with Judge Stock, Judge MacEachern was exhausted and emotionally drained because her husband had been hospitalized three days earlier and was in dire condition. Judge MacEachern continued to work while her husband was in the hospital and did not mention her husband's condition to Judge Stock.

Judge MacEachern's Intent

The masters found Judge MacEachern made intentionally false and misleading statements in her August 16 e-mail to Valadez. Specifically, the masters found the following statements to be intentionally false and misleading: (1) "When I got to the CJSP it turned out there was a mix up with my registration"; and (2) "I just sat in on the judicial excellence class on Monday" and "I sat in on the Thursday a.m. D.V. class." In her testimony, Judge MacEachern insisted that these statements were not intended to mislead, but were the result of a hastily drafted and carelessly worded e-mail. The masters emphatically rejected this testimony, finding her word choice was "calculated, not careless." We concur and adopt this finding.

First, the evidence is undisputed that there was no mixup with her registration when Judge MacEachern got to CJSP. She was registered for the same class when she arrived at CJSP on Monday morning as when she left to drive to San Diego for the conference. In fact, Judge MacEachern was informed on the Friday before the conference began that she was enrolled only in the Wednesday Statement of Decision half-day class and was still on the wait list for the Evidence class. Thus, the statement "When I got to the CJSP . . . there was a mix up with my registration" is false.

Judge MacEachern insists she did not intend to imply that there was any mistake or confusion in her registration when she arrived at the conference. She testified that the "mix up" she was referring to was her clerk's error in signing her up for a class she was not qualified to attend. This explanation is nonsensical when viewed in the context of the antecedent phrase, "[w]hen I got to the CJSP it turned out" (there was a mixup with my registration). (Italics added.) We agree with the masters that her use of this phrase "constitutes a calculated attempt to suggest that any 'mix up' occurred upon her arrival at the program" to explain why she came to San Diego on Sunday even though her first class was not until Wednesday.

Judge MacEachern's explanations for her use of the phrase "sat in" are equally unconvincing. She testified that she never meant to suggest to Valadez that she attended or participated in the entire Excellence in Judging or DV Workshop classes. Instead, she maintains, she used the phrase "sat in" to signify that she briefly observed the classes or had made "sincere but failed efforts" to get into the classes. The masters found, "her defense of this patently misleading statement not only lacks credibility, but also borders on ludicrous." We concur.

In defense of her statement, Judge MacEachern has offered the masters and the commission no less than three alternate and inconsistent definitions of the phrase "sat in": (1) She physically sat down in a chair. ("I did sit down in the judicial excellence class . . . for about 10–15 minutes. I never intended to say I took the whole class, but I did sit down in it.") (2) She observed the class long enough to get a feel for and objectively examine the class. (3) She made a sincere but failed effort to get into several additional classes.

In our view, there is only one reasonable interpretation of the phrase "sat in" when made in the context of a reimbursement claim related to a judicial educational seminar. As noted by the masters, the commonsense, ordinary definition of the phrase "sat in" "suggests that she participated in or observed a particular class for its duration; she audited the class." Judge MacEachern's parsing of the phrase tortures its ordinary, commonsense meaning. Valadez could not possibly have been expected to understand the judge's representation that she "sat in" on classes to mean anything other than that she attended the classes in their entirety. And, this is precisely what Judge MacEachern wanted him to think.

We concur with the masters' finding that Judge MacEachern offered contrived definitions to explain away misleading statements in her e-mail to Valadez. As an educated woman with over 20 years in the legal profession, Judge MacEachern had to know that a representation that she "sat in" on classes would not be interpreted to mean she literally sat in a chair or made a brief entrance into the classroom without deriving any educational benefit. Notably, Judge MacEachern did not inform Judge Stock or Valadez that she meant anything other than the ordinary meaning of the phrase "sat in" when her reimbursement claim was questioned.

Moreover, Judge MacEachern did not mention that she "sat in" on the Evidence and Civil Topics classes in her e-mail to Valadez, even though she testified to having briefly observed both classes. Of course, by doing so she would have alerted Valadez to the fact that she did not attend the entire Excellence in Judging or DV Workshop courses since she could not be in two places at once (the Evidence and Excellence classes were in session at the same time Monday morning and the DV Workshop and Civil Topics classes were in session at the same time Thursday morning). The masters query why she did not mention these other classes in her e-mail if she really intended the phrase "sat in" to signify a brief entrance into the classroom or a "sincere but failed effort" to attend a class. They conclude: "The answer is obvious: MacEachern lied, got caught, and created a self-serving definition to attempt to escape from her lie. We simply cannot accept her sophistry and manipulation of ordinary words and phrases to circumvent quite obvious wrongdoing." This finding is amply supported by the evidence, and is adopted as our own.

Judge MacEachern attempts to justify her word choice as being the result of a quickly drafted e-mail that she "dashed" back in response to Valadez without thought or deliberation. The masters considered and rejected Judge MacEachern's testimony in this regard, finding her "word choice was calculated, not careless." We adopt the masters' credibility determination. As previously discussed, the precise words used in the e-mail manifest a calculated attempt to mislead. Further, Judge MacEachern had ample time to consider her response to Valadez's e-mails. Valadez sent two e-mail inquiries concerning the judge's reimbursement claim, one at 3:10 p.m. on August 14, 2006, and when he had not received a response, a second at 4:42 p.m. on August 15, 2006. Judge MacEachern's response was sent at 9:52 a.m. on August 16, 2006.

In her testimony before the masters and for the first time in this inquiry, Judge MacEachern suggested that her word choice was the result of undiagnosed medical conditions, including temporary dyslexia and aphasia she allegedly experienced after a recent surgery. No medical documentation or expert testimony was admitted to substantiate that she suffered from these conditions or that they contributed in any way to her choice of words. As such, we reject any suggestion that there is a medical explanation for her false and misleading statements.

Significantly, none of the justifications proffered by Judge MacEachern explain how she could have "sat in" on classes when she never entered the classrooms. As previously discussed, we have adopted the masters' finding that she did not go into or briefly observe either the Excellence in Judging class or DV Workshop.

In conclusion, we adopt the masters' finding that Judge MacEachern intentionally made deceptive and misleading statements in her August 16 e-mail to Valadez which falsely suggested that she arrived at CJSP on Sunday because of a mixup in her registration and audited the Excellence in Judging class and DV Workshop. She made these statements in an attempt to obtain reimbursement from the government for costs to which she was not entitled.

B. Conclusions of Law

(1) The masters and we conclude that Judge MacEachern engaged in willful misconduct, the most serious basis for censure or removal. (Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (d).) Willful misconduct is (1) unjudicial conduct that is (2) committed in bad faith (3) by a judge acting in his or her judicial capacity. (Broadman, supra, 18 Cal.4th at p. 1091.)

First, Judge MacEachern's conduct was manifestly unjudicial. Failure to comply with the California Code of Judicial Ethics is generally considered to constitute unjudicial conduct. (Dodds v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1995) 12 Cal.4th 163, 172 [48 Cal.Rptr.2d 106, 906 P.2d 1260] (Dodds).) Judge MacEachern violated fundamental precepts of the canons. She failed to comply with her duty to uphold the integrity of the judiciary (canon 1), avoid impropriety and the appearance of impropriety in all of her activities (canon 2), and comply with the law and act in a manner that promotes public confidence in the integrity of the judiciary (canon 2A). Further, by fraudulently seeking reimbursement from the court for her own pecuniary or personal interests she violated canon 2B (judge shall not lend the prestige of judicial office to advance the pecuniary or personal interests of the judge or others). Judge MacEachern used her position as a judge to ask the court's travel coordinator to submit a request on her behalf seeking reimbursement for expenses to which she was not entitled.

Second, Judge MacEachern acted in bad faith. A judge acts in bad faith "only by (1) performing a judicial act for a corrupt purpose (which is any purpose other than the faithful discharge of judicial duties), or (2) performing a judicial act with knowledge that the act is beyond the judge's lawful judicial power, or (3) performing a judicial act that exceeds the judge's lawful power with a conscious disregard for the limits of the judge's authority." (Broadman, supra, 18 Cal.4th at p. 1092.) The e-mail statements were made in bad faith because their purpose was improper. As the masters state: "It goes without saying that making false representations to the court in order to obtain money reflects a corrupt purpose."

In her briefs to the commission, Judge MacEachern maintains that she was not motivated by greed, but by an unwarranted sense of entitlement. She thought traveling to San Diego and attempting to enroll in additional classes entitled her to reimbursement even though she did not get into or attend those classes. However, this is not what she told Valadez; rather, she falsely suggested that she had attended the additional classes.

The masters concluded that the judge's "haughty sense of entitlement to reimbursement" further evinces her bad faith. We agree. However, we need not decide whether Judge MacEachern's motivation in seeking reimbursement was monetary or an unwarranted sense of entitlement. In either event, she acted for a purpose other than the faithful discharge of her judicial duties. Conference materials clearly informed her that she was entitled only to hotel reimbursement for those days she attended classes in their entirety. Further, common sense and good judgment should have alerted her that her reimbursement request was unjustified under her theory of entitlement. We fail to understand how Judge MacEachern could have thought she was entitled to reimbursement for hotel expenses and meals for appearing at the conference site and making unsuccessful inquiries about enrolling in additional classes or, more importantly, how this provided her license to mislead Valadez. Judge MacEachern acted in bad faith by sending a deceitful e-mail in support of her reimbursement claim, regardless of whether her motivation was monetary or an unjustified sense of entitlement.

(2) Third, Judge MacEachern was acting in her judicial capacity, the final element of willful misconduct. A judge acts in a judicial capacity "while performing one of the functions, whether adjudicative or administrative in nature, that are associated with the position of a judge or when the judge uses or attempts to use the authority of the judicial office for an improper purpose." (Broadman, supra, 18 Cal.4th at p. 1104, citing Dodds, supra, 12 Cal.4th at p. 172.) The masters concluded and we agree that Judge MacEachern's e-mail meets this test because it was sent in her administrative capacity as a judge and because she used her authority as a judicial officer to ask Valadez to submit a claim for reimbursement to which she knew she was not entitled.

Judge MacEachern contends that she was not acting in a judicial capacity because the e-mail pertained to a personal matter, and did not relate to a case or any matter involving her assignment. The e-mail did not pertain to a personal matter—it concerned court reimbursement for attendance at a judicial conference. It was sent to the court travel coordinator, during court hours, on the court's e-mail system, from the courthouse. The form she submitted to Valadez is entitled "Judicial Officers Travel Reimbursement Worksheet." This was clearly an administrative judicial function.

In removing Judge Hyde from office, the commission concluded that he was acting in his judicial capacity when he asked his clerk to access restricted Department of Motor Vehicles records for personal reasons. (Inquiry Concerning Hyde (2003) No. 166, Decision and Order Removing Judge Hyde from Office, p. 5 [48 Cal.4th CJP Supp. 329, 339] (Hyde); see also Inquiry Concerning Murphy (2001) No. 157, Decision and Order Imposing Censure and Bar, pp. 16–17 [48 Cal.4th CJP Supp. 179, 201] (Murphy) [false statements to presiding judge to obtain sick leave rather than taking personal leave made in judicial capacity]; Inquiry Concerning Couwenberg (2001) No. 158, Decision and Order Removing Judge Couwenberg from Office, p. 12 [48 Cal.4th CJP Supp. 205, 221–222] [false statements on form used exclusively for judges in connection with public enrobing ceremonies and other administrative purposes made in judicial capacity].) The commission reasoned: "Judge Hyde did not give Ms. Silva advice, but made a request as a judge to a clerk to perform a task that was a normal duty for a clerk. Ms. Silva could not reasonably have been expected to refuse." (Hyde, No. 166 at p. 5 [48 Cal.4th CJP Supp. at p. 339].) Similarly, Judge MacEachern made a request for hotel reimbursement to the judicial travel coordinator who was charged with processing judicial travel reimbursement requests. As Judge Stock testified at the hearing concerning Mr. Valadez and other court staff: "They essentially believe what we tell them. They rely upon our integrity . . . ."

Judge MacEachern relies heavily on Dodds, supra, 12 Cal.4th 163, in which the Supreme Court held the judge was not acting in a judicial capacity when he failed to report a colleague whom he observed deflate a van tire in the court parking lot, and initially refused to give a statement to an investigating officer and suggested that his staff also refuse to talk. In reaching this conclusion, the Supreme Court first emphasized that Judge Dodds was not acting as a supervisor when he recommended to staff that they decline to give a statement; rather, he was giving advice to a cowitness concerning an event he witnessed outside of his judicial function. (Id. at p. 175.) Second, the court noted that the judge met with the detective at the courthouse only because it was a convenient meeting place that the detective selected. (Ibid.) In this case, Valadez was seeking information necessary to perform his job as the travel coordinator for the court. Judge MacEachern was not offering discretionary advice to Valadez, but information required for the purpose of processing her reimbursement claim. Moreover, unlike the detective in Dodds, Valadez contacted the judge during work hours over the court's e-mail system not because it was convenient but because his inquiry was related to an administrative judicial function.

(3) As did the masters, we conclude Judge MacEachern engaged in willful misconduct by sending an intentionally deceitful e-mail in an attempt to obtain court funds to which she was not entitled.

III

DISCIPLINE

A. Introduction

In this case, we face the question of whether a judge who engages in an act of materially deceitful and fraudulent conduct in her judicial capacity and subsequently responds to the commission's investigation by parsing words, and offering disingenuous defenses and false testimony should remain in judicial office. The purpose of a commission disciplinary proceeding " 'is not punishment, but rather the protection of the public, the enforcement of rigorous standards of judicial conduct, and the maintenance of public confidence in the integrity and independence of the judicial system.' " (Broadman, supra, 18 Cal.4th at p. 1112, quoting Adams v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1995) 10 Cal.4th 866, 912 [42 Cal.Rptr.2d 606, 897 P.2d 544] (Adams).) Faithful adherence to these objectives compels our decision to remove Judge MacEachern from office. As discussed below, Judge MacEachern engaged in wrongdoing that seriously undermines the integrity of the judiciary and falls far short of the rigorous standards to which the judiciary is held.

B. Analysis of Disciplinary Factors

(4) In reaching our decision, we have considered those factors previously identified by the commission as relevant to determining the appropriate discipline in a given case. (Inquiry Concerning Ross (2005) No. 174, Decision and Order Removing Judge Ross from Office, pp. 63–64 [49 Cal.4th CJP Supp. 79, 137–138] (Ross); Inquiry Concerning Van Voorhis (2003) No. 165, Decision and Order Removing Judge Van Voorhis from Office, p. 31 [48 Cal.4th CJP Supp. 257, 295].) At the outset, it should be noted that removal may be appropriate even where these factors do not each weigh against the judge. (Murphy, supra, No. 157 at p. 18 [48 Cal.4th CJP Supp. at p. 202].)

1. Number of Acts of Misconduct

(5) The number of acts of misconduct is relevant to discipline to the extent it shows isolated incidents, or a pattern that demonstrates that the judge lacks judicial temperament and the "ability to perform judicial functions in an even-handed manner." (Fletcher v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1998) 19 Cal.4th 865, 918 [81 Cal.Rptr.2d 58, 968 P.2d 958] (Fletcher).) "A level of discipline may be warranted either by the existence of a pattern of misconduct or by the seriousness of a single incident." (Broadman, supra, 18 Cal.4th at pp. 1112–1113.) Consideration of this factor might militate against removal if it were not for the corrupt nature of the misconduct and pervasive lack of candor during these commission proceedings, which combined demonstrate a temperament lacking the core qualities required of a judge.

2. Integrity and Honesty

(6) "Honesty is a minimum qualification for every judge. (Kloepfer v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1989) 49 Cal.3d 826, 865 [264 Cal.Rptr. 100, 782 P.2d 239] (Kloepfer).) If the essential quality of veracity is lacking, other positive qualities of the person cannot redeem or compensate for the missing fundamental. (Ibid.)" (Inquiry Concerning Hall (2006) No. 175, Decision and Order Removing Judge Hall from Office, p. 26 [49 Cal.4th CJP Supp. 146, 171] (Hall).) Judges have been removed from office for providing false and misleading information in other contexts.

Judge Hall was removed from office for violating campaign finance and disclosure laws, including knowingly filing false declarations under penalty of perjury concerning the source of a $20,000 campaign donation. Although Judge Hall engaged in additional incidents of misconduct, it was the election fraud which compelled our removal decision. (Hall, supra, No. 175 at p. 29 [49 Cal.4th CJP Supp. at p. 173].)

In 2001, we voted to remove Judge Murphy from office for providing false and misleading information in support of his request for sick leave.[4] Judge Murphy took extensive medical absences from court, providing false information about his health to his presiding judge. While on sick leave, he taught evening law classes and took prerequisite classes for admission to medical school, among other activities. (Murphy, supra, No. 157 at pp. 4–15 [48 Cal.4th CJP Supp. at pp. 185–199].) We observed, the "public will not, and should not, respect a judicial officer who has been shown to have repeatedly lied for his own benefit." (Id. at p. 18 [48 Cal.4th CJP Supp. at p. 202].)

Judge Couwenberg was ordered removed from office in 2001 for providing materially false information concerning his educational, professional, and military background in seeking appointment to the bench and as a judge. (Inquiry Concerning Couwenberg, supra, No. 158, Decision and Order Removing Judge Couwenberg from Office [48 Cal.4th CJP Supp. 205].)

(7) Judicial disciplinary decisions from other states in cases involving similar misconduct can also provide guidance. Following the recommendation of the Commission on Judicial Conduct, the Washington Supreme Court removed Judge Ritchie from office for filing false or misleading travel vouchers on four occasions over a five-year period. (In re Disciplinary Proceedings Against Ritchie (1994) 123 Wn.2d 725 [870 P.2d 967].) The travel voucher "contained false and misleading statements concerning the nature, purpose, duration and benefit of the court-related business allegedly conducted during the trips." (Id., 870 P.2d at pp. 970–971.)

In a case involving one false sworn affidavit, the South Carolina Supreme Court approved a stipulated one-year suspension of a judge from office without pay. (In re Augustus (2006) 367 S.C. 364 [626 S.E.2d 346].)[5] Judge Augustus claimed on a notarized continuing education compliance report that he had attended all three days of a seminar when he only had attended one day. Initially, he told South Carolina's disciplinary counsel that he attended two days of the seminar. Subsequently, the judge sent a letter to the disciplinary counsel admitting that he only attended one day.

(8) Judge MacEachern contends that the weight of precedent does not support removal because she engaged in an isolated act of misconduct. The Supreme Court and this commission have recognized that in determining the appropriate discipline, each case must be considered on its own facts. (Broadman, supra, 18 Cal.4th at p. 1112; Hyde, supra, No. 166 at p. 27 [48

[4] Judge Murphy resigned from office just prior to the commission's decision; the actual decision therefore became a public censure and bar from assignment.

[5] Suspension of a judge is not authorized under the California Constitution. (Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (d).)

Cal.4th CJP Supp. at p. 363].) "Choosing the proper sanction is an art, not a science, and turns on the facts of the case at bar." (Furey v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1987) 43 Cal.3d 1297, 1318 [240 Cal.Rptr. 859, 743 P.2d 919].)

In this case, Judge MacEachern's honesty and integrity are called into question on multiple levels. Her misconduct involved sending an intentionally false and misleading e-mail to the court's travel coordinator in an attempt to fraudulently obtain money from the court. When confronted with the patently misleading e-mail, she contrived self-serving definitions and specious excuses. In unequivocal terms, the masters found Judge MacEachern's testimony "was anything but credible." In an attempt to cover up her wrongdoing, Judge MacEachern lied not only about the intent of her words, but also about her presence in certain classes.

(9) The masters found: "Undoubtedly, MacEachern acted with intent to mislead . . . the Commission." In Adams, the Supreme Court strongly denounced a judge who made material misstatements to the commission, stating: "There are few judicial actions in our view that provide greater justification for removal from office than the action of a judge in deliberately providing false information to the Commission in the course of its investigation into charges of wilful misconduct on the part of the judge." (Adams, supra, 10 Cal.4th at p. 914; accord, Fletcher, supra, 19 Cal.4th at pp. 887–891.)

Particularly troubling is Judge MacEachern's willingness to lie under oath to the three special masters appointed by the Supreme Court to make factual findings critical to our decision. In seeking the truth, our justice system relies on the integrity of the oath. A judge who does not honor the oath to tell the truth cannot be entrusted with judging the credibility of others.

Numerous witnesses, including colleagues on the bench and attorneys who appeared before her, testified to Judge MacEachern's reputation for honesty and integrity as a judge and former district attorney. As an example, some witnesses pointed out that she refused to have a "retire-the-debt" fundraiser to pay off her personal debt after being elected to the bench because she did not want to create conflicts with attorneys who may appear before her. We do not doubt that these character witnesses believe Judge MacEachern to be a good and ethical judge. Nevertheless, her reputation cannot disguise the fact that her conduct in this case, exacerbated by her lies throughout these proceedings, portrays a lack of integrity.

(10) The commission has the responsibility of enforcing rigorous standards of judicial conduct. (Broadman, supra, 18 Cal.4th at pp. 1111–1112; Inquiry Concerning Platt (2002) No. 162, Decision and Order Removing Judge Platt from Office, p. 20 [48 Cal.4th CJP Supp. 227, 253] (Platt).) Because judges occupy a position of enormous power and responsibility and pass judgment on the conduct of others, they are held to a more stringent standard of conduct than ordinary citizens and even attorneys. (See Geiler v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications (1973) 10 Cal.3d 270, 287 [110 Cal.Rptr. 201, 515 P.2d 1]; Rothman, Cal. Jud. Conduct Handbook (3d ed. 2007) § 1.11, pp. 6–7.) In addition to the lack of veracity we have observed, other aspects of Judge MacEachern's conduct fail to comport with the high standards to which the judiciary is held. When told she could not audit classes, she attempted to circumvent AOC's rules and flagrantly disregarded staff instructions. The masters found and we agree that she "involved unwitting and innocent persons, such as Valadez, in her misconduct." Additionally, she failed to alter her request for educational leave and meal reimbursement for those days she was not in class until urged to do so by Judge Stock.

3. Appreciation of Misconduct

In her response to the commission's investigation and in her testimony before the special masters, Judge MacEachern repeatedly deflected responsibility for her actions. The masters described her arrogance as "unyielding" and her remorse as "limited only to the 'trouble' her false e-mail caused her." Astoundingly, she testified that she would never do it again, not because it was wrong, but because "it's [not] worth this much trouble." Instead of apologizing, the masters note, Judge MacEachern "engaged in scapegoating, blaming her clerk for the 'mix up' on her registration form [citation], blaming Gordon for not letting her into a class when there were open spots [citation], and blaming AOC staff for being uncooperative [citation]."

(11) In her recent oral presentation, Judge MacEachern told the commission that she now recognizes that she has been arrogant and slow to appreciate the seriousness of her misconduct. Judge MacEachern has had many opportunities to accept full responsibility for her actions since she was first asked to respond to the commission's preliminary investigation in January 2007. Contrition at her last opportunity has limited impact in comparison with well over a year of misrepresentations and excuses.

Moreover, even now she fails to fully acknowledge the gravamen of her misconduct—her intentional dishonesty. At her appearance before the commission, she acknowledged that she was wrong in seeking reimbursement for days she did not attend classes and that her statements in the e-mail were on their face misleading. Yet, she described her representation that she "sat in" on the DV Workshop as an "overstatement," rather than acknowledging that it was untrue, and continued to insist that the "mix up" she referred to in the e-mail "was the one where my clerk initially applied." Simply put, Judge MacEachern's purported acceptance of responsibility is too little too late.

4. Likelihood of Future Misconduct

(12) "A judge's failure to appreciate or admit to the impropriety of his or her acts indicates a lack of capacity to reform." (Platt, supra, No. 162 at p. 15 [48 Cal.4th CJP Supp. at p. 248]; see Ross, supra, No. 174 at p. 65 [49 Cal.4th CJP Supp. at p. 139].) With this in mind, it bears repeating that Judge MacEachern fails to acknowledge that the essence of her wrongdoing lies not in her arrogance, but in her dishonesty. Even at her appearance before the commission, she continued to make misrepresentations. This leaves us with no confidence in her ability to reform.

After going through these proceedings, it is unlikely that Judge MacEachern would again jeopardize her career by submitting a false travel voucher if she remained on the bench. However, we are concerned that the traits and lack of judgment that led to the misconduct in this case could lead to future improper actions demeaning to the esteem of the judiciary. This is a risk we cannot run and still fulfill our responsibility to protect the public and the reputation of the judiciary.

5. Prior Discipline

(13) Judge MacEachern has not previously been disciplined during her five years on the bench. Nevertheless, the seriousness of the judge's misconduct and subsequent lack of candor overshadow her lack of prior discipline.

6. Impact on Judicial System

Judge MacEachern attempts to portray her misconduct as personal, having no impact on the judicial system because it did not relate to a case before her. We could not disagree more.

(14) Public faith in the integrity of the judicial system is seriously compromised by a judge who attempts to obtain money from the government through false pretense. Court staff must be able to rely on the truthfulness of information provided by judicial officers. Judges uphold laws which require citizens to provide truthful information for purposes of obtaining funds from the government. A judge must follow and respect the same laws and standards that apply to the public.

(15) Moreover, a judge who lies under oath when her conduct is called into question does grave damage to public respect for the judiciary. Litigants and attorneys can have little confidence in that judge's ability to determine the credibility of witnesses and seek the truth. Any discipline short of removal would not be adequate to fulfill our mandate to uphold public confidence in the integrity and propriety of the judiciary.

C. Mitigation

In testimony and letters admitted at the hearing before the masters, numerous character witnesses, including attorneys and fellow judges, described Judge MacEachern as a conscientious, knowledgeable, and fair jurist. Based on this evidence, the masters found in mitigation that Judge MacEachern "is well-known for being a hardworking and ethical judge." Judge MacEachern argues that the high regard to which she is held in her community weighs heavily against removal.

(16) Mitigating evidence is not relevant in determining if the judge engaged in bad faith, and thus engaged in willful misconduct, but may be taken into account in determining the totality of the circumstances as pertinent to determining the appropriate discipline. (Freedman, supra, No. 179 at p. 7 [49 Cal.4th CJP Supp. at p. 232]; Broadman, supra, 18 Cal.4th at p. 1112.) We have considered the character evidence offered by Judge MacEachern on the question of discipline, which has made our task all the more difficult. However, her reputation in the community cannot redeem the seriousness of her wrongdoing and its negative impact on the reputation of the judiciary.

ORDER REMOVING JUDGE MacEACHERN FROM OFFICE

Pursuant to the provisions of article VI, section 18 of the California Constitution, Judge Kelly MacEachern is ordered removed from her judicial office; pursuant to that section of the Constitution and rules 120(a) and 136 of the Rules of the Commission on Judicial Performance, Judge MacEachern is hereby disqualified from acting as a judge.

Commission members, Hon. Judith D. McConnell, Hon. Katherine Feinstein, Mr. Marshall B. Grossman, Mr. Samuel A. Hardage, Ms. Barbara Schraeger, Ms. Maya Dillard Smith, and Mr. Nathaniel Trives voted in favor of all of the findings and conclusions expressed herein and in the foregoing order of removal and disqualification of Judge MacEachern. Commission members Mr. Peter E. Flores, Jr., Mr. Lawrence Simi, and Ms. Sandra Talcott concur as to the factual findings and legal conclusions expressed herein, but dissent as to the order of removal and would have imposed a severe public censure.

Hon. Frederick P. Horn was recused.

DISSENTING OPINION

Commission members Lawrence Simi, Peter Flores, Jr., Esq., and Sandra Talcott express the following opinion.

We fully concur with the special masters and our colleagues on the commission in the findings of fact and conclusions of law in the case of Judge Kelly MacEachern.

Judge MacEachern, by submitting a false claim for reimbursement, violated the California Code of Judicial Ethics, amounting to willful misconduct within the meaning of article VI, section 18, subdivision (d) of the California Constitution. She then compounded that conduct before the commission, and, under oath, the panel of special masters, by her defensive, disingenuous lack of candor and her misleading attempts to excuse her conduct.

Our difference of opinion with our colleagues rests only with the level of discipline. Judge MacEachern has not previously exhibited patterns of behavior that lead us to believe she would repeat the grave mistakes she made in this case. Based on the special masters' factors in mitigation concerning the judge's reputation in the community, and the many personal letters of support, it is clear to us that Judge MacEachern's integrity and honesty as a jurist and former deputy district attorney are well known in the community and she is known to be a hard-working and ethical judge. Additionally, as the masters also set forth in mitigation, Judge MacEachern has never previously been disciplined. Her conduct in this case, we believe, was an isolated instance of wrongdoing.

At the public hearing before the commission, Judge MacEachern acknowledged her mistakes, took responsibility for them, and expressed remorse. We believe she was sincere. We feel that this experience has made an indelible impression on a judge who, heretofore, has had a good reputation as an honest, hard-working bench officer. The fact that she has demonstrated remorse and contrition, and that this offense does not directly relate to court proceedings, nor affect nor harm litigants, has added weight to our decision.

Removal is the ultimate sanction for a judge. We do not feel this one-time error in judgment and behavior, albeit highly egregious, rises to that level. We therefore voted to impose a severe public censure, rather than remove Judge MacEachern from the bench.

The judge's petition for review by the Supreme Court was denied on December 10, 2008.

INQUIRY CONCERNING JUDGE RICHARD W. STANFORD, JR.

SUMMARY

A disciplinary matter was brought concerning a superior court judge.

The Commission on Judicial Performance ordered that the judge be removed from office for willful misconduct involving a pattern of handling traffic tickets for family and friends and providing unusually lenient dispositions. Although he was assigned to a criminal felony department that did not ordinarily handle traffic tickets, he arranged for the citations to be transferred to his department and then directed his clerk to waive all fines except a mandatory county traffic school fee. The judge testified that when he was adjudicating the tickets of friends and family, it did not occur to him that his actions were improper. The commission declined to accept the masters' finding as to the judge's state of mind, concluding the judge could not have failed to recognize the impropriety of using the power of his judicial office to help his friends and family. Moreover, the judge had no reasonable basis for believing that his family and friends would have received the same outcome had they appeared in traffic court. The commission concluded that the judge committed willful misconduct (Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (d)) and that he committed multiple ethical violations (Cal. Code Jud. Ethics, canons 1, 2A, 2B(1) 3B(7), 3E(1), 3E(2)). The commission concluded that the judge's exceptional contributions to his court and his community were eclipsed by a pattern of misconduct involving abuse of the power of judicial office by providing benefits to the favored few.

HEADNOTES

(1) Judges § 6.4—Discipline—Proceedings—Findings of Masters.—The examiner has the burden of proving charges against a judge by clear and convincing evidence. Factual findings of the masters are entitled to special weight because the masters have the advantage of observing the demeanor of the witnesses. Nonetheless, the California Constitution vests in the Commission on Judicial Performance the power to impose judicial discipline, subject to review by the California Supreme Court. Thus, the commission may determine that it is appropriate to disregard the findings of fact and conclusions of law made by the special masters and make its own findings and conclusions.

(2) Judges § 6.2—Discipline—Grounds—Ticket Fixing.—Members of the public know instinctively that a judge should not handle traffic tickets of family and friends. Common experience and common sense indicate that ticket fixing is a quintessential bad act of a judge. It is an abuse of power that citizens unquestionably understand and are suspicious about. The impropriety of adjudicating the traffic tickets of friends and family is no less transparent when fines and fees are waived than when the ticket is dismissed. The vice in a two-track system of justice does not turn on whether there was a classic ticket fix in the sense of a dismissal of a ticket, but rather, in the damage to the reputation of the judiciary from the double standard.

(3) Judges § 6.4—Discipline—Proceedings—Findings of Masters.—The Commission on Judicial Performance retains the authority to override the factual findings of the special masters, even on matters of credibility.

(4) Judges § 8—Duties—Familiarity with Legal Standards.—Judges should not issue orders in any cases where they are unfamiliar with the legal standards (Cal. Code Jud. Ethics, canon 3B(2)).

(5) Judges § 6.4—Discipline—Proceedings—Mitigating Evidence.—Mitigating evidence is not relevant in determining if a judge acted in bad faith, and thus engaged in willful misconduct, but may be taken into account in determining the totality of the circumstances as pertinent to determining the appropriate discipline.

(6) Judges § 6.2—Discipline—Grounds—Willful Misconduct—Favoritism.—Willful misconduct is the most serious type of judicial misconduct. The use of the power of judicial office to benefit a friend is a casebook example of willful misconduct. It is defined by the California Supreme Court as consisting of (1) unjudicial conduct that is (2) committed in bad faith (3) by a judge acting in his or her judicial capacity.

(7) Judges § 6.2—Discipline—Grounds—Willful Misconduct—Noncompliance with Ethical Canons.—Failure to comply with the canons of the California Code of Judicial Ethics is generally considered to constitute unjudicial conduct.

(8) Judges § 6.2—Discipline—Grounds—Favoritism.—Cal. Code Jud. Ethics, canons 1, 2, 2A, 2B(1), require a judge to uphold the integrity and independence of the judiciary and avoid the appearance of impropriety and favoritism. The integrity and independence of judges depend in turn upon their acting without fear or favor. Where a judge's special attention is conferred only on a favored few, the integrity of the judicial office is thereby seriously impaired. Such actions undermine public confidence in the judiciary and call into question the fundamental fairness of the judicial process.

(9) Judges § 8—Duties—According Right to Hearing.—In addition to prohibiting ex parte communications, Cal. Code Jud. Ethics, canon 3B(7), requires a judge to accord to every person who has a legal interest in a proceeding, or the person's lawyer, a full right to be heard according to law.

(10) Judges § 8—Duties—Avoiding Improper Communications—Absence of Prosecuting Attorney in Traffic Cases.—Where the district attorney's nonappearance policy in traffic court is limited to matters legitimately before the court, a judge violates canon 3B(7) by failing to accord the district attorney the opportunity to be heard in the disposition of traffic matters for the judge's friends and family outside of the normal course of business. It is not necessary for district attorneys to advise judicial officers that they are not consenting to communications with litigants that by definition are improper, e.g., out of court at a judge's house, or through an intermediary. Even in those cases in which a judge is hearing traffic cases within the normal course of business, the judge must be most circumspect in avoiding an appearance of lack of impartiality. The absence of a prosecuting attorney makes it all the more important that the court at such trials use the utmost care to preserve not only the reality but the appearance of fairness and lack of bias.

(11) Judges § 6.2—Discipline—Grounds—Willful Misconduct—Bad Faith.—The second element of willful misconduct is bad faith. A judge acts in bad faith only by (1) performing a judicial act for a corrupt purpose (which is any purpose other than the faithful discharge of judicial duties), or (2) performing a judicial act with knowledge that the act is beyond the judge's lawful judicial power, or (3) performing a judicial act that exceeds the judge's lawful power with a conscious disregard for the limits of the judge's authority.

(12) Judges § 6.2—Discipline—Grounds—Willful Misconduct—Limitations.—A judge may be censured or removed for willful misconduct occurring not more than six years before the start of his or her current term (Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (d)).

(13) Judges § 6.2—Discipline—Grounds—Ticket Fixing—Determining Appropriate Discipline.—Determining the appropriate discipline depends in large measure on the nature and number of charges found to be true. The number of acts of misconduct is relevant to discipline to the extent it shows isolated incidents, or a pattern that demonstrates that the judge lacks judicial temperament and the ability to perform judicial functions in an evenhanded manner. Giving preferential treatment to friends and family in traffic matters manifestly demonstrates an inability to perform judicial functions in an evenhanded manner. The gravamen of the wrongdoing is the two-track system of justice—one for those with special access to the judge, and the other for everyone else. The nub of the problem is the appearance or reality that Lady Justice is not blindfolded. Rather than justice being dispensed with an even hand without regard to who is before the court, the judge has lifted the blindfold, and seeing a relative or friend or some person with influence, the judge tips the scale and puts them on a special track for favored handling. This is corruption at the core of our system of impartial equal justice, and is intolerable.

(14) Judges § 6.2—Discipline—Grounds—Ticket Fixing—Determining Appropriate Discipline.—The Commission on Judicial Performance recognizes the gravity of the misconduct by imposing the maximum discipline on judges who have engaged in a pattern of providing preferential treatment to family and friends in the adjudication of traffic matters.

(15) Judges § 6.4—Discipline—Proceedings—Determining Appropriate Discipline—Factors.—A factor considered in determining the appropriate discipline is whether the judge's conduct and his response to the Commission on Judicial Performance's inquiry reflect a lack of integrity or dishonesty. The commission also considers whether a judge appreciates the impropriety of his actions as being indicative of a capacity to reform.

(16) Judges § 6.4—Discipline—Proceedings—Determining Appropriate Discipline—Factors—Corrupt State of Mind Not Prerequisite to Removal.—A judge's state of mind is not the determining factor on the issue of discipline because a failure to recognize the impropriety of obviously unethical conduct necessarily raises the correlated concern that he may continue to miss other such issues in the future. Moreover, proof of a corrupt state of mind is not a prerequisite to removal. The purpose of the Commission on Judicial Performance's judicial discipline proceedings is not to punish the judge, but rather the protection of the public, the enforcement of rigorous standards of judicial conduct, and the maintenance of public confidence in the integrity and independence of the judicial system. Adherence to these objectives may require removal regardless of the judge's state of mind. The public deserves protection from judges who commit serious misconduct regardless of whether the conduct is the result of malice or ignorance.

(17) Judges § 6.2—Discipline—Grounds—Ticket Fixing—Removal of Judge Necessary.—A judge had made exceptional contributions to his court and his community, and his prior discipline over a long tenure on the bench had been limited to one advisory letter. These facts, however, were eclipsed by a pattern of misconduct in which the judge repeatedly abused the power of his judicial office by providing benefits to the favored few not available to other citizens, when the judge adjudicated traffic tickets of his friends and family and waived their fines and fees. His removal was necessary to assure the public that a two-track system of justice and the dispensation of special favors by judges have no place in California.

(18) Judges § 6.2—Discipline—Grounds—Favoritism—Determining Appropriate Discipline.—With respect to a pattern of misconduct consisting of a two-track system of justice and the dispensation of special favors by judges, it is the duty of the Commission on Judicial Performance to denounce the misconduct in no uncertain terms and to sanction it as the grave ethical violation that it is, in the commission's best effort to ensure evenhanded justice, starting at the very point of access to the judge.

INTRODUCTION AND SUMMARY

This disciplinary matter concerns Judge Richard W. Stanford, Jr., a judge of the Orange County Superior Court since 1998, and a judge of the Orange County Municipal Court from 1985 to 1998. The Commission on Judicial Performance commenced this inquiry with the filing of its notice of formal proceedings (Notice) on April 7, 2011.

The Notice charges Judge Stanford with a pattern of diverting to his own court and acting on traffic tickets on behalf of his son-in-law, friends, and a juror over a seven-year period, between 2003 and 2010. It alleges that he improperly waived or suspended all or practically all fines and fees in eight cases and granted a continuance, outside of the ordinary course of business, in one case.

The Supreme Court appointed three special masters to hear and take evidence and report to the commission under commission rule 129. (All references to a rule are to the Rules of the Com. on Jud. Performance.) The masters are Hon. Maria P. Rivera, Associate Justice of the Court of Appeal, First Appellate District; Hon. Donald Cole Byrd, Judge of the Glenn Superior Court; and Hon. Jacqueline A. Connor, Judge of the Los Angeles Superior Court.

The masters held a three-day hearing commencing on July 25, 2011, followed by an oral argument on September 16, 2011. The masters' report to the commission, containing their detailed findings of fact and conclusions of law, was filed with the commission on October 7, 2011. Judge Stanford appeared before the commission pursuant to rule 132 on December 7, 2011.

The masters concluded that Judge Stanford engaged in nine instances of willful misconduct over a seven-year period constituting a common practice of handling traffic tickets for friends and family. We reach the same conclusion, although we base our decision to remove Judge Stanford only on the seven instances of willful misconduct which occurred within six years of the start of the judge's current term. (Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (d).) This pattern of misconduct between 2005 and 2010 created both the appearance and the reality of a two-track system of justice—one for his friends and family and another for all others. Removal is necessary to restore public confidence in the integrity and impartiality of the judiciary and honor the commission's mandate to ensure the evenhanded administration of justice.

Judge Stanford is represented by Paul S. Meyer, Esq., of Costa Mesa, California. The examiners for the commission are Gary W. Schons, Esq., and Valerie Marchant, Esq.

FINDINGS OF FACT AND CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

A. Findings of Fact

The masters found that each of the nine incidents of misconduct charged in the Notice was proven by clear and convincing evidence. We concur and adopt the masters' findings of fact on the charges, and on the meeting with the presiding judge and subsequent events as stated below. Judge Stanford does not dispute these findings. The masters made certain other findings on matters not charged in the Notice concerning Judge Stanford's state of mind. As discussed below, we reach our own independent factual findings on those issues based on Judge Stanford's appearance before the commission and our review of the entire record of the hearing before the masters. Finally, we adopt the findings of the masters with respect to the judge's contributions to the administration of justice and his community.

The Traffic Citation Process in Orange County Superior Court

After a person is cited for a moving traffic violation, law enforcement files the citation with the court. A standard courtesy notice is issued within days of the ticket being filed in court. The courtesy notice provides information about the fees and procedures for traffic tickets and lists the total bail amount (the base fine plus any applicable penalty assessments and relevant fees), as well as the traffic school fee if the person is eligible (which is the total bail amount plus an in-county traffic school fee). The courtesy notice also describes the procedure to follow to either pay the ticket or arrange for traffic school. Both can be accomplished without appearing at the courthouse by payment of the full bail amount and, if applicable, the traffic school fee.

A person who does not want to pay the total bail amount can either make a personal appearance in traffic court or write in to request a reduction of the fines and fees, although these options are not explained in the courtesy notice. A person who wants to contest the ticket can either request a court trial or a trial by declaration.[1]

The Charges

1. Count 1(A): Pennell

In 2003, Judge Stanford was presiding over a criminal trial in which George Pennell was a juror. Pennell arrived late one day because he had been stopped and cited for speeding. Judge Stanford had emphasized to the jurors the importance of arriving on time. The judge testified, "I felt bad for the guy and here I am chewing on him. And in his mind, I'm the reason he got his traffic ticket to begin with, which is not really fair . . . . He's doing his civic duty." In open court, Judge Stanford offered to either suspend the fines or order traffic school with payment of only the county fee. Pennell chose traffic school.

Judge Stanford was assigned to a criminal felony department during this and all of the proceedings that are the subject of this inquiry. Traffic tickets are not handled in his department unless they are trailing a criminal proceeding that is set in his department. In this instance, Judge Stanford or his clerk (presumably at his direction) monitored the court's records for the ticket. The judge directed that Pennell's citation be transferred to his department when it entered the system in August 2003. He then directed his clerk to waive all fines except the traffic school fee of $51.50. According to Judge Stanford, the county traffic school fee is mandatory.

In September 2003, Pennell paid the county fee and was provided a traffic school notice. This is in contrast to a ticket he received in 2007, when he attended traffic school and paid the total bail amount of $305. The clerk who processed Pennell's payment in 2003 did not recall ever seeing anyone else attending traffic school who paid only the county fee. Such a circumstance is "extremely rare and out of the ordinary."

Although the minutes describe the proceeding as "Hearing Held for Arraignment," there was no arraignment and Pennell did not appear.

[1] The findings in this paragraph were not included in the masters' report. They are supported by clear and convincing evidence presented at the hearing, particularly the testimony of Cherie Garofalo, the director for criminal operations (including traffic) in Orange County Superior Court.

2. Count 1(B): Mooney

Mary Ann Mooney met Judge Stanford and his family when they were neighbors. They attended the same church. The judge's wife socializes with Mooney's daughter-in-law "somewhat." Judge Stanford and Mooney's son were fraternity brothers in college.

Mooney received a ticket in 2005 for impeding traffic. She was upset because she did not think she deserved the ticket. Judge Stanford learned about the ticket through someone other than Mooney, probably from his wife. The judge explained that he felt moved to assist Mooney, who was 82 years old at the time, because he believed she was frail and in ill health. Mooney's family, however, stated Mooney was neither sick nor frail at the time and was generally very capable. Judge Stanford testified that she appeared frail to him when he saw and talked to her at church on Sundays. When asked why he did not advise Mooney to request a trial by declaration to avoid a trip to court, the judge simply answered he "didn't think of it." Judge Stanford conceded that he also was motivated to help her because she was upset about the ticket.

Judge Stanford could not recall if he communicated his offer of assistance to Mooney. The masters found, based on the totality of the testimony, that Judge Stanford handled the ticket based on hearsay information from his wife. We concur.

In December 2005, the ticket was transferred to Judge Stanford's department. At the judge's direction, his clerk entered a disposition of guilty with all fees and fines suspended. Mooney did not appear. The minutes state the court found "compelling and extraordinary circumstances" to waive the $20 security fee. There is not clear and convincing evidence that Judge Stanford made such a finding. Rather, the evidence establishes that it was entered by the clerk to effectuate Judge Stanford's directive that no fines or fees be paid (certain fees cannot be waived without specific findings). Judge Stanford testified that it was possible he consented to the entry when he was told by his clerk that it was necessary. The clerk entered the disposition as "chambers work" because the judge's notes came out of chambers for her to enter.

3. Count 1(C): Williams

Edwin Williams has been a pastor at Judge Stanford's church since 2000. He and the judge are good friends. They see each other regularly at church services and in connection with the Good Samaritan Center, a church-run homeless ministry where Judge Stanford volunteers. They also play tennis together regularly at Judge Stanford's home. Williams's daughter held her wedding reception at the judge's home.

(a) The 2003 Ticket

In October 2003, Williams received a ticket for failing to stop at a red light. The total bail, excluding the traffic school fee, was $326. Williams discussed the ticket with Judge Stanford who told Williams he would suspend all the fines except the traffic school fee if Williams wanted to plead guilty. Judge Stanford explained that he offered his assistance because Williams was living on a pastor's salary with four children and, "probably could use the money. Nothing specific . . . He could have paid it. I just felt sympathy for him."

In November 2003, a traffic clerk transferred the citation to Judge Stanford's department for arraignment at the request of "a woman" on the telephone. The clerk described this as "very awkward" because Judge Stanford's court was a felony department. Some days after the transfer, Judge Stanford's clerk entered a disposition waiving all fines and fees except the $52 county traffic school fee.

(b) The 2006 Ticket[2]

In March 2006, Williams was cited for speeding, driving 54 mph in a 45 mph zone. He was upset because he thought the speed written on the ticket was different from what the officer had told him. Williams wanted to get the judge's opinion regarding his chances of successfully contesting the ticket. When Williams raised the matter, the judge offered to take care of it. Williams could not recall what the judge said about how the ticket would be handled but, as a result of the 2003 experience, his sense was that the fines and fees would be waived. Williams believes he placed a copy of the ticket in the judge's box at the church office.

A courtesy notice was sent to Williams indicating a total bail amount of $216 and a bail-plus-traffic-school-fee amount of $269.50. A week later, Judge Stanford ordered traffic school and waived all fines and fees except the $53.50 county traffic school fee. The clerk entered the disposition as "chambers work." Williams did not appear in court.

The traffic clerk who processed Williams's payment of the traffic school fee could not recall having ever seen another order for traffic school in which all fines and fees, other than the county traffic school fee, had been waived.

[2] In 2005 Williams received a speeding ticket. He did not discuss that ticket with Judge Stanford and paid the fine of $178.50.

4. Count 1(D): Gonzales

Gina Gonzales became Judge Stanford's clerk in 1994. She considers the judge and his wife as friends and knows their children and their son-in-law. She has attended church teas with the judge's wife and staff holiday lunches at the judge's home.

In May 2006, Gonzales was cited for failure to stop at a stop sign. She was not eligible for traffic school because of a prior ticket. Gonzales was upset about the ticket because she believed she had stopped and because of the cost of the ticket. When she discussed the matter with Judge Stanford, he offered to suspend her fine if she was willing to plead guilty. Judge Stanford testified that he made the offer because he thought it would be awkward for Gonzales to go downstairs to traffic court, that she might need time off to go down there, and that "it would be easier for me to do it for her."

The courtesy notice, sent in June, listed the total bail of $141. In August, Judge Stanford directed that a guilty plea be entered and all fines and fees suspended. Gonzales asked Jennifer Londo, a fill-in clerk, to enter the disposition because clerks are not permitted to enter minutes in their own case. Londo indicated that she did not interact with Judge Stanford about the matter but was given something in writing indicating the disposition to enter. Judge Stanford testified that he "must have" talked to Londo, or that he was "sure he would have" but he had no specific recollection of the conversation. The masters found there was no conversation between Judge Stanford and Londo. We concur.

Londo thought it would be "weird" to enter the matter as chambers work, so she entered it into the minutes as a "Hearing Held for Arraignment" and indicated that Gonzales had appeared and waived her rights. In fact, the judge never took the bench in this matter and there was no appearance or hearing.

5. Count 1(E): Neilson Construction

David Neilson is the owner of Neilson Construction and has been a friend of Judge Stanford for over 30 years.

In December 2006, the driver of a vehicle registered to Neilson Construction was cited for driving an overweight vehicle. The driver signed a promise to appear in court on or before January 31, 2007. Neilson contacted Judge Stanford about obtaining an extension of time to appear on the citation. He told the judge that the driver had not told him about the ticket until the day before the promise-to-appear date and that he was going to be out of town on January 31. Judge Stanford offered to get an extension for Neilson. After getting the extension, Judge Stanford informed Neilson of the new date.

6. Count 1(F): Andrews

Heidi Andrews has known Judge Stanford for nearly 25 years and is a good friend of the judge's wife. In April 2007, Andrews was cited for speeding on the street where the Stanfords live while en route to visit the judge's wife. Neither Andrews nor Judge Stanford could recall whether they spoke about the ticket. The masters found, as do we, that there was no such conversation. It is unclear how it was determined that Judge Stanford would handle Andrews's ticket. Andrews testified, "it was just, for . . . lack of a better word, just sort of this is what happened, and it was able to be taken care of. And I thought, 'Okay,' and I didn't think any more about it." Judge Stanford testified that he wanted to help Andrews because the speed limit on his street had recently changed and he felt bad for her.

The standard courtesy notice was sent to Andrews on May 10, 2007. The total bail amount was $248.50. On May 17, Judge Stanford ordered entry of a guilty plea and suspended sentence, waiving all fees. The minutes state that Andrews "appeared via phone," but neither the judge nor his clerk had any recollection of a telephonic appearance. Cherie Garofalo, the director of criminal operations (which includes traffic), could not recall ever seeing an appearance by telephone in a traffic matter. The masters found there was no telephonic appearance. We concur.

7. Count 1(G): Habbestad

Greg Habbestad knows Judge Stanford through the volunteer work they have done together at the Good Samaritan Center for more than 15 years. Habbestad attended annual barbecues for the ministry at the judge's home and once attended a baseball game with him. He is an aerospace engineer at Boeing.

In September 2009, Habbestad received a citation for speeding, going 56 mph in a 40 mph zone. The courtesy notice was sent on November 2, indicating a total bail amount of $332. In November, the judge and Habbestad were working at Good Samaritan Center when other volunteers were having a conversation about traffic tickets. Habbestad mentioned he had received a ticket and expressed surprise about how expensive the fine was. After the center closed and the other volunteers had left, Judge Stanford told Habbestad that he would take care of the ticket so Habbestad did not have to go to court and could pay a lower fine.

Sometime later, Habbestad provided the judge with a copy of the courtesy notice. Judge Stanford thereafter directed his clerk to enter a disposition of traffic school, with all fines and fees waived other than the $51 county traffic school fee. There was no appearance. The matter was entered in the minutes as "chambers work." The minutes also included a finding of compelling and extraordinary circumstances for waiver of the assessment and security fees. The judge's clerk testified that the entry was not made at the judge's direction; rather, it was a code she entered in order to effectuate the judge's directive to waive those fees.

Judge Stanford delivered the documentation to Habbestad who then went to court and paid the $51. The traffic clerk who took the payment does not recall ever seeing "someone get traffic school without any payment other than the county fee," but she would not have questioned a disposition by a judge. Habbestad told his wife and other friends, including a police officer, that the judge helped him with the ticket.

8. Count 1(H): McGee

Michael McGee is Judge Stanford's son-in-law; he is married to the judge's daughter Laurie. In March 2010, McGee received a ticket for running a red light. McGee believed he had entered the intersection on a yellow light. He talked to his wife about getting Judge Stanford's advice about whether he should fight the ticket. Laurie told McGee she would talk to her father or ask her mother to talk to her father. Laurie either left the ticket for her mother with a note or gave it to her mother. Laurie never spoke directly with her father about the ticket.

Sometime later, McGee and Judge Stanford had a conversation about the ticket. They discussed McGee's options of either contesting the ticket or attending traffic school. At some point, Judge Stanford told McGee that he would process the ticket, but he would not be able to help him with future tickets. McGee does not remember the exact words used, but recalled the judge saying he would let McGee know if there was anything else McGee needed to do.

A courtesy notice was sent on April 12, indicating a total bail amount of $456, and a bail-plus-traffic-school-fee amount of $496. On May 3, Judge Stanford provided written directions for his clerk, Gonzales, to enter a disposition for traffic school with all fines suspended except for the county traffic school fee. When Gonzales recognized the defendant as the judge's son-in-law, she went to the judge's chambers and told him she could not enter minutes for someone she knew. She asked Judge Stanford whether he would like her to give it to her supervisor to assign to someone else to enter the minutes and the judge responded "yes."

Gonzales gave the written disposition to her supervisor and explained that she could not enter it into the system because she knew the defendant. The supervisor asked another clerk to enter the disposition. The supervisor also reported the matter to the deputy court operations manager who determined the clerk should not enter the disposition. Meanwhile, the clerk had independently declined to enter the disposition upon learning that McGee was the judge's son-in-law and reported the interactions to the deputy court operations manager. At this point, the matter was referred to Judge Stanford's superiors.

Meeting with Presiding Judge and Subsequent Handling of the McGee Ticket

When Presiding Judge Kim Dunning learned that Judge Stanford had attempted to enter a disposition in his son-in-law's traffic matter, she arranged a meeting with him for the following morning. Prior to the meeting, Judge Dunning was provided with a list of traffic infractions handled by Judge Stanford, which included the dispositions at issue in this case. Some of the tickets where fines and fees had been waived were highlighted by staff, but the list was not accompanied by minutes or other information detailing the dispositions.

The meeting which took place in Judge Stanford's chambers was attended by Judge Dunning, Assistant Presiding Judge Thomas Borris, and Judge Stanford. Judge Dunning told Judge Stanford "you can't do this," and explained the need for disqualification and the appearance of impropriety created by the judge's conduct. Judge Stanford explained that he did not think it was unusual for a traffic defendant who came to court to have fines and fees reduced or eliminated. Judge Dunning responded that you "can't handle cases for family members," and further explained that traffic tickets are not as simple as they used to be, and that fiscal issues in 2010 have impacted the collection of fines and fees. During the meeting, Judge Stanford was "receptive and cooperative." He was not defensive or argumentative, but appeared embarrassed and humiliated. It was Judge Dunning's impression that Judge Stanford "missed the issue," and that "a light bulb went on" during the meeting. Judge Stanford admitted his actions in the McGee matter and volunteered that he had taken similar actions in the past. Because of this admission, Judge Dunning did not show Judge Stanford the list of other traffic matters he had handled nor ask him about any of the cases on the list. Judge Stanford did not disclose that he had handled a ticket for his courtroom clerk, nor did he offer specifics about his assistance to other friends.

Judge Dunning informed Judge Stanford that she expected McGee's ticket to be paid in full. Judge Dunning did not articulate how the matter should be resolved other than that there must be an immediate payment of the full fines and fees. She recalls Judge Stanford saying that he would write the check.

After the meeting, Judge Stanford gave Barbara Burns, the deputy court operations manager, a personal check for $456, the total bail amount of McGee's ticket, and the "Court Information Sheet" (CIS) for the ticket. Despite having been counseled about the impropriety of entering a disposition in his son-in-law's case, Judge Stanford crossed out the earlier disposition on the CIS and wrote instead: "T.S. Fines & fees pd Today $456, sign & pay TS fee by 5/28/10. RWS." He asked Burns to enter the new disposition. A traffic clerk subsequently entered the payment and the indicated extension of time to pay the traffic school fee. Burns gave Judge Stanford a receipt and a document which reflected the extension. The judge did not inform McGee of the disposition of his ticket or of the May 28 deadline to pay the county traffic school fee.

Judge Dunning testified that she did not expect Judge Stanford to order a disposition in his son-in-law's matter after their meeting. She decided at the meeting that the ticket had to be handled by someone else. However, she went on to state, "I have to take responsibility for this because I didn't articulate [how the matter was to be handled]."

Judge Stanford's State of Mind

1. Did Judge Stanford know his conduct was wrong at the time he acted?

Judge Stanford testified that when he was adjudicating the tickets of friends and family it did not occur to him that his actions were improper, that he simply "missed" the conflicts and appearance issues, and had a "blind spot" which prevented him from thinking about the impropriety of his actions. Consciousness of wrongdoing is not charged in the Notice and is not an element of willful misconduct in the context of this case. Nevertheless, the judge urged the masters to find that he did not realize his actions were unethical until he was confronted by the presiding judge. While recognizing "[t]hat a seasoned judge would miss the issue does seem implausible," the masters were "not persuaded that he [(Judge Stanford)] could not have failed to recognize the conflict of interest and the appearance of impropriety it created. Many who have known Judge Stanford for years have testified that, yes, he could have—and did—miss the issue. We cannot simply disregard this mass of evidence as 'wishful thinking' and conclude it was not possible." (Original italics.) We respectfully decline to adopt this finding and, instead, find that Judge Stanford recognized the impropriety of his conduct when he provided preferential treatment to friends and his son-in-law in traffic matters.

As the masters note, numerous fellow jurists testified and submitted letters attesting to Judge Stanford's integrity and opining that he would not have handled the tickets of friends and family if he had known it was wrong. During her meeting with Judge Stanford, Judge Dunning was of the impression that the judge had "missed" the issue, and that "a light bulb" had gone on when confronted with the impropriety of his conduct. It is not surprising that those who know and respect Judge Stanford would have difficulty reconciling their view of the judge's integrity with his having knowingly engaged in unethical conduct. However, even if the judge's misconduct was an aberration or motivated by his proclivity to help others, we find it implausible that Judge Stanford was entirely unconscious of the impropriety of his actions when he handled the traffic tickets of family and friends.

Judge Stanford's 26 years on the bench, long career as a prosecutor, and reputation as a "by-the-book" judge who does not "cut corners" and is knowledgeable, diligent and follows the law negates any possibility that he missed the issue. Fellow judges to whom the question was posed on cross-examination acknowledged that they would not have missed the issue. Many of those who submitted letters and testified as to the judge's good character acknowledged the apparent impropriety and gravity of the judge's conduct ("disturbing," "serious breach of ethical duties," "shocks and disappoints me," "indefensible").

Significantly, Gina Gonzales, the judge's clerk, did not "miss the issue" when asked to enter the disposition for Judge Stanford's son-in-law. She knew immediately that she could not handle a case involving someone she knew and told the judge so. Yet, according to Judge Stanford, even this did not alert him to the impropriety of handling his son-in-law's ticket.

(2) Members of the public know instinctively that a judge should not handle traffic tickets of family and friends. We have previously noted that common experience and common sense indicate that " 'ticket fixing is a quintessential bad act of a judge. It is an abuse of power that citizens unquestionably understand and are suspicious about.' " (Inquiry Concerning Platt (2002) 48 Cal.4th CJP Supp. 227, 233 (Platt).) Judge Platt was charged with instructing his clerk in four cases to transfer to his court a speeding ticket issued to a friend or relative of a friend or acquaintance, and then dismissing the ticket without an appearance. The judge testified that, although he later realized that dismissing the tickets was wrong, he did not perceive any legal or ethical problem at the time he handled the tickets. The masters concluded that Judge Platt's explanation for dismissing the ticket and his claim that he did not realize at the time his action was wrong were " 'after-the-fact rationalizations which lack credibility.' " Citing Judge Platt's reputation as a careful decision maker with a good knowledge of the law, the commission concurred with the masters' finding that " 'it is inconceivable he did not know the obvious, that ticket fixing was wrong . . . .' " (Ibid.) Judge Platt was removed from office.

The impropriety of adjudicating the traffic tickets of friends and family is no less transparent when fines and fees are waived than when the ticket is dismissed. (Inquiry Concerning Wasilenko (2005) 49 Cal.4th CJP Supp. 26, 49–50, 51 (Wasilenko).) As we stated in Wasilenko, the vice in a two-track system of justice does not turn on whether there was a classic ticket "fix" in the sense of a dismissal of a ticket, "but rather, in the damage to the reputation of the judiciary from the double standard." (Id. at p. 49.)

(3) We are mindful that the masters found Judge Stanford to be a credible witness and that the factual findings of the masters are entitled to special weight. However, this commission retains the authority to override the factual findings of the special masters, even on matters of credibility. (See, e.g., Broadman, supra, 18 Cal.4th at p. 1090.) In this case, commission members had the opportunity to question Judge Stanford extensively concerning his state of mind and observe his demeanor at his appearance before the commission. The judge acknowledged that he has attended judicial ethics education programs and has looked at summaries of cases involving ticket fixing. Yet, he was unable to offer any introspection as to how he could have missed the obvious. When asked why he handled tickets for friends and family, he responded, "In an effort to help people that I knew in situations that, at the time, seemed like an appropriate thing to do, to help the individuals." We simply do not believe that Judge Stanford failed to recognize the impropriety of using the power of his judicial office to help his son-in-law and his friends.

When asked if he would have recused if his son-in-law had a case assigned to his courtroom, Judge Stanford stated that the issue would have been obvious in open court with "people standing in front of you." We believe the issue was just as obvious to Judge Stanford in the cases before us, but that his failure to recuse was easier to conceal when people were not standing in front of him. While insisting that he was oblivious to the impropriety of his actions, Judge Stanford acknowledged that he agreed with his character witnesses who testified that the issue was so obvious they did not see how anybody would miss it. Judge Stanford did not miss the issue, he ignored the issue.

2. Was it reasonable to believe that suspension of all fees and fines was a common practice in traffic court?[3]

Judge Stanford testified he believed that waiving or suspending all fees and fines was a regular practice in traffic court. His understanding was based on his own experience in occasionally covering traffic court and night court 15 to 20 years ago. He testified he also based his belief about standard traffic dispositions on occasional conversations with traffic commissioners; however, he could not provide any specifics about those conversations. The judge admitted he did not make inquiries about the current practices in traffic court at the time he was adjudicating the tickets at issue. The masters found "that the judge's belief he was acting within the mainstream of traffic citation outcomes, while falling below professional standards—possibly, a violation of Canon 3B(2)—was not unreasonable." We reach a different conclusion based on our independent review of the record.

[3] In our discussion of this issue, we exclude Judge Stanford's action on the Neilson ticket which involved only an extension of time to appear—something Neilson could have obtained in the ordinary course of business.

In fact, during the period of the subject tickets, waiver or suspension of all fines and fees was an unusually lenient disposition in traffic court. Orange County Superior Court judges who were familiar with traffic court testified that a judge or commissioner would commonly reduce fees and fines in traffic court, but a complete waiver of fines and fees was not common and was "the exception to the rule." Presiding Judge Dunning testified that traffic fees are not as simple as they used to be and that fiscal issues in recent years have impacted collection of fees and fines.[4] Further, she testified that Judge Stanford "was not really current on what the traffic ticket situation was."

The examiner introduced a random sample of two weeks of traffic dispositions in 2009 and 2010 for the same violations as those handled by the judge in this case (with the exception of impeding traffic). None of the dispositions included a full waiver of fees and fines.[5]

The director of criminal operations in Orange County Superior Court testified that in her experience as a traffic court clerk she frequently saw fines and fees reduced but infrequently, less than a few times per month, saw a waiver of all fines and fees except for the traffic school fee. Other traffic department clerks made similar observations [(full waiver other than traffic school fee was "extremely rare and out of the ordinary," saw similar dispositions "never" or "every once in a while")].

(4) Based on this evidence, we conclude Judge Stanford had no reasonable basis for believing his family and friends would have received the same

[4] The only time fees and fines are routinely waived is when a felony defendant is being sentenced to state prison. In that case, pending traffic tickets are often transferred to the felony department so they can be disposed of by way of dismissal or waiver of fines and fees pursuant to a felony plea bargain or at felony sentencing.

[5] Further, the masters accepted the examiner's representation that there were no dispositions where traffic school was ordered for only the county fee in a compendium of five random-sample weeks of dispositions for the same traffic offenses as those involved in these matters during the years 2003 to 2008. Judge Stanford does not object to this finding.

outcome had they appeared in traffic court. Having handled criminal courts for years, Judge Stanford knows that sentences and fees and fines change over time, yet he never bothered to inquire whether sentencing practices in traffic court had changed in the last 15 to 20 years. Moreover, it has never been proper to waive fees and fines in traffic court for no reason or to benefit friends and family. As noted by the masters, "judges should not issue orders in any cases where they are unfamiliar with the legal standards (Canon 3B(2))." Wearing blinders may have provided Judge Stanford with a rationalization for his conduct, but it did not render his unfounded belief that he was acting within the mainstream of traffic citation dispositions reasonable.

The Judge's Contributions to the Judiciary and His Community

(5) Much of the evidence Judge Stanford presented at the hearing before the masters related to his reputation within the judicial and legal community and his significant charitable contributions outside of court. Judge Stanford understands that mitigating evidence is not relevant in determining if he acted in bad faith, and thus engaged in willful misconduct, but may be taken into account in determining the totality of the circumstances as pertinent to determining the appropriate discipline. (Inquiry Concerning MacEachern (2008) 49 Cal.4th CJP Supp. 289, 312 (MacEachern); Broadman, supra, 18 Cal.4th at p. 1112.)

Fellow judges, lawyers, friends, relatives, members of the community, and law enforcement associations testified or submitted letters on Judge Stanford's behalf. The masters state, "By far the greatest outpouring of support for Judge Stanford relates to his 26 years of ethical, fair and honorable service on the bench and the value of his contributions to the Orange County Superior Court." Judge Stanford is described as "zealously fair," well prepared, honorable, "rock solid" and humble. He is known to be one of the hardest working judges on the Orange County bench. Based on this evidence, the masters found that Judge Stanford is a widely respected jurist. We adopt this finding.

The masters also found "that both the nature and quantity of Judge Stanford's community service is extraordinary." We agree. He is an active member in the First Free Evangelical Church, where he serves as an elder. Judge Stanford volunteers at the church's program for the homeless, the Good Samaritan Center, five days a week. As the administrator of the center, he spends 300 hours per year personally managing the program. In addition to donating his time to the center and other charitable organizations, the judge assists a woman, who was blinded by battery acid in a vicious attack, by driving her to church on Sundays, bringing her food, and helping her with home maintenance. The judge and his wife spend one week of their vacation every year at a camp for foster children.

B. Conclusions of Law

The masters concluded and Judge Stanford concedes that he engaged in nine incidents of willful misconduct. We reach the same conclusion.

Unjudicial Conduct

(7) Failure to comply with the canons of the California Code of Judicial Ethics (all references to a canon are to the California Code of Judicial Ethics) is generally considered to constitute unjudicial conduct. (Adams v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1994) 8 Cal.4th 630, 662 [34 Cal.Rptr.2d 641, 882 P.2d 358].) The masters concluded, as do we, that Judge Stanford's conduct violated canons 1 (a judge shall uphold the integrity and independence of the judiciary); 2A (a judge shall act at all times in a manner that promotes public confidence in the integrity and impartiality of the judiciary and shall avoid the appearance of impropriety); 2B(1) (a judge shall not allow family, social or other relationships to influence the judge's judicial conduct or judgment, nor shall a judge convey or permit others to convey the impression that any individual is in a special position to influence the judge);[6] 3B(7) (a judge shall not initiate, permit or consider ex parte communications, or consider other communications made to the judge outside the presence of the parties in a pending or impending proceeding); 3E(1) (a judge shall disqualify himself in any proceeding in which disqualification is required by law);[7] and 3E(2) (a judge shall disclose on the record information that is reasonably relevant to the question of disqualification).[8]

[6] The Notice charges Judge Stanford with violating canon 2B(2) which provides that a judge "shall not lend the prestige of judicial office or use the judicial title in any manner, including any oral or written communication, to advance the pecuniary or personal interests of the judge or others," except under specified circumstances (e.g., letter of recommendation based on personal knowledge). The masters concluded that this canon was not violated because the "gravamen of this canon is to prohibit the judge's use of his or her title or prestige to influence others to act in a manner that advances the interests of the judge or others." (Original italics.) They point out that all of the exceptions in the canon involve the judge offering testimony or communications to third parties. We agree that in the context of this case canon 2B(2) was not violated.

(8) The masters expound upon the manifest violation of the canons which require a judge to uphold the integrity and independence of the judiciary and avoid the appearance of impropriety and favoritism (canons 1, 2, 2A, 2B(1)): "As noted in the commentary to Canon 1, 'the integrity and independence of judges depend in turn upon their acting without fear or favor.' [(Italics added.)] Judge Stanford's special attention was conferred only on a favored few . . . and the integrity of the judicial office was thereby seriously impaired. These are precisely the kinds of actions that undermine public confidence in the judiciary, and call into question the fundamental fairness of the judicial process, a clear violation of Canons 1, 2 and 2A. In taking irregular actions to assist friends and family Judge Stanford abused his power, allowed his special relationships to influence his judicial conduct, and conveyed the impression that such persons were in a position to influence him, in violation of Canon 2 and 2B(1)." We agree.

(9) With respect to canon 3B(7), the masters concluded that Judge Stanford engaged in ex parte communications with the individuals who received the traffic tickets. The masters considered these violations to be "particularly egregious because the communications took place, in almost every instance, outside of the courtroom. Gathering information about pending matters by telephone, in the home [McGee], at church [Williams] or at a homeless ministry [Habbestad] as well as through intermediaries [Andrews, Mooney], is an unacceptable departure from judicial norms even apart from the judge's ill-advised decision to personally handle the matters." We agree. We part from the masters, however, on the issue of whether the judge failed to accord the district attorney the right to be heard. (Canon 3B(7).) In addition to prohibiting ex parte communications, canon 3B(7) requires a judge to accord to every person who has a legal interest in a proceeding, or the person's lawyer, a full right to be heard according to law. The masters concluded that Judge Stanford did not violate this portion of the canon because the Orange County District Attorney's Office had a policy of not appearing in traffic court.

[7] A judge's obligation to disqualify from matters involving family members and close friends is undisputed. (See Code Civ. Proc., § 170.1, subd. (a)(1), (4), (6)(A)(iii).)

[8] The masters concluded that the disqualification and disclosure canons were not violated with respect to the Pennell matter. Disqualification was not required, the masters concluded, because the judge's only relationship with Pennell was that he had served as a juror in the judge's courtroom. While disclosure was required, the masters concluded the record demonstrates that the judge discussed and disclosed the relevant facts in open court. We adopt this conclusion.

The Orange County District Attorney's Office has not appeared on traffic infractions for many years because of limited resources. The judge and the examiner stipulated: "The DA's non-appearance policy assumes that the ticket is in traffic court, or otherwise legitimately before the judge. The DA's implied consent to ex parte communications with pro per traffic ticket defendants only exists to the extent that the tickets are being heard in the ordinary course of judicial business. The DA's non-appearance policy does not extend to tickets that are not legitimately pending before the judge."

(10) We addressed this issue in Wasilenko, supra, 49 Cal.4th CJP Supp. at pages 44–45. Judge Wasilenko was charged with entering dispositions on traffic tickets of friends and relatives after transferring the matters to his own department. The Yuba County District Attorney had a policy of not appearing in traffic court. The masters in that case also concluded that canon 3B(7) was not violated as to district attorneys because the district attorney's office implicitly consented to ex parte communications in traffic court. The commission declined to make any findings or conclusions on this issue because the record was silent as to whether the district attorney's implied consent to ex parte communications in Yuba County included communications in matters that are not legitimately before the judge. (Wasilenko, supra, 49 Cal.4th CJP Supp. 26, 29–30.) However, we noted that even in those cases in which the judge is hearing traffic cases within the normal course of business, the judge " 'must be most circumspect in avoiding an appearance of lack of impartiality.' " (Id. at p. 45, quoting People v. Marcroft (1992) 6 Cal.App.4th Supp. 1, 4 [8 Cal.Rptr.2d 544].) " 'The very absence of a prosecuting attorney makes it all the more important that the court at such trials use the utmost care to preserve not only the reality but also the appearance of fairness and lack of bias.' " (Ibid.)

In this case, the evidence establishes that the district attorney's nonappearance policy is limited to matters that are legitimately before the judge. The masters note there was no evidence that Judge Stanford was aware of this limitation on the policy. Even so, Judge Stanford should have realized that the district attorney's nonappearance policy was limited to cases being handled by a judge without a conflict in the normal course of business. Moreover, we do not think it necessary for district attorneys to specifically advise judicial officers that they are not consenting to communications with litigants that by definition are improper, e.g., out of court at a judge's house, or through an intermediary. Thus, we conclude Judge Stanford failed to accord the district attorney the right to be heard in violation of canon 3B(7).

Bad Faith

(11) The second element of willful misconduct is bad faith. A judge acts in bad faith "only by (1) performing a judicial act for a corrupt purpose

(which is any purpose other than the faithful discharge of judicial duties), or (2) performing a judicial act with knowledge that the act is beyond the judge's lawful judicial power, or (3) performing a judicial act that exceeds the judge's lawful power with a conscious disregard for the limits of the judge's authority." (Broadman, supra, 18 Cal.4th at p. 1092.) The masters concluded, as do we, that Judge Stanford acted in bad faith under the first definition because he acted for a purpose other than the faithful discharge of judicial duties—to benefit friends and family.

Judicial Capacity

As to the third element of willful misconduct, Judge Stanford was acting in a judicial capacity because he was performing a function associated with the position of a judge—entering pleas, imposing sentence and granting a continuance. (Broadman, supra, 18 Cal.4th at p. 1104.)

III

DISCIPLINE

Judge Stanford has engaged in a pattern of willful misconduct involving the abuse of judicial authority to benefit family and friends—one of the most egregious types of judicial misconduct. Such conduct affronts the very essence of a fair and impartial judiciary.

(12) The California Constitution provides that a judge may be censured or removed for willful misconduct occurring not more than six years before the start of his or her current term. (Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (d).) The judge's handling of juror Pennell's ticket and Williams's 2003 ticket fall outside of this constitutional time limitation. Therefore, we do not consider those incidents in reaching our disciplinary decision. Setting those incidents aside, Judge Stanford has engaged in seven incidents of willful misconduct over a period of nearly five years.

(13) Determining the appropriate discipline "depends in large measure on the nature and number of charges found to be true." (Furey v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1987) 43 Cal.3d 1297, 1307, fn. 2 [240 Cal.Rptr. 859, 743 P.2d 919].) The number of acts of misconduct is relevant to discipline to the extent it shows isolated incidents, or a pattern that demonstrates that the judge lacks judicial temperament and the " ' "ability to perform judicial functions in an even-handed manner." ' " (Fletcher v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1998) 19 Cal.4th 865, 918 [81 Cal.Rptr.2d 58, 968 P.2d 958].) The masters concluded, and we agree, that these were not isolated incidents. Rather, the evidence establishes a common practice of diverting the traffic tickets of friends and family to his court and, in all but one case, waiving or suspending all or most fines and fees.[9] Such conduct manifestly demonstrates an inability to perform judicial functions in an evenhanded manner. As stated in Wasilenko: "[T]he gravamen of the wrongdoing is the two-track system of justice—one for those with special access to the judge, and the other for everyone else. The nub of the problem is the appearance or reality that Lady Justice is not blindfolded. Rather than justice being dispensed with an even hand without regard to who is before the court, the judge has lifted the blindfold, and seeing a relative or friend or some person with influence, the judge tips the scale and puts them on a special track for favored handling. This is corruption at the core of our system of impartial equal justice, and is intolerable." (Wasilenko, supra, 49 Cal.4th CJP Supp. at p. 51.)

In six of the seven instances of misconduct on which we base our disciplinary decision, Judge Stanford provided substantial financial breaks to the favored few. As previously discussed, despite the judge's "understanding" to the contrary, waiver or suspension of all or most fees and fines was not a common practice. Most, if not all, of those who benefitted from the judge's assistance did not have a financial hardship that might have resulted in a reduction of fees and fines had they come to traffic court. Rather, they were given virtually a free ride because of their close relationship to Judge Stanford.

(14) Judge Stanford's conduct was wrong on many levels. Not only did he favor those he knew with procedural shortcuts and extraordinarily lenient dispositions, he repeatedly engaged in ex parte communications, entered dispositions based on hearsay information from his wife, failed to recuse when there were obvious conflicts of interest, handled matters not assigned to his court, and waived fees and fines without considering the facts of the offense, the driver's record, or public safety.[10] The commission has previously recognized the gravity of this type of misconduct by imposing the maximum discipline on judges who engaged in a pattern of providing preferential treatment to family and friends in the adjudication of traffic matters. (Wasilenko, supra, 49 Cal.4th CJP Supp. 26; Platt, supra, 48 Cal.4th CJP Supp. 227; Censure and Bar of Judge Danser (2005); Censure and Bar of Judge Simpson (2002).)

Our decision to remove Judge Stanford is based not only on the nature and extent of the misconduct but on the consideration of other factors previously [9] The masters found a pattern of misconduct based on nine incidents of misconduct. We conclude that the seven incidents of misconduct that occurred within six years of the start of the judge's current term constitute a pattern of willful misconduct.

[10] When Williams received his 2006 ticket for speeding, he had three children in the car. He had previously received a speeding ticket in 2005 and a ticket in 2003 for failing to stop at a red light.

identified by the Supreme Court and this commission as relevant to determining the appropriate level of discipline. First and foremost in our consideration of the case before us is the impact of Judge Stanford's conduct on the judicial system. (See, e.g., Inquiry Concerning Van Voorhis (2003) 48 Cal.4th CJP Supp. 257, 314 [impact of misconduct on judicial system a factor to consider in determining appropriate level of discipline].) By granting special treatment to friends and family, Judge Stanford engaged in conduct that subverts the impartiality of the judicial system and undermines respect for the judiciary as a whole. In the public's eye, ticket fixing is the quintessential bad act of a judge. We doubt citizens consider the waiving of fines for the preferential few to be any less repellant than the outright dismissal of tickets. The masters conclude their report by observing that this case "is a stark reminder that we each hold in our hands, every day, the power to preserve or to tarnish the integrity of the judicial branch." Unfortunately, Judge Stanford used his judicial power in a manner that gravely tarnished the integrity of the judicial system.

The judge's misconduct also had an adverse impact on court staff. In order to transfer matters to his department, and effectuate and process his dispositions, Judge Stanford directly involved at least four members of court staff. In the matter involving the judge's son-in-law, the clerk who was asked to enter the disposition after Gonzales declined was put in the uncomfortable position of reporting the interactions to her manager. Further, the misconduct resulted in the creation of false court records. Because Judge Stanford's dispositions were made out of the ordinary course of business, clerks were uncertain how to reflect the dispositions in the minutes resulting in inaccurate entries—appearances where there were none, findings that were not made or supported ("compelling and extraordinary circumstances" for waiver of a mandatory security fee), arraignments and pleas that did not occur. While helping friends and family, the judge's conduct had an adverse ripple effect on those within the court system and led to the entry of false records. Judge Stanford's failure to realize that his actions could have serious consequences for others within the court system aggravates rather than mitigates his misconduct.

honesty and integrity among those who provided character evidence on his behalf, his conduct in this case unquestionably demonstrates a lack of integrity. Additionally, the judge has not been honest with the special masters or the commission about his state of mind. (See MacEachern, supra, 49 Cal.4th CJP Supp. at p. 309.)

We also consider whether a judge appreciates the impropriety of his actions as being indicative of a capacity to reform. (E.g., Platt, supra, 48 Cal.4th CJP Supp. at p. 248.) Judge Stanford contends this factor weighs against removal because, in the words of the masters, "the evidence presented overwhelmingly supports a finding that Judge Stanford has been remorseful and contrite, that he immediately accepted full responsibility for his actions, and that he can be expected never to engage in this kind of misconduct in the future." (Italics added.) We agree that since being confronted with his transgressions, Judge Stanford has been contrite and humble. However, we do not agree that he has accepted full responsibility for his actions. Indeed, he has admitted that he engaged in the acts charged and that those acts constitute misconduct—facts and conclusions that would be difficult to refute. However, he claims he did not recognize that what he was doing was wrong. In other words, he insists that he was acting in good faith. This does not demonstrate a true appreciation of the misconduct; rather, it reflects an effort to minimize his culpability.

Even if Judge Stanford can be expected not to engage in this type of misconduct in the future, we are not convinced that he would not engage in other types of misconduct. The judge's failure to consider the impact of his misconduct on his court staff and the reputation of the judiciary at the time of his actions leaves us with little confidence in his ability to refrain from future misconduct demeaning to the esteem of the judiciary. Moreover, the fact that he personally changed the adjudication on his son-in-law's ticket despite having been counseled by his presiding judge about the obvious conflict raises concerns about his ability to refrain from future misconduct.

(16) Judge Stanford attempts to focus the question of discipline on his state of mind at the time he handled the tickets. He contends that removal is not warranted absent proof of a consciousness of wrongdoing. As previously discussed, we find clear and convincing evidence Judge Stanford knew that providing preferential treatment to friends and relatives was wrong at the time he handled each of the tickets in this case. Nonetheless, we address this issue because it has been the crux of the judge's defense to the charges. We agree with the masters that the judge's state of mind is not the determining factor on the issue of discipline because a failure to recognize the impropriety of such obviously unethical conduct "necessarily raises the correlated concern that he may continue to 'miss' other such issues in the future." Moreover, we have never said proof of a corrupt state of mind is a prerequisite to removal. (See Inquiry Concerning Van Voorhis, supra, 48 Cal.4th CJP Supp. 257, 314.) The Supreme Court and this commission have repeatedly stated that the purpose of commission judicial discipline proceedings is not to punish the judge, but rather "the protection of the public, the enforcement of rigorous standards of judicial conduct, and the maintenance of public confidence in the integrity and independence of the judicial system." (Adams v. Commission on Judicial Performance, supra, 10 Cal.4th at p. 912; see MacEachern, supra, 49 Cal.4th CJP Supp. at p. 306.) As in this case, adherence to these objectives may require removal regardless of the judge's state of mind. The public deserves protection from judges who commit serious misconduct regardless of whether the conduct is the result of malice or ignorance.

(17) Finally, we have not ignored Judge Stanford's exceptional contributions to his court and his community or the fact that his prior discipline over a long tenure on the bench is limited to one advisory letter.[11] These facts, however, are eclipsed by a pattern of misconduct in which Judge Stanford repeatedly abused the power of his judicial office by providing benefits to the favored few not available to other citizens.

(18) In the end, after consideration of the foregoing guiding factors, we have determined that removal is necessary to assure the public that a two-track system of justice and the dispensation of special favors by judges have no place in this state. As we previously explained with respect to a similar pattern of misconduct: "It is our duty to denounce the misconduct in no uncertain terms and to sanction it as the grave ethical violation that it is, in our best effort to ensure evenhanded justice, starting at the very point of access to the judge." (Wasilenko, supra, 49 Cal.4th CJP Supp. at p. 51.) We remove Judge Stanford from office in order to fulfill our mandate to protect the public, enforce rigorous standards of judicial conduct, and maintain public confidence in the integrity of the judiciary and the evenhanded administration of justice.

ORDER

This decision shall constitute the order of removal of Judge Richard W. Stanford, Jr., pursuant to the provisions of article VI, section 18 of the California Constitution.

[11] Judge Stanford received an advisory letter in 2005 disapproving of the manner in which he issued orders continuing the detention of a material witness.

I.

INTRODUCTION AND SUMMARY

This disciplinary matter concerns Judge Valeriano Saucedo, a judge of the Tulare County Superior Court since 2001. The commission commenced this inquiry with the filing of its Notice of Formal Proceedings ("Notice") on December 19, 2014.

The Notice charged Judge Saucedo with creating and sending to his own home address an unsigned crude letter accusing his courtroom clerk, Priscilla Tovar, of having an affair with a court bailiff; the letter was addressed to Tovar's husband at his place of employment. The judge is further charged with showing the letter to Tovar and using it in an attempt to pressure her to have a "special friend" relationship with him. The Notice alleges that the judge falsely told Tovar that he had called the husband's place of employment and intercepted the letter before it was delivered to her husband. The judge is charged with engaging in a course of conduct during the next two months in which he sent Tovar hundreds of text messages of a personal nature, gave her approximately $26,000 in gifts, including a BMW automobile and a Disneyland trip package for her family, and provided legal advice to her son.

The Supreme Court appointed three special masters to hear and take evidence and to report to the commission under Commission Rule 129. (All references to a rule are to the Rules of the Commission on Judicial Performance.) The masters are Hon. Judith L. Haller, Associate Justice of the Court of Appeal, Fourth Appellate District; Hon. Becky Lynn Dugan, Judge of the Riverside County Superior Court; and Hon. Louis R. Hanoian, Judge of the San Diego County Superior Court.

The three masters held an evidentiary hearing April 6 through April 10, 2015, followed by oral argument on April 27, 2015. The masters filed their report containing their detailed findings of fact and conclusions of law on July 8, 2015. The commission heard oral argument on October 7, 2015.

The masters concluded that the charges were proven by clear and convincing evidence. The masters rejected Judge Saucedo's testimony that he did not write the anonymous letter and that his actions related to the gifts and text messages reflected only a sincere desire to mentor Tovar through a difficult financial period. The masters found "Judge Saucedo created the unsigned September 2013 letter, used it as a basis to foster a close, personal relationship with Tovar on the pretext he intended to help her, and then inappropriately pressured her to maintain this relationship by giving her valuable gifts knowing she had limited financial resources and was vulnerable to these offers." We adopt the masters' factual findings, which we have determined are supported by clear and convincing evidence.

The masters concluded that Judge Saucedo's conduct violated numerous canons of the Code of Judicial Ethics and brought the judicial office into disrepute. The masters found that the judge's "creation of an embarrassing, sexually explicit letter for the sole purpose of manipulating his courtroom clerk is the essence of an act committed in bad faith," and his "ongoing dishonesty and subterfuge additionally shows bad faith." As discussed in this decision, we conclude the judge engaged in willful misconduct in those instances when he was acting in a judicial capacity and prejudicial misconduct in other instances, each of which is a basis for removal. (Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (d).)

The deceitful, calculated, and unseemly nature of the judge's misconduct, compounded by his lack of candor in response to the commission's investigation and untruthful testimony under oath before the masters compels our decision to remove Judge Saucedo from office. We recognize Judge Saucedo is a well-respected jurist who has devoted many hours to giving back to the community. Nonetheless, his reputation cannot redeem the seriousness of his wrongdoing, nor obviate the need for removal in order to fulfill our mandate to protect the public and maintain public confidence in the integrity of the judiciary.

Judge Saucedo is represented by attorneys Randall A. Miller and Caroline van Oosterom, of Miller Law Associates, APC, Los Angeles, California. The examiners for the commission at the proceedings before the special masters were James F. Harrigan, Esq. and Commission Assistant Trial Counsel Valerie Marchant. At the appearance before the commission, the examiner for the commission was Gary W. Schons, Esq.

FINDINGS OF FACT

A. Legal Principles

The examiner has the burden of proving the charges by clear and convincing evidence. (Broadman v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1998) 18 Cal.4th 1079, 1090 [77 Cal.Rptr.2d 408, 959 P.2d 715] (Broadman).) "Evidence of a charge is clear and convincing so long as there is a 'high probability' that the charge is true. [Citations.]" (Ibid.) Factual findings of the masters are entitled to special weight because the masters have "the advantage of observing the demeanor of the witnesses." (Ibid; Inquiry Concerning Freedman (2007) 49 Cal.4th CJP Supp. 223, 232 (Freedman).)

The following facts are adopted from the masters' factual findings, which we have determined are supported by clear and convincing evidence based on our own independent review of the record. Where there were disputes in the testimony, largely between Judge Saucedo and Tovar, we have adopted the credibility determinations of the masters. We find those determinations are supported by a sound and thorough evaluation of the testimony of the witnesses, including their demeanor, responsiveness to questions, and whether their testimony was consistent with documentary evidence and prior statements. This evaluation led the masters to find Tovar's testimony to be credible and her version of events to be true. We reach the same conclusion.

B. Judge's Courtroom and Staff

In 2013, Judge Saucedo was assigned to Department 6 in the main courthouse in Visalia. His staff included court reporter Kim Werth and court clerks Priscilla Tovar and Theresa ("Tessie") Velasquez. Tovar is married and has four children. Her husband's name is Hilario Tovar; his nickname is Lalo (a common nickname for Hilario). Several years earlier during a marital separation in about 2007 and 2008, Tovar had a romantic involvement with court bailiff Jeremy Knoy. This romantic relationship was well known among court staff. In the fall of 2013, Tovar lived "paycheck to paycheck" and frequently had trouble meeting her financial obligations.

Court reporter Werth has worked for Judge Saucedo since 2001, and was still working for him at the time of the hearing before the special masters.

Judge Saucedo presided over a busy criminal department, where he was regarded as a hardworking and demanding judge who strictly controlled his courtroom. But, Judge Saucedo maintained a comfortable, social, family-like environment for the staff, which included potlucks and birthday celebrations. Judge Saucedo, Werth, and Tovar would occasionally go to lunch and would discuss personal matters.

Tovar and Velasquez had work desks facing each other directly outside the judge's chambers. Judge Saucedo generally left his chambers door open. Tovar and Velasquez frequently talked about personal matters while they were at their desks. In 2013, these conversations included that Tovar previously had a romantic relationship with bailiff Knoy; her husband was having an extramarital affair; she owed bailiff Knoy money pertaining to a vehicle he co-signed for her sister; and her husband had recently started a new job at a nearby medical center.

C. Gifts to Tovar in Late Summer 2013

In August 2013, Judge Saucedo gave Tovar $50 for her birthday and $50 for her son's athletic fundraiser. This was the first time he had given money for her birthday.

In early September, Judge Saucedo told Werth and Tovar he had purchased a red Mercedes convertible, and wanted them to see the car at lunchtime. Later that day, Judge Saucedo took Tovar on a 15-minute ride in the car. During the ride, Judge Saucedo said

" 'Who knows, maybe one day you can own a car like this,' " or " 'You'll own a car like this.' "

On Friday, September 13, Judge Saucedo gave Tovar about $50 or $100 to buy a new cell phone because her phone screen was broken. Tovar responded she did not need a new phone, but he insisted. Judge Saucedo texted her during the weekend, asking if she had purchased a new phone, which she had not done.

On Monday, September 16, Judge Saucedo gave Tovar more money for a new phone and said she should consider it an additional birthday gift. He told her to text him after she purchased the phone.

Later that evening, Tovar purchased the new phone and stopped by Knoy's house on the way home to visit his dog (a dog previously owned by Tovar's family). Later that night, Tovar and Judge Saucedo exchanged several text messages about the new phone.

D. The Anonymous Letter

On September 17, Judge Saucedo's wife, Teresa Saucedo, saw an envelope delivered to their home, addressed to her husband and marked "Personal and Confidential."[1] She did not open the envelope, but Judge Saucedo opened it when he came home and then showed her the following "Anonymous letter":

> "Hilario Tovar
> "c/o Tulare Regional Medical Center
>
> "You probably already know and approve. Your wife Priscilla has been having an affair with Jeremy Knoy the bailiff in Department 5 of the Courthouse. She fucks him after work. He brags that she is a good fuck and you get sloppy seconds. He brags about her tattoos, and big boobs and tight ass. The only thing he complains about is her c-scar.
>
> "Sent this to her judge.
> "JK's Friend"

[1] The letter was postmarked September 16, 2013.

Mrs. Saucedo said that someone must be " 'really angry at this woman,' " and Judge Saucedo responded that he would take the letter with him to work and discuss it with Tovar.[2] Judge Saucedo also said, " 'What if her husband gets this and beats her up?' "

The next day, September 18, at about 8:15 a.m., Judge Saucedo called Tovar into his chambers and told her to close the door. Judge Saucedo showed her the Anonymous letter. The letter was attached to Judge Saucedo's typed cover letter stating the unsigned letter would be upsetting and she should remain calm and he would help her if she wanted him to do so.[3] Judge Saucedo pointed out that the Anonymous letter had been sent to her husband's work. Tovar was shocked and began crying. She said she needed to report the letter to court administration or law enforcement and she had no idea who would do this. The judge responded that she could not " 'tell anybody' " about the letter, including court reporter Werth. He said Tovar could get fired if she reported the letter, and that the letter had to be from somebody in law enforcement because law enforcement would be the only possible source for his home address.

When Tovar continued to insist the letter needed to be reported, the judge said he would call Tovar's husband's employer and tell them that it was a jury letter or jury certificate sent in error and he was calling on behalf of the court, and that he would ensure the letter would be intercepted if she trusted him completely. Judge Saucedo kept

[2] Mrs. Saucedo testified at length about her husband's whereabouts the days before they received the Anonymous letter. She and Judge Saucedo stayed overnight in San Jose on Saturday, September 14, to attend an opera. After returning home together the next morning, they went to Orchard Supply Hardware and then spent several hours together at the courthouse in Visalia. On Monday, September 16, Mrs. Saucedo drove her husband to and from the Visalia courthouse and they had lunch together. Mrs. Saucedo did not testify that her husband never left her presence during these days.

[3] The judge denied giving Tovar a cover letter. We find that there was a cover letter. Our finding is supported by the fact that Tovar reported the existence of a typed cover letter to Human Resources when she reported the judge's conduct in December 2013; the judge had a practice of typing notes to Tovar, many of which were admitted at the hearing; and that the message in the cover letter was consistent with his later notes and texts professing his desire to "help" her.

the letter in his chambers and told Tovar to meet him in a conference room at noon in the court's law library. About one or two hours later, during courtroom proceedings, Judge Saucedo handed Tovar a note stating he had communicated with someone named "John," the human resources manager at the hospital where Mr. Tovar worked and that everything was going to be okay. At noon, Tovar met with Judge Saucedo in the law library conference room he had reserved, located in the basement of the courthouse. Judge Saucedo had reserved the room earlier that morning because it was a "more private setting" than his chambers. During this meeting, Judge Saucedo told Tovar that when he called the hospital, "John" told him the Anonymous letter was sitting on his desk and he was wondering who Hilario Tovar was because the name did not sound familiar to him. Judge Saucedo said that "John" shredded the letter during this phone conversation.

In his testimony and in his verified answer to the Notice ("Answer"), Judge Saucedo acknowledged he had made no attempt to contact the hospital or anyone at Mr. Tovar's place of employment. The judge testified that he made these false statements to make Tovar "feel better," an explanation we reject.

During the noon meeting, Judge Saucedo again showed Tovar the Anonymous letter and suggested that Knoy wrote it, but Tovar denied that he would have done so. He then said that if Tovar wanted him to help her, she needed to be completely honest with him and tell him everything about her relationship with Knoy. Judge Saucedo wanted to know if she was "intimate" with Knoy, and the nature of their relationship. Tovar responded that she and Knoy were just friends and were no longer romantically involved. She said Knoy was assisting with her sister's payments for a Jeep that Tovar sometimes drove. Judge Saucedo asked when she last met with Knoy, and Tovar answered that she went to his house for about 30 or 40 minutes after buying the new phone. The judge asked: " 'Are you sure you weren't intimate with him . . . at that time?' " Tovar said she was not.

Judge Saucedo told Tovar she should no longer take any money from Knoy and that she was to cut off all communication with him. He said he would give her $200 per month to cover the Jeep payments. When Tovar said she did not want him to do this,

Judge Saucedo said she needed to take the money if she wanted his help. At this point in the conversation, both Judge Saucedo and Tovar were crying. When Tovar again said the letter should be turned over to court administration, Judge Saucedo responded that no one was to know about the letter and that Tovar just needed to trust him completely. Judge Saucedo hugged her at the end of the meeting.

E. Gifts, Favors, and Communications with Tovar: September 19 to November 15

1. Cash and Statement re Assistance from the Judge's Brother

The next day, Judge Saucedo left $200 cash in an envelope on Tovar's desk. Tovar said she did not need the money, but Judge Saucedo insisted.

The following day, Friday, September 20, when Tovar was finished with her work at about 4:45 or 4:50 p.m., Judge Saucedo asked her to come into his chambers and close the door. Judge Saucedo said he wanted to talk to her about what had happened and that he "didn't have anybody else to talk to" about the Anonymous letter. He said he continued to believe Knoy wrote the letter and he could get Knoy fired because he (the judge) was a very powerful man. Judge Saucedo was crying and said he was upset and hurt because he cared about Tovar. Tovar responded that she wished she could just report the letter to court administration and that she did not feel comfortable. Judge Saucedo told her not to do this because she might get in trouble. Tovar said that Judge Saucedo hugged her as she left the chambers, which made her feel uncomfortable.

On Monday morning, Judge Saucedo gave Tovar a typewritten note with his brother's name and phone number. According to Tovar, Judge Saucedo said that over the weekend he had been thinking about his statement to Tovar that he would take care of her, and then started thinking about what if something happened to him. He said he had talked with his brother (a physician), and told his brother everything and that she should call his brother if she ever needed anything.

Judge Saucedo testified that he gave Tovar his brother's contact information to assist her and her son with medical issues. However, he previously told the investigator hired by the Judicial Council, Lisa Buehler, he wanted Tovar " 'to understand in order to break the financial relationship with J.K. … she could continue with [Judge Saucedo's] brother to help if [Judge Saucedo] couldn't do it.' " We reject the judge's testimony concerning this conversation with Tovar based on his prior inconsistent statements and our general credibility determinations as discussed later in this decision.

2. Legal Assistance for Tovar's Son

Later that same Monday, Judge Saucedo gave Tovar a letter written to her teenage son concerning an alcohol-related citation he had received. The lengthy letter was entitled "Privileged and Confidential Communication." The first paragraph states:

> "I am Valeriano Saucedo, a California Superior Court Judge sitting in Department 6 in Tulare County. Your mother, Priscilla, is my clerk and friend. I write for two reasons: One, to give you legal advice at your mother's request on your recent citation alleging a violation of Business and Professions Code section 25667 [minor in possession of alcohol in a public place]. Two, to give you a personal and judicial perspective which hopefully will enable you to gain from this experience and to better exercise leadership in your home, school, baseball team and community."

In the next several pages, Judge Saucedo detailed the potential penalties for the offense, identified several potential defenses to the charge, and said that if a further notice to appear was issued, he would "find out and let [Tovar's son] know how Fresno County handles minor in possession of alcohol cases whether filed as infractions or misdemeanors." Judge Saucedo additionally commented on Tovar's work at the court, stating she is "hardworking" and "brilliant," and he "trust[s] her implicitly and completely." Judge Saucedo concluded the letter by discussing his own background and the importance of working hard to "realize your dreams." He also stated: "You may contact me at my chambers in court or on my personal cell [phone number] to discuss the legal advice in this letter and to arrange to meet."

Judge Saucedo told Tovar she should give the letter to her son that evening, and she should text him back to let him know what her son's thoughts were regarding the letter. There was no follow-up on the letter because Tovar's son never received a notice-to-appear for the ticketed offense. Although Judge Saucedo initially testified that he wrote "Privileged and Confidential" on the letter because it was meant for the parents, he later acknowledged, "in retrospect," it referred to an attorney-client privilege. He testified that an attorney-client relationship had never been formed, although he ultimately admitted the letter contained legal advice.

3. Flowers and More Cash Gifts

On September 25, when Tovar came into work, she found flowers on her desk that had been delivered to her the day before. The card was unsigned and stated "NEW DAY, NEW WEEK, NEW BEGINNING." Tovar had no idea who had sent her the flowers, but later that day Judge Saucedo called her into chambers and said he had sent them to her. Judge Saucedo told her to tell everyone they were from her husband. Judge Saucedo later gave Tovar a typed note stating:

> "As for the flowers, simply say that things are wonderful between you and Lalo and that Lalo sent the flowers. (A little white lie won't hurt anyone.) Word will get out and Jeremy [Knoy] will get the clear message. Remember always operate from a position of strength."

The florist's order form contained Judge Saucedo's request that his identity not be revealed and stated: "Arrangement small and understated. For her desk." (Capitalization omitted.)

Later that day, Tovar told Judge Saucedo she did not feel comfortable with him sending her flowers and helping her financially and that although she appreciated it, she did not need help. Judge Saucedo responded that they did not have anyone else to talk to about the letter, if he told his wife she would ask why he did not report it to court administration, and that he thought of Tovar as a daughter so she should trust him.

Judge Saucedo acknowledged that he told Tovar to lie about who sent the flowers. He testified that he sent the flowers on September 24 in memory of the anniversary of Tovar's brother's death. Tovar testified that her brother passed away on October 8, 1990. In prehearing documents, the judge misidentified the date the flowers were sent as October 1, closer to the anniversary of Tovar's brother's death. We reject the judge's purported reason for sending the flowers, and instead conclude, as did the masters, that the flowers were sent in furtherance of his efforts to establish a closer personal relationship with Tovar. Had the flowers been sent in memory of Tovar's brother, there would have been no need to conceal that he sent the flowers.

About one or two days later, Judge Saucedo left an envelope with $500 in cash on Tovar's desk. He told her she should go shopping and she needed to change the way she dressed. Judge Saucedo asked her to send him a photograph of herself while she was shopping.

On Friday, September 27, Judge Saucedo sent Tovar an email with the subject line "Cases" stating, "May we spend a few minutes talking before you leave." Tovar responded: "I can[']t today, I am meeting my sisters for dinner." Tovar was not actually meeting her sisters, but she did not want to talk to him because she was feeling uncomfortable with their interactions. Later that evening and over the weekend, Judge Saucedo sent Tovar several texts in which he asked whether she had continuing contact with Knoy and whether she had gone shopping with the money he had given her.

4. September 30 Note to Tovar

On Monday, September 30, Judge Saucedo handed Tovar a one-page typewritten note while she was at her clerk's desk in the courtroom ("the September 30 note"). The note stated:

> "I support you completely and unequivocally in all of your endeavors.
>
> "Reflecting back on this last week, I am concerned that I have not yet fully earned your complete trust and confidence. Two examples come to mind. Last week, until I probed, you did not voluntarily tell me that you only had $10.00 in your checking account. Clearly, this was not enough money to make it through the rest of the week and weekend until Tuesday of this week, your payday. You should have voluntarily told me. Once I learned of your financial pressure, I initially gifted you $200 and then $500. I was happy to do so but what concerned me is that you did not voluntarily tell me. The second example is Saturday when I asked you about Jeremy [Knoy]. I again felt like I probed when we had agreed that you would voluntarily let me know if he contacted you about the loan payment.

"I truly want to earn your trust and feel badly that I have not yet done so. What else do I need to do? I voluntarily took a risk to protect you because you have earned my trust and respect. I have no regrets that I took the risk. It was absolutely the right thing to do. You have my utmost respect and trust and always will. I was upset with myself this weekend, notwithstanding your forgiveness, because sometimes I still feel that I am hurting and not helping you enough.

"This month and every month I will gift you $200 for the loan. However, I am happy to meet your other financial needs. As I've told you, from here on out, you will no longer have any financial worries. However, you must trust me unconditionally and voluntarily tell me everything. Don't be like my former clients. They didn't lie to me. Sometimes they forgot to tell me important things. Don't feel embarrassed or like a burden. I can handle anything.

"Looking at the future, I want to earn your complete trust and have you voluntarily tell me what is going on in your life. I am willing to do anything to earn your trust and confidence. I want to support your every endeavor but I cannot know your endeavors unless you tell me. In this connection, I find texting is fine but I find these notes and form of communication unsatisfying and incomplete. They do not fully inform me on what is going on. I prefer to talk to you and would like to know whether you wish to talk and when. Sometimes I feel like you would prefer to avoid me altogether and not talk to me. Perhaps, you don't even like me, want to talk to me or have me involved. I hope not. Let's work on these issues together, planning for your financial future (including a two seater---although you seem skeptical about this promise). As you know, I do not make promises I cannot keep. Frankly, my biggest concern is how you would explain a two seater gift to Lalo. (By the way, what did you say and what did he say about the flowers? Just curious.)

> "Finally, I, too, am human and have an ego. Feel free, if you wish, to compliment me if you like things I do or wear, or, if you wish, you may treat me like the Maytag repair man.
> "Please respond. Always your genuine friend and supporter."

Tovar felt uncomfortable and disgusted by the letter, particularly the portion of the letter where he told her to feel free to compliment him on things he does or wears.

After Tovar read the note, Judge Saucedo asked her to return it to him, but she did not immediately give it back and instead covertly made a copy. When she returned the original to him toward the end of the day, Judge Saucedo asked if she had a response to the letter. She thanked him, but said she did not want any more help from him and she did not want him to give her any more money. Judge Saucedo responded in an angry manner, stating, " 'What do you mean you don't want my help anymore? So you mean the [Anonymous] letter is true? So is it true about you and Jeremy? Maybe your husband does need to know about the [Anonymous] letter.' " Judge Saucedo then left the courtroom and Tovar heard a door slam near the stairwell. Judge Saucedo denied making these statements or slamming the door. As did the masters, we find Tovar's version of the interaction credible.

5. Tovar Confides in Werth

Tovar testified that the judge's conduct was scaring her and she decided she needed advice from Werth (the court reporter). After her interaction with Judge Saucedo on September 30, Tovar told Werth about the Anonymous letter and showed her the September 30 note. According to Tovar, Werth responded: " 'This . . . is wrong. This is not right. Something is going on with him.' " Werth told Tovar she needed to get a copy of the Anonymous letter. Tovar said she thought it was in Judge Saucedo's desk and she would attempt to obtain a copy later that day. Werth told Tovar that she would text her when Judge Saucedo left for the day, so Tovar would know it would be safe to search his office for the letter.

At about 6:20 that evening, Tovar texted Werth to let her know she was "snooping" in Judge Saucedo's office, and was worried she was "going to be in big trouble." After Tovar found the Anonymous letter, she texted Werth with a photograph of the letter and then made a copy of the letter and returned the original to Judge Saucedo's desk. A few hours later, Tovar sent a text to Werth stating that Judge Saucedo had sent a text message to her "apologizing" for his behavior earlier in the day.

The next day, Tovar showed Werth a copy of the Anonymous letter. Tovar testified that Werth immediately responded that Judge Saucedo wrote the letter, and that Werth knew this based on working with him for "all these years, reading his pleadings and his rulings . . . ." When Tovar said she did not believe Judge Saucedo could have written it, Werth said she was " 'positive. I know him too well.' "

At the hearing before the special masters, Werth denied stating or believing that Judge Saucedo was the author of the Anonymous letter. The masters rejected this testimony, noting that Judicial Council investigator Buehler testified that Werth told her she thought the judge wrote the letter, important parts of Werth's testimony were contradicted by her own text messages written as events were unfolding, and that she still worked for Judge Saucedo at the time of her testimony (and worked for him since 2001). We find that Werth told Tovar she believed the judge was the author of the Anonymous letter.

6. Assistance with Tovar's Car Problems

On October 1, Judge Saucedo called Tovar into his chambers. Judge Saucedo apologized for his behavior the day before and said it would not happen again. He also indicated he had overheard her talking about car problems and asked why she had not taken her car to a mechanic. The judge offered to take her car to his mechanic. Tovar agreed to meet Judge Saucedo the next day at his mechanic's shop.

That evening, Werth and Tovar had the following text message exchange[4]:

> "[Werth:] You really think it's a good idea to drop your car off tomorrow and be further into debt with him?"
>
> "[Tovar:] I know I've been thinking about it."

[4] Typographical errors in text messages and notes from here on have not been corrected.

"[Werth:] Totally up to you . . . But I think you're sending [some] mixed messages . . . in that you tell him you're good, no more help, then you take it . . . He says why won't you be my friend, etc. . . . See what I mean?"

"[Tovar:] So what do I say . . . . [¶] I should have had you pick me up. I will cancel the [appointment]."

"[Werth:] [Y]ou do what you think is right, I don't want to tell you what to do . . . ."

"[Tovar:] Ugh."

"[Werth:] I'm sorry, I know it's difficult . . . But the thing is, you can't have it both ways . . . . Can't say no, I don't need your help anymore, basically stop bugging me then turn around and say I need help with my car . . . . He's getting mixed signals. . ."

"[Tovar:] I didn't ask for help again he would not take no. I'm going to pay for it. Not going to say anything out loud any more. I'm seriously thinking of [asking] to be moved. Maybe it was meant for me to its time."

"[Werth:] I'm sorry you feel that way and I hope you reconsider that decision . . . . I know you didn't ask for any of this to happen! This is NOT your fault! I hope you KNOW that and BELIEVE it . . . ."

"[Tovar:] I do but I'm having to watch every conversation I have and it's not fair. And I don't like that."

"[Werth:] I can imagine how you must feel, and you're right, it's not fair . . . . Let's brainstorm more tomorrow . . . . We're gonna figure this thing out! . . ."

The next morning, Tovar met Judge Saucedo at his mechanic's shop and dropped off her car. While at work, Judge Saucedo twice emailed Tovar about the car (he titled one of the emails "Case Files"). Judge Saucedo paid the total bill of approximately $533.

7. More Notes, Cash Gifts

In early October, Judge Saucedo handed Tovar a note while she was at her clerk's desk in the courtroom stating, "Don't share with anyone any information. I assume you have not told anyone about Jeremy and the letter. Correct?" Tovar indicated that she had not told anyone. She then secretly made a copy of the note. Pursuant to Judge Saucedo's explicit directions, she returned the note to him. She testified that he wanted her to give back every note and letter he gave her so he could shred them.

In mid-October, Judge Saucedo sent Tovar numerous text messages, often during the evening hours. Tovar sometimes responded to the texts. At about this time, Judge Saucedo asked Tovar if she had been shopping and Tovar said she could not afford to buy anything. The judge then asked for her bank account number so he could put money in her savings account. When she said she did not need the money, Judge Saucedo told her she needed to trust him. Tovar gave him her bank account number.

8. Disneyland Trip for Tovar's Family

At some point in October, Tovar and Velasquez were talking at their desks and Tovar said she had always wanted to go to Disneyland for Christmas. Judge Saucedo then called Tovar into chambers and asked why Tovar did not plan a trip to Disneyland for Christmas. She said she did not have the time or money to go on that type of a trip. Judge Saucedo responded that she was going and it would be his gift to her. Tovar testified that when she told him she did not want to accept the gift, the judge insisted and said, " 'Do you want your husband to find out about the [Anonymous] letter?' "

According to Judge Saucedo, Tovar asked him to pay for the Disneyland trip and he agreed. As did the masters, we find Tovar to be credible and adopt her version of the conversation.

Soon after, Judge Saucedo and Tovar met at an American Automobile Association ("AAA") office during the lunch hour to discuss arrangements for the Disneyland trip. Judge Saucedo ultimately purchased a Disneyland vacation trip package for Tovar's family ($1,862), and then purchased an additional vacation package for Tovar's sister and her family ($1,340). Judge Saucedo promised to pay for all trip expenses, including meals and souvenirs. Judge Saucedo told her to tell her family she was paying for the trip with overtime earnings, and not to tell anyone he was paying for the trip. She complied. The AAA trip documentation states Judge Saucedo requested the travel agent "not to have any [additional] contact" with him regarding the trip purchase.

Shortly after this lunch meeting, Judge Saucedo gave Tovar a note ("AAA note") attaching a deposit slip showing he had deposited $500 into her bank account and asking for his "texting privileges" to be "reinstated." The note read:

> "Here is your temporary AAA card. You must sign and keep the temporary card. Keep it with you. The hard plastic card along with your free gift, the movie Turbo, will be mailed to your Selma address. We should upgrade the card to a premium level in about 90 days. This will give you better protection. Keep in mind that the card runs with you not your car. This means that it will provide you with personal protection no matter which car you are in.

> "Have a wonderful weekend and I hope you feel better."

Tovar testified she asked him on several different occasions not to text her. She said he was doing it "a lot, all the time" and he would "get upset if [she] wouldn't text him back right away or text him back at all." She repeatedly told him the texting was too much and she did not feel comfortable with it. Judge Saucedo concedes he sent Tovar about 445 texts during the two-month period in question.

9. Planning Purchase of BMW, Offer to Pay for Body Sculpting, and Further Efforts to Create Closer Relationship

On October 28, Judge Saucedo texted Tovar numerous times asking whether she and her sister were happy, and mentioned a car that he might be buying for her. Tovar told him she appreciated his offer, but did not need a new car.

On October 29, in the morning before work, Judge Saucedo sent several texts to Tovar. At 7:27 a.m., he wrote:

> "Good morning. Follow up to our conversation. Every morning wake up feeling wonderful and beautiful. No pressure, no worries."

Six minutes later, he wrote:

> "You do not need body sculping. You are gorgeous and in fine shape as you are. However if it would help your self esteem, let's discuss it in March or April. We have lots on our plate right now, Disney, the car, etc."

Three minutes later, he wrote:

> "Lalo [Tovar's husband] should not criticize you unless he is willing to pay for your body sculptng. I am willing to pay."

One minute later, he wrote:

> "I am working on a Disney budget."

Tovar did not initiate or respond to these early morning messages. According to Tovar, the topic of body sculpting was brought up by Judge Saucedo sometime before these text messages were sent. She testified she was having a conversation with other employees in the common area about plastic surgery and a few minutes later the judge called her into his chambers and started talking about body sculpting. She told him that she did not want to do that.

Later on October 29, during working hours, Judge Saucedo sent Tovar several text messages about the Disneyland trip and a possible new car for Tovar. Tovar responded that she told her daughters about Disneyland, and that she "looked" at the car (apparently on the Internet), and that it was "nice," but if "it doesn't work out that's ok."

That same day and into the evening, the two had the following text message exchange:

At 1:15 p.m., Judge Saucedo wrote to Tovar:

> "I am very excited and happy for you. I u[n]derstand about the car but I also do not like failure. Our friendship makes me happy. Seeing you happy and self assured also makes me happy."

Six minutes later, Judge Saucedo wrote to Tovar:

> "Did everything go well at your medical appointment?"

At 4:41 p.m., Judge Saucedo wrote to Tovar:

> "You seemed aloof and unhappy today. Everything okay?"

Thirty minutes later, Tovar responded:

> "A lot of work . . . I'm behind so I'm feeling overwhelmed is all. It was nice not having to be in court is all."

At 5:21 p.m., Judge Saucedo wrote to Tovar:

> "I understand. Is there anything I can do? I try to brighten up your day with positive thoughts. Everyday love, kindness and respect."

Four minutes later, Judge Saucedo wrote to Tovar:

> "I truly appreciate everything you do. Too bad we can't talk very much. I had a wonderful conversation with my brother about you. Just doing financial planning. You don't know how well you are covered."

Fourteen minutes later, Tovar replied:

> "Not to be picky but on the car issue I wouldn't mind a 4 seater sports car. . . I don't mind a 2 door convertible . . . Hope that's not rude."

Nineteen minutes later, Judge Saucedo responded:

> "Not rude at all. BMW makes a beautiful 4 seater convertible. I found one in LA and another in SLO but did not think it would work. It is a rag top. Did you have a particular model in mind?"

Two minutes later, Judge Saucedo wrote:

> "I want you to be happy and I don't want to get a car that won't work for you. I am talking to three dealers. Hope to make this happen soon. As you know, I am serious about everything I do."

Tovar testified that she decided to accept his offer after he repeatedly pressed the issue. Although he wanted to buy her a two-seater, she told him she would prefer a four-door car because of her family.

The next morning, Judge Saucedo sent Tovar text messages about a meeting at the AAA office over the noon hour regarding the Disneyland trip. When Tovar said she did not have much time, Judge Saucedo texted her: "I understand but I detect some attitude. There are a few things I would like to talk to y[o]u about but sounds like you may not want to talk to me. Is everything truly okay?"

As they were leaving one of their AAA appointments, Judge Saucedo told Tovar he wanted to have more contact with her. Tovar responded she did not feel comfortable with that, and asked him to limit his texting.

Later that afternoon, Judge Saucedo sent Tovar several texts about the car he intended to buy for her. The two then exchanged several text messages in the early evening hours (from about 4:10 p.m. to 8:30 p.m.). The messages were as follows:

> "[Judge Saucedo:] It's silly but still feeling under appreciated. It's silly because you don't owe me anything. I am doing this for my own soul because it makes me happy."
>
> "[Tovar:] I'm not doing anything different and I'm not sure why you are feeling that way. . . I truelly do appreciate everything."
>
> "[Judge Saucedo:] I am feeling out of balance. I appreciate you are not doing anything different. Feeling today like a one sided friendship. My feelings are momentary and episodic. I'll be fine. Everything is on line and on course. No change. Just expressing my feelings. Said I am always honest in my feelings and dealings with everyone."
>
> "[Judge Saucedo:] Just a silly man."
>
> "[Judge Saucedo:] I need to refle[c]t and strike a balance. Embarrassed about my feelings."[5]
>
> "[Judge Saucedo:] The sedan is a silver 4 door, sun roof, blue tooth, black interior. Some wear and tear but not bad. 80,000 miles. . . ."
>
> "[Judge Saucedo:] Did you hook up with Lalo in Visalia?"
>
> "[Tovar:] I did not meet Lalo. He decided not to come up so I went home."
>
> "[Judge Saucedo:] Ed [the BMW salesperson] has made a very generous offer on the sedan. $15[,000] out the door. We need to think about this one. If I can forward his email you will see the offer."

[5] When asked at the special masters hearing what he was "embarrassed about," Judge Saucedo said: "My feelings about mortality," and "coming to grips" with the fact that many of his friends and colleagues were suffering from serious health problems.

"[Tovar:] When can I see the car?"

"[Judge Saucedo:] When would you like to see it?"

"[Tovar:] Maybe tomorrow at lunch. . ."

"[Judge Saucedo:] Did y[o]u receive the [emailed] offer [regarding the sedan vehicle]?"

"[Tovar:] Busy with [my youngest son]. So I would have a car payment?"

"[Judge Saucedo:] Absolutely correct. I would make all of the payments. You would be responsible for an increase, if any, for insurance but I would certainly help. Remember this would be my gift to you. We would work out other reasonable accommodations. For example, if you decided you no longer wanted the car or wished to sell it we would decide what to do with the proceeds. It would be yours as long as you and only you owned it."

"[Judge Saucedo]: Have I not taken care of you without asking anything in return? Things would not change. You would just have to put up with my silliness like today."

"[Judge Saucedo:] You could have a new car within days."

When Tovar did not respond to this last text, at about 9:30 p.m., Judge Saucedo sent Tovar a text asking for feedback. The two then had the following text message exchange during the next 30 minutes:

"[Tovar:] Yes was watching the game with my famil[y] and also thinking about the car. The issue with that is the payments I know you said you would take care of it and I trust you but my issue is its not free and clear. something hanging over my head to worry about. Just like today you felt unappreciated I can't always text back immediately, I'm not always going to be in the best mood and that bothers you, I am simply being me. This is unexpected and a lot to think about. Please don't take it the wrong way."

> "[Judge Saucedo:] I understand. As you said, we are human. It is always question of trust. I hope you trust me and that I have done enough to earn your trust. I am a stupid and silly man but I would never hurt you financially or otherwise. I would never exploit you."
> "[Judge Saucedo:] I would also not want you to be nice simply because of our financial arrangement. That's why I sometimes ask whether you like me and respect me. It is important to have a friendship that extends b[e]yond a financial connection. I will respect any decision you make."
>
> "[Tovar:] I respect you and our friendship way beyond financial reasons I've never even thought or think about that sorry this has crossed your mind a couple of times I'm hurt because you bring that up often. I've always been respectful to you even before your offer. Good night Lalo is now questioning me about who I'm texting this late."

Early the next morning (before 8:00 a.m.) on October 31, Judge Saucedo sent Tovar three additional messages (there is no indication that Tovar responded to any of these messages):

> "[Judge Saucedo:] True friends forgive each other for their mistakes and failures. I sincerely apologize for everything I said or did yesterday that was offensive or hurtful. I should not have communicated while off balance. Those are my worst moments. I wish to continue our friendship. I hope you will continue on this journey. In good faith, check your savings balance later today. Let me know if our friendship continues."
> "[Judge Saucedo:] Texting is imperfect. Like the AAA incident, you do n[o]t know the entire picture. The car offer is part of an overall financial plan annualized over the next year. You will own the car free and clear in one year, not four years as projected. The expenses over the next year are: 2.4 for the jeep, 12 for savings and 12 for the car for a total of $26,400. This does not include other possible special expenses such as trips to see [your son] play [baseball] next summer or to visit him in college, body sculpting, etc."

> "[Judge Saucedo:] In sum, I am committed to helping you financially if you wish. I will make mistakes and so will you including both of us being moody at times. But the test of friendship is overcoming these minor differences and reaching a better understanding. We can not walk away over a simple misunderstanding. My goal is to help you succeed in your marriage and personal and professional life."
> "[Judge Saucedo:] Let me know how you wish to proceed."

At noon, Tovar went with Judge Saucedo to the BMW dealership. After Tovar test drove a car, Judge Saucedo asked the salesperson to allow him to have a private conversation with Tovar.

They met in a private staff break room. Judge Saucedo told Tovar to tell her husband that the car was Judge Saucedo's wife's old car. He also asked Tovar what she thought about everything. Tovar told him she appreciated it, and "was in shock." Judge Saucedo said he wanted to have more communication with her, and that he wanted Tovar to "tell him . . . how [she] felt all the time, what [she] was thinking, what [her] plans were." He wanted "to know [her] happiness; he wanted [her] to be emotional with him." Tovar told Judge Saucedo the texting "was becoming too much," and that she was not comfortable with having an emotional relationship with him. Tovar asked whether Judge Saucedo "was asking [her] for an affair, emotional affair, and he said . . . no." At that point, the salesperson came in and said the employees needed to use the break room, and Judge Saucedo became angry stating, " 'I'm not done here.' "

Less than one hour after returning to work, Judge Saucedo sent the following text message to Tovar:

> "This is the most difficult message I have ever written. We will always be friends and my financial commitment to you will continue unchanged. But I'm done. I cannot overcome my embarrassment over my childish, stupid and silly behavior. You owe me nothing, including emotional support. This is my last text. I will also not call you. You may text or call if you like. I am angry with myself."

Six minutes later, Judge Saucedo sent another message to Tovar:

> "Here's the schedule. I will deposit into your account at the beginning of each month and in the middle for the jeep payment. You may also let me know of other needs. I told you I would never hurt you but it is obvious my behavior is negatively impacting you. If you want the car it is yours. We simply need to wor[k] out the details. Please forgive me and continue to be my friend on your terms. Check your account."

Seven minutes later, Tovar responded back:

> "I would love the car, don't be upset, it will all be ok. I will check my account in a few minutes."

Five hundred dollars was deposited into Tovar's bank account at 2:09 p.m. that same day.

Later that evening, Judge Saucedo began a text message exchange with Tovar stating: "I feel stupid for breaking my rule. Critical development on the car. Must talk tonight. Teaching class. Can you call me around 8:15. Critical!!" Tovar responded that she would try to call. About one hour later, Judge Saucedo texted back:

> "Don't call. I have slowed down the process. If we want the car and put down a nonrefundable deposit of 1000, Ed will hold the car for 10 days. This is perfect. We can get everything lined up and not rush through this. We must be certain that we want this car with this deal or, if we don't follow through we lose the $1000. Are you sure you want this car?"

Approximately one hour later, Judge Saucedo sent Tovar another message stating he was "doing this" because he "care[d] about [her] and [her] family" and wanted her "in a safe car." Judge Saucedo then sent another message stating, "This car will be yours," and Tovar responded that she "agree[d]" with the plan.

The next day, Tovar and Judge Saucedo returned to the dealership for Judge Saucedo to make a $1,000 down payment. According to Tovar, as they were walking out of the dealership in the parking lot, Judge Saucedo brought up the issue of a "romantic relationship." Tovar testified:

> "[Judge Saucedo] said that he had a conversation with his accountant . . . about having to cash stocks in to get the car or something like that, and his accountant asked him . . . who was I. Who buys a car for a person? Who gives them a Disneyland trip? And was he sure I wasn't more than just a special friend; was I his mistress? . . . [¶] And then [Judge Saucedo] said that . . . if my husband didn't find out and his wife didn't find out, if he would consider having a romantic relationship with me. And I looked at him, and I said, 'What?' And he says 'If they wouldn't know about it, would you have a romantic relationship with me?' And I said, 'Is that what this is all about?' I said, 'No I wouldn't.' And he says, 'Why? Because of my age?' I said: 'I've never looked at you like that. . . . I'm married, and you're my judge. I work for you. I would never look at you this way. And if this is what this is all about, then I don't want the car; just forget it.' "

Judge Saucedo responded by hugging her and saying, " 'No. Okay. I'm sorry. I'm sorry. The car is yours.' "

Judge Saucedo denied this conversation occurred. Based on the credibility determinations of the masters, which we have adopted, we find Tovar's recollection of the conversation to be credible.

10. Text Messages About Relationship Status, and Judge's Claimed Suicide Attempt

The next day, Saturday, November 2, Tovar and Judge Saucedo texted throughout the day as follows:

> "[Tovar:] Hope your game of golf was good. I had a question about the tint on the car. I called Ed but he's not returning my call. I wanted to make sure it was dark. Sorry to bother"
>
> "[Judge Saucedo:] Tessie [Velasquez] is coming over to my house."
> "[Tovar:] How nice."

"[Judge Saucedo:] I was busy with Tessie and did not have a chance to directly respond to your earlier text. She might be next. Thank you for asking about golf. It's always wonderful. I truly enjoy it. . . . Your texts are never a bother. I have information from Ed about the molding and tinting. Your comment begs the question. You are focused on the end result and not the process. The process is more important."

"[Judge Saucedo:] Covered by accountant-client privilege, I spoke with my accountant again. He said I didn't realize I had already been seriously hurt and will only experience more hurt in the future. After I told him about the $5 in savings and the car, he said 'wow and not even a thank you'. No texting, no calls, a few hurried conversations, you initiate all communication, 'what's in it for you' he commented. [¶] Not even a text or a call on whether the car closed. It's [a] friendship in your mind and at most, a one sided friendship he said. Think about it he asked. I spoke to him because I needed an objective assessment. Is his assessment right?"

"[Tovar:] I thought we talked about all this. I'm not sure where your going with this issue. We are friends always were and as far as I see we will be. I'm thankful and appreciate everything. I don't know what you mean when you say hurt I have never hurt you. Really stressing me with all this."

"[Judge Saucedo:] I shared with you the conversation with my accountant. I wanted reassurance everything is fine and he is wrong. It is not a challenge of your values. I appreciate this causes stress but I too stressed. I am about to gift you $15 and he is right in some respects. You texted about the tinting but never asked either yesterday or today whether the deal c[l]osed or any other details. I understand you are thankful but it would be so nice to receive a simple 'thank you' or statement about how this feels or how excited you are. Simple things make a difference. Love, kindness and respect everyday."

"[Judge Saucedo:] Where is this going? You will have a beautiful car before or on or about November 12. That's where this is going. [¶] I promised it and I deliver on my promises. It's that simple."

> "[Tovar:] I thought it was done or closed sorry. . I'm excited but then when I get texts like the one Earlier from you it makes me stress. I didn't know you needed reassurance. . . I was in a great mood all day. You know I'm super excited a car and a trip who gets that. . . ."
>
> "[Judge Saucedo:] How would I know you were in a great mood today without you telling me? How would I know you are super excited without you telling me? T[h]at's the point. You know knowing you are happy makes me happy. It's the mental part that is important to me. Or as you describe it, the emotional part."
>
> "[Judge Saucedo:] Aren't you interested in the final details?"
>
> "[Judge Saucedo:] I want you to savor the moment. It real now. You did not believe me when I first broached the subject. You wrote flowers, a car? Because you did not believe. Now the moment is here and I want you to reflect on the journey and acknowledge it has been great."
>
> "[Judge Saucedo:] Feedback? Comments? My accountant is right---texting is a wholly unsatisfactory way of communicating."

The next day, Judge Saucedo sent two texts to Tovar in which he continued to discuss his relationship with Tovar:

> "[Judge Saucedo:] After reflection, I understand it. You think of me as an ordinary friend like Kim [Werth] or others. Indeed, you have said in the past you want to go back the way it was. But I am not an ordinary friend. As you said 'a car and a trip who gets that'. No other ordinary friend h[a]s in the past given you or will give you in the future a valuable car, a trip for you and your sister and your families or a commitment to support you financially. Is this what an ordinary friend does? No. Only a special friend does this. An ordinary friend would provide only moral support. If you want me to be an ordinary friend like I was before September, I will provide only moral support. But if you want me for a special friend, everything is on line with full financial and moral support going forward. Special friend means you want > to make time and effort to share thoughts and experiences with me."

> "[Judge Saucedo]: These are my feelings. I am always honest and truthful. Am I an ordinary or special friend?"

Less than 10 minutes later, Tovar responded by text stating: "Correct me if I'm wrong, are you once again asking for an emotional affair?" Judge Saucedo responded, "Absolutely not" and "Why do you ask that q[u]estion?" Over the next hour, Judge Saucedo and Tovar had an exchange of texts that began with Tovar's statement that she thought it was "time" to tell her husband "absolutely everything" about Judge Saucedo's conduct and she could not handle it anymore:

> "[Tovar:] That's what you mean when you say special friend? I think it's time I tell Lalo absolutely everything from the letter, financial gifts, the trips, the car, I can't handle it anymore, I'm shaking, I'm sick, I'm an emotional mess and I have not bothered anyone in my life. I can't handle this no longer. The lies to my family and friends its not worth how I'm feeling right now I can't focus on my family since your texts yesterday."
> "[Tovar:] And they don't deserve this. I will also seek a therapist tomorrow just so you know. This has gone bad."
>
> "[Judge Saucedo:] Please calm down and think about this. Think before you act. What should I tell Ed [the BMW salesperson]?"
>
> "[Judge Saucedo:] Please think and slow things down."
>
> "[Judge Saucedo:] Please call me."
>
> "[Judge Saucedo:] Based on your text, I will resign as Ju[d]ge tomorrow. My career is toast. We can still save this. Please call."

More than three hours later, Tovar texted Judge Saucedo demanding that he "follow through" with his promised gifts of a Disneyland vacation and a car:

> "I take it that you will follow through with the cost of my family trip and the car, I will not come out of this as a failure without either. I do not want to hear anymore of our relationship status, Not one word. I am an emotional wreck as I text this. I will consider you a friend and nothing else just as I consider 'Kim'. I am still going to seek a therapist as damage has been done. I did not think this was going to end up this way."

Judge Saucedo responded, "Call me please," and Tovar countered with, "No phone calls. No more texts after this. Please." Judge Saucedo wrote: "I understand but I am concerned about my career. It is toast unless you talk to me. In the garage committing suicide. Have the red car running with the door down. Please call." Tovar replied she would call 911, and then she said, "I'm not going to say anything. If you follow through with what I asked."[6] She told him to "stop calling." Judge Saucedo then wrote: "Thank y[o]u for sparing my life and career. Absolutely I will follow through on the car, trip, and not another word as you request. Your text was timely because I was ending my life. Thank you for the gift of life."

11. Discussions of Judge's Resignation, Continuation of Gifts, Involvement of Werth, and Tovar's Request for Promised Expense Money for Disneyland Trip

The next day, Monday, November 4, Judge Saucedo called Tovar into his chambers and told her he had given a letter of resignation to the court's executive secretary, Ellen Kennedy.[7]

Two days later, Judge Saucedo paid the remaining purchase price ($14,000) for the BMW automobile, and registered the vehicle in Tovar's name.

[6] It is not entirely clear from the record whether this statement was made in a text or in a phone call, but it is undisputed Tovar communicated these words to Judge Saucedo. The statement is included in a document prepared by Judge Saucedo reflecting the content of certain text messages previously contained on his phone (that he later deleted).

[7] In her testimony, Kennedy denied Judge Saucedo had given her this letter, or had discussed his resignation or retirement with her. Investigator Buehler testified that Judge Saucedo told her he discussed the possibility of his retirement with Kennedy.

On November 12, Bailiff Eddie Cibrian began talking with Tovar in the courtroom. Judge Saucedo came into the courtroom and told Cibrian to leave and that he needed to speak with Tovar. Judge Saucedo told Tovar her financial privileges were reinstated and that he had made a deposit in her account. Tovar became very upset and responded: " 'Why? Why did you do that? You said you were done.' " Later that day, Judge Saucedo deposited $200 into Tovar's bank account.

Two days later, Tovar sent a text to Werth saying: "I'm sick of all this . . . . [w]hy doesn't he just leave it alone . . . he told Eddie to leave the court room so he could talk . . . why put me in that position and At work . . . . Just leave it alone already ugh . . . . It's sick . . . I'm disgusted . . . I want to so bad file harassment but I know that's bad."

Later that day, Werth met with Judge Saucedo in an attempt to act as a "go-between" to assist Judge Saucedo and Tovar to repair their relationship. In text communications to Tovar shortly before the meeting, Werth said she had "a feeling once [Judge Saucedo] know[s] [the] cats outta the bag, he'll stop," but she said she was not sure he would fully "come clean."

According to Werth, during her ensuing meeting with Judge Saucedo, she told him she knew about the text messages and the gifts, and that Tovar did not want him to send her any more text messages or give her any more money or gifts. Judge Saucedo agreed he would stop texting and there would be no more gifts. Werth learned for the first time that Judge Saucedo had paid for the entire purchase price of the car ($15,000); Tovar had told her he paid only the down payment. Werth had also been unaware Judge Saucedo had been depositing cash directly into Tovar's account. When Werth confronted Tovar about her failure to tell her the truth about the car purchase and the direct deposits, Tovar began crying and said she had not disclosed this information because she had been too embarrassed.

The next day, Friday November 15, Judge Saucedo called Werth, Tovar, and Velasquez into his chambers and said he had decided not to retire or resign. He said he had been "going through something," and that he was better and everything was going to be okay.

F. Last Payment and Judge Accuses Tovar of Extortion

Over the weekend, Tovar was emotionally distraught and decided she could no longer work in Judge Saucedo's department. On Monday, November 18, she went into Judge Saucedo's chambers and told him the Disneyland trip was coming up and she would need the trip expense money by Wednesday, November 20, and that she was going to ask for a transfer. She told him she had previously spoken with her supervisors about a transfer and was told she would have to inform him of her request.[8] Judge Saucedo replied, " 'Okay.' "

Judge Saucedo testified that Tovar came into his chambers and threatened to report him to human resources unless he gave her $8,000 by November 20th. Tovar testified she never threatened Judge Saucedo or asked him for $8,000 or any specific amount. She said she asked him for the Disneyland expense money he had previously promised because without it she would be forced to cancel the trip and explain the situation to her family.

Werth testified that shortly after the judge's meeting in chambers with Tovar, Judge Saucedo told her that Tovar had demanded $8,000 and threatened to report him to human resources.

The next day, during a criminal proceeding, Judge Saucedo handed Tovar a typewritten note in an envelope while she was sitting at her courtroom desk. The note stated:

> "Yesterday, November 18, 2013, you threatened to go to HR unless I deposited $8,000.00 into your savings account by Wednesday. The deposit slip for $8,000.00 is enclosed. Please stop. It is done. Enough is enough. It ends today. No more money will be paid out. Confirm through Kim [Werth].

[8] In October, Tovar had a brief meeting with a court manager. She told the manager that she was overwhelmed with the work in her department and thought it was time for a transfer. Tovar decided not to proceed with her transfer request when the manager told her that Judge Saucedo would have to be informed of Tovar's request.

To expose any secret affecting him or them."

Attached to the note was a bank deposit slip showing Judge Saucedo had deposited $8,000 into Tovar's bank account at noon that day.

Tovar said she regretted taking and keeping the money, but at the time she thought if she gave back the $8,000, the judge would say she "was guilty of all of this." Tovar never returned any of Judge Saucedo's money or the BMW vehicle.

Regarding Tovar's alleged demand for $8,000, the masters found that Tovar approached Judge Saucedo to inform him of her intention to seek a transfer from his department and also to ask for the Disneyland money that had been promised to her. However, they found the evidence insufficient to determine whether it was Judge Saucedo or Tovar who suggested the specific $8,000 figure. We agree. However, as stated by the masters, regardless of who raised this $8,000 figure, "the Examiner proved by clear and convincing evidence that Judge Saucedo deposited the $8,000 into Tovar's bank account for the specific purpose of seeking to ensure Tovar would stay silent about his past behavior." Judge Saucedo provided no reasonable explanation for his decision not to report the alleged extortion conduct to court administration or law enforcement.

On the issue concerning the circumstances in which Judge Saucedo gave Tovar the "extortion" note, Tovar testified that Judge Saucedo handed the note to her while she was sitting at her courtroom clerk's desk "in the middle of" a criminal hearing (a factual issue relevant to the legal question of whether the judge was acting in a judicial capacity, as discussed later in this decision). According to Tovar, during the hearing when a public defender, deputy district attorney, an interpreter and Werth were present, Judge Saucedo asked to go off the record, and then handed her the note and asked her to read it. She asked whether he wanted her to read it on the record, and Judge Saucedo said, "No." Judge Saucedo then went back on the record and finished the proceeding.

Judge Saucedo acknowledged he gave the note to Tovar in the courtroom, but said he handed her the note when the afternoon calendar was completed and the attorneys were picking up their materials and leaving.

The masters found Tovar's testimony on this issue "was specific, detailed, and made sense given the entire circumstances." We adopt the masters' finding that Judge Saucedo gave Tovar the "extortion" note during court proceedings while he was on the bench and in his judicial robe. We further adopt the masters finding that Judge Saucedo engaged in this conduct at this time and place for the specific purpose of using his judicial office to intimidate Tovar and ensure her silence.

G. Tovar Reports Judge Saucedo's Claimed Improper Conduct

Shortly after she received the November 19 "extortion" note, Tovar filed a request to be transferred out of Department 6. While this request was pending, on December 6, Tovar asked to meet with human resources manager Doreen Vitale and, during a highly emotional meeting, summarized the events of the past two months. Vitale took notes, and then typed the notes into a document, which Tovar reviewed and signed. With minor exceptions, the typed summary is consistent with Tovar's testimony. Tovar told Vitale that Judge Saucedo is very powerful and she was afraid of losing her job and of retaliation. Tovar said she did not report the conduct earlier because she was hoping Judge Saucedo's conduct would "all stop and go away," but it did not.

Tovar later filed two administrative claims, one with the Judicial Council and one with the Department of Fair Employment and Housing, alleging Judge Saucedo engaged in unlawful sexual harassment and seeking damages for the harassment. She also filed (or was considering filing) a lawsuit, but she testified she was not sure she was going to maintain this action. She said that other than the hugs, Judge Saucedo's conduct was not "sexual" in nature.

H. Credibility Determinations and Findings on Primary Factual Issues in Dispute

1. Summary

Many of the critical facts underlying the charges are undisputed. Judge Saucedo admits he presented the Anonymous letter to Tovar, falsely told her he had contacted her husband's employer and intercepted the letter, and told her not to tell anyone about the letter. He also admits that between mid-September 2013 and mid-November 2013 he gave Tovar gifts valued in excess of $25,000, sent hundreds of text messages of a personal nature, gave her several notes, and wrote the letter providing legal advice to her son. There are, however, two important factual issues that are strongly disputed. First, Judge Saucedo steadfastly denies he wrote the Anonymous letter. Second, he denies that the gifts were given to Tovar as a means to establish a "close" or romantic relationship. Rather, he maintains he was motivated solely by a sincere desire to mentor Tovar and assist her in resolving marital and financial difficulties he perceived she was experiencing. Judge Saucedo claims Tovar turned on him and manipulated his well-intentioned efforts to assist her, as evidenced by her decision to keep all of the gifts.

In the sections below, we first explain why we adopt the masters' credibility determinations and then address our factual findings on the two major factual issues in dispute.

2. Credibility Findings of Tovar and Judge Saucedo

In those instances where the testimony of Judge Saucedo and Tovar conflicted, the masters found Tovar's testimony to be credible and her version of events to be true. The masters found significant portions of Judge Saucedo's testimony lacked credibility. We adopt these credibility determinations both because the masters were in a position to observe the credibility of the witnesses and because these findings are supported by our own independent evaluation of the evidence.

Tovar's testimony was consistent with, and corroborated by, numerous items of documentary evidence, including her text messages with Judge Saucedo and Werth, and notes and letters given to her by Judge Saucedo. Tovar recalled numerous details of the relevant events, and those details coincided with, and were substantiated by, the content and timing of the documents.

For example, Tovar's description of Judge Saucedo's actions in the car dealership break room (that he wanted to "know [her] happiness" and wanted her to "be emotional with him") was followed one hour later by a text from Judge Saucedo (during the work day) in which he said he was "angry with [him]self"; "[t]his is the most difficult message I have ever written"; and "I cannot overcome my embarrassment over my childish, stupid and silly behavior." Documentary evidence reflects that shortly after this text, Judge Saucedo deposited additional money into Tovar's bank account and assured her he would buy the car for her.

Likewise, Tovar's testimony that Judge Saucedo told her he wanted to have more personal contact with her after one of their AAA office meetings was corroborated by Judge Saucedo's October 30 texts (shortly after a AAA meeting) stating he was "feeling out of balance" and "still feeling under appreciated" and was "embarrassed about [his] feelings," and his text of the next morning stating, "I sincerely apologize for everything I said or did yesterday that was offensive or hurtful. I should not have communicated while off balance."

By contrast, Judge Saucedo's testimony was often disputed by documentary evidence. For example, the judge's testimony that he sent the flowers to Tovar to acknowledge the anniversary of Tovar's brother's death is contradicted both by the fact that the anniversary of her brother's death was the following month and by the florist note indicating that his identity was not to be disclosed. Also, when asked what privilege he was referring to when he marked the letter to Tovar's son as "Privileged and Confidential Communication," he responded that it was directed to the parents, yet the letter was addressed to Tovar's son. Only after being questioned further by a special master did he acknowledge he was referring to an attorney-client privilege.

Judge Saucedo's testimony and prior statements were also at odds with his text messages and notes to Tovar. For example, in his Answer, he denied he offered to provide Tovar with spending money for the Disneyland trip, but his testimony and text messages clearly show he committed to giving her this money. He also denied in his Answer that Tovar had told him to stop texting her, yet his AAA note specifically asks for his "texting privileges to be reinstated." Further, he denied telling Tovar that he planned to give her $26,400, even though his October 31 text message clearly states this fact. He also maintained he did not talk with his brother regarding financial support for Tovar, even though he told her in a text that he had spoken with his brother "about you" and, "You don't know how well you are covered."

Judge Saucedo's testimony was also inconsistent with assertions made in documents he signed and prior statements. For example, in his June 2014 letter to the commission, he stated, "Ms. Tovar has initiated and entertained all personal contact we had with one another at all times but one." (Italics added) The statement directly conflicts with the documented facts showing Judge Saucedo frequently initiated the text communications. He also gave conflicting explanations of his statement in the September 30 note that he "voluntarily took a risk" to protect Tovar: he told investigator Buehler that the "risk" referred to was in intercepting the letter at Mr. Tovar's place of employment; in his Answer, he denied that the "risk" was contacting the husband's employer; at the hearing, he testified that he was referring to not reporting the Anonymous letter. If the judge meant to suggest to Tovar that he was taking a risk in intercepting the letter, as he told Buehler, his credibility is further damaged since he knew he had not intercepted the letter.

Significantly undermining Judge Saucedo's credibility is the fact that he admitted lying in the past or telling others to lie. He admitted he did not tell the truth on several occasions, including when he falsely told Tovar he had communicated with her husband's employer. Judge Saucedo not only misrepresented the fact that he had contacted the hospital, he also provided numerous false details to embellish the story (e.g., that he spoke with a person named "John" who was the human resources manager;

John had the letter on his desk; John did not know who Mr. Tovar was; and John said he "shredded" the letter during the phone conversation). Judge Saucedo also acknowledged he encouraged Tovar to lie about the flowers and admitted he previously misidentified the delivery date of the flowers. Additionally, he told Tovar to misrepresent the facts regarding the source of the money for the Disneyland vacation and the BMW automobile.

Because the special masters had the opportunity to observe the demeanor of the witnesses, we give special weight to their assessment of credibility. After observing Tovar testify over two days, the masters found Tovar's testimony to be credible. In support of this finding, the masters stated,

> "[Tovar] freely acknowledged when she was not sure of a particular fact or a specific date. Tovar was forthright in admitting facts that were damaging to her, and made a good faith effort to explain the reasons for her actions. These explanations appeared to be unrehearsed and truthful. Although Tovar has filed claims based on Judge Saucedo's conduct and is represented by counsel, we are satisfied her testimony was trustworthy on the issues before us, notwithstanding any financial motivation associated with litigation. Further, although Tovar did not always use the best judgment in responding to Judge Saucedo's overtures, we are convinced her detailed testimony about Judge Saucedo's conduct is reliable."

After observing Judge Saucedo testify over two days, the masters found that "the manner in which Judge Saucedo testified – failing to answer direct questions, providing nonresponsive and sometimes rambling answers, and answering with irrelevant points – created significant doubts as to the truthfulness of his answers." The masters had to point out to the judge on more than one occasion that his answer to a question was nonresponsive. During one exchange with the examiner, a special master interjected and stated, "Judge, he's asked you three times, and I haven't gotten the answer yet." Later in the proceedings, the presiding master told the parties that "Judge Saucedo's answers have been nonresponsive and gone well beyond." Yet, still in another instance, the judge gave a nonresponsive and nonsensical response to a special master who asked why he wrote in a text to Tovar that he was in the garage with the red car running. The judge responded, "I was in the garage, and that's where I kept my – my Mercedes."

For all these reasons, we adopt the masters' credibility determinations.

3. Judge Saucedo Wrote the Anonymous Letter and Sent it to Himself

Upon initially reviewing the Anonymous letter, the masters were "highly skeptical that Judge Saucedo – a highly regarded, dignified, meticulous judge – could have possibly written the letter and then participated in a convoluted plan to persuade [Tovar] that she needed his help." However, after carefully considering all of the testimony and closely examining the documents, the masters reached "the inescapable conclusion that Judge Saucedo did write the letter and mailed it to himself for this purpose." Our examination of the record leads us to the same conclusion.

Of foremost significance, Judge Saucedo's actions after receiving the letter make sense only if he was the author. He falsely told Tovar that he would speak with her husband's employer and ensure the letter would be intercepted before Mr. Tovar received it. The judge further falsely told Tovar that he had contacted the hospital where Mr. Tovar worked and an official agreed to destroy the letter. The masters disbelieved the judge's testimony that he lied to Tovar because he was concerned with her feelings and wanted to reassure her. Rather, the masters found that he lied to Tovar because he already knew he was the author and no letter had in fact been sent to the hospital. We agree.

If a third party had sent the letter, Judge Saucedo would have known that Mr. Tovar would most likely receive the letter and be very upset with Tovar and Knoy. Under those circumstances, falsely reassuring Tovar that her husband would not receive the letter could have put her in jeopardy and deprived her of an opportunity to explain the situation to her husband before he received the letter. Furthermore, had the husband received the letter, Tovar would have known Judge Saucedo had lied to her. We do not believe the judge would have concocted this false scenario of intercepting the letter at

Mr. Tovar's place of employment had he not been certain that the letter would never be received by Mr. Tovar.

Additionally, there is no evidence that Tovar or her husband or his employer ever received a copy of the letter. If a third party had sent the letter to Judge Saucedo to inform Mr. Tovar of his wife's alleged extramarital affair, it would seem reasonable that this person would also have sent the letter to Tovar's husband. It is not logical that the letter was sent only to Judge Saucedo if it had been written by a third party.

In fact, Judge Saucedo expressed his awareness that the letter was sent only to him. He testified, and told investigator Buehler, it was his understanding there was only one copy of the letter (the one he received). When the examiner asked him why he did not give Tovar a copy of the Anonymous letter, Judge Saucedo responded, "I didn't want multiple copies out there. Only one had been sent. And at the time, I just wanted to hold onto it. And she didn't ask me for a copy." If he had not sent the letter, he would not know that there was only one copy.

Further, Judge Saucedo was aware of possible security and domestic violence concerns that could be triggered if Mr. Tovar received the letter. As a judicial officer, he was aware of his obligation to report this type of correspondence to his presiding judge and law enforcement. He nonetheless took no action to report the matter or to preserve the letter for forensic analysis. Instead, he affirmatively precluded any such actions by demanding that Tovar not tell anyone about the letter. Judge Saucedo was unable to explain these actions, other than to say that "[p]erhaps" he did not "think" about these issues at the time. Given Judge Saucedo's experience and intelligence, the masters found this explanation to be implausible. Instead, the masters concluded "Judge Saucedo did not 'think' about these issues because he was the author of the letter and its only recipient and thus knew there were no security concerns associated with his receiving the letter." We agree.

Judge Saucedo's repeated insistence that Tovar not tell anyone about the letter further supports our finding that he was the author. His explanation that he was trying to protect Tovar from being fired is not plausible. There is no evidence that Tovar would have been fired or disciplined for having an open romantic relationship with a bailiff. On the other hand, not informing court administration about a letter that raised security concerns might well be the basis for discipline. Judge Saucedo instructed Tovar not to reveal the letter to anyone to protect himself, not her.

The judge's reliance on the letter to create a dependent relationship between himself and Tovar provided additional support for our finding that he wrote the letter. As stated by the masters:

> "Immediately after showing Tovar the Anonymous letter, Judge Saucedo had a specific and defined plan for moving forward, a plan that relied on the contents of the letter and his willingness to 'fix' the problems raised in the letter. Over the next two months, Judge Saucedo continued to use the letter to pressure Tovar when she sought to distance herself from him. For example, after Judge Saucedo gave her the September 30 note and she told him she did not feel comfortable with his help, Judge Saucedo responded in an angry manner, stating ' "What do you mean you don't want my help anymore? So you mean the [Anonymous] letter is true? So is it true about you and Jeremy? Maybe your husband does need to know about the [Anonymous] letter." ' "

Judge Saucedo contends there is insufficient evidence to prove he knew of facts included in the Anonymous letter, specifically of Tovar's prior relationship with Knoy, her cesarean section scar, tattoo, and information about Tovar's husband. We agree with the masters that the examiner proffered clear and convincing evidence that the judge was in fact aware of those details.

Witnesses testified that the prior romantic relationship between Tovar and Knoy was widely known at the courthouse and discussed by Tovar and Velasquez in the clerk's common area directly outside the judge's chambers (he generally kept his door open).

Regarding Tovar's tattoos, the masters had the opportunity to observe that Tovar's tattoos would be clearly visible while wearing her work outfits. Werth testified Tovar's tattoos were visible at work. Tovar testified that she and Judge Saucedo talked about her tattoos on two occasions. During one of those conversations, Judge Saucedo asked Tovar why she was wearing a band aid on her foot, and Tovar explained that the court policy was that employees must cover their tattoos at work (although Tovar did not always follow this policy). In another conversation, Judge Saucedo told Tovar that his son had tattoos and Tovar discussed her tattoos. In light of this evidence, we reject Judge Saucedo's testimony that he was unaware of the tattoos.

As to the reference to Tovar's "c-scar," the masters credited Tovar's testimony that she had discussed with Judge Saucedo the fact that she had a cesarean section when he saw a photograph of her infant in an incubator. We adopt this finding and also find Judge Saucedo was aware of this fact through the frequent personal discussions among staff in the common area outside his chambers.

Further, although Tovar generally referred to her husband as "Lalo" and the letter was addressed to "Hilario Tovar," Judge Saucedo admitted he was aware that Lalo is a common nickname for Hilario. He also acknowledged he knew Mr. Tovar worked for a healthcare provider in the area. Tovar testified she was excited her husband had recently gotten a job at the medical center and she mentioned that to court staff and the judge. Additionally, when Judge Saucedo first showed Tovar the Anonymous letter, he pointed out that the letter had been sent to her husband's employer, reflecting he was aware that Mr. Tovar worked at the Tulare Regional Medical Center.

Finally, contrary to Judge Saucedo's contentions, the fact that the forensic analysis did not find that the Anonymous letter was written on his court computer is not dispositive because the evidence shows the analyst did not find evidence of the other notes and letters that Judge Saucedo admitted writing. Further, we reject as implausible Judge Saucedo's claim that he did not know how to type an envelope to himself, or that he could not have printed the self-addressed envelope. Additionally, the fact that the examiner did not "prove" the precise location of the mailbox that Judge Saucedo used to mail the letter is not dispositive. The evidence shows the letter was received at a distribution center that processes mail from the area where Judge Saucedo lived and worked, and that Judge Saucedo was in this vicinity at the time the letter was mailed.

This evidence leaves us clearly convinced that Judge Saucedo wrote the Anonymous letter and sent it to his own home address. We see no other reasonable interpretation of the evidence.

4. Judge Saucedo's Actions Were Not for the Purpose of Mentoring Tovar

Judge Saucedo claims he and Tovar jointly agreed to embark on a "mutual venture" to solve the problems raised by the letter, to reconcile her marriage and build her self-esteem. He testified that the "mentoring" relationship fell apart because Tovar improperly focused on details and not "the process." As did the masters, we find by clear and convincing evidence Judge Saucedo wrote the Anonymous letter as part of a predesigned plan to manufacture Tovar's dependence on him, hoping it would lead to a closer personal or "emotional" relationship with Tovar. We reject his claim he intended only to "mentor" her or that his improper actions can be properly blamed on any of Tovar's actions. We agree with the masters that although Tovar "made some poor choices in continuing to accept gifts, and, in one instance, demanded Judge Saucedo make good on his financial 'promises,' these considerations do not excuse the fact it was Judge Saucedo who initiated the relationship through false means and then improperly used his position and financial rewards to pressure his court clerk into maintaining an inappropriate and unwanted personal relationship."

Mentoring involves advice, direction, referrals and encouragement. As stated by the special masters, "Mentoring is not accomplished by providing a subordinate with thousands of dollars in gifts, including a BMW car and vacation," an offer to pay for body sculpting" or expecting a 'special' friendship in exchange."

Further, the overly personal and emotional language the judge used in his text messages and notes to Tovar is far from the type of supportive but professional communication one would expect in a mentoring relationship (i.e., "It's silly but still feeling under appreciated"; "I, too, am human and have an ego. Feel free, if you wish, to compliment me if you like things I do or wear"). Further, the judge repeatedly stated and suggested that he wanted a closer or "special" relationship with Tovar in exchange for his

"gifts," something that would not be expected or appropriate in a mentoring relationship ("If you want me to be an ordinary friend like I was before September, I will provide only moral support. But if you want me for a special friend, everything is on line with full financial and moral support going forward. Special friend means you want to make time and effort to share thoughts and experiences with me"; telling Tovar that his accountant questioned why he was buying her all of these gifts and whether this was a "one sided friendship").

It is undisputed that Judge Saucedo has successfully and enthusiastically mentored numerous individuals out of a sense of compassion and desire to help. But the judge's conduct here does not remotely resemble the conduct described by the many witnesses and declarants who lauded Judge Saucedo's willingness to assist them (mentoring law school graduates to pass the bar exam; supervising and mentoring legal interns and new attorneys; mentoring students in a program bridging high school and college; mentoring members of the community professionally and personally by providing advice and encouragement).

Judge Saucedo testified that he is a highly ordered and structured person who focuses on "framework" and "process" when working with others. In his closing statement, Judge Saucedo's counsel argued that everything that Judge Saucedo "does, he does with vigor and does it in a deliberate and organized way." The evidence establishes that this is precisely how Judge Saucedo approached his desire to have a closer personal relationship with his female clerk. We agree with the masters that Judge Saucedo "devised the plan to send a crude and 'vile' letter accusing her of sexual infidelity and apparently envisioned that Tovar would rely on him to become the person who would protect her and 'fix' her life problems (or what Judge Saucedo perceived to be her life problems)."

I. Judge Saucedo's Background and Character Witness Evidence

Judge Saucedo presented evidence about his personal and professional background. His parents were immigrants who worked as farm workers. The judge received financial aid to attend the University of California at Berkeley and worked with his family in the farm fields on weekends and breaks. After earning his law degree from Stanford, he practiced law for more than 24 years in the Central Valley, primarily with rural legal service agencies and at a private law firm representing plaintiffs in employment class action matters. The judge was on the Lindsay City Council, and was later appointed mayor.

Judge Saucedo presented substantial character evidence, including the testimony of 16 witnesses and more than 100 supporting declarations from judges, community leaders, community members, religious leaders, attorneys, court staff and former mentees.[9] In general, the witnesses described the judge as a fair, generous, honest, respectful, courteous, caring and hardworking judge, attorney and leader. He devotes substantial time to volunteering for organizations and mentoring young professionals. The judge provided bar examination tutoring to a number of recent law school graduates who came from underprivileged backgrounds and who had difficulty passing the bar exam. He also provided mentoring and support to many young lawyers starting out their careers in public interest law and has been a positive influence in the lives of members of his community.

Based on this evidence, we adopt the masters' finding that Judge Saucedo has had a distinguished career as a judge, attorney, and community leader, has very strong support from his colleagues, attorneys, community leaders and community members, and has provided substantial assistance to many individuals in need of his assistance.

[9] On September 29, 2015, prior to the appearance before the commission, the commission chairperson, Hon. Erica R. Yew, sent a letter of disclosure to the parties concerning Dale Minami, an attorney who submitted a supporting declaration on Judge Saucedo's behalf. The letter, which is included in the public file of these formal proceedings, discloses Judge Yew's social and professional contacts with Mr. Minami over the past 12 years, and that he previously made a donation to a nonprofit foundation that her husband founded and in which he serves as president.

III.

LEGAL CONCLUSIONS

A. Violations of the Code of Judicial Ethics

The Notice of Formal Proceedings alleged Judge Saucedo violated several canons of the Code of Judicial Ethics: Canons 1, 2, 2A, 2B(1), 3C(5), and 4G. Those canons, as pertinent here, require a judge to personally observe high standards of conduct "so that the integrity and independence of the judiciary is preserved" (canon 1); "avoid impropriety and the appearance of impropriety in all of the judge's activities" (canon 2); "act at all times in a manner that promotes public confidence in the integrity and impartiality of the judiciary" (canon 2A); "not allow family, social, political, or other relationships to influence the judge's judicial conduct or judgment" nor " convey or permit others to convey the impression that any individual is in a special position to influence the judge" (canon 2B(1)); "avoid nepotism and favoritism" (canon 3C(5)); and to not practice law (canon 4G).

We conclude that Judge Saucedo violated each of these canons through the following conduct. First, Judge Saucedo's authorship of the Anonymous letter violated canons 1, 2, and 2A. This conduct violates the high standards required of a judge, undermines the integrity of the judiciary, and diminishes public confidence in the integrity of the judiciary.

Second, Judge Saucedo's failure to report the Anonymous letter to his presiding judge, court administration or law enforcement violated canons 1, 2 and 2A. This conduct violates the high standards of conduct required of a judge, undermines the integrity of the judiciary, and diminishes public confidence in the integrity of the judiciary.

Third, Judge Saucedo's conduct in using the Anonymous letter as a means to promote a closer personal relationship with Tovar violated canons 1, 2 and 2A. This conduct violates the high standards required of a judge, undermines the integrity of the judiciary, and diminishes public confidence in the integrity of the judiciary.

Fourth, Judge Saucedo's course of conduct during September 18 through November 19 that included giving Tovar, a subordinate employee, substantial monetary and tangible gifts as a means to convince her to become involved in a closer personal relationship violated canons 1, 2, 2A, and 3C(5). This conduct violates the high standards required of a judge, undermines the integrity of the judiciary, diminishes public confidence in the integrity of the judiciary, and manifests favoritism toward a subordinate employee.

Fifth, Judge Saucedo's extortion allegation, and the manner in which he made the accusation, violated canons 1, 2, 2A, and 2B(1). Judge Saucedo interrupted court proceedings to hand Tovar a note accusing her of extortion. By doing so, Judge Saucedo improperly used the power of his judicial office to intimidate Tovar and seek to ensure her silence regarding his conduct during the previous two months. Judge Saucedo also failed to report the claimed extortion demand to law enforcement or court officials. Judge Saucedo's conduct concerning the extortion claim violated the high standards required of a judge, and violates his duties to act in a manner that promotes public confidence in the integrity and impartiality of the judiciary.

Sixth, Judge Saucedo's conduct in providing Tovar's son with legal advice violated canon 4G.[10]

B. Level of Misconduct

A judge who violates the Code of Judicial Ethics engages in one of three types of judicial misconduct: (1) willful misconduct, (2) prejudicial misconduct, and (3) improper action. A judge may be removed from office or censured based on the first two, but not the third. (Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (d).)

Willful misconduct is (1) unjudicial conduct that is (2) committed in bad faith (3) by a judge acting in a judicial capacity. (Broadman, supra, 18 Cal.4th at p. 1091.)

[10] The masters also concluded that Judge Saucedo engaged in willful misconduct in providing false information to Tovar's supervisors to justify overtime work and with regard to an incident involving Deputy Scott Ballantyne. As discussed later, we do not adopt the masters' conclusions that the judge engaged in misconduct with respect to these incidents because they were not charged in the Notice.

Failure to comply with the canons of judicial ethics is generally considered to constitute unjudicial conduct. (Adams v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1994) 8 Cal.4th 630, 662 [34 Cal.Rptr.2d 641, 882 P.2d 358].)

In the context of willful misconduct in judicial office, a judge acts in bad faith "only by (1) performing a judicial act for a corrupt purpose (which is any purpose other than the faithful discharge of judicial duties), or (2) performing a judicial act with knowledge that the act is beyond the judge's lawful judicial power, or (3) performing a judicial act that exceeds the judge's lawful power with a conscious disregard for the limits of the judge's authority." (Broadman, supra, 18 Cal.4th at p. 1092.)

The third element of willful misconduct – acting in a judicial capacity – is discussed below.

Prejudicial misconduct is "conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute." (Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (d).) Prejudicial misconduct occurs when an objective observer would conclude the judge's improper conduct was " ' "prejudicial to [the] public esteem for the judicial office," ' " regardless of the motive or intent of the judge. (Broadman, supra, 18 Cal.4th at p. 1092.) Prejudicial misconduct differs "from willful misconduct in that a judge's acts may constitute prejudicial conduct even if not committed in a judicial capacity, or, if committed in a judicial capacity, not committed in bad faith." (Ibid.) Unjudicial conduct committed in bad faith by a judge not acting in a judicial capacity constitutes prejudicial misconduct. (Id. at pp. 1092-1093.) "In this context, bad faith means a culpable mental state beyond mere negligence and consisting of either knowing or not caring that the conduct being undertaken is unjudicial and prejudicial to public esteem." (Id. at p. 1093.)

Improper action occurs when the judge's conduct violates the canons, but the circumstances do not rise to the level of willful misconduct and do not bring the judiciary into disrepute. (Adams v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1995) 10 Cal.4th 866, 899 [42 Cal.Rptr.2d 606, 897 P.2d 544] (Adams II).)

Each of Judge Saucedo's canon violations constitutes, at minimum, prejudicial misconduct. The judge's conduct was improper in myriad ways. He authored the Anonymous letter containing crude and sexually explicit language, and then used the letter to create a closer "emotional" relationship with his clerk, pressured her with expensive gifts and other benefits to comply with his requests for a closer relationship, and presented her with the extortion note in open court to discourage her from reporting his conduct. We agree with the masters' conclusion that an objective observer would readily conclude the judge's conduct was highly prejudicial to the "public esteem for the judicial office," and that Judge Saucedo brought the judicial office into disrepute.

We also agree with the masters that the judge acted in bad faith with respect to the entire course of conduct as charged in the Notice and as proven by clear and convincing evidence at the hearing before the special masters. His creation of the Anonymous letter for the sole purpose of manipulating his courtroom clerk is the essence of an act committed in bad faith. Further, Judge Saucedo's ongoing efforts to conceal his conduct, and his acknowledgement that his career would be "toast" if his conduct was revealed, show he was aware his conduct was wrong and unjudicial.

With respect to the extortion note, Judge Saucedo testified that Tovar threatened to report him unless he paid her $8,000. Instead of disclosing this conduct to his superiors or law enforcement, he deposited this money into her account and engaged in this conduct hoping to intimidate her to adhere to her promise not to report him if he paid the money. Judge Saucedo – who had been a judge for more than 10 years and had been presiding over criminal matters for at least three years – clearly knew his making extortion allegations against Tovar, while he was on the bench, was not within his judicial powers. At the very least, Judge Saucedo engaged in the conduct with a conscious disregard for the limits of his judicial authority.

Having concluded that Judge Saucedo engaged in unjudicial conduct in bad faith, our determination of whether any of his actions constitute willful misconduct, in addition to conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice, turns on whether he was acting in a judicial capacity (the third element of willful misconduct). The judge argues that none of his conduct took place in a judicial capacity. The examiner acknowledges that most of Judge Saucedo's improper activities were performed away from the courtroom and were not undertaken in connection with his judicial functions or through explicit use of his judicial authority. However, the examiner contends that Judge Saucedo was acting in a judicial capacity and thus engaged in willful misconduct when he: (1) initiated the personal relationship with Tovar by meeting with her to show her the letter and create a plan of action; and (2) handed Tovar the letter in the courtroom accusing her of extortion. We agree and conclude that the judge engaged in willful misconduct in those instances and in prejudicial misconduct with respect to his other improper conduct.[11]

A judge is acting in a judicial capacity while performing one of the functions associated with the position of a judge, whether adjudicative or administrative in nature. (Broadman, supra, 18 Cal.4th at p. 1104.) When a judge is in chambers or other locations in the courthouse during working hours, the judge is "generally, though not necessarily, acting in a judicial capacity." (Dodds v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1995) 12 Cal.4th 163, 172 [48 Cal.Rptr.2d 106, 906 P.2d 1260] (Dodds).) A judge is also acting in a judicial capacity if he or she uses or attempts to use the authority of the judicial office for an improper purpose. (Ibid.)

When Judge Saucedo initially called Tovar into chambers and showed her the Anonymous letter, he specifically instructed her not to report the letter to court administration and told her that reporting the letter could result in her being fired. By so doing, the judge was acting in a supervisory capacity. One of the functions associated with judicial authority is supervising staff. (Dodds, supra, 12 Cal.4th at p. 175.) We do not believe that any reasonable person would view the judge's comments about being fired as personal advice from a friend. From Tovar's point of view, she was called into chambers and instructed to meet in the law library conference room to discuss a personnel issue. We recognize that not all conduct toward court staff is undertaken in a judicial capacity. In Dodds, the Supreme Court held the judge was not acting in a judicial capacity when he failed to report a colleague whom he observed deflate a van tire in the court parking lot, and suggested that his staff refuse to talk to the investigating officer. In reaching this conclusion, the Supreme Court first emphasized that Dodds was not acting as a supervisor when he recommended to staff that they decline to give a statement; rather, he was giving advice to a co-witness concerning an event he witnessed outside of his judicial function. In this regard, the Supreme Court stated, "To hold that petitioner acted in a judicial capacity simply because his advice carried with it a degree of authority due to his status as a judge and supervisor would mean that a judge is always acting in a judicial capacity when he talks to staff." (Ibid.) Second, the Supreme Court noted that the judge met with the detective at the courthouse only because it was a convenient meeting place the detective selected. The present case is distinguished from Dodds because Judge Saucedo was giving Tovar advice about a court personnel matter. Additionally, they met in the private room in the court library not because it was convenient, but because the judge did not want the conversation to be overheard. For these reasons, we conclude that Judge Saucedo used his judicial authority during these initial encounters for the purpose of advancing his plan to entice Tovar into developing a closer, "special" relationship with him.

[11] The masters concluded that Judge Saucedo was acting in a judicial capacity and engaged in willful misconduct concerning the extortion note, but not during the initial communications with Tovar about the Anonymous letter. For reasons discussed below, we reach a different conclusion with respect to the judge's initial communications with Tovar.

We also conclude that Judge Saucedo was acting in a judicial capacity, and thus engaged in willful misconduct when he handed Tovar the extortion note in court on November 19.

As the masters concluded, "When he handed Tovar the letter, Judge Saucedo was on the bench presiding over a court case and thus presumptively acting in a judicial capacity. He also specifically attempted to use his authority as a judge for improper ends (silencing Tovar), which necessarily supports a finding of judicial capacity." (See Dodds, supra, 12 Cal.4th at p. 172.)

Thus, we conclude that Judge Saucedo engaged in a course of highly improper conduct toward Tovar over a two-month period that constitutes willful misconduct in those instances when he was acting in a judicial capacity and prejudicial misconduct in all other instances. Even if Judge Saucedo had not been acting in a "judicial capacity" during his initial meetings with Tovar and when he handed her the extortion note, the entirety of his misconduct warrants removal. (A judge may be removed for prejudicial misconduct, as well as willful misconduct. [Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (d).])

IV.

JUDGE SAUCEDO'S DUE PROCESS AND EVIDENTIARY ARGUMENTS

A. The Investigation

Judge Saucedo asserts his due process rights were impaired because Buehler, the investigator for the Judicial Council, did not request or preserve any electronic evidence from witnesses other than Tovar. He also complains that he did not have unfettered access to some of the witnesses, including court bailiffs, court clerks and other court staff.

The judge cites no legal authority in support of his due process argument. In response to these same arguments, the masters concluded the judge did not show error or any undue prejudice to his defense. We agree.

Judge Saucedo was given full discovery after the initiation of formal proceedings and the opportunity to call any witnesses. The judge was represented by counsel during both the Judicial Council's investigation and the commission's preliminary investigation.

Judge Saucedo complains that the commission was not able to retrieve all text messages from Tovar's phone over the two-month period at issue. (Some witnesses had already deleted text messages.) He states that Tovar and other witnesses "altered" evidence by deleting text messages, and that the loss of this "critical evidence" impairs his due process rights. The judge does not suggest that the commission had anything to do with this alleged "altering" of evidence or text messages. Nor has he identified how text messages deleted by Tovar or other witnesses were "critical" to his case. (See Broadman, supra, 18 Cal.4th at p. 1108 [court rejected judge's argument that judge's due process rights were violated because of delay in interviewing witnesses where judge did not identify the testimony of any material witness whose memory was impaired by the passage of time].) Moreover, the judge has not presented proof that any text messages were deleted for nefarious reasons. In fact, the judge admitted that he regularly deletes messages on his own phone.

The judge also complains that Buehler did not ask to look at the cell phones of certain peripheral witnesses. Once again, the judge has not suggested how this would have been helpful to his case. Further, the commission is not responsible for the investigation conducted by Buehler.

Judge Saucedo also contends that the commission was biased because it only conducted a forensic search of his computer. However, the judge has not shown that there was reliable evidence that anyone else wrote the letter.

Additionally, Judge Saucedo argues that he was not given access to Tovar and Knoy and other witnesses who refused to speak with the judge. The judge was provided with witness statements from commission interviews and had the opportunity to depose up to four witnesses. The judge deposed Tovar for over seven hours, more time than permitted by commission rules. (Rule 122(g).)[12]

In Ryan v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1988) 45 Cal.3d 525, 526-529 [247 Cal.Rptr.378, 754 P.2d 724], the Supreme Court rejected the judge's claim that his due process rights were violated because the examiner admonished witnesses during the preliminary investigation that they were not to talk to anyone about the subject of the investigation, and certain witnesses refused to speak with him. The Supreme Court put the burden on the judge to show that the witnesses refused to speak with him because of the witness admonishment and how such refusal prejudiced his preparation for the hearing. Because the judge could not establish either, the Supreme Court rejected his due process argument.

In this case, Judge Saucedo does not claim that the examiner prevented the witnesses from speaking with him through an admonishment or in any other manner. Nor does he identify how his failure to speak with the witnesses prejudiced his [12] After having deposed Tovar for the full seven hours authorized by commission rule 122(g)(2)(c), Judge Saucedo made a request for an additional two hours to depose Tovar. Upon considering the request, the examiner's opposition, and the judge's reply, the commission denied the request because the judge failed to establish any specific and material area of examination he was unable to complete within the seven allotted hours or that his due process rights were impaired.

preparation for the hearing. In addition to the deposition of Tovar, the judge was provided with the statements Tovar gave to Buehler and commission staff, and cross-examined her extensively at the hearing before the special masters.

We concur with the conclusion of the masters: "Judge Saucedo had the full and fair opportunity to present his defense at the Special Masters' hearing and was at all times represented by experienced and very able counsel. There was no due process violation."

B. Uncharged Incidents

The masters found that Judge Saucedo engaged in willful misconduct with respect to two incidents that were not charged in the Notice. The first concerned the judge's meeting in chambers with Tovar to discuss the Anonymous letter on the late afternoon of Friday, September 20. In response to inquiries about why Tovar did not clock out until after 5:00 p.m., Judge Saucedo sent an email to Tovar's supervisor stating he wanted to confirm Tovar worked after 5:00 p.m. at his request and they were working on orders concerning inmate prescriptions. The examiner presented evidence refuting that they were working on prescription orders or other court matters during this after-hours meeting. The judge did not object to the introduction of this evidence at the hearing.

The second incident involved an incident report filed by Sheriff's Deputy Scott Ballantyne, a court bailiff. Judge Saucedo introduced evidence that Tovar was disciplined based on a report submitted by Ballantyne concerning a delayed release of a prisoner as a result of Tovar's clerical error. Upon learning of this report, Judge Saucedo banished Ballantyne from his courtroom during a proceeding and recommended that Ballantyne be terminated.

The examiner requests that the commission not adopt the masters' legal conclusion that the judge engaged in willful misconduct with respect to these incidents because they were not charged in the Notice. We concur and do not reach conclusions as to whether the judge engaged in misconduct with respect to either incident or consider them as a basis for discipline. (See Cannon v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications (1975) 14 Cal.3d 678, 695-696 [122 Cal.Rptr. 778, 537 P.2d 898] (Cannon); rule 128(a).)

Judge Saucedo argues that "the Examiner presenting evidence on these topics that were not contained in the Notice cannot be cured by the Examiner now rejecting those findings . . . . [T]he Commission must consider what impact this fundamentally unfair and prejudicial actions had on the entirety of the Special Masters' Findings when deciding on the appropriate level of discipline in this matter." Significantly, Judge Saucedo raised this argument for the first time in his response brief to the commission, after the issue of the masters reaching legal conclusions based on conduct not charged in the Notice was raised by the examiner in his opening brief.

There is no reasonable possibility that the incidents concerning Ballantyne and overtime pay influenced the masters' findings on the far more serious charges concerning the Anonymous letter and the inappropriate gifts to Tovar. In their 110-page report, the masters gave detailed and distinct support for their findings and conclusions on each charged incident.

Furthermore, it was the judge, not the examiner, who introduced the Ballantyne incident into the proceedings, and he did not object to the introduction of evidence concerning the overtime incident. Thus, we reject the judge's contention that he was prejudiced by the introduction of evidence on these incidents.

V.

DISCIPLINE

In determining the appropriate disciplinary sanction, we consider the purpose of commission disciplinary proceedings, which, as stated by the Supreme Court, "is not punishment, but rather the protection of the public, the enforcement of rigorous standards of judicial conduct, and the maintenance of public confidence in the integrity and independence of the judicial system." (Adams II, supra, 10 Cal.4th at p. 912.) Adherence to these objectives compels our decision to remove Judge Saucedo from office. He engaged in a calculated course of egregious misconduct involving dishonesty and subterfuge that seriously undermines the integrity of the judiciary and falls exceedingly short of the rigorous standards to which the judiciary is held.

The commission has identified several factors to consider in determining the appropriate sanction, including: the judge's honesty and integrity, the number of acts and seriousness of the misconduct, whether the judge appreciates the impropriety of the conduct, the likelihood of future misconduct, the impact of the misconduct on the judicial system, and the existence of prior discipline. (Inquiry Concerning McBrien (2010) 49 Cal.4th CJP Supp. 315, 342-345; see Inquiry Concerning Van Voorhis (2003) 48 Cal.4th CJP Supp. 257, 295; see also policy declaration 7.1.)

Foremost in our consideration of these factors is honesty and integrity. The Supreme Court stated that honesty is a "minimum qualification" that is expected of every judge." (Kloepfer v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1989) 49 Cal.3d 826, 865 [264 Cal.Rptr. 100, 782 P.2d 239].) Judge Saucedo's misconduct demonstrates a profound lack of veracity and integrity – he created a false, sexually explicit letter; lied to Tovar about the source of the letter and having intercepted the letter; and told Tovar to lie to her family, friends and court administration, all for the corrupt purpose of manipulating a subordinate employee into having a closer "emotional" relationship with him. Moreover, his deception did not stop when his conduct was reported, but continued throughout these proceedings. The masters stated, "Judge Saucedo was not truthful in the investigation or at the hearing. He refused to admit important documented facts, failed to answer direct questions, and made affirmative misrepresentations." The Supreme Court has said there are few actions that "provide greater justification for removal from office than . . . deliberately providing false information to the Commission in the course of its investigation . . . ." (Adams II, supra, 10 Cal.4th at p. 914.)

We take particularly seriously a judge's willingness to lie under oath to the three special masters appointed by the Supreme Court to make factual findings critical to our decision. In removing Judge Kelly MacEachern for misconduct involving dishonesty compounded by untruthful testimony before the special masters, we stated, "In seeking the truth, our justice system relies on the integrity of the oath. A judge who does not honor the oath to tell the truth cannot be entrusted with judging the credibility of others." (Inquiry Concerning MacEachern (2008) 49 Cal.4th CJP Supp. 289, 309 (MacEachern).)

Judge MacEachern's misconduct involved making misrepresentations about her attendance at a judicial education seminar on her claim for reimbursement and subsequent communications with the court travel coordinator. The masters found that she was untruthful in her response to the commission's investigation and in material portions of her testimony at the hearing. The commission concluded that the lack of integrity reflected in the judge's misconduct, aggravated by her subsequent untruthful statements during the commission investigation and under oath before the special masters compelled the judge's removal from office. (MacEachern, supra, 49 Cal.4th CJP Supp. at p. 293.) Other judges have also been removed based, in significant part, on a lack of veracity and integrity. (Inquiry Concerning Hall (2006) 49 Cal.4th CJP Supp. 146 [misconduct included judge signing four campaign statements under oath falsely listing herself as the source of a $20,000 campaign contribution]; Inquiry Concerning Couwenberg (2001) 48 Cal.4th CJP Supp. 205 [extensive misrepresentations to governor and commission concerning past educational, career and military history]; Inquiry Concerning Murphy (2001) 48 Cal.4th CJP Supp. 179 (Murphy) [judge lied about his ill health to remain on payroll while attending medical school in the Caribbean].)

The nature and number of acts of misconduct is another important factor in our determination of the appropriate sanction. (Policy declaration 7.1(1)(a), (b).) The number of acts of misconduct is relevant to discipline to the extent it shows isolated incidents, or a pattern that demonstrates the judge lacks judicial temperament and the " ' "ability to perform judicial functions in an even-handed manner." [Citation.]' [Citation.]" (Fletcher v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1998) 19 Cal.4th 865, 918 [81 Cal.Rptr.2d 58, 968 P.2d 958].) Judge Saucedo's misconduct involved far more than a single inappropriate text message or gift to a subordinate employee; he engaged in an ongoing course of subterfuge and dishonesty over a two-month period. The deceptive and calculated nature of the judge's conduct is incompatible with the temperament and integrity required of a judge.

Judge Saucedo contends that his conduct is less serious than the conduct of Judge Cory Woodward and Judge Scott Steiner that resulted in censures by the commission in 2014. (Censure of Judge Cory Woodward (2014); Censure of Judge Scott Steiner (2014).) Both judges were disciplined for engaging in sexual activity in chambers, Judge Woodward with his clerk and Judge Steiner with two former students in his law school class. In addition, Judge Woodward was not forthright with court administration when questioned about the nature of his relationship with his clerk. Those cases were similar to the present case in that they involved serious misconduct that was damaging to the decorum and esteem of the judicial system. However, those cases differ from the present matter in significant ways – the relationships were consensual and did not involve unwelcome advances and pressure to engage in a personal relationship, the judges did not use subterfuge and dishonesty in pursuit of the relationships, and the judges did not lie under oath about their conduct. Moreover, in both Woodward and Steiner, the commission found in mitigation that the judges acknowledged their wrongdoing and expressed great remorse and contrition. (Woodward, supra, at p. 7; Steiner, supra, at p. 6.)

Rather than show an appreciation of the serious nature of his misconduct, Judge Saucedo continues to deny the essential facts, blame Tovar for his conduct and minimize the gravity of his misconduct to a brief lapse in judgment. He apologizes for his wrongdoings, but his remorse is limited to appearing too familiar with Tovar in his effort to "mentor" her, and failing to report the Anonymous letter and Tovar's alleged "demand" for $8,000 to court administration. Even at his appearance before the commission, he continued to blame Tovar for his conduct, stating that Tovar "was asking for more and more, and [he] didn't know how to get out of the situation . . . ." This statement reflects the judge's continued denial of the fact that he was the one who offered Tovar gifts and favors for his own manipulative purposes and his failure to appreciate the gravity of his misconduct.

"A judge's failure to appreciate or admit to the impropriety of his or her acts indicates a lack of capacity to reform." (Inquiry Concerning Platt (2002) 48 Cal.4th CJP Supp. 227, 248; see policy declaration 7.1(2)(a).) It may be unlikely that Judge Saucedo would again jeopardize his career by engaging in this precise type of conduct; however, we are concerned that the traits and lack of judgment that led to the misconduct in this case could lead to future improper actions demeaning to the esteem of the judiciary. This is a risk we cannot run and still fulfill our responsibility to protect the public and the reputation of the judiciary.

Whether the misconduct undermines the integrity of the judiciary, respect for the judiciary or the administration of justice is another important factor in our consideration of the appropriate discipline. (Policy declaration 7.1(1)(h).) Judge Saucedo asserts that his conduct had no impact on the judicial system because no case or litigant was affected. This ignores the impact of his conduct on the public's perception of the judiciary. As the commission has previously noted, "The public will not, and should not, respect a judicial officer who has been shown to have repeatedly lied for his own benefit." (Murphy, supra, 48 Cal.4th CJP Supp. at p. 202.)

Judge Saucedo's plea for censure, rather than removal, focuses on his lack of prior discipline and the strong support he has earned as a judge and community leader. We recognize and appreciate the many contributions Judge Saucedo has made to his community and the legal profession, and to promoting diversity on the bench and in the legal profession. Nonetheless, his lack of prior discipline and distinguished career cannot undo his egregious misconduct in this case. While mitigating evidence may be taken into account in determining the totality of the circumstances as pertinent to determining the appropriate discipline, "[t]here can be no mitigation for maliciously motivated unjudicial conduct." (Spruance v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications (1975) 13 Cal.3d 778, 800; Cannon, supra, 14 Cal.3d at p. 707; Broadman, supra, 18 Cal.4th at p. 1112; Freedman, supra, 49 Cal.4th CJP Supp. at p. 232.) Certain misconduct is so completely at odds with the core qualities and role of a judge that no amount of mitigation can redeem the seriousness of the wrongdoing or obviate the need for removal in order to fulfill our mandate to protect the public, enforce high standards of judicial conduct, and maintain public confidence in the integrity of the judiciary. This is such a case. As such, we issue the following order removing Judge Saucedo from office.

ORDER

This decision shall constitute the order of removal of Judge Valeriano Saucedo, pursuant to the provisions of article VI, section 18 of the California Constitution; pursuant to that section of the Constitution and rules 120(a) and 136 of the Rules of the Commission on Judicial Performance, Judge Saucedo is hereby disqualified from acting as a judge.

Commission members Hon. Erica R. Yew; Ms. Mary Lou Aranguren; Hon. Thomas M. Maddock; Dr. Michael A. Moodian; Nanci E. Nishimura, Esq.; Hon. Ignazio J. Ruvolo; Mr. Richard Simpson; Ms. Sandra Talcott and Mr. Adam N. Torres voted in favor of all the findings and conclusions expressed herein and in the order of removal and disqualification. Commission member Pattyl A. Kasparian did not participate. Commission member Anthony P. Capozzi, Esq. was recused.

| INQUIRY CONCERNING JUDGE JOHN T. LAETTNER, No. 203 | DECISION AND ORDER REMOVING JUDGE JOHN T. LAETTNER FROM OFFICE |

I. INTRODUCTION

This disciplinary matter concerns Contra Costa County Superior Court Judge John T. Laettner. The commission commenced this inquiry with the filing of its Notice of Formal Proceedings on September 14, 2018.

Judge Laettner is charged with nine counts of misconduct, which, with subparts, include 28 allegations of misconduct. The allegations involve remanding criminal defendants without notice and the opportunity to be heard in two cases (Counts One and Three); three improper ex parte communications (Counts One and Two); a pattern of undignified and inappropriate comments to women (Counts Two, Four, and Five); making statements that give the appearance of prejudgment and bias (Count Six); improperly instituting a new program to address a backlog of criminal cases (Count Seven); failing to disclose and/or disqualify in some cases involving his son, who is a deputy district attorney (Count Eight); and attempting to persuade certain deputy public defenders not to file peremptory challenges against him (Count Nine).

The California Supreme Court appointed Hon. M. Kathleen Butz, Associate Justice of the Court of Appeal, Third Appellate District; Hon. Douglas Hatchimonji, Judge of the Orange County Superior Court; and Hon. Russell L. Hom, Judge of the Sacramento County Superior Court, as special masters to conduct an evidentiary hearing.

The 10-day hearing took place between February 25 and March 8, 2019, with closing arguments on April 26, 2019. The masters filed a report containing their findings of fact and conclusions of law on June 14, 2019. The commission heard oral argument on October 2, 2019.

The special masters found that the allegations in Counts One (in part), Two (in part), Three, Four (in part), Five (in part), and Nine (in part) were proven by clear and convincing evidence, and that the allegations in Counts Six, Seven, and Eight were not proven. They concluded that Judge Laettner committed willful misconduct as to Counts One (in part) (ex parte communication with a prosecutor), Three (remanding a criminal defendant without notice and an opportunity to be heard), and Nine (discouraging deputy public defenders from filing peremptory challenges); that he committed prejudicial misconduct as to Counts One (in part) (remanding a criminal defendant without notice and an opportunity to be heard), Two, Four, and Five (in part) (gender bias and inappropriate comments to and about women); and that his conduct constituted improper action as to Count Five (in part) (gender bias and inappropriate comments to and about women).

We conclude, based on our independent review of the record, that the masters' factual findings as to all counts are supported by clear and convincing evidence, and we adopt them in their entirety. We include in our decision some additional facts that are supported by clear and convincing evidence.

The masters also found that Judge Laettner was "not credible or not truthful as it relates to his testimony concerning several of the events making up this inquiry," and that "[h]is lack of candor regarding several of the allegations is troubling." We agree with, and adopt, the masters' credibility findings.

We adopt the masters' legal conclusions as to most, but not all, of the allegations. In some instances, we reach our own independent legal conclusions. We base our decision on five acts of willful misconduct and eleven acts of prejudicial misconduct that we find Judge Laettner committed.

Much of Judge Laettner's misconduct reflects a pattern of engaging with attorneys appearing before him in a manner that is governed by his emotions, rather than by the California Code of Judicial Ethics. His desire to have certain attorneys like him and not be upset or "mad at him" about his rulings, and action he has taken when he was angry or upset with them, has, at times, overridden his compliance with the canons of judicial ethics. The factual findings of the special masters suggest that Judge Laettner failed to maintain the necessary professional distance between himself and attorneys appearing before him, or that he became embroiled. "Once a judge becomes embroiled in a matter, fairness, impartiality, and the integrity of decisions leave the courtroom." (Rothman et al., Cal. Judicial Conduct Handbook (4th ed. 2017) § 1:35, p. 27 (hereafter Rothman).)

Judge Laettner has also displayed a pattern of inappropriate treatment of women in his courtroom that reflects bias based on gender, as well as physical appearance. He has taken responsibility for some, but not all, of the improper comments he was found to have made to and about women, but he has not accepted responsibility for the other misconduct that the special masters found was proven (i.e., denying criminal defendants due process, improper ex parte communications, and discussing peremptory challenges against him with the deputy public defenders who were filing them).

There is substantial evidence that, during his 13 years as a judge, Judge Laettner has had an exemplary work ethic and has been a responsible, conscientious judge, and an asset to his court. In light of this evidence, if we were to consider only his acts of willful and prejudicial misconduct, we would impose a censure. But given our mandate to uphold high standards of judicial conduct, protect the public, and preserve the integrity and impartiality of the judiciary, it is Judge Laettner's lack of candor during this proceeding, and his selective and limited acknowledgment of his misconduct, that leads us to conclude that removal from the bench is the appropriate discipline.

Judge Laettner is represented by James A. Murphy, Esq., Janet L. Everson, Esq., and Joseph S. Leveroni, Esq. of Murphy, Pearson, Bradley & Feeney in San Francisco, California. The examiners for the commission are commission trial counsel Mark A. Lizarraga, Esq. and commission assistant trial counsel Bradford Battson, Esq.

II. LEGAL STANDARDS

A. Levels of Misconduct

There are three types of judicial misconduct: willful misconduct, prejudicial misconduct, and improper action.

1. Willful Misconduct

Willful misconduct is the most serious type of misconduct. Its elements are (1) unjudicial conduct, (2) committed in bad faith, (3) by a judge acting in a judicial capacity. (Broadman v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1998) 18 Cal.4th 1079, 1091.) Unjudicial conduct occurs when a judge fails to comply with the canons of judicial ethics. (Adams v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1994) 8 Cal.4th 630, 662.) A judge acts in bad faith "by (1) performing a judicial act for a corrupt purpose (which is any purpose other than the faithful discharge of judicial duties), or (2) performing a judicial act with knowledge that the act is beyond the judge's lawful judicial power, or (3) performing a judicial act that exceeds the judge's lawful power with a conscious disregard for the limits of the judge's authority." (Broadman, supra, 18 Cal.4th at p. 1092.)

2. Prejudicial Misconduct

The second most serious type of misconduct is "conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute," also referred to as "prejudicial misconduct." (Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (d).) Prejudicial misconduct does not require bad faith; rather, it is conduct that a judge undertakes in good faith, while acting in a judicial capacity, but that nevertheless would appear to an objective observer to be not only unjudicial but prejudicial to public esteem for the judicial office. (Geiler v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications (1973) 10 Cal.3d 270, 284.)

3. Improper Action

Improper action occurs when the judge's conduct violates the canons, but the circumstances do not rise to the level of prejudicial misconduct and do not bring the judiciary into disrepute. (Inquiry Concerning Ross (2005) 49 Cal.4th CJP Supp. 79, 89, citing Adams v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1995) 10 Cal.4th 866, 897-899 (Adams II).) Improper action may be the basis for a public or private admonishment, but not censure or removal. (Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (d).)

B. Burden of Proof

The examiner has the burden of proving the charges by clear and convincing evidence. (Broadman, supra, 18 Cal.4th at p. 1090.) "Evidence of a charge is clear and convincing so long as there is a 'high probability' that the charge is true. [Citations.]" (Ibid.) Clear and convincing evidence is so clear as to leave no substantial doubt. It is sufficiently strong to command the unhesitating assent of every reasonable mind. (Ibid.)

C. Standard of Deference to Findings and Conclusions of Special Masters

The California Supreme Court has held that factual findings of the special masters are entitled to special weight because the masters were in a position to observe and assess the demeanor of the witnesses, but the legal conclusions of the masters are entitled to less deference because the commission has expertise with respect to the law concerning judicial ethics. (See Adams II, supra, 10 Cal.4th at p. 880, citing Kloepfer v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1989) 49 Cal.3d 826, 832.) Thus, if the commission reaches a contrary legal conclusion, it is free to disregard the legal conclusion of the masters. (Inquiry Concerning Freedman (2007) 49 Cal.4th CJP Supp. 223, 232.)

III. FINDINGS OF FACT AND CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

A. Count One—People v. Imlay

Judge Laettner is charged with (a) an improper ex parte communication with a law enforcement officer; (b) remanding a criminal defendant without exonerating and resetting bail in open court, and then later increasing bail in the defendant's absence and without a hearing on the appropriate bail amount, thereby failing to accord the defendant and her attorney the full right to be heard according to law; and (c) an improper ex parte communication with a prosecutor. The misconduct allegedly occurred while Judge Laettner was presiding over People v. Stephanie Imlay.

The special masters found that Judge Laettner committed willful misconduct by engaging in an improper ex parte communication with a prosecutor, but that his ex parte communication with a law enforcement officer was not misconduct. They also found that Judge Laettner committed prejudicial misconduct by failing to afford a criminal defendant and her attorney the right to be heard regarding bail.

We adopt the masters' findings of fact, as summarized below, and their conclusions of law, with one additional canon violation (3B(7)), discussed below.

1. Findings of Fact

In May 2017, Judge Laettner presided over a misdemeanor and felony arraignment courtroom in the Martinez courthouse of the Contra Costa County Superior Court, conducting arraignments and pretrial hearings. His courtroom was one of the busiest in the county, often hearing over 100 cases per day.

a. May 18, 2017

On May 18, 2017, Judge Laettner presided over People v. Stephanie Imlay, a criminal matter in which Imlay was alleged to have a diversion failure, two probation violations, a misdemeanor drug case, and a felony attempted car theft. Imlay was represented by Deputy Public Defender (DPD) Krista Della-

Piana, and had been released on bail, on all cases. That morning, before her cases were called, Imlay was found sleeping on the floor outside Judge Laettner's department. Imlay was later found asleep inside Judge Laettner's courtroom.

When DPD Della-Piana appeared in Judge Laettner's courtroom on May 18, 2017, she presented to the court an executed waiver of rights form, intending for Imlay to enter a change of plea. Judge Laettner asked DPD Della-Piana about Imlay's condition, stating: "Ms. Della-Piana, your client doesn't look like she feels too well." DPD Della-Piana responded: "She's doing okay. She's ready to proceed." Judge Laettner said he was going to have a law enforcement officer examine Imlay to determine whether she was under the influence, which would affect her ability to competently waive her rights. Operations Sergeant Garrett Schiro volunteered to perform a drug abuse recognition examination of Imlay. DPD Della-Piana was present for some or all of the examination. Sergeant Schiro formed the opinion that Imlay was under the influence of a controlled substance. He then went into Judge Laettner's chambers and told the judge his opinion. DPD Della-Piana was not present during this conversation in chambers. Judge Laettner and Sergeant Schiro returned to the courtroom, where Judge Laettner put on the record that Sergeant Schiro had performed the examination of Imlay and was of the opinion that she was under the influence, so the court was unable to proceed with the change of plea at that time.

After summarizing on the record his conversation with Sergeant Schiro, Judge Laettner remanded Imlay into custody. When Imlay was handcuffed, she became upset, loudly crying and talking directly to Judge Laettner, and protesting her remand and asking to be released. Judge Laettner indicated his belief that Imlay had been released on her own recognizance, but DPD Della-Piana told him that Imlay was out on bail. After some colloquy, Judge Laettner left the bench.

DPD Della-Piana testified that Judge Laettner did not revoke Imlay's prior bail, or raise and reset bail, in her presence, and that he did not give her a chance to be heard about bail.

Judge Laettner testified that, when he returned to the bench a few minutes later, his clerk told him that he needed to set bail in the Imlay matter. He testified that he exonerated bail and set new bail in open court, with DPD Della-Piana present. At some point, the judge's clerk prepared minute orders setting bail at $25,000 in each of Imlay's cases.

The masters found that Judge Laettner was "not credible" when he testified that he exonerated and reset Imlay's bail in open court, and in DPD Della-Piana's presence, and that he gave DPD Della-Piana a chance to be heard on bail. He testified that, although the prosecutor was at the counsel table, he called DPD Della-Piana into the well between the counsel table and the bench so that she could receive the minute orders, where he told her that he had reset bail at $25,000 on each case, and she did not object. DPD Della-Piana testified that this did not occur. The bailiff, Deputy Scott Reed, testified that the normal procedure in Judge Laettner's courtroom was to make the orders available to public defenders by putting them in a bin he had for them. The masters said Judge Laettner's stated reason for calling DPD Della-Piana into the well "rings hollow" because there was "no rational reason" for him to want to see that DPD Della-Piana got the paperwork in the well, especially since he must have assumed, at the time, that the court reporter was taking down his open court order to exonerate and reset bail. And it would have been improper for the judge to talk to the public defender in the well while opposing counsel sat at counsel table, as both sides have the right to be heard on bail.

Judge Laettner objects to this finding based on his explanation described above, which the masters found was not credible. We agree with the masters.

The masters also found that Judge Laettner was "not credible" in explaining why his order exonerating and resetting bail, which he said he had issued in open court, was not reflected in the transcript of the proceedings. He testified that he believed his court reporter, Jennifer Michel, was not present when he set bail because she was difficult to locate. But Michel was his court reporter for 11 years and, other than Imlay and another case involved in these proceedings (People v. Ventura), he could recall only one occasion when he discovered something was not in the transcript that he was sure he had said. He also testified, inconsistently, that things did not appear in the record because Michel was present but was not taking things down. The masters found no basis for believing that Judge Laettner's court reporter would not have transcribed a bail order, if he had made one in open court, and that the "only reasonable inference" from the evidence is that he did not exonerate and reset bail in open court, thereby denying the defendant the opportunity to be heard as to bail.

Judge Laettner objects to this finding based on his explanation described above, which the masters found was not credible. We agree with the masters.

b. May 25, 2017

Imlay was set for another hearing on May 25, 2017. DPD Della-Piana and another deputy public defender noticed that Imlay had not given an Arbuckle waiver[1] on the diversion case, so Judge Laettner could not sentence her on that case. They brought this to the clerk's attention. The clerk went into the judge's chambers and told him this. Judge Laettner said this meant that he could not sentence Imlay on the diversion case, and he needed to get a deputy district attorney to the other judge's courtroom to handle sentencing.

Judge Laettner asked to speak to Deputy District Attorney (DDA) Jun Fernandez in his chambers. DPD Della-Piana testified that she was in the courtroom when this occurred. Judge Laettner testified that he did not see her in the courtroom and did not know where she was. DDA Fernandez testified that DPD Della-Piana was not in the courtroom when Judge Laettner called him into chambers.

Judge Laettner testified that he told DDA Fernandez, "We can't discuss the cases," that he was going to send the diversion case to another judge, and that a deputy district attorney would be needed to cover that appearance.

DDA Fernandez testified that Judge Laettner asked him in chambers, "What do you want to do on these matters?" The court reporter, Michel, testified that she overheard the judge say to DDA Fernandez, " . . . 'so what are we going to do about the time waiver or the Arbuckle waiver,' something along those lines."

When DDA Fernandez returned to the courtroom from the judge's chambers, DPD Della-Piana asked him if he and the judge had been discussing the Imlay cases. He said that they had and that, because there was no Arbuckle waiver in one case, Judge Laettner would be sending the cases to a different judge. DDA Fernandez testified that his conversation with the judge in chambers took 30 seconds to one minute.

When Judge Laettner went back on the record, he said the clerk had brought to his attention the lack of an Arbuckle waiver on the diversion case and that he would be sending that case to a different judge. DPD Della-Piana then stated that Imlay had been "illegally detained" and asked that Imlay be released. The following exchange occurred:

> MS. DELLA-PIANA: . . . I would also like to put on the record that the court asked Jun Fernandez, the DA in this case, to go back in chambers without anyone from my office being present, discussed this case and what would happen in this case, and the Arbuckle waiver without counsel present for Ms. Imlay. [¶] So Ms. Imlay's rights are being violated multiple ways, and I'm asking that she be released immediately.

> THE COURT: Yes. [¶] Well, you really don't have any idea what I discussed with Mr. Fernandez. First off, you weren't present.
> MS. DELLA-PIANA: I do because I asked Mr. Fernandez.
> THE COURT: So we—I told Mr. Fernandez that this case was going back to Judge Mills because there was an Arbuckle problem.

DPD Della-Piana testified that on June 8, 2017 (about two weeks later), Judge Laettner discussed with her in chambers the Imlay matter and his ex parte communication with DDA Fernandez, and that he told her the reason he had not included her in his conversation in chambers with DDA Fernandez: "You want me to tell you why I—why I only brought in Jun Fernandez? I was mad at you. I was mad at you about the Imlay case. I was still mad at you that day." The masters found DPD Della-Piana's testimony on this topic to be credible. They also found that Judge Laettner's "petulant" response to DPD Della-Piana's question about the ex parte communication ("Well, you really don't have any idea what I discussed with Mr. Fernandez. First off, you weren't present.") is consistent with him being mad at her. They noted that "expressing his upset with counsel is an established pattern of conduct," which includes admitting that DPD Della-Piana was mad at him, that he "snapped" at DPD Christy Wills-Pierce, and that he was angry or upset with DPD Jermel Thomas (discussed below).

Judge Laettner objects to the masters' findings regarding his ex parte communication with DDA Fernandez. First, Judge Laettner contends that DPD Della-Piana was not present in the courtroom when he called DDA Fernandez into his chambers, which made "her inclusion [in the conversation] impossible." Although the judge, court reporter Michel, and DDA Fernandez testified that DPD Della-Piana was not in the courtroom, DPD Della-Piana testified that she was present.

The masters found it unnecessary to resolve the dispute about whether DPD Della-Piana was in the courtroom when Judge Laettner called DDA Fernandez into his chambers because, even if she had not been present at that moment, there is "no reason to believe that it was impossible or impracticable for Judge Laettner to wait until DPD Della-Piana was present in the courtroom." "Ex parte communications for scheduling, administrative purposes, and emergencies should only be used when it is impossible or impracticable to assemble everyone." (Rothman, supra, § 5:5, p. 269.)

The masters found that the evidence was clear that DPD Della-Piana was in the courtroom when the clerk took the Imlay files into the judge's chambers to discuss the lack of Arbuckle waiver, and she was in the courtroom when DDA Fernandez emerged from the judge's chambers, where he said he spent only 30 seconds to one minute. Judge Laettner could, therefore, have either had DPD Della-Piana summoned to the courtroom or waited for her to return for the impending hearing, at which she was to be present.

Second, the judge argues that the exception under canon 3B(7)(b) for ex parte communications for scheduling purposes applies because there is no evidence that the subject of the ex parte was anything other than scheduling. DDA Fernandez testified that, when the judge called him into chambers, the judge asked him what he wanted to do on the Imlay matters. He also testified that he "got the idea that it was just about procedures." Court reporter Michel heard the judge say, ". . . 'so what are we going to do about the time waiver or the Arbuckle waiver,' something along those lines." By asking DDA Fernandez, "What do you want to do on these matters?" the judge appears to have been asking how the prosecutor wanted to handle them. The masters found, and we agree, that this was more than just a question about "scheduling." Scheduling pertains to a date or time something will occur; there is no evidence that setting dates or times for anything was discussed.

But even if the ex parte communication with DDA Fernandez had been to discuss "scheduling," the masters found that Judge Laettner did not promptly disclose it, as required by canon 3B(7)(b)(ii). Judge Laettner claims he promptly disclosed the conversation to the parties, but this is inconsistent with the transcript, which reflects that it was DPD Della-Piana who brought up the ex parte communication, which she learned about from DDA Fernandez, and not the judge. And when she brought it up, the judge said: "Well, you really don't have any idea what I discussed with Mr. Fernandez. First off, you weren't present." The judge's response does not constitute prompt disclosure.

Third, Judge Laettner argues that DDA Fernandez was assisting him in his adjudicative responsibility, which is permitted by canon 3B(7)(a). Canon 3B(7)(a), however, specifically excludes the lawyers in a proceeding before the judge. DDA Fernandez was a lawyer in the proceeding.

Fourth, Judge Laettner asserts that there is no reliable evidence, "given its source [DPD Della-Piana]," that he told DPD Della-Piana on June 8, 2017 that he was "mad" at her, and contends that this is contradicted by his and Michel's testimony that his conversation in chambers with DPD Della-Piana was about restoring a good working relationship. The masters, who are in a better position to evaluate credibility, found DPD Della-Piana to be credible on this point. The commission should "give special weight to the special masters' resolution of fact issues that turn on the credibility of testimony taken in their presence." (Fitch v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1995) 9 Cal.4th 552, 557.) In addition, Michel testified that she probably heard less than a minute of the conversation between the judge and DPD Della-Piana. Contrary to what the judge contends, having a conversation about a good working relationship is consistent (and not inconsistent) with the judge discussing with DPD Della-Piana why he was upset with her, and she with him, with regard to what occurred in Imlay. It is also consistent with the judge's pattern of being overly concerned about how he is perceived by DPDs and his desire to be liked by them, and by DPD Della-Piana in particular.

Fifth, Judge Laettner says that after DPD Della-Piana accused him of having an ex parte communication with DDA Fernandez, he told Supervising Judge Theresa Canepa about the conversation, and she concluded that, because it related to scheduling only, it was proper. Judge Canepa's opinion is irrelevant, especially because it is based on Judge Laettner's (unsubstantiated) representation that he and DDA Fernandez discussed only scheduling.

We agree with, and adopt, the masters' factual findings.

2. Conclusions of law

a. May 18, 2017

The masters concluded, based on clear and convincing evidence, that Judge Laettner directed his clerk to reflect on minute orders that bail was exonerated and reset at $25,000 per case, without giving Imlay, through her counsel DPD Della-Piana, the opportunity to be heard. They took into account the busy environment of the judge's courtroom and indicated that what occurred could have been a mistake. The masters determined that the judge's action constituted prejudicial misconduct and violated California Code of Judicial Ethics canons 1 (a judge shall uphold the integrity and independence of the judiciary), 2 (a judge shall avoid impropriety and the appearance of impropriety in all of the judge's activities), 2A (a judge shall respect and comply with the law and shall act at all times in a manner that promotes public confidence in the integrity and impartiality of the judiciary), and 3B(2) (a judge shall be faithful to the law and shall maintain professional competence in the law). We find, in addition, that Judge Laettner's conduct violated canon 3B(7) (a judge shall accord to every person who has a legal interest in a proceeding, or that person's lawyer, the full right to be heard according to law).

Judge Laettner objects to the finding of prejudicial misconduct and argues that there was no misconduct. We agree with the masters that there is clear and convincing evidence that the judge remanded Imlay without exonerating and resetting bail in open court, thereby denying her and her attorney the due process right to be heard.

The examiner objects to the masters' finding of prejudicial misconduct and argues that the judge committed willful misconduct based on his knowing or reckless failure to provide defendant Imlay with due process. The examiner submits that the judge was acting in bad faith by acting with "reckless or utter indifference" as to whether his orders exceeded the bounds of his prescribed powers.

The masters found that Judge Laettner had the authority to remand Imlay; his order doing so did not exceed the bounds of his prescribed powers. The issue is whether he failed to give Imlay and her counsel, DPD Della-Piana, notice and the right to be heard on the issue of bail, a denial of due process. We agree with the masters' finding that, by failing to give notice and the right to be heard about bail, Judge Laettner engaged in conduct that was prejudicial to public esteem for the judiciary, but was not in bad faith. Based on our independent review of the record, we do not conclude that there was clear and convincing evidence that Judge Laettner had a corrupt purpose, or acted recklessly, or with utter indifference, when he revoked and reset Imlay's bail without affording Imlay, through DPD Della-Piana, the right to be heard.

The masters found that Judge Laettner did have an ex parte conversation with Sergeant Schiro in chambers, but they did not conclude that it was improper, as charged, because they found that it related to Sergeant Schiro's "aiding Judge Laettner in his adjudicative responsibilities, within the meaning of canon 3B(7)(a)." They concluded it was within Judge Laettner's discretion to have Imlay undergo a drug abuse recognition examination to ascertain her competency, and that Sergeant Schiro's communication with Judge Laettner related to assisting the judge in his adjudicative responsibilities.

The examiner objects to this conclusion and argues that the communication does not fall within the canon 3B(7) "court personnel" exception because "court personnel" excludes "employees of other governmental entities, such as lawyers, social workers, or representatives of the probation department," and Sergeant Schiro was an employee of the Contra Costa County Sheriff's Department, an "other governmental entity." The examiner asserts that, although Sergeant Schiro was the court security supervisor who oversaw the bailiffs' activities, he was not one of the judge's bailiffs.

Bailiffs are expressly permitted to assist the judge under canon 3B(7). The judge's bailiff during the Imlay proceedings, Deputy Scott Reed, was not qualified to conduct the drug examination, so Sergeant Schiro offered to perform it. We find that, because Sergeant Schiro was acting as the court security supervisor overseeing the bailiffs, who are also employees of the Sheriff's Department, he was properly assisting the judge in carrying out his adjudicative responsibilities, which include determining whether a defendant is competent to waive her rights. (Cal. Judges Benchbook: Felony Arraignment and Pleas (CJER revised 2013); Benchguide No. 91, § 91:26.) Further, we find that Sergeant Schiro conveyed information to the judge that was consistent with the proper performance of his duties, and that the judge promptly disclosed his communication with Sergeant Schiro to DPD Della-Piana. We concur with the masters' conclusion that the judge's ex parte communication with Sergeant Schiro does not constitute misconduct.

b. May 25, 2017

The masters concluded that Judge Laettner committed willful misconduct by engaging in an ex parte communication with DDA Fernandez in chambers about the Imlay cases, in violations of canons 1, 2, 2A, 3B(2), 3B(4) (a judge shall be patient, dignified, and courteous to those with whom the judge deals in an official capacity), and 3B(7) (a judge shall not initiate, permit, or consider ex parte communications, that is, any communications to or from the judge outside the presence of the parties concerning a pending or impending proceeding). They found that there was no reason for the judge to have talked to DDA Fernandez without DPD Della-Piana present. Although Judge Laettner argued that the ex parte communication with DDA Fernandez involved only scheduling, the masters found that the judge and DDA Fernandez talked about more than scheduling because DDA Fernandez testified that the judge asked, "What do you want to do about these matters?" and the court reporter heard the judge say something similar. Judge Laettner also did not promptly notify DPD Della-Piana about the conversation. The masters found that his subsequent statement to DPD Della-Piana that he was "mad at her" demonstrated that he knowingly engaged in the ex parte communication for a corrupt purpose, which is any purpose other than the faithful discharge of judicial duties.

Judge Laettner posits that this ex parte communication is analogous to the ex parte communication he had with Sergeant Schiro, which the masters found was not improper. The difference between the two ex parte communications is that Judge Laettner had the ex parte communication with DDA Fernandez for an improper purpose—because he was mad at DPD Della-Piana. Moreover, Judge Laettner did not initially promptly disclose the ex parte communication with DDA Fernandez; it was DPD Della-Piana who raised it with him. In contrast, the ex parte communication with Sergeant Schiro was for the legitimate purpose of conducting court business, and it was promptly disclosed, as required.

We agree with, and adopt, the masters' legal conclusions.

B. Count Two—Treatment of Deputy Public Defender Della-Piana

Judge Laettner is charged, in six subcounts, with engaging in a pattern of conduct toward DPD Della-Piana that was unwelcome, undignified, discourteous, and offensive, and that would reasonably be perceived as sexual harassment or sexual discrimination.

The special masters found that five of the six subcounts were proven and that Judge Laettner's conduct toward DPD Della-Piana, taken as a whole, constituted prejudicial misconduct because the incidents involve conduct that is undignified, discourteous, and offensive, and brings disrepute to the bench. They further found that much of Judge Laettner's conduct in Count Two (except subcount 2B), as well as in Counts Four (except subcount 4C) and Five, taken as a whole, constituted gender bias, in violation of canon 3B(5)(a). They did not find sexual harassment.

In response to Judge Laettner's assertion that "maintaining collegial relationships among the criminal justice partners is essential for the orderly administration of justice in criminal courts," the masters stated that it is the relationship between opposing counsel in criminal courts that allows for the efficient and effective administration of court calendars, and it is appropriate for the court to seek to foster that working relationship, but "[d]eputy district attorneys and deputy public defenders are not partners nor are they colleagues of the court, to the extent that these terms imply an equality of relationship." The masters stated:

> The Special Masters are not suggesting that judges must be unsmiling imperious souls. The Special Masters recognize that in these courtrooms judges are witnesses to a wide range of human emotion among the litigants and the attorneys that appear before the court. Judges must view and manage this drama with understanding, empathy, humor, and flexibility, with a calm and steadying hand—but always positionally aware—aware of the proper role of the judge.

The masters found that Judge Laettner's misconduct was "the failure to be aware of and adhere to the boundaries attending with his position as a judge."

We adopt the masters' findings of fact, which are summarized below, in each of the six subcounts. We also agree with the masters' conclusions of law as to the canons violated. We respectfully disagree, however, with the masters' conclusion that all five of the proven subcounts constitute prejudicial misconduct and find that three subcounts (subcounts 2D, 2E and 2F) constitute willful misconduct, for the reasons discussed below.

(a) Count 2A: "Having a teenage daughter"

1. Findings of Fact

Judge Laettner admitted that, in approximately May 2016, he said to DPD Della-Piana words to the effect of, "Sometimes having you in here is like having a teenage daughter—you constantly argue with me and you just keep talk, talk, talking until you get what you want," followed by: "It's a compliment. Take a compliment." This was said outside another judge's chambers. Judge Laettner testified that he made the comment during a "friendly teasing conversation" in which his comment started as a joke, but then he told her it was a compliment because "maybe [he] wasn't getting the response that [he] expected." He testified that he did not think the comment was demeaning because of the context of their interaction and his rapport with DPD Della-Piana at the time.

DPD Della-Piana testified that the "teenage daughter" comment made her feel demeaned and that her "face definitely showed that [she] didn't care for that."

Neither party objects to these factual findings.

2. Conclusions of Law

The masters concluded that Judge Laettner's "teenage daughter" comment was undignified and inconsistent with the judge's obligation to maintain high standards of conduct, but that it would not be reasonably perceived as sexual harassment or discrimination, as charged. They stated that Judge Laettner's reference to a "teenage daughter" who just "keep[s] talk, talk, talking" "invokes a stereotypical image of a young, immature, adolescent girl," and that it "is inconceivable that a young professional female attorney would interpret such a comparison as a compliment." The masters further found that, intended or not, there is a gender element to the judge's stereotypical statement, as no one would ever say, "You're like a teenage son. You just keep talk, talk, talking . . . ." (Italics in masters' report.)

They found that Judge Laettner violated canons 1, 2, 2A, 3B(4), and 3B(5)(a). The masters included this charge in their conclusion that Judge Laettner's conduct in Count Two constituted prejudicial misconduct.

Neither party objects to these legal conclusions, and we adopt them.

(b) Count 2B: Winking

Judge Laettner allegedly winked at DPD Della-Piana during a hearing and called her to the bench to ask her if she saw him winking at her.

The masters found that this allegation was not proven by clear and convincing evidence.

Neither party objects to the factual findings or legal conclusion. We adopt the masters' findings and their conclusion that there is not clear and convincing evidence of the alleged misconduct.

(c) Count 2C: "I want it to be you"

1. Findings of Fact

On August 24, 2016, Judge Laettner presided over In re Lauryn G., a case involving a juvenile. DPD Karen Moghtader represented Lauryn G., but asked DPD Della-Piana to appear for her because she had a meeting. DPD Della-Piana appeared for DPD Moghtader before Judge Laettner. DPD Della-Piana testified that when she told the judge that DPD Moghtader would be able to appear after her meeting, he said, "No, I want it to be you," and when DPD Della-Piana responded, "I don't think you really get to decide that," Judge Laettner sort of smiled at her and said, "Well, I'm telling you I want it to be you."

After the case was called, there was a discussion about setting the date of a contested probation violation hearing. DPD Della-Piana refused to waive Lauryn G.'s right to a speedy hearing. The following exchange occurred:

> THE CLERK: Last day is September 15.
> MS. DELLA-PIANA: I don't know if there needs to be a lot of prep since it was already prepped. Can we do it earlier than that? Ms. Moghtader is out the 15th and 16th. Any other day works. [¶] The Monday of that week maybe? No?
>
> THE COURT: No, no, we'll set it for the 15th given my schedule. Somebody else is going to have to cover.
>
> THE CLERK: Thursday, September the 15th at 1:30 in Department 25.
> (Italics in masters' report.)

DPD Della-Piana testified that, during this discussion, the judge locked eyes with her, "sort of tilted his head," and said, "Well, I guess someone else is just going to have to appear." She testified that this comment and "No, I want it to be you" made her uncomfortable.

Judge Laettner testified that he believed DPD Della-Piana was Lauryn G.'s assigned attorney, not DPD Moghtader. He said: "Well, there was, in my mind, confusion as to who Lauryn G.'s attorney was. I believed her attorney was Ms. Della-Piana. And then there were [sic] Ms. Moghtader got into the mix somehow." He also testified that it was his preference that the assigned attorney appear because a stand-in attorney does not know the case.

Judge Laettner also testified that he set September 15 as the next hearing date because it was the best date on his personal calendar, there was no time waiver, he did not expect DPD Della-Piana to be at the date set, and her testimony about his tone was "fantasy."

The special masters found "not credible" Judge Laettner's testimony that, on August 24, 2016, he was confused about whom Lauryn G.'s attorney was. The transcript reflects that DPD Della-Piana announced that she was "standing in for Karen Moghtader," and that she referred to DPD Moghtader and her unavailability on September 15 and 16 as a reason to set the hearing on a different date. Further, the transcript of the hearing the day before reflects that DPD Moghtader had appeared before Judge Laettner, representing Lauryn G., and had engaged in substantive discussions with him about the case, including the issuance of a warrant. The judge referenced those discussions when DPD Della-Piana appeared in DPD Moghtader's place the next day. Finally, DPD Della-Piana later wrote down what occurred in court that day from memory, without the benefit of a transcript. The masters found that the unexplained contradiction between the judge's stated preference for having the assigned attorney present and then setting the hearing on a date when the assigned attorney was not available corroborates DPD Della-Piana's belief that Judge Laettner wanted her to appear.

Judge Laettner objects to the masters' finding that his testimony that he was confused about who represented Lauryn G. was not credible, and says he was credible.

We agree with, and adopt, the masters' findings, including that Judge Laettner was not credible when he testified that he was confused about who represented Lauryn G. DPD Moghtader had appeared on Lauryn G.'s behalf the previous day and engaged in substantive discussions with the judge about her case. And DPD Della-Piana informed Judge Laettner at the outset of the hearing that she was "standing in" for DPD Moghtader and referred to DPD Moghtader's availability when discussing scheduling with the judge. We agree with the masters that the judge's claim is contradicted by the evidence.

2. Conclusions of Law

The masters concluded that the judge's conduct violated canons 1, 2A, 3B(4), and 3B(5)(a). The masters included this charge in their conclusion that Judge Laettner's conduct in Count Two constituted prejudicial misconduct.

Neither party objects to these legal conclusions, and we adopt them.

(d) Count 2D: Conversation regarding In re Eric B.

1. Findings of Fact

Judge Laettner presided over In re Eric B., which involved a mentally ill juvenile. DPD Della-Piana represented Eric B. Juvenile proceedings had been suspended due to Eric B.'s incompetency, and he was receiving treatment or competency restoration services in juvenile hall. A hearing in August 2016 involved whether Judge Laettner would order the involuntary administration of medication to Eric B., to which DPD Della-Piana objected.

On October 6, 2016, Judge Laettner released Eric B. from custody to his mother, deemed his sentence satisfied, and set a future competency review date for January 5, 2017.

On October 12, 2016, while DPD Della-Piana was conversing in the courthouse hallway outside Judge Laettner's courtroom with a prospective juror she knew, Judge Laettner approached them, in what he described as "basically a sea of jurors," and initiated a conversation with DPD Della-Piana. He testified that he spoke to DPD Della-Piana because, in his words: "I wanted to make sure everything was okay, because I knew she had been frustrated with Eric B. being in custody for a long time. And I wanted to say in general terms that I was not insensitive to people who are mentally ill." He denied that he discussed the Eric B. case during the conversation and said, "I went to the issue of mental health generally with her."

DPD Della-Piana testified that Judge Laettner did bring up the Eric B. case, and said he was aware that she was upset with him about the Eric B. case and that she should not be upset with him.

The examiner objects that the masters did not make a finding regarding allegations that the judge commented to DPD Della-Piana that he noticed how happy she was when he ordered Eric B. released from custody, and that he said he could tell by her face that she was happy when he did so. Judge Laettner testified that he did not discuss the Eric B. case with DPD Della-Piana and that he only discussed mental health generally. While we agree that Judge Laettner was obviously discussing the Eric B. case, we do not find it necessary to amplify the masters' findings here to include DPD Della-Piana's additional testimony regarding this conversation (see Count 2F).

2. Conclusions of Law

The masters concluded that the conversation Judge Laettner initiated with DPD Della-Piana in the courthouse hallway constituted an improper ex parte communication, in violation of canon 3B(7), because the matter was still pending, with a future competency review date that the judge had set six days earlier.

The masters also found that Judge Laettner did specifically reference the Eric B. case during the conversation, and, even if he did not say the name of the case, it was apparent that he was talking about that case. They stated that "any reasonable trial lawyer would perceive Judge Laettner's comments under such circumstances as not simply a coincidental happenstance," and that "[a] reasonable attorney would immediately realize that, by bringing up the subject matter of a case the attorney was frustrated about and that had just been heard six days before, the judge is talking about that specific case." The masters said that it "belies common sense to think that Judge Laettner and DPD Della-Piana did not know they were talking about the Eric B. case, even if the minor's name was not used."

The masters further found that the conversation was undignified and created the appearance of impropriety because it took place amongst "a sea of jurors," who had been before Judge Laettner and knew he was the judge before whom they were providing their jury service. The masters stated that the judge's desire to make sure things were "okay" with DPD Della-Piana after the contentious Eric B. hearing reflected a "solicitousness for her and their relationship that was inappropriate to express in a public hallway."

They found that the conversation violated canons 1, 2, 2A, 3B(4), 3B(5)(a), and 3B(7). They included this charge in their conclusion that Judge Laettner's conduct as alleged in Count Two constituted prejudicial misconduct.

We respectfully disagree with the conclusion that Judge Laettner's hallway ex parte conversation with DPD Della-Piana in a "sea of jurors" about the Eric B. case constituted prejudicial misconduct; instead, we find that it constituted willful misconduct, as urged by the examiner, because Judge Laettner was not acting in the faithful discharge of his judicial duties. In Inquiry Concerning Kreep (2017) 3 Cal.5th CJP Supp. 1, the commission found that it was willful misconduct for Judge Kreep to engage in ex parte communications with attorneys about a pending case for the corrupt purpose of venting his frustration about being the subject of peremptory challenges. (See also, Inquiry Concerning Van Voorhis (2003) 48 Cal.4th CJP Supp. 257, 275 [comments made for the purpose of venting frustration are for a purpose other than the faithful discharge of judicial duties].) Similarly, in this matter, Judge Laettner engaged in an improper ex parte communication about a pending case with an attorney in that case—DPD Della-Piana—in a public venue for a purpose not related to his judicial duties; i.e., his "solicitousness for her and their relationship" and his excessive concern about how she felt about him, which creates the appearance of a lack of impartiality. We find it aggravating that Judge Laettner indulged in this type of conversation with a DPD in a public hallway in the presence of jurors serving in his courtroom.

(e) Count 2E—"Your parents hadn't spanked you enough"

1. Findings of Fact

On June 8, 2017, Judge Laettner asked his clerk to ask DPD Della-Piana to speak with him. The judge and DPD Della-Piana then had a conversation in his chambers. Judge Laettner admitted that, during this conversation, he called DPD Della-Piana a “hard one” and told her, “[Y]our parents hadn’t spanked you enough.” At the evidentiary hearing, he acknowledged that it was wrong and apologized because it was something he should not have said.

Judge Laettner said he made the comments because he felt DPD Della-Piana was being “stubborn, unreasonable and petulant,” and he wanted to resolve a misunderstanding and she did not. He testified that, after the Imlay hearing on May 18, 2017, his relationship with DPD Della-Piana was strained and that she was upset with him. He said he had seen her the day before, on June 7, and she was ignoring him and “didn’t say hi or didn’t acknowledge [him] on purpose.” He testified that he wanted to “correct her attitude” because he does not want to see people who are upset, and he wants people to be happy. He also said that the purpose of his conversation with DPD Della-Piana was to “try to mend the fences, smooth things over, so she could be comfortable coming back to [his] court if she wanted to.” He also said he was “a little bit exasperated” with her because he wanted a “truce,” but she did not.

DPD Della-Piana testified that, during this conversation, Judge Laettner said a lot of things, including that he did not want things to be bad between them, that he had been thinking a lot about the other day, that she was so mad at him about the Imlay case, and that he did not want her to be mad at him anymore. She stated: “I knew he was referring to Imlay. And my understanding was that he thought we were in a fight with each other and that we needed to make up. And he sort of wanted to know, did I still care and like him and wanted to kind of pull me back in and make sure I was good with him and close with him.” DPD Della-Piana described Judge Laettner as appearing to be “pretty frantic and emotional” during this conversation.

DPD Brooks Osborne testified that he saw DPD Della-Piana on June 8, 2017, and she told him that Judge Laettner had just told her that her parents did not spank her enough. DPD Osborne said she was “ashen” and “looked horrified.”

Judge Laettner twice denied discussing the Imlay cases with DPD Della-Piana during this conversation. The masters, however, found that Judge Laettner's testimony was impeached by his Answer to the Notice of Formal Proceedings, in which he "does not deny a conversation with Ms. Della-Piana regarding the People v. Imlay cases." And he testified that, during this conversation, he told DPD Della-Piana that his conversation with DDA Fernandez about Imlay was not an impermissible ex parte communication, which is inconsistent with his testimony that he did not talk to her about the Imlay cases during their conversation in chambers.

The examiner contends that additional facts regarding what Judge Laettner said to DPD Della-Piana during this conversation, which were alleged in the Notice of Formal Proceedings, should be included in the findings. We find that the masters' description of DPD Della-Piana's testimony regarding what Judge Laettner said adequately conveys her testimony.

2. Conclusions of Law

The masters concluded that Judge Laettner's June 8, 2017 conversation with DPD Della-Piana was "injudicious, inappropriate and undignified," and constituted an improper ex parte communication concerning Imlay, in violation of canon 3B(7). They stated that calling an attorney a "hard one" or saying that the attorney's parents did not "spank you enough" is contrary to the judge's ethical obligations. They noted that conveying to an attorney that his or her feelings about a judge's decision are relevant to the judge gives the appearance of partiality, suggests embroilment, and is undignified. They added that Judge Laettner's purpose for calling DPD Della-Piana to his chambers—to "mend fences" over his decision in Imlay—demonstrated that her upset over his decision was of significant enough import that he expressed his frustration by calling her a "hard one" and saying she had not been "spanked enough." They found that Judge Laettner's conduct violated canons 1, 2A, 3B(4), 3B(5)(a), and was prejudicial, but they did not find that it could reasonably be perceived as sexual harassment, as charged, because DPD Della-Piana did not express that the judge's comments were offensive as sexual harassment.

We agree with the masters' conclusion that Judge Laettner initiated a conversation with DPD Della-Piana that constituted an improper ex parte communication, in violation of canon 3B(7), because they discussed the pending Imlay cases. We also agree with the other canon violations found. We respectfully disagree with the masters, however, that Judge Laettner's ex parte communication with DPD Della-Piana, in which he discussed the Imlay cases, was prejudicial misconduct and find that, because he initiated the conversation for a purpose not related to the faithful discharge of his judicial duties, his actions constituted willful misconduct. As discussed above, Judge Laettner made the improper comments to DPD Della-Piana because he cared excessively about how DPD Della-Piana perceived him, a motive that was personal rather than a part of his judicial duties, and created the appearance of partiality.

(f) Count 2F: "I know you're mad at me"

1. Findings of Fact

DPD Della-Piana testified that, approximately 10 to 15 times in 2016 and 2017, Judge Laettner asked her to approach the bench to check in to see if she was mad at him. She testified:

> But usually when he ruled against me, I would sort of know that that was coming next. And he would want to debrief, almost as if we were having like a relationship fight or something . . . Like a relationship talk. And he wanted reassurance that I wasn't mad at him. Or he would often comment on my facial expressions, the facial expressions I would make during the hearing. 'Say, you know, I noticed that you were really happy when I said this.' Or 'you didn't like when I said this. I could tell from your face,' and comment how well he knew and could read my facial expressions and how that affected him essentially.

Judge Laettner admitted that he understood that DPD Della-Piana was mad at him at times and does not deny that he probably acknowledged that to DPD Della-Piana.

Neither party objects to these factual findings.

2. Conclusions of Law

The masters concluded that Judge Laettner's conduct violated canons 1, 2A, and 3B(4), and was part of a pattern of undignified, discourteous, and offensive conduct toward women, constituting gender bias in breach of canon 3B(5)(a). The masters included this charge in their conclusion that Judge Laettner's conduct in Count Two constituted prejudicial misconduct. They stated that attempting to "smooth over" the anger or upset of counsel resulting from a judge's decision "gives the appearance that counsel's emotional response to a decision matters," which illustrates a solicitousness that suggests embroilment. They noted that the United States Supreme Court has stated that judges are to represent the "impersonal authority of law" and provide "that atmosphere of austerity . . . indispensable for an appropriate sense of responsibility on the part of court, counsel and jury." (Offutt v. United States (1954) 348 U.S. 11, 17 [99 L.Ed. 11]; quoted in Rothman, supra, § 2:1, pp. 58-59.)

We respectfully conclude that Judge Laettner's repeated summoning of DPD Della-Piana to the bench to discuss their relationship was willful misconduct because it was for a purpose unrelated to his judicial duties, which was to make sure she was happy with how he was discharging his judicial duties. This is improper because it creates the appearance of partiality and is inconsistent with his duty to remain neutral as to those appearing before him. We find it aggravating that Judge Laettner did this frequently in open court, where his preference for DPD Della-Piana could be perceived by others in his courtroom.

C. Count Four—Treatment of Other Female Attorneys[2]

Judge Laettner is charged, in eight subcounts, with making unwelcome, undignified, discourteous, and offensive comments, some of which would reasonably be perceived as sexual harassment or sexual discrimination, to and about other female attorneys who appeared before him.[3]

The masters found that seven of the eight subcounts in Count Four were proven, except that they did not find sexual harassment or sexual discrimination. Concluding that Judge Laettner's treatment of the various female attorneys involved, taken as a whole, constituted prejudicial misconduct, they stated:

> Lady Justice wears a blindfold. Centuries ago, William Penn explained: "Justice is justly represented Blind, because she sees no Difference in the Parties concerned." (William Penn, Fruits of Solitude, The Harvard Classics (1909-14), Part. I, "Impartiality," No. 407.) [¶] Saying that a female attorney is beautiful or otherwise commenting upon her looks lifts Lady Justice's blindfold by suggesting that one of a person's immutable characteristics, her appearance, matters to the judge; suggesting that the judge is partial to the woman he has declared to be beautiful. Even though the judge may have meant the comment to be an innocent courteous compliment, intended to create and maintain a "friendly" and "collegial atmosphere," does not excuse such a statement. Whether the recipient of the comment was offended or made uncomfortable, as in the case of DPD Emi Young, or not, as in the case of DDA Devon Bell, is not the issue upon which the propriety of the statement turns. The reason a judge's declaration that someone is beautiful or attractive is misconduct is due not only to its > effect on the person to whom the comment was directed, but also because of the potential impact the statement has upon those who may not perceive themselves as attractive or beautiful. If two attorneys appear before a judge, and one attorney perceives herself to be unattractive, and the judge says to the other attorney, "Here is the beautiful Ms. Bell," it is reasonable for the other attorney to question the fairness and impartiality of the judge. [¶] . . . That the attorneys noted and took advantage of Judge Laettner's favoritism is corrosive to the fair and impartial administration of justice.

[2] We address Counts Four and Five after Count Two because all three concern Judge Laettner's improper treatment of women. Count Three, which involves an unrelated issue, follows the discussion of Count Five.

They also noted, in connection with subcount 4F: "Unprofessional remarks made in the courtroom concerning an attorney's personal appearance, pregnancy, or sexuality, can have an impact on the credibility of women in court; and when addressed to a woman lawyer, such remarks would make it difficult for her to effectively represent her clients." (Rothman, supra, § 2:11, p. 75 ["Judges should not make unprofessional remarks concerning an attorney's personal appearance, pregnancy, or sexuality."].)

The masters found it relevant that Judge Laettner's conduct spanned 11 years, from 2006 to 2017, because, after 10 years on the bench, "it can be expected that a judge's words and conduct will have conformed to the demands of the canons." They found that Judge Laettner's words and conduct did not.

We adopt the masters' findings of fact, which are summarized below, and their conclusions of law as to each of the eight subcounts.

(a) Count 4A: Comments to DPD Sarah MonPere

1. Findings of Fact

DPD Sarah MonPere testified that, between October 2007 and June 2008, Judge Laettner made various comments to her and very frequently asked her personal questions, including whether she had a boyfriend. After a colleague appeared in court with a client who had a fussing infant, and DPD MonPere held the baby while the client finished her plea, Judge Laettner commented, on more than one occasion, about how natural DPD MonPere looked holding the baby, and asked her if she wanted to have children. He also called her his "favorite" and "teacher's pet," and said something to the effect that she "had him on a chain," implying that she controlled him or could get him to do what she wanted.

DPD Nicole Eiland testified that she heard Judge Laettner ask DPD MonPere personal questions and refer to DPD MonPere as his "favorite" more than once. She also testified that he favored DPD MonPere, and she viewed the judge's behavior toward DPD MonPere as "very flirtatious." DPD Osborne testified that he heard Judge Laettner tell DPD MonPere that he "could not say 'no' to her," that it was obvious that DPD MonPere was the judge's favorite, and that it seemed like he treated her and her clients differently. DPD Matthew Cuthbertson testified that Judge Laettner interacted differently with DPD MonPere, in sort of a flirtatious manner.

Judge Laettner denied most of the alleged comments to DPD MonPere, and claimed he had a "purely professional" relationship with her, but he admitted that he would compliment her on occasion for the purpose of "building her confidence" and thinks he did refer to her as his "favorite."

Neither party objects to these factual findings.

2. Conclusions of Law

The masters concluded that Judge Laettner made the statements attributed to him by DPD MonPere, in violation of canons 1, 2A, 2B(1) (a judge shall not allow family, social, political, or other relationships to influence the judge's judicial conduct or judgment, nor shall a judge convey or permit others to convey the impression that any individual is in a special position to influence the judge), 3B(4), and 3B(5)(a). They found that his statements were "inappropriate and lacked any appearance of impartiality."

Judge Laettner objects on the ground that this count is barred by the statute of limitations because the comments were made before January 1, 2013, the cut-off date for the statute of limitations (six years before the commencement of the judge's current term, which was January 1, 2019). (Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (d).) Due to the statute of limitations, we consider this subcount only for purposes of evaluating the judge's honesty during this proceeding (see footnote 3), and we need not address whether we adopt the masters' legal conclusion as to the level of misconduct.

(b) Count 4B: Comment to DPD Kim Mayer about her husband

1. Findings of Fact

DPD Kim Mayer testified that, in 2012 to 2013, Judge Laettner asked her to approach the bench and commented that he had just found out to whom she was married and that he was the same age as her husband, in a tone that was "somewhat suggestive" or "just inappropriate." This made her uncomfortable because her husband is 14 years older than she is, and it felt like Judge Laettner was comparing himself to her husband.

Judge Laettner testified: "I called her up to the bench in one of our slow moments, and I said, 'I just found out that you're married to Oscar Bobrow.' And she said, 'Yes, yes, I am.' And I said something to the effect of, 'He's a little bit older than you.' Something like that. And she said, 'Yes.' And that was really it. You know, it was just commenting on that. And I had told her also that I did a felony possession trial with him." (Italics in masters' report.)

2. Conclusions of Law

The masters found DPD Mayer's testimony credible and that Judge Laettner indeed made the comment to DPD Mayer that he was the same age as her husband. The comment violated Judge Laettner's duty to be dignified and courteous, and the suggestive nature of the comment was part of a pattern of conduct that would reasonably be perceived as gender bias, in violation of canons 1, 2, 3B(4), and 3B(5)(a).

Judge Laettner objects that this allegation is barred by the statute of limitations because it occurred in 2012, before the January 1, 2013 cut-off date. DPD Mayer testified that she believes Judge Laettner took over the calendar in 2013, but Judge Laettner testified that the comment occurred in 2012. We agree with the judge that the comment is barred by the statute of limitations. We consider this subcount only for purposes of evaluating the judge's honesty during this proceeding (see footnote 3), and we need not address whether we adopt the masters' legal conclusion as to the level of misconduct.

(c) Count 4C: Poor demeanor toward DPD Kim Mayer

During a March 11, 2013 hearing in People v. Jacob Pastega, Judge Laettner allegedly reprimanded DPD Mayer for interrupting him, demeaned her by asking if she knew what a proffer was, and told her not to argue with him.

The masters found that there were interruptions and interjections during the hearing, but that there was not clear and convincing evidence that Judge Laettner committed misconduct.

The examiner argues that the judge's comments constitute prejudicial misconduct because they were sarcastic and belittling, contrary to canon 3B(4). The masters found that the comments do not rise to the level of misconduct because the words on their face seem de minimis at most, and there is no evidence that the tone used by the judge was sarcastic or belittling. We adopt the masters' conclusion and find no misconduct.

(d) Count 4D: Poor demeanor toward DPD Christy Wills-Pierce

1. Findings of Fact

Judge Laettner presided over People v. Henry Williams on November 1, 2013. DPD Christy Wills-Pierce represented the defendant. Judge Laettner admitted that, after DPD Wills-Pierce questioned him about the basis for drug testing the defendant, he snapped at her and replied: "Our prior discussions with regard to this case. I know you're coming in late [to the case]. I'm not going to pretry every case all over again because you're here today." After the hearing, he called DPD Wills-Pierce up to the bench and said that he was sorry he was mad earlier, but it was DPD Wills-Pierce's friend who had made him so mad. When DPD Wills-Pierce asked him whom he meant, he said, "Ms. Thomas," referring to her colleague, DPD Jermel Thomas.

DPD Thomas testified that DPD Wills-Pierce told her about this, which embarrassed her, and she went to Judge Laettner's chambers that day to ask him whether he had said, "Ms. Thomas makes me so angry and she makes me so upset and so mad." Judge Laettner told DPD Thomas that he had said that to DPD Wills-Pierce and that she does make him upset.

Judge Laettner testified that, "I think I snapped at her [DPD Wills-Pierce] because I didn't want to spend two hours going over every case we just pre-tried." He admitted calling DPD Wills-Pierce to the bench and apologizing to her, and that he probably told her that he was mad at her friend, DPD Thomas. Yet on cross-examination, Judge Laettner testified that he did not remember making the statement.

Neither party objects to these factual findings.

2. Conclusions of Law

The masters found that Judge Laettner's conduct violated canons 1, 2, 2A, 3B(4), and 3B(5)(a). The masters included this charge in their conclusion that Judge Laettner's conduct in Count Four constituted prejudicial misconduct.

Neither party objects to these legal conclusions.

(e) Count 4E: Comments to DPD Nicole Herron

1. Findings of Fact

Between 2014 and 2017, Judge Laettner repeatedly told DPD Nicole Herron that she looked like an actress named Caroline Catz, who appeared on the television show, "Doc Martin." DPD Herron testified that Judge Laettner referred to Catz and the show about 12 to 20 times during DPD Herron's weekly appearances in his department, often saying, "I saw you on TV last night."

DPD Herron testified that, when Judge Laettner mentioned the show, he seemed "overly excited," and that his comments felt "creepy" to her. The comments made her uncomfortable because they were about her physical appearance and were made in open court, where other people could hear them, including clients who later commented to her about the judge's statements.

The judge's court reporter, Jennifer Michel, testified that she could tell that the judge's questions made DPD Herron uncomfortable.

Judge Laettner also commented in 2014 and 2015 that DPD Herron "was someone I just can't say no to," was the "best attorney" in the public defender's office or the juvenile court, and his "favorite attorney." He said to her, "I just can't say no to you" about five to ten times.

Judge Laettner did not deny offering these "compliments." He admitted telling DPD Herron that she bore a physical resemblance to Caroline Catz and that he talked about the show with her a few times.

Neither party objects to these factual findings.

2. Conclusions of Law

The masters found that Judge Laettner's repeated comments about DPD Herron's physical appearance were undignified and discourteous, would reasonably be perceived as gender bias, and conveyed the impression that DPD Herron was in a special position to influence him, in violation of canons 1, 2, 2A, 2B(1), 3B(4), and 3B(5)(a). The masters included this charge in their determination that Judge Laettner's conduct in Count Four constituted prejudicial misconduct. They concluded, however, that the judge did not commit sexual harassment (canon 3B(5)(b)), as defined in Hughes v. Pair (2009) 46 Cal.4th 1035,1042-1043, because sexual harassment requires a finding that the harassing conduct was "severe enough or sufficiently pervasive to alter the conditions of employment and create a work environment that qualifies as hostile or abusive to employees because of their sex." The masters found that, given the conflicting testimony about the number of times Judge Laettner made the comments and the lack of evidence that he described the physical appearance of the actress, his "acts of alleged sexual harassment fall short of establishing a pattern of continuous, sufficiently pervasive harassment, necessary to show a hostile working environment under FEHA [Fair Employment and Housing Act]."

Neither party objects to these legal conclusions.

(f) Count 4F: Comments about DDA Devon Bell

1. Findings of Fact

DDA Devon Bell was the grand jury coordinator for the district attorney's (DA's) office. Once Judge Laettner selected a grand jury, DDA Bell would go to his courtroom and take the grand jurors back to the DA's office, where the grand jury hearings took place.

On about five or six occasions, in the presence of grand jurors, Judge Laettner referred to DDA Bell as "beautiful" or "lovely," and said she was a member of the DA's volleyball team. He also referred to her as one of his "favorite" attorneys, and said that because he had married her and her husband, he liked to say, "I married Ms. Bell." Transcripts corroborate these remarks.

Judge Laettner testified that the reason he discussed DDA Bell with the grand jurors was because he wanted to tell them that she was "competent and they were in good hands." He said he joked that she was a member of the DA's volleyball team after a grand juror said that she was very involved in her daughter's traveling volleyball team.

Neither party objects to these factual findings.

2. Conclusions of Law

The masters concluded that Judge Laettner's statements about DDA Bell violated canons 1, 2, 2A, 2B(1), 3B(4), and 3B(5)(a). The masters included this charge in their conclusion that Judge Laettner's conduct in Count Four constituted prejudicial misconduct. They said that even if DDA Bell was not offended by the comments, they were particularly improper because the judge made them in front of other people, including members of the grand jury. And even if the judge intended his references to her playing on the DA's volleyball team (which does not exist) to be a joke, they appear to have been comments about her physical stature or build, which are inappropriate for a courtroom setting and suggested that he evaluated women based on their physical appearance. Further, his comment that she was "one of [his] favorite attorneys" reflected bias and conveyed the impression that she was in a special position to influence him.

Neither party objects to these legal conclusions.

(g) Count 4G: Comments to DPD Emi Young

1. Findings of Fact

In early 2017, before DPD Emi Young had become a permanent employee of the public defender's office, Judge Laettner began asking her personal questions, including about her ethnicity, her childhood, and her relationship with her father. He also once told her that one of his sons was engaged to an Asian woman, which made him interested in Asian people and culture, and he asked about her background or "what kind of Asian" she was. DPD Young responded that she is part Japanese. Judge Laettner replied that he knew two half-Japanese twins in college and that they were very beautiful. DPD Young testified that she felt incredibly uncomfortable because the judge was singling her out in a way that was not appropriate.

Neither party objects to these factual findings.

2. Conclusions of Law

The masters concluded that Judge Laettner's inquiries about DPD Young's racial background, his comments about the physical appearance of persons who shared her ethnicity, and his intrusive questions about her background violated canons 1, 2, 2A, and 3B(4). The masters included this charge in their conclusion that Judge Laettner's conduct in Count Four constituted prejudicial misconduct.

Neither party objects to these legal conclusions.

(h) Count 4H: Comments about DPD Emi Young

1. Findings of Fact

In approximately May or June 2017, Judge Laettner told an attorney who was looking for DPD Young that, "She's the attractive young Asian woman."

Neither party objects to this factual finding.

2. Conclusions of law

The masters found that the judge's comment about the physical beauty of a female attorney violated canons 1, 2, 2A, and 3B(4). The masters included this charge in their conclusion that Judge Laettner's conduct in Count Four constituted prejudicial misconduct.

Neither party objects to this legal conclusion.

D. Count Five—Comments to Other Women

Judge Laettner is charged, in six subcounts, with making unwelcome, undignified, discourteous, and offensive comments to and about other women who appeared or worked in his courtroom, some of which would reasonably be perceived as sexual harassment or sexual discrimination.

The masters found that each of the subcounts was proven. They concluded that the judge's conduct violated canons 1, 2A, and 3B(4), and would be perceived as gender bias in violation of canon 3B(5)(a). As to Count 5B, they also determined that the judge violated canon 2.

We adopt the masters' findings of fact, as summarized below, and their conclusions of law, with the exceptions discussed below.

(a) Count 5A: Court reporter Jennifer Michel

1. Findings of Fact

Jennifer Michel was Judge Laettner's court reporter from March 2006 to June 2017. When she first started working in his department, he made comments about her appearance that made her uncomfortable. In 2006, he said that when he met his wife, she had long, dark hair like Michel, which made Michel uncomfortable because she felt the judge was comparing her to his wife. In 2007, he told her, "You're so pretty. I don't know how you do it."

In 2009, when Michel entered his chambers to report a hearing and asked if the judge wanted the attorneys present, he responded, "You are hot." Judge Laettner substantially corroborated Michel's account of this interaction, but claims it was a joke and that he said something to the effect of, "Well, you are hot, but let's do it the way we always do and bring in the parties." He acknowledged that he did not have a joking relationship with Michel, and she did not receive his comment as a joke. Inconsistently, in his December 18, 2017 supplemental response to a preliminary investigation letter, he denied making the statement.

Several witnesses testified that Judge Laettner would refer to Michel as "very pretty" or "beautiful" when introducing her to the jury. DPD Cuthbertson testified that the judge occasionally commented to prospective jurors that Michel was "quite tall" and "very pretty," and that they would "enjoy looking at her." Judge Laettner conceded that he may have introduced Michel as his "lovely court reporter," but denied telling jurors that they would enjoy looking at her.

Michel testified that she quit working in Judge Laettner's department in 2017 because she "could not take the years of unwelcome and inappropriate comments toward [herself] and others," his "favoritism towards tall, skinny blondes, young females [and] petite Asian women," and his bias against "heavyset, pudgy, dark-haired public defenders and ones that would argue their case too strenuously in front of him." The masters found that the impact of Judge Laettner's inappropriate comments based on the physical appearance of female attorneys or litigants created an environment that resulted in Michel changing her court reporting assignment.

Neither party objects to these factual findings.

2. Conclusions of Law

The masters concluded that the judge's comments about Michel's physical appearance were undignified and discourteous, would reasonably be perceived as gender bias, and constituted prejudicial misconduct, contrary to canons 1, 2A, 3B(4), and 3B(5)(a).

The examiner objects that there was no finding of sexual harassment and asserts that Michel was exposed to repeated references about the physical appearance of herself and other women that were sufficient to create a hostile working environment. Canon 3B(5)(b) provides that a judge shall not, in the performance of judicial duties, engage in speech, gestures, or other conduct that would reasonably be perceived as sexual harassment.

We adopt the masters' legal conclusions, with the exception of their failure to find that Judge Laettner committed sexual harassment. We find that the judge did commit sexual harassment by creating a hostile work environment that caused Michel to leave his department, based on the course of his conduct between 2006 and 2017.

Judge Laettner objects that this charge is beyond the statute of limitations because the allegations span from 2006 to 2017. We find that the cumulative effect of Judge Laettner's comments over the years on his court reporter, Michel, constitutes sexual harassment. But even if the conduct were limited to remarks he made to women after January 1, 2013, it created a hostile work environment that caused Michel to seek employment elsewhere.

Sexual harassment requires a finding that the harassing conduct was "severe enough or sufficiently pervasive to alter the conditions of employment and create a work environment that qualifies as hostile or abusive to employees because of their sex." (Hughes, supra, 46 Cal.4th at pp. 1042-1043.) In our view, there is clear and convincing evidence that Judge Laettner's pattern of conduct toward women, which the masters determined was gender bias, as observed by Michel, created a hostile work environment. Michel testified that she heard Judge Laettner commenting to DPD Herron, three to five times, about how she looks like an actress in his favorite television show and asking DPD Herron about it; telling certain female defendants charged with driving under the influence that she is a "pretty girl" or "pretty woman"; frequently referring to DDA Bell as "beautiful"; and remarking to defendant Thalia Hernandez, "I always wonder what fat people were thinking when they get tattoos."

(b) Count 5B: "Women can drive you crazy"

1. Findings of Fact

Judge Laettner admits that, in 2013, while presiding over a domestic violence case, in response to a defendant explaining what he learned from participating in a domestic violence treatment program, the judge said, "On a lighter note, I can take judicial notice that women can drive you crazy." DPD Wills-Pierce, who was representing the male defendant, believed the statement was demeaning and undermined her ability to represent clients in the judge's courtroom. When she explained this to Judge Laettner, he responded that his wife "would be really upset if she heard about this" and, "You know, a judge could get in trouble for something like this." DPD Wills-Pierce memorialized this meeting at the time in an email to her supervisor.

Although Judge Laettner testified that he immediately recognized that the comment was a mistake and apologized for it, it was not until DPD Wills-Pierce confronted him several days after the comment that he expressed contrition. He acknowledged to his supervising judge, Judge Barry Goode, that he made the remark and said it was a "bone-headed statement." Judge Laettner also testified that he and Judge Goode "had a chuckle" about it. The masters found it notable that this conversation occurred as a result of Judge Goode contacting Judge Laettner ostensibly as a result of a complaint.

Neither party objects to these factual findings.

2. Conclusions of Law

The masters found that the comment was prejudicial misconduct and violated canons 1, 2, 2A, 3B(4), and 3B5(a). They stated that, although Judge Laettner minimizes the severity of his comment by contending that it was a joke, it was nonetheless inappropriate and demeaning. As stated in the California Judicial Conduct Handbook (Rothman, supra, § 3:42, pp. 189-190):

> A judge must be mindful not to make jokes at the expense of others. The temptation to get a laugh is even greater when there is an audience of people seeking the judge's favor. A judge must remember that the people in the courtroom are generally there because of some serious event in their lives, and they may not appreciate humorous exchanges between the judge and counsel. A judge must be mindful that the use of humor may not be in the service of the goals and objectives of a judicial proceeding.

The masters found it particularly aggravating that Judge Laettner made the remark while on the bench and in the presence of multiple individuals, and that it had the effect of undermining the effectiveness of experienced counsel appearing before him. They also found that it could be perceived that he was biased based upon gender or sex, and that this erodes public confidence in the integrity and impartiality of the judiciary, and diminishes the dignity of the judicial process.

The masters further noted that the judge's remark cannot be considered in isolation, as it was consistent with many other incidents where his comments to women or about women were inappropriate and undignified.

Neither party objects to these legal conclusions.

(c) Counts 5C-E: Comments re tattoos and scarring

The masters found that Judge Laettner engaged in improper action (as opposed to prejudicial misconduct) and violated canons 1, 2A, 3B(4), and 3B(5)(a) by making various comments about the physical appearance of women. The comments included telling female defendants that they were "pretty" and should avoid drinking and driving, or tattoos. The masters found that, although Judge Laettner was motivated by a genuine desire to foster rehabilitation or to impress upon them the seriousness of their conduct, comments about beauty or physical appearance are inappropriate. They said, "An observer might construe such references to the physical appearance of a litigant to imply that there is a different standard of justice based upon appearance."

The examiner asks the commission to reject the masters' conclusions that the comments were improper action and to find that they were prejudicial misconduct, based on Kreep, supra, 3 Cal.5th CJP Supp. at pages 30-31. In Kreep, the commission determined that a judge's comments on the physical appearance of attorneys appearing in court (e.g., "attractive," "lovely," and "pretty girl") constituted prejudicial misconduct because they "were not relevant to the court proceedings, made others in the courtroom uncomfortable, did not afford proper respect to the individuals, diminished the dignity of the judicial process, and may have created the appearance of bias or impartiality." In this matter, Judge Laettner's remarks had some relevance to the proceedings; they were in the context of him trying to help the defendants by conveying the serious consequences, including disfigurement, that could occur from drinking and driving. There was testimony that he made similar remarks to a few male defendants. The comments also did not convey the same level of disrespect to the individuals involved in Judge Kreep's case. We do not think that an objective observer would conclude that the comments would erode public esteem for the judiciary, a requirement for a finding of prejudicial misconduct.

We adopt the masters' findings of fact and conclusions of law, but, because the conduct constitutes improper action, do not consider these allegations as a basis for the judge's removal.

(d) Count 5F: Comment regarding tattoos and "fat people"

1. Findings of Fact

On June 16, 2017, after Judge Laettner presided over a hearing in People v. Thalia Hernandez, he stayed on the bench and engaged in a discussion with Hernandez about her tattoos. Court reporter Jennifer Michel testified that Judge Laettner remarked, "I always wonder what fat people were thinking when they get tattoos." Judge Laettner acknowledged discussing Hernandez's tattoos, but said it was in the context of her efforts to obtain employment, and he provided her with a workforce reentry form and resources for job training.

Neither party objects to these factual findings.

2. Conclusions of Law

The masters found that Judge Laettner engaged in improper action (as opposed to prejudicial misconduct) and violated canons 1, 2A, 3B(4), and 3B(5)(a). We respectfully disagree that Judge Laettner's comment about "fat people" constituted improper action and find that it constituted prejudicial misconduct, as argued by the examiner.

In this matter, like in Kreep, we find that Judge Laettner's remark erodes public esteem for the judiciary because it was not relevant to his judicial duties, is disrespectful, and creates the appearance of bias against "fat people" and that there could be a different standard of justice based on someone's physical appearance.

E. Count Three—People v. Ventura

Judge Laettner is charged with revoking a criminal defendant's own recognizance (OR) release in the defendant's absence without affording him or his attorney notice and the opportunity to be heard, and with giving the appearance that he was retaliating for the filing of a peremptory challenge against him by the defendant's attorney.

The masters found that Judge Laettner committed willful misconduct by failing to give a criminal defendant notice and the opportunity to be heard with respect to the revocation of his OR release and remand, and the rejection of the peremptory challenge.

The masters further found that Judge Laettner was "not credible" when he stated that he revoked the defendant's OR release and remanded him, and denied the peremptory challenge as untimely, in open court.

We adopt the masters' findings of fact, as summarized below, and their conclusions of law, with one exception discussed below.

1. Findings of Fact

On October 31, 2013, Judge Laettner presided over People v. Harlyn Ventura. Ventura was represented by DPD Jermel Thomas. Ventura had been arrested for violating probation. He was released on OR, but remained in custody on an immigration hold.

The Ventura matter came before Judge Laettner again the next day, November 1, 2013. During an in-chambers discussion between Judge Laettner, DPD Thomas, DDA Catherine DeFerrari, and probation officer Valerie Miramontes, DPD Thomas advised Judge Laettner that she planned to file a peremptory challenge against him pursuant to Code of Civil Procedure section 170.6.[4]

Back in open court, DPD Thomas filed the 170.6 challenge against Judge Laettner and informed him on the record that she had done so. Judge Laettner set the case for a further pretrial hearing in his court on November 8, 2013, and a contested probation violation hearing on December 20, 2013 before a different judge.

Judge Laettner testified that, in open court at the November 1, 2013 hearing, he (1) revoked Ventura's OR release and remanded him into custody, and (2) found DPD Thomas's 170.6 challenge to be untimely.

Regarding his revocation of Ventura's OR release and remand into custody on November 1, Judge Laettner testified: "I was in open court when all parties were present, and I stated very plainly he's remanded. That was on the record." Judge Laettner's decision to remand Ventura is not reflected in the reporter's transcript of the proceeding. It is also not reflected in the contemporaneous notes Judge Laettner took during the in-chambers discussion, and it is not in the contemporaneous notes he made while he was on the bench during the November 1 proceeding. The contemporaneous notes he made for the October 31 and November 8 proceedings, however, do make note of Ventura's release status.

[4] A peremptory challenge of a judge pursuant to Code of Civil Procedure section 170.6 is initiated by the filing of a declaration under penalty of perjury, or an oral statement under oath, that the judge is prejudiced against a party or attorney or that the party cannot have a fair and impartial trial before the judge. No other act or proof is required to disqualify the judge. A peremptory challenge can be stricken, without a hearing, if it is untimely.

The remand order is reflected on the clerk's minute order. Judge Laettner testified that he turned to his right and told his clerk that Ventura was remanded. When asked whether he looked at DPD Thomas and told her that he was revoking Ventura's OR and remanding him, Judge Laettner testified: "No. I said that to my clerk in court loudly enough that I believed everyone would hear. And I also believe that she [DPD Thomas] knew it was going to happen because [of] what had just happened in chambers. It was no surprise."

DPD Thomas testified that, on November 1, Judge Laettner did not say during the in-chambers conference that he was going to revoke Ventura's OR, and he did not say in open court that he was revoking Ventura's OR and remanding him, or ask if she wished to be heard.

DDA DeFerrari appeared for the prosecution in the Ventura matter on November 1, 2013. Consistent with DPD Thomas, her notes for that day reflect that Ventura was on OR status. She does not recall Ventura's OR status being revoked on November 1 or even being discussed that day.

The Ventura case came before Judge Laettner again on November 8, 2013. During the morning session of the hearing, DPD Thomas raised the issue of Ventura's remand, stating her belief that the minute order for November 1 "inadvertently" reflected her client's remand without bail. She asked Judge Laettner to correct the minute order "for housekeeping purposes" since the remand order was "in error." She told him: "So it appears as though there was a mistake as to the November 1st hearing because I don't believe we addressed his custodial status at that time. I think we all believed that he would have been released on his own recognizance." According to the transcript, neither Judge Laettner nor DDA DeFerrari said anything to contradict DPD Thomas's statement that Ventura's custodial status had not been addressed on November 1.

Regarding Judge Laettner's testimony that he denied DPD Thomas's 170.6 challenge as untimely in open court and in her presence on November 1, the transcript does not reflect Judge Laettner saying the challenge was untimely or the basis for the ruling. The minute order also does not reflect that the judge found the 170.6 challenge untimely. Judge Laettner admits that it would be appropriate for the clerk's minute order to reflect his finding that the challenge was rejected as untimely. Judge Laettner's contemporaneous notes do not reflect the filing of the challenge or that he found it untimely; he does not know why this is so. Judge Laettner also testified that he did not look at DPD Thomas and tell her he was rejecting her challenge as untimely or ask her if she wished to be heard.

The masters found Judge Laettner's testimony "not credible" that he "very plainly," in open court, revoked Ventura's OR release and remanded him. They stated:

> While at some point in time he instructed his clerk that the defendant was to be remanded, it was not announced during his chambers discussion or in open court. The transcript does not reflect his decision, his contemporaneous notes do not show it, the deputy public defender testified it didn't happen, and the deputy district attorney cannot recall it happening. And when asked directly, Judge Laettner admitted that he did not turn to DPD Thomas and say: "Ms. Thomas, I'm revoking his OR. I'm remanding your client. Do you wish to be heard?"

The masters also found "not credible" Judge Laettner's testimony that he rejected DPD Thomas's 170.6 challenge in open court and on the record because the transcript does not reflect it, the court minutes do not show it, and his contemporaneous notes do not show it. The masters said: "The fact that the record is devoid of reference to Judge Laettner's rejection of the 170.6 challenge raises the inference that it was never done."

Judge Laettner objects to the finding that he was not credible about revoking Ventura's OR release and remanding him in open court. In addition to insisting that he did so by turning to the right and telling his clerk about the revocation and remand, he asserts that DPD Thomas knew from the chambers discussions on October 31 and November 1 that Ventura was going to be remanded due to his termination from a treatment program, which was a violation of a term of probation. Ventura was released on OR on October 31, so his remand would not likely have been discussed that day. And even if it were discussed in chambers on November 1, his counsel, DPD Thomas, had the right to be heard before the remand occurred. She denies that Judge Laettner told her on November 1, in chambers or on the record, that he was going to revoke Ventura's OR release from the previous day. Other than the judge's testimony, which the masters found not credible, there is no evidence to contradict the testimony of DPD Thomas.

The judge also contends that DPD Thomas did not address the remand between November 1 and November 8, which corroborates that she knew about it on November 1. She did not do anything because she did not learn about it until November 7, when she saw that the remand box on the minute order for the criminal case was checked. Until then, she believed Ventura was in custody on an immigration hold. She learned about the remand when she and Ventura's immigration attorney were trying to get the immigration hold released by posting bond, which they would not have done had they known that Ventura had been remanded without bail by Judge Laettner. The evidence supports a finding that DPD Thomas did not know about the remand without bail on November 1, and that Judge Laettner did not order the remand in open court in her presence.

Judge Laettner also objects to the masters' finding that he was "not credible" about rejecting the 170.6 challenge in open court. He submits that the masters omit that DPD Thomas had previously moved for Judge Laettner to decide contested factual issues, thereby rendering the 170.6 peremptory challenge untimely. Whether or not the peremptory challenge was untimely or meritorious is not relevant; the issue is whether Judge Laettner's statement under oath that he denied the 170.6 in open court is true. The masters found that it was not, and we agree, based on the evidence. We agree with the judge, however, that if the peremptory challenge was untimely, the judge was not required to hold a hearing regarding the timeliness of the challenge, and could have simply stricken it. He was, nevertheless, required to advise DPD Thomas of his ruling. The evidence does not support his claim that he did so in open court. It shows, to the contrary, that he did not.

We agree with, and adopt, the masters' findings, including regarding credibility.

2. Conclusions of Law

The masters determined that Judge Laettner's conduct in the Ventura matter was willful misconduct. They concluded that he abused his authority by failing to give Ventura's attorney, DPD Thomas, notice and the opportunity to be heard as to (1) his decision to revoke Ventura's OR release and remand him on November 1, 2013, and (2) his rejection of her 170.6 challenge as being untimely.

To support their finding that his conduct was in bad faith, they referred to the morning session on November 8, when DPD Thomas raised the issue of Ventura's remand, describing it as an error. At the beginning of the afternoon session, Judge Laettner stated that Ventura would have to enroll in a program as a condition of his OR release. DPD Thomas again raised the issue of the revocation of Ventura's OR, arguing that there had been no changed circumstances to justify his remand. The masters cited the following colloquy from the transcript:

> MS. THOMAS: So the court had previously OR'd him with—subject to no conditions on the 31st of October. I don't believe that there has been any change in circumstance from that date to today.

> THE COURT: He's been remanded. That's one change. If you want him released on his OR, those are the conditions. If you don't then we can continue with this hearing on December the 20th with him in custody. (Italics in masters' report.)

The masters found that Judge Laettner took advantage of Ventura's custodial status by conditioning his release on his enrollment in a program, and that the knowing or reckless failure to provide Ventura the process he was due was willful misconduct. And on November 8, Judge Laettner did not correct DPD Thomas by indicating that he had issued the revoke-and-remand order in open court on November 1; instead, he repeatedly reiterated that Ventura's OR would be conditioned upon his entry into a program.

In support of this conclusion, we note from the record that when DPD Thomas's colleague, DPD Jonathan Laba, accompanied her to court on November 8, the following exchange occurred:

> MR. LABA: . . . Our particular concern, procedurally, is what happened on Friday [November 1] because Ms. Thomas and Mr. Vaca [Ventura's immigration attorney], both of whom were here, have conveyed that the court didn't make any statements on the record about changing the previous day's OR to no-bail remand that showed upon the court's minute order, which is why now we're addressing the issue of his being released with conditions. Either the court did that and did it on the record, or the court did not, but that was not done. I don't know why the minute order reflects that, and I don't know why we are now addressing adding conditions to the OR release.
> THE COURT: Well, he was remanded on the 1st, and we have had many, many cases. I don't have a clear recollection of what happened on the 1st, but I have reviewed the minute order. He was remanded. It would have been with me saying he's remanded. That's where you find him. He is remanded.

Judge Laettner argues that there is no corrupt purpose for his remand of Ventura because Ventura was in violation of his probation by failing his treatment program. But Ventura had already been released on OR without conditions, and when DPD Thomas asked for him to be released on OR again, the judge required a condition, which appears to be retaliatory.

We further note that on November 1, right after Judge Laettner heard the Ventura matter, he heard People v. Williams, during which he snapped at DPD Wills-Pierce. He then called her up to the bench and told her that he was sorry he was mad earlier, but that it was her friend, DPD Thomas, who had made him so mad. DPD Thomas testified that when she confronted Judge Laettner about this later the same day, he confirmed that she had made him upset. Judge Laettner testified that he was angry or upset at DPD Thomas because he believed she had been dishonest about her client.

We agree with the masters that there is clear and convincing evidence that Judge Laettner revoked Ventura's OR and remanded him without bail without notifying DPD Thomas or letting her be heard—which the masters found to be a reckless denial of Ventura's due process, the basis for willful misconduct.

We do not find that Judge Laettner was required to give DPD Thomas the opportunity to be heard regarding his denial of her 170.6 challenge as untimely. But we do find that he was required to notify her of his ruling, and we agree with the masters that Judge Laettner lacked credibility when he testified that he did so in open court. There is no evidence to support his claim that he did.

The masters determined that Judge Laettner's conduct violated canons 1, 2, 2A, 3 (a judge shall perform the duties of judicial office impartially, competently, and diligently), and 3B(2). We agree with those legal conclusions and that his misconduct was willful.

F. Count Eight—Failure to Recuse or Disclose Son's Employment in District Attorney's Office[5]

Judge Laettner is charged with failing to recuse or timely disclose on the record his son's employment with the district attorney's office in some cases where that office appeared.

The masters found that Judge Laettner had a system for appropriately making disclosures on the record, but that he failed to routinely do so in juvenile cases. They found, nevertheless, that he did not commit misconduct. We respectfully disagree and conclude that the judge's failure to always disclose the conflict on the record in juvenile cases constitutes improper action (which we do not consider for purposes of removal).

1. Findings of Fact

Judge Laettner's son, Max Laettner, was a law clerk at the Contra Costa County DA's Office starting August 18, 2014, and a deputy district attorney starting June 29, 2015. Judge Laettner understood that he was required to disclose his son's employment as an attorney in the DA's office. He established a two-step procedure to address the disclosure requirement, which was to give an oral admonition at the beginning of the calendar, before cases were called, and to have the clerks stamp on the minute orders in every case a notice that his son was a deputy district attorney in the DA's office. The bailiff would double-check that orders were stamped with the disclosure before distributing them. Judge Laettner testified that he made the oral disclosure every day at the commencement of the calendar, before any cases were called, and that he was supposed to give the oral disclosure in the afternoon, but he is not sure he did it every time. In juvenile cases, however, Judge Laettner only made the disclosure to the attorneys, and only at the beginning of the calendar. It is not clear that all of the attorneys would be present at that point. None of the juveniles or their families would be present when the judge made the disclosure, as the cases came in "one at a time" after the judge purportedly made the oral disclosure.

[5] We address Counts Six and Seven, where no misconduct was found, after Counts Eight and Nine.

Three juvenile cases were identified in which the judge did not make the disclosure on the record:

(a) In In re Vanessa W., Judge Laettner presided over the first hearing on April 1, 2014. His son started as a clerk in the DA's office in August 2014. The first hearing in the case after Judge Laettner's son started in the DA's office, on October 7, 2014, was not reported, and the minutes do not indicate that the judge made a disclosure about his son. There was evidence that Judge Barry Baskin, as the "ethics advisor," had advised Judge Laettner that he was not required to make a disclosure about his son's clerkship. The transcript of the first reported hearing in the case, on April 8, 2016, does not reflect an oral disclosure on the record that day, but the minute order contains the stamped disclosure. Another minute order, dated April 29, 2016, also contains the stamped disclosure.

(b) In In re Lauryn G., Judge Laettner made no disclosure on the record at four hearings. He admitted that, on one occasion, he presided over this case after his son had appeared on an uncontested motion to continue, and that he would have recused from the case had he noticed that. The masters had no doubt that he would have done so.

(c) In In re Victor E., Judge Laettner made no disclosure on the record at a number of hearings. Only some of the minute orders were stamped.

Neither party objects to these factual findings.

2. Conclusions of Law

Canon 3E(2)(a) provides that in "all trial court proceedings, a judge shall disclose on the record . . . information that is reasonably relevant to the question of disqualification under Code of Civil Procedure section 170.1, even if the judge believes there is no actual basis for disqualification." Section 170.1, subdivision (a)(6)(A), provides that a judge shall be disqualified if, for any reason, a "person aware of the facts might reasonably entertain a doubt that the judge would be able to be impartial."

The masters found that Judge Laettner was diligent in his efforts to disclose that his son was employed as a DDA by routinely making an oral disclosure, backed up by a written disclosure on the minute order, which was checked by the bailiff. There was no evidence that Judge Laettner was careless or indifferent about his duty to disclose.

The masters acknowledged that Judge Laettner handled some of the busiest court calendars with a significant number of cases, and they agreed that, in juvenile matters, "group 'disclosures' are impractical due to the sequential nature of the minors' appearances in a courtroom that is not open to the public." They found, nevertheless, that Judge Laettner omitted necessary on-the-record disclosures in several instances, and stated:

> Minute orders issued after a hearing, which bear the disclosure stamp, do not remedy the lack of an oral disclosure before a proceeding commences. It is at the outset of a hearing that the parties and attorneys must have the relevant disclosure, in order to decide whether to seek a disqualification before the matter is heard by the judge.

The masters concluded that Judge Laettner failed to recuse himself in In re Lauryn G. and failed to timely disclose his son's employment with the DA's office in several instances in the In re Vanessa W. and In re Victor E. matters.

Despite the foregoing, the masters found that, under all of the circumstances, and weighing the court's significant caseload, coupled with the judge's diligent and consistent efforts to comply with the disclosure requirements, there was not clear and convincing evidence that these failures "even approached improper action . . . let alone constituted prejudicial misconduct or willful misconduct," as urged by the examiner.

We respectfully disagree with the masters' legal conclusion regarding Judge Laettner's failure to disclose on the record in every case his son's employment with the DA's office. The rules of ethics are clear that a judge must disclose that his or her adult child works in the district attorney's office in every case in which the district attorney's office appears. (See Cal. Judges Assn. (CJA), Jud. Ethics Update (2017), p. 2; CJA Jud. Ethics Update (2007) p. 1; CJA Jud. Ethics Com. Opinion 51 (2001) p. 2; Cal. Supreme Ct. Com. on Jud. Ethics Opns., Formal Opn. No. 2013-002 (2013) p. 8.)

The evidence establishes that Judge Laettner did not always properly disclose his son's employment with the DA's office in juvenile cases, and that he knew he was supposed to do so. The requisite disclosure is for the benefit of the parties, so that they might evaluate whether to seek to disqualify the judge. We find that the judge's failure to disclose his son's employment on the record in all juvenile cases violated canon 3E(2)(a). We further find that this was improper action, and not willful misconduct as argued by the examiner, because, in light of Judge Laettner's efforts to comply with the disclosure requirement, as described above, we do not believe that an objective observer would find his failure to do so in every case prejudicial to public esteem for the integrity and impartiality of the judiciary. We also find no corrupt purpose. Because we conclude that it is improper action, we do not consider this charge for purposes of removal.

G. Count Nine—Ex Parte Comments to Deputy Public Defenders

Judge Laettner is charged with making ex parte comments in response to peremptory challenges exercised by deputy public defenders that would reasonably be perceived as sexual harassment or sexual discrimination and, at a minimum, gave the appearance that he was attempting to influence the attorneys not to exercise the challenges.

The masters found that Judge Laettner committed willful misconduct by engaging in two ex parte communications with deputy public defenders who were filing peremptory challenges against him. They did not find sexual harassment or sexual discrimination.

The masters further found that Judge Laettner's testimony was "not credible" regarding the statements he made to the deputy public defenders.

We adopt the masters' findings of fact. Due to the statute of limitations, we consider this subcount only for purposes of evaluating the judge's honesty during this proceeding (see footnote 3), and we need not address whether we adopt the masters' legal conclusion as to the level of misconduct.

1. Findings of Fact

a. Conversation with DPD Eiland

In 2008, Judge Laettner presided over the trial in People v. Hector Ignacio, a sexual battery case in which defendant Ignacio was charged with grabbing a woman's breast twice. DPD Nicole Eiland represented Ignacio. The jury acquitted Ignacio of sexual battery, but convicted him of simple battery. Judge Laettner sentenced Ignacio to 60 days in jail and probation for three years. The maximum penalty for simple battery is six months in county jail (Pen. Code, §§ 242, 243, subd. (a)).

DPD Eiland considered the sentence to be unduly harsh and began exercising peremptory challenges against Judge Laettner, pursuant to Code of Civil Procedure section 170.6. She testified that, three or four weeks after she began filing the challenges, Judge Laettner called her up to the bench and indicated that he had noticed that there had been challenges filed against him and "couldn't help but think it had something to do with the last case that [they] had together," which was the Ignacio case. She testified that he told her that he wanted her to think about "what if this had been [her] or what if this had been Ms. MonPere" whose breast had been grabbed. DPD Eiland testified that Judge Laettner never explicitly said not to file challenges against him, but she felt that she was "being called into the principal's office and told not to do this [file 170.6 challenges] anymore."

Judge Laettner denied discussing the 170.6 challenges with DPD Eiland. He admitted having a conversation with her about whether his sentence in Ignacio was too harsh and said he did so because he could see that she was still very upset with him. He testified that he did not say anything about the sentence, but that he said she needed to consider the victims. He denied making reference to DPD MonPere or grabbing her breast, but testified that he might have said, "[W]hat if it had been a family member or a friend that had been a victim in a case?" He said he did this because he wanted DPD Eiland to have empathy for the victims of crime and "basically to defend [him]self." He also said she needed to consider victims because she had a hostile demeanor toward him and, "in fairness to [him], since [he] was considering the victim who had been essentially molested," she should consider victims.

The masters found DPD Eiland's testimony credible. It was partially corroborated by Judge Laettner's testimony that he asked her what if the assault in Ignacio had involved a family member or friend, and was further corroborated by DPDs Osborne and Cuthbertson, who testified that Judge Laettner made similar comments to them. The masters also found that, even though Judge Laettner did not explicitly say not to file 170.6 challenges against him, he indirectly referenced DPD Eiland's 170.6 challenges against him during his conversation with her.

b. Conversation with DPDs Osborne and Cuthbertson

DPDs Osborne and Cuthbertson also began exercising peremptory challenges against Judge Laettner in 2008 after his sentence in Ignacio. Because their challenges of him "jammed up" the three-judge courthouse, Supervising Judge William Kolin had a conversation with DPD Osborne, during which it was agreed that he and DPD Cuthbertson would pretry cases with Judge Laettner, which Judge Kolin would review.

About a month or so after Judge Laettner sentenced Ignacio, DPDs Osborne and Cuthbertson and a prosecutor were pretrying cases in front of Judge Laettner. The judge asked the prosecutor to leave. DPD Osborne testified:

> So Judge Laettner said that, you know, he wasn't trying to tell us to—to not challenge him on cases, but he could tell that we were upset with him. And so he—I started telling him about why I was—why I was challenging him on those cases. [¶] And I told him that the sentence for Ms. Eiland's client was grossly unfair and disproportionate to the crime that he was convicted of. And—you know, and after that, Judge Laettner said, well, you know, what if it had been Ms. MonPere's breast that this man had—had grabbed?
> (Italics in masters' report.)

DPD Osborne got the sense that Judge Laettner was trying to smooth things over with the public defenders.

DPD Cuthbertson also testified that Judge Laettner asked the district attorney to leave. He said the judge then brought up the challenges, saying: "I would never tell you not to represent your clients to the best of your ability. But I would be lying if I told you that being challenged didn't hurt my feelings or didn't hurt." DPD Cuthbertson also testified that, in talking about the Ignacio case, Judge Laettner asked, "[W]hat if that was Ms. MonPere's breast that he grabbed?" DPD Cuthbertson remembers this because it was inappropriate, DPD MonPere was his friend, and the "power dynamics in the room" were such that he "felt what was happening wasn't right."

Judge Laettner admitted having an in-chambers discussion with DPDs Osborne and Cuthbertson about Ignacio, but he denied asking the district attorney who had been in chambers to leave. Judge Laettner denied knowing, at the beginning of his conversation with the DPDs, that they had been filing 170.6 challenges against him. He testified that DPDs Osborne and Cuthbertson were "kind of my guys" and that he began the conversation by asking them, "[S]o what's going on you guys?" He said DPD Osborne told him they had been challenging him because of his sentence in Ignacio, at which point Judge Laettner said he could not discuss challenges with them, and that they should challenge a judge if they thought it was in their client's best interest. He also testified that when DPD Osborne said the reason they were challenging him was because they thought the sentence in Ignacio was unfair, he said something like, "[W]hat if it had been a family member or friend or Ms. Eiland or Ms. MonPere that had been the victim?"

The masters found that Judge Laettner was "not credible" when he testified that, until their conversation in chambers, he was unaware that DPDs Osborne and Cuthbertson were filing 170.6 challenges against him, because he was in a three-judge courthouse, where two judges were having to do the work of three, and the supervising judge took it upon himself to intercede with the DPDs.

The masters found the testimony of DPDs Osborne and Cuthbertson credible that Judge Laettner engaged them in a discussion about their 170.6 filings. Judge David Flinn, formerly on the Contra Costa County bench, testified that when Judge Laettner had been receiving 170.6 challenges for a week or two, Judge Laettner sought his advice about his experience with 170.6 challenges. Judge Flinn related that Judge Laettner was frustrated that he could not stop the deputy public defenders in the hallway and ask why they were doing it, or explain the reason he ruled as he did, but he understood that he could not do this. Judge Flinn told Judge Laettner that, by "reaching out and being friendly to the public defenders," the challenges would stop. DPD Cuthbertson's testimony that Judge Laettner said he would be lying if he said being challenged did not hurt his feelings was consistent with the frustration Judge Laettner expressed to Judge Flinn regarding his inability to explain himself to the DPDs. Further, DPD Cuthbertson's testimony that Judge Laettner brought up the challenges is consistent with Judge Flinn's advice (which the masters found "questionable") to reach out and be friendly to the public defenders.

The masters also found "not credible" Judge Laettner's denial that he referred to touching DPD MonPere's breast. He admitted saying to DPDs Osborne and Cuthbertson, "[W]hat if it had been a family member or friend or Ms. Eiland or Ms. MonPere that had been the victim?" The masters reasoned that, if he was trying to impress upon them the seriousness of the situation, which he said he was, then he would refer to the defendant's conduct, "grabbing breasts," when asking them to imagine if it had been their colleague. And the masters found credible and compelling DPD Cuthbertson's explanation as to why he remembers that Judge Laettner referred to DPD MonPere's breast.

The masters found that Judge Laettner did speak to DPDs Eiland, Osborne, and Cuthbertson about the 170.6 challenges, and that, by telling them to consider victims, he was defending his sentence in Ignacio. According to the masters, the misconduct in this case is Judge Laettner's defense of his sentence in response to the public defenders' 170.6 challenges. His suggestion to DPD Cuthbertson that his feelings were hurt by the challenges from his "guys" reasonably calls into question his ability to make a difficult or unpopular decision in the future. As the masters stated, "The integrity of the judiciary depends upon the unflinching posture by judges that necessary but unpopular decisions will always be made."

Judge Laettner objects to the masters' findings that he was not credible. He contends that he never mentioned the 170.6 challenges to DPD Eiland, and that she testified that he did not reference peremptory challenges pursuant to Code of Civil Procedure section 170.6. But DPD Eiland, whom the masters found credible, testified that, while Judge Laettner never said not to file challenges against him, he told her he could not help but notice that she had been exercising challenges against him, and that he thought it had something to do with their last case.

The judge objects that the masters omitted that DPD Osborne admitted misremembering the events and/or adopting the recollections of other parties regarding the conversation about the Ignacio sentence. First, DPD MonPere told DPD Osborne that she did not think he was there when the judge's comment about her was made, but DPD Osborne said he did not think that was the case, and he testified that he had "strong memories" of the conversation with Judge Laettner. Second, DPD Osborne admitted that DPD Cuthbertson reminded him that they had met with the judge when the comment was made, which confirmed his memory. That DPD Osborne was at first uncertain about his memory, and that DPD MonPere thought DPD Osborne was not present, is not determinative of whether the comments were made. We find that there is sufficient evidence to support the masters' finding that they were in fact made.

Judge Laettner argues that there was no "blanket challenge"[6] by the public defenders against him, but that there was one against Judge William Kolin, and that therefore he was credible when he said he did not know that DPDs Osborne and Cuthbertson were filing challenges against him. The masters referred in their report to the filing of 170.6 challenges against Judge Laettner by DPDs Osborne and Cuthbertson in early 2008 as a "blanket challenge." They are not referring to a "blanket challenge" by the entire public defender's office. The evidence that DPDs Osborne and Cuthbertson routinely challenged Judge Laettner for a period of time in 2008 is uncontroverted.

Judge Laettner says that differences in testimony as to whether he referred to DPD MonPere's breast is due to a faulty memory, not dishonesty. But he also asserts that he admitted the conduct before formal proceedings were initiated. In his response to a supplemental preliminary investigation letter and in his verified Answer, however, he denied referring to DPD MonPere's breast during his conversation with DPDs Cuthbertson and Osborne. We agree with the masters' finding that Judge Laettner's denial that he made the comment about DPD MonPere's breast lacks credibility.

[6] "Blanket challenge" refers to the practice of a party or attorney repeatedly filing 170.6 challenges against a particular judge.

2. Conclusions of Law

The masters determined that Judge Laettner committed willful misconduct because, according to Judge Flinn, he understood that he could not explain himself, but, by asking the public defenders to consider the victim, he was speaking directly to the reason the peremptory challenges were being made. Willful misconduct occurs when a judge acts on the desire to stop 170.6 challenges from being filed against him by "initiating any communication with the lawyer or the law firm involved." (Rothman, supra, § 5:4, p. 267.) The masters found that, although he did not explicitly tell the DPDs not to file the challenges, because of the "power dynamics in the room," as felt by DPD Cuthbertson, and DPD Eiland's feeling that she was "being called into the principal's office and told not to do this anymore," the act of explaining his sentencing decision, in the context of a blanket challenge, was for a purpose other than the faithful discharge of his judicial duties.

They also found that the judge's comment about considering if it had been DPD MonPere's breast that had been grabbed was undignified and discourteous, contrary to canon 3B(4). They did not find that it constituted gender bias or sexual harassment. As to both subcounts, they found the judge violated canons 1, 2, 2A, 3B(2), 3B(4), and 3B(7).

Due to the statute of limitations, we consider this count only for purposes of evaluating the judge's honesty during this proceeding (see footnote 3), and we need not address whether we adopt the masters' legal conclusion as to the level of misconduct.

H. Count Six—Comments in dependency case

Judge Laettner is charged with making statements in a case involving a juvenile that gave the appearance of prejudgment and that would reasonably be perceived as bias or prejudice.

We adopt the masters' findings and their conclusion that there is not clear and convincing evidence of the alleged misconduct.

I. Count Seven—Instituting program to address backlog

Judge Laettner is charged with instituting a new program to address a backlog in criminal court, which was allegedly an abuse of authority, had a chilling effect on defendants' constitutional right to trial by jury, and gave the appearance that he intended to give harsher treatment to defendants who asserted their right to trial and were convicted.

We adopt the masters' findings and their conclusion that there is not clear and convincing evidence of the alleged misconduct.

IV. APPROPRIATE DISCIPLINE

In determining the appropriate level of discipline, we consider our mandate to protect the public, to enforce rigorous standards of judicial conduct, and to maintain public confidence in the integrity and impartiality of the judiciary. (See Broadman, supra, 18 Cal.4th at pp. 1111-1112.)

The commission has identified several factors to consider in determining the appropriate sanction, including the judge's honesty and integrity, the number of acts and seriousness of the misconduct, whether the judge appreciates the impropriety of the conduct, the likelihood of future misconduct, the impact of the misconduct on the judicial system, and the existence of prior discipline. (Inquiry Concerning Saucedo (2015) 62 Cal.4th CJP Supp. 1, 95-96.) The commission may also consider the effect of the misconduct on others and whether the judge has cooperated fully and honestly in the commission proceeding. (Policy Declarations of the Com. on Jud. Performance, policy 7.1(1)(f), 7.1(2)(b).)

Foremost in the commission's consideration of the foregoing factors is honesty and integrity. (Saucedo, supra, 62 Cal.4th CJP Supp. at p. 96.) Honesty is a minimum qualification expected of a judge. (Kloepfer, supra, 49 Cal.3d at p. 865.) A judge who does not honor the oath to tell the truth cannot be entrusted with judging the credibility of others. (Inquiry Concerning MacEachern (2008) 49 Cal.4th CJP Supp. 289, 309.) The commission takes "particularly seriously a judge's willingness to lie under oath to the three special masters appointed by the Supreme Court to make factual findings critical to [its] decision." (Saucedo, supra, 62 Cal.4th CJP Supp. at p. 97.) The California Supreme Court has said, "There are few judicial actions in our view that provide greater justification for removal from office than the action of a judge in deliberately providing false information to the Commission in the course of its investigation into charges of wil[l]ful misconduct on the part of the judge." (Adams II, supra, 10 Cal.4th at p. 914).

Judge Laettner repeatedly asserted, in his post-hearing briefs and at his appearance before the commission, that the special masters concluded that he is "honest to a fault." The masters, however, specifically stated in their report that, to the contrary, Judge Laettner was "not credible" in six instances and that his testimony was "impeached" in another. They also rejected much of his testimony in favor of that of other witnesses. While the masters found Judge Laettner's acknowledgment of wrongdoing as to some of the acts charged to be mitigating, they determined that he was "not credible or not truthful as it relates to his testimony concerning several of the events" in this matter, and that his "lack of candor regarding several of the allegations is troubling."

The instances where the masters found, either explicitly or implicitly, that Judge Laettner was not credible include his testimony that:

- He called DPD Della-Piana into the well to ensure she received the minute orders, while the prosecutor was at counsel table, and told her he was resetting Imlay's bail at $25,000 per case.
- His order exonerating and resetting Imlay's bail is not on the record because his court reporter was not present, or was present but did not take his order down.
- He was confused about who represented Lauryn G.
- He did not talk to DPD Della-Piana about Eric B. in the hallway.
- He did not talk to DPD Della-Piana about Imlay in chambers.
- He revoked Ventura's bail and remanded him in open court.
- He rejected DPD Thomas's 170.6 peremptory challenge as untimely in open court.
- He did not know he was being routinely peremptorily challenged by DPDs Osborne and Cuthbertson in a three-judge courthouse.
- He did not refer to DPD MonPere's breast when he said the DPDs should consider the victim in Ignacio.

Judge Laettner argues that differences in testimony may be the result of faulty memory, rather than conscious dishonesty. But the masters found, in several instances, that the judge's explanations lacked credibility because they did not make sense. For example, he testified that DPD Della-Piana was in the well when he revoked Imlay's bail, but the masters stated that there would be no reason for this to occur, and it would have been improper. His explanations about why something was not on the record in Imlay were inconsistent: he said his court reporter was not present, and he also said she was present but not taking things down. According to the masters, his claim that he was confused as to which DPD represented Lauryn G. was not believable given DPD Moghtader's prior involvement in the case and DPD Della-Piana's references to her during the hearing. And his assertion that he did not know he was being peremptorily challenged is at odds with Judge Flinn's testimony that he sought Judge Flinn's advice on how to handle the challenges.

Judge Laettner also claims that the special masters found that he has taken full responsibility for his mistakes "without excuse." There is no such finding in the masters' report. Judge Laettner denies committing misconduct in three of the six counts the masters found were proven with clear and convincing evidence (Counts One, Three, and Nine), and in a fourth count the masters concluded did not constitute misconduct but we did (Count Eight). Further, he does not take responsibility for the following conduct:

- Ex parte communication with DDA Fernandez—The judge says DPD Della-Piana's absence from the courtroom "made her inclusion [in the ex parte] impossible." (There was no need for the ex parte communication in the first place.)
- "Teenage daughter" comment to DPD Della-Piana—He denies that this was demeaning and said he intended it as a "compliment." (The masters found it "inconceivable" that she might take it as a compliment.)
- Ex parte communication with DPD Della-Piana regarding Eric B.—He denies discussing the Eric B. case with her. (She testified that he did, and the masters found that he did. And he says in his post-hearing brief that he did not explicitly deny referencing Eric B. during the ex parte discussion with DPD Della-Piana, but when he was asked whether he discussed that case with DPD Della-Piana on that occasion, he responded, "No.")
- Ex parte communication with DPD Della-Piana regarding Imlay—He denies discussing the Imlay cases with her. (She testified that he did, he admitted in his Answer that he did, and the masters found that he did.)
- Remand of Ventura—He denies that he did this off the record. (The evidence indicates that he did not do it on the record.)

- Denial of DPD Thomas's 170.6 request—He denies that he did this off the record. (The evidence indicates otherwise.)
- Discussion of peremptory challenges with DPD Eiland—He denied that he discussed them with her. (She testified that he did, and the masters found her credible.)
- Referring to DPD MonPere's breast when asking the DPDs to consider the victims—He denied doing so. (DPDs Osborne and Cuthbertson testified that he did, and the masters found them credible.)

Judge Laettner emphasizes that he admitted the misconduct in Counts Two, Four, and Five, which the masters found reflected a pattern of gender bias against women. But he only admitted some of the misconduct, and, as the masters stated, he attempted to minimize and justify some of his remarks. For example, he said he commented on DDA Bell's looks because he wanted to convey her competence to grand jurors, he claimed that comparing DPD Della-Piana to a teenage girl was a compliment, and he said he told DPD MonPere that she was "his favorite," in front of other attorneys, to build her confidence.

Judge Laettner also contends that he promptly recognizes his mistakes, and cites as an example his response to DPD Wills-Pierce's complaint that he said, "I can take judicial notice that women can drive you crazy." But he did not apologize for the comment until several days later, when DPD Wills-Pierce confronted him about it. Moreover, he testified that he and then-Supervising Judge Barry Goode "had a chuckle" about it, which does not reflect recognition of the effect such a comment could have on a professional female attorney or her clients, particularly in a domestic violence case.

Further, Judge Laettner still blames the Contra Costa County Public Defender's Office, stating in his post-hearing briefing that "[i]t cannot be overlooked that all but one complainant" is from there, and that he is facing disciplinary action "only as the result of" circumstances involving a campaign against him by the Contra Costa County Public Defender. The masters found, and we agree, that the source of the complaints is irrelevant; it is the judge's conduct that matters.

Judge Laettner's inability to fully accept responsibility for his behavior was evident at his appearance before the commission on October 2, 2019. While he acknowledged generally the impropriety of his comments in Counts Two, Four and Five, he continued to deny responsibility for the significant acts of misconduct in Counts One and Three, and to blame others. Judge Laettner argued that the special masters were incorrect in each of the multiple instances they found his explanations or statements to be not credible, and he denied that he might have been mistaken as to any instance, even after hearing testimony from other individuals that was inconsistent with what he said was his recollection. When asked why he thought the special masters found some of his testimony to be not credible, he responded that they "weren't given the whole story." He claimed that he had "100 other witnesses lined up and ready to go," with "testimony that corroborated [him]," but that the masters did not allow their testimony. This assertion seems disingenuous in light of what actually occurred during this proceeding.

Judge Laettner called close to 40 witnesses on his behalf during the evidentiary hearing (and cross-examined the examiner's many witnesses). After the special masters heard 34 witnesses testify about Judge Laettner's character and honesty, Judge Laettner said he had seven additional witnesses he wished to call (Kim Carmichael, Thomas Wolfrum, Sergeant Mike Parrish, Deputy Sheriff Lisa Berry, DDA Melissa Smith, Peter Silten, and Laura Delehunt). The masters indicated that they had "heard a great deal of testimony with regard to Judge Laettner's character and traits for honesty, respect, and dignity," including "from some of the most well-respected judges in California," and they excluded the testimony of the last four witnesses on the ground that it was cumulative. Evidence Code section 352 allows the court to exclude evidence if, in its discretion, the probative value of the evidence is substantially outweighed by the probability that its admission will necessitate undue consumption of time. (See Dodds v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1995) 12 Cal.4th 163 [masters may exclude cumulative evidence].) Carmichael was not available to testify, but Wolfrum and Sergeant Parrish testified. Judge Laettner's counsel then informed the special masters that the judge had no other witnesses to call.

We note that testimony about the judge's reputation for honesty is different from that of percipient witnesses who would testify about the facts upon which the misconduct findings are based.

After the evidentiary hearing before the special masters was concluded, Judge Laettner submitted with his opening brief to the commission a request to reopen the evidence, pursuant to commission rule 133(a), on the ground that his due process rights under commission rule 126[7] had been denied because the special masters did not let him call additional witnesses to testify as to his "character for honesty."

Judge Laettner's request also sought to introduce declarations and testimony of witnesses with evidence that he claimed was new and that corroborated his testimony in the six instances where the masters expressly found his testimony to be not credible, summarized as follows:

(a) Declaration of former Judge William Kolin: In his proposed declaration, Judge Kolin does "not recall Judge Laettner being 'blanket' challenged under [Code of Civil Procedure section] 170.6 on all public defender cases." Judge Laettner was not alleged to be the subject of a blanket challenge on all public defender cases. The proposed declaration does not refute the masters' finding that Judge Laettner was not credible when he testified that he did not know of a blanket challenge by DPDs Osborne and Cuthbertson.

[7] Rule 126 states in relevant part that: "When formal proceedings have been instituted, a judge shall have the right and reasonable opportunity to defend against the charges by the introduction of evidence, to be represented by counsel, and to examine and cross-examine witnesses."

(b) Declaration of Deputy Sheriff Lisa Berry: Deputy Berry's proposed declaration states that she does not recall public defenders filing peremptory challenges against Judge Laettner on every matter. Like Judge Kolin's declaration, this is not relevant because there is no allegation that public defenders filed peremptory challenges against Judge Laettner on every matter.

(c) Declaration of DDA Jun Fernandez: DDA Fernandez was a witness during the hearing. His proposed declaration seeks to revise his prior testimony. Judge Laettner had ample opportunity during the hearing to elicit from DDA Fernandez all information relevant to the charges. Judge Laettner offered no reason why he did not do so during the hearing.

(d) Declaration of Deputy Scott Reed: Deputy Reed was also a witness during the hearing. The masters did not believe all of his testimony. His proposed declaration states that Judge Laettner said he was exonerating bail and resetting it in Imlay in open court with all parties present. Deputy Reed's declaration also states that he cannot recall if the court reporter was present when the judge issued the bail order, that public defenders commonly interchange cases, and that DPD Della-Piana was often flirtatious in the courtroom, whereas the judge was not.

Deputy Reed testified at the hearing, and Judge Laettner had a full opportunity to question him about all of the issues he seeks to address in the declaration, including that of bail in the Imlay case, which was a significant charge in the case. The judge offers no reason why he did not elicit the information in Deputy Reed's declaration during the hearing. And whether public defenders exchange cases has no bearing on whether Judge Laettner knew who was representing the defendant in Lauryn G. The issue of DPD Della-Piana's alleged flirtatiousness, and that of the judge, was also the subject of testimony and could, and should, have been fully addressed during the hearing.

(e) Testimony of Lisa Humiston: Judge Laettner also sought to reopen the evidence to have Humiston, his courtroom clerk, testify that he said in open court, with all parties present, that Ventura was remanded. Judge Laettner was notified of this allegation on August 4, 2017, and it was thoroughly addressed at the hearing. The judge included Humiston on his witness list, but he chose not to call her at the hearing. He offered no reason for not calling her.

The commission denied Judge Laettner's request to reopen the evidence on the grounds that he failed to establish that his due process rights were being violated or that there was good cause to reopen the hearing to take additional evidence, as required. (See Inquiry Concerning Hyde (2003) 48 Cal.4th CJP Supp. 329 [good cause requirement for reopening the record in formal proceedings].)

Accordingly, Judge Laettner's argument at his appearance that the masters did not get the "whole story" because he was precluded from calling "100 other witnesses" who would have refuted the masters' credibility findings is dubious at best.

Regarding the nature and seriousness of the misconduct, we find, for purposes of determining the appropriate level of discipline, that Judge Laettner committed five acts of willful misconduct and eleven acts of prejudicial misconduct. This is a significant amount of misconduct. Judge Laettner's willful misconduct includes two improper ex parte communications with DPD Della-Piana about pending cases for the impermissible purpose of addressing his frustration about her feelings toward him; his ex parte communication with DDA Fernandez because he was "mad" at DPD Della-Piana; and his retaliatory conduct in remanding DPD Thomas's client, without bail, without affording her the opportunity to be heard. His prejudicial misconduct includes the separate incident of remanding defendant Imlay and resetting bail without affording her attorney, DPD Della-Piana, the opportunity to be heard; inappropriate remarks to DPD Della-Piana; inappropriate comments to and about a number of women, many of which reflect gender bias; comments that create the appearance of bias based on physical appearance; and poor demeanor toward DPD Wills-Pierce because he was upset with DPD Thomas.

Judge Laettner claims that he did not know that comments about the physical appearance of women were improper, that he learned this from the commission's investigation letter and discussions with his presiding judge, and that he was not trained on this issue until September 2018. The masters noted that, presumably during Judge Laettner's 10 plus years on the bench, he "received ethics and conduct training, in the form of CJER's New Judge Orientation, and qualifying ethics courses, elective and mandatory, every three years." They also found that, after 10 years on the bench, "it can be expected that a judge's words and conduct will have conformed to the demands of the canons," but that Judge Laettner's did not do so.

We also note that the California Judicial Conduct Handbook in effect when Judge Laettner took the bench in 2006 addresses gender bias and states that unprofessional remarks made in the courtroom concerning an attorney's personal appearance can have an impact on the credibility of women in court and, when addressed to a woman lawyer, makes it difficult for her to effectively represent her clients. The 1999 Handbook also notes that exhibitions of gender bias have been regarded as conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute. (Rothman, Cal. Judicial Conduct Handbook (2d ed. 1999) § 2.11, pp. 37-38.) Thus, Judge Laettner should have been on notice that comments in the courtroom about a woman's personal appearance are inappropriate.

Judge Laettner also argued at his appearance that he has received a lot of counseling and now understands that he should not comment on women's physical appearance. But he introduced no evidence of that counseling at the evidentiary hearing. And his misconduct goes beyond improper comments to women. He did not indicate at his appearance that he understood why the additional misconduct (e.g., denial of due process and improper ex parte communications) was wrong; instead, he claimed that the masters were wrong.

Given the judge's failure to acknowledge the impropriety of much of his misconduct, and his lack of credibility before the masters, we do not believe that he has shown sufficient appreciation of his misconduct to assure us that he will not reoffend. "A judge's failure to appreciate or admit to the impropriety of his or her acts indicates a lack of capacity to reform." (Inquiry Concerning Platt (2002) 48 Cal.4th CJP Supp. 227, 248; Ross, supra, 49 Cal.4th CJP Supp. at p. 139.)

Judge Laettner contends that the masters found "undisputed" evidence that there will be no further misconduct. The masters made no such finding. They described him as an "asset" to the local bench, and, from this, he extrapolates a finding as to his future misconduct that the masters never made.

Judge Laettner's claim that he has committed no misconduct since 2017 is not given much weight because neither he nor the commission members would necessarily know if complaints have been made about him because the commission members are typically not told about a new complaint if it is received while formal proceedings are pending.

Regarding the impact of the judge's misconduct on the judicial system, the masters found that Judge Laettner's actions eroded public confidence in the dignity, integrity, and impartiality of the judiciary. They specifically noted that commenting on the physical appearance of women attorneys and joking about how "women can drive you crazy" diminishes the dignity of the process of the court. They said that partiality, showing favoritism, and referring to an attorney's physical beauty "strikes at the very foundation of the administration of justice and erodes public trust and confidence." We agree with the masters' findings that Judge Laettner's conduct had an adverse impact on the judicial system in general.

We also take into account the effect of the judge's conduct on other individuals. The masters found that two individuals' "employment circumstances changed as a byproduct of Judge Laettner's conduct." His former court reporter, Michel, said she left his department in June 2017 because she "could no longer take" his favoritism toward tall, skinny blondes and petite Asian women. DPD Della-Piana was transferred after bringing the judge's comments about being a "hard one" and "not spanked enough" to her supervisor's attention.

Laettner has no prior discipline. This is a mitigating factor in light of his 13 years on the bench. But because the aim of commission proceedings is protection of the public and not punishment, in the more serious cases involving willful and prejudicial misconduct, mitigating circumstances have only limited appeal. (Rothman et al., Cal. Judicial Conduct Handbook (4th ed. 2017) § 12:92, p. 856.) The commission has removed other judges from the bench who had no prior misconduct, particularly where dishonesty was involved (e.g., MacEachern, supra, 49 Cal.4th CJP Supp. at p. 311; Saucedo, supra, 62 Cal.4th CJP Supp. at p. 102.)

We also take into account the testimony of numerous witnesses in favor of Judge Laettner, and we acknowledge his years of judicial service and contributions to the bench. But the California Supreme Court has held that even a good reputation for legal knowledge and administrative skills does not mitigate willful misconduct or prejudicial misconduct. (Kloepfer, supra, 49 Cal.3d at p. 865.) And as the commission stated in Ross, supra, 49 Cal.4th CJP Supp. at page 90, "If the essential quality of veracity is lacking, other positive qualities of the person cannot redeem or compensate for the missing fundamental."

In light of all of the foregoing factors—but particularly the requirement that judges must, at a minimum, be honest and have integrity—we conclude that removal from the bench is warranted.

ORDER

Pursuant to the provisions of article VI, section 18 of the California Constitution, and rules 120(a) and 136 of the Rules of the Commission of Judicial Performance, we hereby remove Judge John T. Laettner from office and disqualify him from acting as a judge.

Commission members Nanci E. Nishimura, Esq.; Hon. Michael B. Harper; Anthony P. Capozzi, Esq.; Mr. Eduardo De La Riva; Ms. Sarah Kruer Jager; Ms. Kay Cooperman Jue; Dr. Michael A. Moodian; and Mr. Adam N. Torres voted in favor of all the findings and conclusions expressed herein and in this order of removal. Commission members Hon. William S. Dato, Hon. Lisa B. Lench, and Mr. Richard Simpson concur as to the factual findings and most of the legal conclusions expressed herein, but dissent as to the order of removal and would have imposed a public censure.

Dated: November 6, 2019

| INQUIRY CONCERNING JUSTICE JEFFREY W. JOHNSON,No. 204 | DECISION AND ORDER REMOVING JUSTICE JEFFREY W. JOHNSON FROM OFFICE |

I. INTRODUCTION

This disciplinary matter concerns Justice Jeffrey W. Johnson of the California Court of Appeal, Second Appellate District, Division One. Justice Johnson was notified of the commission's investigation in July 2018. A notice of formal proceedings was filed on January 4, 2019. The notice was amended three times to add charges. A third amended notice was filed on June 18, 2019.

Justice Johnson was charged with 10 counts, which with subparts contain 62 allegations of misconduct. The charges involve sexual misconduct toward 17 women he encountered at the courts where he worked and at professional functions (Counts One, Two, Three, Four, Five, Seven, and Nine), including the unwanted touching of several women; disparaging women with whom he works (Count Ten); poor demeanor toward those with whom he works (Count Six); and multiple instances of undignified conduct while under the influence of alcohol, which demeaned the judicial office (Count Eight).

The California Supreme Court appointed Hon. Judith L. Haller, Associate Justice of the Court of Appeal, Fourth Appellate District, Division One; Hon. Louis R. Hanoian, Judge of the San Diego County Superior Court; and Hon. William D. Lehman, Judge of the Imperial County Superior Court, as special masters to conduct an evidentiary hearing and prepare a report to the commission of their findings of fact and conclusions of law.

The special masters presided over 17 days of testimony, with over 100 witnesses and 120 admitted exhibits, and multiple discovery motions. The hearing took place between August 5 and 27, 2019, with an additional day of testimony on September 11, 2019, and closing arguments on October 8, 2019. The masters filed their report to the commission on January 3, 2020. The commission heard oral argument, presided over by then-chairperson Nanci E. Nishimura, Esq., on May 7, 2020.

The masters found that the allegations in Count One (in part), Two (in part), Three, Four (in part), Five, Six, Seven (in part), Eight (in part), Nine, and Ten were proven by clear and convincing evidence. They concluded that Justice Johnson engaged in 15 instances of prejudicial misconduct (comprised of 42 proven allegations), as well as 5 instances of improper action (comprised of 5 proven allegations).

Based on our independent review of the record, we conclude that the findings of fact in the masters' report are supported by clear and convincing evidence, and we adopt them in their entirety. In this decision, we summarize the factual findings. The findings include that Justice Johnson was, at times, intentionally dishonest in his testimony.

We adopt the masters' legal conclusions as to most of the allegations, but respectfully reach our own independent legal conclusions as to certain allegations. We find that Justice Johnson engaged in 18 instances of prejudicial misconduct.

In their report, the masters stated:

> The proven allegations establish Justice Johnson lacked personal boundaries; engaged in unwanted touching of several women; attempted to use the prestige of the judicial office to create personal relationships with women; and engaged in ongoing improper touching and sexually related comments toward his colleague, Court of Appeal Justice Victoria Chaney.

> Justice Johnson's pattern of conduct toward these women reflects ethical lapses that undermine the public's trust in the judicial process and erodes the confidence we ask the public to place in our individual judges. These lapses are compounded by Justice Johnson's failure to take responsibility for many of his actions and to manifest insight into his behavior. We find particularly concerning Justice Johnson's actions towards women who had recently graduated from law school; were in the early stages of their legal careers; and welcomed the opportunity to establish professional contacts with a Court of Appeal justice. Additionally, the evidence established the most serious misconduct occurred when Justice Johnson was intoxicated, impairing both his judgment and his recollection of events.
> In making these findings, we have carefully considered, but largely rejected, Justice Johnson's defenses, including that (1) witness memories of the relevant events were exaggerated or misconstrued because widespread negative publicity and unsubstantiated gossip caused many of the women to rethink and overstate their encounters; and (2) many of the witnesses (including Justice Chaney) should not be believed because they did not tell him his conduct was unwelcome or report his actions until many years later.

We find that, by engaging in sexual misconduct, Justice Johnson severely undermined public esteem for the integrity of the judiciary. Treating women disrespectfully, including unwanted touching and making inappropriate sexual comments, reflects a sense of entitlement completely at odds with the canons of judicial ethics and the role of any judge. Sexual misconduct has no place in the judiciary and is an affront to the dignity of the judicial office.

Justice Johnson refused to admit his most serious sexual misconduct. Rather than take responsibility for his offensive behavior, he maligned the victims, including his colleague Justice Chaney, and accused them of testifying falsely. But it is Justice Johnson whom the masters found, and we find, testified untruthfully in many instances.

As to the sexual misconduct Justice Johnson does admit, he claimed that he did not know it was wrong. At his appearance before the commission, he attributed the misconduct he has admitted to his being "friendly." But friendliness does not extend to sexualized behavior. Judges have been on notice for many years that men and women alike are entitled to a professional workplace free from inappropriate and unwelcome conduct, particularly from judges, who are held to a higher standard of behavior. Judges, including Justice Johnson, receive ethics training that reinforces this concept. In addition, Justice Johnson was personally cautioned about some of his inappropriate conduct. He failed to heed these warnings and to comport himself in a professional manner befitting his position.

At his appearance before the commission, Justice Johnson told commission members that he was raised to treat everyone "with respect and dignity." Yet he failed to treat everyone at the appellate court with dignity and respect, not only by engaging in sexual misconduct, but also by displaying poor demeanor to coworkers and making disparaging remarks about colleagues, and by becoming intoxicated and using the courthouse to socialize late at night, sometimes in the presence of courthouse custodians and court personnel who were working there.

Justice Johnson's misconduct has severely tarnished the esteem of the judiciary in the eyes of the public. Given his persistent denials of serious misconduct, we do not have confidence that he can reform, as he has not conveyed that he recognizes the extent of his wrongdoing. Further, given his lack of candor during this proceeding, we do not have confidence that he has the fundamental qualities of honesty and integrity required of a judge. Consequently, in order to fulfill our mandate of protecting the public, enforcing high judicial standards, and preserving public respect for the judiciary, we remove Justice Johnson from office.

Justice Johnson is represented by Paul S. Meyer, Esq., Reginald A. Vitek, Esq., Willie L. Brown, Jr., Esq., and Thomas J. Warwick, Jr., Esq. The examiners for the commission are acting commission trial counsel Emma Bradford, Esq., trial counsel Mark A. Lizarraga, Esq., and commission assistant trial counsel Bradford Battson, Esq.

II. LEGAL STANDARDS

A. Three Levels of Judicial Misconduct

Willful misconduct consists of unjudicial conduct, committed in bad faith, by a judge acting in a judicial capacity. (Broadman v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1998) 18 Cal.4th 1079, 1091.)

Prejudicial misconduct is "conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute." (Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (d).) The California Supreme Court has defined prejudicial misconduct as either "willful misconduct out of office, i.e., unjudicial conduct committed in bad faith by a judge not then acting in a judicial capacity" or "conduct which a judge undertakes in good faith but which nevertheless would appear to an objective observer to be not only unjudicial conduct but conduct prejudicial to public esteem for the judicial office." (Broadman, supra, 18 Cal.4th at pp. 1092-1093.) The subjective intent or motivation of the judge is not a significant factor in assessing whether prejudicial conduct has occurred. (Adams v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1995) 10 Cal.4th 866, 878 (Adams II).)

Improper action occurs when the judge's conduct violates the canons of the California Code of Judicial Ethics, but an objective observer aware of the circumstances would not deem the conduct to have an adverse effect on the reputation of the judiciary. (Inquiry Concerning Ross (2005) 49 Cal.4th CJP Supp. 79, 89.) A judge may be removed from office or censured based on willful misconduct or prejudicial misconduct, but not improper action. (Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (d).)

Only prejudicial misconduct and improper action are relevant in this matter because the examiner did not argue, and the special masters did not find, that any of Justice Johnson's misconduct constitutes willful misconduct, based on the assertion that it did not involve him acting in his judicial capacity. The masters accepted the parties' agreement that Justice Johnson was not acting in a judicial capacity in connection with the allegations. The commission accepts this agreement for purposes of this decision only, but notes that certain instances of misconduct occurred in the courthouse, while Justice Johnson was working with others on judicial matters, and other instances of misconduct occurred while he was at professional events in his capacity as an appellate justice.

B. Burden of Proof

The examiner has the burden of proving the charges by clear and convincing evidence. (Broadman, supra, 18 Cal.4th at p. 1090.) "Evidence of a charge is clear and convincing so long as there is a 'high probability' that the charge is true. [Citations.]" (Ibid.) Clear and convincing evidence is so clear as to leave no substantial doubt. It is sufficiently strong to command the unhesitating assent of every reasonable mind, but need not establish the facts beyond a reasonable doubt. (Ibid.)

C. Standards Regarding Masters' Findings and Conclusions

The factual findings of the masters are given special weight because the masters have "the advantage of observing the demeanor of the witnesses." (Broadman, supra, 18 Cal.4th at p. 1090.) The legal conclusions of the commission are given great weight because of the commission's expertise in evaluating judicial misconduct. (Ibid.) The commission may determine, however, that it is appropriate to disregard the factual findings and the legal conclusions of the special masters and make its own determinations based on its own independent review of the record. (See Inquiry Concerning Clarke (2016) 1 Cal.5th CJP Supp. 1, 7.)

III. FINDINGS OF FACT AND CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

BACKGROUND

Justice Johnson has been a judge for 19 years. He attended Duke University, studied at Oxford University as a Duke Scholar, and graduated from Yale Law School in 1985. He worked as an attorney in private practice from 1985 to 1989 and was an Assistant United States Attorney from 1989 to 1999. In 1999, he was selected as a United States Magistrate Judge for the Central District, where he served until his appointment in 2009 to the Court of Appeal, Second District, Division One.

COUNT ONE—Sexual harassment of Justice Chaney

Justice Johnson was charged with a pattern of conduct toward his colleague on the bench, Justice Victoria Chaney, that was unwelcome, undignified, discourteous, and offensive, and would reasonably be perceived as sexual harassment or gender bias (counts 1A-1J). The alleged misconduct involved multiple instances of unwanted touching and other sexual misconduct.

A. Proven charges found to constitute misconduct

The masters found, based on clear and convincing evidence, that Justice Johnson, while at court, asked Justice Chaney to have an affair with him after she had already declined his request (count 1C), said he wanted to "squeeze" her "titties" to make her "feel better" and then squeezed one of her breasts in the courthouse hallway (count 1D), repeatedly touched her breasts while hugging her (count 1E), occasionally patted her buttocks in the courthouse hallway (count 1F), commented on her nipples (count 1G), and warned her not to report him for sexual harassment (count 1J). They also found that, when they were on a work trip, he entered her hotel room uninvited (count 1B), and, at a restaurant, implied that she should not report him for sexual harassment (count 1H).

1. Findings of Fact

Count 1B: Entering hotel room uninvited

Justices Johnson and Chaney attended the National Judicial College in Reno in 2010. They had dinner together each evening. During these dinners, Justice Johnson drank alcohol and appeared to be intoxicated. Justice Chaney testified that, during dinner the first night, Justice Johnson asked her if she ever had an affair. She perceived this as a "come on." When they returned to the hotel, he escorted her back to her room and then followed her into her room uninvited, which made her uncomfortable. Justice Chaney testified that Justice Johnson did not say anything inappropriate, but he touched her shoulder, arm, and back, which made her feel uncomfortable. Although she felt uncomfortable the first night, she continued to spend time with Justice Johnson because they were colleagues on a court together, and were going to be working together for the foreseeable future. Justice Chaney also testified that, after subsequent dinners together, Justice Johnson again entered her room by walking close behind her when she opened her hotel room door. He left when she asked him to, but she felt upset and uncomfortable because she "felt that he wanted sex."

Justice Chaney's testimony about what occurred the first night was corroborated by the testimony of her best friend, Emily Bernardis, whom the masters viewed as an "open and honest witness." Bernardis testified that Justice Chaney called her from her hotel room and told her that Justice Johnson had been drinking and "pushed his way into the room," which made Justice Chaney "freaked out" and "very upset." Justice Chaney's testimony was also corroborated by Daniel Alexander (her friend and later her research attorney), and Raphael Gunner (her private yoga instructor of 17 years), each of whom testified that she told them about the incident. Gunner testified that Justice Chaney told him that, one evening, Justice Johnson pressured her to let him into her room, that it was obvious to her that he wanted to have a sexual encounter with her, and that she had to firmly keep him from entering the room. Alexander testified that, one year after the trip, Justice Chaney told him that she had dinner with Justice Johnson in Reno and that he had pushed into her hotel room, and she could not get him out. The masters found that, even though the testimony of Bernardis and Gunner did not precisely match Justice Chaney's testimony, it supported the fact that Justice Johnson came into Justice Chaney's hotel room uninvited for at least a few minutes on one night, and the witnesses confirmed the essence of what occurred. The masters also concluded that Justice Chaney's clear explanation of the incident was believable and consistent with other evidence showing Justice Johnson's overly friendly and overly familiar conduct with women, particularly when he is drinking alcohol.

The masters determined, however, that other details in Justice Chaney's testimony—that Justice Johnson touched her when he came into her hotel room the first night, and that he came into her room uninvited on additional nights after the first night—were not alleged in the notice, and were not disclosed to Bernardis, Gunner, Alexander, commission staff, or Administrative Presiding Justice Elwood G. Lui, to whom she reported Justice Johnson's conduct in connection with a workplace investigation conducted in July 2018 by outside counsel at the court's request. As a result, the masters declined to credit Justice Chaney's testimony on these points, and found that the truth of what actually happened in Reno was somewhere in between each party's version of the events.

Justice Johnson denied propositioning Justice Chaney or going to her room at any time during the trip, and said that he did not know where her room was located. He testified that her testimony that he came to her room was an "unequivocal lie." Justice Johnson also denied being intoxicated the first evening, claiming that he had one or two beers and that this matter is "full of stereotypes." The masters found Justice Johnson's denials about what occurred the first evening in Reno to be "untrue" and that his testimony reflected "intentional misrepresentations."

Justice Johnson asserted that Justice Chaney should not be believed because she testified incorrectly regarding certain details about the trip, such as the name of the hotel, the precise date of the event, and whether she had rented a car. Justice Chaney testified that she rented a car when they arrived in Reno, that she gave Justice Johnson a ride to their hotel, and that they stopped at a convenience store where she purchased Diet Cokes and he purchased a bottle of liquor of some sort. Justice Johnson called her testimony that she drove him in the rental car, and that he stopped to buy liquor, a "total fabrication." He produced copies of expense reimbursement requests he submitted in 2010 that show that he paid $45 for a taxi he and Justice Chaney shared between the hotel and the judicial college each day, and he testified that Justice Chaney paid for a taxi in the other direction each day. He asserted that this proved they used taxis to travel to the judicial college, not Justice Chaney's rental car. He also provided evidence that the program ended at 4:00 p.m. the last day and that his flight was at 5:30 p.m., so they would not have had time to return the rental car before his flight.

The masters agreed that some of Justice Chaney's testimony was not fully substantiated and/or conflicted with written records of the trip, but they concluded that this was the result of her "misremembering, rather than any intentional misrepresentation." They stated: "It makes sense that Justice Chaney would not remember the details of a trip that occurred more than nine years before she testified, but that she would recall an unsettling event—the fact that Justice Johnson came into her hotel room with some suggestion that he would like to carry things further."

The masters stated that this conclusion is consistent with the opinions of Dr. Mark Kalish, a forensic psychiatrist who testified on Justice Johnson's behalf regarding memory and how it is impacted by internal factors (e.g., an individual's personality, former experiences, and perspective), and external factors (e.g., the passage of time, "social contagion," which is the desire to be part of a group dynamic, and confirmation bias). They noted that Dr. Kalish has not conducted research in the area of sexual harassment. With regard to Justice Johnson's assertion that factors identified by Dr. Kalish as impacting witness memories are present in this matter, the masters stated: "In evaluating testimony, we have carefully considered these views and found some relevant and others inapplicable. For example, we agree that in the case of an emotionally traumatic event, witnesses accurately recall the 'gist' of the encounter, even if they are mistaken regarding details. Likewise, because the passage of time is always an important factor in evaluating witness testimony, we have found contemporaneous corroborating evidence quite helpful."

Justice Chaney and Justice Johnson also each testified that the other had made a sexual proposition while they were at the conference. The masters declined to fully credit either Justice Chaney's or Justice Johnson's versions regarding the propositions, noting that this allegation was not charged in the notice. They concluded that Justice Chaney and Justice Johnson had conversations about various personal topics, some of which may have included comments of a sexual nature, but did not encompass any form of sexual propositioning. Because this allegation was not charged, and neither party's version was found to be true, we decline to go into detail about the alleged sexual propositioning.

Count 1C: Asking her to have an affair

Between about February to April 2010, while they were in Justice Johnson's chambers, Justice Johnson told Justice Chaney that he wanted to have an affair with her and that they were "perfect together," or words to that effect. His affair proposal made her feel "more than uncomfortable," frustrated, angry, and nervous, and she became concerned about how she was going to get out of it. She responded that she was happily married, and said, "It's not good to dip your pen in the company inkwell," referring to the fact that a romantic relationship at work can be "complicated." Although she rebuffed his advances, within the next two months he again asked her to have an affair with him.

The masters found this improper because the conversations occurred at court during working hours while they were finishing a discussion about a case, and Justice Johnson continued to ask Justice Chaney to have an affair after she declined his offer. They found her detailed recall of this proposal to be "highly credible" and consistent with their findings regarding the events in Reno. Justice Chaney's testimony was corroborated by Justice Thomas L. Willhite, Jr. and Justice Lui, each of whom said that Justice Chaney told them about the incident. They also found it consistent with testimony given by independent rebuttal witness Nina Park, who testified that, during the same time period, Justice Johnson told her that he "wished his wife would have an affair or something to that effect because that would then kind of give him an open license to have affairs."

Justice Johnson denied the allegations. He testified that, in 2017, Justice Chaney said: "Wouldn't it be funny if we had an affair and no one knew. It would be our laugh alone, and no one else would know about it." He said he ignored the statement. He also said that she asked him if he wanted to see her MRI or X-ray, which he thought was strange because it would have been essentially a "naked" picture of her. The masters found that Justice Johnson's testimony on this subject, including that he "categorially denied ever asking Justice Chaney to have an affair," reflected "his failure to tell the truth."

Count 1D: Wanting to "kiss and squeeze [her] titties" and touching her breast

In approximately the summer of 2010, when Justice Johnson saw Justice Chaney in the courthouse hallway after a difficult hearing she had just finished, he said to her, "Well, I should kiss and squeeze your titties to make you feel better," or words to that effect, and then squeezed one of her breasts. Justice Chaney testified that she was shocked and upset, but did not say anything to Justice Johnson. She went immediately to her chambers and told her research attorney Adam Phipps what had happened. Justice Chaney testified that she was either crying or on the verge of crying, and that she was upset and shaking. The masters found Justice Chaney's testimony on this matter to be "highly credible." They further found that Justice Chaney's testimony about the motion Justice Johnson made with his hands, as though he would place them on her breasts, to be highly similar to his conduct with federal court employee Isabel Martinez, to whom he made a similar gesture after her breast augmentation surgery.

Justice Chaney's testimony was compellingly corroborated by attorney Eric George, to whom she disclosed the incident at a professional event later that day, only after he observed that she appeared to be upset and repeatedly asked her what was wrong. George confirmed Justice Chaney's account of what occurred. He testified that Justice Chaney told him that Justice Johnson had said he would "rub her breasts to make her feel better." Justice Chaney testified that she told George that she was having problems with Justice Johnson and was afraid of him, but she did not want to take any action because she was concerned that it would upset the "delicate balance" in her division at court.

Justice Chaney also discussed Justice Johnson's conduct with her friend Bernardis, her research attorney Alexander, and California Highway Patrol (CHP) Officers Tatiana Sauquillo and Matthew Barnachia. In October 2016, Justice Chaney had lunch with Officers Sauquillo and Barnachia and disclosed to them some of Justice Johnson's inappropriate conduct toward her. Officer Barnachia testified that, during the lunch, Justice Chaney "mentioned something to the effect that when she was hugging Justice Johnson, he grabbed maybe her breast or breasts," and that Justice Johnson had "offered to kiss her boobs to make her feel better." Texts between Officers Sauquillo and Barnachia after the lunch further corroborated Justice Chaney's testimony. Among other things, Officer Barnachia texted: "I can't believe he told her that kissing her boobs will make her feel better!!! And I saw her afterwards, the harassment still goes on according to her. It's not just a few random incidents. He wants that ass!! [emojis]" Officer Barnachia also texted: "He is a creep!"

Justice Johnson "strenuously denied" that this incident ever occurred and testified that he does not use the word "titties." He asserted that Justice Chaney was using every stereotype people want to buy into to blame him. The masters specifically rejected his denials about the incident.

Count 1E: Hugging and breast touching

On multiple occasions between January 2010 and June 2018, Justice Johnson hugged Justice Chaney and pressed against her entire body, intentionally touched her breast, and made comments such as, "Mmm-mmm" and "You feel good." Justice Chaney described the touching of her breast as "significant," and not light or fleeting. She testified that this occurred only when they were alone. She would pull away as fast as she could.

Justice Chaney's testimony was corroborated by the testimony of Gunner and Bernardis, whom she told about the breast-touching incidents close to when they were occurring. Justice Chaney's testimony was also corroborated by Alexander, who said that, in August or September 2017, Justice Chaney came into his office, upset and shaking, and told him that Justice Johnson had grabbed her breast again. And Justice Chaney's testimony was consistent with the independent testimony of former Assistant United States Attorney (AUSA) Barbara Curry, who described receiving similar hugs and hearing similar sounds from Justice Johnson, but without the breast-touching, many years earlier. Curry also said that Justice Johnson sometimes asked her questions about her sex life with her husband.

Justice Johnson denied ever touching Justice Chaney's breasts and said the hugs were mutual. As to the allegation that he would say "Mmm-mmm" while hugging her, he testified that she was "telling lies" and that the "stereotypical allegations" of him "being inarticulate and animal-like and making animal noises is a total insult."

The masters found that Justice Chaney had no motive to lie about the nature of the hugs or breast touching. The masters did not find, however, that the hugs occurred with the regularity to which Justice Chaney testified because there was no specific evidence of hugs occurring after 2014 until about September 2017, when Justice Chaney told Alexander that Justice Johnson had hugged her "again," suggesting that the offensive hugs had resumed following an extended period without hugs.

In addition, in February 2014, Justice Johnson told Justice Chaney that he was going to apply for a position on the California Supreme Court and asked her to write a recommendation letter in support of the appointment. Justice Chaney wrote a letter to the Governor's appointments secretary, along with Justice Robert M. Mallano, recommending Justice Johnson for the appointment. In the letter, Justice Chaney praised Justice Johnson as a "family man" who was "eminently qualified to sit on the California Supreme Court," who would "make a great contribution to our state," and who "has common sense and is collegial in dealing with the justices on his panel." When asked why she signed the letter given the ongoing harassment issues, Justice Chaney testified that she was not sure how much Justice Johnson understood about his inappropriate behavior and, given that she thought she was the only person at the court who was being sexually harassed, it was okay with her if he was appointed to the California Supreme Court. The masters found it doubtful that Justice Chaney would have written such a glowing letter if Justice Johnson had been grabbing her breasts with "significant pressure" once or twice a month during the years before she signed the letter.

Count 1F: Buttocks-patting

Between January 2010 and June 2018, Justice Johnson occasionally patted Justice Chaney on her buttocks while the justices were walking into oral argument. The masters found this conduct was consistent with Justice Johnson's overly personal and overly familiar conduct toward women in the workplace. Bernardis and Gunner corroborated Justice Chaney's testimony by testifying that she had told them about Justice Johnson patting her bottom.

Justice Johnson testified that this "never happened." He argued that witnesses, including four justices who walked with Justice Johnson and Justice Chaney to oral argument many times, testified that they never noticed any discomfort on the part of Justice Chaney when she was around Justice Johnson.

Count 1G: Comments about nipples

Between January 2010 and June 2018, Justice Johnson would make comments such as "You're happy to see me" or "Looking good today," and make sounds, such as "Mmm, mmm, mmm," while he was looking at Justice Chaney's chest area and the outline of her nipple was visible when she was wearing a sweater. Justice Chaney testified that she would change the subject, back away, or turn around, and that she tried using devices to cover her nipples, but they were uncomfortable and did not remedy the problem.

Gunner corroborated that Justice Chaney told him about the nipples issue. The masters found that this was a highly embarrassing topic for Justice Chaney to testify about, and she had no motive to testify about the comments if they did not occur. They also found that this conduct is consistent with Justice Johnson's overly personal behavior, his comments about breast implants to staff members when he worked at the federal court, and his repeated touching of Justice Chaney's breasts.

Justice Johnson testified that he did not remember Justice Chaney wearing a sweater, but if she did, he was not paying attention. He did not specifically deny this conduct, but he denied making the "noises" Justice Chaney was trying to attribute to him.

Count 1H: Squeezing and sexual harassment remark

In December 2013, Division One of the Second Appellate District held a holiday party at the Taix French Restaurant, attended by 35 to 40 staff members. Justice Chaney and research attorney Peter Israel approached the open bar, where there was an opening next to where Justice Johnson was standing. Justice Chaney testified that she and Israel squeezed in so that she was standing between Justice Johnson and Israel at the bar. Justice Chaney testified that Justice Johnson, who was drinking an alcoholic beverage, put his arm around her, touched her left breast, stroked her buttocks area, and made a "raunchy" comment about her breast or body part. She could not remember the exact comment. She said she was startled and embarrassed, and pulled away. She testified that Israel saw it and appeared startled, and that Justice Johnson said to her and Israel, "You can't sexually harass someone who's on your own level," or words to that effect. She further testified that Israel responded, "Justice Johnson didn't know the law of sexual harassment if he believed that."

Israel testified that he did not recall the incident or making the comment. Justice Chaney's research attorney Alexander testified that she later told him about this incident. Justice Chaney also told Justice Willhite about it.

Justice Johnson testified that Justice Chaney walked up to him and pressed against him, and that he did not rub his hand up and down her side, or put his hands on her bottom, or make the comment she attributes to him.

The masters found that Justice Johnson squeezed Justice Chaney against him as she stood next to him because this was consistent with their outwardly close and friendly relationship, they were at a holiday party where Justice Johnson was acting in an informal manner and was drinking alcohol, and his conduct in physically touching her had apparently become, in his view, a normal part of their relationship.

The masters did not find, however, that he squeezed her breast or buttocks or rubbed her body or made a vulgar comment about her body, as Justice Chaney testified, because Israel testified that he was present at the restaurant but did not observe such conduct. They also noted that many people were at the Taix event, and they did not believe that Justice Johnson would engage in the breast and buttocks touching, or make a "raunchy" comment, in view of others. The masters also did not believe that Justice Chaney would have written a positive letter about Justice Johnson to the Governor's appointments secretary in connection with his being considered for the California Supreme Court if all of the conduct she described had occurred.

Count 1J: Comment about reporting sexual harassment

In December 2017, during a discussion about sexual harassment, Justice Johnson said to Justice Chaney, "You would never report me [for sexual harassment], would you?" or words to that effect, and he was not joking when he said this. Justice Chaney testified that he was glaring at her and looked a little frightened, and she felt threatened. She responded by staring at him for a moment and then said, "No." Alexander testified that Justice Chaney told him about the incident.

The masters found little doubt that, by that time, because Justice Johnson knew of ongoing sexual harassment investigations of other judges, the widespread public conversation about the "Me Too" movement, and his own prior conduct, he would have serious concerns about whether information about his past conduct toward Justice Chaney and other women would come to the attention of the authorities.

Justice Johnson testified that he did not recall saying anything like that, but if he did, it would have been a joke.

The examiner did not object to the masters' factual findings regarding the foregoing charges (counts 1B through 1J). Justice Johnson's objections to these factual findings are addressed below.

2. Justice Johnson's objections to allegations involving Justice Chaney

In his post-masters' report briefing, Justice Johnson objected to the foregoing factual findings and argued that Justice Chaney should not be believed about any of the proven charges for the following reasons.

First, Justice Johnson argued that, if Justice Chaney actually believed she was a victim of sexual harassment, she would have reported him, but she never reported him to any authority, despite her duty under canon 3 to report judicial misconduct ("Whenever a judge has reliable information that another judge has violated any provision of the Code of Judicial Ethics, that judge shall take appropriate corrective action, which may include reporting the violation to the appropriate authority.").

Second, she treated him in a friendly manner, spent time alone with him, and referred to him as her "conjoined twin" and to herself as "the other twin." She would frequently engage in friendly communications with Justice Johnson in person and by telephone, email, and texting. They occasionally had lunch together, and, about six months after the alleged incident at the Taix restaurant, they had dinner alone together at a restaurant during an appellate justices' conference, rather than attending the official group dinner. In January 2017, Justice Chaney sent Justice Johnson a crude political cartoon with sexual overtones. It showed President Trump putting his hand underneath a woman's dress and grabbing her bottom, and, in the next panel, showed Russian President Putin grabbing Trump's bottom. Justice Chaney testified that she sent the cartoon to Justice Johnson because they had been having a conversation with Justice Frances Rothschild about President Trump, and the cartoon fit into what they were discussing.

Third, many witnesses (including four justices) testified that they did not see Justice Chaney displaying discomfort with Justice Johnson; rather, the two acted as if they were good friends and colleagues.

Fourth, Justice Chaney wrote the letter of recommendation to the Governor about Justice Johnson in February of 2014, listing his many positive attributes.

Justice Chaney testified about the following reasons she did not report Justice Johnson or tell him to stop sexually harassing her. She was concerned about the negative effect that such a report would have on the court's work, particularly in light of her awareness of conflicts and divisiveness among the justices of her division. She did not think there was a person at the court to whom she could report him who would take action on her complaint. She believed that, until the "Me Too" movement, women who complained were not believed and instead were ridiculed, fired, or marginalized. She was afraid of how Justice Johnson would respond based on his temper, which she had previously observed him display at court. She had conflicting feelings about him. She thought she was the only one being subjected to his sexual harassment and believed she could handle it because she is a "tough lady." Although she had heard rumors that Justice Johnson sexually harassed women outside the court, she did not know anything specific about his treatment of women at the court. Once she learned that others at the court claimed he had sexually harassed them and that she would be interviewed as part of a workplace investigation, she decided to report his conduct. Justice Chaney's concerns about the consequences of reporting Justice Johnson were corroborated by her friend Bernardis, her yoga teacher Gunner, research attorney Alexander, Justice Willhite, and Justice Lui.

In late 2013 or early 2014, Justice Chaney told Justice Willhite about various incidents involving Justice Johnson, including comments he made to her about her body, an affair, and Black men, and that he had touched her breast. Justice Willhite testified that he urged Justice Chaney to report Justice Johnson, but she did not think Justice Mallano, then the administrative presiding justice, would do anything about it because he and Justice Johnson were Yale grads and "seemed to be palling around together." Justice Willhite further testified that Justice Chaney said she was afraid of Justice Johnson's temper (see count 6A), that she was afraid it would be a "he-said, she-said, and he might insert racial overtones into it," and she did "not want to go through all that." She also said she had to work with Justice Johnson. She asked Justice Willhite to keep their conversation confidential, and he did.

In 2018, when Justice Chaney learned that she would be interviewed as part of a workplace investigation, she met with Justice Lui, who testified that she told him that Justice Johnson had asked her to have an affair, would grab her breast when he hugged her, said he should hug her "titties" and kiss them, and grabbed her breast at the Taix holiday party. Justice Lui testified that Justice Chaney told him she had not reported Justice Johnson earlier because she was "fearful" and "women of her generation didn't do that," she wanted to get along with the people in her division, and she could not just transfer somewhere else.

Dr. Louise Fitzgerald, an expert witness in sexual harassment called by the examiner, testified that women generally do not report sexual harassment because there is a "very high personal and professional cost to reporting, and reporting does not necessarily preclude further harassment." She also testified that if a victim has previously stayed silent about sexual harassment, she is more likely to come forward to prevent the same conduct from happening to other women. Dr. Fitzgerald said that learning that other women have been harassed or are at risk of being harassed can change the calculus and can outweigh the personal costs of reporting.

Based on Justice Chaney's testimony, and that of the expert witness, the masters accepted Justice Chaney's explanation that she believed disclosing Justice Johnson's conduct would seriously disrupt the work of their division, so she committed to maintaining a collegial relationship with him. Although they found her decision to write the letter to the Governor's appointments secretary "perplexing," and stated that her representations in the letter about his fitness, character, and collegial nature stand in "stark contrast" to her testimony, they concluded that Justice Chaney's statements in the letter "do not negate the reliability of her overall testimony." Further, while they agreed with Justice Johnson that Justice Chaney's failure to report his conduct raises "legitimate questions," they found that, despite her awareness of her duty, she made the deliberate decision to address the situation by working cooperatively with him, "an appeasement strategy commonly used by sexual harassment victims." The masters stated:

> Although in retrospect Justice Chaney's decision not to report or at least tell Justice Johnson his behavior made her uncomfortable may have been ill-advised, there was nothing in her actions that excused Justice Johnson's conduct.
> Any reasonable judicial officer should and would have known that you do not touch a colleague's breasts; you do not pat a colleague's buttocks; you do not comment on her nipples; and you do not state that you want to squeeze her "titties." The conduct would be wrongful under any circumstance, but was particularly objectionable because it occurred at the courthouse and reflected "an utter disrespect for the dignity and decorum of the court and is seriously at odds with a judge's duty to avoid conduct that tarnishes the esteem of the judicial office." [Citation.]

Justice Johnson also argued that Justice Chaney should not be found credible due to inconsistencies between some of her testimony and that of other witnesses. For example, Justice Chaney testified that she was unaware that other women at court were being harassed, but she admitted being aware in 2010 of numerous rumors that Justice Johnson harassed women outside of court, knowing that Officer Sauquillo was uncomfortable with Justice Johnson while Officer Sauquillo worked at the court, and knowing by February 2018 that Officer Sauquillo alleged that Justice Johnson propositioned her with sexually explicit language. Further, Justice Chaney did not identify Officer Sauquillo or Officer Barnachia as persons with knowledge of the relevant events during the workplace investigation at the court, even though she disclosed serious misconduct claims to them two years earlier.

The masters determined that the conflicts in the evidence concern "primarily collateral matters and/or reflect faded memories based on the passage of time, and do not suggest that Justice Chaney cannot be believed on the larger issues of whether [Justice Johnson] engaged in unwanted touching and inappropriate statements." They concluded that her omitting to identify Officers Sauquillo and Barnachia as individuals knowledgeable about Justice Johnson's conduct is consistent with her lack of recall about a conversation she had with Officer Barnachia two years earlier, as well as her desire to protect Officer Sauquillo's confidentiality.

Justice Johnson also posited that Justice Chaney should not be believed because some of her testimony about a telephone conversation she had with Justice Lui in July 2018 was impeached by Justice Lui. Justice Chaney testified that she thought Justice Lui asked her about a female officer in the judicial protection unit during their conversation, and he testified that he did not ask her anything about Officer Sauquillo and does not recall whether Justice Chaney mentioned Officer Sauquillo's name. This conflict or confusion seems to be based on whether Justice Lui identified Sauquillo by name during that conversation. Justice Lui's testimony on the subject is unclear and does not unequivocally impeach Justice Chaney's testimony. And it does not establish that Justice Chaney lacked credibility as to all her allegations.

Justice Johnson further argued that the masters used a "double standard" to credit Justice Chaney's testimony and discredit his testimony. The masters, however, did not unquestioningly accept Justice Chaney's testimony wholesale. To the contrary, they specifically declined to credit some of her testimony, including that Justice Johnson came to her hotel room uninvited all three nights of the conference in Reno, that he grabbed her breasts with "significant pressure" once or twice a month in the years before she wrote the letter of recommendation to the Governor, that he hugged her and touched her breast as frequently as she claimed, and that he touched her inappropriately and made a "raunchy" comment about her body at the Taix restaurant. They also credited Justice Johnson's testimony about Officer Sauquillo's most serious allegations by finding that the touching and sexual propositioning she alleged did not occur.

Based on our independent review of the evidence, we have determined that the masters properly evaluated the evidence and reached a balanced and correct assessment of what was proven—and what was not proven—by clear and convincing evidence as to the allegations in Count One. We agree that some of Justice Chaney's conduct while she was experiencing sexual harassment by Justice Johnson—particularly the letter to the Governor praising Justice Johnson, her ongoing friendly behavior, and referring to herself as his "conjoined twin"—seems odd and hard to explain. Nevertheless, we also agree with the masters that Justice Chaney's behavior toward Justice Johnson was part of her appeasement strategy, born of her desire to get along with her colleagues and maintain conviviality at the court. And we understand that this desire was one of the several reasons that she did not report him. Justice Chaney's attitude is supported by the testimony of Justice Mallano, who testified that he could understand why she might not want to report sexual harassment if it happened, and remarked: "How could you have four people working as partners, if one suggested that the other committed a sexual battery on them?" Finally, we accept that Justice Chaney had conflicting feelings about Justice Johnson, including being afraid of him, having witnessed his angry demeanor toward her and others.

We do not find Justice Johnson's objections to the masters' findings of fact regarding Justice Chaney persuasive or consistent with the evidence, and we adopt the masters' factual findings.

3. Conclusions of Law

The masters determined that Justice Johnson's conduct toward Justice Chaney, as described above, was unwelcome, undignified, discourteous, offensive, and would reasonably be perceived as sexual harassment of Justice Chaney. They also concluded that it constituted conduct prejudicial to public esteem for the judicial office and violated canons 1 (a judge shall observe high standards of conduct so that the integrity of the judiciary is preserved); 2 (a judge shall avoid impropriety and the appearance of impropriety in all of the judge's activities); 2A (a judge shall act at all times in a manner that promotes public confidence in the integrity and impartiality of the judiciary); 3B(4) (a judge shall be patient, dignified, and courteous to persons with whom the judge deals in an official capacity); 3B(5) (a judge shall not, in the performance of judicial duties, engage in speech, gestures, or other conduct that would reasonably be perceived as sexual harassment); 3C(1) (a judge shall not, in the performance of administrative duties, engage in speech, gestures, or other conduct that would reasonably be perceived as sexual harassment); and 4A(2) (a judge shall conduct all of the judge's extrajudicial activities so that they do not demean the judicial office).

The examiner did not object to these legal conclusions. Justice Johnson's objections to these legal conclusions are the same as his objections to the masters' factual findings, which we find are neither persuasive nor consistent with the evidence. We adopt the masters' legal conclusions.

B. Charges not proven to be misconduct

The masters also found that the facts in two charges involving Justice Chaney (counts 1A and 1I) were proven by clear and convincing evidence, as summarized below, but that they did not constitute misconduct.

Count 1A: Telephone call in 2009

1. Findings of Fact

In June 2009, Justice Johnson and Justice Chaney were nominated to the Court of Appeal, Second Appellate District, Division One, on the same day. Justice Mallano wanted to encourage collegiality at the court. He asked Justice Chaney to call Justice Johnson to welcome him to the court. Justice Chaney called Justice Johnson and told him that she was looking forward to working with him. He responded, "I didn't know you were so beautiful," and said he had seen her photograph in the newspaper that morning. The comment confused her, but did not make her uncomfortable.

Justice Chaney's testimony was corroborated by Alexander and Gunner, each of whom testified that she told them about the comment. Gunner testified that Justice Chaney told him about it shortly after the telephone conversation. The comment was also consistent with Justice Johnson's own testimony that he regularly complimented people, including on their physical attributes, as his way of creating a positive relationship.

Justice Johnson denied that the telephone call occurred. He testified that he had received calls from the two other justices on the panel and thought it was "unusual" that he had not received a telephone call from "the third person on the panel" to congratulate him.

The masters found Justice Johnson's credibility on this point to be questionable because he and Justice Chaney were nominated the same day, and Justice Chaney was not on the panel at that time. They stated that Justice Johnson's denial that the telephone call occurred illustrates his "lack of candor."

Neither party objected to the masters' factual findings, and we adopt them.

2. Conclusions of Law

The masters concluded that the comment was not judicial misconduct because a single comment to a colleague who was not necessarily offended by it does not rise to the level of a violation of the canons of judicial ethics.[1]

Neither side objected to the masters' legal conclusions, and we adopt them. We dismiss count 1A.

Count 1I: Remark re genitals

1. Findings of Fact

Around the time Justice Chaney signed the Supreme Court recommendation letter to the Governor, she had several conversations with Justice Johnson about why the Governor might not select him for the position. Justice Chaney testified that Justice Johnson discussed his belief that his being a Black male would be a negative factor. She testified that he said that a Black man is very powerful and people are "afraid of the size of a Black man's penis or 'cock' or 'dick'," and that "Black men can pleasure women or something on that order."

The masters found that Justice Johnson made the comments about the size of African-American male genitals, but not in a sexually suggestive or stereotyping manner.

Neither side objected to the masters' factual findings, and we adopt them.

[1] The masters also concluded (incorrectly) that because Justice Johnson made the comment before he was confirmed, it falls outside the commission's jurisdiction as pre-bench conduct. The commission has jurisdiction over conduct occurring within six years before the commencement of the judge's current term. (Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (d).) Justice Johnson's current term began in January of 2015. The commission has frequently disciplined judges for pre-bench conduct (e.g., Inquiry Concerning Couwenberg (2001) 48 Cal.4th CJP Supp. 205, Public Censure of Judge Paul D. Seeman (2013), Public Censure of Judge Charles R. Brehmer (2012), In re Charles S. Stevens (1982) 31 Cal.3d 403).

2. Conclusions of Law

The masters concluded that no misconduct occurred because the comments did not contravene the canons.

Neither party objected to the masters' legal conclusions, and we adopt them. We dismiss count 1I.

COUNT TWO—Conduct toward CHP Officers Sauquillo and Davison

It was alleged that Justice Johnson made vulgar sexual comments to CHP Officer Tatiana Sauquillo (count 2A), made comments about her appearance (count 2B), put his hand on her thigh while she was driving him (count 2C), and propositioned her for sex (count 2D). It was also alleged that he spoke to CHP Officer Shawna Davison in a sexually suggestive tone (count 2E).

A. Proven charges found to constitute misconduct

The masters found that Justice Johnson made comments to Officer Sauquillo about her appearance and his wife that made her uncomfortable and were improper (count 2B).

Count 2B: Comments to Officer Sauquillo about her appearance

1. Findings of Fact

Officer Sauquillo worked in the Judicial Protection Section (JPS) between 2013 and 2016. Her assignments included transporting Court of Appeal justices to work-related functions. Between October 2013 and May 2016, Justice Johnson occasionally made comments to Officer Sauquillo about her appearance when they were in his chambers, in the court hallways, and when she was driving him while she was assigned to the JPS unit. These comments included that she looked good in her uniform, that he would like to see her out of her uniform, that she looked cute and pretty, that he liked what she was wearing, and unflattering comments about his wife in comparison to Officer Sauquillo. His comments made her uncomfortable.

Justice Johnson admitted that he may have told Officer Sauquillo, "You look nice," but he denied making the other comments.

The masters found that Justice Johnson made the comments because he admitted complimenting Officer Sauquillo's appearance, Officer Barnachia believed that Justice Johnson had a "crush" on Officer Sauquillo, and Justice Johnson's comments were consistent with evidence that he often made these types of comments to women with whom he worked.

Neither party objected to the masters' factual findings, and we adopt them.

2. Conclusions of Law

The masters concluded that Justice Johnson's comments to Officer Sauquillo about her appearance and his wife would reasonably be perceived as sexual harassment, constituted prejudicial misconduct, and violated canons 1, 2, 2A, 3B(4), and 3C(1).[2]

Neither party objected to the masters' legal conclusions, and we adopt them.

B. Charges not proven to be misconduct

The masters found that three counts of alleged inappropriate conduct involving crude sexual propositioning and touching of Officer Sauquillo (counts 2A, 2C, and 2D), and one count of alleged suggestive conduct toward Officer Davison (count 2E), were not proven by clear and convincing evidence.

Count 2A, 2C and 2D: Touching Officer Sauquillo's thigh and propositioning her in vulgar language

1. Findings of Fact

Officer Sauquillo testified that, on April 11, 2014, when she was driving Justice Johnson back to court from a professional event in Baldwin Hills, he put his hand on her thigh and propositioned her for sex. She said that he asked if she wanted to go have drinks with him afterwards, and if she would go back to his chambers "to essentially have sex." She also testified that she was "pretty sure" it was at that event when he asked her to "pull over" to "have sex." She declined his overtures. During her direct testimony, she did not say that he said he wanted to "bend her over" or "fuck her from behind," as alleged. When asked on cross-examination if the drive from Baldwin Hills was when Justice Johnson made the "gross statements" to her (i.e., "bend her over," etc.), she said, "Yes," without elaboration.

She did not recall telling anyone about the alleged touching, crude statements, and propositioning while she still worked at the court. When she requested a transfer from the JPS, she did not tell anyone that it was because of Justice Johnson's conduct. She testified that she did not file a complaint about him because she wanted to avoid retaliation, which she had experienced when she previously reported her former CHP supervisor for sexual harassment. She testified that, after she left the court, she told Justice Chaney and Officer Barnachia about Justice Johnson's conduct, but was unsure whether she told either of them about the sexual propositioning with vulgar language. Officer Barnachia testified that he did not recall Officer Sauquillo saying anything to him about Justice Johnson making vulgar comments, propositioning her, or putting his hand on her thigh. Justice Chaney testified that she did not learn of Officer Sauquillo's specific claims until February 2018.

Justice Johnson strenuously denied these allegations and presented evidence that, in April 2014, he and his family were under tremendous stress arising from an incident in which his daughter was being stalked. He also provided evidence that Officer Sauquillo requested a transfer from the JPS unit due to conflicts with her supervisor, and she did not tell anyone it was because of him.

The masters found that the allegations that Justice Johnson once put his hand on Officer Sauquillo's thigh while she was driving him and sexually propositioned her in crude, graphic terms were not proven for several reasons.

First, Officer Sauquillo testified about only one occasion when he sexually propositioned her and touched her, which was while she was driving him from the Baldwin Hills event, and her testimony about this was "equivocal and evasive." For example, when asked to identify all of Justice Johnson's comments that made her feel uncomfortable, Officer Sauquillo briefly stated that, during the drive back, he asked her to have drinks and go to his chambers "to essentially have sex" and she was "pretty sure it was that event, too, when he asked [her] if [she] would pull over [to have sex]."

Second, she admitted that, several years earlier, a CHP supervisor had made vulgar comments to her that were identical to those she alleged Justice Johnson had made (i.e., wanting to "bend her over" and "fuck her from behind"). The masters found that, absent some connection, the possibility of Justice Johnson saying the exact same comments to Officer Sauquillo is "remote."

Third, the masters found it "troubling" that she did not recall telling anyone about the propositioning and vulgar comments until she met with Justice Lui in June 2018 in connection with the workplace investigation. While the masters acknowledge that delayed and selective reporting of sexual harassment is common, and that Officer Sauquillo had suffered retaliation when she reported her previous CHP supervisor for sexual harassment, they viewed these factors "under the unique circumstances" of her close relationships, and highly candid conversations, with Justice Chaney and Officer Barnachia and believed that she would have revealed his behavior to her trusted friends before finally doing so four years later, in February 2018.

Fourth, Officer Sauquillo continued to drive Justice Johnson for about two years and did not ask to not be assigned to drive him or testify about any similar conduct during that time.

Fifth, she testified that she left the JPS unit because she was worried about Justice Johnson's conduct, but her personnel records do not mention that reason, and two witnesses who were close with her testified that she complained about her then-supervisor, not Justice Johnson.

Sixth, no evidence was presented that Justice Johnson was intoxicated the evening of the Baldwin Hills event, which is distinguishable from other incidents in which Justice Johnson engaged in unwanted touching of women while he was intoxicated.

Seventh, Justice Johnson's testimony about the stress he was experiencing due to the events involving his daughter undermines the allegation that he engaged in the conduct at the time. The masters stated that all of these factors together "create serious misgivings about the accuracy of the charged allegations."

Neither party objected to these factual findings, and we adopt them.

2. Conclusions of Law

The masters concluded that the allegations were not proven with clear and convincing evidence.

Neither party objected to these legal conclusions, and we adopt them. We dismiss counts 2A, 2C, and 2D.

Count 2E: Invitation to Officer Davison

1. Findings of Fact

In November 2015, CHP Officer Shawna Davison was assigned to drive Justice Johnson home from the airport. This was the only time she performed a protective service detail for him. She testified that, when they arrived at his house, he invited her inside more than once to use the restroom and told her that no one was home. She perceived it as "sexual in nature" and "sexually suggestive," but she did not testify why she perceived it that way. She declined his offer.

The masters found that Justice Johnson invited Officer Davison into his house after she drove him home, but not that it was in a "sexually suggestive" tone or other improper manner.

Justice Johnson testified that he might have said she should feel free to use his bathroom because he knew she had another 50 miles to drive. He also said that he was upset and distracted that day because his best friend from college had died unexpectedly a few days earlier, he was involved with funeral arrangements and eulogies, and his wife was home to assist him. His wife corroborated that she was home that day to assist him.

Neither side objected to these factual findings, and we adopt them.

2. Conclusions of Law

While the masters found Officer Davison credible in thinking that his invitation was "suggestive," they found no misconduct based on the lack of any objective factors supporting her conclusion, as well as on Justice Johnson's credible testimony that he was distracted and upset that afternoon, and that he may have been concerned that Officer Davison would need to use the facilities before making a long drive.

Neither side objected to these legal conclusions, and we adopt them. We dismiss charge 2E.

COUNT THREE—Conduct toward attorney Butterick

Justice Johnson was charged with engaging in unwelcome, undignified, discourteous behavior toward research attorney Jessica Butterick, that would reasonably be perceived as sexual harassment, on three occasions in 2015 and 2018 (counts 3A, 3B, and 3C). The masters found that these counts were proven.

1. Findings of Fact

Butterick began working for Justice Luis A. Lavin at the Court of Appeal in August 2015. Justice Lavin's chambers were in the North Tower; Justice

Johnson's are in the South Tower. In September 2015, while Butterick was temporarily working in the South Tower, she encountered Justice Johnson. He asked her what she was doing there, and, while stroking her arm between her elbow and shoulder, said, "Well, we got to get you back over here more often." This made her feel uncomfortable.

Butterick's testimony was corroborated by research attorney Alex Ray, who testified that Butterick told him that she had just met Justice Johnson in the hallway, and that he had said something like, "I've never seen you around here before," and touched her arm or shoulder. Butterick also later told research attorney Merete Rietveld about it, which further corroborated her testimony.

At the evidentiary hearing in this matter, Butterick described the way in which Justice Johnson stroked her arm, which included touching her arm in an intimate manner such that his thumb was squeezing her upper arm or near her underarm.

Two months later, she told other attorneys she would not take an office near Justice Johnson's chambers because she felt uncomfortable being so close to his chambers. Ray corroborated this.

In February or March 2018, Butterick encountered Justice Johnson near his chambers in a hallway with photographs of Court of Appeal justices. When he saw her, he said, "You're new," and she responded that she had been Justice Lavin's research attorney for several years. He reached out to shake her hand for what she thought was an "unusual amount of time. Justice Johnson said, "Well, I'm Jeff Johnson. Why haven't we met before?" She replied, "Judge, we met a couple of times." He looked at the row of photographs of appellate justices, which Butterick described as a "row of very [W]hite men," and said to her, "Well, not a lot of people around here look like me." She responded, "Well, everyone here looks like me," because she believed most of the research attorneys were White women. He said words to the effect of, "No. Not a lot of people look like you." Butterick found this overly familiar, and it made her feel a little bit uncomfortable. Butterick's testimony about this encounter was corroborated by Ray, who testified that she discussed the incident with him at the time. The masters found that, in context, Justice Johnson's statements were intended to be a comment on Butterick's attractiveness and were overly familiar, and that the extended handshake was inappropriate in the workplace.

Later that week, Butterick again saw Justice Johnson in the hallway. He said to Butterick, "Twice in one week," and briefly stroked her arm, which was unwelcome.

Butterick testified that she did not report the conduct in 2015 because reporting inappropriate behavior is "never good for anyone's career," and she believed it would be "career suicide" and would not make a difference. In 2018, she learned that another research attorney, Katie Wohn, had reported Justice Johnson's inappropriate conduct to Justice Lui, so she gave Rietveld, who was communicating with Justice Lui about the workplace investigation, permission to give her name to Justice Lui because she wanted to support Wohn and protect other women.

Justice Johnson admitted the three encounters with Butterick and that they may have included "some form of physical touching," but he denied stroking her arm, particularly in the manner she demonstrated.

The masters found that the three encounters occurred, and that Justice Johnson put his hand on Butterick's arm and stroked it between her elbow and shoulder as he was shaking her hand and greeting her in 2015 and 2018, but that he did not do it in the manner she demonstrated at the hearing because that was not included in her earlier description of the touching to her friends or to commission staff.

Neither party objected to these factual findings, and we adopt them.

2. Conclusions of Law

The masters concluded that the conduct described above constituted a pattern that would reasonably be perceived as sexual harassment,[3] was prejudicial misconduct, and violated canons 1, 2, 2A, 3B(4), and 3C(1).

Neither party objected to these legal conclusions, and we adopt them.

COUNT FOUR—Conduct toward attorney Blatchford

Justice Johnson was charged with engaging in unwelcome, undignified, discourteous behavior toward his research attorney, Andrea Blatchford, that would reasonably be perceived as sexual harassment on six occasions in 2018 (counts 4A-4F). The masters found that all but one of these charges were proven.

A. Proven charges found to constitute misconduct

1. Findings of Fact

Count 4A: Hug and comment

Blatchford worked as a research attorney on Justice Johnson's staff, starting in February 2018. She transferred after five months. About a month after Blatchford began working in his chambers, Justice Johnson raised his voice and reprimanded her during a phone conversation. Afterward, they had a nice conversation about it, and he asked her for a hug. He hugged her and commented that he was very fond of her. Neither the hug nor the comment made her uncomfortable.

Justice Johnson acknowledged that Blatchford "basically told the truth" about the various incidents and that some of his conduct might have been inappropriate.

[3] See footnote 2.

Count 4B: Questions about tattoos

In about May 2018, Justice Johnson and Blatchford were in his chambers, and he pointed to her forearm and asked, "Is that a tat?" [referring to tattoos]. She responded, "Yes." He asked her if she had any more. She said she had five and identified some of them. After the conversation ended, she returned to her office and was working when Justice Johnson came to her office and asked, "Where are the other two?" His question made her a little uncomfortable because he reinitiated the conversation "sort of randomly."

Justice Johnson admitted asking about the tattoos but said he believed the discussion was appropriate because he thought of tattoos as "art" and did not intend anything sexual by his question. He now understands that his behavior was not appropriate. The masters found his "attempts to justify or explain his comments to be unsupported."

Count 4C: Questions about boyfriend

In April or May 2018, Justice Johnson asked Blatchford several questions about her boyfriend. He asked if her boyfriend was an intellectual and said, "You strike me as an intellectual . . . I think it's very important for two people to share that in common." Blatchford felt this discussion was "too personal."

Shortly thereafter, while discussing how to value stolen property in connection with a restitution issue, Blatchford, seeking to show the difficulty in valuing items, noted that a necklace from Tiffany that she was wearing had cost only $200. Justice Johnson asked, "Is that necklace a gift from your boyfriend?" The question made her a little bit uncomfortable because she was wondering why he was asking about her boyfriend again.

In June 2018, Justice Johnson brought up Blatchford's boyfriend again. When she mentioned that she lived in Baldwin Hills, a historically Black neighborhood, he asked, "Oh, is your boyfriend Black?" She said, "No." He then asked her, "Have you ever dated Black guys?" She replied, "Yes." He said, "Well, I guess you went back then." Blatchford understood that Justice Johnson was referring to a well-known joke that, “Once you go Black, you never go back.” Blatchford said she felt shocked by the comment because the only other time someone said that to her was when a Black man was hitting on her or flirting with her, and because it is a “very explicit reference to the stereotype that Black men are well-endowed,” compared to White men. Blatchford felt really uncomfortable, and she just wanted to “make it stop and get out.”

Justice Johnson admitted asking the questions and making the “Well, I guess you went back then” comment, but said it was a “really dumb joke” that was intended to make fun of a stereotype. He testified that he thought she would see how he was making fun of a stereotype because Blatchford “seemed to be a really enlightened person.” He also testified that he now understands that she felt uncomfortable, and acknowledged that the joke was in poor taste. He apologized for the joke and accepted full responsibility for it.

Count 4D: Comment about President Trump and Stormy Daniels

Justice Johnson, Blatchford, and others were at a staff lunch at the Blue Cube restaurant in May 2018. A research attorney raised the subject of a recent television interview of Stormy Daniels and said she did not believe the sexual contact between Daniels and President Trump was consensual. Justice Johnson commented, “To me, it just sounded like it was pedestrian sex.” Blatchford understood this to mean that the sex itself was “standard, boring, and not kinky,” and it made her uncomfortable because the discussion had been about consent versus coercion, not sex.

Justice Johnson admitted making the statement, but testified that it was merely a shorthand or sanitized version of Daniels’s comments about the quality of President Trump’s sexual performance. The masters found “his attempts to justify or explain his comments to be unsupported.” Justice Johnson testified that he now realizes that there were different sensibilities among those present, and he did not appreciate or respect them the way he should have at the time.

Count 4F: Comment about prostate exam

During a chambers conversation with Blatchford and Justice Helen Bendix, after Justice Bendix mentioned her gynecologist appointment and said, "You men don't have to go through the kinds of things women do," Justice Johnson responded, "Well, there is a prostate exam," and then said, "But it's not like we get aroused during those exams," and laughed. This made Blatchford uncomfortable because "it was yet another instance when he was sort of injecting sex into a conversation that really had nothing to do with sex." Justice Bendix testified that she recalled saying something about the appointment and that women need to go to these appointments regularly, but she did not remember Justice Johnson responding to her statements.

Justice Johnson denied making the comment about "arousal," but the masters credited Blatchford's testimony on this issue because she recalled that the comment was unnecessary to the conversation, and it was consistent with her observations that Justice Johnson frequently injects sex-related topics into routine conversations.

Neither party objected to the factual findings regarding the foregoing counts, and we adopt them.

2. Conclusions of Law

The masters stated: "Justice Johnson engaged in a pattern of conduct toward his research attorney Blatchford that made her feel uncomfortable. The conduct included asking her overly personal questions about topics related to her tattoos and her boyfriend; making a joke based on sexual and racial stereotypes; making a sexual reference during a staff lunch that was out of context for the specific topic being discussed; and making a joke about sexual arousal while in his chambers. Considered together, the comments were unwanted and had no place in the courthouse or at the staff lunch during the work day." They concluded that allegations proven in counts 4A, 4B, 4C, 4D, and 4F were part of a pattern that would reasonably be perceived as sexual harassment,[4] constituted prejudicial misconduct, and violated canons 1, 2, 2A, 3B(4), and 3C(1).

Neither party objected to these legal conclusions, and we adopt them.

B. Charges not proven to be misconduct

Count 4E: Comment about being his "favorite"

Justice Johnson told Blatchford that she was his "favorite" and put his finger to his lips. Blatchford felt uncomfortable because she did not think it was healthy to compare employees that way, and she did not want to keep secrets from her coworkers. She told him that she did not like him saying that, but he continued to make the comment to her several times. She acknowledged that the comments were made in the context of Justice Johnson's appreciation for her work.

Justice Johnson admitted making the comment that Blatchford was his favorite and putting his finger to his lips. He said he did so because he did not want to make his other attorneys feel bad.

The masters found that, although these facts were proven, the "favorite" comments did not constitute misconduct because Blatchford and Justice Johnson understood that they were made in reference to Blatchford's work.

Neither party objected to these factual findings or legal conclusions, and we adopt them. We dismiss count 4E.

COUNT FIVE—Conduct toward other women at the appellate court

Justice Johnson was alleged to have engaged in inappropriate conduct toward several Court of Appeal employees: judicial assistants Trisha Velez (count 5A) and Carolyn Currie (count 5C), research attorney Katie Wohn (count 5B), and Court of Appeal Justice Elizabeth Grimes (count 5D). All of these charges were found proven.

[4] See footnote 2.

Count 5A: Judicial assistant Velez

1. Findings of Fact

In 2013, Justice Johnson repeatedly asked Justice Chaney's judicial assistant Trisha Velez to join him for coffee, which she declined about five times. He later saw her walking into the courthouse when Justice Chaney was scheduled to be absent, and told her she had no excuse not to join him for coffee. She reluctantly agreed. During their conversation at the Syrup café, he told her that, if he were appointed to the California Supreme Court, he would like to bring her as one of his judicial assistants. She agreed to have coffee with him a second time, during which he told her he was "unhappily married" and asked about her private life. When she said her first husband was a "philanderer," he replied that if he were married to her, he "would never leave her bed," and that he liked her. This incident had a big impact on her and made her very uncomfortable and upset. Two weeks later, Justice Johnson approached her at her desk, and she told him that she was never going to coffee or anywhere with him again. Five minutes later, he telephoned her and asked her to come to his chambers and said he wanted to talk to her. This made her feel "panicked," and she contacted research attorney Kristi Cook, who suggested that they immediately leave the court together, which they did. During the five years following the coffee outings, Justice Johnson made comments like, "You're my favorite," "I love you" and wink at her, "I got your back," and "We're good," and would blow kisses at her. Justice Johnson also told Justice Chaney and Justice Rothschild about Velez's private life, which he learned about from Arash Goleh, a friend of his who had attended high school with Velez. Velez was embarrassed and horrified that the justices were discussing her personal life.

Justice Johnson admitted having coffee with Velez twice, asking her to come to his chambers, and making personal statements about her private life to others. He said he regretted revealing Velez's personal information. Justice Johnson denied making the comment that, if he were married to her, he would never leave her bed. He testified that he was "100 percent confident" that he said, "A good man wouldn't leave his wife at home in bed wondering where he was." He also denied telling her he was unhappy in his marriage.

The masters found that his testimony denying the "I would never leave your bed" remark was "not credible" and reflects his "intentional fabrication of the relevant facts." They noted that, in his written response to the preliminary investigation letter, Justice Johnson denied conveying to Velez "anything about a bed." They said: "This evolution in his description of the conversation suggests that Justice Johnson is being untruthful and is attempting—upon further reflection—to posit an innocent (but false) context for his remarks." They further noted that, although in his response to the commission's preliminary investigation letter he denied calling her his favorite and blowing her kisses, he did not attempt to rebut these allegations at the evidentiary hearing.

The masters found Velez to be a credible witness who described the events in a detailed and straightforward manner, without embellishment, and who had no motive to misrepresent the facts. Her testimony about her conversations at the Syrup café were corroborated by Cook, with whom Velez discussed Justice Johnson's actions, including the remark about never leaving her bed. Velez's testimony was further corroborated by Justice Johnson's judicial assistant Carolyn Currie, who testified that Velez told her about going to coffee with Justice Johnson, his comment about never leaving her bed, and Velez's statement to her that Justice Johnson was the "biggest sexual harasser." The masters also found Justice Johnson's statements to be consistent with those he made to other women about being in love with them if they had met when they were younger and being unhappily married.

Neither party objected to the masters' factual findings, and we adopt them.

2. Conclusions of Law

The masters concluded that seeking to create a personal or romantic relationship with Velez during working hours, making sexually suggestive remarks at a café, making inappropriate and overly personal statements to her for the next five years, and discussing her personal life with others without her permission was part of a pattern that would reasonably be perceived as sexual harassment,[5] constituted prejudicial misconduct, and violated canons 1, 2, 2A, 3B(4), and 3C(1). As the masters stated, "Respect for the judicial office is diminished when a judicial officer uses sexually suggestive language and seeks to establish a personal or romantic relationship with a judicial assistant during working hours over her clear discomfort."

Neither party objected to these legal conclusions, and we adopt them.

Count 5B: Attorney Wohn

1. Findings of Fact

Katie Wohn was Justice Johnson's research attorney between 2009 and 2015. Between August 2009 through November or December 2012, Justice Johnson made multiple comments about Wohn's appearance and scent, including telling her that certain clothing "looked great" on her, that she "smelled nice," and that she had "beautiful eyes," which made her feel uncomfortable. He also invited her to lunch for her birthday in 2012. She tried to invite other people to join, but no one was available. It was the first time she went to lunch with Justice Johnson. During the lunch, Justice Johnson told Wohn that if he had been in high school with her, he would have been in love with her. This made her feel very uncomfortable because he was looking straight at her and "it seemed flirtatious." She felt it was a "lead-in to looking for more of a relationship" than a work relationship. She responded with something like, "No, you wouldn't," and they left soon after. Wohn testified that Justice Johnson stopped making compliments and personal comments to her after they had a disagreement about her work schedule.

[5] See footnote 2.

Wohn also testified that Justice Johnson would often sit in a guest chair in his office that allowed him to stare directly into her office, which made her so uncomfortable that she would bring in large flower arrangements to block his view. She also testified that she saw him intoxicated and with a woman late at night in his chambers, and that she saw beer bottles in his office trash can when she arrived in the morning. She did not report his conduct because she did not believe the court would follow up.

Justice Johnson did not specifically deny saying that he would have been in love with Wohn if he had been in high school with her. He admitted making the statements to Wohn about her appearance and smell, but denied that he did so for an improper purpose or to make Wohn uncomfortable. He argued that they were only "social compliments" that are "part and parcel of casual conversation amongst adults." The masters rejected this contention and stated that his comments about his supervised employee's appearance were not appropriate conversation at work. Justice Johnson also claimed that Wohn's testimony reflected an embellished memory after she spoke with other Court of Appeal attorneys. The masters also rejected this, stating that, based on Wohn's testimony, they were convinced that, from day one, Wohn was uncomfortable with Justice Johnson's informal and overly personal communications with his staff and became increasingly offended when he began making compliments about her appearance and staring at her.

Neither party objected to these factual findings, and we adopt them.

2. Conclusions of law

The masters concluded that Justice Johnson's remarks would reasonably be perceived as sexual harassment[6] and violated canons 1, 2, 2A, 3B(4), and 3C(1), but because they were isolated and the content did not bring disrepute to the judicial office, they constituted improper action, rather than prejudicial misconduct.

Justice Johnson did not object to these legal conclusions. The examiner objected and requested that this charge be combined with four others (counts 5A, 5C, 5D, and 10) and be found to constitute prejudicial misconduct. We agree with the examiner that Justice Johnson's remarks to Wohn should be deemed prejudicial misconduct, rather than improper action. We agree with the masters that the conduct would reasonably be perceived as sexual harassment and conclude, therefore, that because the perception of sexual harassment is involved, a reasonable observer would find it prejudicial to public esteem for the judicial office. In addition, the fact that Justice Johnson was Wohn's supervisor while he was engaging in the misconduct is relevant to our determination. Accordingly, we find that the allegations involving Wohn constituted prejudicial misconduct. We do not find it necessary to consolidate these charges with others, as the examiner suggests, in order to conclude that Justice Johnson's conduct toward Wohn constitutes prejudicial misconduct.

Count 5C: Judicial assistant Currie

1. Findings of Fact

Between 2009 and 2011, Justice Johnson made comments to his judicial assistant Carolyn Currie about her appearance and scent, such as "You look hot," and "You smell good," that made her uncomfortable. Currie said she did not report Justice Johnson's conduct because she did not know what the process was, she did not know of anyone to go to, and Justice Johnson was her boss and had the power to fire her.

The masters found that Currie's testimony was "highly credible," and that her testimony was supported by evidence showing that Justice Johnson frequently did not conduct himself in accord with professional standards at work, and that he often acted in an overly personal and inappropriate manner with his staff and other employees.

Justice Johnson admitted making the complimentary comments. He said he did not realize that using the word "hot" to compliment someone's outfit was socially inappropriate, and that his intent was solely to express that something looks "really good" on the person.

Neither party objected to the masters' factual findings, and we adopt them.

The masters concluded that Justice Johnson's remarks would reasonably be perceived as sexual harassment[7] and violated canons 1, 2, 2A, 3B(4), and 3C(1), but because they were isolated and the content did not bring disrepute to the judicial bench, they constituted improper action, rather than prejudicial misconduct.

The examiner objected on the ground that the conduct should constitute prejudicial misconduct. We agree with the examiner that if the conduct would reasonably be perceived as sexual harassment, a reasonable observer would find it prejudicial to public esteem for the judicial office. We also find it relevant that Justice Johnson was Currie's supervisor while he was engaging in the misconduct. Accordingly, we find that the allegations involving Currie constitute prejudicial misconduct. We decline the examiner's request to consolidate this charge with others because we find that it constitutes prejudicial misconduct on its own.

Count 5D: Justice Grimes

1. Findings of Fact

In about 2010, Justice Johnson told Justice Elizabeth Grimes, who was wearing workout shorts and a top at lunchtime, something like, "You have the cutest little ass in the Second Appellate District." He repeated his remark to Justice Chaney, who was present and asked him what he had said. Justice Chaney's testimony on this subject was supported by evidence showing that

[7] See footnote 2.

Justice Johnson would regularly notice and remark on the physical attributes of women, including those with whom he worked (see, e.g., testimony of Officer Barnachia, Officer Sauquillo, Wohn, Currie, and Butterick).

Justice Grimes testified that she did not recall the remark. She acknowledged, however, that she would regularly work out with a personal trainer during the relevant time period. Justice Lui testified that, after Justice Chaney told him about the "best ass" remark, he asked Justice Trisha Bigelow whether she was aware of any inappropriate actions or statements by Justice Johnson, and she volunteered that Justice Grimes had told her about the "best ass" statement.

Justice Johnson denied making the remark and said it was "another lie" by Justice Chaney.

Neither party objected to these factual findings, and we adopt them.

2. Conclusions of law

The masters found that Justice Johnson made the "cutest ass" (or similar) statement in a public space that could have been overheard by others (and was overheard by Justice Chaney) during work hours in front of the courthouse building, which, even if in jest, was inappropriate and undignified, in violation of canons 1, 2, 2A, and 3B(4). They concluded that because it was a single remark and not in a courtroom setting, an objective observer would not conclude that it diminished public esteem for the judicial office; therefore, it was improper action and not prejudicial misconduct. They also did not find that it created the appearance of sexual harassment.

The examiner requested that this charge be grouped with others as prejudicial misconduct. We decline to do so because we do not believe a reasonable observer would necessarily find that the comment, made by one judge to a peer, would tarnish public esteem for the judiciary. We adopt the masters' legal conclusions.

COUNT SIX—Demeanor toward people at the appellate court

Justice Johnson was charged with displaying poor demeanor toward four court employees: Justice Chaney (count 6A), judicial assistant Carolyn Currie (count 6B), his research attorney Ellen Lin (count 6C), and Justice Chaney's research attorney Daniel Alexander (count 6D). All of these charges were found proven.

Count 6A: Justice Chaney

1. Findings of Fact

Shortly after an oral argument session in October or November 2009, Justice Johnson approached Justice Chaney in the courthouse hallway, got very close to her, pointed and shook his finger in her face, and said, "Don't you ever interrupt me again." The encounter left her shocked and frightened. Justice Chaney's yoga teacher Gunner testified that she told him about this incident, which left her shaken.

Justice Johnson denied that the incident occurred and suggested that Justice Chaney is overly sensitive.

The examiner did not object to the masters' factual findings. Justice Johnson objected on the general grounds that Justice Chaney was not credible, as discussed in Count One above. We do not find Justice Johnson's objections persuasive or consistent with the evidence, and we adopt the masters' factual findings.

2. Conclusions of Law

The masters concluded that Justice Johnson displayed anger toward Justice Chaney without justification and that this was prejudicial misconduct and violated canons 1, 2, 2A, and 3B(4).

The examiner did not object to the masters' legal conclusions. Justice Johnson objected on the general grounds regarding Justice Chaney, as discussed in Count One above. We do not find Justice Johnson's objections persuasive or consistent with the evidence, and we adopt the masters' legal conclusions.

Count 6B: Judicial assistant Currie

1. Findings of Fact

On multiple occasions between 2009 and 2018, when Justice Johnson's judicial assistant Currie questioned his instructions, he raised his voice (but did not yell), called her "defiant," and told her he was the boss and she needed to do what he said. Currie testified that she would generally respond by going to the bathroom and crying. The masters found that his conduct was not justified because, although a supervisor can become frustrated and angry when a supervised employee challenges his or her decisions, a judge is required to be patient, dignified, and courteous with all persons with whom the judge deals, including court personnel.

Justice Johnson admitted becoming upset with Currie six or seven times and talking to her in a stern tone, but he denied yelling at her.

Neither party objected to the masters' factual findings, and we adopt them.

2. Conclusions of Law

The masters concluded that the conduct toward Currie was improper action because Justice Johnson's discourteous treatment of her happened only a "handful" of times in eight years, the conduct reflected frustrations that are not uncommon when supervisors and staff disagree, and the remarks were not flagrant. They concluded that the conduct violated canons 1, 2, 2A, and 3B(4).

Neither party objected to these legal conclusions, and we adopt them.

Count 6C: Attorney Lin

1. Findings of Fact

Between October 1, 2015 and September 9, 2016, Justice Johnson told his research attorney Ellen Lin that her work on draft opinions was "horrible" and "ignorant," yelled at her on numerous occasions, and stomped his feet while yelling at her on at least one occasion. The masters found Lin to be highly believable, and her testimony was corroborated by Currie, who testified that she twice heard Justice Johnson "aggressively yelling" at Lin when he was in Lin's office with the door closed, and by judicial assistant Tracey Bumgarner, who testified that she once heard Justice Johnson yelling at Lin. The masters stated that the fact that Justice Johnson was not satisfied with Lin's work did not provide justification to yell and stomp his feet at a supervised employee.

Justice Johnson did not specifically deny yelling at Lin. He acknowledged that he was highly frustrated with the quality of Lin's work.

The examiner did not object to the masters' factual findings. Justice Johnson objected that the findings regarding yelling are unsubstantiated. Because the masters found that Currie and Bumgarner corroborated the yelling allegation, we adopt the masters' factual findings, including as to yelling.

2. Conclusions of Law

The masters concluded that Justice Johnson used derogatory and humiliating words to criticize Lin's work, which was prejudicial misconduct and violated canons 1, 2, 2A, and 3B(4).

Neither party objected to the masters' legal conclusions, and we adopt them.

Count 6D: Attorney Alexander

1. Findings of Fact

In approximately December 2017 or January 2018, when Justice Johnson was discussing a case with Justice Chaney and Justice Rothschild, and research attorney Alexander, he disagreed with Alexander about how the case should be decided and became angry and yelled at Alexander over their difference of opinion. Alexander testified that it was like an "explosion," and that Justice Johnson called him and Justice Chaney "stupid," which felt humiliating. The masters found his testimony credible.

Justice Chaney corroborated Alexander's testimony, stating that Justice Johnson disagreed with Alexander "strongly, rudely, aggressively" and called them “stupid.” She said it was frightening and upsetting. Justice Rothschild also corroborated Alexander’s testimony, testifying that Justice Johnson became angry and aggressive with Alexander, and she believed his anger to be inappropriate to the situation.

The masters found that Justice Johnson attacked Alexander personally by yelling at him in a demeaning fashion, which was offensive and discourteous.

Justice Johnson denied acting inappropriately or calling Alexander “stupid.” He described Alexander’s claim that he called Alexander “stupid” an “abject lie.” Johnson’s defense was supported by the testimony of Roger Smith, his former research attorney, who described Johnson’s communication style as forceful and direct, but without animosity or ill will. He said he never saw Justice Johnson show anger. Smith said that when Justice Johnson engaged in a vigorous discussion about the law, his voice would go up in volume and acquire an edge, which he did not regard as yelling, although others might. Rebekah Young, another former research attorney, also testified that she never saw Justice Johnson act inappropriately in terms of tone or demeanor, and she always observed him to be respectful of staff attorneys from other chambers.

The examiner did not object to the masters’ factual findings. Justice Johnson objected that the findings regarding yelling are unsubstantiated, as corroborated by Justice Rothschild. But Justice Rothschild corroborated that Justice Johnson displayed inappropriate anger toward Alexander. Because the masters found that Justice Rothschild and Justice Chaney corroborated the yelling allegation, we adopt the masters’ factual findings, including as to yelling.

2. Conclusions of Law

The masters concluded that Justice Johnson’s disrespectful conduct toward Alexander was not patient, dignified, or courteous, which was prejudicial misconduct, and violated canons 1, 2, 2A, and 3B(4).

Neither party objected to these legal conclusions, and we adopt them.

COUNT SEVEN—Conduct toward other women attorneys

Justice Johnson was charged with engaging in a pattern of conduct toward other women attorneys that demeaned the judicial office and lent the prestige of judicial office to advance his personal interests. The alleged conduct involved the following female attorneys, who did not work at the Court of Appeal: Melanie Palmer (count 7A), Allison Schulman (count 7B), Wendy Segall (count 7C), Price Kent (count 7D), Roberta Burnette (count 7E), and Taylor Wagniere (count 7F). The masters found that the allegations were proven as to all of these women except Segall.

A. Proven charges found to constitute misconduct

With respect to Palmer, Justice Johnson was attempting to engage in a personal relationship by seeking to impress her with his status and power, and the trappings of his judicial office, by inviting her to the courthouse and making inappropriate comments to her (count 7A). With respect to Schulman, Justice Johnson became intoxicated, repeatedly touched her body in inappropriate ways, grabbed her waist and wrist, kissed her, and made inappropriate statements to her at one professional event, and became intoxicated and made inappropriate statements to her at another event (count 7B). With respect to Kent, Justice Johnson became highly intoxicated at a dinner, discussed inappropriate personal subjects, suggested he could assist her career, and ran his hand up her thigh under the table (count 7D).

Count 7A: Attorney Palmer

1. Findings of Fact

Attorney Melanie Palmer met Justice Johnson at a mentorship event for new attorneys in 2013. He encouraged the new attorneys there to reach out to him for mentorship. Palmer did so. They agreed to meet for dinner. During the dinner, Palmer told Justice Johnson that she was interested in working at the district attorney's office. They had dinner and drinks, during which he told her that she looked "pretty and young," and that she would have to "prove herself."

After dinner and drinks, Justice Johnson took her back to his chambers at the courthouse, where he commented on her legs and told her she was fit and beautiful, and suggested that his wife used to be attractive, but no longer cared about fitness. This made Palmer uncomfortable. He also told her that he knew Los Angeles County District Attorney (DA) Jackie Lacey and walked his dogs with her, implying that he could help Palmer get a job at the DA's office. He also sent sexually suggestive texts to Palmer over the course of the next few months. This made her feel uncomfortable and "gross." In 2016, she told her friend, attorney Allison Schulman, about Justice Johnson inviting her to his chambers and that it made her feel uncomfortable. Palmer also told Helen Zukin, then a partner at her law firm and now a judge, that she had had a bad experience with Justice Johnson when she was a new lawyer, and that he had taken her back to his chambers after dinner, where he complimented her body and made negative comments about his wife's body, and then sent her texts that were very suggestive and inappropriate.

The masters said, "Viewing the totality of the circumstances, Justice Johnson was attempting to create a personal or romantic relationship with Palmer by bringing her to his chambers, impressing her with his power and status, suggesting that he could assist her with employment opportunities, and then sending her sexually suggestive texts for about four months."

Justice Johnson admitted bringing Palmer back to the courthouse at night and talking to her, but he denied mentioning anything about his wife or sending her suggestive texts. Justice Johnson said he took Palmer to the courthouse because she was asking questions about it, he believes it is one of the most beautiful courtrooms in the state, and he wanted to show her photographs of himself with his family and famous people. He denied that taking a young woman back to his chambers alone after dinner and drinks created any appearance of impropriety. He specifically denied that he told her that he knows DA Lacey and walks his dogs with her, and that he said or implied he could help her get a job with the DA's office. He testified that he told Palmer that he knows DA Lacey and walks his dogs past her house a lot of mornings. He acknowledged that he was willing to help advance Palmer's career, but said he was not trying to create the impression that he could help her get into the DA's office.

The masters found Justice Johnson's denials "not credible." They found Palmer credible because the conduct about which she testified was consistent with that of other witnesses who had no connection to her, there was no evidence she had any motive to fabricate or exaggerate her testimony, she told a friend about her visit to Justice Johnson's chambers and that it made her uncomfortable well before the court's workplace investigation began, she fit the pattern of the type of women with whom Justice Johnson tried to cultivate a personal or romantic relationship, a superior court judge vouched for her credibility, and she was worried about what the reporting would do to her career. Further, the number and timing of the texts from Justice Johnson do not support his testimony that they were work-related and instead support Palmer's testimony that they were inappropriate. The masters also found that one allegation about a text stating that he felt "insecure" and that she needed to "give [him] something" was not proven because no evidence was produced to support this allegation.

Neither party objected to the factual findings, and we adopt them.

2. Conclusions of Law

The masters concluded that Justice Johnson's conduct toward Palmer violated his obligations to uphold the integrity of the judiciary, demeaned the judicial office, impaired the dignity and prestige of the institution of the Court of Appeal, and lent the prestige of the judicial office to advance his personal goals. They stated that a "judicial officer must act in an honorable fashion and must participate in maintaining standards of conduct so that the integrity of the judiciary is preserved." They further concluded that Justice Johnson's actions toward Palmer constituted prejudicial misconduct and violated canons 1, 2, 2A, 2B(2) (judge shall not lend the prestige of judicial office to advance the judge's personal interests), and 4A(2).

The examiner did not object to the masters' legal conclusions. Justice Johnson objected by stating his belief that a conclusion of improper action should be applied to all of the findings in Count Seven, rather than prejudicial misconduct, because an objective observer would not conclude that his conduct would undermine public esteem for the judiciary or bring the judicial office into disrepute. Justice Johnson asserted that the findings in Count Seven "relate to social conversations unrelated to judicial conduct, and when examined separately reflect settings in which judicial officers routinely engage in casual private discussions."

We agree with the masters that Justice Johnson's attempts to cultivate a personal relationship with Palmer, and taking advantage of his position as a respected justice to do so, including by taking her to the courthouse alone at night, making inappropriate comments about her body and his wife, and sending her suggestive texts, bring the judicial office into disrepute and constitute prejudicial misconduct. We adopt the masters' legal conclusions.

Count 7B: Attorney Schulman

1. Findings of Fact

In June 2015, at a reception hosted by the Consumer Attorneys Association of Los Angeles (CAALA) for graduates of its trial academy for newer attorneys, Justice Johnson was introduced to young attorney Allison Schulman, who was excited to meet an appellate justice. He suggested that attorneys take photographs with him and then text him the photographs so he would remember their names. Schulman agreed, took a photograph with Justice Johnson, and texted it to him. Later at the reception, he began acting in a "touchy-feely" manner toward Schulman. He put his hand on her arm, and grabbed her stomach and waist area to turn her body around so that he could talk to her. She testified that he did this more than five times, which made her uncomfortable.

Schulman testified that she was uncomfortable with Justice Johnson's conduct and said, "I don't think it's really appropriate for a man I don't know that I just met to be touching my stomach, and he's in a power [position] and should be more professional than that." As Schulman was leaving the reception with Jake Finkel, a young male attorney who also had attended the trial course, Justice Johnson grabbed her wrist and pulled her toward him, and made comments about her leaving the party with Finkel, including telling her that Finkel was going to "rape" her. He also told her that his friends who were sheriffs or police chiefs would come looking for her if she did not text him the next morning to let him know she was okay. She told Justice Johnson that they were just going to their cars. She felt shocked by his behavior. As she started to exit, Justice Johnson pulled her forward and kissed her cheeks three times. She described the kisses as "really wet" and "gross." Schulman believed Justice Johnson was intoxicated based on the way he was speaking and his unprofessional behavior. She testified that she had only one drink that night. She did not ask him to stop his behavior because she "didn't want to have any problems with him, because he was a judge," and she "just wanted to get out of this situation."

The masters found that Schulman's testimony was "highly believable" regarding this event. They said she testified in a careful manner, provided specific details, and made no attempt to overstate the events. They also found that Justice Johnson was intoxicated at this event.

Schulman's testimony was corroborated by Finkel, who said that, as they were leaving, Schulman looked "surprised and shocked" and was "upset" and told him that Justice Johnson had grabbed her arm, kissed her on the cheek, and told her not to leave with Finkel because Finkel was going to rape her.

Schulman's testimony was also corroborated by the testimony of attorney Ariadne Giannis, who attended the reception and witnessed Justice Johnson touching Schulman inappropriately, putting his arm around Schulman's waist or shoulder, and "being generally touchy and feely." Giannis could tell from Schulman's face that she was "incredibly offput and uncomfortable" by Justice Johnson's actions. When Schulman later told Giannis that she was very upset, Giannis indicated that she had seen what had happened and understood why Schulman would be upset.

Schulman's testimony was further corroborated by Facebook Messenger communications that she exchanged with attorney Michelle Iarusso that evening, in which she said that Justice Johnson was "groping all of the women" and told her that the guy she was talking to was going to rape her. When Schulman sent Iarusso a photograph of Justice Johnson, which she said was taken when he was "soberish," Iarusso responded, "Jeff," and "He likes a good drink." Iarusso was, coincidentally, friends with Justice Johnson.

Three months later, in September 2015, Schulman and Justice Johnson both attended a CAALA event in Las Vegas. Justice Johnson was a speaker and attended the event in his capacity as an appellate justice. He spent some of his free time with his close friend, Goleh. Goleh invited Schulman to an invitation-only dinner, and said they should meet at a cocktail party beforehand. When Schulman arrived at the cocktail party with Iarusso, Goleh was there and was soon joined by Justice Johnson and his friend Ray Patel. Goleh told Schulman that she would be going to the dinner alone with Justice Johnson because there were only two tickets. This made her feel very uncomfortable. She suggested that they all go to a party that they could all attend instead, which they did. At one point, Schulman was sitting on a couch with Justice Johnson, Patel, and Iarusso. When Iarusso left to get a drink, Justice Johnson asked Schulman to sit right next to him on the couch. When she declined, he asked her about her law firm. She told him she handled employment law cases. He responded that he had the perfect employment case, with "100 percent perfect liability" and "high damages," to refer to her, and said, "But I can only give it to you if you come sit right next to me." Schulman did not want to do this and got up. When she started to walk away, he yelled at her. Schulman testified that she was "fairly sober" when this occurred.

The masters found that Schulman's testimony was "highly believable" as to the CAALA event and "highly credible" as to the Las Vegas event. They also found that there was "strong, highly credible" evidence that Justice Johnson was intoxicated at the CAALA event.

Schulman's testimony about the Las Vegas event was corroborated by texts between Schulman and Iarusso that were sent before there were any reports of Justice Johnson's alleged sexual harassment of others.

Justice Johnson claimed that Schulman was not credible because she was drinking alcohol at both events and was prone to overdramatizing incidents. He denied grabbing Schulman's stomach and wrists and said he put his arm around her waist only once when the photograph was taken, and he may have shaken her hand with two hands and kissed her "European style." Justice Johnson said he spent the entire evening in Las Vegas with Goleh and Patel, and his only exchange with Schulman and Iarusso was to briefly say hello. He denied sitting on a couch with Schulman and said it made no sense to refer a case to her because she was a brand-new lawyer.

Justice Johnson called his friend Goleh as a witness in his defense. Goleh testified that he was with Justice Johnson most of the evening of the CAALA reception and did not see Justice Johnson acting inappropriately, and that Justice Johnson routinely hugs and kisses people. Goleh said he saw Justice Johnson greet Schulman by shaking her hand and kissing her in a "European" or "Persian" style. He testified that Schulman is often "emotional" when she drinks, and he once saw her standing alone and crying at an unrelated event. Goleh further testified that he was with Justice Johnson the entire evening of the party in Las Vegas, except when he had to use the restroom, and he did not recall seeing Schulman.

The masters rejected Goleh's assertions that Justice Johnson always acted appropriately toward Schulman at the CAALA event because of Goleh's close relationship with Justice Johnson and the inconsistency of his testimony with established facts, including the testimony of Justice Johnson and Iarusso. They did not find it believable that Goleh would have been standing next to Justice Johnson most of the night of the CAALA reception and, therefore, did not accept his assertions that Justice Johnson always acted appropriately toward Schulman. And both Justice Johnson and Iarusso recalled seeing or being with Goleh and Schulman in Las Vegas, which undermines Goleh's testimony that he did not recall seeing Schulman there.

Justice Johnson also called Iarusso as a witness in his defense. The masters found that Iarusso's testimony was "unreliable and biased." Iarusso testified that she and Schulman "drank with abandon" in Las Vegas and that Schulman was "very intoxicated" when they met up with Justice Johnson and Goleh that evening. Iarusso testified that Schulman never complained about Justice Johnson's conduct at either event, but the masters found that Iarusso's testimony was "severely impeached" on cross-examination when she acknowledged her communications with Schulman the evening of the CAALA event. She admitted Schulman had texted her that Justice Johnson got "wasted," "was groping all of the women," and suggested Finkel was going to rape her, to which Iarusso responded that "Jeff" "likes a good drink." Iarusso had a text message exchange with Schulman about nine months after the Las Vegas event, in which Schulman complained about Justice Johnson's conduct and referenced Justice Johnson's "groping all of us" and "telling me that my friend was going to rape me" and that he was going to call his sheriff friends if she did not text him the next morning to tell him she was okay. Schulman also texted that, in Las Vegas, Justice Johnson "was telling me he had a great employment law case for me which he was completely making up, but that I could only have it if I came and sat right next to him."

The masters found Justice Johnson's defenses concerning the first event to be unsupported, and that his denials were overcome by strong, highly credible evidence. Concerning the Las Vegas event, they found that he was attempting to create a personal relationship with Schulman that evening, and that he was seeking to pressure Schulman to sit next to him on the couch by stating that he could refer a case to her. His anger when she refused is consistent with other evidence of his demeanor.

Schulman testified that she did not report the events involving Justice Johnson because she was concerned about retaliation and the consequences of reporting a judicial officer. She first reported the incidents to the commission in July 2018, after her acquaintance Melanie Palmer told her about the Daily Journal article discussing sexual harassment allegations against Justice Johnson.

Neither party objected to these factual findings, and we adopt them.

2. Conclusions of Law

The masters concluded that Justice Johnson's conduct toward Schulman violated his obligations to uphold the integrity of the judiciary, demeaned the judicial office, impaired the dignity and prestige of the institution of the Court of Appeal, and lent the prestige of the judicial office to advance his personal goals. They further concluded that it constituted prejudicial misconduct and violated canons 1, 2, 2A, 2B(2), and 4A(2).

The examiner did not object to the masters' legal conclusions. Justice Johnson objected by stating his belief that a conclusion of improper action should be applied to all of the findings in Count Seven, which he asserted "related to social conversations unrelated to judicial conduct," and, when examined separately, "reflect settings in which judicial officers routinely engage in casual private discussions."

We agree with the masters that Justice Johnson's conduct toward Schulman, including grabbing her waist and wrist, kissing her, saying the person she was with was going to rape her, and trying to get her to sit next to him by taking advantage of his position and saying he would refer a case to her, bring the judicial office into disrepute. We adopt the masters' legal conclusions.

Count 7D: Attorney Kent

1. Findings of Fact

Attorney Price Kent worked as a young associate at the law firm of Marcin Lambirth from 2007 to 2012. At that time, the firm was managed by partners John Marcin and Timothy Lambirth. The firm is now closed. In about June 2009, the Marcin Lambirth partners invited Kent to attend Justice Johnson's Court of Appeal nomination party. Marcin was close friends with Justice Johnson. When Kent met Justice Johnson, he told her that he would like to invite her to his chambers to talk, so he could learn more about her and perhaps help her with her career. Two months later, the firm partners invited Kent to Justice Johnson's swearing-in ceremony and told her that Justice Johnson had been impressed with her and asked them to bring her to the ceremony.

In late 2009 or early 2010, the firm hosted a bowling event for its attorneys, followed by a dinner at Maggiano's restaurant. Justice Johnson attended both the bowling event and the dinner. At the bowling alley, Justice Johnson discussed inappropriate personal subjects with young attorneys. He drank a lot of alcohol and discussed with Kent his views that "humans were not meant to be a monogamous race" and identified various "powerful people" who agreed with him. Kent tried to change the subject and did not think it was professional or appropriate to be discussing "people's sexual exploits or whether it was okay to cheat." Kent felt Justice Johnson was acting "flirtatious," "overly friendly," and "entitled" toward her. At the dinner, Justice Johnson asked to sit next to Kent. He sat to her left, and the partners sat to her right. During the dinner, Justice Johnson again invited her to his chambers and said he could help her with her career and networking, and introduce her to people he knew "in the business." He then reached under the table, put his hand just over her knee, and slid his hand up to the middle of her thigh. Kent was shocked and tried to remove his hand, and said something to the effect of, “Are you kidding me?” Justice Johnson did not immediately remove his hand and said something like, “What?” Kent immediately left the table because she was upset and in shock. She told her paralegal what had happened. When she returned to the table to get her things, Justice Johnson kept insisting that he walk her to her car. She repeatedly said, “No.”

The next morning, Kent emailed the law firm partners telling them what had happened and that she was very upset about the incident. (The email was not produced, presumably because the firm dissolved years ago, and such records were not kept.) Kent expressed concern that Justice Johnson had an alcohol problem. The partners told her they would handle it and speak to Justice Johnson. They later told her they had done that and that Justice Johnson apologized and said he had had too much to drink.

Kent’s testimony was corroborated by Regina Ashkinadze Spurley, a former Marcin Lambirth attorney who attended the bowling event and the dinner. Spurley recalled Justice Johnson leaning in toward Kent and paying attention only to Kent at the dinner, and that Kent was very upset later that night and Justice Johnson had said or done something during the dinner that made Kent highly upset and leave the event. Spurley remembered thinking that Justice Johnson was under the influence of alcohol that evening.

Justice Johnson recalled seeing Kent at a bowling alley event, but in 2012. He denied being intoxicated at the event that took place in 2009 or 2010. He did not recall sitting next to Kent at Maggiano’s or speaking to her while he was there. He said the allegations about putting his hand on Kent’s thigh was “pure fabrication.” The masters found Kent’s recall of the events to be “highly credible” and that there was no evidence she had any motive to misrepresent the truth. To the contrary, she was a reluctant witness. The masters declined to credit Justice Johnson’s assertions that he did not engage in the wrongful conduct.

Justice Johnson called as a defense witness Timothy Lambirth, a partner at the firm where Kent was employed. Lambirth testified that he did not believe Justice Johnson was intoxicated at the bowling event. He did not testify about Justice Johnson's level of intoxication at the subsequent dinner. Lambirth also testified that the next day Kent, who was "a little bit agitated," told him that Justice Johnson had "hit on her" and walked her to her car, where he wanted, or tried, to kiss her. Lambirth did not recall Kent saying anything about Justice Johnson touching her thigh, but he acknowledged that he had suffered from a neurological condition that could cause some cognitive issues. The masters found Lambirth's testimony that Kent complained to him the next day about Justice Johnson's behavior to be corroborating.

Justice Johnson objected to the masters' factual findings on the grounds that there is no clear and convincing evidence of this charge based on Lambirth's testimony, Kent's conversation with "scorned" attorney Lisa Miller, and the influence of (unspecified) outside events. Justice Johnson asserted that Miller had propositioned him, and when he told the partners at the Lambirth firm, where she was employed, she lost her job.

Justice Johnson argued that Lambirth's memory was distinct as to certain details (Justice Johnson's level of intoxication and what Kent reported to Lambirth the next day), and that those details are in conflict with Kent's testimony. He also asserted that Lambirth's memory difficulties only kept him from managing full cases by himself.

Justice Johnson claimed that Lambirth, who attended the dinner, testified "unequivocally" that Justice Johnson was "sober for the entirety of the event." Lambirth did not testify that Justice Johnson was "sober" at the dinner; he testified that Justice Johnson "did not appear intoxicated" and, in his opinion, "had not been drinking much," at the bowling alley. This preceded the subsequent dinner at a restaurant, where the thigh touching of Kent occurred.

Moreover, Kent and Spurley each testified that Justice Johnson appeared to be intoxicated at the dinner.

Justice Johnson pointed to Lambirth's testimony that Kent told him Justice Johnson had tried to kiss her on her way to her car, but did not say that he touched her thigh. The masters apparently concluded, however, that Lambirth's memory was less reliable than Kent's about the actual conduct because Lambirth had neurological problems during the relevant time. And the touching was likely to make more of a memorable impact on Kent than on Lambirth, and she had no motive to misrepresent the truth.

Justice Johnson also argued that Kent's 2018 contact with Miller cast doubt on her credibility and motivation. The masters found no showing of any relationship between them, other than a professional relationship because they had both worked at the Lambirth firm. They also found no evidence that Kent had any reason to lie on the witness stand merely to gain favor with Miller.

We concur with the masters' factual findings and adopt them.

2. Conclusions of Law

The masters concluded that Justice Johnson's conduct toward Kent demeaned the judicial office and lent the prestige of the judicial office to advance his personal interests. They further concluded that it constituted prejudicial misconduct and violated canons 1, 2, 2A, 2B(2), and 4A(2).

The examiner did not object to the masters' legal conclusions. Justice Johnson objected by stating his belief that a conclusion of improper action should be applied to all of the findings in Count Seven, which he asserted "related to social conversations unrelated to judicial conduct," and, when examined separately, "reflect settings in which judicial officers routinely engage in casual private discussions."

We agree with the masters that Justice Johnson's actions toward Kent, including making inappropriate comments and running his hand up her thigh, bring the judicial office into disrepute. We adopt the masters' legal conclusions.

Count 7E: Attorney Burnette

1. Findings of Fact

In October 2015, attorney Roberta Burnette attended an Association of Business Trial Lawyers (ABTL) dinner at the Jonathan Club in Los Angeles as a networking event because she hoped to be appointed to the ABTL board by her firm. She attended with her then-boyfriend, now-husband Greg Elliot. Justice Johnson also attended the event. When she was alone at a table with Justice Johnson, he said to her, "You know, you're very voluptuous." Trying to brush it off, she said, "Thank you," and then "Hey, have you heard of the Los Angeles Lawyers Philharmonic Orchestra?" He nodded yes, and she said, "I'm in the orchestra. I play the viola. I'm the principal violist." He kept nodding, and she said, "My stand partner is Judge Bendix [then a superior court judge, now a justice on Justice Johnson's court]. Do you know Judge Bendix?" Justice Johnson continued to nod and said, "Yes." He then said, "So you play the viola?" When Burnette said, "Yes," he said, "You need to put your viola mouth on my big black dick." She was shocked and tried to treat it like he had been joking and said, "Oh, no. You don't play the viola with your mouth. It's a string instrument. It's like a big violin." She pantomimed how to play a viola. He responded, "Oh, so you stroke it?" She started saying, "Oh, no, no," and he blurted out, "You need to stroke my big black dick with your viola hand." She stood up, approached Elliot, and said to him, "Get me out of here right now." They left immediately. As they were leaving, she told Elliot what Justice Johnson had said to her.

Elliot corroborated substantially all of Burnette's testimony. He testified that after Burnette told him that she wanted him to get her out of there, as they were taking the elevator, she told him that Justice Johnson had made "very crude and disgusting" remarks to her. He could not recall the precise words used.

After Burnette reported Justice Johnson's actions to her law firm, they did not appoint her to the ABTL board. Burnette did not report Justice Johnson's conduct to any authority because it was embarrassing, she thought it was a "one-off situation" involving a man who had "just made a really vulgar pass," and she was concerned about retaliation against her or her law firm.

Justice Johnson strenuously denied ever meeting Burnette and said her claims were false and "malicious," and based on a stereotype of a Black man. He testified: "She says that I told her she was voluptuous. So that stereotype, Black male sexualization. She says that I didn't know what the viola was. I'm a Duke, Yale, Oxford educated man whose wife plays cello, who grew up in a household full of music. And she assumed I didn't know what the viola was. So stereotype, ignorant Black man. Then she goes to my next thought being put your viola mouth on my genitals. I described my genitals. No educated Black man who wants to fit into the world and who has been as lucky, successful, and fortunate as I have been wants to be known by his genitals. I'm not going to say to somebody, the first time I meet them, something about my genitals or the color of my genitals or the size. This is not something I've ever said."

Justice Johnson provided a declaration from attorney Eric Swanholdt, which stated that Swanholdt was with Justice Johnson the entire evening, and he did not observe Justice Johnson acting in an improper manner.[8] Swanholdt also stated that he has never seen Justice Johnson show "aggressive sexual or improper intent" or use the type of vulgar language identified by Burnette.

In his post-masters' report briefing, Justice Johnson objected to the masters' factual findings and argued that the clear and convincing standard was not met, based on the following arguments.

First, he claimed that the masters' "reliance on what appear to be political considerations arising from the 'Me Too' movement prompted clear distortions and a reliance on a double standard."

[8] The parties stipulated to the admissibility of the declaration due to Swanholdt's unavailability to testify in person.

Justice Johnson offered no evidence to support the notion that the masters credited Burnette's testimony due to political considerations, and there is none.

Second, Justice Johnson claimed that there is not a "single witness to corroborate [Burnette's] version of the events." He argued that the masters' conclusion that Burnette's testimony was corroborated by Elliot and two other witnesses is "demonstrably false." He asserts that Elliot's inability to recall the exact words allegedly used means that Elliot "did not corroborate anything."

To the contrary, Elliot testified that Burnette told him that Justice Johnson had made "very crude and disgusting" remarks to her that made her "creeped out" and "quite upset" and caused her to want to leave the event immediately. Elliot did not testify that he could not recall any of the words she spoke, as Justice Johnson asserts. He testified that Burnette told him the language used, but that he did not recall the "exact words." The masters found it surprising that Elliot did not remember the precise words used, but that this did not negate his credibility because it "is reasonable to conclude that an individual would not necessarily commit to memory the vulgar language used against his girlfriend." They also found Elliot credible because he could easily have pretended to remember the exact words since he and Burnette continued to discuss the event after she reported the facts to the commission.

The masters also found that Swanholdt's declaration corroborated Burnette's testimony, contrary to Justice Johnson's assertion that it supports his claim that he never met Burnette. Swanholdt's declaration states that he "believes" he and Justice Johnson were together the entire evening, he does not recall them being apart, and he did not see Justice Johnson sitting next to anyone alone at a table at any time. The masters gave little weight to this because "it is not realistic to assume that two friends would be physically together for an entire night at a professional event at which socializing and networking is expected." Further, Swanholdt declared that he and Justice Johnson joined a table with two other people near a bar, which is consistent with Burnette's testimony that she walked up to a group of four or five people seated at a table near a bar.

Justice Johnson also contended that the testimony of Los Angeles County Superior Court Judge Kevin Brazile only corroborates that he had been drinking, and not that he "was 'highly intoxicated' to the point where he would black out," a conclusion he asserts is unsupported by any evidence.

The masters never stated that Justice Johnson was intoxicated "to the point of blacking out." What they said is: "Heavy intoxication can affect the ability to recall events. It is undisputed that Justice Johnson was drinking heavily that evening." Judge Brazile, who is Justice Johnson's friend, testified that Justice Johnson "had been drinking a bit much" and was headed to the bar to continue drinking, and that he expressed concern about how Justice Johnson was going to get home because he felt the justice was not in a condition to drive. Justice Johnson testified that he did not think he was able to drive.

Justice Johnson also argued that Burnette testified that she told her adult children and friends what occurred, but that there is no corroboration because these witnesses were not called.

Burnette and her husband Elliot testified convincingly about what occurred. The masters found Burnette and Elliot to be credible and deemed their testimony sufficient to prove the allegations. We concur that their testimony is sufficient.

Third, Justice Johnson claimed that Burnette's story is "unbelievable on its face." The masters found Burnette to be a "highly believable witness" and with "nothing to gain from the reporting" of Justice Johnson's conduct. They stated that there was "no evidence whatsoever supporting that she would concoct an elaborate story of Justice Johnson making vile comments to her in response to her mentioning that she plays in an orchestra." They also found no motive why she would fabricate a story to accuse an appellate justice she did not know of such offensive conduct.

Fourth, Justice Johnson argued that Burnette's "actions did not match her words" because she did not walk away after he allegedly called her "voluptuous." The masters found believable her explanation that she tried to divert his attention and allow him to save face. And she did walk away after his remarks became more offensive.

Fifth, Justice Johnson claims that the comments play into the worst racial stereotypes, that no self-respecting African-American man would ever use them, and that no witness has suggested that he has. He asserts that the vulgar language Burnette attributed to him "is the type of language that a Caucasian person might believe a [B]lack man would use based on stereotypes about how [B]lack men talk."

The masters found no evidence to support Justice Johnson's claim that Burnette's testimony is the result of stereotyping of Black males. The evidence also shows that Justice Johnson has invoked racial stereotypes himself (e.g., his comment to Blatchford about "going back," and his remarks to Justice Chaney about the size of an African-American man's genitals, both of which are based on a stereotype).

Justice Johnson also argued that "no witness came forward to suggest that these highly offensive, racially tinged remarks are any part of Justice Johnson's vocabulary or character," and that the masters improperly considered his alleged propensity to use sexually inappropriate language when drinking. The masters found Justice Johnson's claim that he never uses sexually inappropriate language to be "not credible." The evidence shows that Justice Johnson can be crude. He admitted giving his externs T-shirts stating "BAMF," which he testified stands for "badass motherfucker." They also found that he asked attorney Nina Park, "I've always been wondering, but do you shave your pussy?" (Park was a rebuttal witness whose testimony the masters considered solely for its relevance to certain issues, such as this one.) And Martinez testified that, at a dinner attended by law clerks, Justice Johnson said, "If you want a daughter, you need to do it doggy style." He admitted making this comment. They further found that he told Justice Chaney that "people are afraid of the size of a Black man's . . . cock or dick."[9]

Sixth, he contended that Burnette could be helping her friend Lisa Miller by "embellishing" the story. Burnette described Miller as a "professional acquaintance" with whom she speaks only once every one or two years. Embellishment implies that Justice Johnson did meet Burnette that evening, but that Burnette exaggerated what occurred, whereas he denies ever meeting Burnette at all. The masters found "no evidence that Burnette had any reason to lie on the witness stand merely to gain favor with Miller or because Miller was angry with Justice Johnson."

Seventh, Justice Johnson argued that Burnette has her own ax to grind with him because she suggested that her then-law firm retaliated against her for complaining about him by denying her the position she wanted on the ABTL board. This makes no sense if, as Justice Johnson claims, he never met Burnette; there would be no reason for her to invent a complaint about an appellate justice before the firm decided not to put her on the board.

In our view, not only would Burnette have no reason to make up this story, but when her testimony is viewed in light of the corroborating testimony and the many claims of Justice Johnson's sexual impropriety toward women, including putting his hand on Kent's thigh at a different dinner, also while he was intoxicated, the evidence is clear and convincing that the alleged misconduct involving Burnette occurred. We do not find any of the justice's arguments or objections persuasive, and we adopt the masters' factual findings.

[9] The masters concluded that this last statement was not misconduct under the circumstances in which it was said.

2. Conclusions of Law

The masters concluded that Justice Johnson's conduct toward Burnette demeaned the judicial office and the integrity of the judiciary. They further concluded that it constituted prejudicial misconduct and violated canons 1, 2, 2A, and 4A(2).

The examiner did not object to the masters' legal conclusions. Justice Johnson objected by stating his belief that a conclusion of improper action should be applied to all of the findings in Count Seven, which he asserted "related to social conversations unrelated to judicial conduct," and, when examined separately, "reflect settings in which judicial officers routinely engage in casual private discussions."

We agree with the masters that Justice Johnson's crude, graphic remarks to Burnette during a professional dinner bring the judicial office into disrepute. We adopt the masters' legal conclusions.

Count 7F: Attorney Wagniere

1. Findings of Fact

Taylor Wagniere met Justice Johnson when she was a law-student extern for a different justice at the Second District Court of Appeal in 2011. Between 2013 and 2015, after her externship had concluded, Justice Johnson and Wagniere had a friendly relationship and occasionally met for lunch or dinner. During that time, Justice Johnson sometimes made her feel uncomfortable by divulging more personal information than she felt was appropriate, commenting on her physical appearance, wanting to know who she was dating, and implying that their lunches or dinners were dates. Justice Johnson also told Wagniere that he was unhappily married, and that he and his wife were living separately, but in the same house. He once kissed her on the mouth, without her consent, which shocked her and made her feel uncomfortable. She continued to exchange texts with Justice Johnson and occasionally see him for meals until 2018.

Justice Johnson admitted kissing Wagniere once, but asserted that he did so to show her his support. He denied making the comments about his marriage.

Neither party objected to the masters' factual findings, and we adopt them.

2. Conclusions of Law

The masters concluded that Justice Johnson's conduct toward Wagniere constituted improper action and violated canons 1, 2, 2A, 2(B)2, and 4A(2).

Neither party objected to the masters' legal conclusions, and we adopt them.

B. Charges not proven to be misconduct

The masters found that the allegations in one charge (count 7C) were proven, but that they were not misconduct.

Count 7C: Deputy District Attorney Segall

1. Findings of Fact

When Justice Johnson was walking to lunch with then-Deputy District Attorney Wendy Segall (now a judge), he made comments about her appearance and put his hand on the small of her back to guide her across the street, both of which made her uncomfortable. At the lunch, when talking about Justice Johnson's children, Segall said something like, "You finally got a boy," to which Justice Johnson responded, "Well, it was fun trying," or words to that effect.

Justice Johnson admitted the allegations, but denied that they were canon violations.

Neither party objected to these factual findings, and we adopt them.

2. Conclusions of Law

The masters concluded that Justice Johnson's conduct toward Segall (count 7C) did not constitute a violation of the canons. They stated that, although Justice Johnson's comments during lunch could possibly be perceived as personal or overly friendly, and he may have had a hope or desire to develop a closer relationship in the future, the "judicial canons are not so broad that they prohibit such thoughts or giving compliments to a lunch companion with whom he or she does not work."

Neither party objected to this legal conclusion, and we adopt it. We dismiss count 7C.

COUNT EIGHT—Alcohol-related behavior

Justice Johnson was charged with nine instances of demeaning the judicial office by appearing to be under the influence of alcohol, seven instances of which occurred at the courthouse late at night. The masters found that seven of the allegations were proven.

A. Proven charges found to constitute misconduct

The masters found that seven of the instances were proven and grouped them into three findings of prejudicial misconduct (one for a wedding he attended (count 8B), one for the CAALA event in Los Angeles (count 8C), and five incidents at the courthouse (counts 8D, 8E, 8G, 8H, and 8I).

1. Findings of Fact

Count 8B: Wedding

In September 2011, Justice Johnson attended the wedding of AUSA Julian Andre in Modesto. Andre was Justice Johnson's extern in 2005 or 2006, and the two have remained good friends. Justice Johnson performed the wedding ceremony, after which there was a cocktail hour, a dinner, and a reception. During the cocktail hour and dinner, Justice Johnson drank to excess. Around midnight, close to when the reception was ending, a staff member asked Justice Johnson to leave the establishment. He was the only guest asked to leave before the end of the reception. Andre testified that he heard Justice Johnson asking, in "an elevated voice," why he had to leave. Andre's brother saw Justice Johnson and a staff person "appear agitated," and it seemed that their voices were raised. Andre's brother and a friend told Justice Johnson it was time to go, and he agreed. The next day, some of Andre's friends thought Justice Johnson may have had a little too much to drink and maybe was “a little flirty,” and they felt “somewhat uncomfortable.” Andre’s brother did not think Justice Johnson appeared intoxicated at that point, but may have been “buzzed.” The masters declined to give much weight to the testimony of Andre and his brother regarding Justice Johnson’s level of intoxication due to their relationship with him and their status of groom and best man at the wedding.

The masters gave more credit to the notes of an interview given to commission staff by Daniel Nobel, a friend of Andre’s who attended the wedding and is now a pediatric dentist.[10] According to the notes, Nobel said that, at the rehearsal dinner, Justice Johnson gave unwelcome attention to various young women and commented on their beauty. The notes reflect that Nobel said Justice Johnson was asked to leave by a restaurant employee and had said or done something disrespectful to a female employee. According to the notes, Justice Johnson was “drunk” and “loud, yelling, belligerent,” and had “no level of decorum.”

Justice Johnson testified that he had a glass or two of wine at the dinner, or maybe a couple of glasses during the remainder of the night, and when he asked for a beer at the end of the evening, the waiter said, “No, we’re closing,” and told him he had to leave. According to Justice Johnson, he asked why the waiter was yelling so loud, the waiter said it was because it was time for him to go, he responded, “Okay. That’s not very nice of you, but I’ll go,” and Andre’s brother and a “really big guy” showed up and said it was time to go. He denied that there was an incident involving a female staff member.

The masters stated: “The evidence was undisputed that Justice Johnson was the only guest who was asked to leave the reception before the end of the party. Instead of complying, he demanded another alcoholic beverage and, when this was refused, he became loud, yelled, and acted in a ‘belligerent’ manner. This confrontation was noticeable to the guests and was so unsettling that the groom's brother and at least two others were required to intervene and make clear to Justice Johnson that he needed to leave the premises." The masters noted that Justice Johnson had served as the officiant at the wedding and those in attendance were aware of his status as a Court of Appeal justice, and his intoxicated state was a topic of discussion among the wedding guests the next day.

[10] The notes were admitted by stipulation because Nobel was unavailable to testify.

Count 8C: CAALA reception

The masters referred to the facts in count 7(B) regarding the CAALA reception in Los Angeles, at which Justice Johnson became highly intoxicated and engaged in inappropriate behavior with a young female attorney (Schulman) (i.e., grabbing her waist repeatedly, grabbing her wrist and pulling her toward him, kissing her on the cheeks, and telling her that the man she was going to leave with was going to rape her).

Justice Johnson denied being intoxicated at this event.

Count 8D: Incident in August or September 2016

In August or September 2016, custodian Rodney Pettie and Justice Rothschild's judicial assistant Tracey Bumgarner saw Justice Johnson intoxicated at the courthouse late at night. Bumgarner testified that she was working late, and Justice Johnson came into Justice Rothschild's chambers and said, "I got your back Trace, I got your back." She said Justice Johnson appeared to be "very, very, very intoxicated" and was "slurring his words a lot" and "speaking very slowly." Shortly after, she and custodian Pettie were leaving when they encountered Justice Johnson, who was also leaving, and they spoke with him for five to ten minutes. When Bumgarner took the elevator to the judicial parking area where her car was parked, she saw Justice Johnson get into his car and start driving away. As he was driving away, she heard his vehicle hit something or "he slammed his brakes on so hard it sounded like he hit something." Pettie testified that Justice Johnson appeared to have "had a few drinks that night" and that he believed Justice Johnson was intoxicated based on the "slurring of words, the dialogue that he was having" with them, and the smell of alcohol.

Justice Johnson denied being intoxicated at the courthouse at any time.

Count 8E: Incident in summer of 2017

During the summer of 2017, custodian Darnice Benton saw Justice Johnson outside the courthouse at around 1:00 a.m., as she was driving away at the end of her shift. He was walking on the street and, in her opinion, looked "severely inebriated." She testified that he was walking "topsy-turvy" and in a manner consistent with others she has seen who were intoxicated. She demonstrated this by walking in an extremely unsteady manner, taking very high steps and waving her arms up and down. Benton pulled over to the side of the street and called her supervisor because she was worried about Justice Johnson's safety. Benton's supervisor told her Justice Johnson was a grown man and could handle himself. Benton saw Justice Johnson walk into the Court of Appeal building.

Justice Johnson denied being intoxicated at the courthouse at any time.

Count 8G: Incident involving statues

Custodians Pettie and Cruz Hermosillo testified that they saw Justice Johnson at the courthouse at approximately 1:00 a.m. one night in 2015 with two young women who were dressed as if they were going to a club, with short skirts and high heels. The women appeared to be drunk. The women climbed on large lion statues in the lobby of the courthouse and took "selfies." One of the women fell off a statue and was laughing hysterically. Justice Johnson was standing about ten feet away from them, acting nonchalant, and holding a brown paper bag. He looked at the custodians and shrugged his shoulders, saying, "What are you going to do?" He also asked custodian Hermosillo if he wanted to come to his chambers to "party" with him and the women. These findings are consistent with evidence that the masters found "convincingly shows" that Justice

Johnson would often leave court at about 5:00 p.m. or 5:30 p.m., go to bars or restaurants and drink alcohol, and then come back to the Court of Appeal many hours later.

Justice Johnson did not deny that this incident occurred, but he denied that he was intoxicated. He said he was with "two White women" whom he knew, and whom he said were close friends and "free spirits." He said he told them to get off the statue and they would not. He did not specifically deny asking Hermosillo whether Hermosillo wanted to "party" with him.

Count 8H: Incident in 2016

In 2016, custodian Hermosillo saw Justice Johnson, whom Hermosillo described as "over-the-top drunk," in the courthouse at approximately 11:00 p.m. Justice Johnson told Hermosillo that some people were going to come into the courthouse and asked if Hermosillo would bring them to his chambers. A man and a woman subsequently entered the building from the parking garage. The woman appeared to be intoxicated. Hermosillo took them to Justice Johnson's chambers, and they remained in the building past midnight.

Justice Johnson did not deny that this incident occurred, but he denied that he was intoxicated.

Count 8I: Incident in December 2017

In approximately December 2017, custodian Gabriel Gutierrez saw Justice Johnson in the courthouse hallway around 10:00 p.m. and thought the justice was "drunk." Justice Johnson was leaning against the wall, walking slowly, and stumbling a little bit. Gutierrez asked if Justice Johnson needed assistance. Justice Johnson responded that he was "okay," smiled and burped, while putting two fingers against his lips. He also said, "Take care. Happy holidays. Have a good night."

Justice Johnson denied being intoxicated at the courthouse at any time.

Additional Evidence

The masters considered as additional evidence the testimony of custodian Pettie, who has been cleaning Justice Johnson's chambers for nine years. He has a friendly relationship with Justice Johnson. Although a somewhat reluctant witness, he testified that, between 2016 and 2018, he saw Justice Johnson intoxicated in the late evening about five times. He occasionally saw beer bottles in Justice Johnson's office trash can, "maybe like twice in three or four months." The masters also considered the testimony of custodian Hermosillo, who testified that, between 2015 and 2018, he saw Justice Johnson at the courthouse "on a regular basis" and on "multiple occasions" with "different women" late at night, usually between 10:30 p.m. and 11:00 p.m. He could not tell for certain whether Justice Johnson was actually drunk. He said Justice Johnson would often be carrying a brown paper bag that appeared to contain a "six-pack." He told his supervisor about this behavior because he did not think it was "normal," but he was told to mind his own business. Hermosillo also testified that Pettie would tell him stories about "unusual things going on pertaining to Justice Johnson's chambers."

Justice Johnson's former research attorney Wohn testified that, between 2009 and 2015, she would sometimes see beer cans or bottles in Justice Johnson's trash can when she arrived in the morning. One evening when she was working late, she saw Justice Johnson come into chambers walking very carefully and hanging onto whatever was next to him. He appeared to be trying very carefully to look like he was not intoxicated. She also testified about an incident in about 2011 or 2012 when she heard Justice Johnson enter his chambers with a woman who was apparently not his wife, and they were laughing. Wohn left very soon thereafter.

2. Justice Johnson's defenses and objections to intoxication allegations

Justice Johnson testified that he has never been under the influence of alcohol at the courthouse and that all of the witnesses who testified that he was under the influence were "testifying falsely" as the result of a stereotype of a "shiftless, drunk, lazy Black man." The masters found no evidence that the witnesses who observed Justice Johnson intoxicated at the courthouse testified falsely or were motivated by racial stereotypes. We agree that there is none.

Justice Johnson also argued that he suffers from diabetes, and that this should be a mitigating factor for him. He asserted that both high blood sugar and low blood sugar can cause problems for him, and that high blood sugar causes him to stammer and stutter and experience headaches and fatigue. His wife and two close friends (Goleh and Ralph Galloway) testified that they have seen him unbalanced and unsteady, and slurring words, due to diabetes.

Justice Johnson provided a letter from his treating physician, Dr. Bennett Sloan, stating that he has Type 2 diabetes and that hypoglycemia can occur. The masters noted that Dr. Sloan does not state that Justice Johnson suffers from hypoglycemia or its symptoms.

Justice Johnson also provided a Mayo Clinic article entitled "Hypoglycemia," which states that shakiness, fatigue, pale skin, and tingling around the mouth can be caused by blood sugar levels that are too low. The masters noted that the article states that these same symptoms can also be caused by "excessive alcohol consumption." They concluded that hypoglycemia and its symptoms can also manifest if a person with diabetes consumes alcohol. They specifically rejected Justice Johnson's arguments that his symptoms were the result of low blood sugar, stating that he never presented any evidence that he was suffering from diabetes symptoms or low blood sugar when he was observed exhibiting symptoms of intoxication at the courthouse at night.

The masters also pointed out that Justice Johnson had a habit of going to bars after work and returning to court after drinking alcoholic beverages, and that two witnesses testified about beer bottles found in his chambers trash can. Twelve witnesses testified that they observed him under the influence of alcohol to a degree that he appeared intoxicated (Benton, Pettie, Gutierrez, Hermosillo, Kent, Justice Chaney, Judge Brazile, Burnette, Schulman, Bumgarner, Wohn, and Spurley). Further, he did not explain what he was doing at court late at night when he encountered Bumgarner and Pettie. His close friend Goleh could not recall a single instance, among the hundreds of times they had been together, when he had seen Justice Johnson with diabetic symptoms in the evening. The masters concluded that, by blaming his intoxication symptoms on his diabetes, Justice Johnson "ignores the facts, manifests a lack of awareness that he has a problem with alcohol, and reflects a lack of candor on his part."

We agree with the masters and reject Justice Johnson's arguments about diabetes. We adopt the masters' factual findings.

3. Conclusions of Law

The masters concluded that Justice Johnson's conduct at the wedding (count 8B), his conduct at the CAALA reception (count 8C), and his conduct at the courthouse taken as a group (counts 8D, 8E, 8G, 8H, and 8I) demeaned the judicial office, constituted prejudicial misconduct, and violated canons 1, 2, 2A, and 4A(2). His undignified conduct, as described in counts 8B, 8D, 8E, 8H, and 8I, also violated canon 3B(4).

Regarding the wedding, the masters stated that although it was a private event, "a judge must expect to be the subject of constant public scrutiny, and is prohibited from behaving with impropriety or the appearance of impropriety in both professional and personal conduct."

Regarding the intoxication at the courthouse, the masters found that Justice Johnson "was improperly using court facilities for his personal benefit as a venue to socialize with others in a fashion that was discourteous and disrespectful to others at the court facility." They stated: "Engaging in irresponsible and improper behavior in the courthouse 'reflects an utter disrespect for the dignity and decorum of the court and is seriously at odds with a judge's duty to avoid conduct that tarnishes the esteem of the judicial office in the public's eye,'" citing Censure of Judge Steiner (2014) at page 7.

The examiner did not object to the masters' legal conclusions. Justice Johnson's objections to their legal conclusions are predicated upon his objections, discussed above. We find those objections unavailing and adopt the masters' legal conclusions.

B. Charges not proven to be misconduct

Count 8A: Intoxication at bar on Spring Street

Justice Johnson was alleged to have been intoxicated at a bar on Spring Street near the Court of Appeal building (count 8A). The masters found that not all of the allegations in this count were proven and that no canons were violated by his actions.

Neither party objected to the masters' factual findings and legal conclusions, and we adopt both. We dismiss count 8A.

Count 8F: Smelling of alcohol at courthouse at night

Justice Johnson allegedly was frequently seen returning to the courthouse at approximately 10:30 p.m. or 11:00 p.m. with a strong smell of alcohol on his breath. The masters found that this charge was not proven.

Neither side objected to the masters' factual findings or legal conclusions, and we adopt both the findings and the conclusions. We dismiss count 8F.

COUNT NINE – Conduct while magistrate judge

It was alleged that Justice Johnson made inappropriate comments to federal court employees Isabel Martinez (count 9A) and Nicole Denow (counts 9B-9E) between 2004 and 2008, while he was a federal magistrate judge. The masters found that the allegations in Count Nine are barred by the statute of limitations,[11] but they made the factual findings, summarized below, because they are relevant to support other allegations.

1. Findings of Fact

Count 9A: Clerk Martinez

The masters found that then-Magistrate Judge Johnson asked Isabel Martinez, another judge's courtroom clerk who had had a breast augmentation, "out of the blue" if she had had her "boobs done," and held up his hands with his fingers spread apart and asked if he could touch them. She said, "No." The comments made her feel uncomfortable and embarrassed. Martinez testified that, even before he made the comments about her breasts, she did not feel comfortable with him because he would often make inappropriate comments to her, such as asking why she did not "date Black guys."

Martinez's testimony was corroborated by Currie, who worked at the federal court at that time. Currie testified that Martinez told her about the breast incident and that Martinez thought it was "very creepy." Martinez also told Chief Magistrate Judge Patrick Walsh about the incident in 2018. Judge Walsh, who supervised Martinez for 18 years, testified that it was difficult for Martinez to talk about the incident and that he has never questioned her honesty.

Justice Johnson denied asking to touch Martinez's breasts, but admitted asking if she had a breast augmentation. He said he commented on her breasts because he was under the mistaken impression that she had asked his opinion about them. The masters did not find this explanation to be credible.

Neither party objected to these factual findings, other than on statute of limitations grounds, and we adopt them.

[11] The commission can censure or remove a judge for conduct occurring within six years of the start of the judge's current term. (Cal. Const., art. IV, § 18, subd. (d).) Justice Johnson's current term began in January 2015. Conduct that occurred before January 2009 is, therefore, barred by the statute of limitations.

Count 9B-9E: Denow

The masters found that, from August 2006 to May 2008, then-Magistrate Judge Johnson made various comments to his law clerk, Nicole Denow, that she found offensive and that made her uncomfortable. These comments included remarks about her physical appearance, questions about an extern's boyfriend, negative comments about his wife, and remarks about other women's "boob jobs." The remarks were offensive to her at the time. He once asked her whether it was her "time of the month," which she found uncomfortable, demeaning, and sexist. Once, after Denow went to a farmer's market with another law clerk, then-Magistrate Judge Johnson made a "face of disgust" and said, "I just pictured you having sex with [the law clerk]."

The masters found that Denow was a very honest person and the remarks were consistent with some of Justice Johnson's conduct toward other women. The masters also found that Justice Johnson's denials about making negative comments about his wife, the "sex with [the law clerk] remark," and the "time of the month" remark reflected his "attempts to misrepresent the true facts and the context of the remarks."

Justice Johnson admitted some, but not all, of the remarks.

Neither party objected to these factual findings, other than on statute of limitations grounds, and we adopt them.

2. Conclusions of Law

We agree with the masters that the allegations are barred by the statute of limitations, and, therefore, reach no conclusion as to the level of misconduct and do not consider these allegations when determining discipline. We do, however, consider the conduct to the extent that it supports factual findings in other charges and as evidence of Justice Johnson's honesty, or lack thereof, during these proceedings.

COUNT TEN—Comments about Justices Chaney and Rothschild

Justice Johnson allegedly referred to Justices Chaney and Rothschild as "nasty ass bitches" when speaking to certain CHP officers.

1. Findings of Fact

The masters found that, between September 2015 and October 2016, during a conversation with CHP Officer Barnachia, who was driving him in an official capacity, Justice Johnson referred to Justices Chaney and Rothschild as "nasty ass bitches." They found it corroborating that Officer Barnachia sent Officer Sauquillo a text in October 2016 stating that Justice Johnson would "talk shit" about Justices Chaney and Rothschild, and called them "nasty ass bitches." Officer Sauquillo replied to Officer Barnachia with a text that Justice Johnson called them that to her as well. The masters also found Officer Sauquillo's testimony that Justice Johnson referred to Justices Chaney and Rothschild in the same way to be credible. They further found that such a remark is consistent with Justice Johnson's admission that he used profanity in the workplace in another context, such as giving his externs T-shirts with the initials "BAMF" on them, which he said stands for "bad ass motherfucker."

Justice Johnson testified that he did not recall using the phrase "nasty ass bitches" and that it is not a phrase he uses, but he was "not going to call [Officer] Barnachia a liar." He also testified that the phrase is a "sideways" compliment for a tough or strong-willed woman who is hard to get along with. He said that, if he used it, he is sorry, but he does not believe it violates the canons because it was a private comment that had no improper purpose, and he did not expect the comment would be made public.

Neither party objected to these factual findings, and we adopt them.

2. Conclusions of Law

The masters concluded that the conduct violated canons 1, 2, 2A, and 3B(4), and stated that, "Making personal remarks using profanity about a fellow judicial officer to a subordinate state employee places the judiciary in a negative light and undermines respect for the judiciary." Nevertheless, they found that the conduct was improper action because they did not think an objective observer would conclude that a few comments made in private to security officers about judicial colleagues would erode public esteem for the judiciary or bring the judicial office into disrepute.

Justice Johnson objected to the legal conclusion that the remark was improper action on the ground that a private comment to another person "in a casual setting where profanity is often used" is not a violation of the canons. He argued that there is no claim that he was actually demeaning another person when he used profanity to underscore a comment about a "strong willed woman." We disagree and find, based in part on the corroborating texts between Officer Barnachia and Officer Sauquillo, that the comment was pejorative and disparaging about his fellow justices, and that it violated the canons.

The examiner objected to the masters' legal conclusion that the remark was improper action, and not prejudicial misconduct, on the ground that the test for prejudicial misconduct is not whether the remarks were made in private, but whether they would, if known to an objective observer, appear to be prejudicial to public esteem for the judicial office, citing Geiler v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications (1973) 10 Cal.3d 270, 275. The examiner also cites Gonzalez v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1983) 33 Cal.3d 359, 377 for the proposition that, regardless of the speaker's intent, derogatory remarks may become public knowledge and thereby diminish the hearer's esteem for the judiciary, and the "reputation in the community of an individual judge necessarily reflects on that community's regard for the judicial system." The examiner argued that the justice's use of the phrase should be grouped in with comments to Wohn, Currie, and Justice Grimes for a finding of prejudicial misconduct.

We agree with the examiner that disparaging one's colleagues on the bench to individuals who also work for those colleagues (providing judicial security), and using profanity to do so, would, to an objective observer, be prejudicial to public respect for the judiciary. The masters agree that the remarks undermine respect for the judiciary. And the remarks have, in fact, become public. We conclude that this conduct constitutes prejudicial misconduct.

Rebuttal and Sur-rebuttal Testimony

The examiner called 11 rebuttal witnesses. Justice Johnson called one witness, and testified himself, in sur-rebuttal. Justice Johnson objected to all but three of the rebuttal witnesses. The masters overruled his objections. In their report, the masters stated that their conclusions would have been the same had the rebuttal witnesses not testified, and they only reference the witnesses' testimony to emphasize prior conduct similar to conduct charged in the notice. The masters declined to provide detailed accounts of these witnesses' testimony.

In his post-masters' report briefing, Justice Johnson argued that the testimony of the rebuttal witnesses was improperly admitted and was a "shocking breach of due process and equal protection under the law." We disagree and find that the masters' exercise of their discretion in allowing the testimony was not improper. We refer to this testimony only to the extent that it supports the masters' findings regarding conduct charged in the notice.

IV. DISCIPLINE

In determining the appropriate level of discipline, we consider that our mandate is not to punish, but rather is to protect the public, enforce rigorous standards of judicial conduct, and maintain public confidence in the integrity and impartiality of the judiciary. (See Broadman, supra, 18 Cal.4th at pp. 1111-1112.)

The commission has identified several factors it considers in determining the appropriate sanction, including the number of acts and the seriousness of the misconduct, the judge's honesty and integrity, whether the judge appreciates the impropriety of the conduct, the likelihood of future misconduct, the impact of the misconduct on the judicial system, and the existence of prior discipline. (Inquiry Concerning Saucedo (2015) 62 Cal.4th CJP Supp. 1, 50.)

The commission may also consider the effect of the misconduct on others and whether the judge has cooperated fully and honestly in the commission proceeding. (Policy Declarations of Com. on Jud. Performance, policies 7.1(1)(f) and 7.1(2)(b).)

The commission also considers any mitigating factors that a judge may advance. (Inquiry Concerning Van Voorhis (2003) 48 Cal.4th CJP Supp. 257, 295.)

A. Number of Acts and Seriousness of Misconduct

The number of acts of misconduct is relevant to determining appropriate discipline to the extent that it shows whether the conduct consisted of isolated incidents or a pattern that demonstrates a lack of judicial temperament. (See Fletcher v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1998) 19 Cal.4th 865, 918.)

Justice Johnson committed 18 acts of prejudicial misconduct (based on 42 separate instances of proven misconduct). This is a substantial amount of misconduct, and some of it is quite egregious. The masters found the "particularly flagrant" nature of some of the misconduct and the "large number of victims" to be factors in aggravation. Eleven women were victims of Justice Johnson's sexual misconduct (Justice Chaney, Officer Sauquillo, court staff attorneys Butterick, Blatchford, and Wohn; judicial assistants Velez and Currie; and private attorneys Palmer, Schulman, Kent, and Burnette). Seven women were victims of conduct that would reasonably be perceived as sexual harassment in their workplace (Justice Chaney, Officer Sauquillo, Butterick, Blatchford, Velez, Currie and Wohn). Justice Johnson also touched four women's bodies without their consent. He touched Justice Chaney's breasts and patted her buttocks on a number of occasions; he stroked Butterick's arm twice; he grabbed Schulman repeatedly around the waist and at her wrist, and kissed her; and he ran his hand up Kent's thigh. The incidents involving Justice Chaney and Butterick occurred at the courthouse, during business hours. The incidents involving Schulman and Kent occurred at law-related functions. Unwanted touching is especially serious misconduct.

Justice Johnson also engaged in patterns of making comments to women that were unseemly and particularly inappropriate coming from an appellate justice. Seven women testified that his behavior toward them at court made them uncomfortable (Justice Chaney, Officer Sauquillo, Butterick, Blatchford, Velez, Wohn, and Currie).

Four additional women, who encountered Justice Johnson at professional functions and were aware of his judicial position, testified that his inappropriate behavior toward them shocked them or made them uncomfortable (Palmer, Schulman, Kent, and Burnette).

Justice Johnson also displayed inappropriate demeanor toward three attorneys with whom he worked and his peer on the bench, Justice Chaney.

Justice Johnson further displayed undignified behavior by becoming intoxicated on multiple occasions, and, as the masters stated, he had a pattern of acting "highly inappropriately with female attorneys when he is intoxicated."

Justice Johnson's patterns of improper conduct demonstrate that he lacks the temperament and judgment required for his position.

Justice Johnson argued that he should not be removed for prejudicial misconduct alone because judges have only been removed in matters that include willful misconduct. Justice Johnson appears to believe that prejudicial misconduct is, by definition, less serious than willful misconduct. As noted above, the Supreme Court has defined prejudicial misconduct as "willful misconduct out of office," with the same characteristics as willful misconduct (i.e., unjudicial conduct committed in bad faith), but which takes place when the judge is not acting in a judicial capacity. (Broadman, supra, 18 Cal.4th at pp. 1092-1093.) The California Constitution (art. VI, § 18, subd. (d)(2)) states that the commission may remove a judge for prejudicial misconduct. (See, e.g., McCullough v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1989) 49 Cal.3d 186, 191 [prejudicial conduct may "by itself, justify removal"]; Saucedo, supra, 62 Cal.4th CJP Supp. at p. 46 ["judge may be removed for prejudicial misconduct"]; Van Voorhis, supra, 48 Cal.4th CJP Supp. at p. 314 [judge can be removed for "conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute"].) A judge can even be removed for only one act of prejudicial misconduct. (Inquiry Concerning Willoughby (2000) 48 Cal.4th CJP Supp. 145, 165 ["The commission's reluctance to remove Judge Willoughby from office should not be construed to suggest that the commission will not in the future remove a judge from office, even for a single act of prejudicial conduct, where warranted"].) And, last year, the commission imposed a censure and bar—the maximum penalty available for former judges—based solely on prejudicial misconduct. (Inquiry Concerning Bailey (2019) 6 Cal.5th CJP Supp. 24.)

The number and nature of the 18 acts of prejudicial misconduct, and the several acts of unwanted physical touching in particular, support our determination that removal is the appropriate sanction.

B. Honesty and Integrity

The commission has stated that foremost in its consideration of factors relevant to discipline is honesty and integrity. (Saucedo, supra, 62 Cal.4th CJP Supp. at p. 50.) Honesty is a minimum qualification expected of every judge. (Kloepfer v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1989) 49 Cal.3d 826, 865.) A judge's dishonesty has often been a factor when removing judges from the bench. (See, e.g., Inquiry Concerning Hall (2006) 49 Cal.4th CJP Supp. 146; Inquiry Concerning MacEachern (2008) 49 Cal.4th CJP Supp. 289, 309; Ross, supra, 49 Cal.4th CJP Supp. at pp. 87, 141-143; Inquiry Concerning Spitzer (2007) 49 Cal.4th CJP Supp. 254, 286; Saucedo, supra, 62 Cal.4th CJP Supp. at p. 52.) "If the essential quality of veracity is lacking, other positive qualities of the person cannot redeem or compensate for the missing fundamental." (Ross, supra, 49 Cal.4th CJP Supp. at p. 90.) "The public will not, and should not, respect a judicial officer who has been shown to have repeatedly lied for his own benefit." (Inquiry Concerning Murphy (2001) 48 Cal.4th CJP Supp. 179, 202.) "A judge who does not honor the oath to tell the truth cannot be entrusted with judging the credibility of others." (MacEachern, supra, 49 Cal.4th CJP Supp. at p. 309.)

The masters found, as the first aggravating factor, that "Justice Johnson was not truthful in several aspects of his testimony and made affirmative misrepresentations about his behavior and the conduct of others." They specifically pointed out his lack of honesty in connection with five of the ten counts (Counts One, Five, Seven, Eight, Nine),[12] including the following:

- He was "not always truthful" in his testimony about Justice Chaney.
- His "lack of candor" was illustrated by his denial of his telephone call with Justice Chaney.
- His denials that he entered Justice Chaney's hotel room the first night of the Reno trip were "untrue," reflects his "intentional misrepresentations," and were "untruthful."
- His denials that he asked Justice Chaney to have an affair reflect "his failure to tell the truth" and were not credible.
- His testimony about his conversation with judicial assistant Velez, in which he denied making a comment about never leaving her bed, was "not credible" and reflects his "intentional fabrication of the relevant facts."
- His denials that he told attorney Palmer that he knows Los Angeles County DA Jackie Lacey and walks his dogs with her, and that he said

[12] The judge's testimony regarding the allegations in Count Nine, which are barred by the statute of limitation for purposes of evaluating the level of discipline, can be considered for purposes of evaluating his truthfulness during the proceeding. (Policy Declarations of Com. on Jud. Performance, policy 7.1(2)((b).)

or implied he could help Palmer get a job with the DA's office, were "not credible."

- His denials of certain comments he made to former federal law clerk Denow about his wife, visualizing Denow having sex with another law clerk, and Denow's time of the month reflect "attempts to misrepresent the true facts and the context of the remarks."
- His claim that he does not use sexually inappropriate language was found "not credible" by the masters.
- His argument that his intoxication symptoms should be blamed on his diabetes "reflects a lack of candor on his part."

The Supreme Court has said there are few actions that "provide greater justification for removal from office than . . . deliberately providing false information to the Commission in the course of its investigation." (Saucedo, supra, 62 Cal.4th CJP Supp. at p. 50). The commission takes "particularly seriously a judge's willingness to lie under oath to the three special masters appointed by the Supreme Court to make factual findings critical to [its] decision." (Saucedo, supra, 62 Cal.4th CJP Supp. at p. 51.) "Lack of candor toward the commission is uniquely and exceptionally egregious." (Ross, supra, Cal.4th CJP Supp. at p. 90.)

We find that Justice Johnson's intentional fabrication and misrepresentation of facts during the evidentiary hearing, while he was under oath, is exceptionally egregious and demonstrates that he lacks the essential qualities of honesty and integrity that are required of a judge.

C. Appreciation of the Misconduct and Likelihood of Future Misconduct

"A judge's failure to appreciate or admit to the impropriety of his or her acts indicates a lack of capacity to reform." (Inquiry Concerning Platt (2002) 48 Cal.4th CJP Supp. 227, 248.) "Implicit in the lack of reform is the risk of yet further violations in the future." (Ross, supra, 49 Cal.4th CJP Supp. at p. 143.)

"It is very difficult for a judge to avoid repeating an ethical violation unless he or she recognizes the act as misconduct." (Van Voorhis, supra, 48 Cal.4th CJP Supp. at p. 308.)

- Justice Johnson denied the following allegations, which the masters found were proven by clear and convincing evidence:
- Justice Chaney's testimony that he became intoxicated in Reno and entered her hotel room uninvited, solicited an affair with her, offered to "squeeze [her] titties" to make her "feel better," touched her breasts and made "mmm-mmm" sounds when he hugged her, patted her on the buttocks, made comments while staring at her chest, and squeezed her and said, "It can't be sexual harassment because we are both on the same level." He said the "titties" comment was an "absolute fabrication" and Justice Chaney was "using stereotypes to blame" him, and that the allegations about touching her breasts and making sounds were "lies" and "racial stereotyping."
- Butterick's testimony that he stroked her arm between her elbow and shoulder.
- Velez's testimony that he said if he were married to her, he would "never leave her bed," and that he would blow her kisses and call her his "favorite."
- Palmer's testimony that he made negative remarks about his wife, sent Palmer sexually suggestive texts, and told her that he was friends with DA Lacey.
- Schulman's testimony that he grabbed her stomach and wrist, kissed her, said the attorney with whom she was leaving an event was going to rape her, and tried to get her to sit next to him on a couch at a law function by telling her he could refer a case to her.

- Kent's testimony that he put his hand on her thigh under the table during a dinner, which he called "pure fabrication."
- Burnette's testimony about his repugnant comments about the viola, which he said was false and "malicious," and based on stereotypes of a Black man.
- All seven instances of being intoxicated, claiming that every witness who testified about seeing him intoxicated at the courthouse was testifying "falsely" as a result of a racial stereotype.

The masters found it to be an additional aggravating factor that "Justice Johnson showed only limited insight into his misconduct as evidenced by his focus on blaming others for the more serious incidents." They specifically rejected his assertion that he has accepted responsibility for his conduct and stated that, with respect to his most serious misconduct, "there is no evidence he has accepted responsibility for this behavior." To the contrary, he has "attempted to shift the blame to the victims, suggesting they were lying, improperly influenced by third parties, or advancing racial stereotypes."

Justice Johnson has, in fact, gone beyond "suggesting" certain victims were lying and has outright accused them of doing so. He accused Justice Chaney of "telling lies" for "the entire nine-year period" that they were colleagues on the bench, Velez of telling a "false lie" about what he said to her, Kent of "lying" about him touching her thigh, and Burnette of making claims that were "false" and "malicious." He accused Justice Chaney, Officer Sauquillo, and Burnette of racism, asserting that they were "invoking images" of him that were "racist and stereotypical because they thought it would make their story more believable." He also claimed the witnesses who observed him to be intoxicated at the courthouse were resorting to racist stereotypes of him "being a shiftless, drunk, lazy [B]lack man."

The masters found that the claims of stereotyping and racism were not supported by the evidence. We agree that there is no evidence to support

Justice Johnson's claims of stereotyping or racism. In Spitzer, supra, 49 Cal.4th CJP Supp. at page 287, the commission stated that it was "troubled" by the judge's willingness to impugn the credibility of witnesses, and noted that the judge's lack of candor was "fundamentally at odds with the role of a judge who is sworn to uphold the law."

We, too, are troubled by Justice Johnson's assertions that certain witnesses, whom the masters found credible, were lying or invoking racist stereotypes. These unfounded accusations compound the injury these witnesses have suffered as a result of Justice Johnson's actions.

As to the limited conduct Justice Johnson does admit (primarily the comments to Officer Sauquillo about her appearance, and various comments to Blatchford, Velez, Currie, and Wohn), the masters state that, while they believe he has gained insight and now understands that he overstepped boundaries, he continues to attempt to justify his behavior by arguing that he did not intend to offend, that he was "curious," that he was attempting to create a positive relationship with others, and that he thought the woman was "more sophisticated and would understand." To the extent that Justice Johnson admitted some of the less serious misconduct, he has, for the most part, either minimized it or argued that it does not violate the canons, as exemplified by the following:

- He characterized the masters' finding that he stroked Butterick's arm twice as a "contested view of [a] handshake or touching forearm in greeting."
- He said his overly personal questions to Blatchford, jokes, and references to sex ("pedestrian sex," "arousal," "Well, I guess you went back then") are "not significant misconduct at all."
- He asserted that blowing kisses, and saying, "You're my favorite" and "I love you," to Velez are comments "praising work performance."
- He argued that the phrase "nasty ass bitches" is "complimentary" and did not violate the canons.

Justice Johnson contended that it is mitigating that much of his proven past conduct was "within the bounds of tolerated or acceptable conduct in the not-so-distant past." The masters found that this contention is unsupported as it concerns judicial officers. They stated:

> It has long been the rule that in all aspects of a judge's life, "a judge must be acutely and constantly aware that everything he or she does or says must be managed through the filter of identity with this high office," and with the awareness a judge is a "public figure who is seen as a symbol of justice." (Rothman [et al., Cal. Judicial Conduct Handbook (4th ed. 2017)] § 1:31 at 21-22.)
> Many of the misconduct incidents at issue in these proceedings were clearly wrong today and were clearly wrong from the time he was appointed in 2009. This is true even with respect to his inappropriate compliments and personal questions to female court staff. For well over 10 years, judicial officers have been required to attend mandatory ethics courses where they have been cautioned to avoid engaging in overly familiar conduct with staff and commenting on their appearance. (See Rothman, supra, § 2:11 at 74-75.)

At Justice Johnson's appearance before the commission, he stated that classes on gender in the workplace that he has taken since the investigation began have made him "more aware of the changing mores in our society and the rights of women in the workplace." While it is true that social mores have evolved, it has never been acceptable for a judge to engage in unwelcome physical contact with women, or to engage in conduct that would reasonably be perceived as sexual harassment, especially at court. Since 2009, when Justice Johnson was appointed to the Court of Appeal, the Code of Judicial Ethics has required judges to be patient, dignified, and courteous to those with whom they deal in an official capacity; to avoid impropriety and the appearance of impropriety; to refrain from conduct that would reasonably be perceived to be sexual harassment; and to not demean the judicial office. Since 1999, when the second edition of the California Judicial Conduct Handbook was published, judges have been warned to avoid sexual harassment: "Judges, as administrators of the judicial system, have an obligation to know what constitutes sexual harassment in the work place, and to not only avoid it themselves, but to deal with it in their supervisorial capacity over staff." (Rothman, Cal. Judicial Conduct Handbook (2d ed. 1999) § 6.29, pp. 174-175). Moreover, judges, including Justice Johnson, have been receiving training in avoiding sexual harassment for years.

It is implausible that Justice Johnson did not know the appropriate standards of behavior for a person in his position. Indeed, this is evidenced by his proven comments to Justice Chaney: "It can't be sexual harassment because we're both on the same level" and, "You would never report me [for sexual harassment], would you?" Justice Johnson disregarded those standards for years, creating discomfort for multiple women. And being intoxicated at the courthouse late at night in the presence of those working there has never been proper. We are not persuaded by the argument that much of his proven conduct was within the bounds of acceptable conduct in the "not-so-distant" past.

Justice Johnson also argued that he had no notice that his conduct was improper, and stated, in his post-masters' report briefing that, "While a judicial officer, [he] was never afforded the opportunity to demonstrate his ability to reform in the face of discipline or allegations." The masters rejected this claim, and so do we.

First, the masters stated that he "was, or should have been, aware his misconduct violated the judicial canons" because "some of his conduct was so flagrant that a warning was unnecessary," and "[h]is conduct in becoming highly intoxicated and then engaging in grossly inappropriate behavior with female attorneys did not require advance notice [that] the conduct violated judicial canons of ethics."

Second, he "was on notice that he needed to change his behavior," at least with respect to his alcohol intoxication at the courthouse and his conduct toward women. In late 1994, then-AUSA Richard Drooyan warned then-AUSA Johnson about comments Johnson had made to a young female AUSA about her looks and her dress on several occasions, and told Johnson that he could not do that in a professional setting in an office. Further, Eric George, an attorney whom the masters found "highly reliable on this topic," testified that in approximately late 2009, he learned that the Daily Journal was planning to publish a story about Justice Johnson being ejected from a bar after grabbing the posterior of a waitress while intoxicated. George told Justice Johnson that he had to be careful about being in a situation where he "could be compromised by having these sorts of things said about him." And Justice Johnson admitted that former Justice Joan Dempsey Klein told him in 2014 that there were rumors about him bringing women back to the courthouse, which, if true, would put him in "deep trouble." The masters found that the evidence establishes that some of the rumors were true (i.e., that he was highly intoxicated at the courthouse and brought women guests who were intoxicated into the building).

The evidence establishes that Justice Johnson was on notice about the impropriety of his behavior, yet continued to engage in such behavior for years. Even without the warnings, he should have known his behavior was improper.

Justice Johnson also seems to fault some of the women for not reporting him sooner, arguing that he was denied the opportunity to effect change and modify his behavior. This reflects a lack of awareness that most of the women involved, especially at court, were in a subordinate position to him and did not want to risk potential retaliation if they reported his misconduct. Even some of the women outside of court were reluctant to report his behavior due to possible adverse consequences to their careers. Burnette experienced such a consequence when, after she reported his conduct to her law firm, she was not asked to represent her firm on the ABTL board. Palmer testified that she did not initially report Justice Johnson because she was concerned that he would badmouth her, and she did not want to put herself in a position where a justice did not like her. Schulman testified that she did not initially report Justice Johnson because she was concerned about retaliation and the consequences of reporting a judicial officer. These concerns are understandable, and the failure to immediately report the misconduct does not mean that it did not happen.

At his appearance before the commission, Justice Johnson asserted that he has undergone therapy and taken various classes, that he has stopped drinking alcohol, and that he has learned to be more cognizant of how his behavior affects others. But he only undertook education and abstinence since the inception of this proceeding. What he did not say at his appearance is that he admits the most serious sexual misconduct. This fact strongly supports our determination that he lacks the capacity to reform.

Justice Johnson further argued that his "excellent" and "exemplary" conduct over the last two years is "the only evidence/predictor" of his "future self-discipline and sensitivity" that the masters had before them. This argument lacks merit because Justice Johnson has been away from the court and its female employees, other than for oral argument, since July 2018, and there is no evidence in the record of his conduct toward women during the past two years.

We find that the extent of Justice Johnson's lack of recognition of his misconduct creates a significant risk that he will reoffend.

D. Impact on Judicial System and Others

"In determining the appropriate level of discipline, the impact of the misconduct on the integrity of and respect for the judiciary must be considered." (Rothman et al., Cal. Judicial Conduct Handbook (4th ed. 2017) § 12:91 at p. 849, citing Inquiry Concerning Hyde (2003) 48 Cal.4th CJP Supp. 329, 370.) The nature and extent to which the misconduct has been injurious to others is also relevant in this matter. (Policy Declarations of Com. on Jud. Performance, policy 7.1(1)(f).)

In his post-masters' report briefing, Justice Johnson asserted that, "No person was harmed in their position or treated unfairly by Justice Johnson." This statement reflects a remarkable lack of recognition of the impact of his behavior on others. Although none of Justice Johnson's prejudicial misconduct occurred while he was on the bench, certain instances occurred in the courthouse during court hours, and other instances occurred while he was holding himself out as an appellate justice at professional functions. Further, much of Justice Johnson's misconduct affected the working lives of women at the court, as exemplified by the following:

- Justice Chaney testified that his conduct toward her made her uncomfortable, and she was, and is, afraid of him. Some of his sexual harassment of her made her feel "shocked" and "upset," and she discussed his behavior toward her with others working at the court.
- Butterick, a court research attorney, testified that her interactions with Justice Johnson made her uncomfortable, she told her colleagues she would not take a particular office that was close to Justice Johnson's chambers, and she avoided the South Tower because she did not want to encounter Justice Johnson there.
- Blatchford, a court research attorney, said Justice Johnson's questions about her tattoos and her boyfriend made her "a little uncomfortable," his comments about "pedestrian sex" and "arousal" made her "uncomfortable," and his comment about "not going back" made her "really uncomfortable." She said his references to personal topics caused her to be "on guard."
- Velez, Justice Chaney's judicial assistant, testified that Justice Johnson's remark about never leaving her bed had a "big impact" on her and made her "very uncomfortable." She also said she felt "panicked" when he called her and asked her to come to his chambers, which caused her to leave work early. She felt "embarrassed and horrified" by his discussing her personal life with other justices. She would attempt to avoid interactions with him, pretending to be on a call, ducking behind her monitor, or leaving the courthouse.

- Wohn, his former research attorney, said that Justice Johnson's comments about her appearance and smell, and that he would have been in love with her in high school, made her feel uncomfortable. She was so uncomfortable about him looking at her that she brought in large flower arrangements to obscure his view of her at her desk.
- Currie, his judicial assistant, testified that Justice Johnson's comments about her appearance and smell made her uncomfortable and embarrassed her.
- Officer Sauquillo said Justice Johnson's comments about her appearance when she was at court made her uncomfortable.

Justice Johnson's conduct also had an adverse impact on female attorneys who did not work at the court, but who encountered him at various law-related functions that he attended by virtue of his position as an appellate justice. For example:

- Palmer said Justice Johnson's comments during her visit to the courthouse made her uncomfortable, and his subsequent sexually suggestive texts made her "feel gross."
- Schulman was "shocked" and "very upset" by his grabbing of her stomach and wrist, kissing her, and commenting that she was going to be raped.
- Kent felt uncomfortable when he paid too much attention to her and was "shocked" and "very upset" when he ran his hand up her thigh under the table.

- Burnette was “quite upset” and “creeped out” by Justice Johnson’s vulgar comments related to her playing the viola, and left the event immediately after he made them.

Justice Johnson’s displays of anger toward those with whom he worked also had an adverse impact on them. For example:

- Justice Chaney felt “shocked” and “frightened” by his angry outburst toward her.
- Currie would go to the restroom and cry after Justice Johnson became angry with her.
- Alexander testified that Justice Johnson’s yelling and calling him “stupid” felt humiliating.

Justice Johnson’s appearances at the courthouse late at night when he was intoxicated, and often in the company of others, affected the custodians who were working there. For example:

- Custodian Hermosillo testified that he told his supervisor about Justice Johnson’s behavior involving women at the courthouse late at night because he did not think such behavior was “normal,” and his supervisor told him to mind his own business.
- Custodian Benton testified that, when she observed him intoxicated out on the street at around 1:00 a.m. one night, she was so concerned about his safety that she called her supervisor, who told her Justice Johnson could handle himself.
- Custodian Gutierrez once encountered Justice Johnson walking slowly and stumbling in the courthouse hallway around 10:00 p.m. and believed he was drunk, so he asked Justice Johnson if he needed assistance.

We consider the adverse effects of Justice Johnson’s misconduct on the individuals who were subjected to his actions, and the negative impact of his misconduct on public perception of the judiciary, to be a substantial aggravating factor.

E. Prior Discipline

Justice Johnson has no prior discipline. The masters found that, while mitigating, this is of "limited weight" given their serious reservations about his ability to reform. Mitigating circumstances have only limited appeal because the aim of commission proceedings in the more serious cases is protection of the public and not punishment. (Rothman, supra, § 12:92, p. 856-857.) The commission has removed other judges from the bench who had no prior misconduct, particularly where dishonesty was involved (e.g., MacEachern, supra, 49 Cal.4th CJP Supp. at p. 311; Saucedo, supra, 62 Cal.4th CJP Supp. at p. 53.)

With 18 findings of prejudicial misconduct, some of which would reasonably be perceived as sexual harassment and involves unwelcome touching, and others of which involve misuse of the prestige of office in an effort to cultivate personal relationships with young women, and still others involve intoxication at the courthouse, this matter falls within the "more serious cases" category, and Justice Johnson's lack of prior discipline is of little weight in mitigation.

F. Contributions to Others

There is substantial evidence about Justice Johnson's contributions to the judiciary and to his community. The masters found Justice Johnson's community service to be mitigating, as follows. He has had a positive impact on many lives and devoted time and effort to giving back to the community. His community service includes teaching, tutoring, assisting students in an underserved elementary school, and helping establish a toy drive for underprivileged children. He has taught at local law schools and served as an important mentor to young men and women, many of whom attribute their success in the legal field and their personal lives to Justice Johnson's encouragement and guidance. He assisted others in difficult times. Justice Johnson has also performed important work for, and made exemplary contributions to, the judicial branch as a member of the Court Facilities Advisory Committee and as chair of the Courthouse Cost Reduction subcommittee, for which he received a Judicial Council award in 2017.

In his post-masters' report briefing, Justice Johnson claimed that his work is "exceptional" and that he was lauded by Justice Rothschild and "all staff attorneys" for his intellect and ability to keenly examine legal issues, without anyone noting any issue that affected his work performance. This claim is undercut by the testimony of Justice Rothschild and Justice Lui.

Justice Rothschild, Justice Johnson's presiding justice since 2014, testified that, while she respected his intellect, she did not respect his work ethic or his work product. She also testified that she counseled Justice Johnson about his demeanor, and that she observed him being angry toward individuals and too aggressive toward attorneys. Justice Rothschild also testified that Justice Lui spoke with Justice Johnson about his demeanor. Justice Rothschild further testified that Justice Johnson's frequent absences from the courthouse and unavailability during work hours made it more difficult to get the division's work done.

Justice Lui, the administrative presiding justice, testified that Justice Johnson had an inappropriate demeanor in court and raised his voice in an angry manner at Justice Rothschild during a case conference.

Justice Johnson also claimed that colleagues testified enthusiastically about his work ethic and intensive preparation for difficult hearings. But that testimony pertains solely to his work on the Court Facilities Advisory Committee, not his work on the bench.

It is undisputed that Justice Johnson has made significant contributions to the judiciary as well as to his community. But even a good reputation for legal knowledge and administrative skills does not mitigate prejudicial misconduct. (Kloepfer, supra, 49 Cal.3d at p. 865.)

G. "Social Contagion"

Justice Johnson argued, as another mitigating factor, that he is the victim of "social contagion," whereby witnesses' testimony was tainted because they talked to each other about him. According to Justice Johnson, the following occurred: "Rumors and unsubstantiated gossip" about him began to circulate at the Court of Appeal at least as early as 2016, which included the "exchange and propagation of recalled experiences among persons who would later become complaining witnesses." In the fall of 2017, a staff attorney at the appellate court, Merete Rietveld, began collecting stories about his rumored conduct and, in 2018, initiated circulation of a petition urging sexual harassment training at the court. It went to over 100 people in the judiciary. Rietveld also urged Administrative Presiding Justice Lui to conduct an investigation of allegations about Justice Johnson. Justice Lui initiated a workplace investigation that was conducted by outside counsel.

Around the same time, on July 2, 2018, Justice Lui asked Officer Barnachia whether he was aware of any inappropriate behavior by Justice Johnson toward a female CHP officer. Officer Barnachia mentioned Officer Sauquillo. Justice Lui interviewed Officer Sauquillo, who reported that Justice Johnson had propositioned her, using crude, graphic sexual language. Justice Lui prepared an email about her allegations that he sent to "hundreds and likely thousands" of court personnel throughout the state.[13] Justice Lui sent a subsequent email asking recipients to disregard and not redistribute his earlier [13] Justice Lui testified that he intended to send a cc of the email to Kathleen Ewins, counsel for the court, but, by mistake, the recipient line autofilled "EXEC-appellate and Supreme Court Staff," which is the group for all appellate court justices and staff, and he did not notice the error. (He apparently typed "Ex" rather than "Ew.") Officer Sauquillo was later discovered to have made similar allegations against a former CHP supervisor, using the same crude language she attributed to Justice Johnson. As discussed above, the masters ultimately found her claim against Justice Johnson to be not credible.

email. The Daily Journal printed an account of Officer Sauquillo's allegations the next day. Justice Johnson asserts that the story "spread like wildfire" and influenced witnesses' thoughts about him.

After the Daily Journal article appeared, attorney Lisa Miller contacted various witnesses whom she knew had had encounters with Justice Johnson and sent an anonymous letter to the commission describing people who had information about Justice Johnson. Justice Johnson asserts that Miller has animosity toward him because he reported her to her boss after she sexually propositioned him, and she was let go by her law firm as a result. He says that a number of witnesses talked among themselves before they were interviewed by commission staff. Justice Johnson argued that there was the "contagion effect" of publicity and gossip that adversely affected witnesses' attitudes and recollections over time.

But Justice Johnson offers no proof that any witness fabricated a story about him based on conversations with other people. The masters concluded that, while there was evidence that Miller had been terminated after Justice Johnson's complaint to the partners in her law firm that she had contacted him about personal matters, the women identified by Miller told the truth and were not improperly influenced by her.

Justice Johnson also points to "admissions about Justice Chaney's private discussions with her staff before they went in for interviews." But this reference pertains to Velez's testimony that Justice Chaney briefly told her "a few things" about Justice Chaney's experience with Justice Johnson before Velez's interview with commission staff, but after Velez's interview with the attorney retained to conduct the court's investigation. Velez had, therefore, already been interviewed about her own experiences with Justice Johnson. Justice Johnson also points out that the masters found that Butterick embellished her description of his stroking of her arm while she was testifying, which he attributes to her having talked to other people. But there is no evidence this occurred as a result of her talking to people, and the masters rejected her embellished description because it was inconsistent with her prior descriptions to friends and commission staff.

Justice Johnson argued that the "toxic nature of the allegations and virulent social metastatic oozing of the leaked email, gossip, Me Too's impact on social and political burdens of proof and objectivity, media propagation of salacious claims, coupled with confirmation bias—rendered fair and objective decision-making more difficult and more politically risky." The masters found that the evidence did not support Justice Johnson's "social contagion" argument.

We agree. Not only is there no evidence to support this highly speculative theory, but there is clear and convincing evidence to support the masters' factual findings, many of which are undergirded by contemporaneous corroborating evidence that preceded any discussions witnesses may have had with one another.

Furthermore, the masters were apparently not swayed against Justice Johnson by any outside factors when they determined to discredit Officer Sauquillo's allegations about Justice Johnson propositioning her for sex in graphic, vulgar language. This was a significant charge in this matter, and their decision to reject it, and some of Justice Chaney's allegations, demonstrates their neutrality. We acknowledge that Officer Sauquillo's allegations were widely disseminated via Justice Lui's email and were publicized in the media, but this does not support Justice Johnson's claim that the victims of his more serious sexual misconduct, or the custodians who observed him intoxicated at the courthouse late at night, fabricated their testimony.

Justice Johnson also argued that the witnesses benefitted from making claims against him, asserting: "Once the word is out that the administration, back channel conversations, colleagues and coworkers are promoting a negative view of a judicial officer, the benefits to career and social approval become irresistible. . . . Simply stated: when your boss asks you to join the team, you join the team." (Italics in original.) There is no support for this assertion.

First, there is no evidence that anyone's "boss" asked anyone to do anything, especially with respect to an investigation of Justice Johnson.

Second, a number of witnesses do not work for the court and stand to gain nothing from their testimony (e.g., Burnette, Kent, Schulman, and Palmer). Indeed, it is difficult to understand how testifying publicly about being the victim of sexual misconduct could result in any career benefit.

Third, some witnesses were reluctant and required subpoenas before they would testify (e.g., Butterick, Lin, Kent, Pettie, Denow, and Melissa Miller [rebuttal witness whose testimony was not used for findings]).

We reject Justice Johnson's argument that "social contagion" is a mitigating factor.

H. Comparable Discipline

Justice Johnson claimed that he does not fall within the realm of other removal decisions by the commission because his conduct does not include the certain "disqualifying characteristics" or "critical elements generally common to those decisions."

First, he argued that there is no willful misconduct. As previously discussed, willful conduct is not required for removal.

Second, he has no "prior discipline which was not heeded." Of the 12 judges removed by the commission, five (or nearly half) had no prior discipline (Judges Couwenberg, Spitzer, MacEachern, Saucedo, and Laettner). The existence of prior discipline is not a prerequisite for removal.

Third, he said that "a failure to take steps to modify behavior" "after notice of the investigation" is another "critical element." This is also not required. Several judges were removed for conduct they could have not subsequently modified (e.g., Saucedo, MacEachern, and Stanford).

Fourth, Justice Johnson listed the "occurrence of improper efforts to influence witnesses and/or non-cooperation with the commission" as another required element for removal. That is also not required, and Justice Johnson does not cite any authority identifying that as a requirement.

Justice Johnson also argued that he should receive lesser discipline than removal based on Supreme Court and commission precedent in the following cases.

Judge Gary Kreep, who was censured in 2017, engaged in 29 individual acts of misconduct (grouped into one instance of willful misconduct and 17 instances of prejudicial misconduct) over a three-year period, with the majority occurring within his first year on the bench. (Inquiry Concerning Kreep (2017) 3 Cal.5th CJP Supp. 1.) Justice Johnson drew various similarities and differences between his matter and that of Judge Kreep, arguing that he, too, should receive a censure. He said that Judge Kreep's misconduct included sexual comments, among other things, and the commission found that, in addition to constituting a pattern, his behavior evidenced his "failure to recognize that his comments could offend people or make them feel uncomfortable."

There are significant differences between this matter and that of Judge Kreep. Judge Kreep's conduct toward women was much less serious; it did not involve the unwanted touching of multiple women. It also did not involve undignified conduct while intoxicated on multiple occasions. Judge Kreep's conduct occurred mostly during his first year on the bench, but Justice Johnson's misconduct upon which our decision is based spanned nine years on the bench. Judge Kreep modified his behavior while at court, after being counseled. Justice Johnson received several warnings, but did not modify his behavior.

Judge John Fitch was censured in 1995 for inappropriate comments to court staff attorneys, and others, as well as for nonconsensual touching of women working under his supervision. (Fitch v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1995) 9 Cal.4th 552.) Judge Fitch made the remarks "on several occasions," and "on a few isolated occasions" touched, or attempted to touch, women working under his supervision (e.g., slapping or patting their buttocks).

(Id. at p. 557.) The commission found that the touching was episodic, relatively infrequent, and did not constitute a pattern of misconduct. (Id. at p. 554.) In contrast, Justice Johnson's improper touching of Justice Chaney was found to constitute a pattern, and his touching of Kent and Schulman was more extreme than Judge Fitch's conduct. Also, Judge Fitch had ceased his conduct for the three years before the commission issued its decision, whereas Justice Johnson has been away from the court since the investigation began, and has not been able to demonstrate that he has ceased the conduct toward court employees. Significantly, 25 years have elapsed since the decision involving Judge Fitch, and behavioral standards for judges, particularly with respect to sexual harassment, have changed.

Judge John Gibson received a public admonishment in 2010 for inappropriate gestures and comments to court staff, many of which were sexually suggestive. (Inquiry Concerning Gibson (2000) 48 Cal.4th CJP Supp. 112.) Judge Gibson's case is distinguishable because he had a "unique" joking relationship with the woman involved in seven of the eight incidents of prejudicial misconduct, and several circumstances mitigated the risk of future violations, including that the events had occurred six years earlier, when he was new to the bench, and no subsequent incidents had been reported.

Judge John Harris received a public admonishment in 2005 for, among other things, making comments to women at court, and, in one instance, putting his hands on an attorney's face and saying, "You're so cute." (Inquiry Concerning Harris (2005) 49 Cal.4th CJP Supp. 61.) Judge Harris was a former judge when the discipline was issued and did not intend to return to the bench; therefore, the capacity to reform was not a relevant consideration. (Ibid.) Here, the conduct is far worse, and a critical issue is Justice Johnson's capacity to reform.

Judge Scott Steiner stipulated to a censure in 2014 for, among other things, engaging in sexual activity in chambers with two women with whom he had personal relationships. (Censure of Judge Steiner (2014).) Justice Johnson argued his conduct "does not begin to approach the level or nature of misconduct found in Judge Steiner's matter." The difference is that, as Justice Johnson notes, the commission agreed to a censure, rather than removal, because Judge Steiner fully acknowledged his wrongdoing, which involved consensual conduct, and expressed remorse and contrition. Justice Johnson does not admit most of the misconduct proven in this matter, particularly the most serious misconduct, and it was not consensual.

Similarly, Judge Cory Woodward received a censure in 2014 for engaging in sexual activity in the courthouse with his clerk and misleading court administration about their relationship. (Censure of Judge Woodward (2014).) Like Judge Steiner, he admitted all of his misconduct, which involved consensual behavior, and expressed remorse and contrition.

V. CONCLUSION

"Certain misconduct is so completely at odds with the core qualities and role of a judge that no amount of mitigation can redeem the seriousness of the wrongdoing or obviate the need for removal in order to fulfill our mandate to protect the public, enforce high standards of judicial conduct, and maintain public confidence in the integrity of the judiciary." (Saucedo, supra, 62 Cal.4th CJP Supp. at p. 53.) The "ultimate standard for judicial conduct must be conduct which constantly reaffirms fitness for the high responsibility of judicial office." (Geiler, supra, 10 Cal.3d at p. 281.)

Judges are expected to be honest, have integrity, uphold high personal standards, and treat everyone with dignity and respect, on or off the bench. Justice Johnson's conduct before, and during, this proceeding demonstrates that he does not meet these fundamental expectations. He committed 18 acts of prejudicial misconduct and was found to have engaged in the unwanted touching of four women, to have engaged in conduct that would reasonably be perceived as sexual harassment of seven women at his court, to have misused the prestige of his position and demeaned his judicial office by attempting to develop personal relationships with three other young women, and to have further demeaned his office by his offensive conduct toward a fourth woman, as well as by multiple incidents of undignified conduct while intoxicated.

Justice Johnson's refusal to admit to serious misconduct, and his intoxication, coupled with his failure to be truthful during the proceedings, compels us to conclude that he cannot meet the fundamental expectations of his position as a judge. Fulfilling the commission's mandate—particularly with respect to maintaining public confidence in the integrity of the judiciary—can only be achieved by removing him from the bench.

ORDER

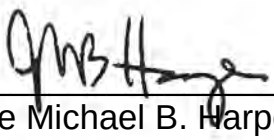
Pursuant to the provisions of article VI, section 18 of the California Constitution, and rules 120(a) and 136 of the Rules of the Commission on Judicial Performance, we hereby remove Justice Jeffrey W. Johnson from office and disqualify him from acting as a judge.



Commission members Hon. Michael B. Harper; Dr. Michael A. Moodian; Hon. William S. Dato; Mr. Eduardo De La Riva; Ms. Kay Cooperman Jue; Nanci E. Nishimura, Esq.; Victor E. Salazar, Esq., Mr. Richard Simpson; and Mr. Adam N. Torres voted in favor of all the findings and conclusions expressed herein and in this order of removal. Commission members Ms. Sarah Kruer Jager and Hon. Lisa B. Lench were recused from this matter.

COMMISSION ON JUDICIAL PERFORMANCE ISSUES DECISION AND ORDER REMOVING JUSTICE JEFFREY W. JOHNSON FROM OFFICE

The Commission on Judicial Performance has issued a decision and order removing Justice Jeffrey W. Johnson of the California Court of Appeal, Second Appellate District, Division One, from office. The commission's determination becomes final in 30 days, subject to discretionary review by the California Supreme Court.

The commission ordered Justice Johnson removed from office for 18 acts of prejudicial misconduct, comprised of more than 40 proven allegations. The commission found that Justice Johnson engaged in the unwanted touching of four women; engaged in conduct that would reasonably be perceived as sexual harassment of seven women at his court; misused the prestige of his position and demeaned his judicial office by attempting to develop personal relationships with three other women, and further demeaned his office by his offensive conduct toward a fourth woman, as well as by multiple incidents of undignified conduct (including conduct at the courthouse for the Court of Appeal) while intoxicated; and displayed poor demeanor to coworkers and made a disparaging remark about judicial colleagues.

Justice Johnson's misconduct was aggravated by his lack of candor throughout the commission proceedings. The commission found that Justice Johnson "testified untruthfully in many instances." As a result of his misconduct and his lack of candor during the course of the proceedings, the commission concluded that Justice Johnson "cannot meet the fundamental expectations of his position as a judge."

The commission's Decision and Order is available on the commission's website at https://cjp.ca.gov (under "Pending Cases - Press Releases & Documents" and "Public Discipline & Decisions"). Justice Johnson is represented by Paul S. Meyer of Costa Mesa and Reginald A. Vitek of San Diego.

The commission is composed of six public members, three judges, and two lawyers. The chairperson is Hon. Michael B. Harper. Commission members Sarah Kruer Jager and Hon. Lisa B. Lench are recused in this matter.

LELAND W. GEILER, a Judge of the Municipal Court, Petitioner, v. COMMISSION ON JUDICIAL QUALIFICATIONS, Respondent.

SUMMARY

On the basis of evidence heard by special masters appointed by the Supreme Court, the Commission on Judicial Qualifications recommended that petitioner, a municipal court judge, be removed from office. After granting a writ of review to examine the commission's findings, conclusions and recommendation, the Supreme Court adopted the commission's recommendation. As a preface to its decision, the court summarized the relative positions and functions of the masters, the commission and the court, and explained that in reviewing the commission's recommendation, the court will make an independent evaluation of the record evidence, and will then decide, as a question of law, whether conduct which the court may have found, as a fact, to have occurred comes within Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, as "wilful misconduct in office," or "conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute." The court found such conduct in evidence that, among other things, petitioner had brandished a dildo in chambers and had used the incident to curtail a public defender's cross-examination, had profanely and abusively reprimanded court employees, and had, in bad faith, interfered with the attorney-client relationship, by indulging his petty animosity toward public defenders. The court did conclude, however, that petitioner's conduct did not evidence moral turpitude, dishonesty or corruption and, accordingly, ordered that despite his removal from office, he is to be permitted to practice law if otherwise qualified. (Opinion by The Court.)

HEADNOTES

Classified to McKinney's Digest

(1) Judges § 19—Removal—Censure—Review of Commission's Recommendations.—Although a recommendation of censure or removal of a judge by the Commission on Judicial Qualifications is not self-effectuating, the commission does possess fact-finding and recommendatory powers which represent an allocation of judicial functions by the Constitution. Thus, the Supreme Court may treat a petition challenging the commission's recommendation as a petition for a writ of review.

[See Cal.Jur.2d, Judges, § 24.]

(2) Judges § 19—Removal—Censure—Burden of Proof.—The burden of proof imposed on the Commission on Judicial Qualifications' examiners in an inquiry concerning a judge should be analogous to that employed in State Bar disciplinary proceedings.

(3) Judges § 19—Removal—Censure—Standard of Proof.—The standard of proof in an inquiry concerning a judge before the Commission on Judicial Qualifications is proof by clear and convincing evidence sufficient to sustain a charge to a reasonable certainty.

(4) Judges § 19 — Removal — Censure — Commission's Powers. — The Commission on Judicial Qualifications, not special masters who may be appointed by the Supreme Court, is vested by the Constitution with the ultimate power to recommend, to that court, the censure, removal, or retirement of a judge. Thus, the commission is free to disregard the masters' report and may prepare its own findings of fact and consequent conclusions of law, but must apply the "clear and convincing evidence" standard of proof in its independent evaluation of the evidence before the masters. It may, of course, give great weight to the masters' action on the ground that they had heard the presentation of evidence and were, therefore, in a better position than the commission to pass on the truthfulness of the testimony.

(5) Judges § 19—Removal—Censure—Supreme Court's Power.—The Supreme Court's power to retire a judge for disability or to censure or remove a judge for misconduct is contingent on the Commission on Judicial Qualifications having so recommended and is, therefore, more limited than the court's power to commence proceedings on its own motion to disbar or suspend an attorney.

(6) Judges § 19—Removal—Censure—Review of Commission's Recommendations.—In reviewing the Commission on Judicial Qualifications' recommendation as to censure or removal of a judge for misconduct, the Supreme Court will make an independent evaluation of the record evidence adduced below. After conducting such a review, the court will decide, as a question of law, whether certain conduct, which the court may have found as a fact to have occurred, was "wilful misconduct in office," or "conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute," coming within Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18. The court's determination as to whether to dismiss the proceedings or order the judge censured or removed from office must rest on the court's findings of fact and conclusions of law.

(7) Judges § 19 — Removal — Censure — Constitutional Provision.—In authorizing the censure or removal of a judge for "wilful misconduct in office," Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (c), connotes something graver than it does in authorizing such discipline for "conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute." The more serious charge should be reserved for unjudicial conduct which a judge, acting in his judicial capacity, commits in bad faith, whereas the lesser charge should be applied to conduct undertaken in good faith but which would appear to an objective observer to be, not only unjudicial conduct, but conduct prejudicial to public esteem for the judicial office. However, in appropriate circumstances, the lesser charge may sustain the sanction of removal from office.

(8) Judges § 19—The Office—Removal—Causes for Removal.—Removal of a trial judge from office was called for by evidence that, in brandishing a dildo in chambers, in referring to the incident in open court, with intent to curtail cross-examination, and in profanely and abusively reprimanding court employees, the judge engaged in "wilful misconduct in office," within Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (c), and by other evidence demonstrating "conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute," within that constitutional provision, including interference by the judge with the attorney-client relationship, in violation of Code Civ. Proc., § 284.

OPINION

THE COURT.—Petitioner was appointed a judge of the Municipal Court for the Los Angeles Judicial District of Los Angeles County on December 30, 1966. On March 26, 1971, the Commission on Judicial Qualifications[1] (hereafter the Commission) resolved on its own motion pursuant to rule 904 of the California Rules of Court[2] to conduct a preliminary in-

[1]The California Constitution, article VI, section 8, provides in pertinent part: "The Commission on Judicial Qualifications consists of 2 judges of courts of appeal, 2 judges of superior courts, and one judge of a municipal court, each appointed by the Supreme Court; 2 members of the State Bar who have practiced law in the State for 10 years, appointed by its governing body; and 2 citizens who are not judges, retired judges, or members of the State Bar, appointed by the Governor and approved by the Senate, a majority of the membership concurring. All terms are 4 years."

Article VI, section 18, subdivision (c), of the California Constitution provides: "On recommendation of the Commission on Judicial Qualifications the Supreme Court may (1) retire a judge for disability that seriously interferes with the performance of his duties and is or is likely to become permanent, and (2) censure or remove a judge for action occurring not more than 6 years prior to the commencement of his current term that constitutes wilful misconduct in office, wilful and persistent failure to perform his duties, habitual intemperance, or conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute."

Subdivision (e) of the same section provides: "The Judicial Council [see Cal. Const., art. VI, § 6] shall make rules implementing this section and providing for confidentiality of proceedings." These are rules 901-921 of the California Rules of Court.

[2]All references herein to specific rules are to the California Rules of Court.

"Rule 904. Preliminary Investigation.

"(a) The Commission, upon receiving a verified statement, not obviously unfounded or frivolous, alleging facts indicating that a judge is guilty of wilful misconduct in office, wilful and persistent failure to perform his duties, habitual intemperance, or conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute, or that he has a disability that seriously interferes with the performance of his duties and is or is likely to become permanent, shall make a preliminary vestigation of the judicial conduct of petitioner. Pursuant to rule 905 the Commission filed a notice of formal proceedings herein on January 21, 1972. The Commission requested this court by resolution of February 11, 1972, to appoint three special masters for the taking of evidence, as authorized by rule 907. By order filed March 7, 1972, this court appointed three special masters to hear and take evidence in this matter and to report thereon to the Commission.[3]

After a hearing which consumed 21 court days the masters rendered their report on July 5, 1972. The Commission had set forth in the six counts of its notice of formal proceedings 23 specifications of wilful misconduct in office and conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice. The masters found that petitioner had, as charged in five of these specifications, been guilty of conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice which brought the judicial office into disrepute. As to the remaining specifications the masters concluded that petitioner was not guilty of wilful misconduct in office or conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice. The masters unanimously recommended that petitioner "be censured for the following reasons: [¶] 1. Indiscreet use of vulgar, unjudicial and inappropriate language directed toward court attaches and lawyers. [¶] 2. His crude and offensive conduct in public places."

Both petitioner and the examiners filed objections to the report of the masters pursuant to rule 913.[4] After the Commission had itself heard oral argument in accordance with rule 914, and following each member's consideration of the evidence adduced before the masters and the objections filed to the masters' findings thereon, the Commission issued its own unanimous findings of fact and conclusions of law. In addition to the five specifications upon which the masters had found petitioner guilty of misconduct, the Commission also found petitioner guilty of conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice as charged in four other specifications. In relation to the remaining 14 specifications the Commission concluded investigation to determine whether formal proceedings should be instituted and a hearing held. The Commission without receiving a verified statement may make such a preliminary investigation on its own motion."

[3]We appointed Arthur L. Alarcon, judge of the Superior Court of the County of Los Angeles (presiding master); D. Sterry Fagan, judge of the Superior Court of the County of Los Angeles; and Peter S. Smith, judge of the Municipal Court for the Alhambra Judicial District of Los Angeles County who, before hearings began, was elevated to the Superior Court of the County of Los Angeles.

[4]The Commission designated two deputy attorneys general as examiners "to gather and present evidence before the masters or Commission with respect to the charges against a judge." (Rule 921 (f).) The same deputy attorneys general argued the cause for the Commission before this court.

that the charges were either unproved or did not warrant discipline. The Commission thereupon recommended to this court, pursuant to rule 917 and article VI, section 18 of the California Constitution (see fn. 1, supra), that petitioner be removed from office. The recommendation of removal was approved by seven members of the Commission. The two remaining members of the Commission voted to recommend censure rather than removal of petitioner.

(1)(See fn. 5.) We granted a writ of review to examine the Commission's findings of fact, conclusions of law, and recommendation of removal.[5] (See rule 920.) After reviewing the entire record, we adopt the recommendation of the Commission.

(2) In reviewing the Commission's recommendation, we must address ourselves to the issue of the quantum of proof applicable to an inquiry concerning a judge. We believe the burden of proof imposed upon the examiners in such an inquiry should be analogous to that employed in State Bar disciplinary proceedings, wherein we require that charges of misconduct "be sustained by convincing proof and to a reasonable certainty and any reasonable doubts should be resolved in favor of the accused." (Moore v. State Bar (1964) 62 Cal.2d 74, 79 [41 Cal.Rptr. 161, 396 P.2d 577].)
(3) We accordingly declare the standard of proof in such an inquiry before the Commission to be proof by clear and convincing evidence sufficient to sustain a charge to a reasonable certainty. (Cf. Medoff v. State Bar (1969) 71 Cal.2d 535, 550 [78 Cal.Rptr. 696, 455 P.2d 800].)

(4) The Commission, not the masters, is vested by the Constitution with the ultimate power to recommend to this court the censure, removal or retirement of a judge. Thus the Commission is free to disregard the report of the masters and may prepare its own findings of fact and consequent conclusions of law. The Commission must, however, apply the "clear and convincing evidence" standard of proof in its independent evaluation of the evidence adduced before the masters. Moreover, "[s]ince it is difficult to pass upon the weight to be given the testimony of a witness when only

[5]Although a recommendation of censure or removal by the Commission on Judicial Qualifications is not self-effectuating, the Commission does possess fact-finding and recommendatory powers which represent an allocation of judicial functions to the Commission by the Constitution. Thus when we receive a petition challenging the recommendation of the Commission, we deem it proper to treat it as a petition for a writ of review. (Code Civ. Proc., § 1067.) Code of Civil Procedure section 1068 provides: "A writ of review may be granted . . . when an inferior tribunal, board, or officer, exercising judicial functions, has exceeded the jurisdiction of such tribunal, board, or officer, and there is no appeal, nor, in the judgment of the court, any plain, speedy, and adequate remedy."

the written record is before a reviewing body," the Commission may properly "give great weight to the action of the [special masters]," who, having heard the presentation of evidence were "in a better position than the [Commission] to pass upon the truthfulness of the testimony." (McKinney v. State Bar (1964) 62 Cal.2d 194, 196 [41 Cal.Rptr. 665, 397 P.2d 425].)

We must also decide the appropriate standard for this court to employ in reviewing a recommendation by the Commission. Were this recommendation of independent force and effect absent further action by this court, our review of the evidentiary basis for that recommendation might properly be limited to a determination whether the Commission's findings of fact were supported by substantial evidence. Under such a standard of review, we would not be free to disregard the Commission's findings merely because the circumstances involved might also be reasonably reconciled with contrary findings of fact. (Cf. People v. Mosher (1969) 1 Cal.3d 379, 395 [82 Cal.Rptr. 379, 461 P.2d 659].) Procedures in State Bar matters offer an alternative standard—an independent review of the record by this court. (5) However, the power to retire a judge for disability or to censure or remove a judge for misconduct is, of course, contingent on the Commission having so recommended (Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18), and is therefore more limited than our power to commence proceedings on our own motion to disbar or suspend an attorney. (See Bus. & Prof. Code, § 6107; In re Hallinan (1954) 43 Cal.2d 243, 253-254 [272 P.2d 768].) (6) Nevertheless, since the ultimate, dispositive decision to censure or remove a judge has been entrusted to this court, we conclude that in exercising that authority and in meeting our responsibility we must make our own, independent evaluation of the record evidence adduced below. After conducting such a review we may then decide as a question of law whether certain conduct, which we may have found as a fact to have occurred, was "wilful misconduct in office" or "conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute." (Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18.) Finally, it is to be our findings of fact and conclusions of law, upon which we are to make our determination of the ultimate action to be taken, to wit, whether we should dismiss the proceedings or order the judge concerned censured or removed from office.

Having clarified what we consider to be the proper institutional role of this court vis-à-vis the Commission and the special masters in an inquiry, we turn to the instant proceeding. It should be noted initially that the masters did apply the proper standard of proof in preparing their findings of fact. The masters' formal findings contain four separate references to a "clear and convincing evidence" standard of proof in holding certain allegations not to have been proven.

Although its conclusions of law differed, the Commission's findings of fact paralleled the masters' findings. The Commission adopted as its own all but a few words of the masters' findings relative to the first five counts of the notice of formal proceedings, containing 22 of the 23 specifications of misconduct by petitioner. Where the Commission's findings in regard to these specifications did differ from the masters', they reflected the Commission's quite proper determination to focus on an objective appraisal of petitioner's conduct in terms of the effect of such conduct on the administration of justice. The masters were more concerned with the subjective motivations of petitioner in engaging in specified conduct, and with the subjective appraisal of his motivations by the persons directly affected by the specified conduct. It should be emphasized that there were no significant differences in the Commission's and the masters' determinations of whether or not the conduct alleged to have occurred in the 23 specifications did in fact occur. In no instance did the Commission find to have occurred conduct alleged in a particular specification, which allegation the masters had previously found not proven.

The specifications found by the Commission to have been proven other than that of count six generally concerned crude behavior and vulgar language which petitioner used in dealing with various professional associates, employees and officers of the court. Petitioner was found to have prodded a deputy public defender with a "dildo" during a conference in chambers one morning, and later that day to have referred to this incident twice in open court so as to curtail the victim's cross-examination of two witnesses. Petitioner was found to have approached a court commissioner from behind in a public corridor of the hall of justice and to have grabbed this victim's testicles. Petitioner was found on two occasions to have made lustful references to his female clerk, once while in chambers in the presence of a group of professional associates. Petitioner was found to have habitually used vulgar and profane language in his conversations with this clerk, and on two occasions to have used profane terms of personal abuse in reprimanding her and another woman employed by the court. Petitioner was also found to have invited two female attorneys into his chambers wherein he discoursed on the salacious nature of the evidence adduced in criminal cases concerning homosexual acts and rape, punctuating his commentary with profane terms for bodily functions.[6]

[6]The Commission's findings as to all specifications determined by the Commission to have been proven other than the specification of count six (see fn. 7, infra) are as follows:

The only substantive difference between the masters' and the Commission's findings arose in relation to count six, which set forth the 23d and

Upon the completion of that matter Judge Geiler invited Mrs. W. and Mrs. C. into chambers to discuss the handling of preliminary hearings.

"Judge Geiler spoke of the importance of the religion of judges in predicting how of these nine cases was there an assertion of a conflict of interest." The findings of the Commission as to count six are set out in the margin.[7]

The Commission's findings as to count six are substantially identical to those of the masters save for the final two paragraphs. The masters had found mutual hostility between petitioner and the public defender's office; they will rule on a matter. However, the major part of the Judge's conversation, a monologue which lasted approximately ten to twenty minutes, was rambling and disjointed. The only thread tying the conversation together was the theme of sex. For example, Judge Geiler told of a gang-rape by 'hot-blooded' Mexicans and of a judge who had vomited upon surreptitiously witnessing a homosexual act in the lavatory at the May Company. Judge Geiler also discussed other homosexual acts and degrees of penetration in rape cases, all with apparent relish at the salacious nature of the subject matter. He used 'street language' such as, 'shit' and 'fuck,' in discussing cases. . . ."

[7]"In the nine preliminary hearings specified in COUNT SIX of the Notice of Formal Proceedings the Public Defender was relieved as counsel. The respective defendants were eligible for representation by the Public Defender and the Public Defender's office was willing to represent and was appearing for each defendant. In the eight escape cases, Judge Geiler made a preliminary statement from the bench regarding his sentencing policy on escape cases where there was no evidence of violence or damage to property.

"In each case the defendant advised the court of his desire to plead guilty to a misdemeanor, but the Public Defender refused to plead the defendant guilty for the following reasons:

"(1) Hakes—The Public Defender wanted to consolidate this matter with other pending superior court cases so that defendant might spend less time in jail.

"(2) Cole—No statement was made to show any reason for the Public Defender's reluctance.

"(3) Dominguez—Uncertainty as to the effect of a guilty plea on defendant's parole status.

"(4) Marquardt—Refusal of Judge Geiler to make a record of the plea bargain.

"(5) Oderda—Uncertainty as to the effect of a guilty plea on defendant's parole status.

"(6) Saldate—The records of the proceedings before Judge Geiler do not reflect whether the Public Defender made any statement as to whether or not Saldate would plead guilty or the reasons why he should not do so, nor whether an opportunity was afforded to express the Public Defender's position.

"(7) Ramirez—The Public Defender and the District Attorney agreed to a lesser sentence because of mitigating circumstances. Judge Geiler refused but subsequently acceded to the same sentence after the substitution of private counsel.

"(8) Deever—Refusal of Judge Geiler to make a record of the plea bargain.

"(9) Ricketts—Judge Geiler refused to give the Public Defender additional time to research a possible defense suggested by the defendant.

"There was no evidence to show that there was a conflict of interest between the public defender and the defendants.

"In each case, private counsel was appointed at the request of the defendant for the purpose of the plea only and without compensation. Thereafter, each defendant entered a guilty plea in compliance with 'IN RE TAHL.'

the Commission found petitioner responsible for this hostile relationship. The Commission additionally found that petitioner's substitutions of counsel were the direct result of petitioner's hostile attitude toward deputy public defenders.

We have made a detailed review of the full record and independently find upon clear and convincing evidence in accord with the findings of the Commission, including the findings as to the specification of count six. We adopt the Commission's findings as our own.

The Commission concluded on its findings that each of the proven specifications involved conduct constituting "wilful misconduct in office" and "conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute." With the qualifications subsequently noted, we reach similar conclusions.

The ultimate standard for judicial conduct must be conduct which constantly reaffirms fitness for the high responsibilities of judicial office. It is immaterial that the conduct concerned was probably lawful, albeit unjudicial, or that petitioner may have perceived his offensive and harassing conduct as low-humored horseplay.

The first two canons of the Code of Judicial Conduct proposed in 1972 by the American Bar Association's Special Committee on Standards of Judicial Conduct emphasize the importance of appraising alleged judicial misconduct objectively rather than subjectively. Canon One declares: "a

"After the pleas, the defendants in the escape cases received sentences ranging from 10 to 45 days in county jail, consecutive. Defendant Dominguez pleaded guilty to misdemeanor possession of marijuana and was placed on probation and fined $100. No evidence was offered to show that any of the defendants were innocent of the charges.

"Judge Geiler had a hostile attitude and bias toward members of the Public Defender's office. As a result, some members of the Public Defender's office were hostile towards Judge Geiler. Since 1970 the Public Defender's office has attempted to limit the tour of duty of the Deputy Public Defenders assigned to Judge Geiler's court to a period of one week. Four of the five Deputy Public Defenders who testified regarding their being relieved as counsel by Judge Geiler had been admitted to practice law for periods of time ranging from two to four months at that time.

"Deputy Public Defenders were required by office policy to obtain approval from a supervisor before pleading a defendant guilty to a misdemeanor at the time of a preliminary hearing in any municipal court. In eight of the foregoing cases, the Deputy Public Defender had a valid reason for refusing to accede to Judge Geiler's desire for an immediate guilty plea. However, because of Judge Geiler's preconceived bias against Deputy Public Defenders and his professed desire to expedite the administration of justice even at the expense of defendants' constitutional rights, Judge Geiler initiated and carried out the foregoing substitutions of counsel."

judge should uphold the integrity and independence of the judiciary." The accompanying text adds: "A judge should participate in establishing, maintaining, and enforcing, and should himself observe, high standards of conduct so that the integrity and independence of the judiciary may be preserved." Canon Two speaks for itself: "A judge should avoid impropriety and the appearance of impropriety in all his activities." (Italics added.)

The preface to the proposed Code of Judicial Conduct concludes: "The canons and text establish mandatory standards unless otherwise indicated. It is hoped that all jurisdictions will adopt this Code and establish effective disciplinary procedures for its enforcement." California is fortunate in that it need not formally adopt the proposed code in order to hold its judiciary to the high standard of conduct the public and the bar are entitled to expect of the judicial branch of government.

The Commission on Judicial Qualifications was created by constitutional amendment in 1960, when new section 10b was added to article VI. The proposition establishing the Commission found its way to the ballot in response to a demonstrated need to insure that those who sit in judgment in this state are both fit and able to discharge their responsibilities. One of the most dedicated and persuasive proponents of the Commission was Chief Justice Phil S. Gibson of this court.[§]

We had earlier held that the State Bar lacked jurisdiction over judges. (State Bar of California v. Superior Court (1929) 207 Cal. 323 [278 P. 432].) Due to the unwieldiness of legislative impeachment as a means of imposing judicial discipline, the bar of this state had been held to a higher standard of conduct than the bench—in reverse of the dictates of common sense and sound legal policy. The Commission provided an innovative and effective alternative to the impeachment process.

Although formal proceedings of the Commission have been few, the potentiality of such proceedings has proven to be the vital element of the Commission's efficacy. Each year since the establishment of the Commission the possibility of an inquiry and ultimately removal from office has led several unfit or disabled judges to remove themselves from the active ranks of the judiciary. In contrast to the low profile of most of its work, the California Commission on Judicial Qualifications, the first such commission created in the United States, has itself been much publicized as a model for other states anxious to share California's reputation for an outstanding judicial system.[9]

[§]See Gibson, For Modern Courts (1957) 32 State Bar J. 727, 733-735. See generally Frankel, Judicial Conduct and Removal of Judges for Cause in California (1962) 36 So.Cal.L.Rev. 72; Frankel, Removal of Judges: California Tackles an Old Problem (1963) 49 A.B.A.J. 166.

This court has considered disciplinary recommendations from the Commission on only five prior occasions. In the first instance, the Commission recommended removal. Without commenting on the validity of the Commission's findings of fact, we rejected the recommendation of removal of the judge concerned. (Stevens v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications (1964) 61 Cal.2d 886 [39 Cal.Rptr. 397, 393 P.2d 709].) At that time, however, our Constitution (art. VI, § 10b) authorized removal as the sole disciplinary measure, and limited the grounds for imposing discipline on a judge to "willful misconduct in office or willful and persistent failure to perform his duties or habitual intemperance."[10]

In 1966 a second constitutional amendment concerning the Commission on Judicial Qualifications repealed section 10b and added new section 18 to article VI (see fn. 1, supra), thereby broadening the grounds for removal of a judge and adding the intermediate disciplinary option of public censure. Since 1966 this court has on four occasions adopted the recommendation of the Commission that a judge be publicly censured for "conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute." (In re Chavez (1973) 9 Cal.3d 846 [109 Cal.Rptr. 79, 512 P.2d 303]; In re Sanchez (1973) 9 Cal.3d 844 [109 Cal.Rptr. 78, 512 P.2d 302]; In re Glickfeld (1971) 3 Cal.3d 891 [92 Cal.Rptr. 278, 479 P.2d 638]; In re Chargin (1970) 2 Cal.3d 617 [87 Cal.Rptr. 709, 471 P.2d 29].)

As indicated above, the Commission in the instant matter concluded that the conduct proven in the previously discussed specifications constituted "wilful misconduct in office" and "conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute." As we have noted above, the second ground for imposing discipline was added to the Constitution in 1966. (7) We believe this mandates our construing "wilful misconduct in office" as connoting something graver than the "lesser included offense" of "conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice

[9]Chief Justice Roger J. Traynor stated in an address to the Virginia State Bar Association: "When a bench can quit itself of a burdensome member through such a commission, it gains as much as the Bar and the public. It reaps added benefits from each judge's quickened awareness that he must meet reasonable standards of competence and behavior in relation to his office." that brings the judicial office into disrepute." The more serious charge should be reserved for unjudicial conduct which a judge acting in his judicial capacity commits in bad faith, while the lesser charge should be applied to conduct which a judge undertakes in good faith but which nevertheless would appear to an objective observer to be not only unjudicial conduct but conduct prejudicial to public esteem for the judicial office.[11]

(8) Viewed in this light, we conclude that the following specifications of petitioner's vulgar and profane conduct constituted "wilful misconduct in office:" petitioner's brandishing of the "dildo" and petitioner's subsequent remarks, found by the Commission to have been made with the intent of curtailing cross-examination by the victim, and petitioner's profane and abusive reprimanding of two court employees. We consider the remaining proven instances of petitioner's vulgar conduct to have been "conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute."

Turning to the final specification of misconduct embodied in count six, we regard the Commission's conclusions[12] to be worthy of incorporation in this opinion:

"We conclude that Judge Geiler violated Code of Civil Procedure section 284 when he relieved the Deputy Public Defenders in the eight cases (excluding Cole). While legal precedent in this area is scant, any excuse for Judge Geiler's noncompliance with Code of Civil Procedure section 284 was precluded by the fact that he did not act in good faith. Judge Geiler interfered with the attorney-client relationship between the public defenders and their clients. All of the cases were the type which probably would have become misdemeanors by sentence had the defendants been held to answer and pleaded guilty or been convicted in the superior court. In these cases, no actual prejudice was suffered by any of the defendants. Nevertheless, Judge

[11]The lesser charge of "conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute" would also apply to wilful misconduct out of office, i.e. unjudicial conduct committed in bad faith by a judge not then acting in a judicial capacity. It should be emphasized that our characterization of one ground for imposing discipline as more or less serious than the other does not imply that in a given case we would regard the ultimate sanction of removal as unjustified solely for "conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice which brings the judicial office into disrepute."

[12]It is significant that all nine members of the Commission concurred in these conclusions. All the findings of fact of the Commission, and all the conclusions of law relative to each proven specification of misconduct were adopted by unanimous resolution. The only nonunanimous act of the Commission was its recommendation of removal, for which seven members of the Commission voted. Two members of the Commission voted to recommend censure.

Geiler's bad faith interference with the attorney-client relationship in violation of Code of Civil Procedure section 284 constituted conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice and wilful misconduct in office.

"During the last few years there has been great public concern over the problem of trial court delay and congestion. It may be argued that Judge Geiler was attempting to respond to this crisis in the court system by encouraging pleas of guilty in minor cases which would undoubtedly result in a misdemeanor disposition in the superior court. However, a judge must decide each case on its own individual merits. In his misguided attempt to expedite justice, Judge Geiler did not do so. By his own testimony, he had biased preconceptions as to public defender cases. This precluded good faith consideration of each of these eight cases on its own merits.

"Judge Geiler's refusal to permit plea bargains in the Marquardt and Deever cases to be placed 'on the record' was petty, unreasonable and contrary to the rule set forth in People v. West. Judge Geiler's refusal to allow the Public Defender in the Ricketts case additional time to investigate a possible defense was arbitrary and made in callous disregard of the defendant's interests. Judge Geiler's replacement of the Public Defenders in the Dominguez and Oderda cases in effect precluded the investigation of possible parole consequences of guilty pleas; as such these actions also were made in callous disregard of the defendants' interests. Judge Geiler's summary dismissal of the Public Defender in the Saldate case for no apparent reason and without any discussion whatsoever was arbitrary, unjust, and capricious. In the Ramirez case, Judge Geiler's removal of the Public Defender who insisted on a lesser sentence, coupled with the Judge's subsequent imposition of the same sentence, was arbitrary and capricious. Finally in the Hakes case, Judge Geiler's removal of the Public Defender prevented the reasonable consolidation of this matter with other pending superior court cases.

"Thus we conclude that the actions of Judge Geiler in these eight cases violated Code of Civil Procedure section 284, interfered with the attorney-client relationship and were made in bad faith.

"The foregoing conduct of Respondent constituted wilful misconduct in office and conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute."

We agree with the Commission that the conduct charged in count six was not only unjudicial but unlawful as well. (Cf. Smith v. Superior Court (1968) 68 Cal.2d 547 [68 Cal.Rptr. 1, 440 P.2d 65].) We also are in accord with the Commission in concluding, contrary to the special masters, that petitioner acted in "bad faith." However, we feel this last conclusion requires elucidation.

By "bad faith," we do not mean to imply that petitioner sought to harm the interests of the defendants involved. Rather, we mean that in indulging his petty animosity toward deputy public defenders, and in culmination of a pervasive course of conduct of overreaching his authority over subordinates, petitioner intentionally committed acts which he knew or should have known were beyond his lawful power. The resulting misconduct entailed the most insidious kind of official lawlessness—disregard for the statutory and constitutional rules by which a society of millions and a heritage of centuries have sought to preserve fundamental fairness within a legal system which cannot escape the inherent imperfections of mankind.

No more fragile rights exist under our law than the rights of the indigent accused; consequently these rights are deserving of the greatest judicial solicitude. The ideal of our legal system is that the judicial should be equated with the just. Such an ideal cannot be achieved if one man clothed with judicial power may ignore with impunity such a basic institutional mandate as the sanctity of the attorney-client relationship merely because the attorneys are young deputy public defenders and their clients are indigent.

It is immaterial whether petitioner's abuse of power resulted in just or unjust treatment for any given defendant. It is undisputed that petitioner bore no ill will towards the individual defendants enumerated in count six. Petitioner's bad faith was directed towards our legal system itself; his arbitrary substitutions of counsel because of his personal beliefs as to the defendants' guilt and his personal hostility to their counsel smacks of an inquisitorial intent to serve imagined truth at the expense of justice. Our adversary system of justice and our elaborate procedure for the prosecution of alleged criminals represents an institutional recognition of the fallibility of the individual. Much as our political system apportions power among jealous branches of government, so within the judicial branch we have striven to disperse the functions of the judicial process among many adverse participants in the hope that the institutions of our legal system will bear a collective capacity for justice and righteousness which no single mortal can achieve. It is this commitment to institutional justice which petitioner's individual conduct threatens to corrupt. Risk of recurrence of such conduct cannot be tolerated.

After reviewing the entire record and considering all the facts and circumstances, we have concluded that the recommendation of the Commission should be adopted. We therefore order Judge Leland W. Geiler of the Municipal Court of the Los Angeles Judicial District of Los Angeles County removed from office. This order is final forthwith.[13]

As indicated above, before the advent of the Commission on Judicial Qualifications the bar of this state was held to a higher standard of conduct than the bench. This anomaly has since been rectified and the reverse is now true. We recognize that petitioner's removal from office is required more by the high standards of judicial office than by his personal failings. Much evidence was adduced before the Commission of petitioner's diligence in the work of the law, and his unjudicial conduct cannot be said to amount to moral turpitude, dishonesty or corruption. (Cf. Bus. & Prof. Code, § 6106.) We therefore further order that despite his removal from judicial office Leland W. Geiler shall if otherwise qualified be permitted to practice law in the State of California. (See Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (d).)

Petitioner's application for a rehearing was denied November 15, 1973.

[13]This is the first instance in which we have removed a judge from office and we do so only after careful consideration of all matters, including the standards of conduct to which members of the judiciary must conform, the nature of our review of proceedings before the masters and the Commission, and the full record of those proceedings as reported to this court. The record discloses that the masters rendered their report 120 days after their appointment. During the hearings, which consumed 21 court days, they heard a total of 73 witnesses whose testimony is reported in 3,193 pages of transcript. Thereafter the Commission, after careful deliberations over a 56-day period, made and reported its findings of facts, conclusions of law and recommendations. Both the Commission and this court were required to review the full transcript in performance of their responsibilities to make independent findings on a conflicting factual record.

WILLIAM D. SPRUANCE, a Judge of the Municipal Court, Petitioner,
v.
COMMISSION ON JUDICIAL QUALIFICATIONS, Respondent

S.F. No. 23153.

Supreme Court of California.

March 25, 1975.

SUMMARY

On the petition of a municipal court judge to modify or reject the recommendation of the Commission on Judicial Qualifications that he be removed from office, the Supreme Court held that the judge had engaged in inexcusable and reprehensible conduct constituting in some instances "wilful misconduct in office" and in other instances "conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute" within the meaning of Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, providing for censure or removal in such cases, and accordingly it adopted and effectuated the commission's recommendation of removal. In reaching its decision, the court discussed proven instances of the judge's having treated attorneys and litigants in a cavalier, rude, and improper manner, of his judicial conduct being subject to the improper influence of his business relationships and social friendships, of his having solicited another judge to dismiss a traffic citation which he had received and his subsequent alteration of the reported disposition so as to conceal the fact that he had received preferential treatment, and of his having consistently appointed two attorneys, who were long-time friends and political supporters, in criminal cases in which the defendant was either not entitled to counsel at public expense or the public defender had not been requested to represent them. In view of its findings that the judge had acted in bad faith on numerous occasions, the court further held that no credit could be given to his asseverations of mitigating circumstances, and that mere censure would woefully fail to convey the court's utter reproval of any judge who allows malice or other improper personal motivations to infect the administration of justice. In view of the judge's previous long unblemished career as a lawyer, however, and the fact that, as a practicing attorney, he would not have available that authority which he abused as a judge, the court ordered that despite his removal from judicial office, he be permitted, if otherwise qualified, to practice law in the State of California.

HEADNOTES

Classified to California Digest of Official Reports

(1) Judges § 6--Removal.
The language of Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, that "on recommendation of the Commission on Judicial Qualifications the Supreme Court may" censure or remove a judge for wilful misconduct or prejudicial conduct, as well as sound procedure, requires that the Supreme Court predicate its adoption, modification, or rejection of the commission's recommendation solely on those specifications in the notice of formal proceedings which the commission has found both to have been proven as a matter of fact and to have constituted constitutionally sufficient grounds for the imposition of discipline.

(2) Judges § 6--Removal--"Wilful Misconduct."
Under Cal.Const., art. VI, § 18, relating to discipline of judges, for "wilful misconduct in office, ... or conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice," the more serious charge, "wilful misconduct," is reserved for unjudicial conduct committed in bad faith by a judge acting in his judicial capacity, and the term "bad faith" implies that the judge intentionally committed acts which he knew or should have known were beyond his lawful power. As so used, the term entails actual malice as the motivation for a judge's acting ultra vires, and it also encompasses acts within the lawful power of a judge which nevertheless are committed for a corrupt purpose. In sum "bad faith" is quintessentially a concept of specific intent, requiring consciousness of purpose as an antecedent to a judge's acting maliciously or corruptly.

[See Cal.Jur.2d, Judges, § 24; Am.Jur.2d, Judges, §§ 18, 19.]

(3) Judges § 6--"Prejudicial Conduct."
Under Cal.Const., art. VI, § 18, relating to discipline of judges for "wilful misconduct in office, ... or conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice," "prejudicial conduct" includes conduct which a judge undertakes in good faith but which nevertheless would appear to an objective observer to be not only unjudicial conduct, but conduct prejudicial to public esteem for the judicial office, as well as wilful misconduct out of office, i.e., unjudicial conduct committed in bad faith by a judge not then acting in a judicial capacity. 780

(4) Judges § 6--Removal--"Wilful Misconduct."
Proven charges against a municipal judge of treating attorneys and litigants in his court in a cavalier, rude, and improper manner, established that he acted in bad faith in exceeding the bounds of his lawful power, and such incidents therefore constituted "wilful misconduct in office" within the meaning of

Cal.Const., art. VI, § 18, setting forth grounds for discipline of judges, where the record showed that he had acted out of revenge and hostility toward an attorney who had filed an affidavit of prejudice by failing to immediately disqualify himself, that his questioning of a deputy district attorney at length concerning a case not then before him, was also an abuse of judicial authority and clearly motivated by feelings of animosity, and that his utterance of a contemptuous "raspberry" while a defendant in a criminal prosecution was testifying in his own behalf was a deliberate and malicious attempt to prejudice the defendant's case, motivated by the judge's anger toward the deputy public defender.

(5) Judges § 6--Removal--"Prejudicial Conduct."
While a municipal judge's use of a vulgar "finger" gesture to indicate that the tardiness of a defendant in a traffic matter demonstrated the defendant's lack of respect for the court resulted in a loss of courtroom dignity, it was not done in bad faith, and therefore did not constitute "wilful misconduct" within the meaning of Cal.Const., art. VI, § 18. Because it was an isolated act directed toward edifying the defendant rather than prejudicing his case, it fell within that section's less serious category of "conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute."

(6) Judges § 6--Removal--"Wilful Misconduct."
Proven charges against a municipal judge that his judicial conduct was subject to the improper influence of his business relations and social friendships, constituted, with the exception of one specification concerning use of an obscenity, "wilful misconduct in office" within the meaning of Cal.Const., art. VI, § 18, setting forth grounds for discipline of judges, where, in each specified incident, he intentionally used the prestige or authority of his judicial office to effect or influence the disposition of a criminal case out of his desire to help friends and political supporters, and where his conduct in one of the incidents was motivated not only by political favoritism but also by a desire to punish a deputy district attorney for his refusal to accept his suggestion of a negotiated plea. 781

(7) Judges § 6--Removal--"Wilful Misconduct."
A municipal judge's conduct with respect to a traffic citation he had personally received constituted "wilful misconduct in office" within the meaning of Cal.Const., art. VI, § 18, setting forth grounds for discipline of judges, where he not only circumvented proper legal procedure in causing another judge to dismiss the charge, but also altered that judge's notation on the citation so as to indicate that he had attended traffic school, thereby concealing the fact that he had received preferential treatment.

(8) Judges § 6--Removal--"Wilful Misconduct."
A municipal judge's appointment of 2 attorneys in 27 criminal cases in which the defendant was either not entitled to counsel at public expense or the public defender had not been requested to provide representation constituted "wilful misconduct in office" within the meaning of Cal.Const., art. VI, § 18, setting forth grounds for discipline of judges, where both attorneys were long- time friends and political supporters, and the appointments clearly conflicted with the standards established by the California Code of Judicial Conduct.

(9) Judges § 6--Removal.
The Supreme Court makes the decision whether a judge, whose conduct has been found to be either wilful misconduct or prejudicial misconduct should be censured or removed from the bench on the basis of its own findings of fact and conclusions of law. Although the court gives great weight to the findings of fact of special masters appointed to hold evidentiary hearings, the conclusions of law and the ultimate sanction are solely within the province and domain of the court, and it does not defer to either the masters or the Commission on Judicial Qualifications in deciding such matters. (Stating that language to the contrary in McCartney v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications, 12 Cal.3d 512 [116 Cal.Rptr. 260, 526 P.2d 268] is no longer to be regarded as controlling.)

(10) Judges § 6--Removal.
Removal from office, rather than censure, was the appropriate discipline for a municipal judge whose actions in several specified incidents had been found to constitute "wilful misconduct in office," and in other instances "conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice" within the meaning of Cal.Const., art. VI, § 18, setting forth grounds for removal or censure of judges. Since the judge was found to have acted in bad faith on numerous occasions, no credit could be given to his asseverations of mitigating 782 circumstances, and, in view of the clear evidence of his petty tyranny and favoritism, mere censure would woefully fail to convey the court's utter reproval of any judge who allows malice or other improper personal motivations to infect the administration of justice. It is the duty of the court to preserve the integrity and independence of the judiciary, and the risk of the recurrence of the judge's conduct could not be tolerated.

THE COURT.

The Commission on Judicial Qualifications (hereinafter the Commission) has recommended the removal from office of Judge William D. Spruance of the Municipal Court for the San Leandro-Hayward Judicial District of Alameda County. [FN1] Pursuant to rule 920 of the California Rules of Court, [FN2] Judge Spruance has petitioned this court 783 to modify or reject the Commission's recommendation. In discharging our solemn constitutional duties in this matter we have independently reviewed the entire record and have adopted with some modifications the findings of the Commission, as set forth seriatim hereinafter. We conclude that petitioner has engaged in inexcusable and reprehensible conduct constituting in some instances "wilful misconduct in office" (hereinafter wilful misconduct) and in other instances "conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute" (hereinafter prejudicial conduct). We accordingly adopt and hereby effectuate the Commission's recommendation of removal.

FN1 The California Constitution, article VI, section 8, provides in pertinent part: "The Commission on Judicial Qualifications consists of 2 judges of courts of appeal, 2 judges of superior courts, and one judge of a municipal court, each appointed by the Supreme Court; 2 members of the State Bar who have practiced law in this State for 10 years, appointed by its governing body; and 2 citizens who are not judges, retired judges, or members of the State Bar, appointed by the Governor and approved by the Senate, a majority of the membership concurring. All terms are 4 years."
Article VI, section 18, subdivision (c), of the California Constitution provides: "On recommendation of the Commission on Judicial Qualifications the Supreme Court may (1) retire a judge for disability that seriously interferes with the performance of his duties and is or is likely to become permanent, and (2) censure or remove a judge for action occurring not more than 6 years prior to the commencement of his current term that constitutes wilful misconduct in office, wilful and persistent failure to perform his duties, habitual intemperance, or conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute."

FN2 All references herein to specific rules are to the California Rules of Court. (See Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (e).)

After practicing law for almost 20 years, petitioner campaigned for and was elected to the municipal court, taking office on January 4, 1971. On January 11, 1973, he was notified that the Commission had, on its own motion pursuant to rule 904, ordered a preliminary investigation of his judicial conduct. On July 13,

1973, petitioner was served with a five-count Notice of Formal Proceedings (rule 905) encompassing nineteen specifications of wilful misconduct and prejudicial conduct. Following petitioner's filing of a verified answer, this court on January 4, 1974, at the Commission's behest, appointed three special masters to hold evidentiary hearings. (Rule 907.) [FN3]

FN3 The special masters so appointed were Alvin E. Weinberger, retired Judge of the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco (presiding master); Albert A. Axelrod, retired Judge of the Municipal Court of the City and County of San Francisco; and Sidney Feinberg, Judge of the Municipal Court for the Palo Alto-Mountain View Judicial District of Santa Clara County.

The 19 days of hearings before the masters commenced on February 19, 1974, and concluded on March 19, 1974. During the course of the proceedings, the examiners designated by the Commission to prosecute the charges against petitioner (rule 921(f)) received permission to strike three of the specifications in count I of the Notice of Formal Proceedings (counts I-C, I-D, and I-H). The masters filed their report on April 25, 1974, finding five specifications not proven (counts I-G, I-I, II-D, II-G, and IV). Of the remaining eleven specifications, six were found to constitute both wilful misconduct and prejudicial conduct (counts II-A, II-B, II-C, II-F, III, and V), three were found to constitute wilful misconduct (counts I-E, I-F, and II-E), and the final two specifications were found to constitute prejudicial conduct (counts I-A and I-B). The masters, who also made findings concerning factors in mitigation, unanimously recommended that petitioner be censured.

After considering the masters' report (rule 912), written objections 784 thereto (rule 913), which were filed only by the examiners, and oral arguments (rule 914), the Commission, on July 16, 1974, issued its own findings of fact, conclusions of law and recommendation. (Rules 918 and 919.) By unanimous vote (save for a seven-to-two vote as to count I-A) the Commission adopted the masters' findings of fact concerning the eleven specifications found proven by the masters. The Commission unanimously concluded that these proven specifications constituted wilful misconduct. The Commission dismissed the five charges the masters found not proven, [FN4] as well as the three charges which had been stricken. The Commission made no findings concerning mitigation. By a five-to-four vote the Commission recommended to this court that petitioner be removed from office. (Rule 917.) Petitioner was thereby disqualified from acting as a judge for as long as the Commission's recommendation of removal remained pending before this court. (Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (a).)

were found to be not proven. The Commission, combining both counts, made findings pertaining solely to the charges involving count I-F. In the absence of any additional findings, we deem the remaining aspects of count II-D to have been impliedly dismissed by the Commission.

Following the procedure set forth in Geiler v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications (1973) 10 Cal.3d 270 [110 Cal.Rptr. 201, 515 P.2d 1], we granted a writ of review to examine the Commission's findings of fact, conclusions of law, and recommendation of removal. Since the ultimate, dispositive decision to censure or remove a judge has been entrusted to this court, we felt it our responsibility "in exercising that authority ... [to] make our own, independent evaluation of the record evidence adduced below." ( Id., at p. 276.) (1)(See fn. 5.) In fulfilling that responsibility, we have examined in full detail the record of proceedings below and find in accordance with the Commission that the 11 specifications of misconduct not stricken or dismissed below [FN5] have been proven by "clear and convincing evidence" sufficient to sustain them "to 785 a reasonable certainty." (See Geiler v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications, supra, 10 Cal.3d at p. 275.)

FN5 Among the arguments addressed to the court in this case is one of first impression which we feel should be answered directly. The examiners have argued that the dismissal by the Commission of certain of the specifications of misconduct by petitioner should not necessarily be accorded conclusive effect. The examiners contend that two of the dismissed specifications (counts I-G and I-I) were proven by clear and convincing evidence and constitute conduct for which the Constitution authorizes the imposition of discipline (see Geiler v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications, supra, 10 Cal.3d at pp. 283-284) notwithstanding the fact that the Commission, in stating that the specifications were "not sustained," chose not to issue any findings of fact and conclusions of law. The examiners maintain that because we have undertaken to review the record ourselves and to adopt our own findings of fact and conclusions of law, it is within our power to find proven any of the charges lodged against petitioner upon which evidence was received regardless of the Commission's disposition of such charges. We emphatically disagree.
The Constitution clearly makes our power to discipline a judge for misconduct "contingent on the Commission having so recommended." ( Geiler v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications, supra, 10 Cal.3d at p. 276; Cal.Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (c) [see fn. 1, supra].) It would be entirely inconsistent with this constitutional division of functions for us to consider in passing on the Commission's recommendation any allegations of prejudicial conduct or wilful misconduct other than those which formed the basis of that recommendation. Unlike our statutory and inherent constitutional powers to control the professional conduct of members of the bar (see Bus. & Prof. Code, § 6107; In re Hallinan (1954) 43 Cal.2d 243, 253-254 [272 P.2d 768]), our shared constitutional power to censure or remove a judge for misconduct does not permit us to impose such discipline on our own motion. (Cf. Geiler v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications, supra, 10 Cal.3d at p. 276.)

Moreover, the examiners' argument overlooks the dual function which the Commission performs. When considering the masters' report and deciding upon its own findings of fact and conclusions of law, the Commission acts in an adjudicatory role with the prosecutorial function left to the examiners. (See rule 921(f).) But before us the Commission's role is exclusively that of an adversary, as the Commission is the respondent to the petition for a writ of review. (Rule 920(a).) The examiners appear before us merely as counsel to respondent. As such, the examiners are no more free than the Commission itself to argue against the validity of respondent's own adjudication of the facts and consequent conclusions of law. Its dismissal of certain of the specifications against petitioner having been based on its own evaluation of the evidentiary record in the light of the constitutionally ordained grounds for imposing discipline, the Commission is estopped from urging us, through counsel, to assess the record otherwise.

For the foregoing reasons we conclude that the Constitution as well as sound procedure compel us to predicate our adoption, modification, or rejection of the Commission's recommendation solely upon those specifications in the Notice of Formal Proceedings which the Commission found both to have been proven as a matter of fact and to have constituted constitutionally sufficient grounds for the imposition of discipline. It would make a mockery of the constitutional requirement that our imposition of discipline on a judge be contingent "[o]n recommendation of the Commission" (Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (c)), for us to contemplate basing our adoption or modification of such a recommendation on conduct which the Commission has not considered in formulating its recommendation.

We wish to emphasize, however, that with respect to those specifications which have been found proven by the Commission and have been deemed by the Commission to be grounds for imposing discipline, and hence are properly before us in reviewing the Commission's recommendation that discipline in fact be imposed, we do not mean to intimate that this court gives dispositive effect to these determinations of questions of fact and law by the Commission. Such determinations are the condition precedent to our consideration of whether a judge is to be disciplined. This condition having been met, we regard it as established by Geiler that it is solely for this court to decide not only the question of fact whether the conduct in issue occurred but also, unfettered by the characterizations of the Commission, the question of law whether the proven conduct falls within the class of conduct for which the Constitution authorizes the imposition of discipline. (See Geiler, supra, 10 Cal.3d at pp. 276, 283-284.) We reserve decision whether we are similarly unfettered by the nature of the discipline recommended by the Commission, to wit, whether our power to "modify" a recommendation of the Commission (rule 920(a)) would allow us to impose greater rather than lesser discipline than that recommended, and thus to remove from office a judge whom the Commission has recommended merely be censured.

786 We turn now to a precis of the proven specifications of misconduct. As to each such specification, our findings of fact are set forth in the margin. Our findings are adapted, and in some instances adopted in haec verba, from those of the Commission.

Count I generally charged petitioner with having conducted his court in a bizarre and unjudicial manner. In particular, he was alleged to have treated attorneys in a cavalier, rude and improper manner. Count I-E charged that petitioner had subjected an attorney to improper cross-examination when the attorney took the stand in support of his motion to disqualify petitioner (Code Civ. Proc., § 170.6), and had improperly levied "witness fees" against the attorney as a condition to petitioner's disqualification of himself. [FN6] In count I-F petitioner was charged with 787 having demeaned a deputy district attorney in open court and having placed him under restraint, because the deputy had appealed petitioner's disposition of another case. [FN7] Count I also set forth proven specifications 788 of petitioner's treatment of litigants in a cavalier, rude and improper manner. Thus, in count I-A, petitioner was alleged to have expressed his disbelief in the testimony of a defendant by having created a sound 789 commonly referred to as a "raspberry" [FN8] and in count I-B, petitioner was charged with having made a vulgar gesture (giving the "finger" or digitus impudicus) in reprimanding a defendant for coming in late in a traffic matter. [FN9]

FN6 Our findings for count I-E are as follows:
1. On or about August 11, 1972, the case of People v. Dutro was set for hearing on a preliminary examination in department 1 of the San Leandro- Hayward Municipal Court.
2. The petitioner who normally presided over department 5 of said court was on the day in question also presiding over department 1, and had been so presiding for approximately two weeks, substituting for Judge Robert Fairwell.
3. On at least two different occasions immediately prior to August 11, 1972, petitioner had indicated to different deputy district attorneys of Alameda County that he remembered Attorney Victor J. Gianunzio with some degree of displeasure and hostility because of an incident which occurred several years prior when petitioner was a private counsel representing a party in civil litigation and Mr. Gianunzio represented the opposing party.

4. Mr. Gianunzio represented the defendant Dutro at the preliminary examination, and when the case was called he made an oral motion supported by an oral statement under oath (Code Civ. Proc., § 170.6, subd. (2)) seeking to disqualify petitioner from hearing the matter.
5. The oral statement of Mr. Gianunzio alleged: (a) he did not know until the day of the hearing that petitioner was sitting in department 1; (b) some years previous to petitioner's taking the bench the two men had been on opposite sides of some civil litigation and, as a result of an incident during the course of that litigation involving him and the petitioner, the latter had been held in contempt; (c) subsequent to that incident and prior to petitioner's assumption of the bench, he had made overtures to petitioner through third parties to correct the misunderstanding that had arisen and such overtures had been rebuffed; and (d) he was informed and believed that petitioner had expressed an opinion that he (Gianunzio) had "better not appear in his Court."
6. Petitioner questioned Mr. Gianunzio extensively in open court, demanding to know the source of his purported knowledge that petitioner was prejudiced against him.
7. Petitioner denied the disqualification motion on the ground that it was not timely, since (a) he had been sitting in department 1 for more than two weeks preceding the date of the hearing; (b) it was commonly known that during the months of July, August and September many judges take vacations, and (c) department 1 and department 5 had been combined for the period of July 31 - August 25, 1972, inclusive, with petitioner presiding.
8. Petitioner had himself sworn during the course of the proceedings and testified that he had no present recollection of the prior incident between himself and Mr. Gianunzio.
9. Ultimately petitioner disqualified himself and continued the matter conditioned, on the motion of the district attorney, upon Mr. Gianunzio's paying witness fees for all witnesses (approximately 10), including police witnesses, summoned by the district attorney for the preliminary examination.
10. Subsequently, on August 14, 1972, petitioner and Mr. Gianunzio reconciled their differences and petitioner reduced the amount to be paid as witness fees reciting that the fees would be paid by Mr. Gianunzio out of his own pocket and without any appeal from the order directing such witness fee payment.
11. Petitioner knew or should have known the proper method for handling a motion for disqualification. (Code Civ. Proc., § 170.6.) He acted out of revenge and in bad faith in testifying from the bench that he had no present recollection of the prior incident between himself and Mr. Gianunzio, and in questioning Mr. Gianunzio in open court as to the source of Mr. Gianunzio's statement that petitioner was hostile toward him.

FN7 Our findings for count I-F are as follows:
1. On October 31, 1972, about 5:15 p.m., Deputy District Attorney Melville Behrendt appeared in petitioner's court for the purpose of asking petitioner to issue a search warrant. Deputy District Attorney Gerry Hubert, who was appearing for the People in a criminal matter, asked leave of court to bring up the search warrant. At this point Mr. Behrendt approached the bench with the search warrant and gave it to petitioner.
2. Prior to October 31, 1972, a notice of appeal had been filed by the district attorney from the decision of petitioner in the case of People v. Peluso. In support of the notice of appeal Mr. Behrendt had sworn to and filed his affidavit.
3. Upon Mr. Behrendt's approaching the bench, petitioner brought up the Peluso case, a matter not then pending before him and in no manner connected with the request to issue the search warrant. Petitioner proceeded to question Mr. Behrendt at length regarding the Peluso case affidavit.
4. Some 15 to 20 minutes later, after petitioner ordered production of Mr. Behrendt's affidavit and required him to read it, petitioner resumed his questioning. Mr. Behrendt was reluctant to answer any questions regarding the matter and the following colloquy ensued:
"Mr. Behrendt: Your Honor, I recognize this affidavit as the affidavit that I signed on the 7th day of September, 1972 and I think that's all I should say at this time and I believe if the court has any jurisdiction at this time to ask me questions, that matter is not regularly scheduled at this time for a hearing in this department without notice to myself and I believe now the Appellant [sic] Department of the Superior Court will -
"The Court: Well, I don't believe it has gone up, Mr. Behrendt. That's why I am trying to find out what is going to be the status of this case. My understanding was that while it was filed there has to be some sort of a writ taken in order to get it up to the Appellate Court and all I am asking you, if the statement made by you, page two, lines 12 through 13 -
"Mr. Behrendt: I stated upon my affidavit that and that's all I should state at this time.
"The Court: Did you check the record? Did you check with the Department of Motor Vehicles? Did you ever check the record of the courts to see if the court in fact ordered what you said, contrary to what it had stated in open court?
"Mr. Behrendt: May I ask what purpose these questions are being asked me at this time?
"The Court: I don't believe, Mr. Behrendt, that it is your position as an officer to ask the court any questions. The court is asking you and the court, I believe, is entitled to a little courtesy.

"Mr. Behrendt: I have always been courteous to this court, Your Honor, and - "The Court: Now, the -
"Mr. Behrendt: - and I have a right to reserve any answer to - "The Court: Well, now, Mr. Behrendt, I'll tell you what. You have a seat in the jury box.
"Mr. Behrendt: Am I being held, Your Honor, in custody at this time?
"The Court: If you wish it this way.
"Mr. Behrendt: I ask the court to put me under arrest. I may ask for a writ in this so - I'm here in another matter before this court to ask this court to issue a search warrant and - "The Court: Behrendt, you may be quiet, Mr. Behrendt. I'm not in a position to read that affidavit and in view of the fact that you are the person who prepared it, I want some time to read it carefully before I sign it. Now, you may have a seat. You may have a seat, Mr. Behrendt.
"Mr. Behrendt: Is the court holding me in contempt or holding me in custody at this time?
"The Court: The court is telling you to sit down.
"Mr. Behrendt: Your Honor, at this time I intend to leave the courtroom unless I am being placed under arrest for contempt.
"The Court: Mr. Behrendt, don't leave the courtroom. I'm telling you to sit down. Now, that is a court order, if you wish. "Mr. Behrendt: Is the court placing me in custody at this time, Your Honor?
"The Court: It depends on what you do, Mr. Behrendt. The court is telling you to sit down, Mr. Behrendt, I don't want to do anything rash. Now, you sit down.
"Mr. Behrendt: May I ask the court what authority it is holding me in this court?
"The Court: Mr. Behrendt, that is a court order, to sit down until such time - "Mr. Behrendt: May the court define my status at this time, why I am being held inside this courtroom?
"The Court: Until such time as I have had a chance to read the affidavit for your search warrant and go over it with you - "Mr. Behrendt: May I withdraw that search warrant from this court?
"The Court: No, Mr. Behrendt, you may not.
"Mr. Behrendt: May I ask the court's reason for that?
"The Court: Because the court was originally asked to sign it and the court will read it carefully.
"Mr. Behrendt: Well, Your Honor, if I might state to the court at this time, may I make a statement to the court at this time?
"The Court: Mr. Behrendt, I have had enough of you, now, you sit down. "Mr. Behrendt: Your Honor, at this time - "Mr. Court: Mr. Behrendt, this is the last time. Now, sit down.

"Mr. Behrendt: Excuse me, Your Honor, I intend to leave the court. If I am no longer required -
"The Court: You are required here.
"Mr. Behrendt: May I ask the reason the court is requiring me to stay in this courtroom?
"The Court: Do you want to escort him to a seat, please?
"Mr. Behrendt: Am I being placed in custody at this time?
"The Court: Would you escort him to a seat, please? You may have a seat in the jury box."
5. Whereupon the bailiff took Mr. Behrendt by the arm and escorted him to the jury box.
6. The affidavit in support of the search warrant, though drafted by Mr. Behrendt, was signed by a police officer.
7. Ultimately, petitioner signed the search warrant after Mr. Behrendt had been kept in the jury box for approximately one-half hour, remarking that the search warrant was "slightly defective" in that night service had not been requested and petitioner was now so amending it. The subject matter of the search warrant was a vehicle then impounded and under police guard. Upon the signing of the warrant, petitioner suggested that in the future Mr. Behrendt should not return to petitioner's court.
8. It was petitioner's practice to order that persons placed in custody or under restraint, in open court, be seated in the jury box pending further action and only such persons in custody or under restraint, as a general rule, were so seated.
9. The affidavit filed pursuant to the appeal was in error and the deputy district attorney had, in fact, not checked the applicable records of the Department of Motor Vehicles.
10. Petitioner knew or should have known that it was beyond his judicial authority to bring up the Peluso case, to interrogate Mr. Behrendt regarding the Peluso matter, or to place Mr. Behrendt under restraint. Petitioner's attempt to put a gloss of good faith over the entire incident by stating that his careful scrutiny of the warrant had disclosed it to be "slightly defective" failed to conceal the fact that his conduct was clearly motivated by feelings of animosity toward Mr. Behrendt.

FN8 Our findings for count I-A are as follows:
1. Sometime in the summer of 1972 petitioner presided at the trial in the case of People v. Fusilero in the Fremont Judicial District. 2. While the defendant Fusilero was on the witness stand, testifying in his own behalf, petitioner emitted a contemptuous sound commonly called a "raspberry" to indicate his disbelief of the witness. Such derisive sounds had been made by petitioner in open court on other occasions.
3. Petitioner's contemptuous "raspberry" was at least partially motivated by his anger towards the deputy public defender for having refused petitioner's settlement proposal, and was an attempt to prejudice the defendant's case.

FN9 Our findings for count I-B are as follows:
1. In 1972 in open court petitioner did use a vulgar gesture (giving "the finger") in reprimanding a defendant for coming in late in a traffic matter.
2. The petitioner used the gesture to indicate that the tardiness of the defendant demonstrated the latter's lack of respect for the court and not to demean the defendant nor to suggest the attitude of the court toward the defendant.
3. The evidence is not clear and convincing that petitioner used the gesture on any other occasion.

Count II generally alleged that petitioner's judicial conduct was subject to the improper influence of his business relations and social friendships. In counts II-A and II-B, petitioner was charged with having approached a deputy district attorney, as well as that deputy's superior, in an attempt to influence the disposition of a case pending against a friend. [FN10] In count II-C, it was charged that petitioner had attempted to 790 coerce a deputy district attorney into accepting a negotiated plea and, upon his refusal to accept, petitioner had suppressed the evidence and had acquitted the defendant, who was the son of a friend and political supporter. [FN11] In count II-E, petitioner was charged with having caused a defendant cited for engaging in a speed contest (Veh. Code, § 23109, subd. (a)) to appear before him rather than in the department in which the defendant had been directed to appear. When the defendant, who was the nephew of a friend and political supporter, appeared before petitioner, the charge against the defendant was reduced to illegal parking (Veh. Code, § 22502) without notice to or an appearance by the 791 district attorney. [FN12] And finally, in count II-F it was alleged that petitioner had improperly transferred to his own court the file in a felony-assault 792 case involving the same defendant as in count II-E, whereupon petitioner had ordered the defendant released on his own recognizance 793 so as to prevent the defendant from being booked and interrogated by the police pursuant to the execution of an outstanding warrant for his arrest. [FN13] 794

FN10 Our findings for counts II-A and II-B are as follows:
1. On or about April 1972, there was a jury trial in the San Leandro- Hayward Judicial District before Judge Edgar, against one Alchian for an alleged violation of Vehicle Code section 23102. William Cosden, deputy district attorney, prosecuted, and Attorney Larry J. Frumes defended. The jury disagreed eleven to one for conviction. A mistrial was declared. Thereafter, the case was pending for resetting.
2. At all times material herein Mr. Alchian was a friend of petitioner. Mr. Frumes, a young attorney admitted to the bar in 1972, was dating petitioner's daughter and was associated with, or a law partner of, Robert Winkler, a close personal friend of petitioner for many years. (See finding No. 5, count V, fn. 15, infra.)

3. At no time material hereto was the case of People v. Alchian pending before petitioner, nor in the normal course of business would petitioner have presided over any jury retrial since he was not then assigned to criminal jury trials.
4. Subsequent to the mistrial in the Alchian case and while it was pending for resetting, petitioner, on a number of occasions, urged and sought to persuade Deputy District Attorney Cosden to reduce the charge against Mr. Alchian from Vehicle Code section 23102 (driving while under the influence of intoxicating beverage) to Vehicle Code section 23103 (reckless driving). On at least one occasion petitioner attempted similarly to persuade George Nicholson, then Mr. Cosden's superior in the district attorney's office.
5. Petitioner knew or should have known that he was using the prestige and authority of his judicial office to effect a disposition of a criminal case not before him in any judicial capacity and for reasons unconnected with the merits of the case.

FN11 Our findings for count II-C are as follows:
1. On May 26, 1972, the case of People v. Christopher Stephen Goulardt charging the defendant with violations of Penal Code section 647, subdivision (f) (under influence of drugs in a public place) and Health and Safety Code section 11530 (possession of marijuana), was tried before petitioner sitting without a jury.
2. The defendant Goulardt's father, Kenneth J. Goulardt, was then administrative aide to the Mayor of Hayward, had known petitioner for about 10 years, and had been active in his campaign.
3. The defense counsel was Attorney Julio Juarez, a campaign supporter and long-time personal friend of petitioner. (See finding No. 3, count V, fn. 15, infra.)
4. During the course of the trial petitioner made a suggestion, which he had been informed prior to trial would be unacceptable, namely, that the district attorney's office permit the defendant to plead to the Penal Code section 647, subdivision (f) charge and dismiss the Health and Safety Code section 11530 charge.
5. Deputy District Attorney Robert B. Hutchins refused to accede, whereupon petitioner engaged in further questioning of police officers and then stated that the district attorney's refusal to accept the plea had placed him "in a box" and he would have to do something he did not wish to do.
6. Although the record is confused as to whether certain witnesses were sworn, whether a formal motion to suppress evidence was made, whether any order other than that suppressing evidence under Penal Code section 1538.5 was made in open court, the minutes reveal that the defendant was found not guilty on both counts.

7. The Appellate Department of the Alameda County Superior Court reversed the trial court, and was itself reversed by the Court of Appeal, First District on the ground that the defendant having been once in jeopardy could not be retried despite what may have been "flagrant error" resulting in a "gross miscarriage of justice."
8. At the conclusion of the case petitioner stated that although the defendant was in fact guilty he had been saved by a technicality.
9. Petitioner purported to suppress all of the evidence against the defendant, not because he believed the defendant's arrest to have been invalid under the law as applied to the facts of the case, but rather because by resorting to the rubric of search and seizure law he could with colorable justification direct the acquittal of the defendant, notwithstanding what he knew or should have known, as an experienced criminal attorney, was ample evidence in the absence of any defense to find the defendant guilty of at least the Penal Code section 647, subdivision (f) charge. Petitioner's attempt to put a gloss of good faith on the whole incident, by declaring that the defendant "had been saved by a technicality," was intended to conceal the fact that petitioner's conduct was motivated by his relationship with the defendant's father and with the defendant's counsel, as well as petitioner's desire to punish the deputy district attorney for his refusal to accept petitioner's suggestion of a negotiated plea.

FN12 Our findings for count II-E are as follows:
1. On or about July 6, 1972, Ralph N. Leines was arrested and taken into custody by an officer of the San Leandro Police Department for a violation of Vehicle Code section 23109, subdivision (a), (speed contest). Later, on the same day, Mr. Leines was released on a citation directing him to appear before Department 2 of the San Leandro-Hayward Municipal Court, sitting in San Leandro.
2. Sometime between July 6, 1972, and July 19, 1972, Mr. Leines gave his citation to Mr. James M. Temple, a bail bondsman, who said that he would see what he could do for Mr. Leines.
3. On or about July 19, 1972, Mr. Temple met petitioner in his chambers. No one other than petitioner and Mr. Temple were present. Mr. Temple showed Mr. Leines' citation to petitioner, who wrote on the face of the citation as follows:
"7-19-72 40 hours at SLBC by 9/30/72 all sessions ts Reduce on Completion to 22502 V.C. wt wds To 7/28/72 Ex SENT"
4. This meant that Mr. Leines was to (a) donate 40 hours of work to the San Leandro Boys Club by September 30, 1972; (b) attend traffic school; and (c) upon completion of traffic school, the charge of Vehicle Code section 23109 would be reduced to Vehicle Code section 22502 (illegal parking) so that no abstract of conviction would be forwarded to the Department of Motor Vehicles.

5. Mr. Temple was advised by petitioner to notify Mr. Leines to appear on July 20, 1972, in department 5 before petitioner. Mr. Temple did so advise Mr. Leines, who appeared as requested but his case was not calendared nor called, so he left department 5 after the clerk gave him a date about one week later.

6. Unknown to petitioner, a criminal complaint had been filed against Mr. Leines by the district attorney on July 11, 1972, on account of said violation of Vehicle Code section 23109. The criminal complaint was calendared before Judge Byers in department 2 in San Leandro, the department where Mr. Leines had been cited to appear. When Mr. Leines did not appear in department 2 on July 20, 1972, a bench warrant was issued for his arrest.

7. The following appears upon a form used by the San Leandro-Hayward Municipal Court to keep a record of the action taken in a case:

"CRT. DATE ATTY PROCEEDINGS

JUL 20 1972 NA-BW-$750 bail RKB

JUL 20 pro-per QUASH B/W-40 HRS S.L.B.C. 6 sessions By 9/30/72 to Traffic School on completion 22502 7/28/72 For Ex.Sent WDS

7-28-72 T.S. assigned Oct 28 1972

AUG 8 '72 ENTERED ON MINUTES OF 8/3/72"

There is an obvious irregularity in the date "JUL 20" on the second line under "CRT. DATE" which consists of the letters "JUL" imprinted by a rubber stamp, but with the numerals "20" handwritten by a felt tip pen, possibly obliterating other numerals underneath.

8. The official criminal docket for the case shows the following:

"DATE JUDGE PROCEEDINGS

|---|---|---|
| 7-11-72 | | Complaint filed, sworn to by Larry Rinne, SLPD charging the defendant with having committed on or about July 6, 1972, the crimes of misdemeanors to wit: a violation of Section 23109a of the Vehicle Code, two counts thereof. Defendant was cited to appear on July 20, 1972 at 9:00 a.m. in Department 2. |
| 7-20-72 | Byers | DDA: W. Cosden. Defendant not appearing, bench warrant ordered with bail set at $750.00 |
| 8-3-72 | Spruance | Action on calendar for arraignment. (Minutes do not reflect whether defendant was present.) Action transferred from Department 2. Bench warrant is ordered quashed. Time is waived, jury waived, guilty plea entered. Defendant sentenced to 40 hours work for San Leandro Boys Club to be completed by 9-30-72. Defendant is ordered to attend 6 sessions of Traffic School, charge to be reduced to 22502 of the Vehicle Code upon completion." |

9. On or about July 28, 1972, Mr. Leines appeared before petitioner in department 5, entered his plea and was sentenced. At that time petitioner knew that the case was pending in department 2 and that Judge Byers had issued a bench warrant on account of Mr. Leines' failure to appear in department 2 on July 20, 1972. At said appearance of Mr. Leines, petitioner quashed the said bench warrant.

10. The Presiding Judge of the San Leandro-Hayward Municipal Court made no order, formal or informal, transferring the Leines case from department 2 to petitioner in department 5, nor was Judge Byers, presiding in department 2, consulted by petitioner regarding the case.

11. The district attorney's office had no knowledge or notice of petitioner's action in the case until on or about August 3, 1 972.

12. On August 29, 1972, a notice of appeal was filed by the district attorney and ultimately the appellate department of the superior court set aside petitioner's judgment on the ground that it was void and remanded the case to the San Leandro-Hayward Municipal Court with directions that it be started over again with an arraignment of Mr. Leines.
13. Petitioner was friendly with James Temple's father and particularly with defendant Leines' uncle, Joseph Egan, who supported petitioner's election campaign. (See finding No. 3, count II-F, fn. 13, infra.)
14. Petitioner knew or should have known that he improperly assumed jurisdiction of the Leines case, in violation of rule 533(a), as then applicable, and that he acted in derogation of the rights of the People in proceeding without giving notice to the district attorney. It can only be concluded that petitioner's actions were motivated by nothing having to do with the merits of the case, but rather by his friendship with either Mr. Temple's father or Mr. Egan or both.

FN13 Our findings for count II-F are as follows:
1. On August 7, 1972, a felony assault complaint was filed in San Leandro by the district attorney against Ralph N. Leines, the same individual who appears in count II-E. A warrant for Mr. Leines' arrest was prepared but the issuance of the warrant was deferred to the following day.
2. On August 7, 1972, Mr. Leines called the police in San Leandro and was advised that there was a felony complaint on file against him and that the police wished to interview him at the police station. Mr. Leines called his parents for advice.
3. Mr. Leines' father met that day with his brother-in-law, Joseph Egan, business agent for the plasterers' union, who had known petitioner for some 12 years and had been active in his campaign for election in 1970 to his present judicial position. Mr. Egan and Mr. Leines, senior, went to the court in Hayward to see petitioner about 5 p.m., August 7, 1972, and met petitioner in the parking lot outside the court building, just as petitioner was about to leave. A few minutes thereafter the clerk of the court entered the parking lot and was approached by petitioner and directed to bring the court file on the Leines assault matter from San Leandro to Hayward and to have the case placed on petitioner's calendar for the morning of August 8, 1972. Mr. Egan was directed by petitioner to have the defendant Leines in his court the following morning.

4. On the morning of August 8, 1972, the case of People v. Leines charging a violation of Penal Code section 245, was called and petitioner ordered the defendant released on his own recognizance. Although he had been informed the previous night that the San Leandro Police Department wished to interview and book the defendant, petitioner did not require at that time that the defendant be booked.

5. At the time petitioner released defendant on his own recognizance he stated that while he did not know the defendant (he had sentenced him on July 28, 1972, see count II-E, fn. 12, supra) he did know defendant's uncle, Mr. Egan, and that this was the first time that defendant had been involved in anything.

6. The case properly should have been in a department of the court in San Leandro and in the regular course of business would not have been in petitioner's department for any purpose.

7. Petitioner, in proceeding as he did, intended (a) to prevent the police from seeking to interrogate the defendant prior to the defendant's securing counsel, and (b) to avoid the booking of the defendant, as a favor to Joseph Egan, a friend and political supporter of petitioner.

8. On or about August 9, 1972, Deputy District Attorney George Nicholson telephoned petitioner with reference to releasing Mr. Leines without ordering him to be booked. Petitioner informed Mr. Nicholson that as an attorney he had avoided booking whenever possible and, as a judge, he was going to continue to do so; that he had done favors for people in the past and he intended to continue to do so. When Deputy Nicholson suggested that his conduct was improper petitioner replied with an obscenity.

Count III consisted of a single specification alleging that petitioner had solicited another judge to dismiss a traffic citation which he had received and that petitioner had subsequently altered the reported disposition so as to convey the false impression that the citation had been dismissed upon petitioner's having completed traffic school. [FN14]

FN14 Our findings for count III are as follows:
1. On or about November 2, 1971, petitioner personally received a traffic citation for allegedly running a red light. (Veh. Code, § 21453, subd. (a).) The citation directed petitioner to appear within 15 days.
2. On the same day that he received the citation petitioner went to the chambers of Judge Robert Fairwell, then presiding in department 1, and in the presence of at least one other person, Richard Jones, then a deputy district attorney, handed the citation to Judge Fairwell, who attempted to disqualify himself in the proceeding by writing "disqualified" on the back of the copy of the citation. Petitioner indicated displeasure with Judge Fairwell either verbally or by facial expression, whereupon Judge Fairwell crossed out the word "disqualified" and wrote on the back of the citation the following:
"11/2/71 Dismissed R.F."
3. Immediately thereafter petitioner, without the knowledge of Judge Fairwell, altered the above notation as follows:
"11/2/71 all Sessions TS Dismissed on completion R.F."
In fact, petitioner did not attend traffic school pursuant to his own notation on the citation.
4. The San Leandro-Hayward Municipal Court judges have authorized the clerks of the court to send defendants with first offenses to traffic school without any appearance before a judge.
5. We can only conclude that petitioner knowingly circumvented proper legal procedure and placed Judge Fairwell in an embarrassing predicament for the purpose of having his citation dismissed. The only reasonable inference from petitioner's alteration of Judge Fairwell's outright dismissal of the citation was that petitioner intended to convey the erroneous impression that the citation had been dismissed after petitioner had attended traffic school in accordance with the usual practice in the San Leandro-Hayward Municipal Court, thus concealing the fact that he had received preferential treatment.

Finally petitioner was charged in the single specification of count V with having consistently appointed two attorneys in criminal cases in which the defendant was either not entitled to counsel at public expense or the public defender had not been requested to represent them. [FN15] 795

FN15 Our findings for count V are as follows:
1. In the period July 1971 to July 1972 petitioner appointed two attorneys, Julio Juarez and Robert Winkler, to represent criminal defendants in cases pending in the San Leandro-Hayward Municipal Court. Mr. Juarez was appointed in 18 cases; Mr. Winkler in 9 cases. These 27 appointments constituted somewhat more than 44 percent of all appointments made by petitioner in that same period. The balance of petitioner's 61 appointments, constituting approximately 56 percent of his total appointments, were received by 22 other attorneys, no one of whom received more than 3 appointments, or approximately 5 percent of the total appointments. Petitioner maintained no list of attorneys available for appointment in appropriate criminal cases.

2. At all times material hereto, there was an Alameda County Public Defender's office duly constituted and able to afford legal representation to indigent defendants. In the 27 appointments that were made to Mr. Juarez and Mr. Winkler, no valid reason, such as conflict of interest, existed to justify such appointments, nor does it appear that in each of the 27 cases a determination of the indigency of these defendants had been duly made as required by Government Code section 27707. Mr. Juarez and Mr. Winkler were compensated by Alameda County public funds in amounts not less than $150 for each court appearance without regard to the nature of the service performed or the time expended pursuant to orders for payment of attorney's fees.

3. Mr. Juarez has been a friend of petitioner since 1951. At one time prior to petitioner's election to the municipal court, Mr. Juarez rented office space from the law firm of which petitioner was then a partner. Mr. Juarez presently rents office space from Mr. Winkler, whom he has known for some 10 years. Because of his long friendship with petitioner Mr. Juarez was very active in petitioner's campaign for election in 1970.

4. Mr. Juarez has been an attorney since 1966, practicing in the San Leandro-Hayward area. Between 1966 and the time petitioner took office in January 1971, Mr. Juarez had received approximately 8 to 10 appointments from all courts to represent criminal defendants.

5. Mr. Winkler has known petitioner for the past 25 years. They have been close personal friends since they were in law school together. Mr. Winkler was active in petitioner's campaign for election in 1970.

6. Petitioner knew or should have known the proper procedures required in appointing private counsel for indigent defendants. We can only conclude that petitioner's appointments of Messrs. Juarez and Winkler were motivated by his desire to reward his friends and election campaign supporters.

Taken as a whole the record indicates that petitioner engaged in a pervasive course of conduct of overreaching his judicial authority by deciding cases for reasons other than the merits, by improperly influencing another judge, and by using the judicial process to gain special favors for friends and political supporters. The record also shows that petitioner has under color of judicial office repeatedly committed petty, vindictive, vulgar and otherwise unjudicial acts.

We turn now to the question whether the conduct which we have found as a fact to have occurred is conduct for which discipline may constitutionally be imposed. Other than for habitual intemperance or wilful and persistent failure to perform his duties, the Constitution provides that a judge may be censured or removed from the bench only for wilful misconduct or prejudicial conduct. (See fn. 1, supra.) We first sought to give meaning to these standards of conduct in Geiler. (2) We explained that the more serious charge, "wilful misconduct," is reserved for unjudicial conduct committed in bad faith by a judge acting in his judicial capacity. (10 Cal.3d at pp. 283-284.) The term "bad faith" implies that the judge "intentionally committed acts which he knew or should have known were beyond his lawful power." (10 796 Cal.3d at p. 286.) As so used, "bad faith" entails actual malice as the motivation for a judge's acting ultra vires. The requisite intent must exceed mere volition; negligence alone, if not so gross as to call its genuineness into question, falls short of "bad faith." "Bad faith" also encompasses acts within the lawful power of a judge which nevertheless are committed for a corrupt purpose, i.e., for any purpose other than the faithful discharge of judicial duties. In sum, "bad faith" is quintessentially a concept of specific intent, requiring consciousness of purpose as an antecedent to a judge's acting maliciously or corruptly.

(3) The "lesser included offense" of "prejudicial conduct" lacks the element of either "bad faith" or action in a judicial capacity. [FN16] "Prejudicial conduct" includes "conduct which a judge undertakes in good faith but which nevertheless would appear to an objective observer to be not only unjudicial conduct but conduct prejudicial to public esteem for the judicial office" ( FN16 The masters found six specifications of misconduct to constitute both wilful misconduct and prejudicial conduct. Because "prejudicial conduct" is a "lesser included offense" of "wilful misconduct" the masters' additional findings that each of the six charges constituted prejudicial conduct were superfluous. Geiler, supra, 10 Cal.3d at p. 284), as well as "wilful misconduct out of office, i.e., unjudicial conduct committed in bad faith by a judge not then acting in a judicial capacity." (10 Cal.3d at p. 284, fn. 11.) We stressed in Geiler the importance of an objective rather than a subjective appraisal of judicial conduct in light of the constitutional standards for judicial discipline, and pursuant thereto we noted that the canons of the American Bar Association's Code of Judicial Conduct might usefully be consulted to give meaning to the constitutional standards.

[FN17]

FN17 In Geiler we said: "The first two canons of the Code of Judicial Conduct proposed in 1972 by the American Bar Association's Special Committee on Standards of Judicial Conduct emphasize the importance of appraising alleged judicial misconduct objectively rather than subjectively. Canon One declares: 'a judge should uphold the integrity and independence of the judiciary.' The accompanying text adds: 'A judge should participate in establishing, maintaining, and enforcing, and should himself observe, high standards of conduct so that the integrity and independence of the judiciary may be preserved.' Canon Two speaks for itself: 'A judge should avoid impropriety and the appearance of impropriety in all his activities.' (Italics added.)" (10 Cal.3d at pp. 281-282.)
The American Bar Association's Code of Judicial Conduct was adopted by the House of Delegates on August 16, 1972. Subsequently, the Conference of California Judges adopted, with some modifications not relevant here, the American Bar Association Code of Judicial Conduct of 1972, effective January 1, 1975. (See Cal. Rules of Court, Appendix, div. II, Cal. Code of Jud. Conduct.)

(4) We examine first the proven specifications of count I. At the outset we refer to the third canon of the California Code of Judicial Conduct (see fn. 17, supra), which provides in pertinent part that "[a] 797 judge should be patient, dignified, and courteous to litigants, jurors, witnesses, lawyers, and others with whom he deals in his official capacity, and should require similar conduct of lawyers, and of his staff, court officials, and others subject to his direction and control." (Canon 3A(3).)

Except for petitioner's vulgar "finger" gesture (count I-B; see fn. 9, supra) the proven specifications of count I show that petitioner engaged in a pervasive course of conduct of acting vindictively toward recalcitrant attorneys. With regard to petitioner's conduct toward Mr. Gianunzio (count I-E; see fn. 6, supra), it goes without saying that as a judge, petitioner should have known the proper method for handling a motion for disqualification. (Code Civ. Proc., § 170.6.) We have previously noted in connection with similar misconduct that "the rule has developed that, once an affidavit of prejudice has been filed under section 170.6, the court has no jurisdiction to hold further proceedings in the matter except to inquire into the timeliness of the affidavit or its technical sufficiency under the statute. ... When the affidavit is timely and properly made, immediate disqualification is mandatory. ... As this court has noted in respect to the exercise of contempt powers, '[a] judge should bear in mind that he is engaged, not so much in vindicating his own character, as in promoting the respect due to the administration of the laws. ..."' (McCartney v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications, (1974) 12 Cal.3d 512, 531-532 [116

Cal.Rptr. 260, 526 P.2d 268].) Clearly, petitioner abused his judicial authority and acted out of revenge and hostility. Petitioner's treatment of Mr. Behrendt regarding the Peluso case (count I-F; see fn. 7, supra) was also an abuse of judicial authority and clearly motivated by feelings of animosity. Similarly, petitioner's contemptuous "raspberry" (count I-A; see fn. 8, supra) was a deliberate and malicious attempt to prejudice the defendant's case, motivated by petitioner's anger toward the deputy public defender. Because petitioner acted in bad faith in exceeding the bounds of his lawful power, we find each of these incidents to have been wilful misconduct.

(5) We find petitioner's vulgar "finger" gesture (count I-B; see fn. 9, supra), which resulted in a loss of courtroom dignity, to have been prejudicial conduct. Because it was an isolated act directed towards edifying the defendant rather than prejudicing his case, it was not done in bad faith and hence cannot be deemed to have been wilful misconduct.

(6) We examine next the proven specifications of count II, referring again to one of the canons of the California Code of Judicial Conduct: 798 "A judge should not allow his family, social, or other relationships to influence his judicial conduct or judgment. He should not lend the prestige of his office to advance the private interests of others; nor should he convey or permit others to convey the impression that they are in a special position to influence him. ..." (Cal. Code of Jud. Conduct, supra, Canon 2B.) The proven specifications of count II show a flagrant disregard for this canon. In each of the incidents, petitioner intentionally used the prestige or authority of his judicial office to effect or influence the disposition of a criminal case for a personal reason unconnected with the merits of the case, to wit, petitioner's desire to help friends and political supporters. Petitioner was thus acting in bad faith in attempting to influence the disposition of the Alchian case (counts II-A and II-B; see fn. 10, supra) which was not before him in any judicial capacity; in dismissing the Goulardt case (count II-C; see fn. 11, supra); in improperly assuming jurisdiction and acting without notice to the district attorney in the Leines traffic case (count II-E; see fn. 12, supra); as well as in improperly assuming jurisdiction and releasing Leines on his own recognizance in the assault case (count II-F; see fn. 13, supra). As to the Goulardt case, there are additional grounds for the conclusion that petitioner acted in bad faith. In another instance of the course of conduct involved in count I, petitioner's handling of the Goulardt case was motivated not only by political favoritism but also by a desire to punish the deputy district attorney for his refusal to accept petitioner's suggestion of a negotiated plea. We have no recourse but to conclude that each of the proven specifications of count II constituted wilful misconduct, save only with respect to our finding concerning petitioner's use of an obscenity when talking on the telephone with a deputy district attorney (finding No. 8, count II-F; see fn. 13, supra). For the reasons expressed above regarding the "finger" gesture (count I-B; see fn. 9, supra), we conclude that petitioner's injudicious comment constituted prejudicial conduct. In McCartney we established that the muttering of profanity need not necessarily be deemed serious enough to warrant removal or censure. It should be noted, however, that the conduct there in issue, although unbecoming and injudicious, was not intended to be heard and was "not directed as a reprimand to court personnel, attorneys or any other specific individuals." ( McCartney v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications, supra, 12 Cal.3d at p. 535.)

(7) We also find petitioner's conduct regarding his own traffic citation (count III; see fn. 14, supra) to have been wilful misconduct. Inasmuch as the judicial district's practices allowed petitioner to be assigned automatically and ministerially to traffic school, we can only 799 conclude that petitioner acted in bad faith in circumventing proper legal procedure to have his citation dismissed as well as in thereafter concealing the fact that he had received preferential treatment.

(8) Finally, we consider petitioner's illegal and unjustified appointments of two attorneys in criminal cases (count V; see fn. 15, supra). Once more we refer to the standards of conduct established by the California Code of Judicial Conduct: "A judge should not make unnecessary appointments. He should exercise his power of appointment only on the basis of merit, avoiding nepotism and favoritism. He should not approve compensation of appointees beyond the fair value of services rendered." (Cal. Code of Jud. Conduct, supra, (Canon 3B(4)).) California law provides that the court makes the final determination as to whether the defendant is financially qualified for representation at county expense. (Gov. Code, § 27707.) In counties where there is a public defender's office the court normally appoints the public defender to represent the indigent defendant. "Where there is no public defender, or the court finds that because of a conflict of interest or other reasons the public defender has properly refused to represent the indigent, the court shall appoint private counsel, in which case the court shall fix a reasonable fee and order that the fee, together with necessary expenses, be paid by the county." (Misdemeanor Procedure Bench Book, California College of Trial Judges (1971) § 1.39 (including a sample form for defendant's "declaration of financial inability to employ counsel"); see also California Municipal Justice Courts Manual, California Center for Judicial Education Research (1974) § 11.43 (also including the same sample form).) We find that petitioner acted in bad faith in exceeding the bounds of his lawful powers for the purpose of benefiting his friends and political supporters. His appointments clearly conflicted with the standards established by the California Code of Judicial Conduct. Therefore, we find petitioner's conduct to have been wilful misconduct.

(9) We come now to our most important responsibility, [FN18] the decision of the ultimate question whether a judge, whose conduct has 800 been found to be either wilful misconduct or prejudicial conduct, [FN19] should be censured or removed from the bench. (See fn. 1, supra.)

FN18 Under the controlling principles of Geiler, it is our findings of fact and conclusions of law upon which we make our determination of the ultimate action to be taken. ( Geiler v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications, supra, 10 Cal.3d at p. 276.) Although we give great weight to the masters' findings of fact ( id., at pp. 275-276), the conclusions of law and the ultimate sanction are solely within our province and domain; we do not defer to either the masters or the Commission in deciding these matters. Language to the contrary in McCartney v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications, supra, 12 Cal.3d at page 540 is no longer to be regarded as controlling.

FN19 As we noted in Geiler, "[i]t should be emphasized that our characterization of one ground for imposing discipline as more or less serious than the other does not imply that in a given case we would regard the ultimate sanction of removal as unjustified solely for 'conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice which brings the judicial office into disrepute."' (Geiler v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications, supra, 10 Cal.3d at p. 284, fn. 11.)

(10) Petitioner has presented a good deal of evidence that he worked hard in an overworked court, that he was conscientious in admonishing defendants of their rights, that he gave special attention to Spanish-speaking defendants, that he assumed judicial office in a court where "loose practices" prevailed and no rules existed, and that the lack of communication between the various judges of his court compounded the problems created by the considerable geographical distance between them. Petitioner offers this evidence to mitigate the adverse inferences from the procedural irregularities underlying his conduct. Petitioner concedes some of these irregularities but what he emphatically does not concede is the bad faith which we have found to pervade the proven specifications. Petitioner does not contend nor can we conceive that there are circumstances in which bad faith itself can be excused by extraneous circumstances. There can be no mitigation for maliciously motivated unjudicial conduct. Since we have found petitioner to have acted in bad faith on numerous occasions, we obviously have given no credit to petitioner's asseverations of mitigating circumstances.

Petitioner first argues that he was the victim of the judicial district's "loose practices." We grant that loose practices prevailed, but petitioner was accused of more than merely following irregular procedures. His appointments of attorneys without first ascertaining the indigency of the defendant or whether the public defender's office refused representation because of a conflict of interest cannot justify his favoritism toward Messrs. Juarez and Winkler. Similarly, even though "loose practices" permitted reductions of certain Vehicle Code violations to parking violations, the transferring of cases from one court to another, and the granting of a release to a defendant not otherwise before the judge, special favors for friends and political supporters were not sanctioned by any such "loose practices."

Petitioner also argues that he was inexperienced and that he had no idea that he was acting improperly because "no one complained." Although petitioner was "green" as a judge, he had 20 years of 801 experience as a criminal attorney, practicing in many courts. Furthermore, he had many reference works at his disposal to answer most questions as to proper courtroom procedure. (E.g., Misdemeanor Procedure Bench Book, supra. See also the recently prepared Cal. Municipal Justice Courts Manual, supra.) Finally, the evidence is clear and convincing that when attorneys did object, petitioner retaliated. Thus, his vengefulness went beyond mere ignorance of proper procedures. In the Fusilero case, the deputy public defender's objection resulted in his client getting petitioner's "raspberry." Petitioner was "provoked" by Deputy District Attorney Behrendt's erroneous affidavit filed for an appeal taken in another matter and put him in the jury box, notwithstanding the deputy objected and wanted his status clarified. We can accept the earlier error as justification for petitioner's "close scrutiny" of the search warrant application, even though the deputy district attorney merely participated in the preparation of the warrant and was not the affiant, but not as justification for restraining the deputy unlawfully. In the Goulardt matter, when Deputy District Attorney Hutchins objected, petitioner claimed he was being placed "in a box" and would have to do something he did not wish to do. And, in the Leines felony-assault matter, to Deputy District Attorney Nicholson's objection, petitioner responded with an obscenity.

Petitioner finally argues that his heavy workload justified much of his conduct. We agree with the Commission that "petitioner's intent and motivation for committing these acts goes beyond the fact that he knew or should have known that he was acting beyond his lawful power. Here, the evidence clearly shows the reasons, and these reasons belie any excuse that petitioner proceeded improperly merely because he was overworked or inexperienced in proper procedures." Thus petitioner's claims that calendar pressures and language problems necessitated the appointment of private counsel do not conceal the fact that he was motivated by the desire to reward his friends and political supporters.

To be sure, if petitioner's giving the "finger" to a defendant and his use of an obscenity during a telephone conversation with a deputy district attorney were the only charges brought against him, censure would be the appropriate discipline, since we find little risk of the recurrence of such conduct. We are persuaded to accept petitioner's explanation that in both incidents he was provoked, but that in any event, he realized how inappropriate his actions were and would not permit their recurrence. 802

In light of the remaining specifications of misconduct, however, we conclude that the Commission's recommendation of removal should be adopted. We find that petitioner's motives were far worse than those in issue in McCartney, [FN20] where we were persuaded that mitigating factors successfully rebutted any inference of bad faith. We would be remiss in our duty if we allowed petitioner's claims of justification to mitigate against removal, in view of the clear evidence of petitioner's petty tyranny and favoritism, which has led to our determination that petitioner has acted in bad faith. Mere censure of petitioner would woefully fail to convey our utter reproval of any judge who allows malice or other improper personal motivations to infect the administration of justice.

> FN20 In McCartney we were concerned merely with "modes of proper judicial behavior necessarily learned only by judicial experience." ( McCartney v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications, supra, 12 Cal.3d at p. 539.) Here, we are concerned with the basic respect for our institutions of justice which should be a fundamental concern of every judge and attorney.

We are ever mindful of the important role the municipal court judge fulfills in our system of justice. He handles more cases than any other judge in any other court and the municipal court is the only court that the average citizen is likely to observe or participate in. Furthermore, the municipal court judge has broad powers in the performance of his duties: he reviews the sufficiency of warrants and the validity of their execution; he presides over hearings which determine whether certain offenders will be bound over for trial in the superior court; he sets bail, appoints counsel and can even release defendants on their own recognizance; and finally, absent a clear showing of abuse, many of his rulings, decisions and findings are final. In fact, in misdemeanor cases, his authority is almost supreme, since he often acts as both judge and jury and rarely are his decisions appealed. Consequently, we must be careful that the municipal court judges of this state are fully capable of assuming the responsibilities inherent in such an important job.

Because it is our duty to preserve the integrity and independence of the judiciary (Cal. Code Jud. Conduct, supra, Canon 1) and because we cannot tolerate the risk of recurrence of petitioner's conduct, we order Judge William D. Spruance of the Municipal Court of the San Leandro-Hayward Judicial District removed from office. This order is final forthwith.

However, we feel that justice will best be served by allowing petitioner 803 to resume the practice of law. [FN21] We note that his long career as a lawyer was unblemished and that, as a practicing attorney, he will not have available that authority which he abused as a judge. We therefore further order that despite his removal from judicial office, William D. Spruance shall, if otherwise qualified, be permitted to practice law in the State of California. (See Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (d).) 804

FN21 Judge Geiler was also permitted to practice law despite his removal from the bench. We noted that his unjudicial conduct did not amount to moral turpitude, dishonesty or corruption (cf. Bus. & Prof. Code, § 6106), but that his removal was required "more by the high standards of judicial office than by his personal failings." ( Geiler v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications, supra, 10 Cal.3d at p. 287.) We wish to point out that the misconduct here involved is more serious with regard to petitioner's qualifications to practice law. By allowing petitioner to resume the practice of law we do not mean to intimate that petitioner's pattern of conduct of bringing improper influences to bear upon the judicial office is more proper for an attorney than a judge. Were the conduct here involved committed by an attorney, although we do not perceive that the attorney would be subject to so severe a sanction as disbarment, he would certainly be subject to public reproval or other appropriate discipline.

Spruance v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications

END OF DOCUMENT

[L.A. No. 30430. In Bank. July 10, 1975.]

NOEL CANNON, a Judge of the Municipal Court, Petitioner, v. COMMISSION ON JUDICIAL QUALIFICATIONS, Respondent.

SUMMARY

Following the filing of a notice of formal proceedings, the Supreme Court appointed special masters to hear evidence on charges of alleged judicial misconduct on the part of a judge. On the basis of this evidence, the masters recommended censure. However, the Commission on Judicial Qualifications recommended removal.

After making an independent review of the entire record and drawing its own findings and conclusions, the Supreme Court ordered that the judge be removed from office. The court rested its order on evidence of 21 acts of wilful misconduct in office and 8 other acts constituting conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute. Among these acts, the court characterized as "particularly egregious" the bad faith and maliciousness with which the judge, purportedly pursuant to her direct contempt powers, ordered the incarceration of public defenders, and thereby denied the effective right of counsel to clients who were required to defend with substituted counsel who were not afforded a reasonable opportunity to prepare. The court adverted to other conduct by the judge supportive of its conclusion that she had maligned the judicial office and shown her lack of temperament and ability to perform judicial functions in an even-handed manner. Although holding that she had failed to demonstrate any valid mitigating factors, the court did conclude that her misconduct did not amount to moral turpitude, dishonesty, or corruption, and therefore did not constitute grounds for depriving her of her right to practice law in California. (Opinion by The Court.)

HEADNOTES

Classified to California Digest of Official Reports, 3d Series

(1a-1c) Judges § 6—Removal—Grounds.—When viewed in the light of the absence of mitigating factors, removal of a judge from office was called for by the Supreme Court's findings, which were sustained by substantial evidence presented in hearings before special masters, indicating that she had engaged in 21 acts of wilful misconduct in office and 8 other acts constituting conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute, and that she lacked the temperament and ability to perform judicial functions in an even-handed manner.

(2) Judges § 1—Discipline—Supreme Court's Prerogatives.—It is for the Supreme Court, rather than its appointed special masters or the Commission on Judicial Qualifications to make the final findings of fact and conclusions of law in determining what discipline, if any, is to be imposed on a judge charged with judicial misconduct.

(3) Contempt § 3—Defenses—Attorney's Absence From Courtroom —Opportunity to Present Excuse.—An attorney must be afforded a reasonable opportunity to establish excuse before being held in contempt for absence from the courtroom.

(4) Contempt § 6—Punishment—Direct Contempt—Statutory Requirements.—Compliance with Code Civ. Proc., § 1211, relating to summary punishment for direct contempts and requiring the court to prepare an order reciting the facts of, and punishment proposed for, the alleged contempt, is jurisdictional. An order which assumes to punish summarily is void unless it shows facts sufficient to constitute a legal contempt on its face.

[See Cal.Jur.3d, Contempt, § 72; Am.Jur.2d, Contempt, § 86.]

(5) Judges § 1—Discipline—Bad Faith.—Bad faith of a judge charged with judicial misconduct was established by evidence that in citing public defenders for direct contempt, she wilfully failed to comply with the summary punishment requirements of Code Civ. Proc. § 1211, that she embarked on a program by which the defenders were charged and incarcerated as criminals despite her knowledge that they would be entitled to be released by extraordinary writ, that she cited them on grounds she never sought to establish, that she demonstrated no convincing interest or judicial responsibility in the contempt proceedings after ascertaining that the defenders had been subjected to booking procedures, and that at times her conduct was vulgar, lacking in humane understanding, and grounded on retribution and hostility.

(6) Judges § 1—Discipline—Bad Faith.—The term "bad faith," as used in connection with disciplinary charges against a judge, implies that he intentionally committed acts which he knew or should have known were beyond his lawful power. It entails actual malice as the motivation for his acting ultra vires. The requisite intent must exceed mere volition; negligence alone, if not so gross as to call its genuineness into question, falls short of such "bad faith." The term also encompasses acts within a judge's lawful power but which are committed for a corrupt purpose.

(7) Criminal Law § 84—Rights of Accused—Aid of Counsel—Discharge.—The involuntary removal of the attorney representing defendant in a criminal case is a severe limitation on defendant's right to counsel and may be justified, if at all, only in the most flagrant circumstances of attorney misconduct or incompetence when all other judicial controls have failed.

(8) Judges § 1—Discipline—Mitigating Factors.—Extraneous circumstances cannot constitute mitigation for a judge's maliciously motivated unjudicial conduct.

OPINION

THE COURT.— (1a) The Commission on Judicial Qualifications (the Commission) has unanimously recommended the removal from office of Judge Noel Cannon of the Municipal Court for the Los Angeles Judicial District of the County of Los Angeles. Judge Cannon has petitioned this court to modify or to reject the recommendation. We have independently reviewed the entire record and have adopted with slight modification the findings of the Commission.[1]

We conclude that petitioner has engaged in twenty-one acts constituting "wilful misconduct in office" and in eight other acts constituting "conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute."[2] Although some of the specific acts charged and found may overlap as arising out of a particular course of conduct, the totality of petitioner's judicial misconduct nevertheless presents a compelling case against her. We deem to be particularly egregious the bad faith and maliciousness with which petitioner arbitrarily ordered the immediate incarcerations of deputy public defenders who displeased her, and denied the effective right of counsel to their clients who were required to defend against charges in on-going criminal proceedings with substituted counsel who were afforded no reasonable opportunity to prepare. As we find nothing to excuse or mitigate Judge Cannon's conduct we adopt the Commission's recommendation and order that she be removed from office.

Petitioner was appointed a judge for the Los Angeles Judicial District on April 10, 1963. The proceedings herein were initiated by the filing of a

[1]The make-up of the Commission is provided for in the California Constitution. (Cal. Const., art. VI, § 8; see Spruance v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications (1975) 13 Cal.3d 778, 782, fn. 1 [119 Cal.Rptr. 841, 532 P.2d 1209].)

In those instances wherein we have adopted Commission findings and conclusions we have substituted the word "petitioner" for "respondent." Judge Cannon was correctly designated respondent in proceedings before the Commission, but in proceedings before this court she is cast in the role of a petitioner seeking relief from the Commission's recommendation.

[2]This court is authorized to censure or remove a judge on recommendation of the Commission. The recommendation must be based on "action occurring not more than 6 years prior to the commencement of the judge's current term that constitutes wilful misconduct in office, wilful and persistent failure to perform the judge's duties, habitual intemperance, or conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute." (Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (c).)

Rules for implementing the constitutional provisions are provided by the Judicial Council (Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (e)) within the framework of the California Rules of Court. Judge Cannon has petitioned for modification or rejection of the Commission's recommendation pursuant to rule 920.

notice of formal proceedings on July 8, 1974 (rule 905), and thereafter petitioner filed her verified answer denying the allegations set out in the formal notice. We appointed three special masters who commenced evidentiary hearings on October 15, 1974. (Rule 907.)[3] The masters concluded hearings on November 6, 1974, and filed their report on November 19 unanimously recommending censure of petitioner. Both petitioner and the examiners designated by the Commission to prosecute the charges (rule 921(f)) filed written objections to the report (rule 913), and the objections were orally argued before the Commission on February 7, 1975 (rule 914). The Commission thereupon made its recommendation on March 3, based on findings of fact and conclusions of law as hereinafter appear (rules 918, 919). Petitioner, by virtue of the Commission's recommendation, is disqualified from acting as a judge for as long as that recommendation remains pending before this court. (Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (a).)

The lengthy charges of petitioner's misconduct are summarized in the margin. We have omitted from that summary, however, those particular alleged specific acts of misconduct not sustained by the findings of the Commission and dismissed by it.[4]

[3]The special masters so appointed were: Charles H. Older, Judge of the Superior Court of Los Angeles County, Samuel L. Laidig, Judge of the Municipal Court for the Pasadena Judicial District of Los Angeles County, and Celia W. Baker, retired Judge of the Municipal Court for the West Orange County Judicial District.

[4]Petitioner was charged in count one with "wilful misconduct in office" (hereinafter wilful misconduct) and in count two with "conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute" (hereinafter prejudicial conduct). The specifications of misconduct are the same as to each count, and are set forth hereinafter without reference to a particular count. The charged misconduct (pars. A through H) and the specific acts alleged in support of each charge are as follows:

"A. You have abused your contempt power, and thereby infringed upon the constitutional right of criminal defendants to effective assistance of counsel. . . ." Four instances are charged wherein petitioner held deputy public defenders appearing before her in preliminary hearings to be in direct contempt. For purposes of identification these contempt citations will hereinafter be referred to by the names of the deputies cited: Ridgeway (A-1), Ryan (A-2), Karagozian (A-3), and Putnam-Pine (A-4). The facts constituting the specific instances of alleged misconduct will hereinafter be set out in greater detail.

"B. You have unlawfully interfered with the attorney-client relationship by relieving counsel of record and appointing new counsel. . . ." There are charged the four instances (see par. A) wherein public defenders were cited for contempt and removed to the county jail, and different counsel were summarily appointed to represent the criminal defendants in ongoing preliminary hearings. Additionally, a fifth specification involves a public defender (Mrs. Henley) who displeased petitioner and was substituted out as counsel although not cited for contempt. (All five of the foregoing matters are designated in the formal notice under item B-1.) A sixth specification involves private counsel (Kroneberger) who was relieved at his request. Petitioner appointed and dismissed a public defender (Weiss) who questioned the defendant's financial eligibility to be

The masters found that all the specifications of the formal notice, as appearing in footnote 4, ante, to be proved to the extent that they publically defended. Petitioner then appointed a second public defender (Fleishman) who, it is alleged, was intimidated into proceeding with the preliminary examination. (B-2.) A seventh specification involves a private counsel (Ingber) who was relieved upon attempting to file an affidavit of prejudice against petitioner. A deputy public defender was summarily appointed to proceed with the preliminary hearing. (B-3.)

"C. You have acted unreasonably and arbitrarily in matters of bail-setting and the issuance of bench warrants. . . ." It is charged that petitioner had been informed by a veterans hospital that an accused (Russo), who had been released on $500 bail, was unable to appear at a preliminary hearing because he was being evaluated in the hospital for meningitis. Petitioner issued an arrest warrant, set bail at $50,000, and had petitioner arrested at the hospital and removed over the doctor's objections. (C-1.) It is next charged that an accused (Brooks) against whom pending charges for want of prosecution were dismissed, was wrongfully ordered back into custody by petitioner when he would not stipulate to probable cause for his arrest. (C-3.) It is also charged that a juvenile (Alcorn) was certified to juvenile court by petitioner as to certain counts of a multiple count complaint. When the juvenile objected to continuing the preliminary hearing as to the remaining counts, petitioner vacated the certification and revoked bail. When the juvenile and his mother both uttered exclamations petitioner held both to be in contempt and set bail at $100,000 each. After both were in custody for an hour petitioner ordered the contempt charges quashed and reinstated the bail and certification. There was then no objection to the continuance. (C-4.) Petitioner is also charged with having arbitrarily increased bail from $3,000 in the case of an accused (Farrell) who, after being denied release on his own recognizance, indicated his displeasure and stated that he did not care what bail was set. Petitioner raised bail in steps to $5,000, to $10,000, and to $20,000. Petitioner then stated, "And if you want $50,000, we'll make it $50,000," which she did. (C-7.)

"D. You have engaged in conduct calculated to instill in defense attorneys a state of submissiveness and fear so as to expedite preliminary hearings, thereby infringing on a defendant's constitutional right to effective assistance of counsel. . . ." The Henley matter is again referred to (see par. B). The deputy public defender in that matter vainly attempted to ascertain the nature of inquiries petitioner objected to as proper cross-examination. In relieving her as counsel petitioner stated: "We have had the record read. If you can't tell from that, you are not qualified to represent the defendant." (D-1.) It is also charged that petitioner cautioned a deputy public defender (Dennison) in chambers not to ask certain "stupid" questions at a preliminary hearing, cautioning that "If you are thinking of any outlandish questions, check with the people in lock-up to see how they would recommend the food in county jail for the weekend." (D-2.)

"E. You have abused the prerogatives of your high office. . . ." It is charged in this paragraph that petitioner was "profane, vulgar, vicious and abusive" in confronting a police officer first at a street intersection and later when the officer (Fagin) was summoned to petitioner's chambers. (E-1.) The facts constituting this incident will be set out in greater detail in the text of the opinion. It is also charged that on another occasion petitioner verbally abused a police officer both in open court and in her chambers when the officer (Laird) inquired of a deputy district attorney why petitioner had interrupted a preliminary hearing to read a police report and dismiss charges. (E-4.) On still another occasion when deputy public defenders had been delayed in interviewing their clients at arraignment proceedings petitioner required the deputies (Ash-Hopkins) to state under oath their reasons for the delay, and ordered them to remain in the lock-up for more than four and a half hours while they conducted interviews. (E-5.)

"F. You have engaged in curt and rude conduct by deliberately ridiculing qualified members of the bar without cause. . . ." It is charged that petitioner became "very angry" when an accused refused after dismissal on preliminary hearing to stipulate to probable constituted acts of either wilful misconduct or prejudicial conduct, with the exception of five matters: The Russo matter of paragraph C (C-1), cause for his arrest. Petitioner challenged the accused's public defender (Klein), had him swear under oath that he had read the arrest report aloud to his client, inquired into his legal training and experience, and when it appeared that the deputy had been in practice but six weeks, stated: "Six weeks and you are telling me you know everything there is to know about the law?" (F-1.) On a second occasion petitioner engaged a private counsel (Shalant) in conversation in the court room after announcing noon recess. Petitioner stated to Shalant in the presence of his clients that she was ashamed of his poor representation and wished to report him to the State Bar. Before court reconvened, again in the presence of Shalant's clients, petitioner apologized to Shalant. In the afternoon session, petitioner required Shalant to submit a written offer of proof as to what he intended to establish in particular examinations of witnesses. After an hour and a half petitioner resumed the bench without indication that she had read the still incomplete written offer of proof. She next refused to accept a stipulation regarding facts to which a chemist would testify if called as a witness, but refused to advise why the stipulation was unsatisfactory, stating, "You will not cross-examine the court." She then required that the chemist appear as a witness, recessing until 8 p.m., but refused to honor Shalant's request to obtain food at a vending machine on another floor in the building. Finally, petitioner cut short with threats of contempt citations Shalant's attempts to argue in support of his motion to dismiss charges. (F-2.) The incidents hereinbefore referred to as the Putnam-Pine matter of paragraph A, the Kroneberger-Weiss-Fleishman matter of paragraph B, and the Henley matter of paragraphs B and D are also cited in support of the charge of this paragraph F (F-3, F-4 and F-5, respectively).

"G. You unlawfully ordered the court reporter to delete material from preliminary hearing transcripts. . . ." This charge is made in connection with the Putnam-Pine matter of paragraph A. The language sought to be deleted consisted of the following remarks by petitioner: "Now, Paul James [Public Defender] did that to me, and he had better not do that again, and none of you had better do that to me again, lying to me in open court. . . . I have had this practiced on me by Public Defender after Public Defender, and in particular participated in by Paul James of your office who lies to me in open court." (G-1.)

"H. You have engaged in bizarre conduct. . . ." A number of incidents are referred to in support of this charge. In 1967 the judges of petitioner's court passed a resolution criticizing petitioner for certain alleged exhibitionist conduct, including the display of a newly decorated pink chamber to the news media, and advocacy to the media that women should arm themselves against attack with derringers and hat pins. In response petitioner charged in the news media that her colleagues on the bench were guilty of judicial immorality, intemperance, inability, absenteeism and unpunctuality. Petitioner's conduct was the subject of a letter directed to her from the Commission in 1967. (H-1.) It is also charged that for a number of months in 1972 petitioner maintained a mechanical canary in her chambers. The chirping of the device was audible during proceedings in the courtroom through the partially open chamber door. (H-2.) Petitioner also, during the summer and fall of 1972 and early part of 1973, brought a small dog to the courtroom. She either held the dog or maintained it under the bench while the court was in session. (H-3.) Also between September 1972 and March 1973 petitioner arranged for a minister (Reverend William Blackstone) to use an interview room for the purpose of speaking with all persons in custody. Petitioner arranged that the minister be paid $700 to $800 a month from private sources to which she contributed. (H-4.) It is also charged that petitioner wrongfully refused to honor an expense voucher for a witness who came from Washington, D.C. to testify at a preliminary hearing. Petitioner stated to the district attorney's investigator who presented a voucher for petitioner's approval that the witness (Miss Belfrey) was an accomplice who was sexually interested in the defendant, that the investigator should not have an affair with the witness, and that he should not repeat any the Hopkins-Ash matter of paragraph E (E-5), the alleged unlawful order to delete material from a transcript of paragraph G (G-1), the mechanical canary matter of paragraph H (H-2), and the matter involving Reverend Blackstone of paragraph H (H-4). The masters concluded that in each instance wherein they made affirmative findings petitioner had acted in bad faith and was guilty of wilful misconduct with the exception of the Brooks matter of paragraph C (C-3), the Laird matter of paragraph E (E-4), the Shalant matter of paragraph F (F-2), and all matters of paragraph H (H-1, 3, 5 and 6). The masters concluded as to those excepted matters that petitioner was guilty of prejudicial conduct, although they were of the view that her conduct in connection with the resolution of censure by her fellow judges (H-1) was too remote in time to constitute grounds for disciplinary action. The masters were also of the view that there were mitigating matters, hereinafter considered, which warranted censure rather than removal from office.

The Commission made independent findings consistent with the masters' findings as to all specifications except as to the five charges the masters had found not to have been proven. As to these the Commission concluded that the Russo matter (C-1) constituted an act of wilful misconduct, and that the Ash-Hopkins matter (E-5) and matters involving transcript deletions (G-1), the mechanical canary (G-2) and Reverend Blackstone (H-3) constituted acts of prejudicial conduct. In addition the Commission concluded that the Brooks matter (C-3) constituted an act of wilful misconduct rather than prejudicial conduct as concluded by the masters.[5] Finally, the Commission concluded that there were no factors in mitigation of petitioner's misconduct.

Petitioner concedes the propriety of many of the Commission's findings, although she disputes in almost every instance the Commission's conclusions. (2) It is for us, however, to make the final findings of fact and conclusions of law in determining what discipline, if any, is to be imposed. (Geiler v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications (1973) 10 Cal.3d 270, 276, 283-284 [110 Cal.Rptr. 201, 515 P.2d 1].) In doing so we will adopt particular findings of the Commission or of the masters but we will not, in all instances, set those findings out in detail when no purpose is served in doing so. Particular conduct, however, we deem to be of such significance that it must be fully exposed.

of petitioner's remarks. (H-5.) Finally it is charged that in 1974 petitioner summoned maintenance and security personnel to her apartment to lodge a complaint. During a half hour confrontation she directed profanities to the manager, including, "I'm going to shoot you, George, you son of a bitch. And you are going to slowly die."

[5]Attached hereto as an appendix is a chart displaying in graphic form the findings and conclusions by both the masters and the Commission.

Petitioner's conduct is particularly significant in her dealings with public defenders who appeared before her in preliminary hearings. We have set out in the margin extracts from court proceedings pertaining to the Ridgeway (A-1, B-1),[6] Ryan (A-2, B-1),[7] Karagozian (A-3, B-1),[8]

[6]1. On November 30, 1972, during cross-examination of a witness by Deputy Public Defender Tod Ridgeway in the preliminary hearing of People v. Harold Leroy Lovin and Donald R. Fisher, No. A-290837 (a burglary charge), the following occurred:

"Q [Mr. Ridgeway] Was the credit card that you saw after you removed his wallet—was it a Tropicana credit card?

"A I don't recall which card it was.

"Q [Mr. Ridgeway] I will call off the credit cards and try to—

"THE COURT [petitioner]: You will not name off the credit cards. Please proceed with another question.

"Q [Mr. Ridgeway] Was it a Sands credit card?

"THE COURT: Perhaps you didn't hear the Court's ruling, Mr. Ridgeway.

"MR. RIDGEWAY: I think—

"THE COURT: Answer the question. Did you or did you not hear the Court's ruling?

"MR. RIDGEWAY: Yes, your Honor. I heard the ruling. I think—

"THE COURT: Then are you asking—are you asking for what I think you are asking for? I have gone through this yesterday. You had your last chance. Today is the day, and I think now is the time. Are you ready?

"MR. RIDGEWAY: I don't understand, your Honor.

"THE COURT: Take Mr. Ridgeway into custody. Get another Public Defender forthwith.

"MR. RIDGEWAY: Your Honor, I would like to object for the record.

"THE COURT: Overruled.

"May we have Lovin and Fisher to the counsel table in that order, please?

"The record will reflect that defendant Lovin is now represented at this preliminary examination by Deputy Public Defender Sandra Wruck.

"Miss Wruck, are you ready to proceed or do you want more time for preparation?

"MISS WRUCK: Your Honor, I believe I am ready. May the record reflect I am—

"THE COURT: Are you or are you not ready?

"MISS WRUCK: I am ready."

2. Mr. Ridgeway was immediately removed from the courtroom and transported by deputy marshals to the county jail.

[7]About 10:15 a.m. on April 6, 1973, the preliminary hearing of People v. Payne, Glover, and Wells, Jr., No. A-295611 (an 11-count kidnap-rape case), was transferred into Division 36 of the Los Angeles Municipal Court.

2. Deputy Public Defender John L. Ryan was assigned to represent defendant Sylvester Payne.

3. The case was transferred to petitioner's division of that court about 10:45 a.m.

4. At 11:02 a.m. Mr. Ryan informed petitioner that he was not ready to proceed and needed more time to prepare. Mr. Ryan then departed for the court employees' lounge to begin his preparation of the case and to investigate a possible conflict of interest. Mr. Ryan did not inform petitioner that he was leaving the court or that he was concerned about a possible conflict of interest.

5. Petitioner called the case at 11:36 a.m. and Mr. Ryan was not present. Petitioner then ordered a bench warrant, $25,000 bail, for Mr. Ryan held until 2 p.m. Petitioner then attempted to telephone Mr. Ryan at his office. Mr. Ryan testified that the secretary who received the call told him that petitioner was on the telephone and "wanted to talk to me in chambers about the case." Mr. Ryan told the secretary to inform the judge. "I did not speak about my cases off the record, nor did I speak about my cases in chambers."

6. Petitioner thereupon ordered the bench warrant served upon Mr. Ryan.

7. Mr. Ryan learned of the bench warrant and appeared in petitioner's court about noon. As Mr. Ryan entered the courtroom, petitioner made an order appointing Deputy Public Defender Maitland Montgomery to represent defendant Payne. Such order was made without consulting Mr. Ryan. Mr. Montgomery, or the defendant. Mr. Montgomery said he did not think he could be ready by 2 p.m. as directed.

8. Immediately thereafter, the following occurred:

"THE COURT: All right, now, I've had enough of this nonsense, Mr. Ryan.

"MR. RYAN: What nonsense, your Honor?

"THE COURT: Mr. Ryan, as it happens, I am not your witness. And you are not cross-examining the Court. I haven't yet heard an apology for your abominable behavior.

"MR. RYAN: I would apologize if I knew what that behavior was, your Honor.

"THE COURT: All right. You are held in contempt of court. Found in direct contempt of court in the immediate view and presence of the Court. And you are ordered into custody. Bail is set at $25,000.

"MR. RYAN: Thank you, your Honor.

"THE COURT: You're welcome.

"Now, am I going to have to appoint private counsel to represent Defendant Payne?

"MR. MONTGOMERY: I have—I have no idea, your Honor."

9. Mr. Ryan was taken into custody about noon and held in the court lockup for about 45 minutes until released on a writ of habeas corpus.

[1]. On May 3, 1973, in petitioner's division of the Los Angeles Municipal Court, Deputy Public Defender Michael Karagozian was representing the defendant in the preliminary hearing of People v. Robert Paul Dunn, No. A-296476 (two counts of passing bad checks.)

2. During cross-examination of a prosecution witness by Mr. Karagozian, the following occurred:

"Q [By Mr. Karagozian] What location in the restaurant did he sign these checks?

"A Two of the checks that we accepted were signed in front of me at the bar.

"Q Now, this is two separate occasions; isn't that correct?

"A The two that were given to me as evidence, those are two of—

"Q Well—

"THE COURT [petitioner]: Let him finish.

"Now, Mr. Karagozian, I don't want you continually interrupting the witness.

"MR. KARAGOZIAN: That answer isn't responsive to my question, your Honor.

"THE COURT: Mr. Karagozian, as I told you yesterday and as I have told you for the last time, that is for the Court to determine and not for you to determine. Do you understand that?

"MR. KARAGOZIAN: Yes, your Honor.

"THE COURT: Will you oblige with the question and the portion of the answer, please Miss Reporter?

[Question and Answer read.]

"THE COURT: Will you please finish your answer.

"THE WITNESS: The two that were given to me were given to me at the bar and signed in my presence.

"THE COURT: At one time or at two different times?

"THE WITNESS: Two different times.

"MR. KARAGOZIAN: May I continue, your Honor?

"THE COURT: You may.

"All right, Mr. Karagozian, did you bring your toothbrush? Are you ready to suffer the Putnam-Price (A-4, B-1, F-3),[9] Henley (B-1, D-1, F-5),[10] Kroneberger-Weiss-Fleishman (B-2, F-4),[11] and Ingber (B-3)[12] matters. In some instances, we have included, in addition to extracts from the trial transcripts, factual statements in explanation of the circumstances then prevailing. Each of the extracts and the factual statements as related constitute a finding of fact made by the masters, by the Commission, and now by us. Petitioner does not challenge any of such findings.

consequences for being contemptuous to the court, because that is what you are being?

"MR. KARAGOZIAN: Well, your Honor, at this point I would like to say that I am trying to give the best defense possible that I can to my client.

"THE COURT: Mr. Karagozian, why don't you try opening your ears and closing your mouth for a bit. I have warned you, and you take no heed.

"Please rise.

"MR. KARAGOZIAN: Yes, your Honor.

"THE COURT: Put your hands down to your sides.

"MR. KARAGOZIAN: Your Honor, at this time I would like to inform the Court that I am not a child, and that my demeanor—

"THE COURT: All right. You are held in contempt.

"Forthwith, Mr. Bailiff. Forthwith.

"Will you bring Mr. Kascoutas in, please. Take care of Mr. Karagozian forthwith.

"Mr. Kascoutas, will you please prepare Dunn forthwith.

"MR. KASCOUTAS: Yes, I am going to."

3. Mr. Karagozian was immediately taken into custody and booked in the county jail on a commitment stating he was held "upon a charge of contempt," which made no reference to bail in any amount and specified no punishment.

[9]1. On July 12, 1973, Deputy Public Defender Vernon L. Putnam was representing the defendant in the preliminary hearing of People v. Homer Moore, No. A-298498 (charges of violations of Health & Saf. Code, §§ 11378, 11351, 11357).

2. Mr. Putnam made a motion to petitioner to exclude a police officer. The deputy district attorney announced that the officer would not be called as a witness. Whereupon the following occurred:

"MR. PUTNAM: I would like him excluded, well, if not under 867 then perhaps the Court would permit me to clear the courtroom under 868. I may wish to call him.

"THE COURT: You know you are not going to call him. Please don't lie to me.

"MR. PUTNAM: I may wish to call him.

"THE COURT: Please don't make these phony motions, and don't lie to me in open court. Now, Paul James did that to me, and he had better not do that again, and none of you had better do that to me again, lying to me in open court. Is there anything further in support of your motion? Do you wish to clear the courtroom?

"MR. PUTNAM: Yes, I do, your Honor.

"THE COURT: The courtroom is cleared. I am tired of these obstructionist tactics. You have no intention whatsoever of calling that person. I have had this practiced on me by Public Defender after Public Defender, and in particular participated in by Paul James of your office who lies to me in open court. I am tired of this practice.

"All right, the court is in recess for five minutes. Nobody is to leave the courtroom, and nobody is to use the phone.

[Recess taken.]

"THE COURT: Mr. Putnam, you are held in contempt of court. Mr. Bailiff, will you

[10]Footnote 10 commences on page 689.

[11]Footnote 11 commences on page 690.

[12]Footnote 12 appears on page 692.

please take Mr. Putnam into custody.

"Mr. Pine, will you please prepare the case forthwith. I should advise you in advance that I will not put up with any more obstructionist policies. Will you please bring in the people.

"MR. PINE: I am ready at this time, your Honor.

"THE COURT: Thank you. You are still under oath, of course. Please state your name again for the record.

"THE WITNESS: Donald H. Barfield.

"THE COURT: Thank you. Please proceed.

[DIRECT EXAMINATION]

BY MR. MONTES

"Q Officer Barfield, directing your attention to June 24, 1973, would you state for the Court your occupation and assignment on that date.

"A Police Officer for the City of Los Angeles assigned to Wilshire Uniform Patrol.

"MR. PINE: Your Honor, at this time I really do intend to call the other officer.

"THE COURT: All right, Mr. Pine, you are held in contempt of court.

"Take Mr. Pine into custody.

"THE DEFENDANT: Pardon me, your Honor—

"THE COURT: Hold it.

"The court is in recess for five minutes. The same admonition to the bailiff. [Recess taken.]"

3. In holding Mr. Putnam and Mr. Pine in contempt, respondent did not make an order reciting the facts and prescribing the punishment.

[1]1. On July 6, 1973, Deputy Public Defender Maryanna Henley was representing the defendant in the preliminary hearing of People v. Earl Anthony Conway, No. A-297965 (charge of violation of Health & Saf. Code, § 11359).

2. During the examination of a police officer, Mrs. Henley stated that she wished to ascertain whether or not a narcotics informant would be available at the time of trial. Thereupon the following occurred:

"THE COURT [Petitioner]: Was he with you at the time of the arrest?

"THE WITNESS: No, your Honor. He was downstairs.

"THE COURT: Thank you.

"Please proceed with a proper line of questioning.

"MRS. HENLEY: Your Honor, may I state for the record that—

"THE COURT: I have ruled on this. It better not be something on this ruling.

"Please proceed with the proper question.

"BY MRS. HENLEY:

"Q Officer, did you inquire of Mr. Stevens as to his plans for the future regarding his residence, particularly whether he would be in the state or this particular location?

"THE COURT: Will you oblige with the question please, Mr. Reporter?

[The question was read.]

"THE COURT: Did you bring your toothbrush?

"MRS. HENLEY: I beg your pardon?

"THE COURT: Did you bring your toothbrush?

"MRS. HENLEY: To court today, your Honor?

"THE COURT: Yes.

"MRS. HENLEY: No, ma'am.

"THE COURT: I think you better get it right now.

"Have you heard the Court's ruling on this line of questioning? This line of questioning is not permitted.

"Will you please proceed with a proper line of questioning forthwith?

"MRS. HENLEY: Your Honor, am I to understand—

"THE COURT: You are to proceed with a proper line of questioning forthwith.

"MRS. HENLEY: Your Honor, I am somewhat at a loss here. May I inquire as to specifically the line of questioning which I may not pursue?

"THE COURT: I can see you are not able to read, as indicated by your reference to the Evidence Code. Is it also true that you cannot hear?

"MRS. HENLEY: I am certain I heard what your Honor said, but I am equally certain I do not understand what—

"THE COURT: Will you oblige with the record, please, Mr. Reporter?

[The entire record was read.]

"THE COURT: Thank you.

"May we please proceed?

"MRS. HENLEY: Your Honor, it is not my intention to aggravate the Court; however, I am at a loss as to exactly what line of questioning it is that I may not pursue. If the Court would oblige—

"THE COURT: You heard the record. We have had the record read. If you can't tell from that, then you are not qualified to represent the defendant.

"Do you wish to be replaced?

"MRS. HENLEY: Following your Honor's line of logic—

"THE COURT: Will you answer the question, please?

"MRS. HENLEY: —the logic being if I do not understand I am—

"THE COURT: Be seated forthwith.

"Get Mr. Gits forthwith.

"MR. MAYMAN: Mr. Montes went up to get Mr. Gits.

"THE COURT: Thank you.

[Short pause.]

"THE COURT: Mr. Gits, you are substituted for Mrs. Henley.

"MR. GITS: Yes, your Honor.

"I will need time to prepare the case, your Honor.

"THE COURT: You will prepare right now.

"MR. GITS: Yes, your Honor.

"THE COURT: You will oblige with the record, Mr. Reporter.

"Please be seated in the back, Mrs. Henley.

"MR. GITS: Your Honor, may I have the record read?

"THE COURT: Yes."

3. Neither Mrs. Henley nor the defendant requested or agreed to a change of counsel.

[1]1. Private counsel Walter Louis Kroneberger, Jr., was retained by the defendant in the preliminary hearing of People v. Douglas Leroy Nelson, No. A-297879 (charge of violation of Pen. Code, § 502.7, subd. (a)(4), (e)), held on June 25, 1973.

2. Mr. Kroneberger stated to petitioner that he was not prepared to proceed for three reasons: (1) he had filed an affidavit pursuant to section 170.6 of the Code of Civil Procedure, (2) he needed a continuance to properly prepare this case, and (3) he was physically sick.

3. Petitioner ruled the affidavit was not in order and denied the motion for a continuance, whereupon the following occurred:

"MR. KRONEBERGER: I am not prepared to go to the preliminary hearing. I would ask to be relieved at this time.

"THE COURT: Thank you. You are relieved.

"Mr. Weiss, please prepare this case forthwith. You are ordered to prepare this case forthwith.

"MR. WEISS: Yes, your Honor.

"May I receive a copy of the arrest report?

"THE COURT: Yes, you may.

"MR. WEISS: May I request that this matter be trailed to 1:30?

"THE COURT: No.

"MR. WEISS: Your Honor, I also have information that the defendant is not entitled to the services of the Public Defender's office.

"THE COURT: You are ordered to prepare the case forthwith, please, Mr. Weiss.

"Mr. Weiss, you are relieved.
"Mr. Fleishman, you are ordered to prepare the case forthwith.
"MR. FLEISHMAN: I'm sorry, I would make the same motion.
"THE COURT: Please prepare the case, Mr. Fleishman. You are relieved, Mr. Weiss.
"MR. WEISS.: Thank you, your Honor.
"THE COURT: You're welcome.
"MR. FLEISHMAN: Does the Court wish to take a recess while I prepare the case?
"THE COURT: Start preparing.
"MR. FLEISHMAN: May I take the defendant in the conference room and speak to him, please?
"THE COURT: You may take him into the lockup.
"MR. WEISS: May I confer with Mr. Fleishman?
"THE COURT: No, you may not."

4. A few moments later the following occurred:
"THE COURT: The record will reflect that the defendant is represented by Deputy Public Defender Allen Fleishman.
"Will you please proceed to the case in chief.
"MR. FLEISHMAN: May I address the Court briefly?
"THE COURT: You may.
"MR. FLEISHMAN: This case involves a violation of a Penal Code which I am not perfectly familiar with. It is a violation of Section 502.7(a)(4)(e). It is not a section which commonly comes before the Public Defender's office. It involves the use of technical equipment.

"THE COURT: You advised me you are ready. Are you ready or not?
"MR. FLEISHMAN: Your Honor, I would have to say that to do my client justice—
"THE COURT: You have been over there talking to Mr. Weiss. Mr. Weiss has given you certain instructions; isn't that the case?
MR. FLEISHMAN: No, your Honor.
"THE COURT: You told me you were ready. I don't want to have any more nonsense in this matter. Are you ready or not?
"MR. FLEISHMAN: I would ask for a continuance until 1:30.
"THE COURT: The motion is denied. Are you ready or not?
"MR. FLEISHMAN: Your Honor, all I can say is, if your Honor orders me to proceed, I will proceed.
"THE COURT: Are you ready to proceed?
"MR. FLEISHMAN: I can do a better job if I had to 1:30.
"THE COURT: Are you ready to proceed?
"MR. FLEISHMAN: I guess I am not, your Honor.
"THE COURT: Why did you tell me you were?
"MR. FLEISHMAN: I wish at this time to address the Court to explain my predicament.
"THE COURT: Now, Mr. Fleishman, let's not have lying in open court like somebody in your office does.
"MR. FLEISHMAN: Your Honor, it is not my intention to deceive the Court. I really have had mixed feelings about this case. There is little defense that can be made.
"However, the District Attorney has enclosed opinions that, apparently, would justify the telephone company tapping the phone to see where the calls are going. I haven't read these cases, your Honor. There is a search warrant, a technical search warrant.
"THE COURT: No notice has been given.
"People may proceed.
"MR. MAYER: Call Mr. Schmidt to the stand, please."

5. In relieving Mr. Kroneberger respondent did not consult with defendant Nelson or obtain his consent or that of the Deputy Public Defenders Weiss or Fleishman.

Petitioner challenges the Commission's findings relating to paragraph A (A-1, A-3, A-4)[1] to the extent that it found that petitioner ordered the deputy marshals attached to her court to make special preparations to assert quick removal to the county jail of attorneys found in contempt by petitioner. The Commission found as to the Ridgeway matter (A-1) that the special preparations had been made a "week or two prior" to the date of the contempt citation. As to the other matters which occurred after the Ridgeway matter (Karagozian, A-3, and Putnam-Pine, A-4), the Commission found that such preparations had been made "prior to" the citations. Petitioner appears first to quibble that she made arrangements "three or four weeks" prior to the Ridgeway incident rather than a "week or two" prior thereto, but the record supports either version and the precise time period is not critical. Petitioner also asserts that she made no special arrangements for public defenders and wanted to be prepared "for any contemnor." There are no findings, however, that

[1] 1. Private counsel Joe Ingber was retained by the defendant in the preliminary hearing of People v. Robert Crane Hughes, No. A-298342 (three counts of bookmaking), held on August 27, 1973, in petitioner's division of the Los Angeles Municipal Court.

2. On that date Mr. Ingber filed an affidavit of prejudice under section 170.6 of the Code of Civil Procedure against petitioner. Petitioner refused to honor this affidavit, stating that it had not been filed timely. Whereupon the following occurred:

"MR. INGBER: May the record reflect I am standing mute on behalf of Mr. Hughes. I filed an affidavit which I believe to be properly and timely filed. Under the circumstances, I advised Mr. Hughes, I will not participate in the defense of this matter of the preliminary hearing.

"THE COURT: Thank you. The affidavit is not timely filed. The public defender is ordered to prepare Hughes forthwith.

"Mr. Hughes, you have not been excused.

"You are dismissed, if you wish, Mr. Ingber. You may represent the defendant or not as you choose.

"MR. INGBER: I advised Mr. Hughes as to what rights I believe are in his best interests.

"THE COURT: The public defender will please prepare Hughes forthwith.

"Mr. Hughes, you are ordered not to leave the courtroom. If you leave the courtroom a bench warrant will be issued; do you understand that, and your bail will be forfeited. Do you understand that Mr. Hughes?

"THE DEFENDANT: (No audible response.)

"THE COURT: Answer out loud.

"THE DEFENDANT: Yes."

3. A few moments later Deputy Public Defender Steven Hauser stated:

"MR. HAUSER: Excuse me, your Honor. May I at this time make the Court aware that it is my determination that the public defender does not qualify for the services of Mr. Hughes. He earns too much money by our guidelines.

"THE COURT: Thank you. Are you otherwise prepared in this matter?

"MR. HAUSER: Yes, your Honor."

4. Before any evidence was presented in this case, Mr. Hauser said:

"MR. HAUSER: For the record, may it be clear that I am being ordered by the Court to represent Mr. Hughes?

"THE COURT: So ordered."

petitioner made special arrangements for public defenders although there is evidence to that effect. Petitioner also complains of particular findings from which it may be inferred that she had a special interest in the treatment accorded those deputy public defenders held in contempt in her court. The record nevertheless supports findings that she inquired of her deputy marshal after his return from transporting Ridgeway to the county jail, "Did they look up his asshole?" and that when informed Ridgeway was a diabetic and would require special treatment if incarcerated she stated, "Fuck his diabetes, fuck his diabetes." Petitioner explained that her reasons for arranging that contemnors be immediately transported to the county jail was that "Past experience indicated that such persons would be writted out before—while they were in the court lockup, thereby serving no punitive function."

(3) (See fn. 13.) Petitioner's remaining objection to findings of paragraph A is to findings made as to the Ryan (A-2), Karagozian (A-3) and Putnam-Pine (A-4) matters that she had failed to make an order reciting the facts constituting the contempt and prescribing the punishment.[13] It is clear that she failed to make such orders. Her objection to the findings is in reality an objection to the conclusion which we next consider, that she was required to make such orders. We adopt as our findings as to paragraph A the findings of the Commission as to each specification thereof.[14]

Petitioner particularly complains of the Commission's conclusions as to each matter a part of paragraph A that she "acted wilfully, maliciously and in bad faith in the exercise of the contempt power and also failed to comply with the provisions of Code of Civil Procedure section 1211" and to the conclusion that "Such conduct constituted wilful misconduct in office." She contends as to each matter that the Commission seeks to hold her accountable for what is at worst an erroneous judicial ruling

[13]Petitioner's objection in the Ryan matter extends also to a finding that she did not afford him an opportunity for a hearing to explain the reasons for his absence from the courtroom. (See fn. 7, ante.) She does not address her argument to such finding, however. An attorney must be afforded a reasonable opportunity to establish excuse before being held in contempt for absence from the courtroom. (Inniss v. Municipal Court (1965) 62 Cal.2d 487, 490 [42 Cal.Rptr. 594, 399 P.2d 50]; Arthur v. Superior Court (1965) 62 Cal.2d 404, 409 [42 Cal.Rptr. 441, 398 P.2d 777].)

[14]Petitioner also urges that we adopt certain findings of the special masters not found by the Commission. Although in some instances such findings are factually supported, in no instance do we deem it necessary or even helpful to adopt them. The masters' findings generally help explain petitioner's conduct but cannot be deemed to excuse or even mitigate it.

and/or decision as distinguished from "judicial misconduct" within the meaning of the pertinent constitutional provisions.

Petitioner completely ignored proper procedures in punishing for a contempt committed in the immediate presence of a court, as provided in Code of Civil Procedure section 1211.[15] This, without more, constituted an act of bad faith in each instance. Petitioner's explanation that she cannot be deemed to have failed to comply with section 1211 because that section does not provide a time when the order is to be made is without merit. (See In re Jones (1975) 47 Cal.App.3d 879, 881 [120 Cal.Rptr. 914].) It does not appear in any instance that petitioner made any effort to make a proper order at any time at or after the time the attorneys were cited. (4) Compliance with section 1211 is a jurisdictional requirement, "and an order which assumes to punish summarily a direct contempt of court is void unless it shows on its face facts sufficient to constitute a legal contempt." (Arthur v. Superior Court, supra, 62 Cal.2d 404, 409.) Petitioner was an experienced judge, with more than nine years on the bench before the Ridgeway matter, and she had at hand reference works which dealt with proper contempt procedures. (Cf. Spruance v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications, supra, 13 Cal.3d 778, 800-801.)

(5) That petitioner's conduct constituted bad faith, moreover, is amply and independently demonstrated by clear and convincing evidence apart from her wilful failure to comply with section 1211 in citing deputy public defenders. Thus she embarked upon a program by which persons whom she knew would be entitled to release by extraordinary writ would nevertheless be subjected to the embarrassment and indignity of being charged and incarcerated as criminals; she arbitrarily cited such persons for contempt on grounds which she never sought to establish if in fact they could have been established; she demonstrated no continuing interest or judicial responsibility in the contempt proceedings after ascertaining that the public defenders had been subjected to the booking procedures;[16] and her conduct was sometimes vulgar, lacking in humane understanding and grounded on retribution and hostility.

[15]Section 1211 provides in pertinent part: "When a contempt is committed in the immediate view and presence of the court, or of the judge at chambers, it may be punished summarily; for which an order must be made, reciting the facts as occurring in such immediate view and presence, adjudging that the person proceeded against is thereby guilty of a contempt, and that he be punished as therein prescribed."

[16]Ridgeway was released after four hours by a telephone call from petitioner, who later purged the contempt citation. Ryan was released on a writ of habeas corpus before booking. Karagozian was released on a writ of habeas corpus on the same day as his

(6) "The term 'bad faith' implies that the judge 'intentionally committed acts which he knew or should have known were beyond his lawful power.' [Citation.] As so used, 'bad faith' entails actual malice as the motivation for a judge's acting ultra vires. The requisite intent must exceed mere volition; negligence alone, if not so gross as to call its genuineness into question, falls short of 'bad faith.' 'Bad faith' also encompasses acts within the lawful power of a judge which nevertheless are committed for a corrupt purpose, i.e., for any purpose other than the faithful discharge of judicial duties. In sum, 'bad faith' is quintessentially a concept of specific intent, requiring consciousness of purpose as an antecedent to a judge's acting maliciously or corruptly." (Spruance v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications, supra, 13 Cal.3d 778, 795-796.) The foregoing record compels the conclusion in the instant case that petitioner's primary concerns were first to inflict a completed punishment before the deputies were afforded a due process determination that punishment was warranted and, second, to accomplish her objectives in a manner to insure that such conduct would be insulated from judicial review and collateral attack. It is manifest that such a planned subversion of justice and misuse of the judicial power could be undertaken only in bad faith. We adopt as our own the conclusions of the Commission as to each matter of paragraph A.

Paragraph B, which charges unlawful interference with the attorney-client relationship by relieving and appointing new counsel of record in on-going criminal proceedings, is supported in subparagraph B-1 by the foregoing Ridgeway, Ryan, Karagozian and Putnam-Pine matters and also the Henley matter. We have considered and rejected petitioner's objections to findings relating to the first four of these matters in support of paragraph A, and as to the Henley matter petitioner makes no objection to those findings set out in footnote 10, ante. In addition petitioner accepts further findings by the Commission that as to all five of these matters neither counsel of record nor the concerned defendant made application for or consented to the change of counsel, and that petitioner "without warning and without affording to counsel or the defendant any opportunity for consultation, made an abrupt change of Deputy Public Defenders." We adopt as our own findings the findings of the Commission as to subparagraph B-1.

Petitioner takes issue with the following conclusion of the Commission as to subparagraph B-1: "The change of Deputy Public Defenders in incarceration. Putnam and Pine were released on a writ of habeas corpus after five hours in the county jail and the contempt citations were purged by petitioner the following day.

each of the foregoing cases and the substitution of private counsel in [the Putnam-Pine matter] amounted to unlawful interference by [petitioner] with the attorney-client relationship and an unwarranted interference in the operation of the Public Defenders' Office. Therefore, her actions constituted wilful misconduct in office." Petitioner first contends that the conclusion regarding an "unwarranted interference in the operation of the Public Defenders' Office" should be stricken as irrelevant since no charge of such interference was contained in the formal notice. Petitioner was charged only with an unlawful interference with the attorney-client relationship, and we agree that the conclusion of unwarranted interference with the operation of the public defenders' office, although perhaps factually supported, is not contained within the charged misconduct. (See In re Ruffalo (1968) 390 U.S. 544 [20 L.Ed.2d 117, 88 S.Ct. 1222].)

Petitioner also contends that the Commission erred in concluding that she "unlawfully" interfered with attorney-client relationships, arguing that a judge does have the inherent power to remove an attorney from representation after he has been held in contempt. She relies on Smith v. Superior Court (1968) 68 Cal.2d 547 [68 Cal.Rptr. 1, 440 P.2d 65]. In that case a trial court first appointed an attorney for an indigent defendant and later concluded that the attorney was not qualified to represent a defendant against whom a charge had been filed which upon conviction could lead to a possible imposition of a death penalty. The defendant, however, was satisfied that the appointed counsel could best defend him. He accordingly refused to consent to the court's substitution of counsel and in fact vigorously resisted any such substitution. In granting a writ mandating the vacation of the order substituting counsel, we held that when both the attorney and the defendant objected it was beyond the power of a judge to discharge court-appointed counsel on the ground of the judge's evaluation that counsel was incompetent because of lack of experience in trying a particular type of case. We further held that although a trial judge must protect an accused's right to effective counsel, great care should be exercised to avoid infringing on a defendant's right to counsel of his choice and compromising the independence of the bar. We noted that a court has many tools available short of discharging counsel to insure that a defendant is not prejudiced by inadequate representation and that the court's ultimate weapon is the summary contempt power. "Yet that power too must be exercised with great caution, lest it stifle the freedom of thought and speech so necessary to a fair trial under our adversary system. That system is built upon the belief that truth will best be served if defense counsel is given the maximum possible leeway to urge in a respectful but nonetheless determined manner, the questions, objections, or argument he deems necessary to the defendant's case . . . ." (Id. at p. 560.)

We also stated in Smith that the inhibition imposed on a defense attorney by a threat of removal "constitutes a serious and unwarranted impairment of his client's right to counsel. It is, in the . . . language of People v. Crovedi (1966) supra, 65 Cal.2d 199, 206 [53 Cal.Rptr. 284, 417 P.2d 868], 'an unreasonable interference with the individual's desire to defend himself . . . .' " (Id. at p. 561.) Finally, we held that a different rule could not be applied merely because counsel was an indigent represented by court-appointed counsel. "It follows that once counsel is appointed to represent an indigent defendant, whether it be the public defender or a volunteer private attorney, the parties enter into an attorney-client relationship which is no less inviolable than if counsel had been retained. To hold otherwise would be to subject that relationship to an unwarranted and invidious discrimination arising merely from the poverty of the accused." (Id. at p. 562.)

(7) Smith makes it abundantly clear that the involuntary removal of any attorney is a severe limitation on a defendant's right to counsel and may be justified, if at all, only in the most flagrant circumstances of attorney misconduct or incompetence when all other judicial controls have failed. Without determining whether any of petitioner's contempt citations were warranted in the instant case, it is nevertheless manifest that in none of such instances was the conduct of the deputy public defenders so flagrant that petitioner was justified in abruptly substituting counsel without the prior concurrence of the attorneys and defendants involved.[17] In making such substitutions petitioner also failed to allow reasonable time for the newly appointed counsel to prepare to defend.

It avails petitioner little to argue, as she does, that she committed no unlawful act in substituting one deputy public defender for another in the same office. The gravamen of petitioner's misconduct lies not only in the fact of the substitutions but also the manner in which they were accomplished. In some instances she thrust upon new counsel the immediate responsibility of representation in an on-going proceeding

[17]Code of Civil Procedure section 284 provides in pertinent part: "The attorney in an action or special proceeding may be changed at any time before or after judgment or final determination, as follows:

"1. Upon the consent of both the client and attorney, filed with the clerk, or entered upon the minutes;

"2. Upon the order of the court, upon the application of either client or attorney, after notice from one to the other."

when, so far as appears, such counsel had no prior knowledge of or acquaintance with the accused, the evidence supporting the charges, the defenses which might be available or the trial tactics and intended strategy of the attorney who was summarily removed. The accused in such instances was afforded no opportunity to consent or to state his position. Indeed, he was not even permitted to communicate with the newly appointed counsel. The attorney-client relationship was as effectively infringed as if the newly appointed counsel had no prior relationship with the counsel for whom he was substituted as no opportunity was afforded for effective continuity in the attorney-client relationship or in defending against the charges. (Cf. People v. Stroble (1951) 36 Cal.2d 615, 628-630 [226 P.2d 330].) The accused's right to counsel was thus as seriously infringed as in Geiler v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications, supra, 10 Cal.3d 270, where upon the whim of the trial judge private counsel were substituted for deputy public defenders. We stated in that case: "No more fragile rights exist under our law than the rights of the indigent accused; consequently these rights are deserving of the greatest judicial solicitude. The ideal of our legal system is that the judicial should be equated with the just. Such an ideal cannot be achieved if one man clothed with judicial power may ignore with impunity such a basic institutional mandate as the sanctity of the attorney-client relationship merely because the attorneys are young deputy public defenders and their clients are indigent." (Id. at p. 286.)

In view of the foregoing, our conclusion as to subparagraph B-1 is as follows: The change of deputy public defenders in each of the foregoing cases and the substitution of private counsel in People v. Moore (the Putnam-Pine matter) amounted to unlawful interference by petitioner with the attorney-client relationship. Petitioner acted in bad faith. Therefore, her actions constituted wilful misconduct in office.

Petitioner also challenges the Commission's finding in the Kroneberger-Weiss-Fleishman matter (B-2, see fn. 11, ante) that she intimidated Fleishman into proceeding without adequate time to prepare in that case. The matters set forth in footnote 11, ante, constitute clear and convincing evidence in support of such finding, and we adopt the findings of the Commission as our own as to subparagraph B-2. We conclude, as did the Commission, that the actions of petitioner taken after the denial of Kroneberger's motion for continuance were in bad faith. Consequently, such actions constituted wilful misconduct in office.

Petitioner next objects to findings made by the Commission as to the Ingber matter (B-3, see fn. 12, ante) that the substitution of a deputy public defender for Ingber was without the consent of the accused or the attorneys involved, and that petitioner made no effort to ascertain that the accused, who had paid Ingber in full, was eligible to be represented by the public defender. The matters set out in footnote 12, ante, provide clear and convincing evidence in support of the findings of the Commission which we adopt as our own as to subparagraph B-3. We conclude, as did the Commission, that petitioner's actions, after refusing to honor the affidavit of prejudice, were taken in bad faith and constituted wilful misconduct in office.

Petitioner also contends that her conduct as to all matters charged in support of paragraph B of the formal complaint is not subject to reprimand as lying within the proper scope of an exercise of judicial discretion. As earlier discussed in connection with petitioner's similar argument urged as to the matters charged in support of paragraph A of the formal notice, we reject such contention for reasons of demonstrated bad faith of petitioner.

Petitioner is charged in paragraph C with having acted unreasonably and arbitrarily in matters of bail-setting and issuance of bench warrants. The conduct in support of paragraph C is fairly summarized in the charges set out in footnote 4, ante. Petitioner has accepted the findings in full as to all matters alleged except as to certain of the findings of the Russo matter (C-1). We have examined the record and agree in part with petitioner's contentions. Our findings as to the Russo matter are set forth in the margin.[18] We fail to find clear and convincing evidence that petitioner acted in bad faith, but conclude as follows: Petitioner's actions in issuing the bench warrant and setting bail at $50,000 constituted [18]1. On March 23, 1973, Richard Russo (a.k.a. Frank Dariento) was scheduled to appear in petitioner's court for a preliminary hearing on No. A-294898 (two counts of receiving stolen property and two counts involving narcotic violations). Bail had previously been set at $500.

2. Defendant failed to appear on March 23, 1973, and a bench warrant was ordered held until April 2, 1973.

3. Sometime after March 24, 1973, petitioner received a letter from Dr. Jack E. Miller of the Veterans Administration stating that the defendant was in the Veterans Hospital and unable to appear in court. In this letter Dr. Miller mentioned a telephone call to petitioner's court on the morning of March 24, 1973, and indicated that defendant was undergoing evaluation of symptoms that appeared highly suggestive of a form of meningitis. Petitioner attempted to telephone Dr. Miller but was unable to talk with him on any of the calls originating from her office.

4. Before April 3, 1973, petitioner talked with Dr. Toomajian, the medical director of the hospital board of the county jail who, based on the contents of Dr. Miller's letter, conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute.

Petitioner does not take issue with the Commission's findings as to the remaining matters in support of paragraph C. Thus she does not challenge findings that she arbitrarily revoked a dismissal and remanded an accused (Brooks) to custody when he refused to stipulate to probable cause for his arrest (C-3); that she arbitrarily revoked certification of a minor (Alcorn) to juvenile court as to certain charges and revoked bail when he refused to stipulate to a continuance of a preliminary hearing as to other charges; and that she found both the accused and his mother in contempt of court, setting bail at $100,000 as to each, when they audibly protested the aforementioned acts of revocation (C-4); and that she arbitrarily increased bail from $3,000 in steps to $50,000 when an accused (Farrell) indicated his continuing displeasure because he was not released on his own recognizance (C-7). (See factual recitals set forth in charges appearing in fn. 4, ante, subpar. C.) As to each of these matters (C-3, C-4 and C-7) we conclude that petitioner acted in bad faith and that such acts constituted wilful misconduct in office, adopting as our own the conclusions of the Commission.

In paragraph D petitioner is charged with engaging in conduct calculated to instill in defense attorneys a state of submissiveness and fear, thereby infringing on a defendant's constitutional right to counsel. Two matters (Henley, Dennison) are charged herein. We have already considered the Henley matter and petitioner does not challenge the findings as set out in footnote 10, ante. Petitioner purports to challenge the findings as to the Dennison matter (D-2) but such challenge consists only of her stated inability to remember the events as testified to by Dennison. (See factual recitals summarized in charges, fn. 4, ante, par. D.) We adopt the findings of the Commission as our own, and conclude, as does the Commission in each instance, that petitioner's conduct was advised that Russo's problem could be better treated at the county jail hospital.

5. On April 3, 1973, petitioner's clerk answered a telephone call and told petitioner it was from a doctor at the Veterans Hospital. Picking up the telephone, petitioner stated, "That is entirely unsatisfactory. Unsatisfactory."

6. After this telephone call, petitioner immediately took the bench, ordered the bench warrant served, and set bail at $50,000.

7. The defendant was brought to court on April 4, 1973, bail remained at $50,000 and the preliminary hearing was scheduled for April 17, 1973. When the defendant was taken into custody on the bench warrant, representatives of the sheriff's office furnished the Veterans Hospital with a written assumption of responsibility for the defendant's "health care."

8. At the preliminary hearing on April 17, 1973, the defendant was held to answer and bail was continued at $50,000.

arbitrary, unreasonable and in bad faith, and constituted wilful misconduct in office.

Petitioner is charged in paragraph E with abusing the prerogatives of her high office. We are particularly distressed by the Fagin matter (E-1) and have set out in the margin the findings and conclusions of the Commission, none of which is challenged by petitioner, and which we adopt.[19] Petitioner also does not challenge the Commission's findings as to any of the other matters in support of paragraph E. (See summary of factual matters set forth in charges, fn. 4, ante, par. E.) Thus petitioner [19]About 7:45 a.m. on November 30, 1972, Police Officer Richard G. Fagin spoke to petitioner at the intersection of Spring and Arcadia Streets in Los Angeles about the excessive use by petitioner of her automobile horn at the preceding corner. The following conversation occurred between petitioner and Officer Fagin at that time.

"[Officer Fagin] She rolled down her window when I pulled up alongside her, at which time I said, 'Ma'am, there is no reason to honk your horn.'

"I said, 'The gentleman was just waiting for a pedestrian, like he should have.'

"At which time she told me she would honk her horn any time she damn well pleased.

"At that time I said, 'Ma'am, there is a Vehicle Code Section that covers excessive use of the horn.'

"At which time she told me, 'You go to hell, Officer.' "

2. Upon arriving in her chambers shortly thereafter petitioner said to her bailiff, Robert Douillard, "Find the son of a bitch; I want him found and brought in right away. Give me a gun; I am going to shoot his balls off and give him a .38 vasectomy."

3. At about the same time, petitioner said to her other bailiff, Steven Day, "God damn, get that son of a bitch here; find that bastard; I'm not going to start court until that son of a bitch is here; when I find him, I'm going to cut off his balls and have them hang over my bench; I'm going to castrate him; I'm going to give him a vasectomy with a .38." These statements were repeated to Officer Day several times.

4. Petitioner and Officer Day then went to the police officer's waiting room in the courthouse, where petitioner spoke to Sergeant Paul Holmes, stating, "God damn it, find him, find that son of a bitch for me. I am not going to take the bench until you find that male chauvinist pig."

5. Shortly thereafter, various police officers began to arrive at petitioner's chambers, including Sergeant Paul Holmes, Lieutenant James W. Holcomb, and Captain James D. Munger. At this time and with these police officers in her presence, petitioner instructed her bailiffs, "God damn it, no one is to leave, if anyone tries to leave, shoot the bastard." Petitioner appeared to be hysterical at this time and her voice was harsh and loud. While these officers remained in her chambers, petitioner said she could sound her "God damn horn any place in the city and no male chauvinistic officer" could tell her otherwise. Petitioner further stated, "I'd like to slap that mustache off that officer's face for what he did. We have too many of these motor officers out there laying their pecker on the line for their pay checks."

6. Later the same morning, Officer Fagin arrived at petitioner's court and stood outside the chambers. He could hear petitioner "yelling at Sgt. Holmes." After about 10 minutes he entered chambers. We find the following testimony of Officer Fagin to be true:

"Q And would you relate as best you can the substance of the conversation that took place at this time and place?

"A Yes, sir. I walked into the chambers and I stood behind my chair, and Judge Cannon said 'Good morning, Officer,' and I said, 'Good morning.'

"She said, 'Have a seat,' and I said, 'Thank you,' and I sat down, at which time we acknowledges that she verbally abused a police officer (Laird) because he made inquiry as to the dismissal of a criminal complaint following petitioner's interruption of a preliminary hearing for the purpose of reading the police report of the arrest (E-4), and that she ordered deputy public defenders (Ash-Hopkins) into custody while they conducted interviews with clients prior to arraignment proceedings (E-5). Accordingly, we adopt the Commission's conclusion as to each of such matters (E-4, E-5) that petitioner's conduct constituted acts prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute.

just—there was a momentary silence for about 30 seconds; we just looked at each other, because I did not know what to say or do.

"Her opening statement was, 'You've been a very naughty boy.'

"And I stated 'Well, if you say so, your Honor.'

"She said, 'What do you mean, if I say so?'

"I said, 'Well, you are the Judge.'

"At this time we just talked about things in general, such as public defenders and court cases and how the public defenders ask some ridiculous questions like, 'Officer, did you have your gun out when you did this? Did you have your gun out when you did this?'

"She said, 'There is nothing but a revolving door here,' she said, 'All of these people are going to be back, they just come in and out.'

"Then it was—she just changed. The conversation changed back and forth.

"Then she started talking about some religious seminar that she attended over some holiday, just a couple of weeks prior to this, I presume, and she started going through some religious pamphlets that she had, and told me that she wanted me to have a copy of it, and she looked for a copy of it and she could not find one. She gave me her own personal copy of a couple of these pamphlets and told me to look at the dog-eared pages of the pamphlets in my spare time.

"She also stated the guillotine had been used in France again; she wished it would be brought back in the United States.

"Q Now, did she ever ask you to apologize during this conversation?

"A No, sir.

"Q And did you leave with how many pieces of religious brochures?

"A Three or four.

"Q And later on did you receive a letter of commendation from Judge Cannon?

"A Yes, sir, I did.

"Q How many weeks after this incident was this?

"A Two weeks.

"Q And could you relate in essence the substance of this letter of commendation?

"A Yes, sir, it was just addressed to Chief Davis, Chief of Police, and it said the Los Angeles Police Department is the finest in the world, and the motor T.E.D. motor squad was the finest of L.A., and Officer Fagin was the finest of the fine, and it was signed Noel Cannon."

7. The police officers finally left petitioner's chambers that morning shortly before noon.

CONCLUSION:

Petitioner's conduct was arbitrary, unreasonable and in bad faith, and constituted wilful misconduct in office. Petitioner not only used profane, abusive and inexcusable language, but she also misused the authority of her office by ordering persons to appear in her court where no matters were pending requiring their attendance and by directing her bailiffs to use force if they attempted to leave.

[July 1975]

Paragraph F charges that petitioner engaged in curt and rude conduct by ridiculing qualified members of the bar. Petitioner concedes the truth of the Commission's findings that she deliberately ridiculed Deputy Public Defender Klein (F-1, see summary of factual matters set forth in charges, fn. 4, ante, par. F) and accepts the Commission's conclusion that her conduct was arbitrary, unreasonable and in bad faith, and constituted wilful misconduct in office. Petitioner also accepts the Commission's findings as to the Shalant matter but objects to the Commission's conclusion that her conduct was prejudicial to the administration of justice. The findings in the Shalant matter well support the charges as summarized in footnote 4, ante, paragraph F, and constitute clear and convincing evidence in support of the conclusions of prejudicial misconduct. We accordingly adopt the findings and conclusions of the Commission as our own as to the Klein and Shalant matters. We have heretofore made findings as to the Putnam-Pine matter (F-3), the Kroneberger-Weiss-Fleishman matter (F-4) and the Henley matter (F-5) and as to each of such matters we adopt the Commission's conclusion that petitioner engaged in curt and rude conduct by deliberately ridiculing these members of the bar, and that such constituted wilful misconduct in office.

Petitioner accepts the Commission's findings of paragraph G to the effect that she unlawfully ordered the court reporter to delete material from the transcript of a preliminary hearing matter. (See summary of factual matters set forth in charges, fn. 4, ante, par. G.) She objects, however, that the Commission has reached a conclusion which is not related to the charge of the formal notice. We do agree that a charge that petitioner unlawfully ordered the deletion of material from a transcript does not warrant the conclusion, as made by the Commission, that petitioner's direction to the reporter to turn over his notes to the clerk of the municipal court rather than the county clerk, was a violation of Government Code section 69955, subdivision (a). We agree with and adopt as our own, however, the Commission's further conclusion, as follows: Petitioner's conduct in ordering a portion of the record deleted in People v. Moore was a violation of Code of Civil Procedure section 274c, and constituted conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute.

Paragraph H charges certain bizarre conduct on petitioner's part. We do not deem some of such admitted conduct, although bizarre in character and clearly improper in a judicial atmosphere, to constitute either wilful misconduct or prejudicial conduct. This includes the maintenance at particular times of a mechanical canary in petitioner's chambers (H-2) and a small dog at her bench (H-3). The record fails to disclose that either the canary or the dog had any substantial effect on proceedings in petitioner's court. A more serious charge is that petitioner engaged in improper conduct in 1967 when she maligned her colleagues on the bench after they had censured her for certain exhibitionist conduct and statements to the media which she now recognizes as being "foolish." The Commission's findings which support the charge are accepted by petitioner. It appears, however, that such conduct was the subject of a letter from the Commission in 1967 and that petitioner has not engaged in similar conduct since that time. We elect not to include her 1967 conduct as a ground for further disciplinary action in these proceedings.

There is other bizarre conduct which we cannot ignore. Petitioner does not object to Commission findings that she arranged for Reverend Blackstone to use an interview room within the lockup area adjacent to petitioner's courtroom for the purpose of religious interviews with all persons in custody. Petitioner now acknowledges "that religion in any form should not be injected into the judicial process." We adopt as our own the Commission's findings and conclusions that petitioner's conduct was prejudicial to the administration of justice and brings the judicial office into disrepute.

Petitioner does not challenge Commission findings in support of the Belfry matter (see factual matters as set forth in charges as summarized in footnote 4, ante, par. H (H-5)), although she rejects the Commission's conclusion that she is guilty of prejudicial conduct as to that matter. As the findings are based on clear and convincing evidence and support the Commission's conclusion we adopt both the findings and conclusion as our own. Petitioner does object to Commission findings in support of the charge summarized in footnote 4, ante, paragraph H (H-6) that she threatened to shoot the manager of her apartment, but she objects only to a particular finding that a maintenance man who was present was frightened by petitioner's conduct. There is clear and convincing evidence in support of the Commission's finding and also the conclusion of prejudicial conduct, and we adopt both the findings and conclusion as our own. Petitioner's contention that conduct within the privacy of her apartment cannot constitute conduct which brings the judicial office into disrepute overlooks the fact that the charged misconduct was brought out of the privacy of her apartment when the apartment manager, the maintenance engineer and the security guard were summoned there and detained by petitioner while she stated her complaints at length in a loud voice.

The foregoing numerous incidents of wilful misconduct and less serious prejudicial conduct[20] constitute compelling grounds for petitioner's removal from office. Petitioner urges in mitigation, first, "the unanimous conclusion of all who testified [in her behalf] that Petitioner was a hard working judge who puts in long hours because of a lengthy calendar." Also urged in mitigation are her "contrition for her admitted abrasive conduct," her "courteous and respectful attitude and demeanor" in most of her work, her "intelligence and capacity for continued growth" as a judge, her efficiency in managing a heavy case load, her capacity for impartial decisions and long working hours, her "unquestioned integrity," and the "inexperience and sometimes disrespectful attitude of public defenders" who appeared before her.[21]

Seventeen private attorneys, one deputy district attorney and a public official testified in behalf of petitioner. A consensus of the testimony of the attorneys was to the effect that in appearances before petitioner they had observed no conduct which constituted a denial of effective counsel or an interference with the attorney-client relationship, that she did not act in a curt, rude or biased manner, that she did not set unreasonable bails or arbitrarily issue arrest warrants, that she did not instill in defense attorneys fear or submissiveness, and that she was a well-qualified and conscientious judge. It appears, however, that all of such opinion evidence except, perhaps, the opinion that petitioner was a well-qualified and conscientious judge, has been established to the contrary by clear and convincing evidence in these proceedings. We cannot embrace such conclusionary expressions in view of a record which refutes each such expression in instances too numerous to permit us to speculate that petitioner was guilty of misconduct only in isolated occasions which might be individually explained and excused. None of the attorneys was present in petitioner's court on the occasion of any misconduct charged herein.

[20]"The more serious charge should be reserved for unjudicial conduct which a judge acting in his judicial capacity commits in bad faith, while the lesser charge should be applied to conduct which a judge undertakes in good faith but which nevertheless would appear to an objective observer to be not only unjudicial conduct but conduct prejudicial to public esteem for the judicial office." (Geiler v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications, supra, 10 Cal.3d 270, 284.)

[21]The special masters made the following statement in support of their recommendation for censure: "The Special Masters have concluded on the basis of all the evidence that [petitioner] is capable of continuing in her judicial position and functioning as a responsible, effective judge, and that she can and will avoid a repetition of the conduct which is the basis of the recommendation for censure. It is with that belief that the Special Masters make their recommendation."

It is also urged that petitioner has heard far more than her fair share of preliminary hearings and arraignments during the period in which her conduct has been questioned; that she kept her court in session for long hours, generally convening by 8:30 a.m. and occasionally working through lunch or into evening hours, and that she has averaged only a few days' annual vacation and sick leave. There is no reason to doubt the truth of these assertions. Judge Spruance (Spruance v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications, supra, 13 Cal.3d 778, 801) unsuccessfully sought to mitigate his misconduct on grounds of overwork and unusual judicial pressures. Petitioner asserts that she often sought reassignments from other departments when her calendar had cleared; it thus does not appear that it was the pressures of her assigned work load which forced her into the improprieties charged and found. It is manifest in any event that a lack in the quality of justice cannot be balanced by the fact that justice, such as it is, is administered in large quantities.

Petitioner also seeks to mitigate her conduct on frustrations provoked by "inexperienced and sometimes disrespectful lawyers" from the office of the public defender. With one possible exception, however, the record simply does not support her claim that the numerous deputy public defenders involved in the misconduct charged and found to be true were disrespectful or that their inexperience reasonably could have frustrated petitioner or have provoked her unwarranted conduct. (See fns. 6-12, ante.) Nor does the record support a contention that the deputy public defenders engaged in a "vendetta" designed to provoke petitioner or to obstruct the administration of justice in her court. Punitive action against the deputy public defenders, including contempt citations, was petitioner's first and not as it should have been her last means of controlling proceedings in her courtroom. (See Smith v. Superior Court, supra, 68 Cal.2d 547, 560.) "[E]ven assuming arguendo that the evidence was clear and convincing, disrespect on the part of the public defender cannot serve to justify petitioner's injudicious response." (McCartney v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications (1974) 12 Cal.3d 512, 538 [116 Cal.Rptr. 260, 526 P.2d 268].)

(1b) We deem none of the foregoing or other matter urged by petitioner to constitute a factor which we may recognize in mitigation of petitioner's numerous acts of wilful misconduct. (8) We stated in

Spruance, with equal applicability here, that we cannot "conceive that there are circumstances in which bad faith itself can be excused by extraneous circumstances. There can be no mitigation for maliciously motivated unjudicial conduct. Since we have found petitioner to have acted in bad faith on numerous occasions, we obviously have given no credit to petitioner's asseverations of mitigating circumstances." (Spruance v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications, supra, 13 Cal.3d 778, 800.) (1c) Petitioner has engaged in a course of conduct which has maligned the judicial office and clearly establishes her lack of temperament and ability to perform judicial functions in an even-handed manner. Because it is our duty to preserve the integrity and independence of the judiciary (Cal. Code Jud. Conduct, canon 1), we order Judge Noel Cannon of the Municipal Court for the Los Angeles Judicial District of Los Angeles County removed from office.[22] This order is final forthwith.

As petitioner's unjudicial conduct did not amount to moral turpitude, dishonesty or corruption (cf. Bus. & Prof. Code, § 6106) justice will not be further served by prohibiting petitioner from resuming the practice of law. We therefore further order that notwithstanding her removal from [22]The California Code of Judicial Conduct was adopted by the Conference of California Judges effective January 1, 1975. We do not rely on the code in ascertaining violations thereof as grounds for disciplining petitioner; discipline is imposed pursuant to the constitutional provisions and rules in implementation thereof heretofore noted and considered. However, we acknowledge the applicability of the code to any conduct we as judges participate in after its effective date. Canon 1 provides in part that "An independent and honorable judiciary is indispensable to justice in our society. A judge should participate in establishing, maintaining, and enforcing, and should himself observe, high standards of conduct so that the integrity and independence of the judiciary may be preserved."

We note that although the current California Code of Judicial Conduct has only recently been adopted, formal standards have nevertheless existed for more than 50 years. The original American Bar Association Canons of Judicial Ethics were adopted as modified in 1949 for application in California by the Conference of California Judges. The current California Code of Judicial Conduct is adapted from the ABA Code of Judicial Conduct which, after revision of the association's earlier code, was adopted by the ABA in 1972. (See Cal. Rules of Court, appendix, div. II, Cal. Code Jud. Conduct; Geiler v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications, supra, 10 Cal.3d 270, 281-282; Spruance v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications, supra, 13 Cal.3d 778, 796, fn. 17.)

Although as stated, petitioner is not charged with its violation we nevertheless note the content of canon 2, the substance of which has long been incorporated in various ABA canons of judicial conduct: "A judge should respect and comply with the law and shall conduct himself at all times in a manner that promotes public confidence in the impartiality of the judiciary." We stated in Spruance that "the canons of the American Bar Association's Code of Judicial Conduct might usefully be consulted to give meaning to the constitutional standards." (Spruance v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications, supra, 13 Cal.3d 778, 796.)

judicial office Noel Cannon shall, if otherwise qualified, be permitted to practice law in the State of California. (See Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (d).)

MARSHALL F. McCOMB, an Associate Justice of the Supreme Court, Petitioner,
v.
COMMISSION ON JUDICIAL PERFORMANCE, Respondent.

S.F. No. 23585.

Supreme Court of California

May 2, 1977.

SUMMARY

In a special proceeding under Cal. Const., art. VI, §§ 8, 18, the Commission on Judicial Performance conducted an investigation and hearing on the fitness of an 82-year-old associate justice of the Supreme Court to continue in office. While the proceeding was pending, Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (e), was amended to provide that a recommendation of the commission for the censure, removal, or retirement of a judge of the Supreme Court shall be determined by a tribunal of seven Court of Appeal judges selected by lot. On findings that, after 50 years as a judge, the associate justice was suffering from chronic brain syndrome (senile dementia) detrimental to the performance of his judicial duties, of wilful and persistent failure to perform such duties, and that his disability was (or was likely to become) permanent, the commission recommended that he be retired or removed from office.

On the justice's petition to the Supreme Court for writ of review, the duly selected tribunal, holding that specific instances of bizarre behavior on the justice's part were not wilful but merely symptomatic of senility, rejected the commission's alternative recommendation of removal from office, and, upholding the commission's finding of chronic brain syndrome, ordered that he be immediately retired and that such retirement be deemed voluntary. The tribunal held that, because its creation under the new constitutional provision constituted a change of procedure, not of substantive law, the justice's objection to its authority, as being an application of an ex post facto law, was without merit. Similarly the tribunal rejected the justice's objections that impeachment was the only constitutional way he could be removed from the court, and held that, because the instant proceeding was neither a criminal prosecution nor a proceeding that existed at common law or one for which a trial by jury was statutorily provided, he was not entitled to such a trial. Furthermore, the proper standard of proof in the special proceeding was not proof beyond a reasonable doubt, as contended by the justice, but proof by clear and convincing evidence sufficient to sustain a charge to a reasonable certainty. Other objections rejected by the tribunal related to the inclusion of two nonlawyers on the Commission for Judicial Performance, to the justice's alleged preclusion by Cal. Rules of Court, rule 906, from moving to dismiss the proceeding for lack of jurisdiction, and to other matters upon which the justice's contentions were held to be unsupported by the record or irrelevant. (Special Tribunal (Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (e)).

HEADNOTES

Classified to California Digest of Official Reports

(1) Constitutional Law § 4--Operation and Effect--Introduction of Tribunal to Review and Determine Recommendation of Commission on Judicial Performance-- As Procedural Change.
The 1976 amendment to Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (e), providing that a recommendation of the Commission on Judicial Performance for the censure, removal, or retirement of a judge of the Supreme Court shall be determined by a tribunal of seven Court of Appeal judges selected by lot, constituted a change of procedure, not of substantive law. The application, therefore, of such constitutional provision to a pending proceeding inquiring into the mental fitness of an associate justice of the Supreme Court to continue in office did not constitute an application of an ex post facto law (U.S. Const., art. I, § 9, cl. 3, and § 10; Cal. Const., art. I, § 9).

(2) Judges § 6--Removal--Special Proceeding as Constitutional Alternative to Impeachment.
Though judges of state courts are subject to impeachment for misconduct in office (Cal. Const., art. IV, § 18, subd. (b); Gov. Code, § 3020), a constitutional alternative to the impeachment process was made available by the adoption of Cal. Const., art. VI, §§ 8, 18, specifying reasons for which the Supreme Court, on recommendation by the Commission on Judicial Performance, is expressly empowered to suspend, retire, censure, or remove a judge.

[See Cal.Jur.2d, Judges, § 24; Am.Jur.2d, Judges, § 17 et seq.]

(3) Judges § 6--Removal--Noncriminal Nature of Special Proceeding--Jury Trial Inapplicable.
The special proceeding to determine a recommendation by the Commission on Judicial Performance to retire, censure, or remove a judge (Cal. Const., art. VI, §§ 8, 18) is not a criminal prosecution in which the ordinary criminal procedural safeguards apply, and is therefore not a proceeding in which the judge is entitled to a trial by jury under U.S. Const., art. III, § 2, cl.

3, and the Sixth and Seventh Amendments or Cal. Const., art. I, § 16.

(4) Judges § 6--Removal--Special Proceeding as Not Constituting Civil Action--Jury Trial Inapplicable.
No statute provides for trial by jury in a special proceeding to determine a recommendation by the Commission on Judicial Performance to retire, censure, or remove a judge (Cal. Const., art. VI, §§ 8, 18), and such a proceeding did not exist at common law. Because, therefore, the right to trial by jury in civil actions or proceedings is the right as it existed at common law at the time the federal and California Constitutions were adopted, an associate justice of the Supreme Court, whose mental unfitness to continue in office was determined in such a proceeding, was not entitled to trial by jury as provided for civil actions.

(5) Judges § 6--Removal--Special Proceeding--Standard of Proof.
In a special proceeding under Cal. Const., art. VI, § 8, and § 18, subd. (e), as implemented by Cal. Rules of Court, rule 921, to inquire into and determine the mental and physical fitness of an associate justice of the Supreme Court to continue in office, due process and equal protection of the law did not require a standard of proof beyond a reasonable doubt, where he was neither charged with a crime nor threatened by confinement in a state mental institution. The proper standard of proof was by clear and convincing evidence sufficient to sustain a charge to a reasonable certainty.

(6) Judges § 6--Removal--Special Proceeding--Inclusion of Non-lawyers in Commission on Judicial Performance.
In a special proceeding under Cal. Const., art. VI, § 8 and § 18, subd. (e), as implemented by Cal. Rules of Court, rule 921, to inquire into and determine the mental fitness of an associate justice of the Supreme Court to continue in office, the justice, in the initial investigation and hearing by the Commission on Judicial Performance, had no constitutional right to be judged by judges who were lawyers, and the fact that two of the nine members of the commission were neither judges nor lawyers was immaterial. In any event, the commission's recommendations were subject to ultimate determination by a tribunal of seven appellate court justices based on its independent review of the evidence.

(7a, 7b) Judges § 6--Removal--Special Proceeding--Objection to Jurisdiction--Procedural Due Process.
An objection to jurisdiction, if based on lack of jurisdiction of the subject matter, can be made at any time. Thus, in an investigation and hearing by the Commission on Judicial Performance (Cal. Const., art. VI, §§ 8, 18, subd. (e)), on the question of the mental fitness of an associate justice of the Supreme Court to continue in office, the fact that Cal. Rules of Court, rule 906, relative to such proceeding, provided that "The notice of formal proceedings and answer shall constitute all the pleadings" and that "no motion or demurrer shall be filed against any of the pleadings" did not preclude the justice from moving to dismiss the proceeding for lack of jurisdiction, and he was not denied procedural due process where, after proper notice of the proceeding, he did in fact object to the commission's jurisdiction, and where he was given a complete hearing on the charges with full opportunity to question any alleged fact.

(8) Judges § 6--Removal--Special Proceeding--Objections to Notice of Proceeding.
With respect to investigations and hearings by the Commission on Judicial Performance involving recommendations for the censure, removal, or retirement of judges (Cal. Const., art. VI, §§ 8, 18), the apparent purpose of Cal. Rules of Court, rule 906, in providing that "The notice of formal proceedings and answer shall constitute all the pleadings" and that "no motion or demurrer shall be filed against any of the pleadings" is to require the respondent-judge to state his objections in his answer to the notice.

(9) Judges § 6--Removal--Special Proceeding--Retirement as Appropriate Disposition--Disability of Associate Justice of the Supreme Court.
On evidence that an 82-year-old associate justice of the Supreme Court, who had been on that court for 20 of his 50 years as a judge, was suffering from chronic brain syndrome (senile dementia) detrimental to the performance of his official duties, that the disability was (or was likely to become) permanent, and of specific instances of bizarre behavior on his part that, if viewed in isolation rather than as a symptom of senility, would have supported his removal from office for wilful misconduct prejudicial to the administration of justice, the appropriate disposition of his case, at the conclusion of a special proceeding under Cal. Const., art. VI, §§ 8, 18, subd. (e), as implemented by Cal. Rules of Court, rule 921, was to order his immediate retirement from the court (Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (c)(1)), and that he should be considered to have retired voluntarily (Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (d)).

THE TRIBUNAL. [FN*]

FN* Before Taylor, J., Tribunal P. J., Tamura, J., Stephens, J., Thompson, J., Caldecott, J., Paras, J., and McDaniel, J.

The Commission on Judicial Performance (hereafter the Commission) has recommended the retirement or removal of Associate Justice Marshall F. McComb from the California Supreme Court (see Cal. Const., art. VI, §§ 8 and 18; Cal. Rules of Court, rules 901-922). The Commission's recommendation that the 82-year-old justice by retired is based on its findings and conclusions that he is suffering from a disability that seriously interferes with the performance of his judicial duties and that the disability is, or is likely to become, permanent (Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (c)(1)). The Commission's recommendation that Justice McComb be removed is based on its findings and conclusions that he has wilfully and persistently failed to perform his judicial duties, and has engaged in conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice and conduct which brings the judicial office into disrepute (Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (c)(2), before amend. eff. Nov. 2, 1976). [FN1]

FN1 While this matter was pending before the special masters for hearing in October and November 1976, the California electorate approved Proposition 7 at the general election on November 2, 1976, and thereby amended, as of that date, sections 8 and 18 of article VI of the state Constitution, as follows (deleted provisions are printed in type and new provisions are printed in italic type):

" SEC. 8. The Commission on Judicial Performance consists of 2 judges of courts of appeal, 2 judges of superior courts, and one judge of a municipal court, each appointed by the Supreme Court; 2 members of the State Bar who have practiced law in this State for 10 years, appointed by its governing body; and 2 citizens who are not judges, retired judges, or members of the State Bar, appointed by the Governor and approved by the Senate, a majority of the membership concurring. All terms are 4 years.

"Commission membership terminates if a member ceases to hold the position that qualified the member for appointment. A vacancy shall be filled by the appointing power for the remainder of the term.

" SEC. 18. (a) A judge is disqualified from acting as a judge, without loss of salary, while there is pending (1) an indictment or an information charging the judge in the United States with a crime punishable as a felony under California or federal law, or (2) a recommendation to the Supreme Court by the Commission on Judicial Performance for removal or retirement of the judge.

"(b) On recommendation of the Commission on Judicial Performance or on its own motion, the Supreme Court may suspend a judge from office without salary when in the United States the judge pleads guilty or no contest or is found guilty of a crime punishable as a felony under California or federal law or of any other crime that involves moral turpitude under that law. If the conviction is reversed, suspension terminates, and the judge shall be paid the salary for the judicial office held by the judge for the period of suspension. If the judge is suspended and the conviction becomes final the Supreme Court shall remove the judge from office.

"(c) On recommendation of the Commission on Judicial Performance the Supreme Court may (1) retire a judge for disability that seriously interferes with the performance of the judge's duties and is or is likely to become permanent, and (2) censure or remove a judge for action occurring not more than 6 years prior to the commencement of the judge's current term that constitutes wilful misconduct in office, persistent failure or inability to perform the judge's duties, habitual intemperance in the use of intoxicants or drugs, or conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute. The commission may privately admonish a judge found to have engaged in an improper action or a dereliction of duty, subject to review in the Supreme Court in the manner provided for review of causes decided by a court of appeal.

"(d) A judge retired by the Supreme Court shall be considered to have retired voluntarily. A judge removed by the Supreme Court is ineligible for judicial office and pending further order of the court is suspended from practicing law in this State. "(e) A recommendation of the Commission on Judicial Performance for the censure, removal or retirement of a judge of the Supreme Court shall be determined by a tribunal of 7 court of appeal judges selected by lot.

"(f) The Judicial Council shall make rules implementing this section and providing for confidentiality of proceedings."

Having undertaken an independent evaluation of the evidence, we concur in the Commission's finding that Justice McComb is suffering from a disability (chronic brain syndrome, senile dementia) that seriously interferes with the performance of his judicial duties and that the disability is, or is likely to become, permanent. We conclude also that the Commission's findings of wilful and persistent failure to perform judicial duties are not supported by the record and that no cause for discipline exists through conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice which brings the judicial office into disrepute. Accordingly, we order the retirement of Associate Justice Marshall F. McComb from the Supreme Court of the State of California.

(1) Justice McComb petitioned the Supreme Court for a writ of review, which was granted, and he has petitioned that court to reject or modify the Commission's recommendations (Cal. Rules of Court, rule 919(b)). Pursuant to article VI, section 18, subdivision (e), of the state Constitution, as amended on November 2, 1976, seven California Court of Appeal justices were selected by lot to constitute a tribunal to review the Commission's recommendations and to determine the matter. [FN2] Petitioner has filed an objection to this tribunal's authority to make such determination, contending that section 18, subdivision (e) and the court rule implementing that section (rule 921), as to him, violate the federal and state prohibitions against ex post facto laws (U.S. Const., art. I, § 9, cl. 3, and § 10; Cal. Const., art. I, § 9). The objection, however, is without merit because section 18, subdivision (e) is merely a procedural change, as distinguished from a change of substantive law which adversely affects petitioner's rights and thus it is not an ex post facto law as applied to petitioner (see, generally, Beazell v. Ohio (1925) 269 U.S. 167 [ 70 L.Ed. 216, 46 S.Ct. 68]; Duncan v. Missouri (1894) 152 U.S. 377 [ 38 L.Ed. 485, 14 S.Ct. 570]; cf. Keiser v. Bell (E.D.Pa. 1971) 332 F.Supp. 608, 620-624).

FN2 Listed in alphabetical order, the seven Court of Appeal justices so selected are: Presiding Justice Thomas W. Caldecott, First Appellate District, Division Four (San Francisco); Associate Justice F. Douglas McDaniel, Fourth Appellate District, Division Two (San Bernardino); Associate Justice George E. Paras, Third Appellate District (Sacramento); Associate Justice Clarke E. Stephens, Second Appellate District, Division Five (Los Angeles); Associate Justice Stephen K. Tamura, Fourth Appellate District, Division Two (San Bernardino); Presiding Justice Wakefield Taylor, First Appellate District, Division Two (San Francisco); Associate Justice Robert S. Thompson, Second Appellate District, Division One (Los Angeles).

(2) Petitioner has maintained throughout this proceeding that impeachment is the only constitutional way he, as a duly elected justice, [FN3] may be removed from the court. Although judges of state courts are subject to impeachment for misconduct in office (Cal. Const., art. IV, § 18, subd. (b); Gov. Code, § 3020), impeachment is not the only procedure for removing a judge from a court. By adoption of article VI, sections 8 and 18 of the state Constitution, the people of this state have expressly empowered the Supreme Court, on recommendation by the Commission, to suspend, retire, censure, or remove a judge for the reasons stated in section 18 (see fn. 1, ante). This procedure is a constitutional alternative to the impeachment process (see Geiler v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications (1973) 10 Cal.3d 270, 282 [ 110 Cal.Rptr. 201, 515 P.2d 1], cert. den. 417 U.S. 932 [ 41 L.Ed.2d 235, 94 S.Ct. 2643]; cf. In re Kelly (Fla. 1970) 238 So.2d 565, 568-569, cert. den. 401 U.S. 962 [ 28 L.Ed.2d 246, 91 S.Ct. 970]; Cusack v. Howlett (1969) 44 I11.2d 233 [ 254 N.E.2d 506]; In re Terry (1975) 262 Ind. 667 [ 323 N.E.2d 192], rehg. den. 329 N.E.2d 38, cert. den. 423 U.S. 867 [ 46 L.Ed.2d 97, 96 S.Ct. 129]; In re Inquiry Relating to Rome (1975) 218 Kan. 198 [ 542 P.2d 676]; In re Haggerty (1970) 257 La. 1 [ 241 So.2d 469];

FN3 Petitioner has been a judge on the courts of this state for nearly 50 years. He was appointed to the Supreme Court in 1956, and the electorate later approved a 12-year term on the court commencing in January 1967.

(3) Petitioner attacks the validity of this proceeding on broad constitutional grounds involving the alleged denial of due process and equal protection of the laws. His basic premise is that this proceeding is a "criminal prosecution" in which he is entitled to the same constitutional rights, privileges and immunities afforded defendants in criminal cases, particularly the right to trial by jury, the right to be presumed innocent until proven guilty beyond a reasonable doubt, the right to be judged by judges who are lawyers, and protection from ex post facto laws and bills of attainder.

In contending that this proceeding is a criminal prosecution, petitioner relies on Penal Code section 15, which was enacted in 1872, and defines a crime or public offense as "an act committed or omitted in violation of a law forbidding or commanding it, and to which is annexed, upon conviction, either of the following punishments: "1. Death: [¶] 2. Imprisonment; [¶] 3. Fine; [¶] 4. Removal from office; or, [¶] 5. Disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit in this State." (Italics added.) Citing this statute and cases that involved the removal of public officers from office pursuant to former Penal Code sections 758-771 (now Gov. Code, §§ 3060- 3073), [FN4] petitioner argues that since the Commission has recommended his removal from the court, he is being punished for an unlawful act, and therefore this proceeding is a criminal prosecution.

FN4 These statutes provide for removal of certain public officers by a procedure other than impeachment. It begins with a grand jury accusation (Gov. Code, § 3060) and is conducted as a criminal proceeding, including the right to trial by jury (Gov. Code, § 3070). Presumably, it was in light of this procedure for removal of public officers from office that the Legislature included removal from office in its definition of a crime or public offense (Pen. Code, § 15).

A criminal action is a proceeding in which a person charged with a public offense is accused and brought to trial and punishment (Pen. Code, § 683). In the instant proceeding, petitioner is not charged with unlawful acts which constitute criminal offenses. Nor is the proceeding designed to convict petitioner of a crime or to punish him for criminal acts. Rather, this proceeding is limited to an inquiry and determination whether petitioner is physically and mentally capable of performing his judicial duties, or whether he has wilfully and persistently failed to perform those duties, or whether he has engaged in conduct prejudicial to the court and the administration of justice. These grounds for retirement or removal of a judge do not require proof of criminal misconduct. The ultimate objective is to protect the judicial system and the public which it serves from judges who are unfit to hold office. Accordingly, we hold that a proceeding to retire, censure, or remove a judge pursuant to article VI, sections 8 and 18 of the state Constitution, is not a criminal prosecution in which the ordinary criminal procedural safeguards apply (cf. In re Kelly, supra, 238 So.2d 565, 569; In re Inquiry Relating to Rome, supra, 218 Kan. 198; In re Haggerty, supra, 257 La. 1; In re Diener and Broccolino, supra, 268 Md. 659; In the Matter of Mikesell (1976) 396 Mich. 517 [ 243 N.W.2d 86, 90-91]; In re Crutchfield (1975) 289 N.C. 597 [ 223 S.E.2d 822, 825]; Sharpe v. State ex rel. Oklahoma Bar Association (Ct. on the Judiciary of Okla. 1968) 448 P.2d 301, cert. den. 394 U.S. 904 [ 22 L.Ed.2d 216, 89 S.Ct. 1011]; Keiser v. Bell, supra, 332 F.Supp. 608, 616-617). [FN5]

FN5 This proceeding is analogous to a State Bar disciplinary proceeding which is not a criminal action (see Prime v. State Bar (1941) 18 Cal.2d 56, 62 [ 112 P.2d 881]; Emslie v. State Bar (1974) 11 Cal.3d 210, 224 [ 113 Cal.Rptr. 175, 520 P.2d 911]. Proceedings before the State Bar are sui generis, neither civil nor criminal in character, and the ordinary criminal procedural safeguards do not apply (Yokozeki v. State Bar (1974) 11 Cal.3d 436, 447 [ 113 Cal.Rptr. 602, 521 P.2d 858]; Emslie v. State Bar, supra, 11 Cal.3d at pp. 225-226). The purpose of the State Bar disciplinary proceeding is not to punish the individual attorney, or determine whether the attorney is guilty of a crime, but to determine whether the attorney should be allowed to continue the practice of law. The principal objective of the proceeding is to protect the courts, the legal profession, and the public from persons unfit to practice law (In re Vaughan (1922) 189 Cal. 491, 495-496 [ 209 P. 353, 24 A.L.R. 858]; In re Rothrock (1940) 16 Cal.2d 449, 454 [ 106 P.2d 907, 131 A.L.R. 226]; Best v. State Bar (1962) 57 Cal.2d 633, 637 [ 21 Cal.Rptr. 589, 371 P.2d 325]; Zitny v. State Bar (1966) 64 Cal.2d 787, 790-791 [ 51 Cal.Rptr. 825, 415 P.2d 521], fn. 1; Black v. State Bar (1972) 7 Cal.3d 676, 686 [ 103 Cal.Rptr. 288, 499 P.2d 968]; Emslie v. State Bar, supra, 11 Cal.3d, p. 225; Wong v. State Bar (1975) 15 Cal.3d 528, 531 [ 125 Cal.Rptr. 482, 542 P.2d 642]; Segretti v. State Bar (1976) 15 Cal.3d 878, 886 [ 126 Cal.Rptr. 793, 544 P.2d 929]). Thus, an attorney who is the subject of a State Bar disciplinary proceeding does not have a right to a jury trial (Johnson v. State Bar (1935) 4 Cal.2d 744, 758 [ 52 P.2d 928]; In re Wharton (1896) 114 Cal. 367, 370 [ 46 P. 172]), and the standard of proof is clear and convincing evidence sufficient to sustain a charge to a reasonable certainty (Medoff v. State Bar (1969) 71 Cal.2d 535, 550 [ 78 Cal.Rptr. 696, 455 P.2d 800]).

Petitioner contends he was denied his constitutional right to a trial by jury (U.S. Const., art. III, § 2, cl. 3, and Amends. 6 and 7; Cal. Const., art. I, § 16). Because this is not a criminal action or proceeding, however, petitioner was not entitled to a jury trial as a defendant in a criminal prosecution (Sharpe v. State ex rel. Oklahoma Bar Association, supra, 448 P.2d 301; In re Inquiry Relating to Rome, supra, 218 Kan. 198; Keiser v. Bell, supra, 332 F.Supp. pp. 616-617). (4) The right to a trial by jury in civil actions or proceedings is the right as it existed at common law at the time the Constitutions were adopted (People v. One 1941 Chevrolet Coupe (1951) 37 Cal.2d 283, 286-287 [ 231 P.2d 832]; Cline v. Superior Court (1920) 184 Cal. 331, 339 [ 193 P. 929]; In re Inquiry Relating to Rome, supra). Because this special proceeding did not exist at common law, and no statute provides for trial by jury in this proceeding, petitioner was not entitled to a jury trial.

(5) Petitioner contends that he was improperly denied the presumption of innocence and the standard of proof beyond a reasonable doubt (Pen. Code, § 1096). He argues that if due process of law and equal protection of the law require a standard of proof beyond a reasonable doubt in a juvenile court proceeding (In re Winship (1970) 397 U.S. 358 [ 25 L.Ed.2d 368, 90 S.Ct. 1068]) and in a proceeding to determine whether a person is a mentally disordered sex offender (People v. Burnick (1975) 14 Cal.3d 306 [ 121 Cal.Rptr. 488, 535 P.2d 352]), due process and equal protection of the law require a standard of proof beyond a reasonable doubt in this proceeding. Although the juvenile court proceeding is not considered a criminal proceeding, the standard of proof beyond a reasonable doubt applies where, pursuant to section 602 of the Welfare and Institutions Code, the issue is whether the juvenile has committed an act which would be a crime if he were prosecuted as an adult. In mentally disordered sex offender proceedings (Welf. & Inst. Code, § 6300 et seq.), proof beyond a reasonable doubt is required because of possible indeterminate confinement in a prison-like state mental institution. In this proceeding, as previously discussed, petitioner is not charged with the commission of a crime. Nor is he threatened by confinement in a state mental institution. Accordingly, due process and equal protection of the law do not require proof beyond a reasonable doubt in this proceeding. The proper standard is proof by clear and convincing evidence sufficient to sustain a charge to a reasonable certainty (Geiler v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications, supra, 10 Cal.3d, p. 275).

(6) Petitioner contends that since the Commission includes two citizens who are not judges or lawyers who are members of the State Bar (Cal. Const., art. VI, § 8), he was denied his constitutional right to be "judged by judges who are lawyers." He cites Gordon v. Justice Court (1974) 12 Cal.3d 323 [ 115 Cal.Rptr. 632, 525 P.2d 72, 71 A.L.R.3d 551], cert. den. 420 U.S.

938 [ 43 L.Ed.2d 415, 95 S.Ct. 1148], which held that in criminal cases in which the defendant is charged with an offense carrying a possible jail sentence, the use of a nonattorney judge is a violation of due process of law unless the defendant consents thereto. He also relies on Colten v. Kentucky (1972) 407 U.S. 104 [ 32 L.Ed.2d 584, 92 S.Ct. 1953], North v. Russell (1976) 427 U.S. 328 [ 49 L.Ed.2d 534, 96 S.Ct. 2709], and Ludwig v. Massachusetts (1976) 427 U.S. 618 [ 49 L.Ed.2d 732, 96 S.Ct. 2781]. Again, petitioner's argument is based on the premise that the investigation and hearing conducted by the Commission was a criminal proceeding. The Commission, however, is not a court. It can render no judgment, civil or criminal, and thus could not "convict" petitioner of a criminal offense. Moreover, the ultimate decision in this proceeding must be made by this tribunal, based on its independent review of the evidence (Geiler v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications, supra, 10 Cal.3d, p. 276). Accordingly, the presence of two nonlawyer citizens on the Commission did not deprive petitioner of due process or equal protection of the law.

(7a) Petitioner contends that California Rules of Court, rule 906, which precluded him from filing a motion or demurrer against the notice of formal proceedings, resulted in a denial of procedural due process and equal protection of the law. He argues that rule 906: (1) precluded him from objecting to the Commission's jurisdiction of his person and the subject matter and the sufficiency of the facts alleged in the notice; [FN6] and (2) rule 906 does not encompass procedures allowed an attorney in a State Bar disciplinary proceeding. (8) The apparent purpose of rule 906 is to require the respondent-judge to state his objections in his answer to the notice of formal proceedings (cf. Rules Proc. of State Bar, rule 15.10 [3B West's Ann. Bus. & Prof. Code (1974 ed. 1977 cum.supp.) foll. § 6087 (as amended Jan. 1, 1976); Deering's Cal. Codes Ann. Rules (1976 ed.) p. 658]). (7b) The rule, however, did not preclude petitioner from moving to dismiss the proceeding for lack of jurisdiction since that objection, if based on lack of jurisdiction of the subject matter, can be made at any time. Petitioner in fact objected to the Commission's jurisdiction, and thus he was not prejudiced by the lack of a rule providing for objection to the Commission's jurisdiction. Because petitioner was given proper notice of the proceeding and a complete hearing on the charges, with full opportunity to question any alleged fact, he was not denied procedural due process (cf. In re Robson (Alaska 1972) 500 P.2d 657, 661).

> FN6 Rule 905 provides for a written notice of formal proceedings which must specify the charges against the judge and the facts on which the charges are based. Rule 906 provides that the notice of formal proceedings and answer shall constitute all the pleadings, and "no motion or demurrer shall be filed against any of the pleadings."

Petitioner has made the following additional contentions which we have reviewed, find to be unsupported by the record, irrelevant or without merit, and warrant no further discussion:

(1) The Commission's denial of petitioner's motion to refer the matter back to the special masters for the taking of additional evidence pertaining to the sponsorship and drafting of Proposition 7 (see fn. 1) resulted in a denial of his constitutional right to confront and cross-examine the witnesses against him.

(2) The Commission's findings that petitioner wilfully and persistently failed to perform his judicial duties constitute a usurpation of the Legislature's constitutional prerogative to define crimes, and thereby violate the doctrine of separation of powers.

(3) This proceeding is an unconstitutional invasion of the independence of the judiciary.

(4) This proceeding violates the rule of judicial immunity from prosecution.

(5) This proceeding violates petitioner's First Amendment rights "not to speak," "not to associate," and "not to express an opinion" in the performance of his judicial duties.

(6) The Commission's finding that petitioner wilfully and persistently failed to perform his duties is based on an unconstitutionally vague standard (cf. Keiser v. Bell, supra, 332 F.Supp., pp. 612-615; see also, Sarisohn v. Appellate Div., Second Dept., S.Ct. of St. of N. Y. (E.D.N.Y. 1967) 265 F.Supp. 455; Napolitano v. Ward (N.D.Ill. 1970) 317 F.Supp. 79, 83).

(7) Failure of the Commission to state its reasons for its decisions constituted a denial of due process (see, generally, People v. Edwards (1976) 18 Cal.3d 796 [ 135 Cal.Rptr. 411, 557 P.2d 995]).

(8) Petitioner was denied his constitutional right to a trial by an unbiased tribunal.

(9) The retirement or removal of petitioner from the court because of senility constitutes cruel and unusual punishment in violation of the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments of the United States Constitution.

(9) Following the procedure and standard of review as set forth in Geiler v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications, supra, 10 Cal.3d, pages 275-276, and Spruance v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications (1975) 13 Cal.3d 778, 784-785 [ 119 Cal.Rptr. 841, 523 P.2d 1209], footnote 5, we have made an independent evaluation of the evidence presented to the special masters and the Commission, and we find clear and convincing evidence sufficient to sustain a charge "to a reasonable certainty," that petitioner is suffering from a disability which renders him unable to perform his judicial duties, and that the disability is, or is likely to become, permanent. [FN7]

FN7 We adopt the Commission's findings of fact as they relate to count Three of the notice of formal proceedings.

The record establishes specific instances of bizarre behavior by Justice McComb which, if viewed in isolation, would support discipline for conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice which brings the judicial office into disrepute. That conduct must be considered as symptomatic of the condition of chronic brain syndrome (senile dementia) which we find to exist. Balancing the gravity of the conduct against the reason for it and the public interest in an effective judiciary, we conclude that discipline in the form of removal from office or reprimand is not appropriate. The public interest is sufficiently served by the retirement of Justice McComb.

Similar factual analysis establishes that the Commission's findings of wilful misconduct on the part of Justice McComb are not supported by the evidence. The conduct in question was not wilful, but is symptomatic of senility. Accordingly, we disapprove the Commission's findings of wilful misconduct.

We conclude, therefore, that our constitutional responsibilities to maintain the integrity of the judicial system compel us to order the retirement of petitioner from the court (Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (c)(1)). [FN8] Petitioner shall be considered to have retired voluntarily (Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (d)). We hereby order the retirement of Associate Justice Marshall F. McComb from the Supreme Court of the State of California. This order is final forthwith.

FN8 Article VI, section 18, subdivision (c)(1) of the state Constitution was not changed by approval of Proposition 7 on November 2, 1976; therefore, it obviously is not an ex post facto law as applied to petitioner (see, generally, In re Valenzuela (1969) 275 Cal.App.2d 483, 486 [ 79 Cal.Rptr. 760]; cf. Matter of Heuermann (S.D. 1976) 240 N.W.2d 603, 607-608). Nor does the retirement of petitioner pursuant to section 18, subdivision (c)(1) constitute a bill of attainder (see, generally, Westmoreland v. Chapman (1968) 268 Cal.App.2d 1, 5 [ 74 Cal.Rptr. 363], and cases cited).

JERROLD L. WENGER, a Judge of the Justice Court, Petitioner,
v.
COMMISSION ON JUDICIAL PERFORMANCE, Respondent

S.F. 24135.

Supreme Court of California.

Jul 13, 1981.

SUMMARY

The Supreme Court ordered that a justice court judge be removed from office after the court sustained nine charges of wilful misconduct and one charge of prejudicial conduct. The court held the number of wrongful acts was relevant to determining whether they were merely isolated occurrences or, instead, part of a course of conduct establishing lack of temperament and ability to perform judicial functions in an evenhanded manner. The court held the record established that the judge, instead of honoring peremptory disqualifications of himself, intruded into matters that had become another judge's responsibility and denounced the disqualification as an affront, that he groundlessly pried into counsel's advice or attempted to sway counsel from representing a party when annoyed by the party's conduct, that he interfered with law practice by threatening or purporting to exclude attorneys from his courtroom or sentencing an attorney to jail for appropriate advice to the client, that he overstepped limits on his power to resolve civil disputes by attempting to punish nonobedience to his informal directions as a contempt and unilaterally investigating facts, and that he disregarded or violated contempt procedural rules. The court held the aim of proceedings by the Commission on Judicial Performance is not punishment but protection of the judicial system and the public which it serves from judges who are unfit to hold office, and that faithfulness to that aim required the judge's removal. (Opinion by The Court.)

HEADNOTES

Classified to California Digest of Official Reports

(1a, 1b) Judges § 6--Removal--Review.
On review of a recommendation of the Commission on Judicial Performance that a justice 616 court judge be removed, the Supreme Court must independently determine from an examination of the record which, if any, of the charges are supported by clear and convincing evidence. The court then decides whether to adopt, modify, or reject the recommendation of removal. The court generally gives weight to the findings and conclusions of both the commission and the master appointed to investigate the charges. However, where several acts the commission had treated as wilful misconduct were found by the master to constitute only prejudicial conduct, special weight was given to the master's resolution of fact issues that turned on the credibility of testimony in his presence, while deference was accorded to the commission's inferences and conclusions.

(2) Judges § 6--Removal--Grounds--Wilful Misconduct and Prejudicial Conduct.
Prejudicial conduct by a judge is deemed less grave than wilful misconduct even though it may on occasion justify removal. Wilful misconduct requires that the judge in a judicial capacity has acted in bad faith, that is, that he committed acts he knew or should have known to be beyond his power, for a purpose other than faithful discharge of judicial duties. Bad faith acts not committed in a judicial capacity amount to no more than prejudicial conduct. Prejudicial conduct must be conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute.

(3) Judges § 6--Removal--Grounds--Wilful Misconduct--Abuse of Contempt Power.
A justice court judge's initiation of contempt proceedings against an attorney who had disqualified the judge in a drunk driving case, for conduct the judge speculated to have occurred at the trial presided over by another judge, without contacting that judge or in any way ascertaining the actual facts, was an abuse of the contempt power and constituted wilful misconduct in office.

(4) Judges § 6--Removal--Grounds--Wilful Misconduct--Abuse of Contempt Power.
A justice court judge committed wilful misconduct by abusing his contempt power in a small claims proceeding in which he used the contempt power to enforce a supposed stipulation by defendant to pay damages, where, prior to any trial, he stated to defendant that the alternative to payment would be entry of judgment. The judge's policy of deferring entry of small claims 617 judgments against defendants who would comply voluntarily with an informal decision was inapplicable once defendant's attorney announced defendant's refusal to comply.

(5) Judges § 6--Removal--Grounds--Wilful Misconduct--Disqualification.
A justice court judge's refusal to disqualify himself in a contempt proceeding involving a party and attorney with whom the judge was personally embroiled was not misconduct, where the contempt charged was noncompliance with a direction to pay money, not disrespect to the court.

(6) Judges § 6--Removal--Grounds--Wilful Misconduct.
A justice court judge was guilty of wilful misconduct, where the judge suspected an attorney of a contemptuous act in connection with a client's failure to report to jail as ordered and interrogated the attorney to obtain evidence for a contempt proceeding against him without informing him of the purpose of the interrogation. If the attorney had known the purpose of the interrogation he could have invoked his privilege not to testify. The judge's attempt to take him unawares was an abuse of the judicial process.

(7) Judges § 6--Removal--Grounds--Prejudicial Conduct.
A justice court judge was guilty of prejudicial conduct where, in an action for unlawful detainer of a dwelling in which defendants alleged a breach of implied warranty of habitability, the judge undertook a collateral investigation of the condition of the premises and thereby abdicated his responsibility for deciding the parties' dispute on the pleadings and evidence properly brought before him.

(8) Judges § 6--Removal--Grounds--Wilful Misconduct.
It is not misconduct for a judge to initiate contempt proceedings after hearing a case in which properly presented evidence indicates probable deliberate falsity in a verified pleading.

(9) Judges § 6--Removal--Grounds--Rude and Profane Conduct.
A justice court judge was not guilty of rude and profane conduct in referring to a criminal defendant as a "puke" and a "psychopath," where the words were not uttered from the bench but in one-to-one conversation in chambers and on the telephone with defendant's attorneys. The effect differed little from a description of defendant as a "hoodlum" or an "unsavory character." 618

(10) Judges § 6--Removal--Grounds--Wilful Misconduct.
A justice court judge committed wilful misconduct in office by attempting to dissuade two attorneys from representing a criminal defendant on appeal from contempt proceedings before the judge by attacking defendant's criminal background and stating that if the attorneys remained in the case they could never again practice before the judge. A judge must be on his guard neither to infringe on a defendant's right to counsel of his choice nor to compromise the independence of the bar.

(11) Judges § 6--Removal--Grounds--Wilful Misconduct.
A justice court judge was guilty of wilful misconduct, where he attempted to use the contempt power to enforce an order entered by him in a case in which he had been disqualified, and where the judge assigned to hear the matter was present in the courtroom on the date of the hearing but was prevented by the disqualified judge from taking the bench. The judge also committed prejudicial conduct in continuing to preside and to decide contested issues in which a disqualification motion had been filed.

(12) Judges § 6--Removal--Grounds--Wilful Misconduct.
A justice court judge was guilty of wilful misconduct, where he backdated an affidavit in support of a hearing on contempt charges, where, though the motivation for the backdating was not clear, it was done deliberately and the judge knew or should have known that it would create a false impression that he had signed on the earlier date, and where, whatever the purpose, it was not a faithful discharge of judicial duties.

(13) Judges § 6--Removal--Grounds--Prejudicial Conduct.
A justice court judge's issuance of a no-bail arrest warrant against a person cited for traffic infractions, without the filing of a criminal complaint or initiation of a contempt proceeding, was prejudicial conduct.

(14) Judges § 6--Removal--Grounds--Wilful Misconduct.
A justice court judge did not wilfully abuse his contempt power by issuing an order finding an attorney in contempt for not appearing at an arraignment, where, though the attorney had filed a disqualification motion against the judge under Code Civ. Proc., § 170.6, there was merit to the judge's position that the disqualification did 619 not cover arraignments and the attorney should contest it by superior court writ proceedings.

(15) Judges § 6--Removal--Grounds--Wilful Misconduct--Abuse of Contempt Power.
A justice court judge was guilty of wilful misconduct in refusing to consider an attorney's request that his client be released on his own recognizance unless the attorney withdrew a disqualification motion filed against the judge, and then charged the attorney with contempt for violating his duty to his client resulting in the client's being denied a hearing and being incarcerated, where the denial of the hearing and subsequent incarceration resulted from the judge's refusal to honor the attorney's request that the matter be heard by another judge who was then present to preside at the hearing.

(16) Judges § 6--Removal--Grounds--Wilful Misconduct--Abuse of Contempt Power.
A justice court judge was guilty of wilful misconduct for abuse of the contempt power by finding an attorney in contempt and sentencing him to jail for inducing a client charged with a traffic violation to request a change of venue on the ground he could not obtain a fair trial, where the genuineness of the client's belief that the judge would not give him a fair trial was consistent with its being based wholly on information received from the attorney about the strained relations between the judge and the attorney, and where the judge knew or should have known that the attorney's advice to his client was proper.

(17) Judges § 6--Removal--Grounds--Wilful Misconduct--Excluding

Attorney From Courtroom.
A justice court judge committed wilful misconduct in excluding a deputy district attorney from his courtroom in order to prevent her from reporting his conduct to the Commission on Judicial Performance. While the judge claimed his principal concern was that she did not consult him before reporting, consultation was not required and its absence did not justify the ban from his court.

(18) Judges § 6--Removal--Grounds--Number of Wrongful Acts.
Removal was the proper discipline for a justice court judge found guilty of nine charges of wilful misconduct and one charge of prejudicial conduct. The number of wrongful acts is relevant to determining whether they were merely isolated occurrences or, instead, part of a course of conduct establishing lack of temperament and 620 ability to perform judicial functions in an evenhanded manner. The judge, instead of honoring peremptory disqualifications of himself, intruded into matters that had become another judge's responsibility and denounced the disqualification as an affront. When annoyed by a party's conduct, he groundlessly pried into counsel's advice or attempted to dissuade counsel from representing the party. He interfered with law practice by threatening or purporting to exclude attorneys from his courtroom or sentencing the attorney to jail for appropriate advice to the client. He overstepped limits on his power to resolve civil disputes by attempting to punish nonobedience to his informal directions as a contempt and by unilaterally investigating the facts. He also disregarded or violated contempt procedural rules. The aim of proceedings before the Commission on Judicial Performance is not punishment but to protect the judicial system and the public which it serves from judges who are unfit to hold office, and faithfulness to that aim required the judge's removal.

THE COURT [FN*]

FN* Before Bird, C.J., Tobriner, J., Mosk, J., Richardson, J., Newman, J., Kaufman, J.,<<dagger>> and McDaniel, J.<<dagger>>
<<dagger>> Assigned by the Chairperson of the Judicial Council.

The Commission on Judicial Performance unanimously recommends that Justice Court Judge Jerrold L. Wenger of the El Dorado Judicial District, El Dorado County, be removed for "wilful misconduct in office" (hereafter wilful misconduct) and "conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into 621 disrepute" (hereafter prejudicial conduct) (Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (c)). [FN1] The judge has petitioned this court for review. (Cal. Rules of Court, rule 919(b).)

FN1 Article VI, section 18, subdivision (c) provides in part: "On recommendation of the Commission on Judicial Performance the Supreme Court may (1) retire a judge for disability that seriously interferes with the performance of the judge's duties and is or is likely to become permanent, and (2) censure or remove a judge for action occurring not more than 6 years prior to the commencement of the judge's current term that constitutes wilful misconduct in office, persistent failure or inability to perform the judge's duties, habitual intemperance in the use of intoxicants or drugs, or conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute."

He was elected on March 4, 1975, took office on March 18, and was reelected for a six-year term beginning January 1977. The commission notified him in March 1978 and again in August that it had received and was investigating statements alleging his misconduct. (See rule 904.) In December 1978 he was served with a notice of formal proceedings (rule 905) that stated 24 charges of misconduct arising out of 13 incidents. In 1979 there were four amended notices, alleging five additional charges of misconduct in three incidents. The original notice was framed in two counts. The first alleged that all the charges constituted wilful misconduct; the second, that all constituted prejudicial conduct. The amended notices added a third count of persistent failure or inability to perform judicial duties.

From October 30 to December 4, 1979, 21 days of hearings were held before a master. [FN2] He made findings of fact and conclusions of law from the testimony and exhibits, without receiving closing briefs or hearing oral argument from counsel. Exceptions to his report were filed with the commission which, on February 28, 1980, heard oral argument. [FN3] It then filed here on March 19, 1980, its findings, conclusions, and recommendation of removal. 622

FN2 The master was Sacramento Superior Court Judge Rothwell Mason. Rule 907 provided for his appointment: "Upon the filing of an answer or upon expiration of the time for its filing, the Commission shall order a hearing to be held before it concerning the censure, removal, retirement or private admonishment of the judge, or the Commission may request the Supreme Court to appoint three special masters, or with the consent of the judge involved one special master, in the event that two-thirds of the membership of the Commission vote that this procedure be followed in a specified case, to hear and take evidence in the matter, and to report thereon to the Commission. Special masters shall be judges of courts of record, except that when there are three special masters not more than two of them may be retired judges from courts of record. The Commission shall set a time and place for hearing before itself or before the masters and shall give notice of the hearing by mail to the judge at least 20 days prior to the date set."

FN3 Before the master and commission, evidence and argument to sustain the charges were presented by two deputy attorneys general acting as examiners. (See rule 922(f).) Here the commission is represented by the Attorney General, acting through those deputies. (See Spruance v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications (1975) 13 Cal.3d 778, 785, fn. 5 [119 Cal.Rptr. 841, 523 P.2d 1209] (explaining commission's dual function as (1) adjudicator in reaching conclusions and recommendations, and (2) adversary in defending those determinations as respondent in this court).)

The master's and commission's findings and conclusions are based on count one (wilful misconduct) and count two (prejudicial conduct). Count three (persistent inability or failure to perform) was rejected by the master. The commission explained that the charges in that count "were not reached and are dismissed in view of the Conclusions arrived at in Counts One and Two."

We are concerned only with the charges the commission sustained. ( Spruance v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications, supra, 13 Cal.3d 778, 784, fn. 5.) They are 14 charges of wilful misconduct and 6 of prejudicial conduct, arising out of 11 incidents. Each was pleaded as an instance of one of five kinds of misconduct: (A) petitioner's improper injection of himself into judicial proceedings, resulting in denial or apparent denial of fair hearing, (B) abuse of contempt power, (C) rude and profane conduct, (D) his improper failure to disqualify himself, and (E) obstruction of a public officer's performance of duty.

(1a) This court must independently determine from an examination of the record which, if any, of the charges are supported by clear and convincing evidence. Thence we decide whether to adopt, modify, or reject the recommendation of removal. (Geiler v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications (1973) 10 Cal.3d 270, 276 [110 Cal.Rptr. 201, 515 P.2d 1].) Generally we give weight to the findings and conclusions of both commission and master. ( Spruance, 13 Cal.3d at p. 799, fn. 18.) Here, though, their views vary as to factual details and as to application to the facts of grounds for removal. (2)(See fn. 4.) For example, several acts the commission treated as wilful misconduct were found by the master to constitute only prejudicial conduct. [FN4] 623

> FN4 The distinction between the two grounds is elaborated in Geiler and Spruance: Prejudicial conduct is deemed less grave than wilful misconduct even though it may on occasion justify removal. ( Geiler, 10 Cal.3d at p. 284, fn. 11.) Wilful misconduct requires that the judge in a judicial capacity have acted in bad faith; i.e., that he (1) committed acts he knew or should have known to be beyond his power, (2) for a purpose other than faithful discharge of judicial duties. ( Geiler, 10 Cal.3d at pp. 283-284, 286; Spruance, 13 Cal.3d at pp. 795-796.) Bad faith acts not committed in a judicial capacity amount to no more than prejudicial conduct. ( Geiler, 10 Cal.3d at p. 284, fn. 11.) Prejudicial conduct must be "conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute." (Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (c); italics added.) The italicized words do not require notoriety, but only that the conduct be "damaging to the esteem for the judiciary held by members of the public who observed such conduct." (McCartney v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications (1974) 12 Cal.3d 512, 534 [116 Cal.Rptr. 260, 526 P.2d 268].)

(1b) In light of that variation we give special weight to the master's resolution of fact issues that turn on the credibility of testimony in his presence. (See Geiler, 10 Cal.3d at pp. 275-276.) Yet, even though the commission heard no testimony, its own expertise and unanimity, plus the fact that it and not the master heard posthearing argument, suggest that deference be accorded to its inferences and conclusions.

Petitioner's Background and Working Environment

Many of the charges sustained involve petitioner's failure to follow proper procedure; e.g., abusing the contempt power and failing to disqualify. His background and working environment are relevant to those charges, and he testified as follows:

After graduating from McGeorge Law School in 1969 he was admitted to practice in 1970. Before then he had been a Sacramento County probation officer. After admission and until his election to the justice court in March 1975 he was a deputy district attorney of El Dorado County. In July 1975 he attended the two- week judge's college sponsored by California Judicial Education and Research (CJER). Subsequently he attended most of CJER's twice-yearly seminar sessions.

His court was on a rural road six miles from the courthouse in Placerville. His in-chambers library contained little more than the third series of California Reports and Appellate Reports (beginning in Oct. 1969), annotated California codes, texts on criminal law and evidence, and several procedure manuals. The Placerville courthouse housed the county law library, two departments of the superior court (Judges Byrne and Fogerty), and the Placerville Justice Court (Judge Hamilton). The Georgetown-Divide Justice Court (Judge Smith) was an estimated 18 to 21 miles away over a "difficult road"; the other justice court was at South Lake Tahoe. As of January 1, 1977, "the jurisdiction of municipal and justice courts is the same and concurrent." (Code Civ. Proc., § 83.)

We turn to the wilful misconduct and prejudicial conduct charges sustained by the commission. They are discussed in connection with the 11 incidents whence they arose, now set forth in chronological order. 624

Renfro

In Renfro the commission concluded that petitioner committed wilful misconduct by abusing the contempt power and failing to disqualify himself. The master had concluded that both acts constituted prejudicial conduct; whether he found that the failure to disqualify also constituted wilful misconduct is unclear.

Attorney Stephen Keller represented Renfro on a drunk driving charge (Veh. Code, § 23102, subd. (a)). Trial was set for May 5, 1977. On April 29 Keller filed a motion for peremptory disqualification of petitioner (Code Civ. Proc., § 170.6). [FN5]

> FN5 A motion to disqualify a judge whose assignment is known 10 days before trial date must be filed at least 5 days before that date. (Code Civ. Proc., § 170.6, subd. (2).) "Peremptory" means that the motion results in disqualification "without any further act or proof." (Code Civ. Proc., § 170.6, subd. (3); see Solberg v. Superior Court (1977) 19 Cal.3d 182, 204, fn. 23 [137 Cal.Rptr. 460, 561 P.2d 1148].)

The jury trial then was assigned to Judge Hamilton in petitioner's court. Keller phoned Hamilton and said he had to appear that morning in another county and might be late for the trial. Hamilton said he would call the case and, if Keller were late, would decide what to do. Keller arrived at 10:30, and the case was tried.

While waiting for Keller, Hamilton discussed Keller's tardiness with petitioner, who expressed concern that Keller (1) had disqualified him, and (2) claimed an appearance in another county simply to get a continuance of the trial. Petitioner contends that the disqualification was motivated by his having denied Keller such a continuance. But Keller gave good reason for the disqualification: the undisputed fact that at pretrial conference petitioner expressed skepticism of Renfro's version of alcohol consumption in light of the blood report and indicated "the standard fine would be imposed in case of a plea, but if he tries this thing and I think he lied, it'll be a whole lot more." That Keller did request a continuance is supported only by petitioner's uncorroborated testimony; it is not reflected in the court docket. However, the master (but not the commission) found that when Keller informed Hamilton of his probable tardiness he "did not disclose that [petitioner] had refused a request for additional continuance."

Petitioner ascertained from the district attorney's office the circumstances of Keller's arrival at and conduct of the trial. Without 625 consulting Hamilton, petitioner on May 11 sent Keller a "Notice of Order to Show Cause Hearing" that purported to arise from a case in petitioner's court, "People v. Keller" (unnumbered), and announced a hearing on May 25 at 9 a.m. with no indication of the subject matter.

Petitioner concedes he issued that notice simply as a device to bring Keller in to discuss concerns about Renfro, namely Keller's (1) lack of candor about conflicting court appearances in relation to his need for a continuance, (2) failure to disclose petitioner's denial of the continuance request to Judge Hamilton, and (3) tardiness at the trial. The master (but not the commission) accepted petitioner's testimony that he tried to phone Keller before issuing the notice. Keller testified he phoned petitioner in response to the notice; petitioner denied that.

Keller on May 13 filed a motion to disqualify petitioner in People v. Keller (Code Civ. Proc., § 170.6). Petitioner replied by letter of May 17 that the motion "has been denied" and "a review of contempt procedures is suggested" for the noticed May 25 hearing. Keller, through counsel, on May 23 petitioned the superior court for a stay and writ of prohibition against the hearing. Judge Byrne issued a stay on May 23 and an alternative writ on May 25. Petitioner withdrew the order to show cause, and the writ matter was dismissed as moot.

Petitioner clearly abused the contempt process. That Judge Hamilton had power to treat misrepresentation to obtain a continuance or tardiness at trial as a direct contempt (In re Ciraolo (1969) 70 Cal.2d 389, 393 [74 Cal.Rptr. 865, 450 P.2d 241]; Arthur v. Superior Court (1965) 62 Cal.2d 404, 408-409 [42 Cal.Rptr. 441, 398 P.2d 777]; Vaughn v. Municipal Court (1967) 252 Cal.App.2d 348, 358 [60 Cal.Rptr. 575]) did not confer that power on petitioner. Nor is there evidence of any misrepresentation as to Keller's conflicting obligations in another court.

Both master and commission found that petitioner "was of the belief that his administrative responsibility for controlling the calendar of his court justified his intervention despite the assignment of a visiting judge for the trial." That belief did not justify misuse of the contempt power. (3) We adopt the commission's conclusion that petitioner's "initiation of contempt proceedings against Keller for conduct he speculated to have occurred at the trial presided over by Judge Hamilton, without contacting Judge Hamilton or in any way ascertaining the actual facts, was an abuse of the contempt power and constitutes wilful misconduct in office." 626

The commission also concluded that failure to disqualify constituted wilful misconduct in that it was "an act which he should have known was beyond his lawful jurisdiction." He testified he denied Keller's motion to disqualify on May 13 because he "concluded that the 170 and 170.6 did not apply to a direct contempt proceeding." In light of Blodgett v. Superior Court (1930) 210 Cal. 1, 9-15 [290 P. 293, 72 A.L.R. 482], which holds that a judge may not be disqualified under Code of Civil Procedure section 170 from summary contempt proceedings, we dismiss the charge of failure to disqualify.

Rose v. LePeilbet

Lillian Rose sued her neighbor Leroy LePeilbet for cutting branches of her tree that overhung his land. Petitioner awarded judgment for $45, plus costs, on November 7, 1977. On appeal the superior court ordered judgment for defendant.

The commission sustained three counts of wilful misconduct in a contempt proceeding on July 29, 1977, wherein LePeilbet and Braunstein, his attorney, were charged with refusal to pay the $45 in violation of what petitioner perceived as a stipulation in open court. The three counts sustained were (1) petitioner's improper injection of himself into the proceeding, resulting in denial of fair trial, (2) abuse of contempt power, and (3) failure to disqualify himself. The master had sustained only the first count, finding the acts it charged to be both wilful misconduct and prejudicial conduct. He found that the acts charged in the second count were prejudicial conduct and that the third was not proved.

Rose had filed her complaint on April 22, 1977. A judge other than petitioner issued a temporary restraining order against pruning the tree and an order to show cause. Hearing was held on May 20; the evidence of what happened at the hearing is unclear and disputed. Petitioner overruled LePeilbet's jurisdictional objection based on insufficiency of service. It was established that LePeilbet had completed the pruning before being served with the restraining order. The remaining issue was damages. LePeilbet through Braunstein apparently agreed that the case should be handled as a small-claims matter, authorizing the judge to make an independent investigation (Code Civ. Proc., § 117).

Petitioner understood that LePeilbet also agreed to pay whatever damages the court found, and minutes in the docket reflect that understanding. 627 ("Both attorneys agreed to let court appoint a disinterested third party to establish the extent of damage done to the tree. Defendant to pay for damage, if any. Both attorneys stipulated that case subject to reopening at future date if necessary.") LePeilbet and Braunstein, however, each denied admitting liability. Their position from the outset was that LePeilbet had a privilege to prune branches overhanging his land.

Petitioner wrote LePeilbet on June 3 that he had "reviewed the oak tree" with the county agricultural commissioner and concluded that LePeilbet's "self help" caused damage amounting to $45. "Proof of corrective measures must be received by this court by July 1 or this matter will be reopened and an adverse judgment will be rendered on behalf of plaintiff .... Once you have met your obligation [for the $45] ... and I have received proof of such, this matter will be concluded once and for all."

Braunstein's reply on June 15 contained these statements and others in similar vein: "I was shocked by your letter .... [T]he matter heard by you was an Order to Show Cause re Preliminary Injunction. It was not a trial of the facts .... Your statement that my client must take corrective measures on or before July 1st or face an adverse judgment without benefit of trial, smacks of Star- Chamber, a process I thought abolished in this country .... [S]ince you have pre-decided the case, I think you must disqualify yourself from hearing any further proceedings in the matter."

On June 20 petitioner gave notice of a hearing on July 1. Braunstein replied on June 28 that he would be outside California on July 1 and had jury trials set for July 11 and 18, and he requested that the hearing be held no earlier than July 20. Petitioner wrote back that "in view of your position" the hearing would not be continued.

Braunstein on June 22 had moved to disqualify petitioner (Code Civ. Proc., § 170.6). Rose's attorney, Appelbaum, filed an opposing memorandum on June 30, arguing that petitioner's overruling of Braunstein's jurisdictional objection at the May 20 hearing was a ruling on a contested issue that made the disqualification motion untimely.

Only Rose and Appelbaum appeared at the July 1 hearing. Petitioner denied the disqualification motion. He expressed anger at Braunstein's June 15 letter ("Star-Chamber"), which he read aloud. He suggested 628 that Appelbaum file appropriate affidavits if Rose wished to enforce the May 20 stipulation by contempt proceedings.

On July 7 petitioner issued a notice of "Order to Show Cause hearing regarding a contempt of court" to be held July 29. Declarations of Appelbaum and Rose were attached. The notice cited section 1209.5 of the Code of Civil Procedure but was intended to refer to section 1209, subdivision 5, which provides that disobedience of a court order is contempt. Petitioner regarded LePeilbet's noncompliance with the May 20 stipulation (interpreted as an admission of liability) as contempt under that provision even though no judgment had been entered. His policy in small claims matters was to defer formal judgment, thus relieving voluntarily complying defendants from unnecessary difficulties.

At the July 29 hearing Braunstein denied statements in the Appelbaum and Rose declarations that LePeilbet had agreed at the May 20 hearing to pay damages fixed by the court. Petitioner elicited testimony of the Appelbaum version from his bailiff and clerk, then called LePeilbet to the stand. Braunstein invoked LePeilbet's privilege against self-incrimination. To overcome that objection, petitioner withdrew the contempt charge against LePeilbet. He then asked LePeilbet whether Braunstein had advised him not to comply with petitioner's order (the June 3 letter). Braunstein interposed the attorney-client privilege. Petitioner ordered LePeilbet to answer and denied his request to confer with counsel. Braunstein continued to raise the privilege, and petitioner threatened both with contempt. LePeilbet then testified about Braunstein's advice and other aspects of the case.

Petitioner reprimanded Braunstein for failing to advise his client to pay the damages. The parties then entered into a written stipulation that "the matter is deemed submitted as a motion for summary judgment. Judgment shall not be entered in excess of $45." Though the commission found the stipulation to have been coerced, Braunstein was satisfied with it as a means of obtaining an appealable judgment.

Petitioner testified before the master that he overruled the attorney-client privilege because it "does not apply where advice to violate a law is concerned." He contends here that he relied on Evidence Code section 956 (no privilege if lawyer's services were obtained to aid commission of crime or fraud). The master asked if petitioner saw any distinction between advice to commit a crime and advice on legal tactics to test the sufficiency of a court order in pending litigation. (See In re 629 Berry (1968) 68 Cal.2d 137, 148-149 [65 Cal.Rptr. 273, 436 P.2d 273].) Petitioner answered that he "didn't feel there was any pending litigation, other than compliance with the agreement."

Appelbaum on October 7 wrote petitioner that, since no payment had been received, entry of judgment was requested. Petitioner scribbled on Appelbaum's letter: "If JB [Braunstein] wishes another encounter with the Court he need only disregard my instructions one more time." On October 21 petitioner wrote counsel that, since "Mr. Braunstein has failed to comprehend" petitioner's "preference for voluntary compliance in lieu of judgment," judgment was being rendered for plaintiff. From that judgment Braunstein took his successful appeal.

(4) Clear and convincing evidence supports the commission's conclusion that at the July 29 hearing petitioner (1) improperly injected himself into the proceeding, and (2) abused his contempt power. As he now concedes, contempt was not a proper remedy to enforce the supposed stipulation to pay damages. His June 3 letter to LePeilbet stated that the alternative to payment would be entry of a judgment. His policy of deferring entry of small-claims judgments against defendants who would comply voluntarily with an informal decision was inapplicable once Braunstein announced LePeilbet's refusal to comply. The policy then became a purported justification for attempting to deprive LePeilbet of the rights of a judgment debtor. Moreover, petitioner wrongfully assumed a prosecutorial role. ( McCartney v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications, supra, 12 Cal.3d 512, 533.)

Petitioner justifiably was angered by the intemperate language of the June 15 ("Star-Chamber") letter and properly might have taken remedial steps; e.g., by demanding an apology. It appears that instead he sought vindication through misuse of the contempt power. Thus we agree with the commission that petitioner's improper injection of himself into the proceeding and his abuse of the contempt power were wilful misconduct. (See fn. 4, ante.)

We agree with the master that the charge of failure to disqualify was not sustained. There was at least enough merit in Appelbaum's opposition to the June 22 motion to make its denial reasonable. The commission argues that petitioner should have disqualified himself once he had become personally embroiled. (5) Personal embroilment may require disqualification to adjudge contempt for disrespect to the court. (Mayberry v. Pennsylvania (1971) 400 U.S. 455 [27 L.Ed.2d 532, 91 S.Ct. 630 499]; In re Buckley (1973) 10 Cal.3d 237, 255-257 [110 Cal.Rptr. 121, 514 P.2d 1201, 68 A.L.R.3d 248].) But the contempt charged here was noncompliance with a direction to pay money, not disrespect; and the refusal to disqualify was not misconduct.

Lee

Petitioner sentenced Lee to spend the weekend of July 22-24, 1977, in jail. A few hours before Lee was supposed to surrender he retained Keller to obtain a stay of execution because of his girl friend's illness. After Keller unsuccessfully attempted to obtain a stay from petitioner and other judges he advised Lee to report to jail.

Lee did not do so and was ordered to appear in petitioner's court the following Wednesday. Keller accompanied him and went into chambers while Lee waited outside. Petitioner questioned Keller about his advice to Lee, particularly whether he had advised Lee not to appear. He questioned Lee on the same subject, found him in contempt, and sentenced him to five days in jail, to commence immediately. After sentencing, petitioner told Keller that if he thought Keller had played any role in Lee's not reporting for jail he would have held Keller in contempt. [FN6]

> FN6 According to Keller, petitioner said he would have sentenced Keller to jail on the spot. Petitioner testified he told Keller that probably he would have held him in contempt, but had in mind only to initiate contempt proceedings.

While being questioned about his advice to Lee, Keller had no idea that petitioner was considering contempt proceedings. Petitioner made the inquiry because "Mr. Keller had manifest[ed] his inclination in the Renfro matter to manipulate and lie and it was my opinion that he was again manifesting these inclinations." (Letter to commission, Sept. 21, 1978.) Petitioner testified that in Renfro he thought Keller had lied to the superior court when he said in his declaration that he had Judge Hamilton's permission to be late for the trial. Petitioner admitted never having asked Hamilton whether that was true.

The commission concluded that petitioner's actions "manifest a disregard of a suspect's rights in contempt proceedings and constitutes wilful misconduct in office." The master had declined to find misconduct in the "mere threat to consider contempt as against Keller."

(6) The evidence shows more than a "threat to consider" contempt. Petitioner now argues that Keller's advice to Lee was relevant to Lee's 631 culpability. Nonetheless the inquiry was aimed principally at Keller, not Lee. Petitioner suspected Keller of a contemptuous act and interrogated him to obtain evidence for a contempt proceeding. If Keller had known the purpose of the interrogation he could have invoked his privilege not to testify. (See In re Martin (1977) 71 Cal.App.3d 472, 480 [139 Cal.Rptr. 451].) To attempt to take him unawares was an abuse of the judicial process. We agree with the commission that it constituted wilful misconduct.

Hill v. Martin

On September 30, 1977, Hill sued the Martins in petitioner's court for unlawful detainer of a dwelling. On October 5 the Martins, represented by Appelbaum, filed an answer setting up breach of implied warranty of habitability and enumerating serious defects in the premises. Petitioner reviewed the answer, thought it incredible that anyone would live in a house under the conditions alleged, suspected perjury, and without consulting the parties made inquiries of the county building and health departments.

On October 21 petitioner received a copy of a letter to Hill from a county building inspector listing repairs required on pain of an order to vacate. Those repairs corresponded to some but not all defects alleged in the answer. Petitioner made notes of a call received from a health department employee on October 24. The employee said the house was "not substandard by any stretch of the imagination" but, except to report "water good" and "septic OK," did not expressly contradict the alleged defects.

At a pretrial conference on October 28 petitioner announced his investigation, declared his suspicion that the Martins' allegations were false, and indicated he might hold a hearing on whether they were in contempt. He said that because of the investigation he would disqualify himself from the trial of the merits. That trial was set for November 18.

Later on October 28 he wrote to the building department, enclosing a copy of the Martin answer and requesting "in order to determine whether or not perjury has been committed that one of your inspectors examine this house using the allegations in the answer as special points to check." He asked for a report by November 18. The county replied on November 3 that the building was vacant and would be posted as 632 hazardous. Petitioner then abandoned the inquiry and telephoned Appelbaum to apologize. On Hill's motion the case was dismissed. [FN7]

> FN7 Both commission and master found that petitioner was less than forthright in describing this incident in correspondence with the commission. We discern no fraudulent intent in these admitted misstatements in his letter of September 21, 1978: (1) He did not inquire of the county until after the pretrial conference. (The inquiry preceded the conference.) (2) The building department's letters sent to petitioner support the conclusion that Martin attempted deception in the verified answer. (The letters were attached to petitioner's letter as exhibits and spoke for themselves.)

The commission found that petitioner "should have known that it was beyond his lawful authority to conduct an ex parte investigation into allegations of civil pleadings and attempt to transform an ordinary civil case into a contempt proceeding based upon [petitioner's] distorted view that perjury had been committed." It and the master both sustained charges that petitioner committed prejudicial conduct (but not wilful misconduct) by improperly injecting himself into the proceeding and abusing the contempt power.

(7) We agree with the finding that petitioner was guilty of prejudicial conduct. By undertaking a collateral investigation he abdicated his responsibility for deciding the parties' dispute on pleadings and evidence properly brought before him. However, we sustain only the charge of improperly injecting himself into a proceeding and not the charge of abusing the contempt power. (8)

It is not misconduct for a judge to initiate contempt proceedings after hearing a case in which properly presented evidence indicated probably deliberate falsity in a verified pleading. (See People v. Agnew (1947) 77 Cal.App.2d 748 [176 P.2d 724] (perjury in verified pleading).) Petitioner's mistake was abandoning his adjudicative role for an investigatory one.

Aldrich

In Aldrich the commission held that petitioner committed wilful misconduct by attempting to dissuade an inexperienced attorney from representing Robert Aldrich, whom petitioner had jailed for contempt, and that petitioner committed prejudicial conduct in commenting to the press about the superior court ruling setting aside his contempt order and telling the attorney that Aldrich was a "puke" and "psychopath."

On January 11, 1978, petitioner sentenced Aldrich to 24 hours in jail for contempt based on courtroom conduct. John Olson, who petitioner 633 knew was a newly admitted attorney, was retained to represent Aldrich. He petitioned the superior court for habeas corpus and obtained an order to show cause that he served on petitioner in chambers on January 12. No one else was present. Petitioner told Olson that Aldrich was a "puke" and a "psychopath" and that there was no defense to the contempt order. He also said Olson should not be representing Aldrich and urged Olson to talk with experienced local attorneys who assertedly would advise him against getting involved in the case. Olson said he would consider the suggestions.

On January 18, preparing for the habeas hearing, Olson visited petitioner's court to examine the docket. They discussed the case for half an hour. Petitioner again tried to dissuade Olson from representing "that puke" (Aldrich) and had his clerk tell Olson of the events that led to the contempt order. Olson replied that the clerk's version was consistent with his own information but that he thought it was not a proper contempt case. Petitioner attacked Aldrich's "criminal background" and said that if Olson remained in the case he could never again practice before petitioner and probably not in western El Dorado County. He added that Olson's office associates also might have difficulties in practicing in his court. Olson asked what would happen if he did withdraw; petitioner replied that there would then be no problem.

Olson left the conversation confused and upset. He consulted his associates; they advised him not to withdraw. One of them, Mark Nielsen, who had known petitioner since 1971, phoned him that evening, hoping he would reconsider. To Nielsen's dismay, petitioner reiterated what he had told Olson who, petitioner added, had been duped by the scheme of Aldrich (the "puke") to embarrass petitioner's court. Though Olson did not withdraw from the case, neither he nor his colleagues experienced adverse consequences in later appearances before petitioner.

As a deputy district attorney petitioner had assisted in successfully prosecuting Aldrich for armed robbery and arson. According to the testimony of Judge Smith, Aldrich had a community reputation as a hoodlum and describing him as a "puke" was not unfair.

Between petitioner's two conversations with Olson, Aldrich harassed petitioner. He repeatedly drove past petitioner's home. When petitioner and his wife and bailiff went to lunch in a crowded restaurant, Aldrich and a friend continually hovered by petitioner's table, causing petitioner's party to leave. Petitioner obtained a shotgun and installed lights 634 outside his house. A psychiatrist who examined petitioner on November 10 and 18, 1979, testified on November 20 that Aldrich's activities created a "stress reaction" that caused petitioner's outbursts to Olson and Neilsen on January 18, 1978.

At the habeas proceeding on January 20 petitioner appeared in propria persona. After hearing evidence Judge Fogerty explained from the bench his reasons for granting the writ. He began by describing the extreme caution with which the summary contempt power should be exercised. He opined that Aldrich had been jailed simply for accepting a bailiff's invitation to express an opinion. [FN8] He concluded:

> FN8 The opinion was stated as follows: "I don't understand how in the world a bailiff can involve himself in court proceedings and create a situation where an individual is asked to express an opinion, which, if the evidence is true, and it is not contradicted, that the judge called the preceding litigant an ass, and when asked to express an opinion, the individual does so and then finds himself in jail. [¶] Had he approached the judge and called him an ass without provocation, or had he approached the judge in some fashion and engaged in insulting conduct, that would be one thing."

"There have been serious efforts made in California to improve the qualities of the lower courts, and people with professional training are put in those positions and they are supposed to use that professional position to exercise restraint that permits an efficient administration of justice. [¶] It is not a chamber of terror, or it is not a place people should be frightened to go; and when they are asked for an opinion, they should be able to express it. What might be loud and belligerent language to someone might simply be a heated expression of an opinion of another. All of those who have been in the cauldron of the courtroom know that the expression of opinion sometimes is loud and emphatic language. [¶] It is wrong to put people in jail whether it is by the process of contempt or any other ex parte proceeding, except in extraordinary circumstances."

Finally, petitioner's request to reply in open court to Judge Fogerty's statement from the bench was denied. Immediately after the hearing, petitioner was interviewed by a reporter. A local newspaper published the Fogerty statement, followed by this concededly accurate account of what petitioner said:

"'It is unfortunate that the judge has taken the position he has,' said Wenger. [']Superior court judges sit in an insulated environment buffered from direct public contact by the attorneys who represent them. 635 We in the justice courts are not as fortunate, since we maintain a toe-to-toe contact with the public and are therefore exposed to a much greater dilemma than upper levels. [¶] In the instance of my court, removed from the center of activity, completely unprotected, without media contact, without means of relief should a dangerous situation arise it is incumbent that the judge have the ability to control the conduct of those who may appear before him. [¶] 'The instant case is very typical of many that confront justice court judges each day,' Wenger continued. 'Many persons from distant metropolitan areas are required to appear for assorted violations, and many of them manifest a contemptuous and disrespectful attitude to not only law enforcement but likewise the courts where they must appear. To divest justice court judges of the dignity and ability to control this potentially explosive environment is to strip away the underlying foundations originally built into these courts. [¶] It's unfortunate for the law-abiding populace that are required to share the same quarters with dissidents and those who would wilfully disrupt the court proceedings. [¶] It is tragic that the courts which are designed and intended for the man on the street must be turned into an arena for those dissidents who have no respect for the law or consideration for others. [¶] This decision undoubtedly undermines the entire judicial structure on the lower levels, the people's courts." A result of the news story was a rift between Judge Fogerty and petitioner that ended their informal communications on professional matters.

(9) Of the three Aldrich charges sustained by the commission we begin with those found to be only prejudicial conduct. The tasteless use of "puke" and "psychopath" to describe Aldrich to Olson and Nielsen does not warrant discipline for "rude and profane conduct." The words were not uttered from the bench but in one-to-one conversation in chambers or on the telephone. The effect differed little from a describing of Aldrich as a "hoodlum" or an "unsavory character."

As for petitioner's statement to the press, he correctly points out that his making it did not violate the command of canon 3(A)(6) of the Code of Judicial Conduct to "abstain from public comment about a pending or impending proceeding in any court." The contempt litigation had been concluded.

The canon states that it "does not prohibit judges from making public statements in the course of their official duties or from explaining for public information the procedures of the court." An ethics opinion that 636 petitioner introduced states that "nothing in the Code of Judicial Conduct prevents a judge from making a dignified response to public criticism except as related to a case pending or about to be brought before the court." (Conference of Cal. Judges, Com. on Judicial Ethics, Opn. No. 24, Mar. 27, 1976.)

Was petitioner's statement to the press, however, more than "a dignified response to public criticism?" He did not merely recount a justice court's need of power to control unruly conduct while defending his contempt order as a proper exercise of that power. He declared: "To divest justice court judges of the dignity and ability to control this potentially explosive environment is to strip away the underlying foundations originally built into these courts .... This decision undoubtedly undermines the entire judicial structure on the lower levels, the people's courts."

Those words did misrepresent Judge Fogerty's ruling, which was narrowly based on a finding that the bailiff had invited Aldrich's conduct. (See fn. 8, ante.) But was petitioner's statement "conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute" (Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (c))? In the circumstances, we think not (Cf. United States v. Morgan (1941) 313 U.S. 409, 421 [85 L.Ed. 1429, 1435, 61 S.Ct. 999], re "a practice familiar in the long history of Anglo-American litigation, whereby unsuccessful litigants and lawyers give vent to their disappointment in tavern or press") and dismiss the charge.

(10) There remains the commission's determination of wilful misconduct in attempting to dissuade Olson from representing Aldrich. It is elementary that a judge "must be on his guard neither to infringe upon the defendant's right to counsel of his choice, nor to compromise the independence of the bar." (Smith v. Superior Court (1968) 68 Cal.2d 547, 559 [68 Cal.Rptr. 1, 440 P.2d 65] (trial court held without power to remove counsel as incompetent).) "Smith makes it abundantly clear that the involuntary removal of any attorney is a severe limitation on a defendant's right to counsel and may be justified, if at all, only in the most flagrant circumstances of attorney misconduct or incompetence when all other judicial controls have failed." (Cannon v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications (1975) 14 Cal.3d 678, 697 [122 Cal.Rptr. 778, 537 P.2d 898].) Petitioner does not claim to have questioned Olson's competence. 637

Petitioner's "stress reaction" from Aldrich's harassment does not excuse his conduct. (Cf. In re Fahey (1973) 8 Cal.3d 842, 850, fn. 4 [106 Cal.Rptr. 313, 505 P.2d 1369, 63 A.L.R.3d 465] (attorney misconduct).) He does not contend that his January 12 talk with Olson reflected the stress reaction. He argues that his attempts in that conversation to convince Olson that Aldrich's case was meritless and that Olson should not handle it were not improper because petitioner then was simply "a party to the [superior court] lawsuit, not a judge who was to decide anything further." The argument is specious; his position was that of judge attempting to discourage the exercise of rights to obtain review of his contempt order. His statements to Olson and Nielsen on January 12 and 18, 1978, constituted wilful misconduct in office.

Kelly

In Kelly the commission concluded that petitioner committed wilful misconduct by failing to disqualify himself but dismissed charges of abusing the contempt power as "not sustained." Petitioner contends that the misconduct found was different from that charged in the notice of formal proceedings, which alleged: "In People v. Kelly, Docket No. 79645, attorney Roger Cline, on or about April 20, 1978, filed a motion disqualifying you under Code of Civil Procedure section 170.6. On or about April 21, 1978, you notified Mr. Cline that the motion for disqualification was denied as to arraignment; arraignment then proceeded as scheduled. [¶] On May 10, 1978, Cline and the defendant appeared for the pretrial conference. In chambers, you indicated to Cline that you had forgotten about the disqualification, and following some discussion, you told Cline he was disrespectful and unprofessional. Cline then briefly left chambers to confer with his client. Cline returned to your chambers and further discussion ensued. [¶] On or about May 11, 1978, Case No. 79645, you notified Cline to appear on May 15, 1978, for summary contempt proceedings. [¶] On May 15, 1978, purporting to act pursuant to Penal Code section 166, and over objection by Cline's attorney, you found Cline in contempt of court, imposed a $300 fine, and, unless Cline apologized, you banned him from all future appearances in your court except trials. When Cline indicated an unwillingness to pay the fine, you sentenced him to jail until the fine was paid; upon request, execution was stayed. A written order was filed on May 16, 1978, and assigned case No. 7681."

Petitioner's answer admitted the first three paragraphs of those allegations. As to the fourth, it was admitted that he found Cline in 638 "summary contempt," fined him $300 and, on his refusal to pay, sentenced him to jail until the fine was paid. Also admitted were the stay and written order.

The commission concluded: "[Petitioner] sought to read implied withdrawal of disqualifications in the actions of attorneys obeying his specific orders, and he attempted to find an abuse of the disqualification process by questioning the good faith of the affiant. These were acts which he should have known were beyond his lawful power. They accordingly constituted wilful misconduct in office."

The conclusion was based on this evidence: Notifying Cline on April 21 that the disqualification motion was denied as to arraignment, petitioner wrote: "Inasmuch as an arraignment does not involve a contested issue of law or fact, it will be necessary for Mr. Kelly to appear in person, or by counsel at the arraignment [on April 25]." Cline's associate, Brunello, represented Kelly at the arraignment. At the May 15 contempt hearing against Cline petitioner said: "Mr. Brunello made no objection to the [pretrial] date setting, knowing that I would be the presiding judge, nor did he indicate that Mr. Cline would take over the case and would wish to pursue this disqualification as previously referred to. In other words, there was no reference whatsoever to lead me to believe that I would not be acceptable to sit on this case at future hearings."

Later in the hearing he declared, "[T]his is an example of an abuse of the disqualification process permitted under section 170.6 ... Mr. Cline is alleging that I might be prejudiced against the interests of his client, the defendant, and believes that the defendant cannot receive a fair trial. I do not know Mr. Kelly."

When Cline's attorney, Olson, pointed out that the ground for disqualification was that "defendant would be denied a fair hearing because of prejudice against the attorney, "petitioner replied, "I have no prejudice."

In Cannon v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications, supra, 14 Cal.3d 678, 696, this court refused to adopt the commission's conclusion of wilful misconduct consisting of "unwarranted interference in the operation of the Public Defenders' Office" because the judge had been "charged only with an unlawful interference with the attorney-client relationship." Similarly here, the conclusion of misconduct based on 639 questionable statements about the effect of the disqualification motion was beyond the scope of the notice of formal proceedings. Accordingly the charge is dismissed.

Ellis

In Ellis the commission concluded that petitioner committed (1) wilful misconduct in abusing the contempt power by invoking it to enforce an order he made after being disqualified (Code Civ. Proc., § 170.6), and (2) prejudicial conduct in deciding contested issues after the disqualification. The master concluded that failure to disqualify was wilful misconduct but that petitioner's only abuse of the contempt power was negligent failure to follow correct procedures, amounting to prejudicial conduct.

Ellis, represented by Keller, was arraigned on burglary charges before petitioner on October 6, 1978. He pleaded not guilty, and preliminary hearing was set for October 16. Immediately after arraignment Keller, against whom petitioner had sought to exercise the contempt power in Renfro and Lee, filed a section 170.6 motion to disqualify petitioner. Petitioner instructed his clerk to arrange for Judge Smith to sit at the preliminary hearing. The Ellis charges relate to the scheduling of that hearing. [FN9]

> FN9 Keller complained to the commission on May 3, 1978, about petitioner's conduct in Renfro and Lee. Petitioner contends that animosity against him made Keller deliberately disruptive, and he continually interprets Keller's conduct in that light. For example, he argues that Keller deliberately refrained from informing him of the planned disqualification motion during the arraignment, when petitioner could have taken it into account in scheduling the preliminary hearing.

Judge Smith returned from vacation on October 16. Petitioner's clerk called him at 9 a.m.; he said he could conduct the hearing on either October 19 (a.m.) or October 20 (p.m.). They agreed on October 19. The clerk called Keller's office; his secretary said that on October 19 he had an all day engagement in the San Francisco area. The clerk said Keller should appear in court at 11 a.m. that day (Oct. 16) and take the matter up with petitioner.

At Keller's direction his secretary then called Judge Smith and asked if the hearing could be held on a day other than October 19. Smith said October 20 was better for him anyway and asked the secretary to call petitioner's court and set the hearing for October 20. About 9:30 the 640 secretary told petitioner's clerk that Keller's office had been in touch with Judge Smith and that he had set the hearing for October 20. The clerk again replied that Keller should take up the matter in court that morning (October 16).

At 11:15 Keller was in court, and petitioner opened the proceeding by scolding Keller for not giving notice of the section 170.6 disqualification at the time of arraignment. He then stated he understood Judge Smith would be available at 9 a.m. on the 19th. Keller said his office had been in touch with Smith who, Keller understood, "would be available at 1:30 on Friday" (the 20th). Petitioner replied that Keller's office "is in touch with far too many judges" such as Hamilton (an apparent reference to Renfro) and now Smith, "who has no standing in this case until such time that he is arranged for and confirmed by this court." He charged Keller with "twist[ing] the procedures" and asked if Keller was "prepared at this time to file a formal time waiver so that the matter may go over to the 19th for Judge Smith." Keller said he had not prepared a written waiver but would file one; petitioner demanded it before noon.

He then launched into a long lecture, excoriating Keller for disrespect, manipulation, and dishonesty, and for filing a disqualification while knowing that "it is extremely difficult to find a substitute judge." He refused Keller's request to respond, [FN10] finally told him to leave, and ordered Ellis back at 9 a.m. on the 19th for a preliminary hearing at which Judge Smith would preside.

> FN10 Petitioner said: "I have heard all I want to hear. I know you disagree with me, and you can run back to the Council on Judicial Performance again. I think you have already been exposed to Council by a full realization of how you conduct yourself as a so-called attorney."

Petitioner contends his setting the hearing for October 19 was justified by Keller's failure to disclose his calendar conflict. The commission found that Keller had no opportunity to do so, and the finding is supported by testimony of the deputy district attorney and the transcript. The master did not decide the point. In any event, petitioner's clerk acknowledged being informed of the conflict more than an hour before the hearing.

On the 17th Smith had conversations with both Keller and petitioner that left him with the impression that the hearing would be held on the 20th. On the 18th petitioner informed Smith that, because of the number 641 of witnesses subpoenaed and the inconvenience to all parties, he would prefer that the hearing be held the next morning. Later, Keller called Smith to say he still could not make it on the 19th. Smith told Keller to send Ellis to court so that Smith could take a waiver of time for the purpose of continuing the case.

On the 19th Smith was in petitioner's chambers, prepared to don his robe, call the case, take a waiver of counsel and of right to speedy preliminary hearing, and continue the case. He was "a little dumbfounded" when petitioner took the bench instead. The transcript shows that petitioner interrogated his clerk, Ellis, Judge Smith, and the district attorney at length about the scheduling of the hearing and particularly any communications with Keller about his absence. Petitioner then turned to the purportedly unlimited waiver of time for preliminary hearing that Ellis, through Keller, had filed on the 16th. Petitioner construed that waiver as effective only until the 19th and ordered a hearing on the 23d to "establish whether the time waiver will be forthcoming or whether we'll have to dismiss the complaint and refile and proceed with the arraignment again." He told Judge Smith he need not be present on the 23d.

Fearful of being jailed if he appeared before petitioner, Keller presented a petition to Superior Court Judge Byrne, who declined to issue a writ but telephoned petitioner.

On October 23, in place of Keller, Stambaugh appeared before petitioner as counsel for Ellis. Petitioner asked him if he were prepared to file a waiver. Stambaugh said his and Keller's position was that the previously filed waiver was sufficient and, since the court disagreed, asked for a hearing on that issue before another judge, petitioner having been disqualified. Petitioner suggested that since the basis of disqualification was his prejudice against Keller, not Ellis, "we can now proceed to determine the question of fact." Stambaugh replied that in associating with Keller he joined all Keller's prior positions. Petitioner then ordered that the complaint be dismissed and that, on Ellis' rearrest on a new complaint, he be released on his own recognizance. Concededly the basis of that order was a ruling that the previously filed waiver was invalid. The hearing was markedly prolonged by petitioner's tirades against Keller and his "senseless manipulation."

Keller wrote petitioner on October 24 that he was "shocked and surprised" by the dismissal, which he considered void in view of petitioner's disqualification. 642

On November 6 petitioner sent Keller an order to show cause re contempt, to be heard November 13. Attached was petitioner's affidavit grounding the contempt charge on Keller's failure to appear on October 19. Petitioner declared: "That at no time during the proceedings on October 16th, or during the interim period of time between October 16th and October 19th, did Attorney Keller protest the date set for the preliminary hearing." Yet the October 19 transcript reports Judge Smith as stating that between the 16th and the 19th he had had two or three contacts with Keller, who said he could not attend on the 19th because of a calendar conflict and whom Smith then instructed to have Ellis appear on the 19th anyway, so that Smith could "get a time waiver."

Judge Fogerty issued an alternative writ of prohibition against the contempt hearing. [FN11] The writ proceeding was terminated by a settlement providing for (1) dismissal of contempt charges against Keller and (in Anderson) Cline, and (2) procedures enabling Keller and Cline to obtain on request a transfer of any matter in which they were attorneys from petitioner's courtroom to that of Judge Hamilton in Placerville.

> FN11 Petitioner effected a section 170.6 disqualification of Judge Fogerty.

Testifying before the master, petitioner said his reason for citing Keller for contempt was disobedience of petitioner's "order not to engage in calendaring with a judge that had no involvement with the court." Failure to appear on October 19 (the only ground given in the contempt affidavit) was just "the end result." Asked when he made such an order, petitioner pointed only to his statement at the October 16 proceeding that Keller's office "is in touch with far too many judges who have no particular standing in this case" such as Judges Hamilton and Smith.

The commission founded its conclusion of wilful misconduct for abuse of the contempt power on two grounds: (1) error "in ordering the matter heard by himself almost a month after the event," and (2) error "in an attempt to use the contempt power to enforce an order entered by him in a case where he had been disqualified and the judge assigned to hear the matter was present in the courtroom on the date of the hearing but was prevented by [petitioner] from taking the bench."

The first ground is insufficient. Petitioner does appear to have been "personally embroiled" enough to have been required to recuse himself. (Mayberry v. Pennsylvania, supra, 400 U.S. 455, 465 [27 L.Ed.2d 532, 540]; In re Martin (1977) 71 Cal.App.3d 472, 480 [139 Cal.Rptr. 643 451].) Yet, there is no clear and convincing evidence that he intended to hear the contempt matter himself rather than calling in another judge.

(11) The second ground of wilful abuse must be sustained. Keller's reason for absence on October 19 had been fully explained to Judge Smith. It was proper for Keller to deal directly with Smith in making scheduling arrangements, which both understood to be subject to the availability of petitioner's courtroom and to the convenience of other counsel, parties, and witnesses. The contempt charge appears to have been made because of petitioner's animosity toward Keller rather than his good faith perception of any contemptuous conduct. Making it was wilful misconduct.

The commission found prejudicial conduct in petitioner's "action in continuing to preside and to decide contested issues in a case where a 170.6 disqualification had been filed." Petitioner must have known and now admits that he had no power to decide the validity of Ellis's time waiver. The charge is sustained.

Stern

In Stern the commission found wilful misconduct in petitioner's alteration of the date of an "Affidavit in Support of Hearing on Contempt" and prejudicial conduct in issuance of a no-bail arrest warrant unsupported by either a criminal complaint or a contempt affidavit. The master sustained both charges only as prejudicial conduct.

On October 25, 1978, Gary Stern appeared in petitioner's court on traffic infractions. He made remarks that petitioner deemed offensive. Petitioner partially dealt with Stern's case and then, according to petitioner, instructed Stern to remain until the end of the calendar. Stern testified he felt free to leave. During a recess Stern departed, taking with him the court docket on his case.

Petitioner immediately issued an arrest warrant, servable at night, citing the traffic offenses and also misdemeanors under Penal Code sections 166 (contempt) and 488 (theft). The warrant specified "no bail" and was on a form that stated, "A verified complaint was made before me on this day that the offense set forth above was committed." Apart from the traffic infractions, no complaint had been filed. 644

On October 26 Stern consulted Keller. Next day petitioner received in the mail from Stern the stolen docket, a letter making a "formal apology ... as ordered by you," and a check for $10, the original bail set on the citation. On November 3d Stern was arrested on the warrant; Keller filed for habeas corpus in superior court; and Stern was released on his own recognizance. Petitioner was served with that petition no later than November 6.

On November 7 the clerk typed, and petitioner signed, an "Affidavit in Support of Hearing on Contempt" in Stern, reciting that Stern had appeared on petitioner's traffic arraignment calendar on October 25, made disruptive remarks, stolen the docket, and departed contrary to court order. Also recited was receipt on October 27 of Stern's letter and check and the stolen docket.

The clerk first typed on the affidavit the current date, November 7. On petitioner's direction, she whited that out and inserted October 27. Petitioner's only explanation of the change is that October 27 was when he started the rough draft.

The commission described the date change as "alteration" of a document. Yet editing the draft was not alteration since the document was then unsigned and thus incomplete. The change is better described as "backdating."

The commission argues that petitioner changed the date to bolster his position in the habeas proceeding. Keller's clerk had examined the Stern file in petitioner's court on November 1 and ascertained the absence of any affidavit concerning contempt. At the habeas hearing on December 4 petitioner unhesitatingly admitted, under Keller's cross-examination, that the affidavit was typed November 7 and changed to the date of the rough draft.

Petitioner argues that backdating to October 27 would not cure the absence of documentary support for the October 25 arrest warrant. But the affidavit's reference to events of October 27 would have been inconsistent with any earlier backdating.

(12) We agree with the master that petitioner's motivation for backdating the affidavit is not clear. It was, though, done deliberately; and petitioner knew or should have known that it would create a false impression that he had signed on the earlier date. We infer that whatever 645 petitioner's purpose it was not the faithful discharge of judicial duties. Backdating the affidavit was wilful misconduct.

(13) We agree with the commission that issuance of the no-bail arrest warrant without the filing of a criminal complaint or initiation of a contempt proceeding (Code Civ. Proc., §§ 1211, 1211.5) was prejudicial conduct. Though conceding error, petitioner urges that he believed in good faith that he was acting within his summary contempt power. That consideration may have led the commission to refrain from finding wilful misconduct; it does not preclude our finding prejudicial conduct. (See fn. 4, ante.)

Anderson

In Anderson the commission concluded that petitioner "did wilfully abuse his contempt power." The nature of the abuse is implicit in findings on petitioner's (1) order of December 4, 1978, reciting five grounds of contempt by Attorney Cline, and (2) intent to preside at the contempt hearing despite admitted prejudice against Cline. Charges of failure to disqualify were dismissed. The master concluded that petitioner (1) wilfully abused the contempt power as to one of the grounds stated in his order, and (2) wilfully failed to disqualify himself.

A bench warrant was issued against Anderson for failing to appear in petitioner's court for arraignment on a charge of possessing a controlled substance. Cline, as Anderson's counsel, called petitioner on November 7, 1978, to ask for release of Anderson on his own recognizance (OR). Petitioner said he would consider OR release only after talking with Anderson in court. Cline consulted Attorney Keller and decided to disqualify petitioner (Code Civ. Proc., § 170.6). He then called Judge Smith, who said he was sitting in petitioner's court that afternoon and would meet Cline and Anderson there at 3 to consider OR or bail reduction.

At 3 p.m. Cline arrived at petitioner's court, filed the disqualification, and waited outside until Anderson arrived at 3:30. He took Anderson inside and met petitioner, Smith, and two attorneys emerging from chambers. Cline explained he was there to make an OR motion for Anderson. Petitioner said he could not consider it unless the disqualification were withdrawn. Cline suggested Judge Smith handle the matter. Petitioner asserted his authority in that courthouse, saying that Smith 646 was not to hear anything and was just leaving. Smith departed; neither he nor Cline informed petitioner of their arrangement.

Cline asked petitioner to consider the OR request. Petitioner said he would do so only if Cline withdrew the disqualification. Referring to Kelly, petitioner said Cline was not welcome in petitioner's court until he offered an apology. Cline became impatient and aggressive; the confrontation was heated. Finally, petitioner remanded Anderson into custody. Cline departed and obtained an OR order from Judge Fogerty that afternoon. [FN12]

> FN12 Petitioner testified that, if he had been informed of the Cline-Smith arrangement, he would have let Smith hear the matter. Smith testified that he had no "chance to work it into the conversation." Further, that petitioner said, "Judge Smith is leaving, aren't you, Judge Smith, and I, rather than raise a stink, I said sure, I'm leaving, and left."
> Cline had good reason for not disclosing the arrangement himself. He had just talked with Keller and inferably knew that only three weeks earlier, in Ellis, petitioner had berated Keller in open court for communicating directly with Smith on the scheduling of a hearing in petitioner's court for which petitioner had been disqualified. The master, however, found that "Cline's tactics that day, including secreting from [petitioner] the arrangements he had made with Judge Smith, manifested his intention to escalate the tenseness of the situation." Cline had complained about petitioner by letter to the commission on April 14, 1978.

On November 15 petitioner set Anderson's arraignment for November 28. Cline wrote petitioner's clerk on November 21, inquiring when the matter would be assigned to another judge and saying that, because petitioner had banned him from the court, he would not appear until such reassignment. On the 28th petitioner had his clerk advise Cline's office that one of Cline's associates (but not Cline) must appear with Anderson that morning for arraignment. No one appeared. Later that morning Cline called Sprunger, the county counsel, and suggested that the arraignment be put over so that Cline could talk with his client and a substitute attorney. Sprunger called petitioner, who reset the arraignment for the 30th.

Still later on the 28th, Cline called both Sprunger and petitioner and stated he would not appear for the arraignment until another judge was assigned. Petitioner made no attempt to obtain another judge. His position, stated to Cline then and earlier (see Kelly), was that he was authorized to hear an arraignment despite disqualification under section 170.6. [FN13] > FN13 Petitioner reasonably points out that the orderly way to test his position would have been to apply to the superior court for a writ ordering him to refrain from hearing the arraignment. He contended that an arraignment hearing remained within his power because section 170.6 disqualifies a judge only from trying a case or hearing "any matter therein which involves a contested issue of law or fact." That view had at least enough merit to prevent the holding of it from constituting misconduct. (See Mezzetti v. Superior Court (1979) 94 Cal.App.3d 987 [156 Cal.Rptr. 802]

(disqualified judge held authorized to hold settlement conference); Fraijo v. Superior Court (1973) 34 Cal.App.3d 222 [109 Cal.Rptr. 909] (plea bargain). But see In re Byron B. (1979) 98 Cal.App.3d 300 [159 Cal.Rptr. 430] (acceptance of juvenile's admission of guilt); Lyons v. Superior Court (1977) 73 Cal.App.3d 625, 627 [140 Cal.Rptr. 826] (plea bargain).)

On December 1, petitioner served Cline with an "Order Adjudging Direct Contempt of Court" that stated five grounds of contempt based on attached affidavits and set a hearing for December 11. On December 8, Cline petitioned the superior court for mandate. On advice of the county counsel petitioner's order of December 1 was set aside on December 18 and replaced the same day by a similar order issued by a judge assigned from another county. The mandate and contempt proceedings both were dismissed on January 18, 1979, under the settlement that also concluded Ellis.

We see no misconduct in petitioner's including the first, third, fourth, and fifth grounds in his contempt order. The first was that during the November 7 confrontation Cline "address[ed] the court in a disorderly, insolent, hostile and disrespectful manner." Bystanders' testimony provides enough support for that ground to establish that its truth was a proper question of fact. (14) The third, fourth, and fifth grounds were based on Cline's nonappearances at the scheduled November 28 and 30 arraignment hearings. There is no contention that those grounds would have been improper in the absence of Cline's disqualification of petitioner under section 170.6, and the commission dismissed the Anderson charges of petitioner's failure to disqualify as "not sustained." Petitioner's position that (1) the disqualification did not cover arraignments, and (2) Cline should contest it by superior court writ proceeding was not so meritless as to amount to misconduct. (See fn. 13, ante.)

(15) The second-stated ground of contempt was that Cline violated his duty to his client and that as a result the client was denied a hearing and incarcerated. Petitioner's supporting affidavit indicated that the alleged violation occurred during the confrontation of November 7. Yet the affidavit omitted Judge Smith from its enumeration of persons present. It is undisputed that Smith was then authorized to hear cases in petitioner's court. [FN14] Petitioner's refusal to consider the OR request unless 648 Cline withdrew the disqualification impliedly asserted the disqualification's validity. The denial of an OR hearing and subsequent incarceration resulted from petitioner's refusal to honor Cline's request that the matter be heard by Smith, not from Cline's refusal to withdraw the disqualification. To charge Cline with contempt for a consequence for which petitioner himself was responsible constituted wilful misconduct.

FN14 It was stipulated that an order of the Chairperson of the Judicial Council then in effect provided that a judge of any justice court was authorized to sit in any other justice court "under an exchange assignment as defined by Rule 790, California Rules of Court" without prior approval of the Administrative Office of the Courts. In petitioner's deposition of January 11, 1979, taken in the Cline contempt matter, he testified that "Judge Smith is more or less obligated through his agreement with the Board of Supervisors to cover vacancies in the three other judicial districts, that being mine, the Placerville, and Lake Valley."

Petitioner concedes that, though prejudiced against Cline, he intended to preside at the hearing ordered for December 11, erroneously believing that contempt law permitted him to do so. The order seems to have conveyed that intent. [FN15] Its issuance therefore was prejudicial conduct, somewhat mitigated by petitioner's correcting the error when finally another judge was substituted on December 18.

FN15 After declaring the five grounds petitioner's order continued, "for which conduct I did then and there, and do now, adjudge said Roger F. Cline guilty of contempt of court, and I hereby order that said Roger F. Cline appear before this court on December 11, 1978 at 2:00 o'clock P.M. to show cause why he should not be punished for contempt as hereinabove stated."

Brooks

The commission concluded that in Brooks petitioner committed wilful misconduct by abusing the contempt power and failing to disqualify himself. The master found prejudicial conduct in abusing the contempt power, no more.

On October 27, 1978, Brooks was charged with two misdemeanors and an infraction under the Vehicle Code. Section 40517 provides that a person required to appear on such charges "before a justice court judge who is not at the county seat ... may demand a transfer of the case to a ... judge ... having jurisdiction of the offense at the county seat upon filing with such justice court judge an affidavit that he believes that a fair trial without excessive penalties cannot be had before such justice court judge. ... [¶] Thereupon the justice court judge with whom the affidavit is filed shall be without jurisdiction to proceed with the case and shall immediately transfer the case ...." 649

On advice of Attorney Keller and pursuant to statute Brooks executed a declaration under penalty of perjury that included the statement, "I believe that I cannot obtain a fair trial without excessive penalties in the above entitled court." In recommending that declaration Keller (then involved in Ellis and Stern) explained he was having personality conflicts with petitioner.

The declaration and accompanying motion were filed at Brooks' arraignment on November 14. Under questioning by petitioner, Brooks stated he had never met and did not know petitioner and had executed the declaration on his attorney's advice. Petitioner ordered a November 21 hearing on the motion, for which he requested points and authorities on the statute's applicability.

At that hearing petitioner accused Keller of filing a false declaration ("impugning and maligning the integrity of this court and myself as judge") by inducing Brooks to swear he could not obtain a fair trial without excessive penalties. Petitioner charged that Keller thereby committed a direct contempt of court and invited an explanation. Keller objected that (1) he had received no notice of the contempt charge, and (2) the charge should be heard before another judge. He readily conceded that Brooks' declared belief of inability to obtain a fair trial before petitioner had been formed because Keller "persuaded him to believe it."

After berating Keller, petitioner declared him in contempt and sentenced him to five days in jail beginning on November 24 (the 23d being Thanksgiving). Finally he asked, "Do you have anything further, Mr. Keller?" Keller said, "Yes, what is your ruling on the motion for change of venue?" Petitioner replied, "Oh, I have no objection to that; in fact, I welcome it."

Keller through Attorney Cline filed for a writ of certiorari with the superior court which, on November 22, stayed Keller's sentence. At the December 6 hearing on the writ petitioner appeared through County Counsel Sprunger. At the end of the hearing Judge Fogerty "without hesitation" granted the writ from the bench and said he was "appalled by these proceedings."

(16) Petitioner did abuse the contempt power. The genuineness of Brooks' belief that petitioner would not give him a fair trial was consistent with its being based wholly on information about strained relations 650 between petitioner and Keller. Petitioner knew or should have known that Keller's advice to Brooks was proper. The contempt order and jail sentence appear motivated by personal animosity; rendering them was wilful misconduct.

The charge of failure to disqualify is dismissed. Brooks' case was duly transferred. Petitioner would have been entitled to deal with the filing in his court of a false affidavit before that transfer as a direct contempt. ( In re Ciraolo, supra, 70 Cal.2d 389, 393.) His position that such a contempt proceeding need not be transferred to another judge was sufficiently plausible to preclude a finding of misconduct based on lack of transfer. (See id. at p. 392; In re Buckley, supra, 10 Cal.3d 237, 256.)

The commission concluded that petitioner committed wilful misconduct in banishing Prosecutor Susan Disney from his court, thus limiting the district attorney's options in making personnel assignments. The master had reached a similar conclusion.

Disney was assigned to the court on being employed as a deputy in the fall of 1978 . She criticized petitioner's handling of the Rogers matter that October. They had a strained discussion of the incident but made efforts to get along and by March 1979 had developed a workable relation.

In March petitioner was served with the commission's first amended notice of formal proceedings; it charged misconduct in Rogers. (The charge was later rejected by the master and dismissed by the commission.) Petitioner believed Disney was the source of the charge. He told District Attorney Tepper that he felt betrayed and would prefer that Disney not be assigned to his court.

In April 1979 Disney was present in Judge Hamilton's court during proceedings in the May case, which had been transferred from petitioner's court. When May expressed dissatisfaction at petitioner's handling of the case Hamilton told May how to communicate with the commission. On April 17 petitioner was served with the commission's second amended notice charging misconduct in May. (That charge also was rejected by the master and dismissed by the commission.) Petitioner assumed Disney had steered May to the commission and again complained 651 to Tepper. On learning that May's source of information was Hamilton, petitioner apologized to Tepper and Disney.

Petitioner had no further contact with Disney until July 11, when Tepper assigned her two cases in petitioner's court. Petitioner had no advance notice of the assignment. When she arrived he called her into chambers, criticized her complaining to the commission in Rogers, and told her she was not welcome in his court and was to leave. She asked about her cases; he said they would be handled in normal course. He refused her request to set out in the docket that she was forbidden to appear.

In fact the defendants never appeared, and bench warrants were issued. There is no evidence, however, that Disney was informed during the conversation that their nonappearance was the reason the cases would not proceed.

Petitioner called Tepper and tried to arrange a discussion of differences. Tepper testified, however, that petitioner's condition for resolution was "that he expected some apologies and that he expected that she wouldn't be involved in communicating incidents to third parties about the operation of his court." Tepper also stated he told petitioner that to have one of two deputies barred from petitioner's court "did create some problems for us." At the time of the hearings before the master Disney had not returned to petitioner's court.

Petitioner argues that he properly disclosed his bias to enable Tepper to protect the People's right to an impartial judge. But what effect the disclosure might have on assignment of deputy district attorneys was for Tepper, not petitioner, to decide.

Petitioner also contends his conduct was equivalent to recusing himself for possible prejudice. Recusal, though, would require assigning cases to another judge; petitioner retained the cases and barred a particular prosecutor from his court.

(17) Petitioner's apparent purpose in excluding Disney was to prevent her reporting his conduct to the commission. He claims his principal concern was that she did not consult him before reporting. Consultation was not required; its absence did not justify the ban from his court, which we conclude was wilful misconduct. 652

Petitioner contends he was denied due process because the misconduct found by the commission varied materially from that charged. The commission concluded: "The effect of preventing Disney from performing her official duties, banishing her from his court, limited the District Attorney's options in making personnel assignments and thus did obstruct a public officer from performing official duties to that extent. This constituted wilful misconduct in office."

That conclusion was based on this allegation in the third amended notice: "You have willfully and unlawfully resisted, delayed and obstructed a public officer in the discharge or attempt to discharge the duties of his office in that on or about July 11, 1979, you refused, for improper personal reasons, to allow Susan Disney, a duly appointed deputy District Attorney of El Dorado County, to appear in the Justice Court, El Dorado Judicial District, on matters duly and lawfully assigned to her."

Petitioner argues that the charge (1) was not sustained because Disney's appearance on July 11 was thwarted not by his excluding her but by defendants' nonappearance, and (2) omitted the commission's conclusion that the effect of the exclusion was to limit the district attorney's personnel assignment options.

The notice may be reasonably understood to charge obstruction of the district attorney by not permitting his deputy to appear. Even if understood to refer only to obstruction of Disney, the allegation of interfering with her "attempt" to discharge official duties was proved. Further, there was interference with her actual performance of duty to ascertain and report back why the cases assigned to her did not proceed.

Petitioner argues that if he had known the commission's proposed conclusion he could have elicited evidence on the extent to which his conduct limited Tepper's "options in making personnel assignments." Proof of a lesser administrative burden would not have excused petitioner's acts. He was not denied due process.

Conclusion

Petitioner's conduct warrants discipline, and our choice is between removal (the commission's unanimous recommendation) and censure. 653

Addressing above the eleven incidents, we sustain charges of wilful misconduct in nine and prejudicial conduct in another. The charge in the remaining incident (Kelly) is dismissed because the commission's conclusion was procedurally defective.

(18) The number of wrongful acts is relevant to determining whether they were merely isolated occurrences or, instead, part of a course of conduct establishing "lack of temperament and ability to perform judicial functions in an even-handed manner." ( Cannon v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications, supra, 14 Cal.3d 678, 705, 707.) These patterns emerge:

Instead of honoring peremptory disqualifications of himself petitioner intruded into matters that had become another judge's responsibility (Renfro, Ellis, Anderson) and denounced the disqualification as an affront (Ellis, Brooks). When annoyed by a party's conduct he groundlessly pried into counsel's advice (Rose v. LePeilbet, Lee, Brooks) or attempted to dissuade counsel from representing the party (Aldrich). He interfered with law practice by threatening or purporting to exclude attorneys from his courtroom (Aldrich, Anderson, Disney) or sentencing the attorney to jail for appropriate advice to the client (Brooks). He overstepped limits on his power to resolve civil disputes by attempting to punish nonobedience to his informal directions as a contempt (Rose v. LePeilbet) and unilaterally investigating facts (Hill v. Martin). He disregarded or violated contempt procedural rules. (Lee, Stern, Anderson.)

There is no evidence that he neglected his work or used his office for illicit gain. As the master observed, "his fault lay more in his overzealous performance of his duties." Petitioner candidly admitted he had a "bull headed approach" and was "more concerned about substantiating my contentions in a matter than being correct."

By way of mitigation he contends he was a target of obstreperous and manipulative conduct and complains of a conspiracy between Keller and Cline to remove him from the bench. The misbehavior he confronted was manageable. Keller's and Cline's consultations, pointed to as conspiratorial, appear to be only exchanges of information on common problems.

Petitioner also contends that he was inexperienced and has learned not to repeat his mistakes. His five years as a deputy district attorney in 654 the same county should have acquainted him with criminal procedures. He had the benefit of continuing education through CJER. His abuses in the civil matters (Rose v. LePeilbet and Hill v. Martin) were too serious to be explainable by inexperience.

His final testimony before the master was laudably contrite. He had come to understand the truth of Judge Fogerty's remarks in Aldrich that contempt should be used with the greatest of discretion and temperance. At last he saw that the reasons for his making and repeating many mistakes lay in himself and in "that part of my personality that has blinded me to the realization that I'm not right. I've striven to support my position without realizing that there is more to it."

The difficulty with his professed enlightenment is its delayed arrival. He reacted to the commission's initial letter of March 1978 not by reconsidering his position but only with rationalizations and excuses. The second letter reached him in August; yet Ellis, Stern, Anderson, and Brooks occurred that fall, Disney the following spring and summer. Even while preparing for the master's hearing he "couldn't really get a realization" of his problems. It was only during the hearing itself, probably "when one of the witnesses referred to my general demeanor as egotistical," that the light began to dawn.

Mitigation of wrongdoing requires more than an unfulfilled intent to reform. A justice court judge has weighty responsibilities. ( Spruance v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications, supra, 13 Cal.3d 778, 802 (reviewing role of municipal court judge); Code Civ. Proc., § 83 (municipal and justice court jurisdiction the same).) The aim of commission proceedings is not punishment but "to protect the judicial system and the public which it serves from judges who are unfit to hold office." (McComb v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1977) 19 Cal.3d Spec. Trib. Supp. 1, 9 [138 Cal.Rptr. 459, 564 P.2d 1].) Faithfulness to that aim requires removal here.

We order that Judge Jerrold L. Wenger of the Justice Court of the El Dorado Judicial District be removed from office. Since the misconduct for which he is removed did not amount to grounds for disbarment, he shall, if otherwise qualified, be permitted to practice law. (Cal.Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (d); see Geiler v. Commission on Judicial 655 Qualifications, supra, 10 Cal.3d 270, 287; Spruance v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications, supra, 13 Cal.3d 778, 803, fn. 21.) This order is effective upon the finality of this decision. 656

Wenger v. Commission on Judicial Performance

END OF DOCUMENT

MARIO P. GONZALEZ, a Judge of the Municipal Court, Petitioner, v. COMMISSION ON JUDICIAL PERFORMANCE, Respondent.

SUMMARY

The Commission on Judicial Performance charged a municipal court judge with numerous counts of wilful misconduct in office and conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute. Three special masters were appointed who conducted hearings and issued a report concluding that the judge had not engaged in such conduct. The commission heard oral argument and subsequently issued findings of fact and conclusions of law sustaining 21 counts of wilful misconduct and conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice. The commission recommended that the judge be removed from office.

The Supreme Court adopted the commission's recommendation and ordered that the judge be removed from office. The court held that 20 of the 21 charges were supported by clear and convincing evidence and that removal from office was appropriate, given the persistence and pervasiveness of the misconduct. However, since the misconduct did not rise to the level of moral turpitude, dishonesty, or corruption, the court held the judge was entitled to practice law, provided he passed the Professional Responsibility Examination. The acts of wilful misconduct the judge was found to have engaged in included intercession in criminal matters on behalf of friends and benefactors, improprieties in bail-setting and own-recognizance release, abuse of judicial authority and the conduct of court business in violation of proper procedures. The judge was also found to have made comments impugning the character of his judicial colleagues and to have made ethnic slurs both on and off the bench. (Opinion by The Court.)

HEADNOTES

Classified to California Digest of Official Reports, 3d Series

(1) Judges § 6—Removal—Proceedings Before Commission on Judicial Performance—Extension of Time to File Objections to Masters' Report.—In proceedings before the Commission on Judicial Performance regarding allegations of misconduct by a municipal court judge, examiners who were appointed to present the case were properly granted an additional 10-day extension to file objections to a report issued by special masters, beyond a 30-day extension initially granted, and the commission properly accepted the objections 2 days after expiration of the second extension. Although Cal. Rules of Court, rule 915, limits time extensions to 30 days in the aggregate, the judge was not prejudiced by the 12-day delay and in fact benefitted from the commission's liberality by requesting and receiving identical time to file his own objections. Further, as a matter of policy, it was unwise to forsake inquiry into the substance of serious allegations of judicial misconduct merely because of such a brief procedural delay.

(2) Judges § 6—Removal—Proceedings Before Commission on Judicial Performance—Appellate Review.—In reviewing a recommendation of the Commission on Judicial Performance that a municipal court judge be removed from office, it was the duty of the appellate court to independently review the evidence adduced by the masters appointed to take testimony in the matter and to determine whether the allegations were proved by clear and convincing evidence sufficient to sustain the charges of misconduct to a reasonable certainty.

(3) Judges § 1—Standards of Judicial Conduct.—The ultimate standard for judicial conduct is conduct which constantly reaffirms fitness for the high responsibilities of judicial office.

(4) Judges § 6—Removal—Grounds—Wilful Misconduct.—A charge of wilful misconduct connotes unjudicial conduct which a judge acting in his judicial capacity commits in bad faith. "Bad faith" is equivalent to actual malice and encompasses the intentional commission of acts which the judge knew or reasonably should have known were beyond his lawful power, as well as acts which, though within the ambit of lawful judicial authority, are committed for purposes other than the faithful discharge of judicial duties.

(5) Judges § 6—Removal—Grounds—Conduct Prejudicial to Administration of Justice.—A charge of conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute connotes conduct which a judge undertakes in good faith but which nevertheless would appear to an objective observer to be not only unjudicial conduct but conduct prejudicial to public esteem for the judicial office. Such charge also includes wilful misconduct out of office, which is unjudicial conduct committed in bad faith by a judge not then acting in a judicial capacity.

(6) Judges § 6—Removal—Grounds.—A judge may be censured or removed from the bench only for wilful misconduct in office or conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute.

(7) Judges § 6—Removal—Grounds—Wilful Misconduct—Intercession in Criminal Matters on Behalf of Friends and Benefactors.—The Commission on Judicial Performance properly sustained charges that a municipal court judge engaged in wilful misconduct in office and conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice, where there was clear and convincing evidence that the judge used his judicial office improperly by attempting to intercede in criminal matters on behalf of friends and benefactors. As a matter of law, such conduct also violated the Code of Judicial Conduct, canon 2B (prohibiting family or social relationships from influencing judicial conduct). The fact the judge "saw nothing judicially improper" about his conduct could not preclude a charge of wilful misconduct, since that term embraces intentional conduct that a judge should have known was beyond his judicial authority.

(8) Judges § 6—Removal—Grounds—Wilful Misconduct—Improprieties in Bail-setting.—The Commission on Judicial Performance properly found that a municipal court judge acted improperly, unreasonably, and arbitrarily in matters of bail-setting and own-recognizance (OR) release, where the record disclosed that on several occasions the judge offered to grant OR motions which he had originally denied if defense counsel would post a personal check payable to a charity which the judge would hold and return on termination of the case. Such conduct constituted wilful misconduct. Also constituting wilful misconduct was an instance in which the judge refused to hear an OR motion on the merits, instead offering to grant the requested release as a favor to the public defender. The judge also engaged in wilful misconduct by refusing to hear a bail motion after denial of the prosecution's motion to dismiss, where the evidence suggested the reason for such refusal was the public defender's previous objection to the judge's direct questioning of his client on the facts of the case.

(9) Judges § 6—Removal—Grounds—Wilful Misconduct—Comments Impugning Character of Judicial Colleagues.—The Commission on Judicial Performance properly found that a municipal court judge made insulting and derogatory comments from the bench and in chambers impugning the character and competence of his judicial colleagues, in violation of the Code of Judicial Conduct, canon 2A (requiring that judges conduct themselves in a manner promoting public confidence in integrity of judiciary), where there was uncontroverted evidence proving that on several occasions he made grossly unflattering remarks regarding the physical appearance, impartiality, and work habits of his fellow judges. Such criticisms and insults were manifestly uttered in bad faith while the judge was acting in his judicial capacity and thus constituted wilful misconduct.

(10) Judges § 6—Removal—Grounds—Wilful Misconduct—Abuse of Judicial Authority.—The Commission on Judicial Performance properly found that a municipal court judge engaged in a continuous course of overreaching and abuse of judicial authority, where the record disclosed he conducted court proceedings on three occasions in the absence of counsel for one or both of the parties. Although the judge may not have intended to harm the interests of any of the parties involved, he acted intentionally and in bad faith and had thus engaged in wilful misconduct. The record also disclosed another instance in which the judge improperly conditioned dismissal of a case on the defendant's stipulation to the validity of his arrest, even though the district attorney conceded the defendant had mistakenly been taken into custody. Such deliberate and unreasonable action was a form of judicial coercion and constituted wilful misconduct as a matter of law.

(11) Judges § 6—Removal—Grounds—Wilful Misconduct—Conduct of Court Business in Violation of Proper Procedures.—The Commission on Judicial Performance properly found that a municipal court judge conducted court business in violation of proper judicial procedures, to the detriment of the fair, orderly, and decorous administration of justice. The record disclosed the judge left the bench on several occasions during court proceedings, instructing counsel to continue adducing testimony in his absence, and that he disposed of another case by dismissing it on his own initiative and declaring the dog leash and license ordinance at issue unconstitutional on its face without affording the People notice or opportunity to be heard. The evidence also disclosed that the judge entered the jury room during deliberations without counsel for both parties and that he held a half-off sentencing "bargain day" for persons pleading guilty to Vehicle Code violations and misdemeanors. Each of these actions constituted wilful misconduct.

(12) Judges § 6—Removal—Grounds—Wilful Misconduct—Ethnic Slurs. —The Commission on Judicial Performance properly found that a municipal court judge, both in open court and in private communications with persons associated with the court, improperly engaged in personal verbal attacks, indulged in indelicate sexual and ethnic remarks, and made comments that cast doubt on his appreciation of the nature and importance of his judicial duties. Ethnic slurs uttered from the bench constituted unjudicial conduct by the judge acting in his judicial capacity, despite his contention that the remarks were made in jest, and were therefore sanctionable as wilful misconduct. Other ethnic slurs made in a colleague's chambers and at a Christmas party for court personnel constituted the lesser offense of conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice.

(13) Judges § 6—Removal—Grounds—Wilful Misconduct.—A municipal court judge was ordered removed from office where clear and convincing evidence supported 20 of the 21 charges of wilful misconduct and/or conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice levelled against him by the Commission on Judicial Performance, and where his misconduct was persistent and pervasive. The judge's claim of mitigating circumstances was not entitled to significant weight, since there can be no mitigation for maliciously motivated judicial misconduct, and since it was found that on numerous occasions the judge in fact acted in bad faith. However, the misconduct at issue did not rise to the level of moral turpitude, dishonesty, or corruption, and the judge was thus permitted to practice law, provided he pass the Professional Responsibility Examination.

COUNSEL

OPINION

THE COURT.—Petitioner was appointed municipal court judge in May 1972. In June 1980 the Commission on Judicial Performance (Commission) notified petitioner, pursuant to rule 904 of the California Rules of Court, of certain allegations of judicial misconduct.[1] In November 1980 the Commission served petitioner with a notice of formal proceedings, as required by rule 905, consisting of seven counts and fifty-five subcounts of "wilful misconduct in office" and "conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute" (hereinafter "wilful misconduct" and "conduct prejudicial," respectively).

We appointed three special masters to take testimony on this matter, and the Commission appointed examiners to present the case. After 17 days of confidential hearings the masters issued their report to the Commission in November 1981, concluding that petitioner had not engaged in wilful misconduct or conduct prejudicial. The Commission heard oral argument, and in May 1982 issued its findings of fact and conclusions of law, sustaining 21 counts of wilful misconduct and conduct prejudicial. The Commission recommended that petitioner be removed from office.

(1) Judge Gonzalez disputes the Commission's findings and recommendation, and petitions this court for review. Beyond challenging the merits of the Commission's conclusions, he raises a procedural objection that we dispose of at the outset. He claims that by granting the examiners an additional 10-day extension to file their objections to the report of the masters, beyond the 30-day extension initially granted, the Commission violated rule 915, which limits time extensions to 30 days "in the aggregate." In addition, he contests the Commission's acceptance of the objections, filed two days after the expiration of the second extension.

Although he does not request any specific form of relief, presumably petitioner contends this proceeding should have been terminated upon the examiner's failure to meet the filing deadlines. His claim is without merit. Not only was Judge Gonzalez not prejudiced by the 12-day delay (McCartney v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications (1974) 12 Cal.3d 512, 519 [116 Cal.Rptr. 260, 526 P.2d 268]), but in fact he benefitted from the Commission's liberality by requesting and receiving "identical time" to file his own objections. Furthermore, as a matter of policy, it would be unwise to forsake inquiry into the substance of serious allegations of judicial misconduct merely because of such a brief procedural delay.

†Assigned by the Chairperson of the Judicial Council.

(2) We turn now to the merits of Judge Gonzalez' case and begin by summarizing the duties and standards governing our review. Initially it is our duty independently to review the evidence adduced by the masters. The standard of proof we must apply is well established: the allegations must be proved by "clear and convincing evidence sufficient to sustain a charge to a reasonable certainty." (Geiler v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications (1973) 10 Cal.3d 270, 275 [110 Cal.Rptr. 201, 515 P.2d 1].) (3) We have also defined standards of judicial performance to guide our review of the Commission's disciplinary recommendation: "The ultimate standard for judicial conduct must be conduct which constantly reaffirms fitness for the high responsibilities of judicial office." (Id. at p. 281.)

(4) The charge of wilful misconduct connotes "unjudicial conduct which a judge acting in his judicial capacity commits in bad faith, . . ." (Id. at p. 284.) "Bad faith" is equivalent to actual malice and encompasses the intentional commission of acts which the judge knew or reasonably should have known were beyond his lawful power, as well as acts which though within the ambit of lawful judicial authority are committed for purposes other than the faithful discharge of judicial duties. (Spruance v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications (1975) 13 Cal.3d 778, 796 [119 Cal.Rptr. 841, 523 P.2d 1209].)

(5) The lesser included charge of conduct prejudicial connotes "conduct which a judge undertakes in good faith but which nevertheless would appear to an objective observer to be not only unjudicial conduct but conduct prejudicial to public esteem for the judicial office," as well as wilful misconduct out of office, "i.e., unjudicial conduct committed in bad faith by a judge not then acting in a judicial capacity." (Geiler, supra, 10 Cal.3d at p. 284 & fn. 11.) (6) A judge may be censured or removed from the bench only for wilful misconduct or conduct prejudicial.

In keeping with our obligation to scrutinize the record, we have examined in detail the full transcript of the hearings before the masters, the examiners' objection to the report of the masters, the report of the masters, the Commission's findings of fact and conclusions of law, as well as the briefs filed in this court. We concur in 20 of the Commission's 21 charges of wilful misconduct and/or conduct prejudicial, adopt its findings of fact on these counts as our own, and set out pertinent portions of its findings in the margin.[2] We summarize the fac-

[2]The Commission's findings, in pertinent part, are as follows:

"FINDINGS OF FACT

"I. (Count III, Paragraphs 3c and 3a)

"Respondent has used his judicial office improperly in influencing, or attempting to influence, law enforcement officers and officers of the court concerning criminal matters.

"1. In March, 1978, Respondent summoned Deputy District Attorney Joseph R. Martinez to his chambers to attempt to influence him to dismiss a case not then pending before Respondent, the case of People v. Frank Jose Terrones (M191676), in which defendant had already pleaded tual determinations and legal conclusions reached.

(7) First, we find clear and convincing evidence that Judge Gonzalez has guilty and had been sentenced. Present in Respondent's chambers was Los Angeles County Deputy Sheriff Art Guerra, who regularly sought and received from Respondent dismissals of traffic cases on behalf of defendants, and who previously had requested such a dismissal from Mr. Martinez and had been refused.

"2. In May, 1978, Deputy District Attorney Joseph R. Martinez was contacted regarding a felony case, People v. Kasparian (A343101), by three people: the defendant's father; Mr. Semon Kasperoff, a wealthy, influential member of the community and long-time friend of Respondent's; and another person; concerning an immediate disposition of the case. Mr. Martinez told them that it was a good case which would proceed to preliminary hearing, and suggested that they seek the assistance of an attorney. Later that same day, Respondent telephoned Mr. Martinez about the Kasparian case, which was not then pending before Respondent, and asked if Mr. Martinez would discuss the matter in his chambers with the above-named persons. It was Mr. Martinez' belief, based on his prior experiences with Respondent, that Respondent wanted him present in his chambers to attempt to pressure him into a disposition of the case.

"II. (Count I, Paragraphs 1, 2, 3 and 5)

"Respondent has acted improperly, unreasonably, and arbitrarily in matters of bail-setting and own-recognizance release.

"1. Respondent admitted that in three cases during his tenure on the bench, after he had denied motions to release on own recognizance, he had offered to grant such releases if defense counsel would issue personal checks for $25 to their favorite charity, which Respondent would hold and return to them after the cases had been terminated. Respondent advised defense counsel that if they had that much trust and confidence in their clients, they could prove that good-faith belief in their clients' integrity by advancing their own personal checks.

"2. On or about December 17, 1975, in People v. Larry Williams (M175329), Deputy Public Defender Bruce Hoffman appeared before Respondent to request an own recognizance release for defendant Williams. Hoffman was appearing for the attorney of record, private counsel Stan Delnick. Respondent, without allowing argument on the merits, stated that defendant's motion would be denied unless Mr. Hoffman was requesting defendant's own recognizance release as a special favor, in which event the motion would be granted.

"3. On or about December 17, 1975, in the case of People v. Larry Williams (M175329), Stan Delnick, a private attorney appointed to represent defendant Williams, requested that Respondent release defendant on his own recognizance. Respondent refused to order an own-recognizance release for defendant Williams, who was then free on his own recognizance in two other pending cases, but agreed to release defendant upon Mr. Delnick personally posting $50 cash bail, in violation of Rule 5-104(A) of the Code of Professional Conduct, which was done.

"4. On or about February 3, 1975, in the case of People v. Manuel Cruz Cerda (M167759), defendant appeared before Respondent for arraignment. The charge was violation of Penal Code Section 148. Deputy District Attorney Richard Neidorf and the filing deputy for the District Attorney's office, Jess Cortez, both moved for dismissal of the case.

"Respondent then read the police report and inquired of the defendant as to certain factual matters, such as what defendant Cerda had allegedly done to violate the law. Deputy Public Defender Bruce Hoffman objected to the questioning. Thereupon, Respondent denied the motion to dismiss, set a pre-trial date for February 7, 1975, and set bail at $500.

"Mr. Hoffman moved for defendant's release on his own recognizance. Respondent refused to entertain the motion, indicating that he had lost jurisdiction in the case once it had been set for pre-trial. Respondent indicated that he would not entertain the motion because Mr. Hoffman had been the one who had opened his mouth when Respondent had attempted to question the defendant.

"III. (Count VII, Paragraph 4)

"Respondent repeatedly has made insulting comments from the bench about the judges with used his judicial office improperly by attempting to intercede in criminal mat-whom he shared the East Los Angeles bench. It is true that on occasions Respondent did critically remark as to the work habits of his judicial colleagues and did recklessly threaten and impugn the integrity of his colleagues.

"IV. (Count III, Paragraphs 1a, 1b, 1b' and 2c)

"Respondent has overreached his judicial authority by conducting court proceedings in the absence of counsel for one or both parties and exerting undue, improper pressure upon a defendant to plead guilty.

"1. In late 1974-early 1976, former Deputy Public Defender Vernon Putnam was involved in a proceeding in another division when he was summoned to appear in Respondent's courtroom. Mr. Putnam finished his appearance and proceeded to Respondent's courtroom where his client's motion to declare a prior conviction unconstitutional was on calendar. When Mr. Putnam entered Respondent's courtroom, he discovered his client seated in the witness chair giving testimony in response to questioning by either Respondent or the prosecutor.

"Mr. Putnam objected to the impropriety of commencing the hearing in his absence. Following argument between Respondent and Mr. Putnam, Respondent disqualified himself, and the matter was transferred to another division for a de novo hearing. Respondent's explanation was that his court was busy, Mr. Putnam had not responded to the summons, so Respondent had started without him.

"2. During a case heard by Respondent between 1975 and the first part of 1976, then Deputy Public Defender James Tucker arrived in Respondent's courtroom and discovered that the hearing on his client's motion to suppress evidence had commenced without him. When Mr. Tucker arrived, the police officer witness was on the witness stand being examined by Respondent, and the defendant was seated at counsel table. Mr. Tucker objected to Respondent's commencement of the hearing in his absence. Respondent offered to start over, but subsequently transferred the matter to another division.

"3. Between approximately April 1978 and October 1979, when the prosecutor was late returning to Respondent's courtroom after lunch, Respondent continued with the voir dire of the veniremen in the prosecutor's absence.

"4. On or about March 23, 1976, in the case of People v. Frank O. Ortega, the prosecution moved to dismiss the case against defendant Ortega, who had wrongfully been arrested and was being held in custody. Respondent said he would grant the motion to dismiss the case only if the defendant agreed not to sue the county for false arrest. When Deputy Public Defender Bruce Hoffman complained that his client was being coerced because he was in custody, Respondent replied that he was a taxpayer and that he was acting in the taxpayers' and the county's best interests.

"V. (Count V, Paragraphs 2, 3, 9, and 15)

"Respondent has repeatedly conducted court business in a manner which ignores procedures required by law and essential to the fair, orderly, and decorous administration of justice.

"1. Respondent has left the bench abruptly during proceedings in his courtroom. On two such occasions during 1977-1978, he instructed counsel for the parties to continue adducing testimony while he was gone and to note their objections to the testimony in writing so that he could rule on the objections when he returned to the bench. In each instance—once in a jury trial and once in either a court trial or a preliminary hearing—testimony continued during Respondent's absence from the court.

"2. On or about May 25, 1978, in the case of People v. Rebecca Hernandez (S.A.A.C. No. 6076), Respondent dismissed the charges and declared a county ordinance unconstitutional in a press release issued in chambers, outside regular court hours, without notice to or appearance by the prosecution and without appearance by the defendant.

"3. Between 1972 and 1977, Respondent occasionally entered the jurors' room during their deliberations and in the absence of either counsel for the People or for the defense, or both, and without valid legal cause. Inside, Respondent discussed issues material to the cases upon which the juries had been deliberating. Respondent admitted in testimony that he 'wasn't concerned if the District Attorney wasn't present . . . .'

"4. On one occasion, Respondent informed the Public Defender's office that, on the forthcoming Thursday, he would impose only one-half of his customary sentence or fine in cases ters on behalf of friends and benefactors. (Finding I.[3]) In People v. Frank Terrones and in People v. Kasparian, Judge Gonzalez contacted the deputy in charge of the district attorney's office in East Los Angeles and attempted to induce him to dismiss criminal charges. In Terrones (Count III, ¶ 3(c)[4]) he acted at the behest of a law enforcement official; in Kasparian (Count III, ¶ 3(a)) he sought to help an influential friend whose son had been arrested. Though certain factual details were disputed, petitioner concedes that he often approached district attorneys to urge dismissal. The following quotation from his testimony epitomizes Judge Gonzalez' judicial philosophy on this issue: "[I]f [a legislator, a sheriff, a political chairman] . . . if anyone who helped me or a brother judge on the bench were to call me and say, 'Mike, what can you do for this where the defendant pleaded guilty. All the deputy public defenders took advantage of Respondent's prospective offer, by advancing their cases on calendar to coincide with the appointed 'Bargain Day.' Respondent indeed imposed one-half the customary fines upon defendants pleading guilty on that day.

"On this occasion or a second, Respondent also announced the identical offer to a courtroom full of defendants. In neither announcement did Respondent limit his proposed deal to one-point vehicle infractions; on the contrary, it actually applied to misdemeanors.

"VI. (Count VI, Paragraphs 1, 3, 4, 5, and 6)

"Both in open court and in private communications with persons associated with the court, Respondent improperly engaged in personal verbal attacks, indulged in indelicate sexual and ethnic remarks, and made comments which cast doubt upon his appreciation of the nature and importance of his judicial duties and his ability to sit as a fair and impartial judge.

". . . . . .

"1. During pronouncement of a judgment on a tall, large male of Mexican extraction, on the charge of beating his wife, who was small in stature, the Respondent stated such a course of conduct may be tolerated in Mexico and Africa but would not be tolerated in America.

"2. During jury voir dire in a criminal case in June or July, 1979, while questioning an Asian venireman about inflation, Respondent commented that he did not know why he was speaking to a Japanese juror about inflation because 'What do fishheads and rice cost?'

"3. During jury voir dire in a criminal case in approximately August or September, 1980, a black woman on the panel responded that she was a clerk at Safeway, and Respondent next asked her, 'What is the price of watermelon per pound?' The deputy district attorney winced at the question, and later advised Respondent that the question could be offensive to some blacks. Respondent, however, repeated the same question to the same black woman upon her appearance among a subsequent group of panel members.

"4. In Judge Gilbert R. Ruiz' chambers in April or May, 1980, Respondent answered Deputy District Attorney David Milton's disclosure of his wife's miscarriage by saying, 'Oh, good. One less minority,' or words to that effect. Thereafter, Respondent apologized.

"5 On December 19, 1979, at a Christmas party attended by most of the courthouse personnel, Respondent asked a Jewish deputy district attorney, Wendy Widlus, 'Tell me something, Wendy, with all the interbreeding that your people do, aren't you afraid that they will produce a race of idiots?' Ms. Widlus was offended, very angry, and considered the remark to be tasteless as well as anti-Semitic.

"VII. (Count IV)

"During the period of September, 1977 through April 1980, Respondent persistently made improper and unwanted sexual advances toward Maria Rody Moreno, an interpreter assigned to the East Los Angeles Municipal Court."

matter?' I'm going to tell them all the same thing, you know, that I can't dismiss it on my own motion. 'So let me refer you to the D.A. and see if what, if anything, he can do.' And I don't care whether the D.A. dismisses it. I don't care whether the D.A. tells me to go to hell. I don't care whether the D.A. calls up the Assemblyman and the doctor and the sheriff and tells them to go to hell.

"I have cemented relationships between the person who referred that individual to me. And that person, if he was in chambers . . . will go back and tell his judge friend, 'Judge, I appreciate your opening the door of Judge Number 45. And I certainly appreciate Judge Number 45 trying to do what he can, too. But it was that dirty no-good D.A.'

"The referring judge gets points with his friends. I make points with the judge, the D.A., the Assemblyman, the doctor, the sheriff, whoever it is. And that's the little game we play in the criminal justice system." (Italics added.)

In Terrones and in Kasparian, Judge Gonzalez intentionally exploited his judicial office to attempt to influence the disposition of criminal matters. His conduct therefore constitutes wilful misconduct.[5] (Spruance, supra, 13 Cal.3d at p. 798.) As a matter of law he has also violated canon 2B of the Code of Judicial Conduct, which provides that "A judge should not allow his family, social, or other relationships to influence his judicial conduct or judgment. He should not lend the prestige of his office to advance the private interests of others; nor should he convey or permit others to convey the impression that they are in a special position to influence him . . . ." In Spruance we held a similar violation of canon 2B to constitute wilful misconduct. (13 Cal.3d at p. 798.) Petitioner's insistence that he "saw nothing judicially improper" about his conduct cannot preclude a charge of wilful misconduct, for that term embraces intentional conduct that a judge should have known was beyond his judicial authority. (Geiler, supra, 10 Cal.3d at p. 286.) Petitioner's patent misunderstanding of the nature of his judicial responsibility serves not to mitigate but to aggravate the severity of his misconduct.

(8) The record also supports the finding that Judge Gonzalez has acted improperly, unreasonably, and arbitrarily in matters of bail-setting and own-recognizance (OR) release. (Finding II.) On two or three occasions, as petitioner has admitted, he offered to grant OR motions which he had originally denied if defense counsel—in each case a public defender—would post a personal check in the amount of $25, payable to counsel's favorite charity, which he would hold and return on termination of the case. (Count I, ¶ 1.) Similarly, in the case of People v. Williams, petitioner informed the private attorney ap-

[5]Where we find that petitioner's actions constitute wilful misconduct as a matter of law we also find that he has committed the lesser included offense of conduct prejudicial.

pointed to represent defendant that he would grant the OR motion on condition that the attorney post his own $50 in cash as bail. (Count I, ¶ 3.) Judge Gonzalez apparently reasoned that defense counsel could best prove trust and confidence in their clients by risking their personal funds. He further explained that his purpose was "both psychological and educational."

The legal impropriety of Judge Gonzalez' conduct on these occasions is obvious. He caused attorneys who did accede to the personal check policy to violate rule 5-104(A) of the Rules of Professional Conduct, which provides: "A member of the State Bar shall not directly or indirectly pay or agree to pay, guarantee, or represent or sanction the representation that he will pay personal or business expenses by or for a client . . . ." On the other hand, a defense attorney's refusal or inability to post the necessary sum might seriously strain the attorney-client relationship by undermining the client's trust in his or her attorney. Moreover, by purporting to "educate" young public defenders to the realities of criminal defense practice, Judge Gonzalez impermissibly sought to use his judicial office to further a "purpose other than the faithful discharge of judicial duties." (Spruance, supra, 13 Cal.3d at p. 796.) For these reasons, his action clearly constitutes wilful misconduct.

The record further reveals that in 1975, in People v. Williams, Judge Gonzalez refused to hear an OR motion on the merits, but offered to grant the requested release as a special or personal favor to the public defender. (Count I, ¶ 2.) At the hearing before the masters the private attorney of record in the case, who had not appeared before petitioner on the matter but who had instead asked the public defender to make the motion in his place, corroborated the testimony of the complaining public defender. Although the examiners concede that the public defender was not the attorney of record, petitioner bogs down in irrelevant arguments concerning the identity of the attorney of record and fails to address the substance of the allegation itself. The fact remains that Judge Gonzalez offered to grant the requested OR release as a favor and refused to hear the argument on the merits. He was acting in his judicial capacity and knew or should have known that such conduct was beyond his lawful power. (Geiler, supra, 10 Cal.3d at p. 286.) Thus petitioner acted in bad faith and his action constitutes wilful misconduct.

Finally, in People v. Manuel Cruz Cerda, following a motion to dismiss by the People, Judge Gonzalez questioned the defendant directly on the facts of the case. When the public defender objected that his client was being interrogated on matters relating to guilt or innocence and instructed his client not to answer, he immediately fixed bail at $500, set a pretrial date, and refused to entertain the defendant's OR release motion. (Count I, ¶ 5.) Petitioner contends first that he does not remember the incident, and alternatively that Judge Ruiz, then in charge of the district attorney's office, must have requested that defendant stipulate to probable cause. Again, however, petitioner's defense is speculative and unpersuasive, and again he fails to grasp the heart of the matter. Petitioner was not charged with unfairly demanding that the defendant stipulate to probable cause in return for a dismissal; he was charged with improperly refusing to hear the defendant's bail motion after turning down the prosecution's motion to dismiss. The evidence suggests petitioner refused to hear the motion because it was the public defender who had "opened his mouth" during the judge's questioning of the defendant. Such hostile, arbitrary, and unreasonable conduct jeopardizes the liberty of an indigent defendant for reasons not related to the merits of the case and therefore constitutes wilful misconduct. (Spruance, supra, 13 Cal.3d at pp. 795-797.)[6]

(9) We also find ample support in the record for the conclusion that Judge Gonzalez has made insulting and derogatory comments from the bench and in chambers impugning the character and competence of his judicial colleagues. (Finding III; count VII, ¶ 4.) Respondent presents uncontroverted evidence proving that on several occasions petitioner made grossly unflattering remarks regarding the physical appearance, impartiality, and work habits of his fellow judges. He insinuated that one judge had accepted a bribe and admitted to calling another judge a "coward" to his face.

By his actions Judge Gonzalez has violated canon 2A of the Code of Judicial Conduct, which requires that judges conduct themselves "at all times in a manner that promotes public confidence in the integrity and impartiality of the judiciary." Petitioner's brash criticisms and colorful insults were manifestly uttered in bad faith while petitioner was acting in his judicial capacity. (Spruance, supra, 13 Cal.3d at p. 796.) His actions therefore constitute wilful misconduct.

(10) The record further reveals that Judge Gonzalez has engaged in a continuous course of overreaching and abuse of judicial authority. (Finding IV.) First, we find that petitioner conducted court proceedings on three occasions in the absence of counsel for one or both of the parties. (Count III, ¶¶ 1a, 1b, and 1b'.) Each of the three complaining attorneys testified that when he entered petitioner's courtroom he found that petitioner had actually begun proceedings without him.

[6]Furthermore, we have held that extended and improper examination of witnesses by a judge places the judge in the role of advocate and may detract from the public image of the court as an impartial tribunal. (McCartney v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications (1974) supra, 12 Cal.3d 512, 533.)

Judge Gonzalez denies the allegations but fails otherwise to impeach the attorneys' testimony. In a tone that rapidly grows tiresome, he reiterates a conspiracy theory typically raised as a defense in judicial misconduct investigations, and contends that the three attorneys simply fabricated their stories. As he does with virtually every allegation, Judge Gonzalez fundamentally misperceives the nature and gravity of the charge and instead views the entire matter as one of political disagreement or personality difference. His own testimony candidly displays his disdain for the three attorneys involved in this allegation: "I've never had a rapport as being an ex-cop and a judge in the very same courthouse wherein I was an ex-cop. I've never had a rapport with what I consider to be liberal-minded-orientated [sic] individuals, and [the three complaining attorneys are] those kinds of people. And a person of my background and philosophy could never cut it with [them]." Moreover, Judge Gonzalez repeatedly boasts an abhorrence of tardiness and may well have thought he was justified in penalizing recalcitrant attorneys by his actions.

It is obvious that conducting judicial proceedings in the absence of counsel for one of the parties seriously interferes with the attorney-client relationship and may also infringe on the right of the accused to effective representation by counsel. Though petitioner may not have intended to harm the interests of any of the parties involved, he acted intentionally and in bad faith. (Spruance, supra, 13 Cal.3d at p. 796; Geiler, supra, 10 Cal.3d at p. 286.) He has therefore engaged in wilful misconduct.

We also find that in the People v. Frank O. Ortega case Judge Gonzalez improperly conditioned dismissing a case against the defendant—who the district attorney conceded should not have been in custody—on the defendant's stipulation to the validity of the arrest. (Count III, ¶ 2c.) In fact the defendant in that case had mistakenly been arrested for failure to appear pursuant to a citation that did not call for his appearance until two days following the arrest. Because the defendant had spent two days in jail, the People acceded to the public defender's request that the charges be dismissed. Petitioner nonetheless conditioned dismissal on the defendant's stipulation to probable cause, explaining to the public defender that he was acting as a taxpayer in the best interest of the county. Despite some protestations that he did not remember the case, Judge Gonzalez essentially conceded the accuracy of the testimony on this allegation.

By way of defense or explanation petitioner relies on Hoines v. Barney's Club, Inc. (1980) 28 Cal.3d 603 [170 Cal.Rptr. 42, 620 P.2d 628]. But Hoines sustains the prosecutor's prerogative—not the court's—to condition consent to a dismissal of charges on a stipulation of probable cause for arrest. (Id. at p. 611.) Nothing in Hoines suggests that when a prosecuting attorney declines to request a probable cause stipulation because the defendant had mistakenly been taken into custody and held in jail for two days, a judge may compound the injustice by insisting on the stipulation. Judge Gonzalez acted deliberately and unreasonably. His action is a form of judicial coercion and constitutes wilful misconduct as a matter of law.

(11) Next, we find the record discloses that Judge Gonzalez has conducted court business in violation of proper judicial procedures, to the detriment of the fair, orderly, and decorous administration of justice. (Finding V, count V, ¶¶ 2, 3, 9, 15.) Specifically, petitioner has left the bench on several occasions during court proceedings, instructing counsel to continue adducing testimony in his absence and to note any objections in writing so that he might rule on them on his return. (Count V, ¶ 2.) As was customary in petitioner's chambers, on most of these occasions there was no court reporter to help reconstruct the questions asked or the objections taken. Judge Gonzalez denies the allegation and calls the examiners' witnesses "liars." His bailiff and clerk corroborated his denial.

As noted earlier, the standard of proof governing our review of the evidence is the "clear and convincing" standard first articulated by this court in Geiler. In resolving the credibility contest surrounding this allegation, we find, contrary to petitioner's claim, no evidence in the record that any of the examiners' three witnesses ever engaged in any "conspiracy" against petitioner. With no motive to lie or fabricate, each witness testified, under oath, to observing judicial conduct so unusual that even the casual observer would have remembered it plainly.

By leaving the bench during judicial proceedings Judge Gonzalez has demonstrated a flagrant lack of respect for his judicial office, in violation of the general provision and spirit of canon 3 of the Code of Judicial Conduct. If only for a few moments at any one time, on these occasions he abandoned his role in the adjudicative process in utter disregard for his obligation diligently to perform the duties of his office. As such, his unjudicial behavior rises to the level of wilful misconduct.

Judge Gonzalez further demonstrates his disregard for proper judicial procedures by his highly unorthodox and patently improper disposition of the case of People v. Rebecca Hernandez. (Count V, ¶ 3.) The facts regarding this matter are virtually undisputed. The defendant was cited for violating the county dog leash and license ordinance, and failed to appear on the appointed court date. In chambers, on the evening of May 25, 1978, petitioner on his own initiative dismissed the case and declared the ordinance unconstitutional on its face. No notice or opportunity to be heard was afforded the People; no motion had ever been made by the defendant. Judge Gonzalez merely issued what he described in his testimony before the masters as "an opinion in the form of a press release." In an almost farcical misapplication of constitutional law, Judge Gonzalez declared that the dog leash/license ordinance violated the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment because it applied to dog-owners but not to owners of "(a) Canaries, (b) Chinchillas . . . (k) Mynah birds . . . (o) Squirrel monkeys, (p) Steppe legal [sic] eagles, (q) Toucans . . . " and so on. Although Judge Gonzalez sought to start the entire proceeding over so that any appeal taken might reach substantive issues, the district attorney refused to forego immediate review and petitioner's ruling was reversed because of its procedural impropriety.

Petitioner openly admits and defends his action: ". . . I did it under the theory that the statute was unconstitutional on its face, and a judge is permitted to do that if that be the case . . . . As for that, it can be ex parte. That is the law." Yet, not surprisingly, petitioner does not cite any legal authority for the untenable conclusion that a judge may dispose of cases and invalidate legislation without affording the parties an opportunity to participate. By his flagrant and deliberate disregard for even the minimal requirements of fairness and due process petitioner has far exceeded the bounds of his judicial authority. (Geiler, supra, 10 Cal.3d at p. 286; Cannon v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications (1975) 14 Cal.3d 678, 694 [122 Cal.Rptr. 778, 537 P.2d 898].) Furthermore, the facts strongly suggest that as a candidate for election to the superior court at the time of this ruling, Judge Gonzalez was motivated by a desire for preelection publicity. Though his "press release opinion" may indeed have earned him a certain political notoriety, such a blatant exploitation of the judicial office for political ends seriously and impermissibly undermines public esteem for the impartiality and integrity of the judiciary. While petitioner apparently fails to appreciate the gravity of his transgression, we hold his action to constitute wilful misconduct as a matter of law.

We also find that Judge Gonzalez has disregarded proper judicial procedures by entering the jury room during deliberations without counsel for both parties. (Count V, ¶ 9.) The examiners presented three witnesses who testified in significant detail that Judge Gonzalez repeatedly entered the jury room while the jury was deliberating. Petitioner admits he entered the jury room, but denies he ever did so in the absence of defense counsel: "I've never gone in by myself. I've never gone in without cause just to see what they're doing, not without exception of the times that I've gone into the jury room when one or both or all three of us were present. I wasn't concerned if the D.A. wasn't present, but I was always concerned if the defense attorney wasn't present."

Petitioner denies the impropriety of any of his entries into the jury room. He cites People v. Vinson (1981) 121 Cal.App.3d 80, 84 [175 Cal.Rptr. 123], for the proposition that a private communication between a judge and juror does not necessarily constitute reversible error. However, once again Judge Gonzalez fails to grasp the heart of the matter. He has not been charged with committing reversible error by his actions, nor is this the standard for determining whether his misconduct is sanctionable. Rather, petitioner was charged with having "conducted . . . court business in a manner demonstrating ignorance of and indifference to procedures required by law which are essential to the fair, orderly, and decorous administration of justice." It is of course well established that "private communication between court and jury are improper, and that all communications should be made in open court." (People v. Alcalde (1944) 24 Cal.2d 177, 189 [148 P.2d 627]; see also Paulson v. Superior Court (1962) 58 Cal.2d 1, 7 [22 Cal.Rptr. 649, 372 P.2d 641].) Although informal communications between judge and jury may not result in reversible error if an appeal is in fact taken, for our present purposes it is important to stress that such communications do interfere with the parties' right to the assistance of counsel and do undermine public esteem for the integrity and impartiality of the judicial office. The evidence in this case clearly establishes Judge Gonzalez' patent indifference and disrespect for settled judicial practices. He certainly should have known his jury room visits were beyond his lawful powers. (Geiler, supra, 10 Cal.3d at p. 286.) We, therefore, find these actions constitute wilful misconduct.

Finally, we find that Judge Gonzalez improperly disregarded judicial procedures by announcing in open court, and later holding, a so-called half-off sentencing "bargain day" for persons pleading guilty. (Count V, ¶ 15.) Petitioner admits he made the blanket offer but maintains it was limited to Vehicle Code violators. We find that in fact he extended the offer more broadly to include misdemeanants, some of whom were represented by public defenders who advanced their cases on the calendar to coincide with "bargain day." Judge Gonzalez defends his use of the en masse plea bargaining technique by pointing to the court's congested calendar and by claiming to have sought "a couple of dollars for the county and a conviction for the state."

By his wholesale plea bargaining scheme Judge Gonzalez has deliberately misused his otherwise lawful power to reduce sentences and fines in individual cases. As we pointed out in Geiler, even the admirable goal of expediting judicial procedures cannot justify the court's abrogation of its duty to determine each case on its own merits. (10 Cal.3d at p. 285.) Judge Gonzalez' further declared aims of filling the county coffer and scoring convictions for the state are of course completely extraneous to the administration of justice. Judge Gonzalez certainly should have known that his "bargain day" sentencing offer—even if limited to vehicular offenses—contravened the principle of individualized sentencing embodied in our Penal Code. (Pen. Code, § 1203 et seq.) We therefore find his action constitutes wilful misconduct as a matter of law.

(12) The record also reveals that both in open court and in private communications with persons associated with the court Judge Gonzalez improperly engaged in personal verbal attacks, indulged in indelicate sexual and ethnic remarks, and made comments that cast doubt on his appreciation of the nature and importance of his judicial duties. (Finding VI.) On pronouncing judgment on a male of Mexican extraction on a charge of beating his wife, petitioner stated that although such behavior might be tolerated in Africa or Mexico, it would not be tolerated in America. (Count VI, ¶ 6.) During jury voir dire in a criminal case he questioned a Japanese venireman about inflation and then commented that he did not know why he was speaking to a Japanese juror about inflation, because "what do fishheads and rice cost?" (Count VI, ¶ 3.) During another jury voir dire in a criminal case petitioner asked a black woman on the panel who had said she worked as a grocery clerk if she knew the price of watermelon. (Count VI, ¶ 4.) In a colleague's chambers petitioner responded to the news that a black district attorney's wife had had a miscarriage by saying, in essence, "Oh good, one less minority." (Count VI, ¶ 1.) Finally, at a Christmas party attended by most of the court personnel petitioner asked a female Jewish district attorney whether "with all the inbreeding your people do, aren't you afraid that they will produce a race of idiots," or words to that effect. (Count VI, ¶ 5.)

Petitioner vigorously insists that any ethnic or sexual remarks he may have made were made in jest, and that in fact he has never treated ethnic or minority groups unfairly. However, Judge Gonzalez' subjective intent is not at issue. As a judge he is charged with the obligation to conduct himself at all times in a manner that promotes public confidence and esteem for the judiciary. Particular friends or associates may assure themselves that the judge's ethnic remarks are made in jest, but such facially blatant ethnic slurs as those Judge Gonzalez uttered from the bench are apt to offend minority members not familiar with petitioner's views and may be construed by the public at large as highly demeaning to minorities. Regardless of his personal feelings on racial harmony or the propriety of ethnic humor, Judge Gonzalez should have known that his admittedly "salty" courtroom comments were unbecoming and inappropriate. The ethnic slurs uttered from the bench constitute unjudicial conduct by a judge acting in his judicial capacity and are therefore sanctionable as wilful misconduct. (Geiler, supra, 10 Cal.3d at pp. 283-284.)

The comment made off the bench regarding the black district attorney's wife's miscarriage and the Christmas party Jewish remark pose a less serious threat to public esteem for the integrity of the judiciary. However, as held in In re Stevens (1982) 31 Cal.3d 403 [183 Cal.Rptr. 48, 645 P.2d 99], ethnic and racial epithets uttered in chambers do constitute the lesser offense of conduct prejudicial. (Id. at p. 404.) Derogatory remarks, although made in chambers or at a staff gathering, may become public knowledge and thereby diminish the hearer's esteem for the judiciary—again regardless of the speaker's subjective intent or motivation. The reputation in the community of an individual judge necessarily reflects on that community's regard for the judicial system. We hold that petitioner's "one less minority" and inbreeding remarks constitute conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice.

Finally, we review the Commission's finding that during the period of September 1977 through April 1980 Judge Gonzalez persistently made improper and unwanted sexual advance toward a court interpreter assigned to the East Los Angeles Municipal Court. (Finding VII; count VI.) Petitioner disputes the factual finding of sexual harassment. After close scrutiny of the entire record we are not persuaded that the charge is supported by clear and convincing evidence. This charge of conduct prejudicial is therefore not sustained.

We have sustained all eighteen of the Commission's charges of wilful misconduct and two of its three charges of conduct prejudicial. We turn now to our most important responsibility, the decision whether to adopt the Commission's recommendation that Judge Gonzalez be removed from office.

(13) In the final analysis Judge Gonzalez utterly fails to grasp either the substance or seriousness of the numerous charges levelled against him by the Commission. Despite multiple admonitions and the normal evidentiary limitations of the hearing process, Judge Gonzalez has treated this investigation as an attack on his character. Thus he boasts he is opinionated, outspoken, hardworking, and extroverted, but never prejudiced and always impartial. He persists in his theory that his adversaries conspired to record his every misdeed and regards virtually every allegation as personally motivated. Rather than respond affirmatively and convincingly to the specific charges, he expends most of his defense effort in attacking the character and credibility of the adverse witnesses. While he concedes there may be certain minor irregularities in his judicial manner and procedures, he denies he has ever deliberately abused his judicial office and generally refuses to admit he has done anything improper.

Judge Gonzalez reiterates his conspiracy theory and offers character evidence to mitigate punishment. Yet it is well established that there can be no mitigation for maliciously motivated judicial misconduct. (Spruance, supra, 13 Cal.3d at p. 800), and we have found that on numerous occasions Judge Gonzalez in fact acted in bad faith. We therefore give his claim of mitigating circumstances no significant weight.

Judge Gonzalez' misconduct has been persistent and pervasive. Because we recognize the important role that the municipal court judge plays in our judicial system, we cannot risk the recurrence of petitioner's misconduct. We therefore order that Judge Mario P. Gonzalez of the Municipal Court for the East Los Angeles Judicial District be removed from office effective on the date of finality of this decision.

We recognize that since the advent of the Commission on Judicial Performance the bench has been governed by a higher standard of conduct than the bar. (Geiler, supra, 10 Cal.3d at p. 287.) Because we do not find that Judge Gonzalez' misconduct rises to the level of moral turpitude, dishonesty, or corruption, we order that despite his removal from office he be permitted to practice law in California, on condition that he pass the Professional Responsibility Examination required of applicants seeking readmission or reinstatement to the bar. (Cal. Rules of Court, rule 952(d).) All attorneys who have been suspended from practice must pass this examination before being readmitted (Segretti v. State Bar (1976) 15 Cal.3d 878, 890-891 [126 Cal.Rptr. 793, 544 P.2d 929]), and we see no reason to exempt from this requirement a judge who, on removal from office, is automatically suspended from practicing law. (Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (d).)

[L.A. No. 32200. Oct. 29, 1987.]

ROBERT H. FUREY, JR., a Judge of the Justice Court, Petitioner,
v.
COMMISSION ON JUDICIAL PERFORMANCE, Respondent.

SUMMARY

The Supreme Court ordered that a justice court judge be removed from office after it sustained eight charges of willful misconduct against him arising out of four separate incidents and ten charges of prejudicial conduct. The record established that the judge had engaged in numerous incidents involving abuse of his contempt power, that he had improperly attempted to influence judges in proceedings from which he had been disqualified under Code Civ. Proc., § 170.6, and that he had engaged in reprisals against an individual who had reported his alleged improprieties to the Commission on Judicial Performance. It also established that he continued to do so, even after his attention was drawn to his improprieties. The court held that the judge's relative inexperience on the bench did not mitigate his conduct, since lack of prior experience cannot mitigate wilful misconduct. It held that, in light of the type and number of offenses, the interests of protecting the judicial system and those subject to the power of judges would best be served by removing the judge from office. (Opinion by The Court.)

(1a, 1b) Judges § 6.4—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Proceedings—Review.—The Supreme Court independently reviews the findings of the Commission on Judicial Performance regarding judicial discipline, to ensure that there is clear and convincing evidence to sustain the charge to a reasonable certainty. In doing so, the court gives special weight to the factual determinations by the masters, who are best able to evaluate the truthfulness of witnesses appearing before them. The ultimate disposition rests with the Supreme Court.

(2) Judges § 6.2—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Grounds—Willful Misconduct or Prejudicial Conduct.—A judge's behavior must constantly reaffirm fitness for the serious responsibilities of judicial office. Censure or removal from office is appropriate only when the judge fails to meet that standard by engaging in willful misconduct or prejudicial conduct.

(3a, 3b) Judges § 6.2—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Grounds—Willful Misconduct—Distinguished From Prejudicial Conduct—Malice.—The charge of willful misconduct, in the context of judicial performance, refers to unjudicial conduct which a judge, acting in his judicial capacity, commits in bad faith. The critical distinction between willful misconduct and the lesser charge of prejudicial conduct is the presence of malice. The bad faith constituting malice requires that the judge have committed acts he knew or should have known to be beyond his lawful power, and that he committed them for a purpose other than faithful discharge of judicial duties.

(4) Judges § 6.2—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Grounds—Prejudicial Conduct.—The charge of prejudicial conduct, in the context of judicial performance, comprises that which a judge undertakes in good faith, but which would nonetheless appear to an objective observer to be unjudicial and harmful to the public esteem of the judiciary. It also refers to unjudicial conduct committed in bad faith by a judge not acting in an official capacity.

(5) Judges § 6.2—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Grounds—Prejudicial Conduct.—A justice court judge, who had occupied his office only one or two months, engaged in prejudicial conduct during proceedings to account for a probationer's community service, by abusing the contempt power and engaging in hostility. In response to the probationer's question why the judge was harassing him, the judge held him in contempt and remanded him on the spot, despite the probationer's explanation that he had a medical appointment and was in pain. At a later probation hearing, occurring over defense counsel's objection that there was no written notice of the claimed violation, the judge remanded the probationer to the county jail for 180 days when he brought a note from a doctor outlining his medical condition, on the basis of the probationer's alleged failure to obey the judge's earlier order to come in with something more than a perfunctory letter from a doctor.

(6) Judges § 6—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Duplicative Findings.—Although there is no rigid formula for determining the proper outcome in a case alleging improprieties of a judge, the number and quality of the charges found to be true assumes importance as one of the guidelines the Supreme Court applies in determining discipline. Duplicative findings should, for that reason, be avoided, since obviously such actions cannot be equated with the criminal law, in which each additional accusation exposes the defendant to increased punishment. Thus, although supported by facts, charges appearing to focus on the same misconduct as that underlying other allegations should be discounted by the Commission on Judicial Performance in deciding what discipline to recommend.

(7) Judges § 6.2—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Grounds—Prejudicial Conduct.—A justice court judge, who had been on the bench for less than half a year, engaged in two chargeable instances of prejudicial conduct by his abuse of contempt power and impatience and hostility toward an unrepresented defendant. After the judge refused a traffic defendant's request for more time to pay a fine, the defendant muttered the word "tremendous" under his breath and the judge immediately adjudged him to be in contempt of court without following the contempt procedures of Code Civ. Proc., § 1211, and sentenced him to five days in jail. The judge then again held him in contempt and imposed another sentence of five days when, in response to the first contempt sentence, the defendant articulated a long voiceless palatal fricative ("shhh"), that the judge believed was followed by "it."

(8) Judges § 6.2—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Grounds—Prejudicial Conduct.—A finding of malice and willful misconduct was supported against a justice court judge who, after disqualification in a matter under Code Civ. Proc., § 170.6, wrote an unsolicited note to the newly assigned judge, recommending a stiffer than standard sentence on account of the defendant's alleged bad attitude. However, despite the obvious and grave impropriety of the judge's action, in light of his inexperience he engaged only in prejudicial conduct.

(9a, 9b) Judges § 6.2—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Grounds—Prejudicial Conduct.—A justice court judge engaged in prejudicial conduct against a mentally imbalanced, indigent defendant, where he first ordered that a bag the defendant brought to court be searched, even though it was out of the defendant's reach, and then remanded him for violation of Pen. Code, § 171b, when the search disclosed some food and a small paring knife. The search of the bag on the basis of rumors regarding an earlier knife incident in court was itself questionable, as was the judge's overreaction to a small paring knife that was, in any event, beyond the defendant's reach. The judge then summarily found the defendant in contempt when he uttered delusional remarks, and imposed a penalty effectively resulting in a sentence of approximately 65 days in jail. Such punitive measures bore virtually no relation to the defendant's almost trivial underlying offense of jaywalking and his obvious need for psychiatric care.

(10) Contempt § 6—Punishment—Incarceration—Limits.—A justice court judge abused the contempt power when, in proceedings in which an indigent defendant appeared to discuss his inability to pay a fine for jaywalking, the judge imposed a fine of $500, to be served at $30 per day, in addition to a sentence of five days in jail based on the defendant's alleged contempt in bringing a small paring knife into the courtroom in a bag containing some food. The transcript revealed that the judge was aware that the defendant was indigent and would be compelled to work the fine off at the daily rate. The judge thus increased the penalty for contempt far beyond the five days permitted by Code Civ. Proc., § 1218, to an effective period of incarceration of some 22 days simply to insure that the defendant would be held in jail long enough for a mental examination.

(11) Judges § 6.2—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Grounds—Willful Misconduct.—A justice court judge engaged in willful misconduct by failing to conduct himself in a manner promoting public confidence in the impartiality of the judiciary and denying a defendant's right to be heard. In order to coerce guilty pleas in traffic court and thereby expedite the calendar, he announced to the assembled defendants that he would always believe a police officer in the event of a discrepancy between their respective versions of the facts, because a policeman would not jeopardize his career by engaging in the felony of perjury over such an insignificant matter. He later cut off a defendant during the presentation of his defense, without permitting him an opportunity to cross-examine a police officer who testified for the prosecution and to make a closing argument.

(12) Judges § 6.2—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Grounds—Willful Misconduct.—A justice court judge engaged in willful misconduct by his response to a citizen's letter to the Commission on Judicial Performance and her public announcements alleging that he had her evicted from his courtroom and had ordered the bailiff to punch her in the mouth. He wrote to the citizen directing her to appear before him and, when she did so, ordered her to appear in the municipal court to show cause why she should not be held in contempt for what he claimed was defamatory language in her letter to the commission. He then stated that he would hold her in contempt if she again appeared in his courtroom unless she came as a party or a witness. Such conduct failed to comply with the contempt procedures of Code Civ.

Proc., § 1211, and exhibited malice, since it was done for a vindictive and punitive purpose.

(13a, 13b) Judges § 6.2—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Grounds—Willful Misconduct.—A justice court judge engaged in willful misconduct by abusing the contempt power and failing to conduct himself in court proceedings in a manner promoting public confidence in the impartiality of the judiciary, where he improperly summoned and questioned a criminal defendant regarding an uncharged collateral matter, and then held her in contempt and immediately jailed her when she timely invoked her constitutional right to remain silent.

(14) Contempt § 1—Nature of Contempt Power.—In contempt proceedings, the court is often the prosecutor, judge, and jury; the contempt power is unique because it permits a single official to deprive a citizen of his or her fundamental liberty interest without all of the procedural safeguards normally accompanying such a deprivation. The power of contempt is necessarily of an arbitrary nature, and should, therefore, be used with great prudence and caution. A judge should bear in mind that he is engaged not so much in vindicating his own character, as in promoting the respect due to the administration of the laws.

(15) Judges § 6.2—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Grounds—Willful Misconduct.—The right to disqualify a judge, guaranteed by Code Civ. Proc., § 170.6, would be undermined and perhaps vitiated if the disqualified judge were permitted to circumvent the disqualification by initiating advice to another judicial officer on how to decide the matter. Hence, a justice court judge engaged in willful misconduct where, despite his acknowledgment of the need to avoid influencing another judge and his admission to two deputy public defenders that he had acted improperly in a previous case by sending a letter to the new judge assigned to a case after his disqualification, he again gave unsolicited advice to a judicial officer who was assigned to a case from which he had been disqualified under Code Civ. Proc., § 170.6.

(16) Judges § 6.2—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Grounds—Willful Misconduct.—A justice court judge committed willful misconduct where, apparently out of an ongoing and growing animosity towards a courtroom spectator, he adjudged her in contempt for being improperly attired and then, as she was being led out of the courtroom, he ordered that she not be allowed to make a telephone call, in violation of Pen. Code, § 851.5, subd. (a), thereby jeopardizing her ability to obtain relief by a petition for habeas corpus. Singling the spectator out for such treatment clearly did not serve to promote public confidence in the impartiality of the judiciary, notwithstanding the fact that the spectator may have been a controversial and difficult individual; a judge's prime responsibility is the evenhanded dispensation of justice, even for the controversial and difficult persons in society.

(17a, 17b) Judges § 6—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Removal—Numerous Incidents of Wilful Misconduct and Prejudicial Conduct.—Removal was the proper discipline for a justice court judge found guilty of eight charges of willful misconduct arising out of four separate incidents and ten charges of prejudicial conduct. Despite the judge's alleged inexperience, offered in mitigation of the punishment, he engaged in serious, repeated acts constituting abuse of the contempt power, improper attempts to influence matters from which he was disqualified, and taking reprisals against one who complained of his conduct to the Commission on Judicial Performance. Moreover, he continued to engage in such conduct after his attention was drawn to his improprieties.

[See Cal.Jur.3d, Judges, § 62 et seq.; Am.Jur.2d, Judges, § 18 et seq.]

(18) Judges § 6.4—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Proceedings—Application of Sanction—Consideration of Facts.—Choosing the proper sanction for judicial misconduct is an art, not a science, and turns on the facts of the case at bar.

(19) Judges § 6.4—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Proceedings—Application of Sanction—Temporary Suspension From Office.—A temporary suspension from office is not available as a sanction for judicial misconduct. The Supreme Court possesses no authority to apply such a sanction, since the Constitution specifically empowers it only to censure or remove a judge in cases of misconduct (Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (c)).

(20) Judges § 6—Removal, Censure, and Other Discipline—Purpose.—The purpose of judicial disciplinary proceedings is not to punish errant judges, but to protect the judicial system and those subject to the awesome power that judges wield.

OPINION

THE COURT.—The Commission on Judicial Performance recommended that Judge Robert H. Furey, Jr., of the Catalina Justice Court District, Los Angeles County, be removed for "wilful misconduct in office" (hereafter wilful misconduct) and "conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice that brings the judicial office into disrepute" (prejudicial conduct). (Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18, subd. (c).) The judge petitions this court for review. (Cal. Rules of Court, rule 919.) As will appear, we adopt the recommendation.

The petitioner became a member of the State Bar in 1977. For somewhat over a year he engaged in private practice. Later he served as a deputy district attorney in Los Angeles County for approximately two years and then, again for about two years, as a deputy public defender.

Early in 1983 petitioner donned his judicial robe, having won election to the Justice Court of the Catalina Judicial District. The justice court on Santa Catalina Island (Catalina) is in session one day each week. By assignment of the Judicial Council, the judge spends the remainder of the week sitting in a variety of municipal courts on the mainland.

Responding to allegations of possible improprieties by petitioner, the Commission on Judicial Performance (Commission) conducted a preliminary investigation pursuant to rule 904 of the Rules of Court. It concluded that formal proceedings should be instituted and notified petitioner accordingly. (Cal. Const., art. VI, § 18; Cal. Rules of Court, rules 901-922.) The notice of formal proceedings charged petitioner with several acts of wilful misconduct, prejudicial conduct, and persistent failure or inability to perform his duties.

Subsequently, we appointed three special masters—all distinguished jurists, two retired, one active—to hear the evidence and report to the Commission. (Cal. Rules of Court, rule 907.) After 11 days of hearings, the masters announced their findings of fact and conclusions of law. Petitioner filed objections to the masters' report and presented his views to the Commission. After adopting the substance of the report, the Commission, by a vote of seven to one, recommended to us that petitioner be removed from office.

In his petition to review the recommendation the judge does not, for the most part, dispute its factual underpinnings. Rather, he maintains that the actions complained of lacked malice and thus constitute at most the lesser charge of prejudicial conduct. He further contends that in any event removal from office is too severe a penalty for what he characterizes as no more than "serious procedural shortcomings."

I. STANDARD OF REVIEW

(1a) As is our duty, we independently review the findings of the Commission to ensure that there is clear and convincing evidence to sustain the charge to a reasonable certainty. (Gonzalez v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1983) 33 Cal.3d 359, 365 [188 Cal.Rptr. 880, 657 P.2d 372 ]; Geiler v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications (1973) 10 Cal.3d 270, 275 [110 Cal.Rptr. 201, 515 P.2d 1].) We do, however, give special weight to the factual determinations by the masters, who are best able to evaluate the truthfulness of witnesses appearing before them. (Gubler v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1984) 37 Cal.3d 27, 34 [207 Cal.Rptr. 171, 688 P.2d 551]; Wenger v. Commission on Judicial Performance (1981) 29 Cal.3d 615, 623 [175 Cal.Rptr. 420, 630 P.2d 954].)

(2) A judge's behavior must constantly reaffirm fitness for the serious responsibilities of judicial office. (Geiler, supra, 10 Cal.3d at p. 281.) Censure or removal from office is appropriate only when the judge fails to meet this standard by engaging in wilful misconduct or prejudicial conduct. (3a) The charge of wilful misconduct refers to "unjudicial conduct which a judge acting in his judicial capacity commits in bad faith." (Id. at p. 284.) (4) The lesser charge of prejudicial conduct comprises that which the judge undertakes in good faith but which would nonetheless appear to an objective observer to be unjudicial and harmful to the public esteem of the judiciary. It also refers to unjudicial conduct committed in bad faith by a judge not acting in an official capacity. (Geiler, supra, 10 Cal.3d at p. 284 & fn. 11; Gonzalez, supra, 33 Cal.3d at p. 365.)

(3b) The critical distinction between wilful misconduct and prejudicial conduct is the presence of malice. Before reviewing the charged incidents of misconduct we must consider petitioner's contention that the masters and the Commission applied an incorrect definition of this state of mind. The report of the masters, adopted in substantially unchanged form by the Commission, refers to bad faith as "the intentional commission of acts which the judge knew or should have known were beyond his lawful power, engaging in a pervasive course of conduct of overreaching his authority." (McCartney v. Commission on Judicial Qualifications (1974) 12 Cal.3d 512, 531 [116 Cal.Rptr. 260, 526 P.2d 268]; Geiler, supra, 10 Cal.3d at p. 286.) A similar standard is articulated in Gonzalez, which declares that bad faith is "equivalent to actual malice and encompasses the intentional commission of acts which the judge knew or reasonably should have known were beyond his lawful power, as well as acts which though within the ambit of lawful judicial authority are committed for purposes other than the faithful discharge of judicial duties." (Gonzalez, supra, 33 Cal.3d at p. 365.) Admittedly, these cases might be understood as suggesting that malice for purposes of judicial discipline is solely a question of the judge's actual or constructive knowledge of the scope of his authority.

Other cases make it plain, however, that in the present context malice includes a second element: improper purpose. Our recent opinion in Gubler, supra, 37 Cal.3d at page 46, footnote 7, specifically rejected the single-pronged standard applied by the masters and Commission in the case at bar. We there observed that bad faith requires a "malicious or corrupt purpose beyond mere actual or constructive knowledge of lack of power." (Id. at p. 59.) In Wenger, supra, 29 Cal.3d at page 622, footnote 4, we made this two-pronged standard even more explicit by defining bad faith as requiring that the judge "(1) committed acts he knew or should have known to be beyond his power, (2) for a purpose other than faithful discharge of judicial duties." We reaffirm the latter test.

II. CHARGED INSTANCES OF MISCONDUCT

Applying the above standards, we evaluate the various incidents found by the masters and the Commission to constitute wilful misconduct or prejudicial conduct.[1]

The Hatton Incident

(5) On February 10, 1983, petitioner presided over a proceeding involving Autry Lee Hatton, who, a year previously, had been convicted of

[1] Count I in the notice of formal proceedings alleged various charges of wilful misconduct and count II instances of prejudicial conduct, often arising out of the same incident. For ease of reference we have organized the discussion by incident rather than by count or specific charge of wrongdoing. In addition, count III accused petitioner of persistent failure or inability to perform the judge's duties. This is a lesser charge as to which the masters made no findings; we do not further consider it here.

vehicular manslaughter and sentenced by another judge to summary probation for two years on the condition that he complete five hundred hours of community service during the first year. Hatton, who was to account for his community service, attempted to explain to petitioner that he had a medical appointment and was in pain, but petitioner interrupted him, directing him to return in the afternoon with his attorney. He further warned the defendant that if he had to tell him one more time, he would find him in contempt. Hatton replied "All right. I don't know why you are harassing me." Petitioner immediately held him in contempt of court for his utterance and remanded him "right now."

The matter was trailed into the afternoon, at which time counsel appeared on behalf of defendant Hatton. Counsel objected to petitioner's order that the matter be put over to the following day and requested him to set bail, arguing that the defendant was experiencing health problems and had a medical appointment for that day, that he was in any event eligible for release on his own recognizance, and that he had never failed to appear in the past. Petitioner set bail and ordered Hatton to remain in custody and to be medically examined at the county jail forthwith.

The following day petitioner purged Hatton's contempt following an apology for the incident. He then observed that his sentence seemed very lenient in view of the seriousness of the crime, and he noted that Hatton had apparently performed only about half of the required 500 hours of community service. After his counsel described the defendant's medical condition, petitioner—on the recommendation of the deputy city attorney—summarily revoked probation and set a formal probation violation hearing for the following month.

Petitioner presided over the probation hearing, which occurred despite defense counsel's objection that there was no written notice of the claimed violation. Although Hatton had a note from a doctor outlining his medical condition, petitioner chided him for his alleged failure to obey his earlier order to "come in with something more than a perfunctory letter from the doctor" and had him remanded to the county jail for 180 days. The appellate department of the superior court subsequently reversed the order revoking probation and the jail sentence, directing the municipal court to terminate all proceedings against Hatton.

Petitioner was charged with wilful misconduct for abuse of the contempt power, denying the defendant his full right to be heard according to law, failure to conduct himself in court proceedings in a manner that promotes public confidence in the impartiality of the judiciary, and engaging in a vengeful and punitive pattern of conduct toward the defendant. He was also charged with prejudicial conduct in acting with unwarranted impatience, discourtesy, or hostility toward an unrepresented defendant.

The masters made no finding on the charge of vengeful and punitive conduct or on the alleged denial of the defendant's right to be heard. They concluded that the charge of prejudicial conduct for impatience or hostility toward an unrepresented defendant was true. But considering the mere one or two months that petitioner had occupied his office at the time of the incident and his understandable reliance on the representations of an experienced prosecutor, they determined that his behavior in the remaining matters (abuse of the contempt power and failure to conduct himself in a manner that promotes public confidence in the impartiality of the judiciary) was not sufficiently aggravated to constitute wilful misconduct, but was merely prejudicial conduct.

Petitioner has stipulated to the material facts of this incident and does not contest that his actions were prejudicial to the administration of justice. In any event we are persuaded that clear and convincing evidence supports the Commission's findings of fact on the point.

(6) We note, however, that there is considerable overlap in the three findings of prejudicial conduct. Obviously, actions such as these cannot be equated with the criminal law, in which each additional accusation exposes the defendant to increased punishment. Nonetheless, although there is no rigid formula for determining the proper outcome in a case alleging judicial impropriety, the number and quality of the charges found to be true assumes importance as one of the guidelines we apply in making the difficult decision of discipline. (Wenger, supra, 29 Cal.3d at p. 653; see also Gonzalez, supra, 33 Cal.3d at p. 377.) Duplicative findings should for that reason be avoided. The charges of abuse of the contempt power, as well as impatience and hostility toward Hatton, are two related but conceptually distinct allegations of prejudicial conduct that have properly been found true. But the charge that petitioner failed to conduct himself in a manner promoting public confidence in the judiciary, although supported by the facts, appears to focus on the same misconduct that underlies the other two allegations, and we therefore dismiss it.[2]

The Kabbaze Incident

(7) While petitioner was presiding in the Los Angeles County Municipal Court, Anthony Kabbaze appeared before him in propria persona to

[2]We do not wish to intimate that we object to the bringing of potentially overlapping charges; obviously, the Commission may make any charges justified by the evidence. But because the disposition of a case depends in large measure on the nature and number of charges found to be true, we should not consider overlapping findings in reaching our decision, nor should the Commission take them into account in making its recommendation.

request more time to pay a traffic fine. Another judge had previously imposed on him a sentence of $300 or 10 days in prison. Petitioner refused the request, telling him "it is $300 or 10 days today." Kabbaze pointed out that others in the court were obtaining continuances, but petitioner warned him to say nothing further and remanded him to serve the 10 days. As Kabbaze was being directed toward the lockup, he muttered the word "tremendous" under his breath. Petitioner immediately adjudged him to be in contempt of court and sentenced him to five days in jail. Kabbaze then articulated a long voiceless palatal fricative ("shhh") that petitioner believed was followed by "it"; he again held Kabbaze in contempt and imposed another sentence of five days. Later that day a deputy public defender interceded on his behalf and persuaded petitioner, on Kabbaze's apology, to purge the contempt and grant him a continuance to pay the balance of the fine.

The record supports the masters' conclusion that the above events are true. They further resolved that the charge of abuse of the contempt power as well as that of impatience and hostility toward an unrepresented defendant constituted merely prejudicial conduct in these circumstances. It is undisputed that petitioner did not follow the mandated contempt procedure (Code Civ. Proc., § 1211) and acted unjudiciously toward Kabbaze. But petitioner testified that he acted solely to maintain control of the crowded courtroom and that he did not intend that Kabbaze remain in custody beyond that afternoon. We note also that he had then been on the bench for less than half a year, and we therefore adopt the conclusion of the masters and the Commission that this incident reflects merely two charges of prejudicial conduct.

The Hughes Incident

(8) Defendant Bradley Hughes appeared before petitioner on Catalina and filed a motion to disqualify him under Code of Civil Procedure section 170.6. Petitioner ordered the case transferred to San Pedro. He then wrote an unbidden note to the judge of that court, advising him the "standard" sentence for the violation in question was $100 or three days in jail, but that he recommended a stiffer sentence on account of Hughes's alleged bad attitude.

The notice of formal proceedings included two charges of wilful misconduct arising out of this episode: offering unsolicited advice to another judge on a case from which he had been disqualified, and vengeful and punitive conduct. We dismiss the latter because it appears in this case merely to specify his motivation in the giving of the advice, thus duplicating the focus of the former charge.

The allegation of giving unsolicited advice is amply confirmed in the record. The masters found that the communication was for a vindictive and punitive purpose in view of the fact that petitioner was disqualified and had earlier placed Hughes in custody for inability to post bail on the offense; this would support a finding that he acted with malice and that sending the note thus constituted wilful misconduct. Despite the obvious and grave impropriety of petitioner's action, the masters and Commission legitimately concluded that in light of petitioner's inexperience and his admission soon afterwards that his action was wrong, he engaged only in prejudicial conduct.

The Hamilton Incident

(9a) Petitioner was presiding in the Los Angeles Municipal Court when John Hamilton appeared before him to discuss his inability to pay a fine. Petitioner had presided over his trial for failure, as a pedestrian, to yield the right of way to a vehicle. He knew that Hamilton was indigent and possibly mentally imbalanced. He also believed, on the basis of reports of prior incidents in the courthouse, that he was potentially violent. He thus ordered that Hamilton's bag (which was out of his reach) be searched. This revealed some food and a small paring knife with a thin serrated blade measuring barely four and one-quarter inches. Petitioner promptly found Hamilton in violation of Penal Code section 171b, which prohibits bringing into a courtroom a knife with a blade in excess of four inches, and had him remanded, setting bail at $10,000.

That afternoon, on petitioner's initiative, a deputy public defender appeared with Hamilton. Petitioner found Hamilton in contempt for entering the courtroom with a knife and sentenced him to five days in jail. He further ordered a mental evaluation under Penal Code section 4011.6. When the deputy public defender objected to the examination, petitioner imposed on Hamilton a $500 fine, to be served at the rate of $30 per day, while continuing to insist on a mental evaluation. Hamilton reacted by informing petitioner that he was "out of order" and "schizophrenic," and that he, Hamilton, was "God" and "part heir of the Giannini family." Petitioner found him guilty of two more counts of contempt, each of which was punished by a consecutive sentence of an additional five days, plus fines of $500 for each count, to be served at the rate of $30 per day. The punishment thus amounted to 15 days in jail and a total fine of $1,500. The superior court subsequently granted Hamilton's petition for a writ of habeas corpus.

The Commission charged petitioner with abuse of the contempt power (wilful misconduct) and unwarranted impatience, discourtesy and hostility towards an unrepresented defendant (prejudicial conduct). The masters and the Commission concluded that petitioner's fears arising out of reports of a prior knife incident, as corroborated by the bailiff, mitigated petitioner's conduct, and they therefore found only prejudicial conduct.

We agree that the actions at the very least reflect conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice. Remanding Hamilton to custody initially could not be justified for failure to pay the fine for the underlying infraction nor was it appropriate as punishment for contempt for having a knife in the courtroom in the absence of written findings and an order. Indeed, the search of a bag on the basis of rumors regarding an earlier incident was itself questionable, as was petitioner's overreaction to a small paring knife that was in any event beyond the defendant's reach. (Cf. In re Jasper (1973) 30 Cal.App.3d 985 [106 Cal.Rptr. 754].)

(10) Even more troubling is the fact that when the deputy public defender later questioned the order for a mental observation because the examination might not be possible within the five-day period of incarceration, petitioner imposed a fine of $500, to be served at $30 per day, in addition to the original sentence of five days in jail. The transcript reveals that petitioner was aware that Hamilton was indigent and would be compelled to work the fine off at the daily rate. He thus increased the penalty for contempt far beyond the five days permitted by law (Code Civ. Proc., § 1218; In re Antazo (1970) 3 Cal.3d 100 [89 Cal.Rptr. 255, 473 P.2d 999]) to an effective period of incarceration of some 22 days simply to ensure that Hamilton would be held in jail long enough for a mental examination.

(9b) The ensuing two contempt counts, triggered by Hamilton's delusional remarks, suffer from all the shortcomings of the foregoing but are further defective because they impose consecutive sentences for a single course of conduct. (See, e.g., In re Keller (1975) 49 Cal.App.3d 663 [123 Cal.Rptr. 223].) The result is that a mentally disturbed, indigent defendant—who had the misfortune to have a small paring knife in his bag while requesting an extension of time to pay a $50 fine for jaywalking—was effectively sentenced by petitioner to approximately 65 days in jail. There is little doubt that Hamilton may have been unstable and in need of treatment, but these punitive measures bear virtually no relation to his almost trivial offense and his obvious need for care.

The Anderson Incident

(11) On February 14, 1984, petitioner was assigned to hear traffic infraction cases in the South Bay Judicial District. Upon taking the bench he made some preliminary remarks and then announced to the assembled defendants that if there was a discrepancy between their version of the facts and that of a police officer, he would always believe the latter because perjury was a felony and a policeman would not jeopardize his career over such an insignificant matter.

Defendant Anderson appeared in propria persona to contest a traffic citation. A police officer testified for the prosecution. During his defense, Anderson commenced reading a Vehicle Code section. Petitioner, cut him short and found him guilty, imposing a fine and penalty assessment. The appellate department of the superior court later reversed the judgment because Anderson had been denied an opportunity to cross-examine the police officer and to make a closing argument.

The masters' conclusion, adopted by the Commission, was that petitioner's announcement to the assembled defendants constituted wilful misconduct, i.e., failure to conduct himself in a manner that promotes public confidence in the impartiality of the judiciary. Also found to be wilful misconduct was his denial of a defendant's right to be heard by preventing him from cross-examining the witness against him and making a closing argument. We note that both aspects of the incident interfered with fundamental precepts of our judicial system. In fact, petitioner does not dispute that he was or should have been aware that such actions would be highly improper. As both a former deputy district attorney and a former deputy public defender he could scarcely have avoided being intimately familiar with the presumption of innocence and the right of an accused to cross-examine the witnesses against him.

Thus the only issue is whether the second prong of the definition of malice is met. As noted above, there must be "clear and convincing evidence" that his purpose was "malicious or corrupt." (Gubler, supra, 37 Cal.3d at p. 59.) The Commission contends that his corrupt purpose was to coerce guilty pleas and thereby expedite the calendar. We therefore defer to its finding and conclude that petitioner was guilty of wilful misconduct.
